

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

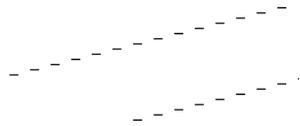

1
A-Azt

THOMSON
—★—™
GALE

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with
THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture

Civie Green

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design™ and Thomson Learning™ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact
The Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at <http://www.gale.com>

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-7876-4004-2

1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002
282'.03—dc21
2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)

0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)
0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)
0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)
0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)
0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)

0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D.

Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center,
Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D.,
Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D.,
Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad
School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana

Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal
Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops,
Washington, D.C.

Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief,
The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly,
Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean,
The Pontifical College Josephinum,
Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr.
Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St.
Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover,
Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head,
Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries,
The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior
Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses
Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

A

A CAPPELLA

A term referring to choral music without instrumental accompaniment. During the Renaissance the performances of the SISTINE CHOIR in Rome were considered exemplary; and since the use of instruments was forbidden by its statutes, the term came to be used for any performance in a manner similar to those in the Sistine Chapel. The Sistine tradition of unaccompanied voices stems from the monophonic, purely vocal style of plainchant. Although musical historians of the 19th century believed that all music before 1600 was a cappella, they ignored the vast amount of evidence, especially that of paintings, to the contrary. Even in liturgical performance the older procedure was to double vocal lines with instruments of disparate tone colors, thus enhancing the individuality of the parts and accenting the music's polyphonic character. The a cappella practice is related to polyphony in what is called the "Palestrina style," a term referring not only to works of G. PALESTRINA but also to imitations of his style, e.g., the stile antico of the baroque era. Though the concertato style with instruments became widespread during the 17th and 18th centuries, the Sistine Choir continued its a cappella tradition, thus furnishing a performance model for the revival of liturgical polyphony in the 19th century (see CAECILIAN MOVEMENT).

Bibliography: K. G. FELLERER, The History of Catholic Church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961). J. HANDSCHIN, "Die Grundlagen des A-capella-Stils," Hans Häusermann und der Häusermannsche Privatchor (Zurich 1929). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). W. APEL, Harvard Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

[L. J. WAGNER]

AACHEN

City in north Rhine-Westphalia, west central Germany. The scene of treaties ending the Wars of Devolution (1668) and of the Austrian Succession (1748), it was in great part destroyed in World War II (1944). The Diocese of Aachen (Aquisgranensis) has been suffragan to Cologne since 1930. In 2001 it had 590 secular and 176 religious priests, 238 members of men's religious institutes, 1,305 members of women's religious institutes, 539 parishes, and 22 churches or mission stations. There are 1,232,300 Catholics out of a population of 2,012,000. It is 3,937 square kilometers in area. The name Aquae Grani, first mentioned at the time of Charlemagne, means water.

The earliest traces of Christianity appear in graves and in a chapel (5th century) at an ancient bath shrine, which King Pepin replaced with a small palace chapel. Charlemagne (786–814) had the palace and chapel rebuilt (c. 786), and in the last part of his reign resided in Aachen, the center of the Carolingian Empire. Aachen's importance appears also in the many Carolingian synods held there, the Aachen rule for canons, and the influence of its court academy and palace school during the Carolingian Renaissance. As a result of the tradition of Charlemagne, 30 German kings were crowned in the cathedral (936–1531), which rulers favored with gifts. Until 1802 Aachen belonged to the Diocese of Liège. Under the French it became a diocese (1802–21), suffragan to Mechelen; then it was suppressed and became part of the restored See of COLOGNE (1821). Resurrected as a see by the Prussian Concordat (1929), Aachen was canonically erected in 1930.

The cathedral, a major monument, began with the octagonal building of Charlemagne, modeled after S. Vitale in RAVENNA and the Theodosian tomb chapel at Old St. Peter's in Rome; it was probably dedicated July 17, 800. Gothic side chapels were added in the 15th century; the hall choir was completed in 1414. Cathedral treasures include the throne of Charlemagne (with six steps modeled after Solomon's), Carolingian and Ottonian Gospels, the cross of Lothair, the golden table, the pulpit of Henry II, and the bronze corona chandelier of Frederick I Barbarossa.

Shrine of Charlemagne, detail, 1200–1215, Aachen Cathedral, Aachen, Germany. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

From Pepin's time the palace chapel housed important relics, and the number increased under Charlemagne. Its Great Relics, apparently exhibited in Charlemagne's time, are the swaddling clothes of Christ, the loin cloth of the Lord, the cloth for John the Baptist's head, and the cloak of Mary. Veneration of these increased through the Middle Ages, with pilgrims coming from all central Europe. The seven-year cycle of the pilgrimage is known from the 14th century. At first kept in a Carolingian shrine, the Great Relics have been in a Gothic Marian shrine since 1239. The Shrine of Charlemagne (1215) houses his remains, exhumed in 1165 when a local cult of St. Charlemagne developed. The cathedral also has a 14th-century statue of Our Lady that is venerated as miraculous.

Many spiritual institutions have arisen in Aachen: St. Adalbert chapter, the Benedictine Burtscheid, smaller cloisters, hospitals, and a leprosarium outside the city. Charitable foundations include the 13th-century Alexian Brothers (Beghards) and the 17th-century Sisters of St. Elizabeth. Three pupils of the poetess Luise Hensel, a teacher at St. Leonhard (1827–32), founded orders: Clara FEY (1815–94), Franziska SCHERVIER (1819–76), and Pauline von Mallinckrodt (1818–81). Around Leonhard Nellessen (1783–1859), pastor of St. Nikolaus, arose the Aachen circle of priests, devoted to pastoral care and works of charity. Aachen was the origin of the May devotion in the 19th century. The Francis Xavier Mission Society (now part of the Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH) and the Child Jesus Society (now part of the Pontifical Association of the Holy Childhood) were founded there. Philipp Höver founded the Society of the Poor Brothers of St. Francis to care for school dropouts (1857). Recently the administration of Misereor, a work originated by the German episcopacy for spiritual and bodily needs in underdeveloped lands, has been in Aachen.

Bibliography: J. RAMACKERS, "Werkstattheimat der Grabplatte Papst Hadrians I," Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 59 (Freiburg 1964) 36–78; "Das Grab Karls des Grossen und die Frage nach dem Ursprung des Aachener Oktogons," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 75 (Munich 1956) 123–153; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 1: 1–3. Zeitschrift des Aachener Geschichtsvereins, v.1–76 (Aachen 1879–1964). Aachener Heimatgeschichte, ed. A. HUYSKENS (Aachen 1924). Handbuch des Bistums A. (2d ed. Aachen 1962). J. TORSY, Geschichte des Bistums A. während der französischen Zeit (1802–1814) (Bonn 1940). C. FAYMONVILLE et al., eds., Die Kunstdenkmäler der Stadt A., 3 v. (Die Kunstdenkmäler der Rheinprovinz, ed. P. CLEMEN, v.10; Düsseldorf 1916–24). Aachener Kunstblätter, v.16–29 (1957–64). W. BOECKELMANN, "Von den Ursprüngen der Aachener Pfalzkapelle," Wallraf-Richartz-Jahrbuch 19 (1957) 9–38. W. SCHÖNE, "Die künstlerische und liturgische Gestalt der Pfalzkapelle Karls des Grossen in A.," Zeitschrift für Kunstwissenschaft 15 (1961) 97–148. H. P. HILGER, Der Skulpturenzyklus im Chor des Aachener Domes (Die Kunstdenkmäler des Rheinlands, op. cit. Beiheft 8; Essen 1961). J. FLECKENSTEIN, Die Hofkapelle der deutschen Könige, v. 1 (Stuttgart 1959). A. SCHULTE, Die Kaiser- und Königskrönungen zu Aachen, 813–1531 (Darmstadt 1965). E. MEUTHEN, Aachener Urkunden 1101–1250 (Bonn 1972). V. GIELEN, Aachen unter Napoleon (Aachen 1977). W. KAEMMERER, Aachener Quellentexte (Aachen 1980). R. SCHLÖGL, Glaube und Religion in der Säkularisierung: die katholische Stadt—Köln, Aachen, Münster—1700–1840 (Munich 1995). A. HAUSMANN, Aachen im Mittelalter: königlicher Stuhl und kaiserliche Stadt (Aachen 1997). D.P.J. WYNANDS, ed., Der Aachener Marienschrein: eine Festschrift (Aachen 2000). M. KRAMP, ed., Krönungen: Könige in Aachen, Geschichte und Mythos (Mainz 2000).

[J. RAMACKERS]

AARON

Son of Amram and Jochabed; brother of MOSES and Mariam (Ex 6.20); and husband of Elisabe, who bore him Nadab, Abiu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (6.23). The actual role of Aaron has been obscured in the development of the PENTATEUCH. Most scholars question whether Aaron appeared in the original YAHWIST tradition and suggest that a later editor was responsible for linking him with Moses.

An illustration of scenes from Exodus, chapters 5 and 7 in which Aaron and Moses ask Pharaoh to let the Hebrews go to the desert to worship God, and Aaron's staff turns into a snake which eats the staffs of the Egyptian magicians. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

In the ELOHIST tradition Aaron acts as Moses' deputy, holds up his hands at Raphidim (Ex 17.10–12), goes up the mountain with him and sees the Lord (19. 24), and acts as leader with Hur in Moses' absence. He accedes to the wishes of the insecure Hebrews, casts the golden calf, and constructs an altar in its honor (32.1–24). He joins Mariam in a complaint against Moses' marriage to a Chusite woman, although the text indicates their envy of Moses as the instrument of God's revelation (Nm 12.1–15). Later, the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS cast Aaron in the role of religious leader who figured prominently in the liberation of Israel. When he and Moses appear before the pharaoh, Aaron brings on the plagues (Ex 7.19–20; 8.1–2, 12–13). As coadjutor of Moses, he too suffers from the complaints of the people (16.2), is likewise consulted by them (Nm 9.6), is addressed by God (Ex 9.8–10), and is forbidden to enter the Promised Land because of the incident at Meriba, where he sinned against the Lord (Nm 20.1–13). The tragic fate of the followers of Core, the checking of the plague (Nm ch. 16), as well as the event of the flowering rod, are presented as the divine witness to the priesthood of Aaron with its exclusive rights and privileges (Nm 17.16–26). Tradition assigns Mt. Hor (Nm 20.22–29) and Moser (Dt 10.6) as the location of his death.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1–2. H. JUNKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 1:3–4. F. MAASS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 1:2–3. F. S. NORTH, "Aaron's Rise in Prestige," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 6 (1954) 191–199.

[E. ROESSLER]

ABAD CASASEMPERE, AMALIA, AND COMPANIONS, BB.

Lay martyrs; d. Aug. 20, 1936 and Jan. 31, 1937, Valencia, Spain. Although the venom of the Republican Guards was vented primarily against priests and religious during the Spanish Civil War, many devout lay people also fell victim to the rebels' hatred of the Church. These women, members of Catholic Action, are representative of the numerous lay martyrs of the period. Many became suspect because they owned a Rosary or were seen attending Mass. Included below, in chronological order of their martyrdom, are single women, wives, mothers, and widows aging in age from 31 to 83.

María Climet Mateu (b. May 13, 1887, Xátiva; d. there, Aug. 20, 1936) was a self-supporting, single woman, who was actively involved in all aspects of parochial life. She was martyred together with her mother, who has not been beatified.

Francisca Cualladó Baixauli (b. Dec. 3, 1890, Valencia; d. Sept. 19, 1936, Benifaiós) was a seamstress, who openly lived and proclaimed her Catholic faith through her frequent participation in the Eucharist and service to others.

Crescencia VALLS ESPÍ (b. June 9, 1863, Ontinyent; d. there, Sept. 20, 1936) contributed to the support of her family through her embroidery, while participating actively in various parish associations. She was martyred with three of her sisters.

Amalia Abad Casasempere (b. Dec. 11, 1897, Alcoi, Alicante; d. Sept. 21, 1936, Benillup, Alicante) was the widowed mother of two daughters. While fulfilling her familial duties, she was involved with various religious groups and in caring for the poor.

María de la Purificación Vidal Pastor (b. Sept. 14, 1892, Alzira; d. Sept. 21, 1936, Corbera), a committed single woman, lived a life of intense Eucharistic and Marian piety.

Josefina Moscardó Montalvá (b. April 10, 1880, Alzira; d. there, Sept. 22, 1936), like many other unmarried lay women of this group, was known for her generosity to all in need. She openly practiced her faith and participated in many parish activities.

Sofía Ximénez Ximénez (b. Oct. 15, 1876, Valencia; d. Sept. 23, 1936, Paterna), widowed mother of two children, whom she supported by her own labor while still finding time to participate in the apostolic works of the parish. She was killed with her sister, Bl. María de la Purificación Ximénez, and Bl. María Josefa del Rio Messa (see TORRENTALLÉ PARAIRE, ELVIRA).

Encarnación GIL VALLS (b. Jan. 27, 1888, Ontinyent; d. Sept. 24, 1936, L'Ollería) was considered especially dangerous by the anti-religious authorities because she taught children and shared with them her profound faith.

Herminia Martínez Amigó (b. July 31, 1887, Puzol; d. Sept. 26, 1936, Gilet), known for her generosity and numerous charitable works, was shot to death with her husband, who has not been beatified.

María Jordá Botella (b. Jan. 26, 1905, Alcoi, Alicante; d. Sept. 27, 1936, Benifallim, Alicante), the youngest of the group, was known for her undaunted optimism and the joy with which she carried out her lay apostolate.

Florencia Caerols Martínez (b. Feb. 20, 1890, Caudete, Albacete; d. Oct. 2, 1936, Rotglá Corbera), an unmarried textile worker, served her parish as a catechist and by visiting the sick.

Ana María Aranda Riera (b. Jan. 24, 1888, Denia, Alicante; d. Oct. 14, 1936, Paterna), a single woman, attended Mass daily, participated in various parish groups, and assisted with the many works of the Church.

Társila Córdoba Belda (b. May 8, 1861, Sollana; d. Oct. 17, 1936, Algemesí) suffered much tragedy in her life. After the deaths of her husband and three children, she found the strength through daily Communion to care for the sick, poor, and needy.

María Teresa Ferragut Roig (b. Jan. 14, 1853, Algemesí; d. Oct. 25, 1936, Alzira), the eldest of this group (83), is called the "Mother of the Maccabees" because she died with four of her daughters, three of whom were beatified with her (see MASIÁ FERRAGUD, JESÚS).

María del Carmen Viel Ferrando (b. Nov. 27, 1893, Sueca; d. Nov. 4, 1936, El Saler de Valencia), an unmarried woman, worked with working-class children and collaborated in parish activities.

María del Olvido Noguera Albelda (b. Dec. 30, 1903, Carcaixent; d. Nov. 30, 1936, Benifairó de Valldigna), an unmarried woman, manifested her faith through diverse apostolates in the parish and secular world.

Luisa María Frías Cañizares (b. June 20, 1896, Valencia; d. Dec. 6, 1936, Paterna), an unmarried professor at the University of Valencia, established her lay apostolate in the college setting and the parish. She is remembered for her loving spirit and desire for social justice.

Pilar Villalonga Villalba (b. Jan. 22, 1891, Valencia; d. Dec. 11, 1936, Burjassot), a committed single woman, lived an intensely spiritual life that manifested itself in her public actions and service to the Church.

María Luisa Montesinos Orduña (b. March 3, 1901, Valencia; d. Jan. 31, 1937, Picassent), an unmarried member of various religious groups, was martyred with her father, three siblings, and uncle, none of whom have been beatified.

These 19 women were beatified by Pope John Paul II with José Aparicio Sanz and 232 companions on March 11, 2001.

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCCEL ORTÍ, Martires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). W. H. CARROLL, The Last Crusade (Front Royal, Va. 1996). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993). R. ROYAL, The Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York 2000). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. no. 11 (March 14, 2001), 1–4, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ABANDONMENT, SPIRITUAL

The term can be taken in either an active or a passive sense. In its active sense it refers to a person's self-abandonment to divine providence through the theological virtues. In its passive sense it refers to a condition in which the soul is really, because of sin, or only apparently, forsaken by God. This article refers to abandonment understood as that experience in which it seems to a spiritual person that God has forsaken him. This spiritual abandonment, then, is an interior trial in which the spiritually advanced soul, feeling the painful need of a clearer and stronger possession of God, has the keen impression that God has deserted it and no longer holds it in His favor.

In its less intense form this abandonment makes one feel that God is far away; in its more intense form it makes one feel rejected by God and destined to be lost. Such suffering is experienced only by persons who have reached a high degree of perfection. Although certain forms of abandonment may be experienced as a result of sin or of a lukewarm faith, the real suffering caused by the feeling of being forsaken by God is only conceivable in holy souls for whom God has become the sole object of an intense desire and love.

Christian hagiography from all ages offers examples of spiritual abandonment. Ancient writers such as St. John Climacus and Cassian describe the trial, but references to this suffering are much more abundant among the saints of modern times. This more recent testimony is undoubtedly attributable to the greater number of spiritual biographies and letters of spiritual direction; these manifest more clearly the interior secrets of souls and, notably, the painful aspects of their spiritual lives.

The experience of spiritual abandonment may arise from the purgative contemplation by which God effects the purification of the soul, especially in the passive night of the spirit; or it may be a means whereby already purified souls suffer as victims in union with Christ. In either case this trial enables the soul to share most intimately in the suffering of Christ's abandonment on the cross. This union with the crucified Christ in turn gives rise in the soul to the most sublime acts of self-abandonment.

See Also: SELF-ABANDONMENT, SPIRITUAL; PURIFICATION, SPIRITUAL.

Bibliography: JOHN OF THE CROSS, "The Dark Night," Collected Works, tr. K. KAVANAUGH and O. RODRIGUEZ (Garden City, NY 1964) 295–389. A. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. YORKE SMITH, ed. J. V. BAINVEL (St. Louis 1950). L. CHARDON, The Cross of Jesus, tr. R. T. MURPHY and J. THORNTON, 2 v. (St. Louis 1957–59). H. MARTIN, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire 3:504–517, 631–645.

[K. KAVANAUGH]

ABBA

A Greek transliteration of the Aramaic 'abbā', a vocative or declarative form of ab, "father." The significance of abba in the NT continues to be debated in biblical studies and Christology. Its earliest uses in Christian sources, Gal 4.6 and Rom 8.15, depict Christians crying out Abba during Spirit-inspired prayer to express their adoptive relationship with God. The only other NT occurrence of the term is Mk 14.36, a later witness, where Jesus addresses God as Abba during his agony in the garden. Many interpreters have regarded this Aramaic word as used by Jesus as an instance of the ipsissima vox Iesu. His prayer in Mk 14.36, however, is witnessed by none (see Mk 14.37), raising uncertainty as to the evangelist's source of the wording.

Each of the NT examples of abba is followed in Greek by ho pater, "the father." The seeming redundancy of abba ho pater has been variously explained: ho pater may be understood as a translation into Greek of the Aramaic 'abbā'. Abba could also be taken to mean "God," with the whole expression then meaning "O God, the (or my, or our) Father."

Over the centuries a so-called "abba-problem" has centered at various times on philological, historical, and theological issues (see Fitzmyer, "Abba," 47–50). Scholars have asked whether the historical Jesus would indeed have used this mode of address (i.e. applied such a familial term to God), from what source(s) the early Christians derived their use of the word, what its relation is to other gospel instances where Jesus simply used the word "Father," and what the theological implications of the term are for Jesus himself and for the NT writers, Paul and Mark.

The research of German biblical scholar Joachim Jeremias gave new life to the debate beginning in the 1950s. Jeremias put forth the thesis that in all of pre-Christian Palestinian literature there is no other use of God being addressed as abba by an individual Jew in prayer. He interpreted this as indicating a uniqueness in the relationship between Jesus and God, an idea he linked also with a theory that this particular form of the Aramaic word for “father” had its origin in the chatter of small children, e.g. as in English “Daddy,” “Papa” (see biblio. of Jeremias’ main works on this subject in Fitzmyer, “Abba,” 132, n.1). While Jeremias continued to hold in his later writings that Jesus “spoke to God like a child to its father, simply, inwardly, confidently” (Prayers, 62), he also called it “a piece of inadmissible naivety” (ibid.) to assume, as he had earlier, that Jesus really spoke to his Father like a small child. Nonetheless, popular works and some exegetes have continued to expound Jeremias’ original position.

Integral to the important criticisms leading to various degrees of nuancing, or rejecting, Jeremias’ approach (see the summary in Ashton, ABD 1:7–8) is evidence from Qumran. There are now two known instances, albeit in Hebrew not Aramaic (4Q372 1:16; 4Q460 5:6), where for the first time an individual Jew is seen in pre-Christian Palestinian texts calling upon God as “my father.” This still seems to leave open the question, however, of whether Jesus’s use of the Aramaic term to call upon God was an expression of unique filiation as early in the first century A.D., as he is portrayed doing so.

While some theologians use Jesus’ use of Abba as a starting point in their Christology, others question whether he even voiced the word at all. Feminist theologians, concerned with the problem of language and imagery applied to God, often focus on what abba meant with respect to issues of patriarchy in early Christian communities where it was used.

Bibliography: J. ASHTON, “‘ABBA,’” ABD 1:7–8. J. BARR, “‘Abba’ Isn’t ‘Daddy,’” Journal of Theological Studies 39 (1988) 28–47. M. R. D’ANGELO, “‘Abba and Father: Imperial Theology and the Jesus Traditions,’” Journal of Biblical Literature 111 (1992) 611–30; idem, “Theology in Mark and Q: ‘Abba and ‘Father’ in Context,” Harvard Theological Review 85 (1992) 149–74. J. A. FITZMYER, “‘Abba and Jesus’ Relation to God” in idem, According to Paul (New York/Mahwah 1993) 47–63 (slightly rev. ed. of “‘Abba and Jesus’ Relation to God,” in R. GANTOY (ed.), A cause de l’évangile: Etudes sur les Synoptiques et les Actes offertes au P. Jacques Dupont, O.S.B. à l’occasion de son 70e anniversaire (Lectio divina 123; Paris 1985) 15–38. J. JEREMIAS, The Prayers of Jesus (London 1967). A. SAND, “‘Abba-Vater’ - Gotteserfahrung und Gottesglaube Jesu,” Renovatio 48 (1992) 204–218; E. SCHULLER, “4Q372 1: A Text about Joseph,” Revue de Qumran 14 (1989–90) 349–76; idem, “The Psalm of 4Q372 1 within the Context of Second Temple Prayer,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 54

(1992) 67–79; C. TERNYÁK, “‘Abba’ nel pensiero di Joachim Jeremias,” Folia Theologica 2 (Budapest 1991) 29–60.

[F. M. GILLMAN]

‘ABBĀSIDS

Descendants of ‘Abbās (d. A.D. 653), uncle of Muḥammad the prophet of ISLAM; in A.D. 750 they seized the office of CALIPH earlier held by the Umayyads, and reigned at Baghdad until 1258.

As Muḥammad’s surviving uncle and head of his clan, ‘Abbās would have had a claim to succeed the Prophet after his death in 632, had not ‘Abbās’s delayed conversion to Islam counted against him. His son ‘Abdallāh (d. 687), a prominent religious authority, was governor of Basra under ALI (‘ALĪ IBN ABĪ ṬĀLIB), but later was won to the cause of Mu‘āwīya.

The family played no public role under Mu‘āwīya’s family, the Umayyads, but they were able by clandestine religious-political propaganda to turn to their advantage the social unrest of the early Arab Muslim Empire. Their message was egalitarian and messianic and seems to have incorporated certain Iranian religious ideas palatable to the newly converted. It was discreetly directed by agents in Kufa, the stronghold of Shī‘ī sympathies in Iraq. Under the able Iranian propagandist Abū Muslim, ‘Abbāsīd propaganda found greatest response among the half-Islamized Iranian inhabitants of the old eastern marches of the Persian Empire, Khurasan, a frontier area where Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, Mazdakism, Manichaeism, and Nestorian Christianity had met and mixed. Here in 747 local revolts were raised that, by calling for “an Imām [religious leader] of the Prophet’s family,” grew by 749 into a general rebellion of all disaffected elements in the Umayyad Empire. Shī‘īs participated enthusiastically in the belief that a descendant of ‘Alī would come to power, but it was the head of the ‘Abbāsīd House, Abū al-‘Abbās al-Saffāh (d. 754) who was acclaimed caliph in 749, and who rooted out the Umayyads in every province but Spain.

Like other revolutionary regimes, the ‘Abbāsīds had, when once in power, to reckon on conflicts with the differing groups and interests that had cooperated to give them the victory. Under al-Manṣūr, brother and successor of al-Saffāh, the new regime’s power was consolidated. Abū Muslim was put to death and his closest followers crushed. The hostility of the Shī‘īs pursued the dynasty through all its history, and succeeding ‘Abbāsīds were alternately led to employ repression or placation in dealing with them.

Al-Manṣūr’s new capital on the Tigris, Madīnat al-Salam (popularly known as Baghdad, after an earlier village on that site), was built at the junction of several trade routes, and within 50 years had become one of the great centers of civilization.

With the 'Abbāsīd accession, the transformation of the Islamic polity from an Arab kingdom to the Muslim Empire was completed. The economic base of the dynasty was Mesopotamia, seat of earlier multiracial Middle Eastern empires; it drew heavily on the skills and traditions of the conquered peoples, particularly of converted members of the Sassanian bureaucratic class, and it depended on the military support of the peoples of the eastern frontier. Islamic religion and the Arabic language gave their distinctive stamp to this richly syncretic civilization, but the Arabs had lost their exclusive right to the responsibilities and rewards of empire. Islam, not Arab origin, sufficed for full membership in the Empire, and advancement depended almost solely on the favor of the caliphs, who had now transformed the simplicity of the first caliphs into the elaborate and splendid court of Persian autocrats.

The rapidity with which the cultural brilliance of the 'Abbāsīd prime was reached (under Harūn al-Rashīd, 786–809, and his son al-Ma'mūn, d. 833) led Prof. Arnold Toynbee to argue convincingly that in fact under the aegis of Islam the earlier civilization of Achaemenid times had come again into its own.

However, during the subsequent period (836–92) when the court resided at Samarra, a new royal city north of Baghdad, the caliphs became the virtual prisoners of the elite corps they had formed from Central Asian Turkish slaves. Local rulers asserted themselves in the provinces, the clash of new cultural ideas prepared the way for new heretical movements, and a slave uprising of Africans devastated lower Iraq. Caliphal authority was slowly reasserted after 870, but during the long reign of al-Muqtadir (908–32) the central administration of the empire began a period of self-strangulation through corruption and internal rivalries. In 909 the Isma'īlī Shī'īs established an anticaliphate "of the Children of Fāṭima" in Tunisia (capital at Cairo from 969–1171). From 945 to 1055 the 'Abbāsīds at Baghdad were puppets of the Buwayhid dictators, Persian Shī'īs of the "Twelver" sect. From 1055 to c. 1194 they were under the patronage of sultans of the house of Seljuk, Turkish chiefs whom they invited to rid them of the Buwayhids. The SELJUKS were at least orthodox in practice and led a Sunnī restoration.

In religious as well as imperial theory the caliph was still the sole fount of all validly exercised power, and most Sunnī Muslim monarchs found it advisable to secure a diploma of investiture from Baghdad. This has led to the caliphate's being rather inaccurately likened to the papacy.

A brief restoration of 'Abbāsīd power, in Iraq at least, occurred with the passing of the Seljuks, under the Caliph al-Nāṣir (1180–225). But in 1258 Hulagu, grandson of Genghis Khan, destroyed Baghdad and put the Caliph al-Musta'ṣim to death.

Under the Mamelukes of Cairo, a member of the 'Abbāsīd family was established as caliph there in 1261. This shadow caliphate was continued by his descendants until the end of the sultanate in 1517, but it was only a legal device for the legitimization of Muslim rulers, and the Cairo 'Abbāsīds were little more than court officials.

Bibliography: P. K. HITT, History of the Arabs (6th ed. New York 1958). W. MUIR, The Caliphate, Its Rise, Decline and Fall, rev. T. H. WEIR (Edinburgh 1924). A. J. TOYNBEE, A Study of History, 12 v. (New York 1948–61). B. LEWIS, The Arabs in History (New York 1950); Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. B. LEWIS et al. (2d ed. Leiden 1954–) 1:15–23.

[J. A. WILLIAMS]

ABBELEN, PETER

Controversialist; b. Germany, Aug. 8, 1843; d. Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Aug. 24, 1917. He attended schools at Gaesdonk and Münster in Germany, and St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, where he was ordained Jan. 29, 1868. After teaching for a semester, he joined the La Crosse diocese, where he spent eight years in pastorates at Chippewa Falls, La Crosse, and Prairie du Chien. In 1876 he became spiritual director of the School Sisters of Notre Dame, Milwaukee, whose subsequent progress was credited to his zeal. He wrote a life of Mother Caroline Friess, first superior of the Milwaukee mother-house. He was one of the theologians selected to do preliminary work for the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore. He was named vicar-general of the Milwaukee archdiocese in 1906, and a domestic prelate in 1907.

Acting for Abp. Michael HEISS and others, he became absorbed in the controversy between German- and English-speaking Catholics. The conflict involved questions concerning the selection of a coadjutor for Archbishop HENNI, the juridical status of nationalistic parishes, the Bennett Law requiring the use of English in schools, Cahenslyism, and Americanism. Among the items contained in his petition to Rome in 1886 were the recognition of parochial status for national churches and legislation assigning immigrants to national churches and their children to the schools thereof. The Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith delayed a decision; when rendered through Bps. John Ireland and John Keane, it was generally regarded as unfavorable to Abbelen. He constantly maintained that he had always been guided by moral objectives, and remarked that he thought Peter Cahensly's program would serve the good of immigrants. The controversy was not fully resolved until the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law and the end of World War I.

Bibliography: P. M. ABBELEN, "Memorial on the German Question. . .," in C. J. BARRY, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953) 289–296, with answers to the same, 296–312.

[P. L. JOHNSON]

ABBESS

Term derived from abbot (Aramaic abba, father), "abbess" is the title of a female superior of a monastic community of nuns. Superiors were referred to as mater monasterii, mater monacharum, praeposita; the term "abbess" appeared for the first time in the West on the tomb of a certain "Serena, abbatissa" (d. c. 514) in the Roman church of St. Agnes-Outside-the-Walls. Growing Benedictine influence endowed the office of abbess with a liturgical character, making it elective by vote of the community, prescribing episcopal benediction, and granting the right to the ring, pectoral cross, and crosier. During the Middle Ages, abbesses of great monastic houses exercised practically all the temporal power of abbots and feudal lords, ranking among the nobles of the realm, sitting in parliament and in councils, and recognizing no ecclesiastical authority other than the pope. Many abbesses assumed spiritual power over their nuns also, to the point of incurring stern papal prohibitions against interference in the administration of penance, conferring the veil, and giving benedictions and even sacramental absolution. For such abuses INNOCENT III rebuked abbesses of the royal monasteries in Burgos (see HUELGAS DE BURGOS, ABBEY OF) and Palencia, Spain. The abbess of Conversano in Apulia, Italy, had the right to a quasi-episcopal authority over her clergy until 1810, when PIUS VII abolished her privileges. The abbess of FONTEVRAULT had jurisdiction over both monks and nuns of this monastic establishment, typical of other double MONASTERIES. With the breakdown of the feudal system, the temporal power of abbesses declined.

The title abbess continues to be used in older monastic orders such as Benedictines, Poor Clares, Bridgettines and canonesses, but not in all. In some orders the name is used only in formal communication, and there is no universal legislation concerning the use or non-use of the term. Instead, it is left to each order to state in their Rule or constitutions the title to be used. The 1983 Code of Canon Law of the Latin church uses the generic term "Supreme Moderator" for the person who has authority over all provinces, houses and members of the institute.

The term Superior is used for others who have authority according to the constitutions and within the limits of their office. The Code leaves to each institute the right to decide what title to use for those who exercise authority in it, and stipulates only that those in authority are to be in office for a given period of time according to the nature and needs of the institute, unless the constitutions establish otherwise for the Supreme Moderator and for the Superiors of an autonomous house.

Bibliography: T. J. BOWE, Religious Superioresses: A Historical Synopsis and a Plain Commentary (Washington 1946). J. BEAL, J. CORIDEN and T. GREEN, New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York, NY/Mahwah, NJ 2000).

[M. F. LAUGHLIN/C. BARTONE]

ABBEVILLE, CLAUDE D'

French Capuchin missionary and historian; b. place and date unknown; d. 1616 (not in 1622 or 1623, as some have stated). He entered the order in 1593. In 1611 he volunteered as a missionary in the French expedition to Brazil. He arrived in Maranhão in June 1612 and with six Amerindians returned to France to get aid in December of the same year. With 12 missionaries he returned to Maranhão in June of 1614, but they were expelled in December because of the war between the French and Portuguese. Abbeville's reputation is based on his literary work; he was a keen observer and an impartial historian, the first to write about the Brazilian lands conquered by the French. In August 1612 he was already writing interesting letters about the expedition and the native tribes; these letters were edited six times in French and translated into German (Augsburg 1613) and Italian (Bérgamo-Treviso 1613). His principal work is the history of Maranhão Island and its first evangelization, Histoire de la mission des Pères Capucins en l'isle de Maragnan et terres circonvoisines (Paris 1614). It is valuable for its information on evangelization, colonization, ethnology, and linguistics.

Bibliography: Histoire de la mission des Pères Capucins en l'isle de Maragnan et terres circonvoisines (Paris 1614), Port. tr. S. MILLIET (São Paulo 1945). F. LEITE DE FARIA, Os primeiros missionários do Maranhão (Lisbon 1961).

[M. DE POBLADURA]

ABBO OF FLEURY, ST.

Abbot, writer; b. Orléans, France, c. 945–950; d. La Réole Abbey, Nov. 13, 1004. Offered as an oblate in Fleury, he studied at Paris, Reims, and Orléans. He was ordained in England, where he had been called to preside over the school of Ramsey (985–988). From 988 to 1004 he was abbot of Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire (Fleury). One of the most remarkable teachers of his century, he was also a prolific writer and a staunch defender of papal authority against royal and episcopal power. When commissioned by King ROBERT II to treat with the papacy in the royal interest, Abbo achieved harmony between the Church and the Capetian dynasty. A zealous promoter of ecclesiastical reform and a champion of monastic independence, he obtained papal immunity for his own monastery and carried the principles of Cluny into the monasteries of France and England. Abbo was fatally wounded during a quarrel that arose between his followers and the Gascons outside the Abbey of La Réole, where he was undertaking a reform. He is revered as a martyr and has received public veneration since 1031. The most notable of his writings (PL 139:463–582) are: Apologeticus to Hugh Capet and his son on the rights and duties of clergy, religious, and laity; Liber de computo; Collectio canonum; Passio S. Eadmundi, (ed. Arnold, Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey, London, 1890–96).

Feast: Nov. 13.

Bibliography: Epistola encyclica de caede A. abbatis, Patrologia Latina 139:417–418; ABBO OF FLEURY, Epistolae, Recueil des historiens de Gaule et de la France 10:434–442. AIMOIN, Vita s. Abbonis, Patrologia Latina 139:375–414. A. VAN DE VYVER, “Les Oeuvres inédites d’A.,” Revue Bénédictine 47 (1935) 125–169. P. COUSIN, A. de Fleury-sur-Loire (Paris 1954). M. MOSTERT, The political theology of Abbo of Fleury: A study of the ideas about society and law of the tenth-century monastic reform movement (Hilversum 1987). A. FLICHE, La Réforme grégorienne, 3 v. (Louvain 1924–37) 1:49–59. E. SACKUR, Die Cluniacenser, 2 v. (Halle 1892–94) 1:270–299.

[P. J. MULLINS]

ABBO OF METZ, ST.

Bishop; b. Aquitaine; d. 647. Abbo, or Goericus, was a member of the prominent family of Ansbertina. When St. Arnulf of Metz, a kinsman, resigned from the See of Metz in 629, Abbo succeeded him. The medieval Vita Goerici that gives other details of his life is wholly unreliable. Among the letters of St. Desiderius of Cahors, there is a letter to Abbo and one from him (PL 87:253, 262). It is in the will of King Dagobert (d. 639) that he is called Abbo. He built St. Peter’s in Metz.

Feast: Sept. 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:48–55. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 2:267–270. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 2:417–425, 442. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:597.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

Alcuin, Abbot of Tours (c. 702-804). (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

ABBOT

Name and title of the superior of an autonomous MONASTERY of one of the old monastic orders such as the BENEDICTINES, CAMALDOLESE, VALLOMBROSANS, and CISTERCIANS. BASILIAN monks sometimes employ the term “hegumen” (Greek ἡγούμενος), while Russian and other Oriental monasteries style their superior an archimandrite.

The term is derived from the Hebrew ABBA, meaning father, a word found in the Bible often with reference to God. It was employed in the early 4th century as descriptive of the role of some of the Egyptian hermits as guides and teachers of religious life for younger monks who came to live under their direction. The original idea of the abbot’s spiritual fatherhood of his monks developed ultimately into the juridical office of abbot, vested with authority as set forth in the BENEDICTINE RULE. In Chapter 2 of the rule St. BENEDICT portrays the ideal abbot, and the traits of both father and officer are recognized in the double form of address the author dictates for him, dominus et abbas. As the representative of Christ the abbot is the father of the monastic community and exercises a father’s jurisdiction over those under his care. He will be held accountable to God, Benedict points out, for the spiritual welfare of his charges. Chapter 64 of the rule goes on to describe the authority of the abbot over his monks and emphasizes encouragement and understanding, as much as firmness and discipline, in the administration of his office. The monks, for their part, owe the abbot reverence and obedience because they should see in him Christ's deputy in their midst.

The abbot is usually elected by the monks of the monastery, the constitutions of the various congregations setting forth the qualifications of electors, the time and manner of voting and the qualifications for the office itself. It was originally intended that the abbot would hold office for life, although in modern times it is not unusual for his term to be limited to 6, 8, or 12 years (as with the English Benedictines). The election must be confirmed by proper authority, either the Holy See, frequently acting through the superior of the monastic congregation, or the local ordinary. The abbot must then seek episcopal benediction according to the rite prescribed in the Roman PONTIFICAL. Monastic founders who were religious often assumed the position of superior in their foundations and in the Middle Ages, as monasteries came to assume an increasingly important role in the economic and political life of their day, feudal lords often dictated the choice of abbots for houses within their territory. The Benedictine Rule envisioned an abbot ruling a single, independent community, but during certain periods, especially those of great monastic reform, one man came to rule a number of widely scattered houses (BENEDICT OF ANIANE, JOHN OF GORZE, ODO OF CLUNY) and later great monastic congregations came to develop (CLUNY in the 10th and 11th centuries, the MAURISTS in the 17th century). The privilege of EXEMPTION, granted since Merovingian times, gave the abbots more freedom from the control of local bishops and feudal lords and a number of houses established themselves as subject only to the Holy See. Among the Cistercians the father abbot and the abbots of the daughter houses have always had a strong influence on each other's abbatial elections while the modern Benedictines have formed themselves into national congregations. Certain privileges are attached to the office of abbot and he may be granted the right to the use of pontificals such as the ring, pectoral cross, miter, and crozier.

Canon law distinguishes between the following types of abbots. The abbas regularis de regimine has de jure and de facto government of an abbey. Enjoying episcopal exemption, he has ordinary jurisdiction in the external and internal forum over all persons belonging to the abbey. An abbas nullius has actual episcopal jurisdiction over all clergy and laity in a specified territory subject directly to the abbey. Archiabbas (archabbot), abbas praeses, or abbas generalis is a designation for an abbot who is head of a monastic congregation. The abbas primas or abbot primate is the head of the modern Benedictine confederation. A titular abbot is one who has the rank, title, and insignia of an abbot but does not himself govern the abbey whose name he bears.

A commendatory abbot, or abbot in commendam, refers to a personage who was allotted the usufruct of a monastic benefice and its revenues. Such an arrangement was much employed in the late Middle Ages but was forbidden by the Council of TRENT (see COMMENDATION).

See Also: ABBESS; ABBOT (CANON LAW).

Bibliography: F. CHAMARD, "Les Abbés au moyen-âge," Revue des questions historiques 33 (1885) 71–108. J. M. BESSE, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:39–42. J. DE PUNNET, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:49–57. F. CIMETIER, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET 1:19–22. C. BUTLER, Benedictine Monachism (2d ed. 1924; repr. New York 1961). J. BAUCHER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 1:29–62. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'Ordre de Saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bel. 1942–56) 1:181–191, 259–262. H. EMONDS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:90–93. B. HEGGLIN, Der benediktinische Abt in rechtsgeschichtlicher Entwicklung und geltendem Kirchenrecht (Kirchengeschichtliche Quellen und Studien 5; St. Ottilien 1961). P. SALMON, L'Abbé dans la tradition monastique (Paris 1962). Handwörterbuch zur deutschen Rechtsgeschichte, ed. W. STAMMLER et al. (Berlin 1964–) 1:18–20, with bibliog.

[P. VOLK]

ABBOT (CANON LAW)

The title applied to the religious superior of an abbey; derives from the earliest years of Oriental monasticism when the aspirant to holiness chose a suitable monk, whom he called his abba (father), to teach and guide him. Later, monastic rules, especially that of St. Benedict, introduced the term into Western Canon Law and liturgy. Since the mendicant orders and the more modern religious institutes adopted another nomenclature for their superiors, the title of abbot is also found among the Canons Regular and in the monastic orders, particularly those that follow the Benedictine Rule.

Election and Privileges. An abbot is usually selected by the secret vote of the community he will govern. The constitutions of each institute establish the specific requisites in the electorate, candidate, and electoral procedure. Generally the requirement is for a majority vote of the solemnly professed religious, taken by secret ballot, for a priest who has been a professed member of the order for at least ten years, is of legitimate birth, and is at least 30 years of age. Upon acceptance of his election and its confirmation by the competent ecclesiastical authority, the new abbot receives the abbatial blessing from the diocesan bishop. While this rite closely resembles an episcopal consecration, it confers no power of orders, but is a requisite for the use of some prelatial powers.

Although in some communities the term of office is limited, an abbot is elected for life. In the event of old age or other incapacity, he may request a coadjutor, or he may even resign. Some resigned abbots are made titular abbots and hold in empty title an abbey no longer active. In very rare cases the title of abbot is directly granted by the Holy See as an honor.

Since the Middle Ages, abbots have received, by papal privilege, the use of insignia and ceremonial proper to bishops. These prelatial prerogatives are recognized in law and liturgy. An abbot is allowed the use of a ring, pectoral cross, and zucchetto. Vested for pontifical functions or assisting in formal choir, he wears the garb of a bishop, except that its color is proper to his religious order. Thus a Norbertine abbot wears white, a Benedictine abbot wears black. An abbot celebrates Holy Mass and performs other liturgical functions according to the ceremonial of a prelate. He uses a throne with a canopy, wears complete prelatial vesture, and observes the rubrics for a pontiff. While there remain no restrictions on the frequency of his use of these prerogatives, an abbot is normally allowed their use only in churches of his own order, although privilege and custom have modified this limitation. Unless the abbot is a bishop, however, he is not authorized to perform those consecrations that require episcopal power. Thus he does not ordinarily prepare the holy oils or ordain to major orders. He is allowed, after having received the abbatial blessing, to confer tonsure and minor orders on his own religious.

An abbot may be honored by being allowed to wear the cappa magna, a cloak and train, in processions. Less frequently the use of a violet zucchetto is permitted as a special distinction.

In formal address, an abbot is titled "right reverend abbot," but his religious would speak to him as "father abbot." In an assembly of their own institute, ruling abbots take precedence according to the time of their election after officers of the assembly, abbots nullius, and archabbots. The name of the abbot is not mentioned in the Canon of the Mass unless he is an abbot nullius. For his funeral, an abbot is vested in full pontifical garb, but the Mass is celebrated as for a priest.

Right to Govern. The abbot is, first of all, the religious superior of his community. His authority to instruct and command the religious is ideally a father's care for his sons. Monastic communities cherish their abbot not only as the superior or administrator, but also as the wise and solicitous parent who recognizes in each member of the family his particular talent and endowment, and by means best suited to the individual, develops that potential. Although the work of the apostolate and the care of temporalities demand consideration, the abbot is ever to be aware of spiritual goals as his first concern. The domi-native power of the abbot arises from the religious profes-sion of vows.

The authority of the abbot as a major superior in a clerical exempt institute is also jurisdictional. As the ordi-nary for his religious, he grants faculties for the hearing of their confessions and he can dispense them from cer-tain obligations of the common law, such as fasting. An abbot possesses exclusive authority and responsibility for his community and for each member of it. He chooses the several officials of the monastery, who are responsible to and remain dependent upon him. He has direct and imme-diate control of each member of the house, while these have the right to approach him directly. This relationship, while sometimes difficult in very large abbeys, is the sig-nificant characteristic of abbatial rule.

While each abbey is a separate and independent ju-ridic entity, most are associated into monastic congrega-tions. The authority of its abbot president is specified in the constitutions. Pope Leo XIII provided for the confed-eration of Benedictine monastic congregations with an abbot primate, whose authority is described in the Lex propria of 1952.

If an abbey is to be specially distinguished, particu-larly as the motherhouse of many abbeys, it may be hon-ored as an archabbey and its abbot called the archabbot. Unless the title is used for the head of a monastic congrega-tion, an archabbot possesses almost no authority over other abbeys and their religious, but does enjoy some pre-cedence. In the United States there are the Archabbies of ST. VINCENT (Latrobe, Pa.) and of ST. MEINRAD (St. Meinrad, Ind.).

Bibliography: M. DLOUHY, The Ordination of Exempt Religious (Catholic University of American Canon Law Studies 271; Washington 1955) 68-87.

[M. J. DLOUHY]

ABBOT, BLESSING OF

In his own monastery and churches belonging to his monastery an abbot may celebrate the liturgy pontifical-ly. To enjoy this privilege he must be blessed by the bish-op of the place where the monastery is located or, in his absence, by a bishop of the abbot's own choice.

Mention of a special blessing for abbots is made in the 6th-century Rule of St. Benedict and also in the writings of St. Gregory the Great (d. 604 A.D.). The nucleus of the present rite was already developed by the 8th century, but throughout the Middle Ages the ceremonial was embellished along the lines of an episcopal consecration.

The blessing takes place at Mass, usually a Pontifical Mass concelebrated by the bishop and the new abbot. Two other abbots assist in the ceremony. The rite begins with the presentation of the abbot, who is examined briefly by the bishop. Then the Mass begins and continues up to the Alleluia Verse or Tract following the Epistle. The abbot prostrates himself before the altar for the chanting of the Litany of the Saints. The bishop then recites two orations and sings the Consecratory Preface, in the course of which he imposes hands on the head of the abbot in blessing. The abbot is given a copy of the Holy Rule of St. Benedict, the crozier, and the ring.

The celebration of Mass is resumed and continues as usual until the Offertory, when the abbot presents the bishop with candles, bread, and wine. Following the last blessing, the abbot is given the miter and gloves and is enthroned by the bishop. During the singing of the Te Deum, the abbot goes through the church blessing the people. At his throne he receives the homage of his monks and then finally imparts his solemn blessing on all.

Bibliography: J. BAUDOT, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 2.1:723–727. P. RADÓ, Enchiridion liturgicum, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:1030–32.

[R. K. SEASOLTZ]

ABBOT, HENRY, BL.

Lay martyr; b. Howden, East Riding, Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, July 4, 1597. Challoner relates his acta as follows: “A certain Protestant minister, for some misdemeanour put into York Castle, to reinstate himself in the favor of his superiors, insinuated himself into the good opinion of the Catholic prisoners, by pretending a deep sense of repentance, and a great desire of embracing the Catholic truth So they directed him, after he was enlarged, to Mr. Henry Abbot, a zealous convert who lived in Holden in the same country, to procure a priest to reconcile him Mr. Abbot carried him to Carlton to the house of Esquire Stapleton, but did not succeed in finding a priest. Soon after, the traitor having got enough to put them all in danger of the law, accused them to the magistrates They confessed that they had explained to him the Catholic Faith, and upon this they were all found guilty and sentenced to die.” Sentenced with Abbot were BB. George ERRINGTON, William KNIGHT, and William GIBSON. Abbot was declared venerable in 1886 and beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ABBOTT, LYMAN

Congregational clergyman and editor, whose writings offered a popular synthesis of Christianity and Darwinism; b. Roxbury, Mass., Dec. 13, 1835; d. Cornwall-on-Hudson, N.Y., Oct. 22, 1922. He was the son of Rev. Jacob Abbott, a popular writer, who moved to New York City in 1843. After graduating from New York University in 1853, Abbott was admitted to the bar, studied theology under his uncle Rev. John S. C. Abbott, and was ordained in 1860. An active abolitionist, he served as secretary of the American Freedmen’s Union, which supported schools for freed slaves. In 1868 he became editor of the Illustrated Christian Weekly and literary editor of Harper’s, resigning both posts in 1879. From 1876 to 1893 he edited the Christian Union, known later as the Outlook under his son’s editorship. After the death of Henry Ward Beecher, Abbott succeeded to the pastorate of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N.Y., from which he resigned in 1898. He edited Beecher’s collected works and wrote his official biography (1903). Abbott’s other writings include the Dictionary of Religious Knowledge (1874), The Spirit of Democracy (1910), and autobiographical Reminiscences (1915). His Lowell Lectures, published as The Evolution of Christianity (1892), dealt with the development of theology and the church in Darwinian terms. Christianity and Social Problems (1896) called for reforms in the social organism. The Theology of an Evolutionist (1897) offered a synthesis of science and religion in Modernist terms.

Bibliography: I. V. BROWN, Lyman Abbott: Christian Evolutionist (Cambridge, Mass. 1953).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

ABBREVIATORS

This term was generically applied to one who drew up the first draft of a document, from which a good copy would be made to serve as the original. The ecclesiastical abbreviators were officials of the Apostolic Chancery, one of the oldest and most important offices in the Roman Curia. Their function was twofold: to compose the first, rather abbreviated, draft of papal letters, which were transcribed in proper form by copyists, and then to inspect the finished letter before it received the papal seal.

The origins of this office are uncertain. Mention is made of the existence of abbreviators in the Curia of Innocent III (1198–1216), but the first explicit use of the title abbreviator of apostolic letters occurs in the acts of John XXII (1316–34).

Whatever may be the date of the institution of the office of abbreviator, it is certain that it assumed greater importance upon its erection under Pius II (1458–64) into a college of prelates divided into a higher and a lower rank.

By decree of Leo X (1513–21) abbreviators were created nobles, counts palatine, and members of the papal household. They and their clerics and properties were exempt from all jurisdiction except the immediate jurisdiction of the pope. He also empowered them to confer the degree of doctor, to create notaries, to legitimize children, to ennoble three persons, and to make knights of the Order of St. Sylvester.

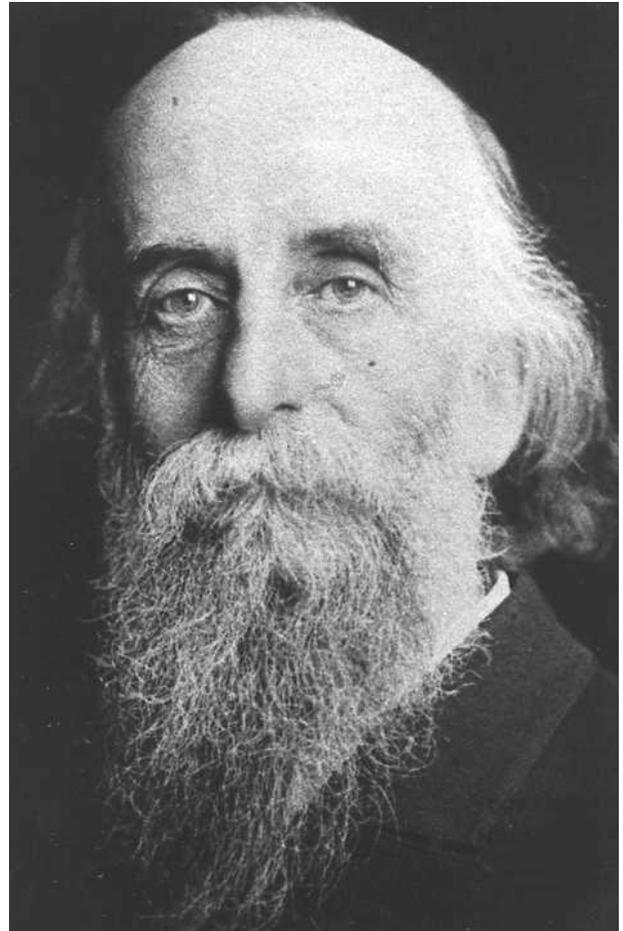

In the reforms of Pius VII (1800–23), the abbreviators of the lower rank were suppressed. The abolition of those of the higher rank in the reorganization of the papal chancery under Pius X (1903–14) brought to a close the long history of this institution.

Bibliography: E. FOURNIER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique 1:98–106. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages 4:38–39. M. LEGA, Praelectiones in textum iuris canonici, 4 v. (Rome 1896–1901) 2.1:289–290. G. CIAMPINI, De abbreviatorum . . . statu . . . (Rome 1691).

[L. A. VOEGTLE]

‘ABDALLĀH ZĀḤIR

Goldsmith, printer, lecturer, polemicist, deacon; b. Aleppo, Syria, 1680; d. monastery of Mar Hannā, Shuwair, Lebanon, Aug. 20, 1748. He was well educated in classical Arabic, philosophy, theology, and church history. Persecuted in Aleppo, he finally settled in the monastery of Mar Hannā (St. John) where he spent the rest of his life as a lay deacon, refusing priesthood out of humility. His greatest achievement was the construction of one of the very first printing presses for the Arabic language in the Orient, between 1723 and 1726. The first publication, however, dates from 1734. The purpose was to provide apologetic, instructional, and liturgical literature for Eastern Christians. He took an active part in the composition of the religious constitutions of the Basilian Shuwairite Order, vigorously opposed attempts by Patriarch Cyril Tānās to merge the Shuwairite monks and the Lyman Abbott.

Salvatorian missionaries into one order, and courageously denounced the efforts of Jesuit missionaries to Latinize the Melchite Church. The literary works of ‘Abdallāh contain dissertations in reply to attacks of non-Catholic writers, an incomplete introduction to philosophy, a short manual of theology, several sermons, and a number of interesting letters. Also, many books on spiritual matters, edited and printed by him, bear the stamp of his character and zeal. He was buried in the church at St. John’s Monastery, Shuwair.

Bibliography: G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 3:191–201, contains good bibliog.

[L. MALOUF]

ABDIAS OF BABYLON, ST.

According to legend, Abdias was the first bishop of Babylon, appointed by the Apostles Simon and Jude. W. Lazius, in 1552, regarded Abdias as the author of a collection of legends about the Apostles, assuming that he had written them in Hebrew and that they had been translated into Greek by Eutropius, his disciple, and into Latin by Julius Africanus. Actually the collection was drawn up by two anonymous authors in Gaul in the sixth century from earlier sources—one describing the martyrdoms of the Apostles and the other adding their virtues and miracles. It was used at the end of the sixth century in a revision at Auxerre of Jerome's martyrology and in a poem by Venantius Fortunatus. The Abdias of a mutilated epigraph of the fifth century found at Henchir Djezza in Tunisia was probably a martyr under the Vandals.

Bibliography: A. AUDOLLENT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:62–63.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

ABDINGHOF, ABBEY OF

Paderborn, Westphalia, founded 1015 by Meinwerk, Bishop of Paderborn, with the help of Benedictine monks from CLUNY. The abbatial church, dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul, was consecrated in 1031. The abbey was an important cultural center during the 11th and 12th centuries. The Carmina Abdinghofensia probably originated there toward the end of the 11th century, and during the 12th century the monks wrote the Vita Meinweri (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 11:104–161), and the Annales Patherbrunnenses. In the 13th century, however, a decline began to be apparent, and although various attempts at restoration were made, none produced any lasting improvement. After the plague of 1476, Abbot Henry of Peine (1477–91) united the abbey to the flourishing Bursfeld Union, and it again became a center of discipline and religious life. But by the end of the 16th century signs of decline were again occurring, and once more restoration took place under Abbot Leonard Ruben (1598–1609); after that the abbey remained vigorous until its suppression in 1803.

Bibliography: U. BERLIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:64–65. Westfälische Zeitschrift, 107 (1957). K. HONSELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:12.

[C. FALK]

‘ABDISHO IV (EBEDJESU), CHALDEAN PATRIARCH

Abdisho IV (1555–1567) was a monk and bishop of Gezirah, Mesopotamia (upper Tigris), when he succeeded the Patriarch John Sulaqa. He journeyed to Rome (1561), where he was recognized and given the pallium by Pope Pius IV (April 17, 1562). His profession of faith was read at the Council of TRENTO (Sept. 14, 1562). He consecrated many bishops. The Portuguese opposed his attempt to bring the Thomas Christians of India under his jurisdiction. He composed hymns in the honor of his predecessors who were martyred.

Bibliography: J. M. VOSTÉ, “Trois poésies inédites,” Angelicum 8 (1931) 187–234. G. BELTRAMI, La chiesa Caldea nel secolo dell’Unione (Orientalia Christiana 83; 1933). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.1:229–230. E. TISSERANT, ibid. 14.2:3101–03. W. DE VRIES, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3:626.

[F. X. MURPHY]

‘ABDISHO BAR BERĪKĀ

Or Ebedjesu, Nestorian writer and metropolitan of Nisibis (Soba) and Armenia; d. November 1318. A monk (c. 1284) and bishop of Sīghar and Bet ‘Arabājē, he became metropolitan of Nisibis in 1291. His voluminous writings in Syriac are listed at the end of his Catalogue of Writers (Badger, 361–379). Commentaries on the OT and NT, Book of the Secrets of the Philosophy of the Greeks, Book on the Wonderful Economy of Salvation, and many letters are lost. His Book of the Pearl and an Introduction to the Trinity and Incarnation are Nestorian dogmatic treatises; his Symbolum, Canonical Collection, Table of Church Orders and Laws, 50 spiritual poems called Eden-Paradise, Book of Jewels, and his Book of the Foundations of Religion are also preserved, some in Syriac and some in Arabic.

Bibliography: A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922) 323–325. J. PARISOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:24–27. B. KOTTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3:625–626. G. P. BADGER, The Nestorians and Their Rituals, 2 v. (London 1852) 2:422. J. M. VOSTÉ, Orientalia Christiana periodica 7 (1941) 233–250, Ascension. G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 1:165; 2:214–216. J. DAUVILLER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique (Paris 1935–65) 5:91–134.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ABDISHO OF KASKAR, ST.

Fourth-century Babylonian martyr. According to the Syrian Passio, Abdisho (Abdiesus, Ebedjesu, or Hebedjesus) was chorbishop of Kaskar, Babylonia. Accused of conspiracy with the Romans, he suffered martyrdom with Abdas and 38 Christians under the Sassanid King Shapur II in 374 or 375.

Feast: May 16.

Bibliography: J. LABOURT, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse (Paris 1904). A. CHRISTENSEN, L'Iran sous les Sassanides (Paris 1937). A. SCHALL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3:626. P. BEDJAN, ed., Acta martyrum et sanctorum, 7 v. (Paris 1890–97) 2:325–347.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ABDUCTION (IMPEDIMENT TO MARRIAGE)

Abduction as an impediment to marriage comes into being when a person is forcibly carried off or at least detained, and is retained in the abductor's power for the purpose of contracting marriage. The Latin code speaks of a woman who has been abducted or detained, while the Eastern code speaks more generally of a person who has been abducted or detained (Codex Iuris Canonici, c.1089, Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium, c. 806). Abduction is a diriment impediment since the law prescribes that there can be no valid marriage between the abductor and the one abducted as long as the abductor retains power over the one abducted.

The impediment of abduction considered in itself, and excluding the defect of consent that is frequently involved in it, is of ecclesiastical law and binds only Catholics. As an ecclesiastical law impediment, the impediment of abduction can be dispensed, however unlikely it might be that such a dispensation would be granted.

The impediment comes into being when a Catholic is either the abductor or the abducted person, because the impediment is intended not only as a protection for the abducted person, but also as a deterrent to the crime of abduction.

The impediment arises whether the abductor acts personally or through agents, either men or women. If a woman is abducted by agents and detained by them up to the actual moment of the marriage, the impediment renders the marriage invalid between the man who ordered the abduction and the woman whom he ordered abducted.

Violent or forceful abduction must be for the sole purpose of contracting marriage. If a woman is taken away and retained for any other purpose, e.g., for extortion or turpitude, the impediment does not arise.

The impediment arises as soon as the abductor perpetrates the abduction, and it continues to exist as long as the abducted person remains in his power. The impediment ceases to exist when the abducted person is separated from the abductor and has been restored to a safe and free place. Separation from the abductor entails a physical separation from him and from his agents. This has a special reference to the dwelling place. The abducted person must no longer be living in the same dwelling with the abductor, but the length of time for which this separation must endure is not established in the law. No change of place is absolutely required. If the abducted person has been detained by the abductor, the place can be said to become free and safe if the abductor departs and absolutely removes his influence and that of his agents over the abducted person. Hence, a safe and free place is one in which the abducted person is able freely to dispose of affairs at will, and in which the abducted person can declare his or her own wishes without external constraint.

Bibliography: B. F. FAIR, Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies: The Impediment of Abduction 194 (Washington 1944) 28–83. H. A. AYRINHAC, Penal Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law (New York 1920) 293–296. H. A. AYRINHAC and P. J. LYDON, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law (New York 1957) 145–150.

[W. A. O'MARA]

ABELARD, PETER

Philosopher and theologian (Lat. Abaelardus, Abeilardus); b. Pallet, Brittany, 1079; d. Châlons-sur-Saône, April 21, 1142. One of the greatest philosophers of the 12th century, this peripatetic from Pallet, known as Peripateticus palatinus and Doctor scholasticus, is renowned for his solution of the problem of UNIVERSALS. As a theologian, he outraged his contemporaries by his original use of DIALECTICS. As a man, he is known for his celebrated love affair with HÉLOÏSE.

Life. Peter's father, Berengar, Lord of Pallet, planned a military career for him, but he chose learning instead. When he was about 15, he began the study of logic, probably under ROSCELIN OF COMPIÈGNE. In his autobiographical Historia calamitatum, he says that he traveled to any town where a teacher of logic could be found. Finally arriving in Paris, he studied under WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX, head of the cathedral school of Notre Dame. Prior to William's arrival, Paris had been considered intellectually inferior to the Benedictine Abbey of Bec and the cathedral schools of Laon and Chartres. Through William, Paris acquired great renown. While enrolled as a student, Abelard defeated William in public debate. On the strength of this victory, Abelard set up his own school in nearby Melun, and later in Corbeil. He was then only 25 years old. His youth and rashness in attacking men of established reputation in such a way that they were publicly disgraced earned him celebrity, devoted followers, and persistent enemies. After about two years

Heloise and Abelard.

deficiat expectatio dum sperat. in quo n̄ est finis. sed augmētū amoris. Quicquid desiderabile est si n̄ contingat. desiderari deficiat in illud: & quasi animā deponit qui desiderat.
 Id est q̄ deficere in id unūquēq; toto studio migrare qd diligit.
 illud cogitat. illi heret. illud p̄sonat. in id quadā anime defectione transfundit. Lassat affectus. sed amor auget.
 Et q̄ dūti abest qd desiderat. eo expectantis desiderium magis ignescit. Caro deficiat. amor p̄ficiat. Sponsa nescit desiderare aliud quā sponsum. Illum desiderat. illū con-cupiscit. in quē totū virib; intendit. illū gremio mentis fouet. illi se apit. & effundit. & dum maiori desiderio erretat ampli' deficiat. Ita defectio immutatio est fragilitatis. sed assumptio uirtutis. Amore languet. Cum scis uiuentib; siue iam mortuis. desiderium n̄m expandim' orando. ut desiderium n̄ri effectū p̄sentent xpo. tunc filia adiuuam' ut dilecto cui primores nobis sunt nuntient q̄ amore languem'.
Rufinus. Ad hec uulnera. que infligunt' ex lingua. int' homines. medic' pene nullus est.
Iuueni religio. unūq; se uelanda. Petr' Abailardus?
 Vnet in p̄ncipio. si in fine sicut u. t.
 Sū q̄d erā nec enī q̄d sū. & dico utriusq;. de a homo nec d̄s est nec hō p̄sent' quā certū p̄magis
 S; d̄s est et hō quē sacra figurat ymagi.

Manuscript folio from a book of verse and prose, 12th century, which contains quotations from Abelard, Ausonius, and Rufinus (Poole MSS, Indiana University).

as a teacher in the region of Paris, he became ill and returned to his native Brittany. Returning to Paris in 1108, he studied rhetoric under the same man against whom he had previously jostled, William of Champeaux. Public disputations had become a prominent feature of school life; during one of them Abelard forced the master to modify his extreme realist position, according to which there is a separately existent reality corresponding to each of the universal terms in one's vocabulary.

When he was 34, Abelard began to study theology under ANSELM OF LAON. He found fault with Anselm's teaching methods, and to show that he could do better he gave a public lecture on the Book of Ezechiel after only one day's preparation. The novelty of his teaching consisted in the forthright raising of questions suggested by his dialectical studies; this was not the traditional method of communicating the patristic tradition with its heavy emphasis on questions that had affective implications. Once more Abelard earned the resentment of his teacher by arousing the interest of Anselm's students, thus showing that they preferred the work of a gifted amateur to Anselm's traditional mode of teaching.

Paris and Héloïse. When Abelard returned to Paris, he was allowed to teach both theology and dialectics, first at the school of Mont Sainte-Geneviève and then, in 1113, at the cathedral school of Notre Dame. Students flocked to him in such numbers that he acquired both wealth and honors. At this time he fell in love with Héloïse, the niece of Fulbert, a canon of Notre Dame. This unwitting man invited Abelard to live in his house and, ironically, to take charge of the further education of his niece. When Héloïse became pregnant, Abelard had her secretly conveyed to his home in Brittany. The whimsical name Astrolabe was given to their son. Later, to mollify Fulbert, Abelard secretly married Héloïse. This was possible since he had not received major orders at the time. When the marriage became known publicly and when students began to sing love songs and lyrics reputed to have been written by Abelard for Héloïse, Abelard tried to safeguard his position by having Héloïse enter the convent of Saint-Argenteuil, where she had been brought up. Fulbert regarded this as an evasion of responsibility and in anger hired men who, with the connivance of Abelard's servant, entered his room at night and emasculated him.

Abelard's personal fame as a man centers not so much on his philosophical and theological work as it does upon this love affair with Héloïse, told in such detail and with such frankness in letters that are still extant. He is the only philosopher in the Middle Ages who left an autobiography and personal letters, in which historians find details that are very illuminating for the study of social and intellectual life in the 12th century. The information supplied in these is invaluable for destroying false stereotypes set up by 19th-century historians, such as Jules Michelet, about intellectual freedom in the Middle Ages.

St. Bernard's Denunciation. After his downfall, Abelard entered the monastery at Saint-Denis to become a Benedictine monk. Characteristically, he aroused opposition by offering proof that the monastery's patron was not identical with Dionysius the Areopagite. He resumed teaching in Paris until 1121, when the Council of Soissons condemned his teaching on the Blessed Trinity. After spending some time in forced residence in a monastic house, he set up a school in what became the town of Nogent-sûr-Seine. In 1125 he was elected abbot of the Abbey of Saint-Gildas in his native Brittany. Finding his life as abbot difficult and complicated because of the monks of Saint-Gildas, he was back teaching in Paris in 1136. His teaching was denounced to St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX by WILLIAM OF SAINT-THIERRY, who accused him of a rationalist approach that attempted to empty even doctrines such as the Trinity of all mystery. Bernard wrote to Pope Innocent II and to numerous bishops against Abelard and his teaching. Under the illusion that he would have the opportunity of publicly disputing with Bernard, Abelard appeared before the Council of Sens in 1141 only to find that his role was to listen silently while a sentence of condemnation was read to him. He appealed to Pope Innocent, oblivious of the fact that Bernard's letters had closed all doors to him. On his way to Rome, he was received at the monastery of Cluny by PETER THE VENERABLE, who persuaded him to abandon the struggle, attempt reconciliation with Bernard, and accept a papal authorization to pass his remaining years under the protection of Cluny. He died at a Cluniac priory in 1142.

Writings. Abelard's more important extant works are those that treat of logic and theology. In addition, there are extant sermons, poems, and letters, one of which is an autobiography covering his life until about 1129.

Logic. His Introductiones parvulorum are short glosses on the logical treatises of Porphyry, Aristotle, and Boethius, probably representing the lessons he gave to beginners. Logica ingredientibus contained more elaborate glosses on Porphyry and on the Categories and De interpretatione of Aristotle. Dialectica is his most developed and complete work on logic; the beginning of this work, probably attacking the realist position, has not survived.

Theology. His Tractatus de fide Trinitatis is the surviving record of his theological lectures prior to the Council of Soissons (1121). This work is notable for its lack of reference to the Church Fathers and the substitution of personal and seemingly rationalistic attempts to explain the Blessed Trinity. The compilation Sic et non lists the opinions of the Fathers, often contradictory, on various theological topics raised in scholastic disputations. This is at the same time an answer to those who said that he was not concerned with the Fathers and a proof that some rational approach was needed to reconcile their differences. One version of this work seems to have been written about 1123, and another toward the end of his life in 1136. Theologia Christiana is a reworking of the Tractatus de fide Trinitatis with many citations from the Church Fathers and the Scripture. It seems to have been written in 1124. Books 1 and 2 of Introductio ad theologiam are a reworking of his earlier books on theology. Book 3 represents an advanced form of his thought and was probably written in 1136. His Ethics, or Scito te ipsum, probably written in 1137, deals with moral theology. Dialogus inter philosophum, Judaeum et Christianum was written during the last year of his life and gives his final thought on the problem of reason and faith.

Influence. The importance of Abelard in the history of philosophy rests mainly on his proposed solution to the problem of universals. He stood midway between the ultrarealist position of the Platonic tradition and the nominalist views of Roscelin, saying that universals as such exist only in the mind but that they signify the nature that individual things share in common. His place in theology depends mainly on his contribution toward the SCHOLASTIC METHOD. Historically, he stands close to the origin of the tradition, exemplified by Peter Lombard, that used varying opinions of the Fathers as the starting point for theological synthesis. His speculative pursuit of questions in theology without reference to their affective connotations seems to have outraged William of Saint-Thierry. In a letter to Bernard, the latter accuses Abelard of doing in theology what he had learned to do in dialectics, of being “a censor of the faith, not a disciple; an improver of it, not an imitator.” Viewed from the vantage point of the great syntheses of faith and reason established by 13th-century SCHOLASTICISM, in which Abelardian methods had an important place, his work seems more defensible than it did to his contemporaries. As to the orthodoxy of Abelard’s theological opinions there are, on the one hand, the condemnations of Soissons and Sens (the latter formally approved by Innocent II) and the firm, lasting hostility of Bernard. On the other hand, modern scholars such as Jean Cottiaux and J. Rozycki, after a careful study of the development of his doctrine on faith and reason and on the Trinity, have found it possible to give a much more benign interpretation. Two things are certain: (1) Abelard wished to reason in such a way as not to be separated from Christ, and (2) much that was condemned at Sens cannot be found, as such, in his writings. This does not mean that Bernard and the bishops were wrong in condemning what they thought his contemporaries would have drawn from his words. Extant MSS of some of Abelard’s immediate disciples indicate that the sense of the errors condemned was the very sense defended by the school of Abelard.

Modern scholarship has shown the existence of a school of Abelard both in theology and in logic. Not all of his disciples, however, were like Adam, a canon of the Lateran, who taught the errors of his master concerning the Incarnation before 1135 and who, being attacked by GERHOH OF REICHERSBERG, preferred apostasy to retraction. Direct disciples, such as JOHN OF SALISBURY and PETER OF POITIERS, were orthodox, while others, such as WILLIAM OF CONCHES and GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, were accused of heresy. Bernard, William of Saint-Thierry, and John of Salisbury attest to the vast divulgation of Abelard’s writings and influence, even after the condemnation of 1141. This is confirmed by the discovery of numerous MSS of summae of various Sentences, theological treatises, and logical works, many of them anonymous, belonging to the school of Abelard. Even after he was long dead, Peter Abelard was attacked by Walter of Saint-Victor as one of France’s evils in Contra quatuor labyrinthos Franciae. By that time, Abelard’s dialectics had taken firm hold in early scholasticism.

See Also: DIALECTICS IN THE MIDDLE AGES, SENTENCES AND SUMMAE.

Bibliography: Works. Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, v.178; Ouvrages inédits d’Abélard, ed. v. COUSIN (Paris 1836); Opera, ed. v. COUSIN et al., 2 v. (Paris 1849–59); “Peter Abelard’s Philosophische Schriften,” ed. B. GEYER, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 21.1–4 (Münster 1919–33) 1–633; Dialectica, ed. L. M. DE RIJK (Assen 1956). Studies. Gilson History of Christian Philosophy 153–163. J. G. SIKES, Peter Abailard (Cambridge, Eng. 1932). É. H. GILSON, Héloïse and Abelard, tr. L. K. SHOOK (Chicago 1951). E. PORTALIÉ, A. VACANT et al, ed. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:36–55. P. GLORIEUX, A. VACANT et al, ed. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) Tables générales 1:5–7. E. VACANDARD, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:71–91. G. PARÉ et al., La Renaissance du XII^e siècle: Les Écoles et l’enseignement (Paris 1933). R. E. WEINGART, The Logic of Divine Love: A Critical Analysis of the Soteriology of Peter Abailard (London 1970). J. MARENBO, The Philosophy of Peter Abelard (Cambridge 1997).

[S. R. SMITH]

ABELL, THOMAS, BL.

Martyr; b. place unknown, toward the end of the fifteenth century; d. July 30, 1540. He was educated at Oxford (M.A., 1516), became a chaplain to Catherine of Aragon, and preached and wrote in her favor. When sent to Spain in 1529 at the time of the divorce question, he performed invaluable work on Queen Catherine's behalf. He was one of her counselors at the divorce trial and probably helped her in making her appeals against the jurisdiction of the Legatine Court. In 1531 he published his vigorous defense of Catherine's marriage, the Invicta Veritas. For this he was imprisoned, but was later released. In 1533 he was sent to the Tower because of his counsel to Catherine to persist in refusing the title of "Princess Dowager." His name was included in the attainder of 1534 against the Nun of Kent and others, but he had had no real association with the Nun. He remained in the Tower for more than six years, receiving appalling ill-treatment. He refused to acknowledge the royal supremacy and for this reason was attainted of treason in 1540. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Smithfield. He was beatified on Dec. 29, 1886.

Feast: July 30.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs Declared Blessed by Pope Leo XIII in 1886 and 1895, 2 v. (London 1904-05).

[J. E. PAUL]

ABERCIOUS, EPITAPH OF

The oldest monument that mentions the Eucharist, the Epitaph of Abercius is of great theological importance for the history of ecclesiastical doctrine. Two fragments of this inscription were discovered in 1883 by the British archeologist W. Ramsay in Hieropolis, near Synnada, in Phrygia Minor; they are now in the Lateran Museum. The epitaph appears to have been composed at the end of the 2nd century. It existed at the latest before the year 216, because the epitaph of Alexander, found by Ramsay a year before near the same place, quotes a part of the epitaph of Abercius and is dated 216. This epitaph of Alexander and a Greek legendary life of Abercius (4th century) enabled scholars to restore the entire text of the inscription. It contains 22 verses, a distichon, and 20 hexameters that describe the life and deeds of Abercius, Bishop of Hieropolis, who says that he composed and dictated it at the age of 72. The great event of his life was his journey to Rome, of which he gives an account.

The mystical and symbolic style of the inscription reflects the influence of the discipline of the SECRET, and its metaphorical phraseology is responsible for the sharp controversy that followed the discovery. A number of scholars, including G. Ficker, A. Dieterich, and R. Reitzenstein, tried to demonstrate that Abercius was not a Christian, but a venerator of Phrygian divinities Cybele and Attis; A. von Harnack called him a syncretist. The majority of scholars, including W. Ramsay, G. de ROSSI,

L. DUCHESNE, and F. CUMONT, are convinced that the epitaph is of Christian origin. A thorough investigation of its language and style, its content and form by F. DÖLGER has removed all doubt as to its Christian character. Abercius does not call himself a bishop, but "a disciple of the chaste shepherd," i.e., Christ, who "has great eyes that look on all sides." He taught him "faithful writings," i.e., the Holy Scriptures of the Christians and their doctrines. He sent him to Rome to see "the queen with golden robe and golden shoes," i.e., the Church of Christ, His Bride. Abercius saw there "a people bearing a splendid seal," i.e., the seal of Baptism. Faith was "his guide," and for this reason he met friends and fellow Christians everywhere who offered him as a meal the Lord's Supper of bread and wine. He calls Christ "the fish from the spring, mighty and pure," that "the spotless Virgin caught," i.e., whom the Virgin Mary conceived. The Christian teaching appears in the language of a mystery cult and explains why Abercius at the end says: "Let him who understands and believes this pray for Abercius," since only the initiated could comprehend the meaning of these words.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima (Bonn 1935-37); Florilegium Patristicum 7, ed. J. ZELLINGER et al. (Bonn 1904-) 2-25, text and Lat. tr. F. J. DÖLGER, IXΘΥΣ, v.1 (Rome 1910) 8-138; ibid. v.2 (Münster 1922) 454-507. A. ABEL, Byzantion 3 (1926) 321-411, complete bibliog. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950-53) 1:171-173, Eng. tr. A. FERRUA, Revista di archeologia cristiana 20 (1943) 279-305; La civiltà cattolica (1943) 39-45. H. GRÉGOIRE, Byzantion 25-27 (1955-57) 363-368, and Bardesanes.

[J. QUASTEN]

ABERCROMBY, ROBERT

Scottish Jesuit, 19 years on the Scottish mission; b. Scotland, 1532; d. Braunsberg College, East Prussia, April 27, 1613. Robert, of a good Catholic family, was educated at St. Mary's College, Scotland. He was one of five young men who in 1562 went to the Continent to study for the priesthood in the company of the Papal Nuncio Nicholas de Gouda, SJ, who was then returning from an unsuccessful visit to the court of Queen Mary in order to bring Scottish bishops to the Council of Trent. All five became Jesuits and played a distinguished role in the Counter Reformation in Scotland: James Tyrie, William Crichton, John Hay, William Murdoch, and Abercromby. Father Tyrie, who died in Rome in 1597, was especially influential in gaining Abercromby for the mission to Scotland. Meanwhile Abercromby spent 23 years abroad assisting Catholics from England and Scotland and training Jesuit novices. He was a pupil of the celebrated Jesuit Diego LAÍNEZ in the latter's last years and a friend of Cardinal Stanislaus HOSIUS, who built a seminary for priests at Braunsberg, where many Scotsmen came to study and receive their training for the missions from the Jesuits.

In 1586 Elizabeth of England had concluded an alliance with James VI of Scotland that had as a condition the expulsion of the Jesuits from Scotland. But the execution of his mother, Mary Stuart, shortly after, disposed the king to show indulgence to his Catholic subjects. The Jesuit missionaries were not slow to take advantage; Abercromby and William Ogilvie arrived from Poland and went into hiding while administering to the Catholics. Abercromby converted a number of high-born Scots, among them James Lindsay, brother of the Earl of Crawford. His most notable convert was James VI's wife, Anne of Denmark, at Holyroodhouse in 1600. Abercromby's own account, in a letter from Braunsberg, September 1608, gives evidence of James's knowledge of this and tacit consent. "She [Anne] admitted [to the King] she had dealings with a Catholic priest and named me, an old cripple." James made no effort to reclaim Anne, but rather made it possible for her to have secret access to her Jesuit confessor by appointing Abercromby "Keeper of his Majesty's Hawks." In a report on the state of Scotland (1602), Abercromby, then superior of the Scottish mission, remarked that the Queen had received Holy Communion nine or ten times.

The Gunpowder Plot of 1605 caused James, now king of England, to order a special search for Abercromby, offering a reward of 10,000 crowns for his capture, no mean proof of his worth to his enemies and his courage and skill in evading his pursuers. Forced finally to flee, Abercromby was one of the last priests to leave Scotland. He spent the remainder of his life at the Jesuit College at Braunsberg.

Bibliography: A. BELLESHEIM, History of the Catholic Church of Scotland, tr. D. O. HUNTER-BLAIR, 4 v. (Edinburgh 1887–90). W. FORBES-LEITH, ed., Narratives of Scottish Catholics under Mary Stuart and James VI (Edinburgh 1885). Recusant History 5 (1959–60) 205–206, for list of documents and bibliog. H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. in 15 (London 1877–82) v.7, pt. 2. G. OLIVER, Collections towards Illustrating the Biography of the Scotch, English and Irish Members of the Society of Jesus (London 1845). D. MCROBERTS, ed., Essays on the Scottish Reformation, 1513–1625 (Glasgow 1962). T. COLLINS, Martyr in Scotland (New York 1956).

[J. D. HANLON]

ABGAR, LEGENDS OF

Two letters published by Eusebius of Caesarea as part of the Acta Edessena (Histoire ecclesiastique 1.13), supposedly discovered in the archives of Edessa. They purport to be an exchange of correspondence between

Jesus Christ and King Abgar V called Uchama (the "black" according to Tacitus), who reigned in Osrohoene from 4 B.C. to A.D. 7 and from A.D. 13 to 50. The first letter carried by an artist, Ananias, requests Christ to come to Osrohoene and cure the king. In His response Christ excuses Himself, but promises to send the Apostle Thaddeus (the Disciple Thomas the Younger, or Addai) after His Ascension. A version (c. 400) of the legend in the Acts of Thaddeus and the Syriac Doctrina Addaei or Thaddeus legend has Christ cure Abgar before sending Thaddeus who converts the king.

The legend is further elaborated with the story of the conversion of King Abgar IX (179–216) who became a Roman tributary in 195, and whose court was visited by JULIUS AFRICANUS and the gnostic Bardesanes [Kestoi 7, ed. J. Viellefond (Paris 1932) 49]. The so-called portrait of Christ at Edessa was supposedly painted by the messenger Ananias; and the words of Christ quoted in the second letter were used by Syrians and Eastern Egyptians as protective devices (Procopius, Bell. Pers. 2.12).

Recent investigation indicates that the Eusebian version that spread in the West through RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA's translation of his Church History antedates the Thaddeus legend. Traces of Tatian's Diatessaron in the letters point to an early third-century composition. St. Augustine denied the existence of any letter written by Christ (C. Faust. 28.4) and the Decretum Gelasianum called this correspondence apocryphal. Considerable doubt now surrounds the conversion of King Abgar IX, which until recently was accepted as historical fact.

Bibliography: H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 1:43. J. QUASTEN, Patrology 1:140–143. LABUBNĀ BAR SENNĀK, The Doctrine of Addai, ed. in Syriac and tr. G. PHILLIPS (London 1876). E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, "Der Briefwechsel zwischen Abgar und Jesus," Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie 43 (1900) 422–486; Das Christusbild von Edessa (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 18, NS 3; 1899). A. VON HARNACK and E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, eds., Decretum Gelasianum (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 38; 1912). S. RUNCIMAN, Cambridge Historical Journal 3 (1929–31) 238–252, portraits. H. C. YOUTIE, ". . . the Letter to Abgar," Harvard Theological Review 23 (1930) 299–302; 24 (1931) 61–66. I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, "Le origini del cristianesimo in Edessa," Gregorianum 15 (1934) 82–91.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ABIDING IN CHRIST

The verb μένειν, which in general means to remain or to abide, occurs about 117 times in the New Testament, and 67 of these are found in the Johannine writings. The phrase "abiding in Christ" reflects both the King James and the Douay translations. Contemporary English translations differ, some using “abide,” but others favoring “remain” and “dwell.” St. John employs the Greek word to express his conviction that the new life of the last age, which the Christian believer possesses here and now, is in itself and in its fundamental orientation permanent and imperishable. This new life is everlasting, precisely because it joins the Christian in an abiding community of life with Christ and, through Christ, with the Father. Christ abides in His disciples, giving them a share in His own divine and everlasting life, which He holds from the Father (Jn 5.26; 6.56–57; 1 Jn 5.11–12). St. John uses with predilection the so-called reciprocal immanence formulas (e.g., “Abide in me, and I in you,” John 15.4) to express this deep unchangeable community of life with Christ and, through Him, with the Father (Jn 6.56–57; 15.4–10; 1 Jn 3.24; 4.12–16). In St. John’s view the Christian’s union with the Father is an extension of his abiding union with the Son (Jn 14.20; 15.9–10; 17.21, 23, 26); and the communion among Christians grounded on their communion with the Son and Father, has as its exemplar the union between Father and Son (Jn 17.11, 21, 22). The abiding new life in Christ is conferred by the Sacraments in FAITH (Jn 3.5; 6.56–57), with the uncreated gift of the Spirit vouching for the fact that “we abide in God and He in us” (1 Jn 4.13; see 3.24b). Nevertheless the hostility of the world requires that Christians strive perseveringly to abide in faith, in love, and in the practice of the Commandments; see St. John’s urgent imperatives: Jn 8.31; 15.4–27; 1 Jn 2.6, 24, 27, 28; 3.15, 17; 4.12, 16.

See Also: MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; BROTHER IN CHRIST; INCORPORATION IN CHRIST; REBIRTH (IN THE BIBLE); GRACE, ARTICLES ON.

[F. X. LAWLOR/D. M. DOYLE]

ABINGDON, ABBEY OF

Benedictine house, Berkshire, England, founded c. 675, refounded c. 954, dissolved 1538. Its early history is doubtful, but according to its chronicler it was founded by a certain Cissa, king of Wessex. It was ruined by the Danes in the 9th century and left derelict until King Eadred gave it to St. ETHELWOLD OF WINCHESTER to restore c. 954. Regular Benedictine life was restored, and Abingdon became a powerhouse of the English monastic revival, sending colonies of monks to the new minster of WINCHESTER and to the Fenland abbeys of ELY, PETERBOROUGH, THORNEY, and CROWLAND. After the Conquest, a Norman abbot from Jumièges was installed and the Crown imposed a service of 30 knights on the abbey. It possessed extensive estates and church patronage in Berkshire, Oxford, Gloucester, and Warwick. The church and monastic buildings were rebuilt in the 12th century, but little of these remain. Its income in 1535 was £1,876. The last abbot, Thomas Rowland, formally surrendered the abbey to the Crown on Feb. 9, 1538.

Bibliography: Chronicon Monasterii de Abingdon, ed. J. STEVENSON, 2 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 2; 1858). The Victoria History of Berkshire, ed. P. H. DITCHFIELD and W. PAGE, 4 v. (London 1906–24) v. 2. F. M. STENTON, The Early History of the Abbey of Abingdon (Reading, Eng. 1913). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 31–56, passim. J. A. ROBINSON, The Times of Saint Dunstan (Oxford 1923).

[C. H. LAWRENCE]

ABINGTON, THOMAS (HABINGTON)

Recusant and antiquarian; b. Thorpe, near Chertsey, Surrey, England, Aug. 23, 1560; d. Hindlip, near Worcester, Oct. 8, 1647. He was the son of John Abington, confederer to Elizabeth I, and he attended Lincoln College, Oxford, and in 1579 went to the Continent to pursue his studies. At Rheims he was converted to the Catholic faith, and some time later he returned to England. The cause of the imprisoned Mary Queen of Scots elicited his devotion, and he became involved, along with his brother Edward, in the Babington Plot. Edward was executed (Sept. 30, 1586), but Thomas was committed to the Tower of London where he remained for six years. Released by order of Elizabeth (he was her godson), he retired to Hindlip Castle, the country seat his father had built in Worcestershire. For harboring priests (the house had 11 priest holes), Abington was arrested in January 1606, when four Jesuits—Fathers Garnet and Oldcorne, and Brothers Owen and Ashley—were found there. On the charge of complicity in the Gunpowder Plot, all four were executed; but Abington, who was tried with them, was released on the intercession of Lord Monteagle, his brother-in-law. Forbidden to leave Worcestershire, he devoted his remaining years to local antiquarian researches.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5v. (New York, 1885–1902) 3:74–76. H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 4.1:33–34. Dictionary of National Biography, from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 8:857–858.

[R. I. BRADLEY]

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION

This cryptic apocalyptic expression is employed contemptuously in Daniel to describe the profanation of the Temple by the King of Syria, ANTIOCHUS IV EPI-

PHANES, who had the statue of Zeus Olympios placed there; in the New Testament the expression is used in the "little apocalypse" of Christ's eschatological discourse to call attention to the blasphemous activity of the Antichrist (prefigured by Antiochus) that is to be expected prior to the Parousia.

In Daniel. The only Old Testament usage of the now traditional expression "abomination of desolation" or "the horrible abomination" is found in the Book of Daniel (9.27; 11.31; 12.11). Scholars now see in this mysterious expression [Heb. šiqqûš (me)šōmēm] a veiled description of the blasphemous actions of Antiochus IV, described with clearer detail in Maccabees (1 Mc 1.57; 2 Mc 6.2). Thus, chapter 11 of Daniel describes Antiochus's ruthless persecution climaxed by the erection of the abomination of desolation in the Temple; the texts of Maccabees tell of the desecration of the Temple by the soldiers of Antiochus and the setting up of the idol Zeus Olympios on the altar. Since Baal Shamem (Aramaic, ba'al šamēm, lord of the heavens) is the Aramaic title of Zeus Olympios, scholars look on the abomination of desolation as a veiled and contemptuous reference to this idol. By replacing the name of Baal with šiqqûš (abomination, detested thing) and by eliminating the vowels of šamēm (heavens) and substituting those of bōšet (shame), the author obtained the Hebrew expression šiqqûš šōmēm (abomination of desolation). The entire expression would then refer to the statue of Baal Shamem (alias Zeus Olympios) that Antiochus IV erected in the Temple in 167 B.C.

In Christ's Eschatological Discourse. In Mt 24.15 and Mk 13.14 the abomination of desolation is linked with the fall of Jerusalem and the end of the world. Since the abomination of desolation is presented as "standing," with a grammatical switch from the neuter τὸ βδέλυγμα to the masculine participle ἐστῆκότα (Mk 13.14; see Taylor, 511–512), the text itself suggests that the abomination is really symbolic of a man. Noting the similarities between the eschatological discourse of Christ in the Synoptics (Mt 24.4–39; Mk 13.5–31) and St. Paul's description of the Antichrist (2 Thes 2.3–12), it is probable that the abomination of desolation is to be identified with the "man of sin," "the son of perdition," "the wicked one," who in the last days "sits in the temple of God and gives himself out as if he were God" (2 Thes 2.4). When Matthew cautions "let him who reads understand," his purpose is to recall the hideous desecration wrought by Antiochus (cf. 1 Mc 1.57) as a warning to his readers concerning the blasphemous activity of the Antichrist. According to earlier commentators, the prophecy was fulfilled when the Emperor Caligula attempted to have his statue erected in the Temple in A.D. 40, or when the fiery zealots turned the Temple into a fortress in A.D.

68, or at the actual destruction of the Holy City and the Temple by Titus in A.D. 70. Although the last opinion merits consideration, recent commentators hold that it is more likely that Matthew and Mark were not so much concerned with indicating a purely historical event, but actualized a traditional expression by applying it to the godless and blasphemous activity of the Antichrist at the end of time.

Bibliography: W. FOERSTER, "Βδέλυγμα," G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 1:598–600. R. H. CHARLES, Commentary on Daniel (Oxford 1929). J. A. MONTGOMERY, Daniel (International Critical Commentary); New York 1927) 388–390. V. TAYLOR, ed., The Gospel according to St. Mark (London 1952) 511–515.

[F. J. MONTALBANO/EDS.]

ABONDANCE, MONASTERY OF

Former house of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, and then of Cistercian Feuillants, more properly called the Abbey of Sainte-Marie d'Abondance (Latin, Abundantia), in the valley of the Drance, in Haute-Savoie, France, former Diocese of Geneva. Its origin is often attributed to St. COLUMBAN, but none of his biographies mentions it. The ascription probably stems from a confusion of names between it and REMIREMONT (original Latin, Monasterium Habundense). It is certain that in 1080 Louis of Féterne established canons regular at Abondance, and that the foundation was richly endowed by his family. Then in 1108, the canons of SAINT-MAURICE gave the lands of Abondance to a group of canons under Prior Herluin. In 1155 these canons were congratulated on their observance in a bull of Pope Adrian IV. Between 1128 and 1144 the monastery had achieved the status of an ABBEY; Rudolph of Vauserier was made first abbot (1144). In 1156 and 1158 the abbots of Abondance and Saint-Maurice signed agreements of association. But between mid-12th and early 13th century, Abondance founded or subordinated to itself five abbeys: Sixt, Entremont, Grandval, Goailles, and Filly, as well as 22 priories. Up to the 14th century, the monastery enjoyed great material prosperity; it held first place in the Diocese of Geneva. But excessive wealth and COMMENDATION (1436) led to a relaxation of discipline. Decadence proceeded at a rapid pace in the 16th century, and the number of religious diminished to half. Though the commendatory Abbot Gaspard Provana opposed the reform attempted there by FRANCIS DE SALES, the future bishop of Geneva, the latter finally won out in 1598. The new reform abbot, Vespasian Aiazza, came to an understanding with the Cistercian FEUILLANTS, and by a brief of Sept. 28, 1606, Pope Paul V sanctioned Abondance's concordat with the Feuillants, who, on May 7, 1607, installed Favre, vicar-general of Francis de Sales, as abbot. But these religious, isolated high up in the valley of the Drance, abandoned themselves in time to unhealthy distractions. Finally, Pope CLEMENT XIII's bull of May 9, 1761, granted King Charles-Emmanuel the right to suppress the Feuillants; another bull of May 4, 1762, allotted the goods of Abondance, with the exception of the benefices, to the Abbey of Sainte-Marie of Thonon. During the French Revolution the abbey was sold. Today, the abbey church (14th and 17th centuries), the cloister (14th century with frescoes), and the rich treasury are all classified as historical monuments. The church serves the needs of the local parish.

Bibliography: L. CIBRARIO, ed., Scriptorum, 3 v. (Monumenta historiae patriae 3, 5, 11; Turin 1840–1863) 2:301–318, constitutions, 321–434, necrology. J. GARIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:144–153. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topo-bibliographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:9–10.

[J. DAoust]

ABORTION

PRACTICE

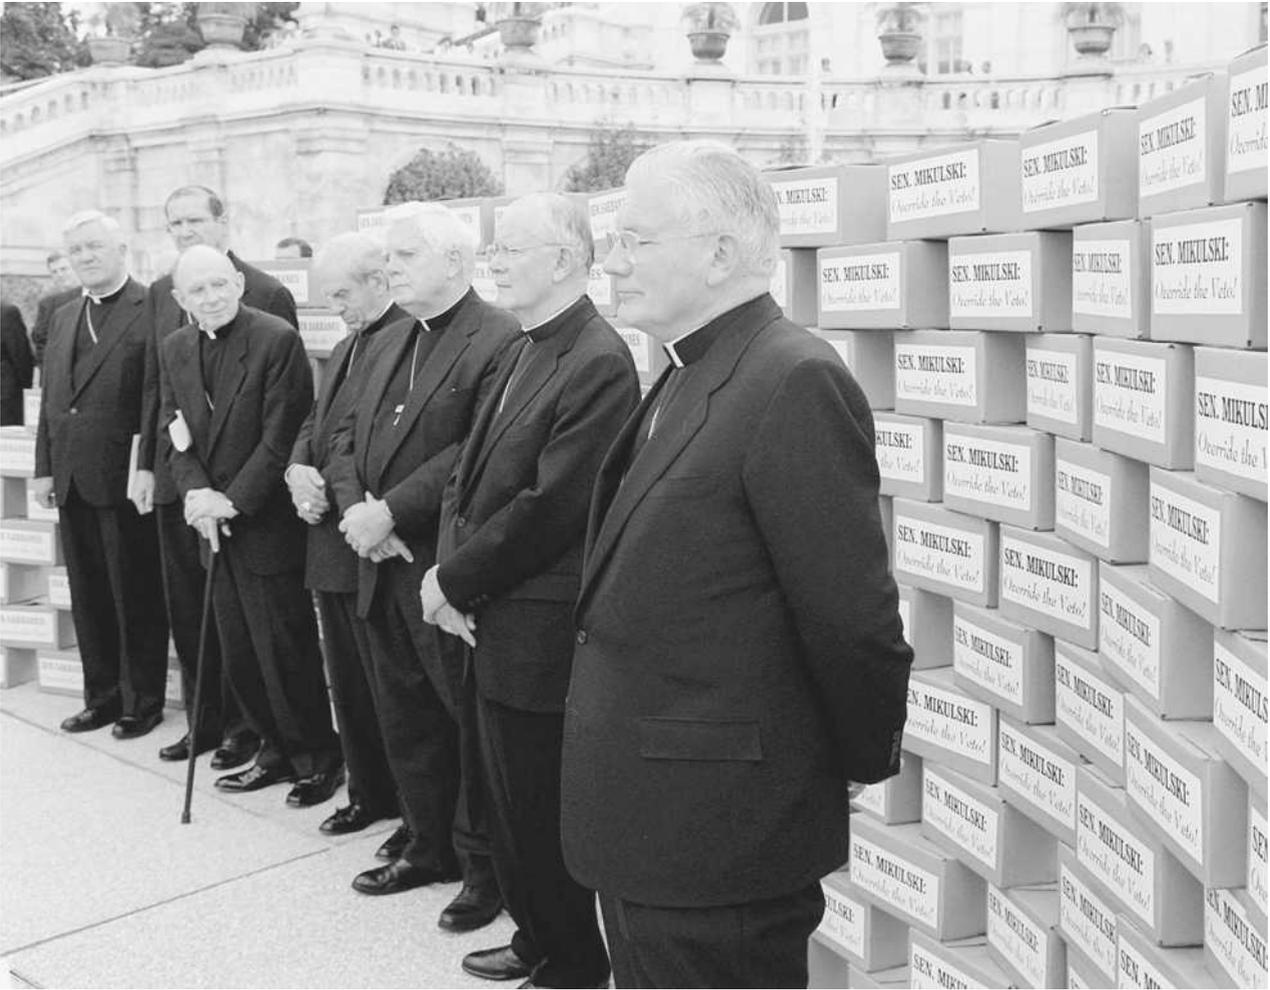

Medically, abortion is defined as the termination of pregnancy by any means before the fetus is sufficiently developed to survive; it is divided into spontaneous (“miscarriage”) and induced. Dictionaries, encyclopedias, and textbooks sometimes follow this definition. However, the practice of induced abortion requires a definition that is properly descriptive of the moral reality. In his landmark encyclical The Gospel of Life (Evangelium Vitae) (1995), John Paul II, citing the need to “call things by their proper name,” defines abortion—he uses the term “procured abortion”—as “the deliberate and direct killing, by whatever means it is carried out, of a human being in the initial phase of his or her existence, extending from conception to birth” (58) (emphasis in original). Approximately 15% of recognized pregnancies end in spontaneous abortions. However, the topic of procured abortion is part of an intense debate that John Paul II calls “an enormous and dramatic clash between good and evil, death and life, the ‘culture of death’ and the ‘culture of life’” (EV 28). At the conclusion of his classical study on abortion, Connery notes that the trend in the 19th century of eradicating abortion has now been reversed and that “in our present society the frequency of abortion is far greater than anything the Roman or ancient world ever knew or dreamed of” (Connery, 313). Indeed, the practice of abortion is unprecedented not only in terms of numbers but in term of methods and motivations.

Procedures. The purpose of abortion is to produce a dead child. Techniques for performing abortion are divided into surgical and what are called medical (involving the use of chemicals).

In surgical abortions the unborn child is killed and removed either through the woman’s cervix or, for some late-term abortions, through the abdomen (hysterotomy or hysterectomy). The most common abortion technique reported in the United States for 1997 was the surgical technique of dilation of the woman’s cervix and curettage (D&C) (97.4% as reported to the Center for Disease Control for 1997), including sharp curettage but mainly suction curettage (vacuum aspiration). In suction curettage, the cervix is dilated, and a hollow curette tube is inserted through the cervix and into the uterus. Suction causes the baby’s body to implode; the body parts are then suctioned through the tube. After 16 weeks, dilation and evacuation (D&E) is used. A variation on D&E is intact dilation and extraction (D&X or partial-birth abortion), used primarily at 20 to 24 weeks, but sometimes later, a technique in which the child is delivered feet-first all except for the head, an instrument is forced into the base of the living child’s head, the brain is sucked out, and the delivery of the now-dead child is completed.

In medical abortions, various chemicals—such as oxytocin, saline or urea solutions, prostaglandins, mifepristone (RU-486), misoprostal, or methotrexate—are used in various combinations to kill the unborn child and/or to induce premature labor. Certain contraceptive drugs and devices can also act as abortifacients by preventing implantation of the newly conceived life. This also is one of the principle effects of “morning-after pills,” high doses of ordinary birth control pills taken a couple of days after intercourse.

Statistics. The number of illegal or clandestine abortions performed is by definition difficult to determine. Estimates vary widely. Once abortion is made legal, the overall incidence of abortion increases. In the United States, the incidence of legal abortion is tracked by the Center for Disease Control (CDC) and by the Alan Guttmacher Institute (AGI), founded by Planned Parenthood. CDC data are derived primarily from central health agencies and are considered incomplete. To overcome this deficiency, AGI sends questionnaires to all known abortion providers. CDC reported 193,491 legal abortions in 1970. The number increased to a peak of 1,429,577 in 1990, then generally dropped throughout the 1990s to 1,186,039 in 1997 (with a slight increase from 1995 to 1996). AGI’s peak number, also in 1990, was 1,608,600, that number dropping in 1996 to 1,365,700 (also with a slight increase from 1995 to 1996). Especially since the 1950s, laws regulating and restricting the practice of abortion have been overturned in many countries. AGI estimates that the number of legal abortions worldwide in 1995 could have been as high as 25.6 million.

Cardinals standing in front of boxes of petitions during a pro-life rally on Capitol Hill. Left to right: Adam Maida, Detroit; Roger Mahony, Los Angeles; Joseph Bernardin, Chicago; Anthony Bevelacqua, Philadelphia; Bernard Law, Boston; James Hickey, Washington; and William Keeler, Baltimore. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Reasons for Abortion. CDC's report on U.S. abortions for 1997 showed that women obtaining abortions were more likely to be under 25 years of age (51.8%), white (58.4%), and unmarried (81%). Forty-eight percent had repeat abortions. CDC or the AGI surveys do not track reasons for abortions. Specialized surveys indicate that most abortions are elective. In one U.S. study, women on average gave 3.7 reasons for obtaining an abortion, with 76% choosing concern about how having a baby could change their lives. Similar results are found worldwide.

However, reasons for promoting the legalization of abortion extend far beyond making life choices available. Major social forces consider abortion an essential part of an effort to control population growth and size. Others see abortion as a tool to solve a wide variety of social problems, for example, poverty and crime. In these and other cases, the inherent dignity of the unborn child is negated, reduced, or superceded for the sake of other values.

CHURCH TEACHING

Each person is created in the image and likeness of God and is called to a personal relationship with God that will last forever. The life of each person is sacred and must be respected absolutely from the moment of conception to natural death. No one can ever claim the right to directly destroy an innocent human being for any reason. Direct abortion is gravely contrary to the moral law. With respect to care for the mother and her child, the Church's social teaching embraces a deep commitment to support for families, help for pregnant women in need, and healing after abortion.

Pro-life demonstrators marching in front of the White House, 1979.

Scripture. Neither the Old nor the New Testament explicitly addresses the question of procured abortion. This silence is not a sign of acceptance but of abhorrence. Life is a gift from God, who is the Lord of life and death. Shedding the blood of the innocent was forbidden (Gn 9:4–6; Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17). In some texts it is suggested that God works within the womb (Jb 10:8–12, 31:15; Is 44:24; Ps 139:13–15; 2 Mc 7:22–23) and that God has a personal relationship with the unborn child (Is 49:1, 5; Jer 1:5). In the New Testament, the infancy narratives in particular manifest great respect for fetal and infant life.

Early Church. Abortion was an accepted practice in the Greco-Roman culture. As the early Church moved into this world, an explicit teaching in opposition to abortion developed. The Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, an early book of Christian instruction with roots in the Jewish community (dating perhaps from the 1st century AD), begins with a teaching on the two Ways of Life and Death, and includes the admonition: “Thou shalt not procure abortion, nor commit infanticide” (II.2). In the early centuries, the condemnation of abortion was unequivocal.

The first Church legislation prescribing penitential discipline for abortion appears in the early 4th century, beginning a legal tradition that continues to this day. The distinction between the formed and unformed fetus, especially with regard to the time of animation, entered into patristic theological reflections. A primary influence in this regard was the Septuagint (Greek) translation of a text in the Old Testament. One man in the course of fighting with another strikes a woman and causes a miscarriage (Ex 21:22–25). In the Hebrew version, a fine is levied for the miscarriage, but the principle of “life for life, eye for an eye” applies to any other injuries. The Greek text introduces a distinction between the unformed and formed child, the penalty for destroying the former being a fine, for the latter “life for life.” Here abortion of the formed fetus was homicide. Not all Church Fathers thought the distinction between the formed and unformed fetus was significant. Even for those who did, the time of animation was not seen as a dividing line determining when abortion was permissible. Whether formed or unformed, a new human life was under way and abortion was rejected either as homicide or as anticipated homicide.

Transmission of the Tradition. In the Middle Ages, Aristotle’s biology, in which the male was formed at 40 days, the female at 90 days, was reintroduced into the West. The distinction between the formed and unformed fetus became a part of Church discipline, law, and theology, but the condemnation of abortion at any stage continued. As Connery notes, “Even during the many centuries when Church penal and penitential practice was based on the theory of delayed animation, the condemnation of abortion was never affected by it” (Connery, 304). The distinction was used mainly for purposes of legal classification and the grading of penances.

Abortion rights supporters march through Washington. (UPI/Corbis-Bettmann)

Building on an unpublished work of John of Naples, Antoninus (1389–1459) for the first time introduced into theology a discussion of abortion of the unanimated fetus to save the life of the mother. Theologians debated this matter for the next three or four centuries. The issue became obsolete when the distinction between formed and unformed fetus was undercut by the findings of modern science and the theory of delayed animation was displaced by that of immediate animation. Connery argues that a consensus of theologians regarding immediate animation was reached in the second half of the 19th century. “This tended to make the whole question [regarding abortion of the unanimated fetus] somewhat speculative” (Connery, 223). In 1869, Pius IX removed the distinction between animated and unanimated fetus as a basis for penalties in Church law.

In the course of the modern debate, Antonius de Corduba (1485–1578) introduced a distinction between acceptable medical therapies that are immediately, directly, and principally conducive to the health of the mother (de se salutifera) and unacceptable therapies that are immediately, directly, and principally conducive to the death of fetus (de se mortifera). Corduba’s distinction met with general acceptance and eventually became known as the distinction between direct and indirect abortion.

Modern Developments. In the second half of the 19th century, an extended debate arose among theologians over craniotomy (collapsing the skull of the child to complete delivery) and medical abortion to save the mother’s life. Those in favor argued that the fetus in these circumstances was an unjust aggressor, even if only in a material sense. The intention was to save the mother’s life, while the death of the fetus was accidental and unintentional. Through decrees in 1884, 1889, and finally 1895 (DS 3258, 3298), the Holy Office rejected craniotomy and medical abortion. It stated that it cannot be taught that craniotomy is licit, and that the same applies to any medical procedure directly lethal either to the fetus or to the mother. After devoting four chapters of his book to these controversies, Connery concluded: “It may be difficult in many cases to know where to draw the line between accidental and deliberate killing, but church authorities apparently felt that these theologians [arguing for the procedures] had gone over the line” (Connery, 312).

Human embryo. (© Science Pictures Limited/CORBIS)

After the issuance of the encyclical Casti connubii by Pius XI (1930), in which abortions for the mother’s life or health were addressed at some length, a discussion developed among theologians on the application of the distinction between direct and indirect abortion to the case of the removal of the cancerous uterus of a pregnant woman. Theologians generally came to accept the position that it was legitimate directly to remove the cancerous uterus to save the mother’s life, with the indirect effect that the child may die.

In 1898 and 1902, the Holy Office responded to questions about ectopic pregnancies (DS 3338, 3358). It recognized the general permissibility of a laparotomy, as long as serious provision was made for the life of both the fetus and the mother, but it objected to the direct removal of the nonviable fetus. In a work published in 1933, T. Lincoln Bouscaren applied the distinction between direct and indirect abortion to ectopic pregnancies. He argued that a pathological tube could be directly removed to save the mother’s life, with the indirect effect that the child may die. His position was generally accepted by theologians.

In his Oct. 25, 1951 “Allocution to Midwives,” Pius XII affirmed that every human being, even the child in the womb, has the right to life directly from God. There is no justification for the direct, deliberate disposal of an innocent human life, whether as an end in itself or as a means. In a Nov. 26, 1951 “Address to the Family Front Congress,” Pius XII again affirmed that innocent human life from the first moment of its existence is to be preserved from any direct voluntary attack. He further stated that this principle applies to mother and child; every means must be used to save the life of both. The Holy Father explicitly adopts the distinction between direct and indirect abortion. He notes that he is careful in the use of the expression “direct killing.”

The reason is that if, for example, the safety of the life of the future mother, independently of her state of pregnancy, might call for an urgent surgical operation, or any other therapeutic application, which would have as an accessory consequence, in no way desired nor intended, but inevitable, the death of the fetus, such an act could not be called a direct attempt on the innocent life. In these conditions, the operation can be lawful, as can other similar medical interventions, provided that it be a matter of great importance, such as life, and that it is not possible to postpone it until the birth of the child, or to have recourse to any other efficacious remedy.

Vatican II to the Present. In its “Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World,” the Second Vatican Council summed up the Church’s teaching tradition on abortion: “God, the Lord of life, has entrusted to men the noble mission of safeguarding life, and men must carry it out in a manner worthy of themselves. Life must be protected with the utmost care from the moment of conception: abortion and infanticide are abominable crimes” (51). Thirty years later, John Paul II authoritatively set forth the teaching that the direct and voluntary killing of an innocent human being is always gravely immoral (EV 57) and then with an equal invocation of authority he applied this teaching to abortion:

Therefore, by the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, in communion with the Bishops . . . I declare that direct abortion, that is, abortion willed as an end or as a means, always constitutes a grave moral disorder, since it is the deliberate killing of an innocent human being. This doctrine is based upon the natural law and upon the written Word of God, is transmitted by the Church's Tradition and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium (EV 62) (emphasis in original).

The worldwide practice and promotion of abortion on a scale unheard of in the history of human society prompted this unprecedented formulation of the Church's teaching. Just as the Church at the end of the 19th century could not be silent about the working classes who were oppressed in their fundamental rights, so today, "when another category of persons is being oppressed in the fundamental right to life, the Church feels in duty bound to speak out with the same courage on behalf of those who have no voice" (EV 5).

SPECIAL QUESTIONS

In the process of human generation, God creates and directly infuses the immaterial and eternal soul. The Magisterium has not definitively resolved the issue of when the soul is infused. However, today, as in the past, all direct abortion from fertilization forward is rejected. In The Gospel of Life, John Paul II sets forth two basic arguments. First, a new human individual begins at fertilization: "a life is begun which is neither that of the father nor the mother; it is rather the life of a new human being with his own growth. It would never be made human if it were not human already. . . . Right from fertilization the adventure of a human life begins, and each of its capacities requires time, a rather lengthy time to find its place and to be in a position to act" (EV 60, quoting the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, "Declaration on Procured Abortion" [1974]). John Paul II takes as his own the rhetorical question asked in the CDF's instruction Donum vitae, "How could a human individual not be a human person?" Second, when human life is at issue, the safer course is required: "The mere probability that a human person is involved would suffice to justify an absolutely clear prohibition of any intervention aimed at killing a human embryo." The Holy Father continues: "Precisely for this reason, over and above all scientific debates and those philosophical affirmations to which the Magisterium has not expressly committed itself, the Church has always taught and continues to teach that the result of human procreation, from the first moment of its existence, must be guaranteed that unconditional respect which is morally due to the human being in his or her totality and unity as body and spirit" (EV 60).

In the Middle Ages, Thomas Aquinas was a proponent of delayed animation. According to his biological theory, out of excess nourishment, the male produces semen, which serves as an active instrumental cause of the generative power of the father's soul, the elements, and the heavens (responsible for the species of the one generated). Also out of excess nourishment, the female produces menstrual blood, a passive material. At conception, the semen begins acting on the menstrual blood; through a series of many generations and corruptions, a new life is generated, at first vegetative, then animal, and finally, when the body is sufficiently organized, intellectual. With respect to the completion of the generative process, the parents only dispose the matter, while God directly creates the form. In the Summa Theologiae, Thomas espouses the classic Aristotelian view that once generation is complete, the semen dissolves. "The movement of an instrument ceases when the effect has been produced in being" (Summa Theologiae I, q. 118, a. 1, ad 4).

As noted earlier, with the establishment of the cell theory, the discovery of the female ovum, and a proper understanding of the male sperm and fertilization, the theory of immediate animation became generally accepted. The essential generative act takes place at fertilization. What happens thereafter is self-directed development and growth. From the single-celled zygote stage, the new life is an organized, complex, unique, human, individual person. The new life is not a potential human being but a human being with active potential to grow and develop in accord with the life cycle proper to the human person.

Those who seek to maintain the general theory of delayed hominization—the commonly used term today for delayed animation—in the context of the new biology have difficulties in explaining how a lower form of life is transformed into a higher. If the male semen is not the cause of the ever-evolving generative process, then a new efficient cause must be found. The most economical argument places the nucleus of the zygote as the efficient cause of the developmental process. Ashley and O'Rourke point out that for Aristotle the presence of a highly organized body is dependent on the appearance of a "primary organ" (which for him was the heart) through which the soul activated the organism. But today we know that "a sequence of primordial centers of organization in the embryo goes back continuously to the nucleus of the zygote, long before the brain appears as the final center" (Ashley and O'Rourke, 236). Only the minimal structure necessary for the active potentiality of self-development is required for an organism to be an actual human person.

Not all who favor some form of delayed hominization adopt the traditional general theory. Some argue that the new human life in its earliest days and even weeks is genetically human but is not a single unified individual. However, a careful look at what is known biologically sheds new light on early human development and casts aside the suggestion that in the early stages the cells of the new life are just an aggregate.

Serra and Columbo argue that the new genome, established at fertilization, is the basis of the structural and functional unity of the embryo developing in a constant direction. In fact, the regulation of the process of development is the result of the hierarchically ordered activity of three main classes of genes: the “coordinate,” the “selector,” and the “realizator” genes. After reviewing the biological data, Serra and Columbo conclude: “[A]part from fortuitous disturbances, at the fusion of two gametes, a new real human individual initiates its own existence, or life cycle, during which—given all the necessary and sufficient conditions—it will autonomously realize all the potentialities with which he is intrinsically endowed” (165).

Johnson examined the arguments that claim irreversible individuality does not occur at fertilization but perhaps 14 or so days later. He reduces the cases giving rise to this view to three: that of the hydatidiform mole, the role of the maternal contribution to human development, and the question of totipotentiality (including the issue of twinning). In the case of hydatidiform moles, no organism is actually present or the organism is profoundly defective and doomed to die. With respect to the maternal role in the developing new life, Johnson argues that any genetic information received from the mother would be subordinate to the dominant role played by the zygote’s own directive structures. The most important of these three cases is that of totipotentiality. The cells of the early embryo, perhaps up to when the primitive streak appears, possess an ability to become separate organisms, as occurs in the case of monozygotic twinning (with the subcase the possibility that the twins subsequently recombine). Thus, some argue, until twinning is no longer possible, the new life is a genetic but not a developmental individual. Johnson observes that separated early cells can develop as new individuals (a form of asexual reproduction) but that excessive focus on this “plastic” character can give rise to the idea that the early cells when part of the developing new life have no more than an incidental unity. An examination of the cells as part of the early embryo shows complex ordering, communication, and regulation one in relation to the other. He suggests that “potentially totipotent” would be a better term for the cells that are a part of the developing new life. Serra and Colombo make a similar point when they state that the totipotency present in the zygote does not mean indeterminacy, but an actual capacity for executing a plan according to a given program. Twinning occurs when cells accidentally break off (due, for example, to an error in cell division) and is the exception to the rule. Johnson argues that the claims for delayed hominization that he has examined cannot be used as grounds to justify any proposed action.

CONCLUSION

On many occasions, John Paul II has addressed the question of abortion. In his Oct. 7, 1979 homily on the Mall in Washington, D.C., he poignantly summed up the Church’s teaching: “I do not hesitate to proclaim before you and before the world that all human life—from the moment of conception and through all subsequent stages—is sacred, because human life is created in the image and likeness of God. . . . Human life is precious because it is the gift of a God whose love is infinite; and when God gives life, it is forever.”

Bibliography: “Law and the Incidence of Abortion,” Documentation on Abortion and the Right to Life II (Washington, DC 1976), 5–11. A. TORRES and J. D. FORREST, “Why Do Women Have Abortions?” Family Planning Perspectives 20 (1988) 69–76. F. G. CUNNINGHAM, et al., eds., Williams Obstetrics: 20th Edition (Stamford, Conn. 1997). K. L. MOORE and T. V. N. PERSAUD, Before We Are Born: Essentials of Embryology and Birth Defects, 5th ed. (Philadelphia 1998). S. K. HENSHAW, “Abortion Incidence and Services in the United States, 1995–1996,” Family Planning Perspectives 30 (1998) 263–70, 287; Sharing Responsibility: Women, Society, and Abortion Worldwide (New York 1999); “Abortion Surveillance United States, 1997,” Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report: CDC Surveillance Summaries 40 (Dec. 8, 2000). Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, “Declaration on Procured Abortion,” (1974); “Instructions on Respect for Human Life in Its Origins and on the Dignity of Procreation,” (1987). Catechism of the Catholic Church 2258, 2270–75, 2319, 2322–23. JOHN PAUL II, The Gospel of Life (Evangelium Vitae) (1995). “The Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles,” The Apostolic Fathers, v. 1, tr. K. LAKE (Cambridge, Mass. 1965). U.S. Catholic Bishops, Pastoral Plan for Pro-Life Activities: A Reaffirmation (1985); Faithful for Life: A Moral Reflection (1995); Living the Gospel of Life (1998). J. T. NOONAN, JR., “An Almost Absolute Value in History,” in The Morality of Abortion: Legal and Historical Perspectives (Cambridge, Mass. 1970), 1–59. G. GRISEZ, Abortion: The Myths, the Realities, and the Arguments (New York 1970); The Way of the Lord Jesus, v. 2: Living a Christian Life (Quincy, Ill. 1993). B. ASHLEY, “A Critique of the Theory of Delayed Hominization,” in An Ethical Evaluation of Fetal Experimentation: An Interdisciplinary Study, ed. D. G. MCCARTHY and A. S. MORACZEWSKI (St. Louis, Mo. 1976), 113–33. B. ASHLEY and K. D. O’ROURKE, Health Care Ethics: A Theological Analysis, 4th ed. (Washington, DC 1997). J. CONNERY, Abortion: The Development of the Roman Catholic Perspective (Chicago, Ill. 1977). S. J. HEANEY, ed., Abortion: A New Generation of Catholic Responses (Braintree, Mass. 1992). M. JOHNSON, “Delayed Hominization,” Theological Studies 56 (1995) 743–63. P. LEE, Abortion and Unborn Human Life (Washington, DC 1996). T. J. O’DONNELL, Medicine and Christian Morality, 3d ed. (Staten Island, N.Y. 1996). I. C. DE PAULA, “The Respect Due to the Human Embryo: A Historical and Doctrinal Perspective,” in Identity and Statute of Human Embryo: Proceedings of Third Assembly of the Pontifical Academy for Life, ed. J. DE DIOS VIAL CORREA and E. SGRECCIA (Vatican City 1998), 48–73. A. SERRA and R. COLOMBO, “Identity and Status of the Human Embryo: The Contribution of Biology,” in ibid., 128–77. W. E. MAY, Catholic Bioethics and the Gift of Human Life (Huntington, Ind. 2000). J. DONCEEL, “Immediate Animation and Delayed Hominization,” Theological Studies 31 (1970) 76–105. N. FORD, When Did I Begin? Conception of the Human Individual in History, Philosophy, and Science (Cambridge, Eng. 1988). T. A. SHANNON and A. B.

Pope John Paul II visits grave of Jerome Lejeune, an ardent abortion opponent and leader of Pontifical Academy for Life, an organization with close ties to the Vatican, Chalo-Saint-Mars cemetery outside Paris, August 1997. (AP/Wide World Photos)

WOLTER, "Reflections on the Moral Status of the Pre-Embryo," Theological Studies 51 (1990) 603–26.

[M. A. TAYLOR]

ABORTION (CANON LAW)

The Catholic Church has long considered abortion to be not only a grave moral evil but also a crime punishable by canonical sanctions. Any Latin Catholic who successfully procures an abortion incurs an "automatic" (latae sententiae) excommunication (Codex iuris canonici c. 1398). A major excommunication can be imposed on an Eastern Catholic who procures an abortion. An Eastern cleric can be subjected to additional penalties, including deposition from the clerical state (Corpus canonum ecclesiarum orientalium c. 1450.2). One who procures or positively cooperates in the procurement of an abortion is irregular or permanently impeded from the reception of orders and the exercise of orders already received (CIC cc. 1041.4, 1044.3; CCEO cc. 762–763).

The traditional canonical understanding of "abortion" was that it consisted in the intentional and culpable expulsion from the uterus of a living, non-viable fetus. Interpreting the text narrowly, most (but not all) canonists held that the canonical penalty for abortion was not incurred by those who killed a viable fetus in utero or allowed such a fetus to die after causing its expulsion from the uterus. In 1988, the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legal Texts authoritatively construed the term "abortion" to mean the intentional and culpable killing of a fetus "in whatever way or whatever time from the moment of conception it may be procured." Thus, penalties for abortion can now be incurred or imposed even for the destruction of a viable fetus.

The current Codes omit the 1917 Code's explicit reference to the mother as one who incurs the censure for abortion. The explicit mention of the mother in the 1917 Code was intended to resolve a controversy among pre-Code authors. Since the 1917 Code definitively resolved this dispute, mention of the mother in the revised Code was seen as superfluous.

The latae sententiae excommunication threatened by the Latin Code for procurement of abortion is often referred to as an "automatic" penalty. It should be noted, however, that only Latin-rite Catholics who have completed their eighteenth year can incur latae sententiae penalties. Any legally recognized factor that eliminates or diminishes culpability for an offense also relieves one of the burden of an “automatic” penalty for that offense (CIC c. 1324.3).

The revised Latin Code subjects to the latae sententiae penalty of excommunication only those cooperators in an abortion whose cooperation was necessary for the commission of the offense. In other words, only those without whose efforts a particular abortion would not have occurred incur the “automatic” penalty of excommunication (CIC c. 1329.2). Penalties can be imposed on other cooperators in accord with the gravity of their complicity in a “common conspiracy” (CIC c. 1329.1; CCEO c. 1417). One need not be a necessary cooperator to become irregular for the reception or exercise of orders. Culpable positive cooperation suffices.

Remission of censures incurred or imposed for abortion is reserved in the Latin Church (CIC c. 1355) to ordinaries in normal circumstances and in the Eastern Churches (CCEO c. 1420.1) to hierarchs. When a penitent of the Latin Church is in danger of death, any priest, even one lacking the faculty to hear confessions, validly absolves from the censure in the act of sacramental confession (CIC c. 976). For the faithful of Eastern Churches, penalties forbidding the reception of the sacraments are suspended when the guilty party is in danger of death (CCEO c. 1435.1) and any priest can then absolve from the sin of abortion that prompted the penalty (CCEO c. 725).

In the Latin Church, as long as the latae sententiae censure for abortion has not been declared, all bishops (CIC c. 1355.2), canons penitentiary, those appointed to fulfill that role in dioceses that do not have cathedral chapters (CIC c. 508), and chaplains in prisons, hospitals, and ocean liners (CIC c. 566.2) may remit the censure in the sacramental forum. In hardship situations, ordinary confessors can temporarily remit the censure, but the penitent reincurs the censure unless he or she makes recourse to one with authority to remit the censure within thirty days (CIC c. 1357). Confessors can be given habitual faculties to absolve unconditionally from this censure in sacramental confession.

Bibliography: T. GREEN, “Sanction in the Church (c. 1311–1399),” in J. CORIDEN et al., eds., The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (New York 1985) 891–942. M. GLENDON, Abortion and Divorce in Western Law (Cambridge 1987). R. SAGMEISTER, “Das neue kirchliche Strafrecht und der Schutz des Lebens,” in K. LUDICKE et al., eds., Recht im Dienste des Menschen (Graz 1986) 493–516. L. WRENN, Authentic Interpretation on the 1983 Code (Washington 1993) 48–49.

[J. P. BEAL]

ABORTION (U.S. LAW)

The United States has been making laws about abortion since the 19th century. From the middle to latter decades of that century, distinctions between abortions performed before and after “quickening” passed away, and the vast majority of states penalized most abortions, as well as the advertising of abortion services and information. While doctors were generally subject to criminal penalties for performing abortions, few states imposed such penalties on the women who sought them.

Beginning in the 1960s, several states enacted laws that permitted abortion in particular circumstances such as rape and incest, and in cases in which a doctor concluded that a pregnancy posed a danger to the mother’s life or health. Some states also allowed abortions during approximately the first trimester of pregnancy. In response, a rapidly developing pro-life movement supported referenda and legislation to reverse permissive abortion laws. These pro-life campaigns were largely successful during the late 1960s and the early years of the 1970s.

The Legalization of Abortion. This democratic process at the state level was largely halted in 1973 with the United States Supreme Court’s decision in Roe v. Wade and its companion case Doe v. Bolton. In these cases, the Supreme Court announced that there could be found in the U.S. Constitution a right of “privacy” broad enough to encompass a woman’s decision to terminate her pregnancy by abortion; unborn human lives were not “persons” entitled to protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. Furthermore, states could not pass abortion laws shielding unborn life from abortion to a degree greater than the federal constitution without running afoul of women’s federal constitutional right to choose abortion.

The Roe Court established standards for state regulation of abortion with reference to the three trimesters of pregnancy. On the surface, it appeared that these standards allowed states to restrict abortion to a greater degree as a pregnancy progressed. In effect, however, the Court’s standards prohibited states from banning any abortion throughout pregnancy. Even in the last trimester, states could not forbid any abortion if an abortion provider would state that it was necessary for a woman’s “health.” The Doe decision defined “health” in the abortion context very expansively to include “all factors—physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman’s age—relevant to the well-being of the patient.”

After Roe v. Wade. In response to Roe, a movement arose in the 1970s to add a “human life amendment” to the federal constitution. Two leading versions of this amendment were proposed. The first would declare the unborn human life a constitutional “person” entitled to the Fourteenth Amendment’s protection of life. A second would allow all states, if they wished, to pass laws protecting the lives of the unborn as they had before Roe. While there arose significant momentum for such an amendment over the course of the 1970s and early 1980s, no such amendment has yet passed. The passage of a human life amendment remains an ultimate goal of the pro-life movement.

“March for Life” Demonstration, Washington D.C., 1975. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Also in response to Roe, state legislatures passed a great number and variety of laws intended either to restrict legal abortion based on the mother’s reasons for seeking abortion or on the length of her pregnancy, or to regulate (usually limit) the conditions under which abortion could take place. Abortion advocates regularly challenged these laws in federal court; as a result, many abortion law cases were appealed to and ultimately decided by the United States Supreme Court. During the 1970s and 1980s, the Supreme Court most often interpreted the privacy right announced in Roe quite expansively, and invalidated state laws regulating or restricting abortion. From 1976 to 1986, for example, the court held: that a husband’s interests in his unborn child are not greater than a wife’s right to seek an abortion (Planned Parenthood v. Danforth); that parents have only a limited right to direct their minor daughters’ abortion decisions, which right can be assumed by a judge (Bellotti v. Baird); that safety regulations may not be imposed upon abortion clinics if compliance would create significant financial obstacles to women seeking abortions (Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health); and that abortionists may not be directed to use the post-viability abortion method most likely to result in a live child (Colautti v. Franklin).

The judicial trend to render the abortion right virtually absolute peaked in the decision of Thornburgh v.

Pro-life demonstrators from Operation Rescue, Buffalo, New York, 1992. (AP/Wide World Photos)

American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. In this case, the Supreme Court struck down a Pennsylvania law requiring abortionists to obtain a woman's informed consent prior to performing an abortion. Dissenting from the majority opinion, Roe supporter Justice Warren Burger wrote: "We have apparently already passed the point at which abortion is available merely on demand. If the statute at issue here is to be invalidated, the 'demand' will not even have to be the result of an informed choice."

Roe v. Wade* Questioned. In 1989, the tone of Supreme Court abortion jurisprudence changed somewhat in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services. In this case, while the Court explicitly refused to reconsider Roe, a majority of justices held that the right to choose an abortion should be demoted from the status of a "fundamental" constitutional right to that of a "liberty interest." The Court upheld Missouri laws that: (a) permitted the use of state resources for childbirth, but not for abortion; (b) mandated viability testing at 20 weeks' gestation and later prior to the performance of an abortion; (c) directed that all state laws should be interpreted to protect unborn children, subject to existing constitutional and case law precedents.

After Webster, two cases clarified the law concerning parental involvement in minors' abortions. In Hodg- son v. Minnesota and Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, the Supreme Court held that one or both parents could legally be required to receive notification of an unmarried minor's abortion decision if the daughter was provided the opportunity of a "judicial bypass," i.e. appealing to a judge to go forward with the abortion without parental notification.

It was widely expected that the Supreme Court would continue to weaken Roe with its decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey in 1992. The opposite occurred. In a plurality opinion authored by the appointees of two anti-abortion presidents, George Bush, Sr., and Ronald Reagan, Roe was reaffirmed, albeit with a bimester (versus a trimester) scheme for reviewing state abortion laws. After viability, the old standard would apply: abortions declared to be for a woman's "life or health" could not be restricted. Pre-viability, abortion laws would be judged according to a new standard: whether or not they imposed an "undue burden" or "substantial obstacle" to any woman's obtaining any abortion. This standard was attacked by the dissenters in Casey as one subject to wildly varying and subjective interpretations.

The plurality opinion in Casey was silent regarding whether Roe had been rightly decided. It opined, instead, that abortion had become necessary for women to plan their lives in the event their birth control should fail. The Court also indicated that it believed that its authority would be undermined by a reversal of Roe.

Partial Birth Abortion. The movement to ban a practice known as "partial-birth abortion" began a new chapter in the legal and political struggle over abortion in the United States. In the early 1990s, pro-life advocates learned of the development of a new method for terminating the lives of partially-born children. In a paper delivered at an annual meeting of the National Abortion Federation (a trade association for abortionists and abortion clinics), abortionist Dr. Martin Haskell of Ohio described a procedure he had helped develop called "Dilation and Extraction." Used on unborn human lives from approximately 16 to 32 weeks gestation, the procedure involved: (1) dilating a pregnant mother's cervix over several days; (2) forcibly converting the body of the living unborn child to a breech position in the womb; (3) with forceps, grabbing a leg of the child and dragging its entire body up to the base of the neck outside the mother's body; (4) stabbing the child with a pair of scissors at the base of the brain; (5) with a suction device, evacuating the contents of the skull; (6) crushing the skull and removing the entire body from the mother.

Pro-life groups disseminated information about this procedure widely to the public, the media, and to Congress. In 1995, legislation was introduced in Congress to ban this procedure; it was entitled the “Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act.” The bill commanded support from many self-described “pro-choice” members of Congress. It also had bi-partisan support. Public opinion polls showed up to 70 percent of American citizens favoring passage of the bill, including a majority of self-described “pro-choice” men and women. Still, after several attempts, the bill did not become law; it was twice vetoed by President William Clinton. While the House of Representatives easily overrode such vetoes, the Senate remained a few votes short of the number needed for an override.

While the federal Congress deliberated, however, 30 states passed legislation banning partial-birth abortion. These laws were immediately challenged by abortion advocates, and in 1999 the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari to hear the dispute over the partial-birth ban passed by the legislature of Nebraska. The Court’s opinion in that case, Stenberg v. Carhart, in the eyes of many veteran legal analysts, marks a return to the days when the constitutional abortion right was interpreted so broadly that it swallowed all attempts at regulation. In Stenberg, writing for the 5–4 majority, Justice Breyer stated that Nebraska’s law failed the Casey test; the law placed an undue burden on women’s right to abortion because it could be interpreted to ban the most common form of second trimester abortions, the dismemberment or “Dilation and Evacuation” method. He also wrote that—despite the lack of empirical scientific evidence on the medical necessity for partial-birth abortion—the state was required to make a “health exception” to the ban in the event that any abortionist might decide that this procedure would be marginally better for any woman seeking an abortion.

The majority’s opinion provoked blistering dissents from Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Thomas, Scalia, and Kennedy. Justice Scalia compared Stenberg with the Supreme Court decisions allowing slavery (Dred Scott) and the internment of Japanese American citizens during World War II (Korematsu). Justice Kennedy, a member of the Casey plurality, argued that the Court had turned its back on Casey’s invitation to accord greater weight to states’ interests in unborn life. In emotional language, he described partial-birth abortion and argued for Nebraska’s right to declare such a procedure a threat to respect for all human life and to the future of the medical profession.

Despite the Stenberg decision, the struggle over partial-birth abortion altered the legal and political landscape in ways fundamentally harmful to abortion advocates in the United States. Public opinion polls taken in the late 1990s showed pro-life support even with support for legal abortion for the first time since the early 1970s. During the federal congressional debate over partial-birth abortion, abortion advocacy groups, for the first time in decades, were forced to answer hard questions in the media. False statements made repeatedly by abortion advocates were exposed by reporters and in congressional hearings broadcast live on C-SPAN. While the fate of state and federal bans on partial-birth abortions is not yet decided and the Stenberg opinion was a major legal blow to the pro-life movement, the campaign to ban partial-birth abortion advanced the credibility of the pro-life movement in ways that will be felt for years.

Bibliography: The texts of all United States Supreme Court decisions can be found in the official U.S. Supreme Court reports. The legal, political, and social history of abortion in the United States during the nineteenth century can be found in M. GROSSBERG, Governing the Hearth: Law and the Family in Nineteenth-Century America (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1985). Abortion law and practice from the nineteenth century to today is found in M. OLASKY, Abortion Rites: A Social History of Abortion in America (Wheaton, Ill. 1992).

[H. M. ALVARE]

ABRABANEL, ISAAC (ABRAVANEL)

Portuguese rabbi, biblical scholar, and philosopher; b. Lisbon, 1437; d. Venice, 1508. Born in a rich Jewish family, Isaac ben-Judah Abrabanel received an excellent education and entered politics. He was the minister of finance, first of King Alfonso V of Portugal (1438–81), and then of King Ferdinand V of Castile. The edict of 1492, which expelled all the Jews from Spain, drove him into exile. At first he was welcomed in Naples, where he held an important post at the court of Ferdinand I (1458–94) and Alfonso II (1494–95), but the French invasion forced him to take refuge in Sicily and later in Corfu. After a short stay in Apulia, he finally settled in Venice.

Despite these numerous changes of abode, Abrabanel wrote many works that are as varied as they are original. With his brilliant mind, encyclopedic knowledge, and noble and generous heart, he was an outstanding exception to the general decadence that marked the disastrous end of the Judeo-Spanish epoch. He once said of himself that he was “a descendant of Jesse of Bethlehem, a scion of the royal house of David”; and there was in fact something princely about him.

His numerous writings show him to have been well versed in Christian and Muslim, Greek and Hebrew literatures, a creative thinker, a careful and exact student of the Bible. While in Portugal, he wrote a commentary entitled Merkebet Ha-Mishneh (The Chariot of Deuteronomy); in Castile, he wrote commentaries on Joshua, Judges, and Kings. In Naples, he composed a commentary on Daniel and a sort of ritual on the Passover sacrifice. In Corfu, he wrote a work on Isaiah; in Venice, commentaries on the other Prophets and on the first four books of the Pentateuch. His dissertations on the Messiah influenced the messianic movements among the Jews of the 16th and 17th centuries (see SHABBATAIISM).

Among his works are also the Migdol Yeshu'ot (Tower of Saving Deeds) on the evidence of God's grandeur as shown in His miraculous interventions, the Lahaqat Nebi'im (The Company of the Prophets), and the 'Ateret Zeqenim (The Crown of the Ancients). As a philosopher, Abrabanel brought to a close the line of Jewish Aristotelian thinkers. He knew and respected Christian scholasticism, especially the works of St. Thomas Aquinas, whose treatise De spiritualibus creaturis he translated from Latin into Hebrew.

In his biblical exegesis he followed in the footsteps of RASHI and Kimchi, avoiding both a mystical and a rationalistic interpretation of the text, in favor of a natural and simple explanation. He was regarded as an authority in learned matters among the Jews, who called him Hakam (the Sage) and Nasi (the Prince). His erudite introductions to the Scriptures rendered considerable service to biblical criticism also among Christian scholars. Richard Simon did not hesitate to write emphatically: "We can gain more from him than from any other of the rabbinical scholars for a better understanding of the Scriptures. . . . His clarity and eloquence in Hebrew are not less than Cicero's in Latin." Yet this is tantamount to admitting that he was more of a rhetorician than an exegete. Besides, it must be conceded that his ideas were often oversubtle and his language too prolix, and that he indulged too much in violent diatribes against Christianity.

See Also: JEWISH PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: B. NETANYAHU, Don Isaac Abravanel, Statesman and Philosopher (Philadelphia 1953). J. SARACHEK, Don Isaac Abravanel (New York 1938). A. MELINEK, Don Isaac Abrabanel: His Life and Times (London 1952). J. B. TREND and H. M. J. LOEWE, eds., Isaac Abravanel (New York 1938). E. I. J. ROSENTHAL, "Don Isaac Abravanel: Financier, Statesman and Scholar, 1437–1937," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 21 (1937) 445–478. J. BAER, "Don Isaac Abravanel and His Relation to Problems of History and Politics," Tarbiz 8 (1937) 241–259, in Heb. M. H. SEGAL, "R. Isaac Abravanel as Interpreter of the Bible," ibid. 260–299, in Heb. E. E. URBACH, "Die Staatsauffassung des Don Isaak Abrabanel," Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums 81 (1937) 257–270. J. BERGMANN, "Abrabanel's Stellung zur Agada," ibid. 270–280. H. FINKELSCHERER, "Quellen und Motive der Staats- und Gesellschaftsauffassung des Don Isaak Abravanel," ibid. 496–508. L. GINZBERG, The Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1901–06) 1: 126–128. I. LANDMAN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1939–44) 1:53–54. S. A. HORODEZKY, Encyclopedia Ju- daica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Berlin 1928–34) 1:588–596.

[A. BRUNOT]

ABRAHAM, PATRIARCH

Ancestor of the Israelites and neighboring peoples. One form of his name, Abram, regarded in Genesis as his earlier name is but a dialectic variant of the other form, Abraham, both meaning "Father [God] is exalted." However, by folk etymology, the form Abraham (Hebrew 'abrāhām) is made to mean 'ab hāmôn gōyīm, "Father of a multitude of nations" (Gn 17.5).

Life. Although the formerly common identification of Amraphel (Gn 14.1) with HAMMURABI is now regarded as very improbable, Abraham can nevertheless be considered roughly contemporaneous with this Babylonian king (18th century B.C.); the background of the Genesis stories of the Biblical PATRIARCHS agrees very well with the known conditions of northern Mesopotamia in the first half of the 2d millennium B.C. Abraham was apparently one of the seminomads of AMORRITE stock who migrated from upper Mesopotamia into Syria and Canaan between 1900 and 1700 B.C. According to the traditions recorded by the YAHWIST and the ELOHIST, his home was in Haran of Aram Naharaim (northern Mesopotamia). The later Pentateuchal PRIESTLY writers locate his original home in "Ur of the Chaldees" in southern Mesopotamia (Gn 11.28, 31; 12.4–5; 15.7; 24.10; Jos 24.2; Neh 9.7). The motive for Abraham's migration was primarily religious, leaving Mesopotamia at Yahweh's command (Gn 12.1–4), to be free from its crass polytheism (Jdt 5.6–9), but political and economic reasons may also have influenced his decision to migrate. In Gn 14.13 Abraham is called "the Hebrew" (hā'ibrī), which later generations may have taken to mean "the descendant of Eber" ('ēber), (cf. Gn 11.14–26), but which more likely originally meant "the immigrant" (see HABIRU).

Biblical genealogies relate Abraham to many Near Eastern peoples: through his brother Nahor to the ARAMAEANS; through his son Ishmael to the Ishmaelites (Gn 16; 21.9–21; 25.12–18); through his son Isaac and his grandson JACOB (Israel) to the Israelites; through his other grandson Esau to the EDOMITES (Gn 36); through his second wife Cetura to several Arabic tribes (Gn 25.1–4); and through his nephew Lot to the MOABITES and Ammonites (Gn 19.30–38). Tradition associated Abraham with several places and sacred trees in Canaan: SHECHEM and its sacred terebinth of More (Gn 12.6), BETHEL and its altar (12.8), Hebron and its terebinths of Mamre (13.18), and Beersheba and its tamarisk (21.33). Besides his wanderings in Canaan, he also went to Gerar in the western Negeb, according to the Elohist (Gn 20), and to Egypt, according to the Yahwist (Gn 12.10–20). According to Gn 25.7–11, Abraham died in his 175th year and was buried in the cave of Machphela, near Hebron.

Abraham in Salvation History. This patriarch marks a significant point in the history of salvation. He is the first to worship the true God. Because of Yahweh's covenant with him, which included the promise that in him all the nations of the earth should be blessed and of which the sign was circumcision, descent from Abraham was considered a necessary condition for belonging to the people of God. Abraham's faith in God's promise of innumerable descendants survived a severe test when God commanded him to sacrifice his only son Isaac (Gn 22). "Abram believed the Lord, who credited the act to him as justice" (Gn 15.6). St. Paul cites these words (Rom 4.3, 9, 22; Gal 3.6) to show that it is not carnal descent or circumcision, but faith like that of Abraham that makes men the true descendants of Abraham (Rom 4; Heb 11.17–19). Because they are his offspring, the blessed after death recline at the messianic banquet "in Abraham's bosom" (Lk 16.22–23).

Iconography. Perhaps the most frequently reproduced theme from the life of Abraham is that of his impending sacrifice of Isaac. This is found as early as the Synagogue of DURA-EUROPOS (c. A.D. 245) and in the Christian catacombs. As a type of the sacrifice of Christ, this scene became increasingly popular in the Middle Ages. It was also interpreted as a type of the Eucharist, as was likewise the frequently depicted encounter of Abraham with Melchizedek (Gn 14.18), e.g., in St. Mary Major in Rome. Another commonly portrayed scene was that of the visit to Abraham of three angels, sometimes represented as the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity (Gn 18). Various motifs from Abraham's life were utilized by Titian, Tintoretto, Rembrandt, and Rubens.

Bibliography: M. NOTH, A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1972). J. VAN SETERS, Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven 1975). B. VAWTER, On Genesis (Garden City NY 1977). C. WESTERMANN, Genesis, 1–11, Genesis 12–36, Genesis 37–50 (Minneapolis 1984–86).

[E. MARTIN]

ABRAHAM ECHELLENSIS

Maronite scholar; b. Ḥāqil (Mt. Lebanon), Feb. 18, 1605; d. Rome, July 15, 1664. Ibrāhīm al-Ḥāqilānī studied at the Maronite Roman College, was ordained and remained a deacon, taught Syriac and Arabic at Pisa and in Rome, published a Syriac grammar (1628), and became the interpreter for the Propagation of Faith (1635), succeeding the Maronite bishop, Sergius Rezzee, on the project to revise the Arabic translation of the Bible. From 1640 he collaborated with C. LEJAY on the Polyglot edition of the Bible, revised the work of GABRIEL SIONITA, and published the Book of Ruth in Arabic and Syriac with a Latin translation, and Maccabees three in Arabic and Latin. In 1645 he became professor of Syriac and Arabic at the Collège de France and in 1647 published three letters in defense of his book on Ruth. He was appointed by Pope ALEXANDER VII a scriptor for Arabic and Syriac at the Vatican Library (1660), and spent the rest of his life studying and publishing. His private library is conserved in the Vatican under Fonds Ecchellensis.

Abraham and Isaac. (©Archive Photos)

Bibliography: A. SCHALL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 1:61–62. J. LAMY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:116–118. L. PETIT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 1:169–171. G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 3:354–359. Y. I. AD-DIBS, Al-Ġāmi' al-mufaṣṣal fī ta'rīḥ al-Mawārīna al-mu'aṣṣal (Beirut 1905) 383–386, history of the Maronites. P. RAPHAEL, Le Rôle du collège maronite romain dans l'orientalisme (Beirut 1950) 88–92.

[E. EL-HAYEK]

ABRAHAM OF CLERMONT, ST.

Hermit, abbot; d. c. 474–481. Abraham was of Persian origins. During the Sassanian persecution of Christians he was imprisoned, regained his freedom, and fled to the West. According to the Vita patrum, ch. three, of GREGORY OF TOURS (MGSrerMer 1:672), who seems to have confused him with the Biblical patriarch, Abraham sojourned among the Anchorites in Egypt before arriving in Auvergne. There he lived a hermit's life near Clermont. His reputation for sanctity attracted a number of disciples, and his hermitage became the nucleus of a monastery dedicated to St. Cyriacus with Abraham as abbot. SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS composed his epitaph (Epist. 7.17; MGAucAnt 8:123). Abraham was invoked for the cure of fever.

Feast: June 15 (Diocese of Clermont).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 3:534–536. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:57. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 6:251–252.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

ABRAHAM OF EPHESUS, ST.

Bishop; d. either after 542 or 553. He built a religious house in Constantinople and another in Jerusalem; the former was known as the monastery of the Abrahamites, the latter as that of the Byzantines. He succeeded to the See of Ephesus as metropolitan of Asia, either in 542 after Hypatios, or in 553, after Andrew. Of his works, two homilies, important for the history of the liturgy are extant: one on the feast of the Annunciation (Euangelismos) delivered on March 25 instead of the Sunday before Christmas according to earlier custom; the other, on the Presentation (Hypapante).

Feast: Oct. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 12:757–769. M. JUGIE, "Abraham d'Éphèse et ses écrits," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 22 (1913) 37–59. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:929.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

ABRAHAM OF SANCTA CLARA

Discalced Augustinian friar, preacher, and author of popular devotional works; b. Kreenheinstetten near Baden, July 2, 1644; d. Vienna, Dec. 1, 1709. He was the son of Matthew Mergerle or Mergerlin, a tavern keeper in Kreenheinstetten, and received the name John Ulrich at baptism. He received his elementary education at the village school and at Messkirch, and he entered the gymnasium of the Jesuits at Ingolstadt in 1656. Upon the death of his father he was adopted by an uncle, Abraham von Mergerlin, a canon of Altötting, who transferred him to the Benedictine school at Salzburg in 1659. After three years there John Ulrich entered the Discalced Augustinians and at profession took the name of Abraham, doubtless out of courtesy to his uncle. He made his novitiate and completed his studies at Mariabrunn and was ordained in Vienna on June 8, 1668. After a brief assignment as preacher at the shrine in Taxa, near Augsburg, where he gained some fame for his dramatic sermons, Abraham went to Vienna, which was to be the chief center of his work. Leopold I named him preacher of the imperial court in 1677, and within the order he served as superior and prior of the convent in Vienna, as master of novices at Mariabrunn, and minister provincial of the Vienna province.

Abraham gained a reputation as a forceful orator with an unusual talent for presenting his themes in a graphic manner. Although accused by some of his contemporaries of being a buffoon in the pulpit, he seems in fact to have been a witty, cultivated, and learned man. He utilized his varied store of knowledge and exceptional ability in such a manner as to be an effective preacher.

Abraham was a prolific author and his works include a vast mélange of both sacred and secular writings. He was a literary master of both prose and poetry. Schiller characterized him as a man of marvelous originality, worthy of respect, and not easy to surpass in wit or cleverness. Abraham regarded his writings as an apostolate and even in his most humorous works aimed at the moral elevation of his readers. Abraham began his literary career in response to the plague that devastated Vienna in 1679. He wrote Merk's Wien! (Vienna 1680) as a dramatic description of the plague to show how death spares no one. He followed this with two lesser works, Lösch Wien (Vienna 1680) and Die grosse Totenbruderschaft (Vienna 1681), which exhorted the people to pray for the souls of those killed in the plague and listed personages of prominence who had succumbed. His next work, Auff, auff, ihr Christen (Vienna 1683) was an appeal to the Christian world to do battle against the Turks. This is chiefly remembered because Schiller used it as a model for the sermon of the Capuchin Friar in Wallenstein's Lager. A four-volume work, Judas der Erzscheml (Judas the archknave; Salzburg, 1686–95), is usually considered Abraham's masterpiece. The fruit of a decade of labor, this work sets forth the apocryphal life of Judas with moral applications for the daily spiritual life of the reader. The remaining works, constituting a mixture of the most varied sort, can be found in a collective edition published at Passau in 1846. They range from the serious Grammatica Religiosa (Salzburg 1691), a compendium of moral teaching, to Huy! und Pfy der Welt (Ho! and phooey on the world; Würzburg, 1707), which shows the influence of Sebastian Brant's Narrenschiff (Ship of fools). Several volumes of literary works were published after his death, and various editions and collections have appeared down to the present century. These must be used with care since there are some doubtful and spurious entries.

Bibliography: G. DUNNHAUPT, ed., Stern so aus Jacob aufgegungen Maria (Rarissima litterarum) (Stuttgart 1994). K. BERTSCHE, Die Werke Abrahams a Sancta Clara in ihren Frühdrucken (Schwetzingen 1922). W. BRANDT, Schwank und Fabel bei Abraham a Sancta Clara (Münster 1923). L. BIANCHI, Studien zur Beurteilung des Abraham a Santa Clara (Heidelberg 1924).

[A. J. CLARK]

ABRAHAM THE SIMPLE, ST.

Called also Abraham the Child; fourth-century desert father. He is identified by John Cassian as one of the great desert fathers known for his simplicity of manner and innocence and for miracles of healing. He was dead by the end of the fourth century. He may be the Abraham who relates Cassian's last Conference, a man of strictest austerity. He is not to be confused with the disciple of Pachomius and Theodore, but he may be the Abraham whose three maxims are given in the Apophthegmata Patrum PG 65: 129–132.

Feast: Oct. 27.

Bibliography: J. CASSIAN, Conlationes, ed. M. PETSCHENIG (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 13; 1886) 430–431, 672–711. S. SALAVILLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1: 171–172. B. KÖTTING, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 1:63. S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (Paris 1693-1712) 10:30–32.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM

The place, according to Jewish ideas at the time of Christ, where the just go after death. In the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16.19–31), the reward of Lazarus after his death is described in terms of his being "borne away by angels into Abraham's bosom." The Greek κόλπος, like its Hebrew equivalent hêq, can mean either bosom or lap. Some exegetes understand the text in the sense that Abraham received Lazarus as a loving father would take his small son upon his lap or hold him close to his bosom (cf. Jn 1.18); others, that Lazarus was given a place of honor at the Messianic banquet, reclining at the right hand of Abraham (cf. Jn 13.23). The latter interpretation appears more probable, since the banquet image was used in Rabbinic literature (see G. Kittel, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament 3:824–826), and Jesus Himself describes the Kingdom of God in terms of the eschatological banquet prepared on top of the Mountain of God (Lk 13.22–29; Is 2.2; 49.12), where the elect will recline with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Lk 13.28–29). At times, however, the repose in Abraham is unrelated to a banquet and signifies blissful happiness enjoyed with the Patriarch (2 Mc 13.17). The common notion of the Fathers of the Church that Abraham's bosom designates a place of happiness not only for Christians in heaven, but also for the just of the OT who there (in the LIMBO of the fathers) await the coming of the Messiah, is foreign to Jewish thought.

"Paradise with Christ in the Lap of Abraham," miniature painting from a manuscript c. 1239.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 15. E. W. SAUNDERS, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 1:21–22. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:58–59. W.

STAERK, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1950) 1:27–28.

[J. PLASTARAS]

ABRAXAS

A magico-mystical word occurring in Hellenistic papyri and found also, along with other symbols, on ancient and medieval amulets. The numerical values of the Greek letters making up the word Ἀβράξας or its variant Ἀβράσαξ (Α = 1, β = 2, ρ = 100, α = 1, ξ = 60, α = 1, ζ = 200) give a sum of 365. This figure corresponds to the total number of days in the solar year. In the Gnostic system of Basilides the term is employed also to designate the First Principle or Supreme Being, the ultimate source of the 365 heavens. Some scholars consider that there is a connection between Abraxas and the magic word abracadabra, but the relationship is disputed.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:127–155, with illustrations. M. HAIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:66.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

ABRUNCULUS OF TRIER, ST.

Bishop; d. c. 527. The only definite information about Abrunculus, or Aprunculus, comes from GREGORY OF TOURS, who says that upon his death Nicetius was elected bishop of Trier (Vitae patrum, 6.3, MGSr Mer 1:682). In the eleventh century his remains were translated from St. Symphorian to the church of St. Paulinus in Trier, and a century later, to the abbey church of Springersbach.

Feast: April 22.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 3:30–31. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 5985. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 4:556.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

ABSALON OF LUND

Archbishop, founder of Copenhagen; b. Fjenneslev, Denmark, Oct. 1128; d. Sorø, March 21, 1201. A member of one of the most powerful families on the island of Sjaelland, that of Skjalm the White, Absalon studied at Sainte-Geneviève-de-Paris. He was ordained there and enthusiastically adopted the Latin culture as well as the current ideology of Church reform. Upon his return to Denmark, he became counselor to King Valdemar the Great, founded the monastery at Sorø, was elected bishop of Roskilde (1158), and in 1178 was appointed archbishop of Lund, simultaneously retaining Roskilde up to 1191. He distinguished himself by the zeal with which he introduced into Denmark Western Church customs (e.g., tithing, clerical celibacy) and Western monasticism (Cistercians and Carthusians). He proved to be an administrator and a statesman—even a warrior—as well as a builder and a patron of the arts. In fortifying his diocese against the invasion of the Slavs (Wends), he built at Havn a castle-keep that became the nucleus of the city of Copenhagen. Multiplying the expeditions against these pagan Slavs on the southern coast of the Baltic, he took by storm the temple of Arkona (1169) on the island of Rügen, which was then annexed to Denmark. On the intellectual plane, Absalon dominated the Danish clergy of his time: a runic inscription at Nørre Aasum, Skåne, testifies to his interest in the traditional Scandinavian culture, but it is significant that he was the protector of the best Latin chronicler of his time, Saxo Grammaticus, who dedicated his Gesta Danorum to Absalon. While remaining outside the investiture struggle, Absalon was the faithful protector of royal power; this earned him the regency under the young King Canute IV (c. 1187–90).

He energetically upheld the interests of his family, promoted the career of his nephews Anders Sunesøn and Peder Sunesøn, like himself former students at Paris, who succeeded him at Lund and Roskilde respectively; Absalon also proclaimed the sanctity of his relative MARGARET OF ROSKILDE.

The city of Copenhagen venerates him as its founder; he can be considered the most brilliant Scandinavian prelate of the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: SAXO GRAMMATICUS, Gesta Danorum, ed. J. OLRİK and H. RAEDER, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1931–57). H. OLRİK, Absalon, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1908–09). H. KOCH and B. KORNERUP, eds. Den danske kirkes historie (Copenhagen 1950–) v.1. L. WEIBULL, Nordisk Historia 2 (1948) 526–538.

[L. MUSSET]

ABSOLUTE, THE

From the Latin ab-solutus, meaning separated, free from, or complete, that which is independent of conditions, relations, or impediments. In philosophical language the absolute may be said to function adverbially, adjectivally, and substantively. In an adverbial sense, a consideration is said to be absolute when something is discussed without reference to conditions that may de facto attach to it but are not essential to it. For example, in comparing intelligence and will, one may maintain that, absolutely speaking, the activity of intelligence is more perfect than that of will, although in man's present condition some objects are attained more perfectly by love than by knowledge. In an adjectival sense, the most important philosophical instance of the absolute is absolute truth. TRUTH is the relation of a mental judgment to reality, and yet some truths are said to be eternal. Finally, in a substantive sense, the Absolute is that which is perfect and complete and preeminently the supreme principle of all things. Absolute truth and absolute being are the most important senses of the term for philosophy. This article summarizes the historical development of the concept from Augustine to Hegel and concludes with a brief evaluation of absolutism as compared to relativism.

Augustine. Although there are many historical precedents to his teaching in this matter, St. AUGUSTINE is among the most notable examples of a thinker who moves from the necessity of eternal truth to a subsistent truth, an absolute being. PLATONISM, through the intermediary of PLOTINUS, is a major source of Augustinian doctrine, and yet the great African bishop had first to formulate a defense against the SKEPTICISM of the Academy, Plato's old school. PLATO had held that the sensible world is incapable of grounding true knowledge but that there are other entities, the Forms or Ideas, that are objects commensurate with the demands of knowledge. The New Academy accepted Plato's teaching with respect to the inadequacy of the sensible world as a cause of knowledge, but it did not share his certitude in the existence of Ideas. In this way, the possibility of knowledge was called into question.

Augustine, in his attack on the new Academicians, appealed to the existence of the doubter as something that escapes doubt. Although this may seem an anticipation of the Cartesian cogito, it did not play the role of a truth from which all others are in some way derived. More positively, Augustine appealed to the truths of mathematics, which, being certain and independent of the sensible world, give strength to the belief that there is an intelligible world to respond to knowledge in the full sense—an intelligible world that is independent of the sensible world. Augustine employed the Platonic vocabulary to speak of the intelligible world, the realm of the Ideas. For him, the existence of Ideas is plain from the facts that this is a created world and that God must know what it is He creates. The Ideas are the patterns according to which God fashions creatures. The locus, as it were, of the Ideas is the Second Person of the Trinity; He is the wisdom philosophers are ever seeking. The supreme attribute of God, for Augustine, is truth; God is the truth who grounds all other truths. Thus the recognition of absolute truths, as in mathematics, led Augustine to the conclusion that there must be an absolute being who is subsistent truth.

Thomas Aquinas. In the teaching of St. THOMAS AQUINAS there is an intimate connection between the notion of eternal or absolute truth and absolute being. This emerges quite clearly from his discussion of the question as to whether created truth is eternal. "Notice that the truth of statements is nothing other than the truth of intellect, for what is stated exists in the mind as well as in speech, and it is insofar as it is in the mind that it has truth properly speaking. As spoken it is said to be a true statement insofar as it expresses some truth in the mind, not because of any truth existing in the enunciation as in a subject. So, too, urine is said to be healthy, not from any health in it but from the health of the animal of which it is a sign. Similarly we have pointed out that things are called true with reference to the truth of understanding. Hence if no mind were eternal, no truth would be eternal. And, because only the divine mind is eternal, in it alone does truth have eternity. Nor does it follow from this that something besides God is eternal, because the truth of the divine mind is God Himself, as we argued earlier" (Summa Theologiae 1a, 16.7). The ontology of Aquinas leads to a description of God as that being whose existence is His very nature. Any being other than God is such that it is possible for it not to exist; the cause of its existence must therefore be sought outside itself. God is His existence and His being is therefore absolute, utterly independent of every other being. It should not be thought that this involves something like the Anselmian ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT; Aquinas dismisses somewhat curtly the suggestion that, since the term God signifies a being than which nothing greater can be thought, such a being must necessarily exist (Summa Theologiae 1a, 2.1 ad 2). St. Thomas holds that man's warrant for asserting that God exists and, indeed, is existence, must always be found in creatures. If man knew God directly, this would not be necessary; but the human mode of knowing, which has as its commensurate object the nature of sensible reality, precludes such a direct intuition. In short, man's knowledge of absolute being is relative to his knowledge of dependent or created being.

This analysis may seem to call into question the absoluteness of divine being since, if God is not somehow relative to creatures, it would seem to follow that knowledge of creatures could not lead to knowledge of God. Indeed, many of the names man applies to God seem to imply such a relation to creatures—names such as "Creator," "Savior," and even the word "God" itself insofar as its etymology refers to divine providence. And, of course, if God is related to the world, He cannot be absolute in the desired sense.

St. Thomas's solution to this difficulty involves a distinction between real relations and relations of reason. A real RELATION is had when one thing is dependent on another for its being. Such a relation is often reciprocal. For example, a son is dependent on his father; but the father is dependent on his son as well since, if he had no child, he could not be a father. In the case of God and creatures, St. Thomas argues that while creatures are really related to God, the relation of God to creatures is one of reason alone (De pot. 7.11). Thus, in knowing that God's existence is absolute, man does not know Him absolutely, that is, independently of his knowledge of things that are quite distinct from, and inessential to, God. That man comes to know God through His created effects is an indication of the imperfection of man's knowledge of God, since there is an infinite distance between created and divine perfection. "Perfect knowledge of a cause cannot be gained through effects that are not proportioned to the cause, but from any effect it can be clearly demonstrated to us that the cause exists, as we have argued. So it is that from the effects of God we demonstrate that God exists, although they do not permit us to know Him perfectly in His very essence" (Summa Theologiae 1a, 2.2 ad 3).

The position of St. Thomas, here as elsewhere, depends on the possibility of distinguishing what man knows from the way in which he knows it. If the human manner of knowing were a complete determinant of what man knows, he could not have knowledge even that an absolute exists. But, given the distinction, it can be maintained that, while the human manner of knowing absolute being necessarily entails relating absolute being to being other than itself—hence preventing man's knowing it absolutely—nevertheless what man knows is absolute being. In the case of God, however, one must quickly add that, since on the level of what is known creatures are the necessary bridge to knowledge of His existence, human knowledge of God is unavoidably imperfect and derived.

Spinoza. The absolute implies an opposite: the non-absolute, or relative; given at least the definition of the absolute, the nonabsolute appears to have but a precarious hold on its claim to reality. For Aquinas, the distinction between the relative and the absolute could be expressed by the dualism of created and uncreated substance. This same dualism, though admittedly on quite another basis, was retained by R. DESCARTES; but, in his wake, B. SPINOZA argued that the very concept of SUBSTANCE leads to the conclusion that there can be but one substance and that substance is absolute. For him, thought and extension—one might simply say, the created—cannot be thought of as substances when compared to God. If they exist, they can exist only as attributes of the one substance. Thus Spinoza's insistence on absolute substance leads to a monism of substance; the only dualism remaining consists of parallel systems of attributes, mental and physical. Everything is reduced in pantheistic fashion to God (see PANTHEISM).

Fichte. The significance of the absolute ego in the thought of J. G. FICHTE has to be understood against the general background of his insistence on the WILL, or ego, as a corrective of Kantian critical idealism. The upshot of the Kantian Critiques was that these provided man with a basis for a rational faith in the realm of freedom. The thing-in-itself, originally a postulated and surd element in the Kantian system, became the realm of morality and of God, which is inaccessible to critical reason. For Kant, the moral law within provides a ground for belief in, but not knowledge of, the existence of God, the spiritual order, and the immortality of the soul. In his view, while man cannot know any of these things by way of proof, he does have a warrant that will allow him to accept them on practical grounds.

Fichte refused to accept this relegation of freedom and self to the fringes of true knowledge; his own philosophy began with the assertion of the conception of FREEDOM, of the ego or SELF, as the absolutely basic principle. From this principle must be derived the categories of experience. This was, in its own way, a Copernican revolution. The willing, free self became the source of all knowledge and experience. Freedom, the world order, and God were the basic realities; if anything else was to be admitted as real, it had to be deduced from these. The practical order was not merely saved as a realm unto itself, then; it became the fundamental and regulative order of reality. Fichte, in order to avoid the charge that he was deducing all reality from his own self, introduced a distinction between particular selves and the absolute self of which individual selves are manifestations. For this reason he would have denied that he had developed a system of subjective IDEALISM. He was able to account, to his own satisfaction, for the existence of the external world, since it did not depend in its entirety on his ego. The absolute ego that thus became the center of Fichte's philosophy is God, but God understood as a process, a self-determining spiritual evolution. This absolute self expresses and manifests itself in individual selves; it lives and acts in them as the law of their nature, the ultimate ground of both the phenomenal world and the necessary laws of thought.

Schelling. In Fichte nature is a product of the absolute ego; with reference to the individual ego, however, it is merely an obstacle. F. W. J. SCHELLING attempted to go beneath this remaining dualism to find, in the concept of the absolute as nature or process, a completely monistic ground for reality. Nature, for him, is no longer a dead, mechanical process; it is unconscious intelligence just as man is conscious intelligence. There is therefore an affinity that permits knowledge. The common note of reality, for Schelling, is pure activity, self-determining energy; nature and mind are not parallel aspects but stages in the development of the absolute ego. The absolute is not something that exists, but something that evolves, unfolds, has a history; and nature and mind are moments in that history. Thus, Schelling maintains that individual selves, since they are the loci where blind intelligence becomes self-conscious, cannot be real except as rooted in the absolute. Schelling's nature is thus very much like the pre-Socratic physis; the ideal he sets for science is the ultimate identification of the laws of thought and the laws of nature. By such an identity, the whole of reality is reduced to intelligence.

Hegel. The identification of the laws of thought and the laws of reality, taught by Schelling, was accepted by G. W. F. HEGEL. Whether in knowledge or in the world, for Hegel one and the same process or development is taking place and the laws according to which it happens are the same. The real is the rational, the rational is the real. The absolute for Hegel is not something vague and amorphous, as he took Schelling's absolute to be, nor is it substance, as it was for Spinoza. The absolute is process that passes through unconscious moments but whose telos is total self-consciousness. The meaning of the process is had in that ultimate goal where the absolute has become completely conscious of itself and recognizes its identity with the ultimate purpose of the universe.

The Hegelian absolute is at once present in, and emerging from, every process. The business of philosophy is therefore to seek and find reason in every process, however apparently irrational and absurd. Hegel's interest in history is predictable: he urges man to seek the absolute in history. He provides religious motives for this search, saying that man is told not only to love God but to know Him as well. God reveals Himself to man in history, which is the theater of providence. One may think that things happen haphazardly and adventitiously in history, but this cannot be. Man must not think that there is any distinction between the way things are and the way they ought to be. In history everything happens necessarily and for the best, and it is the task of the philosopher to show this (see HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF).

The dialectical process and the claim that the principle of CONTRADICTION rules all are both revealing of Hegel's identification of thought and reality. Just as one might think of thought as a process that moves from global confusion to determination and distinction, so Hegel views reality as progressing from the homogenous and undifferentiated abstract to concrete distinction. Each step of the process looks backward and forward. What is is not what it was or what it will be: a present state is the contradictory of a previous state and drives toward the contradictory of what it now is. Contradiction is the law of life and movement. In the whole, opposites and contradictions are swallowed up and reconciled. World development on the natural plane is unconscious, but the thinker must, so to speak, relive the process by thinking it. The dialectical method of thought begins with an abstract notion that gives rise to its contradiction, and these two are reconciled in a third concept: thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. The movement is from the abstract to the concrete universal. Thus Hegel's description of the progress of thought and the evolution of reality are the same.

Hegel's absolute is the evolutionary process of reality and the goal of that process. God does not exist prior to the world, which Hegel holds is eternally created; God is the logos, the reason, the law of the universe; the evolutionary process is the absolute's progressive consciousness of self. Hegel's absolute, accordingly, is unintelligible without the world.

Absolutism. The opposition between absolutism and RELATIVISM is best understood as indicating epistemological options, even though these are based on ontological judgments. In the discussion of Aquinas, a distinction he would wish to make between absolute being and man's manner of knowing it was indicated. An absolute being is by definition one that exists in utter independence of all else. However, as known by someone other than itself, absolute being is relative to that knower, and it would seem to be doubly relative in a doctrine according to which it can be known only relative to another object of knowledge. Unless one can distinguish a thing's manner of being known from its manner of being, such considerations would effectively do away with the absolute. The relatedness to a knower implicit in all knowledge has been a source both of absolutism and relativism. Thus the observation that sense qualities are relative to sense organs leads to a questioning of their OBJECTIVITY. Some thinkers go on to insist on the existence of other absolute aspects of reality, while others conclude that whatever one knows is relative to his mode of knowing. These latter may then seek to ground the laws of knowing in an absolute subject. A thinker who maintains both that what one knows is essentially colored by his way of knowing and that his way of knowing is simply contingent may be called a relativist. Whether the relativist can ever successfully explain the relativity of knowledge without appeal to at least an ideal of absoluteness must, of course, be asked.

Summary. The Absolute is preeminently a changeless, eternal being, independent of all else. As applied to knowledge, absolute knowledge bears on objects whose being is independent of the knower, even though as known they are related to a knower. Whether in reality or in thought, an absolute is required; but it is not necessary to identify, as Hegel did, what is absolute in knowledge and what is absolute in reality.

See Also: PANENTHEISM; IMMANENCE; HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy, v. 7. (Westminster, Md. 1946—). M. C. CAHILL, The Absolute and the Relative in St. Thomas and in Modern Philosophy (Washington 1939). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:3–6. J. MÖLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:70–71. J. KLEIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed Tübingen 1957–65) 1:74–76. A. CHOLLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 1.1:134–135. A. CARLINI, Enciclopedia filosofica 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:406–415.

[R. M. MCINERNY]

ABSOLUTISM

Both a theory of the nature of political authority and a practice that prevailed throughout the 17th and 18th centuries. According to its principles, the ruler possessed an authority that was unconditional and unlimited. He was subject only to his own will and was not restrained in his actions by the laws of God or those of nature or by any other legal limitations.

Essential to the theory of absolutism was the ruler's and the state's relation to law. In the medieval period, the ruler was considered subject to the laws of God and nature. The laws of the state were laws only so far as they were in harmony with the natural law. In the early modern period, law became a thing not of reason but of the will of the ruler. Instead of the state being based upon law, law became solely a command of the state, depending for its efficacy upon the authority of the one who commanded. This concept served the cause of the rising nation-states. It entailed the death of the idea of empire, the rise of the independent sovereign state, the secular state's independence of the church, and the centralization of authority against existing customs and privileges of cities and of the nobility.

The theory of absolutism can be traced from MACHIAVELLI's justification of the separation of morality and politics, through the development of sovereignty in Jean Bodin, to a full-blown absolutism in the legal theory of Thomas HOBBS. The result was the justification of the monarchical absolutism of the dynastic nation-state. During the 18th-century Enlightenment, in writers like Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU, the source of absolute authority was transferred from the monarch to the people, or the "general will," to form a "democratic" absolutism.

Catholic theologians such as BELLARMINE and SUÁREZ upheld the concept of a limited authority. The moral theologians of the 17th century held that the ruler was subject to divine and natural law, but that he was the sole judge of that limitation. Further, a great number of them taught that will was the source of law, that the ruler was above his own law, that the people could not resist a law of the sovereign, and that law was valid without the consent of the people. To that extent they taught a legal theory identical with absolutism and necessary to the rise of the absolute state.

See Also: MONARCHY; DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS.

Bibliography: M. BELOFF, Age of Absolutism, 1660–1815 (New York 1954), bibliography 181–182. J. W. ALLEN, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (3d rev. ed. New York 1957). A. D. LINDSAY, Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences 1:380–382. J. N. FIGGIS, Cambridge Modern History 3:736–769. S. SKALWEIT, Cambridge Modern History 2 5:96–121.

[D. WOLF]

ABSTRACTION

Generally, a mental separation of things, not or at least not necessarily, separated in the real. Looked at from this point of view, abstraction is understood as the psychological act of discarding all but one facet of a thing (or things) to cognize that facet without the others. To be legitimate, this psychological act presupposes an appropriate object: the facet cognized through abstraction must in itself be knowable, apart from that which it is mentally separated. Just as the term abstraction is used to name the psychological act of mentally separating one thing from another, it can also be used to name the abstractability of that which is mentally separated. Thus one may speak of a man abstracting a given object from certain nonessential data, and one may speak of that object itself abstracting from these data. This article first considers the abstraction of the intelligible from the sensible, as well as alternative theories in the history of thought that propose to account for the discovery of the intelligible. It then explains how the intelligible as abstracted is universal, and concludes with a consideration of the various kinds of abstraction.

Abstraction Of The Intelligible. Of the different, though not necessarily unrelated, instances of abstraction the most radical is the abstraction of the intelligible object from the data of sense experience. This abstraction is meaningful, of course, only within a philosophical frame that sees such a thorough difference between the sensible and the intelligible, that they are recognized as objects pertaining to irreconcilably different orders. And even among those who admit this difference there is an abstraction only so long as the sensible and intelligible are somehow given together, with the intelligible somehow cognized by way of an insight in and through the sensible. The sensible is the fluctuating, kaleidoscopic data of man's original cognitive contact with the things of the physical world: their colors and shapes, their sounds, odors and flavors, their temperatures and weights, their motions and rest, and the like. The intelligible, on the other hand, is the stable, definable, potentially scientific object of a cognitive vision radically different from an experience of the sensible. If the sensible is the phenomenal in things, the intelligible is the meaningful in them. The sensible as a datum of experience is exclusively singular, tied to an individual thing in this place at this time. The intelligible is, at least as the object of the direct act of intellection, universal; i.e., it can be said of many, indifferent to individual differences, indifferent to shifts in place and time.

Empiricist View. For those who fail to admit the distinction between the sensible and the intelligible there is no question of the abstraction of an intelligible object from sense data. This is the case, for example, with those empiricists (such as J. LOCKE and D. HUME) who limit knowledge effectively to the realm of sense experience. They may speak of an abstraction, but at best they mean some more or less subtle reworking of sense impressions that yield an image involving an outline simple enough to stand for many things. This notion also underlies the use of the term abstraction by those working in CYBERNETICS. The refined impressions spoken of here, remain on the same plane as the impressions from which they came, the plane of the sensible. There is no question of penetrating to the radically different plane of the meaningful. Therefore, in this there can be no abstraction from the sensible to the intelligible.

Nonabstractive Theories. There are some in the history of thought, however, who do admit the radical difference between the sensible and the intelligible, but they nevertheless explain man's knowledge of each without recourse to a theory of abstraction. Plato and St. Augustine are two such people.

For PLATO, envisioning the intelligible is not the result of seeing into and through the data of sense experience to an underlying intelligibility, but rather, of turning from what is sensible, to the intelligible that is defined apart from and exists independently of the sensible. Plato distinguishes between preexistence in a realm of pure intelligibles, wherein a vision of these intelligibles has once been achieved, and this life, in which there takes place, by way of reminiscence, a conversion from the data of sense experience to these intelligibles. If Plato can be taken literally, for him learning is but a process of remembering ideas from another existence, temporarily forgotten in this existence, but innately present nonetheless.

For St. AUGUSTINE, the intelligible is not innate; it is not apprehended by way of reminiscence, but neither is it seen by way of abstraction from sensible data. In his view, there is a realm of intelligibles to which the human intellect is naturally subject and which a man can know so long as his intellectual vision functions in virtue of an incorporeal light supplied by God. The intellect is thought to be related through this divine ILLUMINATION to the intelligible as the sense of sight is related through corporeal light to the visible. For St. Augustine, as well as for Plato, there is an infinite metaphysical distance between the sensible and the intelligible, but there is no abstraction because the intelligible is not known in and through the sensible. For ARISTOTLE and for St. THOMAS AQUINAS, there is an infinite metaphysical distance between the sensible and the intelligible, and yet the latter can only be cognized through the former; for them a theory of abstraction is a noetic necessity.

Thomistic Account. According to the Thomistic EPISTEMOLOGY, some things are endowed sensibly as well as intelligibly, for example, men, trees and rocks; others, such as angels, are endowed only intelligibly. Men can know both, but the human condition is such that the latter are known only as a function of the former, and the intelligible in the former is known only as a function of the sensible. In other words, the sensible characteristics of the sensibly endowed things are immediately knowable, but the intelligible characteristics are knowable only mediately by way of the sensible.

In Thomistic terms, a thing is said to be actually sensible and only potentially intelligible. As actually sensible it can be actually sensed as it stands; but the potentially intelligible part must be rendered actually intelligible before it can be actually understood. The SENSES are capacities for actually sensing the actually sensible; the INTELLECT (that is, the possible intellect) is the capacity for actually understanding the actually intelligible. The senses need no help since the thing as it stands is actually sensible. The possible intellect stands in need of another capacity on the intellectual level that is able to make the potentially intelligible actually intelligible. This capacity is called the agent intellect. The thing—which is potentially intelligible—is originally present in knowledge through its sensory representation, which is called the PHANTASM. Through this phantasm in sensory experience, only the sensible characteristics of the thing are actually presented to the knower; but just as the thing, while being actually sensible, is potentially intelligible, so through the phantasm the intelligible aspect of the thing is potentially present to the knower. The agent intellect is a spiritual light that, by illuminating the phantasm, actualizes the intelligible so that it can be actually cognized by the possible intellect.

The possible intellect, like the senses, is a passive power, able to operate only after being reduced from potency to act. The thing as it stands, as physical, is able to reduce the senses, themselves in a way physical, from potency to act: no agent sense is needed. But the thing itself, as physical, cannot reduce the wholly spiritual possible intellect to act: only something spiritual can do this, and this is the agent intellect. But the agent intellect is an unspecified light; and since there is no knowing except of something determinate, that which actualizes the possible intellect must simultaneously specify it for the act of knowing something determinate. Thus the agent intellect, as principal cause, uses the phantasm of the thing as instrumental cause (see INSTRUMENTAL CAUSALITY). Together they actualize the possible intellect, which—once reduced from potency to act in reference to a given intelligible aspect of some thing—can posit the act of knowing that intelligible object. The intelligible remains an object irreducibly other than the sensible. Intellection is never reduced to sensation. But the intelligible is known only in and through sense experience by way of an intuitive penetration that is most strictly an abstractive act.

The Intelligible As Universal. The object cognized in the abstractive intuition just described can be distinguished from the data of sense experience in several ways, as has already been noted. Perhaps the most obvious difference is that the characteristics present in sense knowledge are incorrigibly singular, while the object intellectually cognized is characteristically universal. This difference demands further comment. For one thing, though this is an obvious difference between the sensible and the intelligible in man's experience, it is not the essential difference. If it were, the intellect would be defined as an appetite for the universal; it is, rather, an appetite for the meaningful. In fact, there is an inverse ratio between the meaningful content of an object and its universality (man being an object much richer in content than substance, but considerably less general). If one were to define the intellect as transcendently related to universality rather than to intelligible content or meaning, this would strongly suggest that the crowning achievement of the intellectual life would come in the possession of an object involving next to nothing in the way of intelligible content.

It remains true, however, that the object cognized intellectually is, as cognized, universal. The reason is that that which in the thing shrouds its intelligibility (so that it is only potentially intelligible) is MATTER, and this coincidentally is the principle of the INDIVIDUATION of the physical thing. To get to the intelligible, man must (and does, through the light that is the agent intellect) slough off matter as a principle of nonintelligibility. In doing so, of course, he also sloughs off the principle of individuation and cognizes an object that is universal. The intellect is essentially ordered to the intelligible, but the price of knowing the intelligible is knowing it as a universal.

Further comment is required in reference to the universal character of the object of intellection. It might seem, perhaps, that since in the realm of real subjects only singulars exist, the abstraction that renders an object universal somehow precludes the possibility of knowing things as they are. The question is: Is there something inherently falsifying in the process of abstraction? Not at all. A QUIDDITY that is universal in the mind as object, need not be in itself intelligibly different from this same quiddity individualized in things. Natures or quiddities in themselves are neither singular nor universal, but as such are open to either state. In things, in a first existence outside the mind natures are in the state of singularity; in the mind in a second existence, as objects, they are invested with the relation of reason that is the form of universality. Universality is not real; it is a being of reason. But the nature as known, to which universality accrues in the process of being known, need in no sense be itself intelligibly de-realized simply because it takes on a nonreal relation in the mind. The nature of the thing remains unchanged. However, even though abstraction does not falsify things, man does pay a price because he knows by way of abstraction. Things as they exist as subjects, independently of the mind's knowing them, are highly sophisticated complexes of many intelligible aspects as well as all that is sensible in them and the existential act that makes them be more than a mere possibility. In any given act of abstractive intuition some one (more or less meaningful) intelligible aspect, abstracted from all else, is cognized. Thus knowledge by way of abstraction, in any given instance of abstractive intuition, may be seriously incomplete. However, there is an infinite difference between knowledge that is incorrigibly false and knowledge that is less than complete. (See UNIVERSALS.)

Kinds of Abstraction. The discussion thus far has been limited to the abstraction of the intelligible from the sensible. There are other abstractions to consider and certain distinctions to be made, namely, between abstraction by way of simple consideration and abstraction by way of negative judgment, between precise and nonprecise abstraction, between total abstraction and formal abstraction, and between the abstraction of the whole, the abstraction of the form and separation.

Simple Consideration vs. Negative Judgment. One important distinction between different types of abstrac-tion is between abstraction by way of simple consideration and abstraction by way of negative judgment. To abstract one thing from another by way of simple consideration is to cognize it without simultaneously cognizing the other. This is legitimate only if the first is definable or able to be understood without the other entering into its definition or meaning. There is no need here for the first to be existentially independent of the other. Some things (for example, the nature of man) are definable apart from other things (such as individuating characteristics) without being able to exist apart from them. They can, of course, be abstracted from these by way of abstraction through simple consideration.

To abstract one thing from another by way of negative judgment is not simply to cognize it independently of the other but to think that it exists without the other. An abstraction of this sort is legitimate only if what is abstracted from another is not only independent in meaning from the other but even existentially independent. The nature of man cannot be abstracted by way of negative judgment from individuating characteristics because, though man is definable apart from them, man cannot exist apart from them. However, man can be abstracted from a tree by way of negative judgment because man is independent of the tree both in meaning and in existence; for a tree does not enter into the definition of man, and men can exist without trees. This distinction is important, as the examples should make clear, for any solution to the problem of the universal. As Aquinas frequently points out, it was a failure to distinguish between abstraction by way of simple consideration and abstraction by way of negative judgment that forced Plato to posit existing Forms and Mathematics.

Precise vs. Nonprecise Abstraction. Another distinction between types of intellectual abstraction is that between precise abstraction that renders an object abstractly expressed and nonprecise abstraction that renders an object concretely expressed. The difference between “man” and “humanity” (for an example from the category of SUBSTANCE) and between “pious” and “piety” (for an example of an ACCIDENT) is at stake. “Pious” and “piety” do not differ in intelligible content; their difference is one of mode of conception. The formality that is precisely “piety” is conceived as belonging to a bearer (in general) in the conception of “pious.” “Pious” is equivalently “subject-having-piety.” Identically this same formality, but abstracted from any reference to a bearer—that is, positively cut off from any subject—is conceived in the notion of “piety.” “Pious” names a whole, that is, the whole subject that is the bearer of piety, but only from the point of view of its piety. “Piety” names the formality as a part, which, with other parts, makes up the whole. “Pious” can be said of a concrete subject, such as Tom, so long as Tom has piety. “Piety” cannot be said of Tom; though it is no less real than “pious,” it is conceived in such fashion as to be, as conceived, cut off from concrete subjects.

Formal vs. Total Abstraction. Important among the traditional distinctions between types of intellectual abstraction is that between formal abstraction and total abstraction. In this matter it is necessary to clarify the usage of terms, for “total abstraction” and “formal abstraction” are used by different philosophers to stand for a variety of different abstractions. Reference here is exclusively to the use to which T. de Vio CAJETAN and JOHN OF ST. THOMAS put them when they discuss abstraction in reference to the specification of the sciences (see SCIENCES, CLASSIFICATION OF). Although these commentators on St. Thomas claim to be repeating a distinction already made by St. Thomas, a careful investigation of the relevant texts in St. Thomas suggests this is not the case. Be that as it may, the point they make is consonant with the Thomistic theory of science and helpful in understanding it.

Formal abstraction (abstractio formalis) is the abstraction of an intelligible content of thought from the matter that shrouds its intelligibility. Total abstraction (abstractio totalis) is the abstraction of a logical whole from its subjective parts. Formal abstraction yields an object qua intelligible; total abstraction, qua universal. Given the inverse ratio between meaningful content and universality the two abstractions work in opposite directions. And yet they are both necessary for human SCIENCE (scientia). Human science, as science, needs an object able to be intellectually analyzed. For science, the real must be present to the mind in abstraction from whatever matter stands in the way of its being understood. Formal abstraction abstracts from matter as a principle of nonintelligibility to yield an object rich enough in intelligible content to satisfy the scientific mind. Human science, as human, is achieved in discourse. The objects of scientific analysis must be present to the mind as being able to fit into a discursive pattern: they must be present in the state of universality or of communicability. Total abstraction abstracts from matter as the principle of incommunicability to yield an object that is universal and as such able to fit into a discursive pattern.

To the extent that objects are differently freed from the restrictions of matter as a principle of nonintelligibility they are differently scientific. Freedom from individual sensible matter yields an object that is scientifically relevant on the level of natural science. Freedom from all sensible matter yields an object that is scientifically relevant on the level of mathematics. And freedom from all matter yields the object of metaphysical inquiry. Thus one may speak of the first order of formal abstraction, that is, physical abstraction; the second order of formal abstraction, that is, mathematical abstraction; and the third order of formal abstraction, that is, metaphysical abstraction. These three orders or degrees of formal abstraction respectively constitute the different levels of theoretical science.

Total abstraction admits of different degrees also: some objects are more general and some less general than others. These differences do not constitute differences among sciences; they function exclusively within a given science. Two objects on the same level of formal abstraction are studied in the same science, but the more general is studied before the more specific. Total abstraction does not help to specify the sciences, but it is a common condition for all the sciences; and, within a given science, it determines the order of proceeding in its particular subject matter.

Abstraction vs. Separation. In distinguishing between the types of speculative science, St. Thomas speaks of an abstraction of the whole (abstractio totius) that yields the object of natural science, of an abstraction of the form (abstractio formae) that yields the object of mathematics, and a separation (separatio) that yields the object of metaphysics. The first two of these are called abstractions in a strict sense because they are abstractions by way of simple consideration. The third is more sharply referred to as a separation because it is an instance of the more radical abstraction by way of negative judgment.

The first of these three abstractions is the abstraction of the whole essence of the natural thing from the matter that individuates it. It yields an object sufficiently free from matter to be intelligible, but an object defined nevertheless in terms of common sensible matter. The second yields the form of QUANTITY that is abstracted from all matter save common intelligible matter. The third yields an object abstracted from all matter and an object seen to be independent of matter both in meaning and existence. The significantly different stances in reference to matter for these objects—resulting in significantly different modes of defining—put each on a different level of theoretical science. St. Thomas, with his distinctions between the abstraction of the whole, the abstraction of the form, and separation, covers the same ground as do Cajetan and John of St. Thomas with their distinctions between physical abstraction (the first degree of formal abstraction), mathematical abstraction (the second degree of formal abstraction), and metaphysical abstraction (the third degree of formal abstraction).

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; KNOWLEDGE; EPISTEMOLOGY; UNIVERSALS

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, The Division and Methods of the Sciences: Questions 5 and 6 of Commentary on the De Trinitate of Boethius, tr. with introd. and notes, A. MAURER (Toronto 1953), bibliography 86–93. J. F. PEIFER, The Concept in Thomism (New York 1952). E. D. SIMMONS, “In Defense of Total and Formal Abstraction,” The New Scholasticism, 29 (1955) 427–440; “The Thomistic Doctrine of the Three Degrees of Formal Abstraction,” Thomist, 22 (1959) 37–67. C. DE KONINCK, “Abstraction from Matter,” Laval Théologique et Philosophique, 13 (1957) 133–196; 16 (1960) 53–69, 169–188. F. A. CUNNINGHAM, “A Theory on Abstraction in St. Thomas,” The Modern Schoolman, 35 (1958) 249–270. L. FERRARI, “Abstractio totius and abstractio totalis,” Thomist, 24 (1961) 72–89. M. D. PHILLIPE, “‘Α φάρεσις, πρόσθεσις, χωρίζεiv dans la philosophie d’Aristote,” Revue thomiste, 48 (1948) 461–479. G. VAN RIET, “La théorie thomiste de l’abstraction,” Revue philosophique de Louvain, 50 (1952) 353–393. L. B. GEIGER, “Abstraction et séparation d’après S. Thomas: In De Trinitate, q.5, a.3,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, 31 (1947) 3–40.

[E. D. SIMMONS]

ABSURDITY

Absurdity is a basic notion for a number of modern thinkers such as A. Malraux (1901–), J. P. Sartre (1905–80), A. Camus (1913–60), F. Kafka (1883–1924), E. Albee (1928–), F. Arrabal (1932–), S. Beckett (1906–89), J. Genet (1910–86), E. Ionesco (1912–94), and H. Pinter (1930–). Whereas dictionaries define the absurd as that which is contrary to reason, as used by these writers it designates that which is without a reason. The absurd is a situation, a thing, or an event that really is, but for which no explanation is possible. Because the affair is inexplicable, it offends reason; it is senseless; it is absurd.

Søren Kierkegaard (1813–55) is the source for this type of thought. Kierkegaard’s writings are a constant protest against the excessive RATIONALISM of G. W. HEGEL, who taught that all the mysteries of the Christian faith could be comprehended by reason. To indicate that the Incarnation was beyond the understanding of human reason, Kierkegaard called it the absurd, meaning by that something unintelligible and incomprehensible to reason. He insisted that Christian absurdity was neither nonsense, nor irrationality, nor something meaningless; for notions such as these follow on the judgment of reason examining its legitimate data, whereas the Christian accepts the Incarnation by faith. In the light of faith he sees that the Incarnation is in no way absurd.

The notion was then taken up by modern thinkers, especially by existentialists, but in an atheistic context. Thus, absurdity for Sartre arises from the absolute contingency and complete gratuity of the world. Because there is no God, Sartre argues, there are no reasons for things.

Things just are; and because they are without any reason for being, they are absurd. Ultimately all things come from nowhere and are going nowhere. Camus gives a different meaning. Admitting that there are scientific explanations for the various parts of the universe, Camus denies that there is any ultimate reason for the whole. Absurdity is a feeling that arises from the confrontation between man, who is looking for a unified explanation of all things, and a world that has no basic meaning.

Because of their preoccupation with the absurd, playwrights like Genet, Ionesco, Beckett and the like have been called collectively the Theater of the Absurd. To indicate the role of absurdity in the human situation these dramatists create sections of dialogue that are incoherent; they depict scenes in which the actions of the actors directly contradict the words they are speaking; they construct plays around the weird fantasies of deranged minds. In this they resemble Kafka, whose exuberant and enigmatic symbolism describes man as caught in a nightmare of existence; truth and illusion are so intertwined in his works that life is there seen as wearisome, uncertain, and senseless.

The Christian can well appreciate the loneliness, frustration, and the emptiness engendered by ATHEISM in these men. He can also be grateful for his faith, which enables him to see atheism as the most absurd of all absurdities; for the visible things of this world do declare the hidden attributes of God (Rom 1.20).

See Also: EXISTENTIALISM.

Bibliography: P. PRINI, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:416–417.

[V. M. MARTIN]

ABŪ 'L-BARAKĀT

Coptic author; d. May 10, 1324. His full name was Shams al-Ri'āsa abū 'l-Barakāt ibn Kabar. He seems to have taken the added name of Barsauma on the occasion of his priestly ordination. He was a Coptic priest attached to the church called al-Mu'allaqa in Old Cairo. He held, besides, the post of secretary to the prince and Mameluke officer Ruqn al-Dīn Baibars al-Mansūri and collaborated with him on his history of Islam, which comes up to 1325, the year of Ruqn's death. Other works that he left include: a Coptic-Arabic dictionary; a large number of elegant sermons for feasts and occasions; and his principal work, a theological encyclopedia titled The Lamp of Darkness and the Exposition of the Service.

The Lamp of Darkness presents all that clergy and laity need to know about the doctrines of the faith, the Scriptures, Canon Law, liturgy. The work has a practical teaching purpose and seeks to hand on the genuine religious tradition. Of 24 chapters the first seven deal with doctrine (1–3), items of church history (4), a list of collections of Church law (5), introduction to the Scripture and an account of the liturgical books (6), and an account of Christian literature in Arabic (7). The remaining chapters treat of cult and Church customs and practices.

Bibliography: G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 2:438–445. E. TISSERANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 8.2:2293–96; Revue de l'Orient chrétien 22 (1920–21) 373–394. J. ASSFALG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 1:101.

[J. A. DEVENNY]

ABUNDIUS OF COMO, ST.

Bishop and patron of Como, Italy; d. April 2 c. 462–489, probably 468. Abundius (also called Abundantius), assistant and successor of Bishop Amantius, was consecrated Nov. 17, 449, and sent by Pope Leo I in 450, along with Bishop Eutherius of Capua and the priests Basilus and Senator, to Constantinople to discuss the orthodoxy of its patriarch ANATOLIUS. Theodosius II died before their arrival, but Marcian and Pulcheria received them kindly. On Oct. 21, 450, a synod was held in the baptistery of Hagia Sophia in which all the bishops of the patriarchate, beginning with Anatolius, signed the Tome of Leo to Flavian anathematizing the doctrines of NESTORIUS and EUTYCHES. Abundius performed a similar papal mission to Bishop Eusebius of Milan and his suffragans, and then devoted himself to the conversion of pagans in his own diocese.

Feast: April 2.

Bibliography: R. MAIOCCHI, Storia dei vescovi di Como (Milan 1929). P. GINI, Bibliotheca Sanctorum 1:23–30.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

ACACIAN SCHISM

The Acacian Schism (484–519) was caused by a change of policy on the part of the Patriarch of Constantinople, Acacius (472–489), who despite his intimacy with the Monophysites had opposed the anti-Chalcedonian encyclical of the Emperor BASILISCUS in 475. Upon the restoration of the Emperor Zeno (August 476), he collaborated in the deposition of the Monophysite bishops, including Peter the Fuller of Antioch and John Codonatus of Apamea. In 479 he consecrated the Chalcedonian Calandion as bishop of Antioch at the emperor's behest and drew a protest from Pope SIMPLICIUS (468–483) for interfering in another patriarchal jurisdiction (Epist. June 22, 479).

In 482, in concert with Peter Mongus, he composed a doctrinal statement called the HENOTICON, or Decree of Union, which Zeno promulgated for the province of Egypt. It was intended to conclude the Christological disputes by citing the authority of the first three ecumenical councils, condemning Nestorius and Eutyches, but it did not mention the natures in Christ. Contrary teaching, "be it of the Council of Chalcedon or any other council," was condemned. Though the symbol of Chalcedon and Leo's Tome were not rejected, anti-Chalcedonians were admitted to communion, and Peter Mongus was reinstated as patriarch in Alexandria.

Pope FELIX III wrote a letter of protest to Acacius, then excommunicated him in a Roman synod (July 28, 484) when Acacius recognized Peter Mongus at Alexandria. When the excommunication was reiterated in 485, Acacius erased the name of Felix from the diptychs. The two successors of Acacius, Fravita (490) and Euphemius (490–495), were not hostile to the decrees of Chalcedon. They announced their election to the pope for recognition; but Felix demanded that Acacius's name be struck from the diptychs, and relations were again suspended between Rome and Constantinople. The Patriarch Euphemius, having forced the new Emperor ANASTASIUS I (491–518) to accept the decisions of Chalcedon before his accession to the throne, attempted to heal the rupture with Pope GELASIUS (492–496), but without success since the new pope renewed the demand made by Felix. Meanwhile acceptance of the Henoticon, though not universal among the Monophysites, was considered an anti-Chalcedonian gesture. Gelasius, however, entered relations with Constantinople through an embassy sent by the Roman senate (492 and 494); but his successor, ANASTASIUS II (496–498), proved adamant in the request for the removal of Acacius's name from the diptychs.

Emperor Anastasius was encouraged in his anti-Chalcedonian policy during the three-year sojourn in Constantinople (508–511) of the Monophysite propagandist SEVERUS, the future patriarch of Antioch (512–518) and a fervent supporter of the Henoticon. The emperor published his Type, or formula for union, which he attempted to impose upon the Chalcedonian Patriarch, Flavian of Antioch (510). In 512 Pope SYMMACHUS responded to an imperial letter that attempted, among other accusations, to charge him with favoring Manichaeism.

When the rebel general Vitalian forced the emperor to agree to call a council at Heraclea with the pope presiding, Anastasius was compelled to enter into relations with Rome. But after the defeat of Vitalian, legations sent to Constantinople in 515 and 517 by Pope HORMISDAS were unsuccessful. However the advent of JUSTIN I occasioned immediate negotiations between Hormisdas and the pro-

Chalcedonian emperor. The schism was brought to an end on March 28, 519, when Patriarch John in a letter to the pope indicated his acceptance of the formula of Hormisdas and the removal of the names of Zeno and Acacius as well as the latter's five successors from the diptychs. Opposition throughout the East endured only briefly.

Bibliography: E. SCHWARTZ, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma (Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften NS 10; 1934). F. HOFMANN, Das Konzil von Chalkedon, ed. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT (Würzburg 1951–54). 2:43–94. R. HAACKE, ibid. 117–146. H. BACHT, ibid. 266–291. P. CHARANIS, Church and State in the Later Roman Empire (Madison, Wis. 1939). S. SALAVILLE, "L'Affaire de l'Hénotique," Échos d'Orient 18 (1916–19) 255–266, 389–397; 19 (1920) 49–68, 415–433. L. SALAVILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 6.2: 2153–78. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE 2:24–39, 224–228.

[H. CHIRAT]

ACACIUS OF BEROEA

Bishop in the province of ANTIOCH who took part in all major ecclesiastical controversies between 360 and 433; b. Syria?, c. 322; d. Beroea, after 433. He had been a monk under ASTERIUS OF AMASEA at Gindarus near Antioch, and was renowned as a bishop for his austere life and discipline. He fought Arianism and Apollinarianism at Antioch in the persecution of Valens from 369 to 377. He was consecrated bishop of Beroea in 378, and attended most later councils, including CONSTANTINOPLE I in 381. He took part in two legations from the East to Rome to settle the Antiochian schism, and he was prominent in the intrigues (401–404) that led to the exile of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM. He did not attend the Council of Ephesus in 431, but played an important part in the NESTORIAN controversy and helped restore peace between Alexandria and Antioch through the Union formula of 433. When he died shortly after, he was more than 110 years old. Of his writings only six letters remain.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:482–83. G. BARDY, "Acace de Bérée et son rôle dans la controverse nestorienne," Revue des sciences religieuses 18 (1938) 20–44.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

ACACIUS OF CAESAREA

Disciple and successor of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA and leader of the Homoean faction in the Arian controversy; d. after 365. Nothing is known of him before he succeeded Eusebius c. 340. He was present at the Council of Antioch in 341 and became one of the foremost bishops of the anti-Nicene party. As such he was condemned by name by the orthodox assembly of SARDICA in 343. Later he was involved in a bitter feud with St. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM on jurisdictional and doctrinal grounds. His career reached a climax when the Homoean confession (the Son is “like to” the Father) became the official creed of the empire at the Synod of Constantinople in 360. When orthodoxy prevailed under the Emperor Jovian, Acacius had no scruples in signing the Nicene creed; but he returned to Homoean doctrine when VALENS became Emperor of the East in 364. However, he was condemned by the Homoiousian synod of Lampsacus in the summer of 365 but retained his see until his death (c. 366). He was noted for his eloquence and Biblical scholarship. He renovated the famous library of Caesarea, and he composed several works that are lost, except for a few exegetical fragments on Romans and the Octateuch.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:345–46. J. LEBON, “La Position de saint Cyrille de Jérusalem dans les luttes provoquées par l’arianisme,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 20 (1924) 181–210, 357–86.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

ACADEMIC FREEDOM

The nature and purposes of academic freedom have assumed different forms at different points in history and in the contexts of secular and Catholic education, and when applied to professors or to students. This article will examine this complex idea in five steps: (1) some historical precedents to the modern concept of academic freedom before the 20th century; (2) the development of the idea in the United States; (3) the idea in Catholic colleges and universities in the United States; (4) Ex corde ecclesiae (1990) and its application in the U.S.; and (5) the continuing tensions regarding academic freedom today, especially with regard to Catholic universities.

Historical Precedents. With the development in the West of cathedral schools in 11th and 12th-century Europe, and then the great medieval universities beginning in the 12th century, questions arose about the relationship between these educational institutions and the surrounding society, including civil rulers and bishops. Theological faculties within universities gained a certain magisterial authority recognized by bishops and the pope. In some instances, for example, at the University of Paris in 1215 and then again in 1231, the popes protected theological faculties from the precipitous intervention of local bishops into their disputes. On the one hand, the theologians generally accepted authoritative Church teaching; on the other hand, they enjoyed considerable freedom in debating “disputed questions.” Their influence in the Church was considerable. In one admittedly unusual situation, John XXII (1316–1334), asked the theologians of Paris not to come too quickly to a judgement about the orthodoxy of several sermons he had preached on the Beatific Vision, explaining that he was only testing his ideas in public, ideas which he thought merited further debate. Often, however, bishops did make determinations about proposed theological propositions, as was the case with Bishop Steven TEMPIER’s condemnation (1277) of 100 propositions, including several extracted from the writings of St. THOMAS ACQUINAS. The role of theologians in explaining the faith and putting forth new ways of thinking of it on the one hand, and on the other hand the role of bishops in making judgments as to which explanations and interpretations are orthodox, has continued to be a locus for a distinctively Catholic understanding of academic freedom.

At the time of the REFORMATION, the corporate character of medieval universities largely disappeared. The type of theology taught in a particular university in a confessional state was determined in large part by the ruler of that state. Universities in Europe had become, for all practical purposes, confessional institutions. In the early 18th and 19th centuries, a number of German universities “secularized” themselves, and in that process their faculties developed the concepts of Lehrfreiheit (the freedom of professors to do unfettered research and teach their findings) and Lernfreiheit (the freedom of students, mostly what we would consider graduate students, to learn from whomever they wished and to live their lives in private quarters without supervision). In the view of these faculty, such freedoms constituted a university in the true sense.

On the eve of the 20th century, academic freedom (though the name was not used until the early 20th century) indicated a thinker’s personal commitment to speak what he or she believes to be true, regardless of consequence; the appropriateness of the use of reason for believers trying to think through their faith; the freedom of theologians to debate disputed questions; and the protection of academics from persons of power from outside the university.

Academic Freedom in the United States. An institutional confessional stance marked most of the early American colleges: Harvard and Yale, for example, being Congregationalist, William and Mary Anglican, and Princeton Presbyterian. The medieval universities had been self-governed by guild systems and thus largely protected themselves from various external threats. In the New World, boards composed of clergy and laity rather than faculty retained the power to hire and fire and to set policy. With greater reliance on the empirical research model after the Civil War, the dominance of the clergy as presidents and board members of these colleges declined dramatically. By the end of the 19th century, the development of many of the social sciences as distinct disciplines further strengthened the autonomy of faculty, who now based their research on empirical methods of investigation over which the churches had decreasing authority.

Students at Columbia University, New York, protest the university's failure to reappoint Donald Henderson, economics instructor, striking in defense of "academic freedom." Violence erupted between strikers and nonstrikers, and police were called to break up the rioting, May 15, 1933. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Between 1890 and 1915, presidents of these colleges dismissed a number of faculty, many of whom had done doctoral work in German universities. These cases became widely known, and in 1915 thirteen professors signed a statement on academic freedom, titled "Declaration of Principles." Johns Hopkins philosopher Arthur Lovejoy and Columbia economist Edwin R. Seligman drafted the statement; eight of the 13 signers had studied in Germany and seven were social scientists. They founded the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), with John Dewey as its first president. Initially, membership was open to "any university or college teacher of recognized scholarship or scientific productivity who holds, and for ten years has held, a position of teaching or research." Administrators were then typically excluded. Academic freedom in the United States became at this time a protection for individual university professors against the arbitrary actions of administrators and those outside the academy who would seek to influence them. Stated more positively, academic freedom defended professors' ability to do research and go wherever their investigations led them, to teach their students what they know and believe, and to address issues in the public forum ("extramural freedom"), but to do so not as spokespersons for the university.

The AAUP insisted on the responsibilities as well as on the rights of individual professors. For example, when dealing with controversial matters, professors were expected to set forth divergent opinions without suppression or innuendo and were to help students learn for themselves rather than indoctrinate them. According to the 1915 Declaration, “the liberty of a scholar to set forth his conclusions, be they what they may, is conditioned by their being conclusions gained in a scholar’s method and held in a scholar’s spirit; that is to say, they must be fruits of competent and patient and sincere inquiry; and they must be set forth with dignity, courtesy, and temperateness.” Moreover, the AAUP stressed that research required evaluation, which could be done competently only by peers who were to follow certain procedures designed to ensure fairness in matters of promotion and tenure. Again, in the 1915 Declaration, the AAUP stated that in all disciplines, “the first condition of progress is complete and unlimited freedom to pursue inquiry and publish its results,” and added that “such freedom is the breath in the nostrils of all scientific activity.” In the AAUP’s vision of the academy, administrators gave permission to hire; professors, who constituted “the community of the competent,” decided whom they would hire.

The signers of the 1915 “Report” acknowledged the right of a board of trustees of a denominational college to govern according to its religious tradition, but made it clear that the AAUP had serious reservations about the academic integrity of at least a number of such institutions. They stated that such institutions “do not, at least as regards one particular subject, accept the principles of freedom of inquiry, of opinions and of teaching; and their purpose is not to advance knowledge by the unrestricted research and unfettered discussion of impartial investigations, but rather to subsidize the promotion of the opinions held by persons usually not of a scholar’s calling, who provide funds for their maintenance. Concerning the desirability of the existence of such institutions, the committee does not desire to express any opinion. But it is manifestly important that they should not be permitted to sail under false colors. Genuine boldness and thoroughness of inquiry and freedom of speech are scarcely reconcilable with the prescribed inculcating of a particular opinion upon a controverted question.” As a result, the AAUP judged that nearly all church-related colleges could not fully embrace academic freedom. In 1940, it stated what came to be known as the “limitations clause,” which read: “limitations in academic freedom because of religious and other aims of the institutions should be clearly stated in writing at the time of appointment.”

At the time, few church-related institutions had any discussions about academic freedom. A report given at the 1942 meeting of the National Catholic Education Association convention stated that 65% of those Catholic colleges that responded to the questionnaire made no provision for tenure. Since a great majority of Catholic colleges were run and staffed by religious, they never saw the need for tenure. People under the vow of obedience were simply assigned and reassigned, sometimes quite arbitrarily.

The 1960s saw a number of changes in Catholic higher education: the establishment of largely lay boards of trustees, more widespread adoption of the dominant scientific research model, and a decline in Catholic professional associations. By 1970, the AAUP stated that “most such colleges no longer need to state such a limitations clause.” It remained, nonetheless, opposed to any forms of indoctrination. In 1983, for example, it stated that a “college or university is a marketplace of ideas, and it cannot fulfill its purpose of transmitting, evaluating and extending knowledge if it requires conformity with any orthodoxy of content or method.” In 1988, shortly after moral theologian Fr. Charles Curran had been told by the Catholic University of America trustees, that he could no longer teach Catholic moral theology, a subcommittee of the AAUP clarified further the 1940 statement by affirming clearly two of its main points: “(1) the prerogative of institutions to require doctrinal fidelity; and (2) the necessary consequences of denying to institutions invoking this prerogative the moral right to proclaim themselves as seats of higher learning.” Though never formally approved by the AAUP, the subcommittee’s conclusions are consistent with the organization’s long-standing doubt that some church-related institutions provide their faculty with academic freedom, and, in fact, are universities in the “full sense of the term.”

Academic Freedom and Catholic Colleges and Universities in the U.S. Most Catholic educational institutions, beginning with those established by the Ursuline sisters in New Orleans in the 1720s, and John Carroll in Washington in 1789, were little more than primary schools whose mission was to prepare their students for service in the world and equip them with the capacity to defend their Catholic faith. Nearly all of the institutions that eventually grew into colleges were founded by religious communities of men and women. At the turn of the 19th century, nearly all Catholic colleges were small, and even by 1940 typically had no endowments, the religious who ran the majority of them constituting their institutions’ “living endowments.” Few offered tenure and none endorsed the AAUP’s understanding of academic freedom. In 1889, the U.S. bishops founded in Washington, D.C., the Catholic University of America, intended initially to be only a graduate school. Bishops on the board retain full legal control at a pontifically chartered institution. Over the years, the board of the Catholic University dismissed several faculty for opinions judged to be unorthodox (most recently, the 1986 Curran case).

Catholic colleges and universities grew steadily in number and size in the 20th century. In 1916, 32,000 students had enrolled in 84 colleges for men (though more than half these men were actually high school students), and by 1940, 160,000 men and women were enrolled. Shortly after the end of World War II, enrollments at Catholic colleges and universities grew considerably (thanks to the GI Bill and the baby boom). By 1966, nearly 400,000 students had enrolled. In the 1960s, leaders of these institutions began to shift full authority over their institutions to predominantly lay boards of trustees and to adopt the ecumenical emphasis of Vatican II. They promoted the professionalization of their faculties, and, in the process, frequently looked to the AAUP for their understanding of academic freedom and tenure. The year 1966 also marked the beginning of an unexpected and rapid decline in the number of religious men and women who had founded these very institutions.

In July 1967, twenty-six Catholic university and college presidents, faculty, and bishops gathered in Land O'Lakes, Wisconsin, to prepare a statement on the nature and role of a Catholic university. "The Catholic university today must be a university in the full modern sense of the word, with a strong commitment to and concern for academic excellence. To perform its teaching and research functions effectively the Catholic university must have a true autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself. To say this is simply to assert that institutional autonomy and academic freedom are essential conditions of life and growth and indeed of survival for Catholic universities as for all universities." This excerpt from the statement has been frequently cited by many leaders of Catholic higher education. Just as frequently overlooked, however, is another affirmation found in the same paragraph: "Distinctively, then, the Catholic university must be an institution, a community of learners or a community of scholars, in which Catholicism is perceptibly present and effectively operative." How to be distinctively Catholic and, at the same time, an autonomous institution which affirms an "academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind," has remained a key question ever since.

A series of state and Supreme Court judgments in the 1960s and 1970s made it difficult for Catholic colleges and universities to be explicit about their religious mission and remain eligible for state and federal funding. In the early 1980s, a series of court decisions seemed, at least in the view of some academic leaders, to force Catholic colleges and universities to choose between being sectarian or secular. Some of these leaders thought that if they were to remain eligible for federal funding, they needed to avoid any mention of the religious mission of their institution when hiring new faculty or admitting students, to teach theology only as an academic discipline, and to avoid all proselytizing. Most institutions had already made all religious practices optional and had begun to affirm academic freedom along the lines outlined by the AAUP, if not simply adopting it as their own. Given such understandings, along with the rapid expansion and professionalization of lay faculties, the decrease in the number of priests and religious, the power of accrediting agencies, the restrictions that accompanied an ever-increasing amount of government money for sponsored research, and the market pressures to compete with state subsidized public institutions, many Catholic colleges and universities, by the mid 1980s, struggled to find legal ways to make their identity and mission "perceptibly present and effectively operative."

Ex corde ecclesiae (1990). In 1979, the Vatican Congregation for Education published the apostolic constitution Sapientia Christiana, written for all pontifically chartered universities (such as the Catholic University of America). Shortly thereafter, the Congregation initiated a world-wide consultation for a second document that would deal with all non-pontifically chartered institutions—the vast majority of institutions in the U.S. In 1990, Pope John Paul II published the apostolic constitution Ex corde ecclesiae, indicating by its title that universities find their origin from the heart of the Church. The document's vision of higher education calls for Catholic institutions to show how various types of knowledge relate to one another, and to develop a coherent undergraduate curriculum in which philosophy and theology provide a framework for integration. It calls for faculty members to learn about each other's work, to search for the ethical and moral implications of both the methods and discoveries of their research, and to promote social justice.

Two essential components of the Land O'Lakes statement appear in the 1990 document: "Every Catholic university possesses that institutional autonomy necessary to perform its functions effectively and guarantees its members academic freedom, so long as the rights of the individual person and of the community are preserved within the confines of the truth and the common good." By institutional autonomy, the document explains in a footnote that "the governance of an academic institution is and remains internal to the institution." Concerning academic freedom, it explains further that it "is the guarantee given to those involved in teaching and research that, within their specific specialized branch of knowledge and according to the methods proper to that specific area, they may search and publish the results of this search, keeping in mind the cited criteria, that is, safeguarding the rights of the individual and of society within the confines of the truth and the common good.”

The Vatican directed national episcopal conferences to take the general norms outlined in the second part of Ex corde (the first part dealt with the mission and identity of Catholic higher education), and make whatever adaptations were needed for their local application. A “pastoral” application was produced by the U.S. bishops in 1996, but was rejected by the Vatican, which directed that essential juridical elements, outlined in the revised 1983 Code of Canon Law, be included in a new application. Among those juridical elements were the requirement of the mandatum for Catholic theologians, the taking of the Oath of fidelity by presidents of Catholic universities, the desirability of at least 50 percent of the faculty and the board of trustees be Catholics, and the clear inclusion of Ex corde’s description of the mission and nature of a Catholic university in the by-laws of the local institution. The bishops produced such an application in 1999, which was subsequently approved by the Vatican.

Continuing Tensions Regarding Academic Freedom. Five persistent tensions accompany the idea of academic freedom at Catholic colleges and universities: (1) the differences between the corporate and individual aspects of academic freedom, (2) the AAUP’s understanding of academic freedom, (3) institutional autonomy and episcopal authority, (4) the academic freedom of the Catholic theologian, and (5) the practice of hiring for mission.

First, Catholic universities have stressed in practice, though rarely explicitly, a corporate idea of academic freedom. The AAUP understanding of academic freedom emphasizes the rights and responsibilities of the individual professor and the corresponding power of professional peers to determine what counts as knowledge. That understanding arose largely out of a liberal democratic focus on individual rights. Catholic tradition draws on a different understanding of the individual and society. It starts with the understanding that a person is radically social and always a member of a community. It describes society more in organic than contractual terms, though rights continue to belong both to the community and the individual. Given these differences between the AAUP and the Catholic approaches to the individual’s relationship to community, it is understandable why the Church has had such difficulty with many of the affirmations of the Enlightenment, particularly the way it formulated the ideas of freedom of conscience and religious liberty. It seemed to Church authorities that both freedoms led inevitably to a kind of philosophical relativism and a rejection of Church tradition and authority. It was only midway through the 20th century that the work of thinkers like John Courtney Murray helped the Church embrace religious freedom, albeit with careful qualifications. Medieval universities retained a strong corporate freedom; they set their own standards and debated controversial issues. Were the university not to have the right to set appropriate standards that strengthen the Catholic character of the institutions, then the emphasis only on the individual professor’s rights would weaken the corporate identity of the institution.

Second, the AAUP’s concept of academic freedom emphasizes, as has been mentioned, a type of knowledge that relies primarily on scientific methodology. Therefore, it emphasizes new knowledge, acquired by inquiry and experimentation rather than the faithful retrieval and handing on of religious and humanistic traditions. In other words, the authority of a certain type of tradition, a religious tradition, was displaced by another tradition, a certain academic tradition that recognized as valid only that knowledge which is arrived at through scientific methodology. While it is true that very few thinkers now would describe themselves only as empiricists, for a number of secular academics the acceptance of Christian revelation as true still appears to be an indefensible sacrifice of intellectual freedom.

Having underscored these two limitations, it should be added that Catholic institutions can benefit from other characteristics of the AAUP understanding of academic freedom. In particular, its emphases on due process and institutional autonomy are of critical importance for Catholic institutions, which only in recent decades are putting in place procedures to insure both.

Third, Ex corde strikes a delicate balance between institutional autonomy on the one hand and episcopal authority on the other when, citing Pope John Paul II’s 1987 New Orleans address to the leaders of Catholic higher education, it says that bishops “should be seen not as external agents but as participants in the life of the Catholic university.” Except for pontifically chartered universities, nearly all Catholic colleges and universities in the United States (diocesan colleges have a slightly different relationship to their bishop) have predominantly lay boards of trustees. In essence, the local bishop has, as a consequence, no direct authority within the university to hire or fire faculty or employees. The bishop’s influence takes the form of persuasion and encouragement, and will be as effective as is his relationship with the leadership and members of a particular Catholic college. On the other hand, if a board of trustees changed its by-laws to permit the bishop some direct authority, the bishop's "influence" would become administrative authority, no longer external but internal. Unfortunately, the mutually exclusive meaning conveyed by the words "external" and "internal" obscure the many ways in which the life of the Church, including the leadership of bishops, and the mission of a Catholic university do and should mutually influence each other. While the Church and the university have distinctive missions, in some ways, not juridical, these missions overlap.

Fourth, some secular academics question seriously whether Catholic theologians have genuine academic freedom. Theologians do not employ the same methods of verification as do scientists; their work, like that done by many in the humanities, is seen as mainly interpretation and opinion, not the result of rigorous and objective methodologies. Their teaching is perceived as "advocacy" or even "proselytization," rather than the dispassionate presentation of knowledge. Their competency is determined not by their peers, but by bishops who are perceived as "external non-academic" agents. The requirement that Catholic theologians teaching Catholic theology have from the local bishop a mandatum seems to verify all these perceptions. In response to these concerns, some have criticized the narrow epistemology that privileges the scientific method. Others maintain that many academics have shown that it is possible to teach a discipline enthusiastically and yet critically. It is also pointed out that "realities" outside the academy daily determine what ought to be the subject matter of a discipline—Supreme Court decisions for legal education, business trends for finance curricula, the state of the environment for ecologists, and developments in information technology for those designing communications curricula. More precisely, the lives and experiences of Christian believers in different cultures during different periods of history constitute as important a source for theological work as do the formal doctrinal decisions of Church councils and bishops. Finally, defenders of the mandatum point out that it only requires a Catholic theologian to present as Catholic theology what is officially the teaching of the Church—a legitimate professional expectation. Theologians, they continue, may also present other points of view, provide comparisons with other traditions, and raise critical questions, even about official teachings of the Church. If however a Catholic theologian opposes dogmatic teachings of the Church, then he or she ceases to be a Catholic theologian in good standing. Continuing tensions remain and, if Church history is any indication, will continue to remain as to how to insure due process should a difference on doctrine arise between a theologian and a bishop, and as to whether that difference is legitimate or heterodox. Or, tensions will remain over differing interpretations of just what constitutes, in the words of Ex corde, the "confines of truth" and "the common good," the two qualities it attaches to academic freedom.

Fifth and finally, in recent years Catholic colleges and universities have increasingly attempted to "hire for mission," that is, to seek out academically qualified candidates for faculty positions who are Catholic or, if not, who nonetheless understand and support the institution's Catholic mission. Such efforts are fraught with difficulties, not the least of which are hiring candidates with religious but not academic qualifications and making all who are not Catholics feel only tolerated. Defenders of the practice of hiring for mission claim that if Catholicism is to be "perceptively present and effectively operative," especially as an intellectual force, then at least some Catholic intellectuals must be hired. As important as Catholic theology is for a Catholic university, other disciplines also must find ways to explore, critique, and embody key insights of Catholic intellectual traditions. Finally, they argue that unless there is a strong and vital non-juridical relationship to the faith and intellectual life of the Church that founded the college or university, it is only a matter of time before that institution begins to move away from its theological tradition to a moral one, and from there to a humanistic tradition, and before long, given the strong secular currents in the academy in the West, to a tradition that has no discernible relationship—intellectual or cultural—to the founding Church at all.

How to understand academic freedom for Catholic colleges and universities, how to benefit from the AAUP understanding of academic freedom aware of its limitations, how to balance institutional autonomy with a vital relationship to the larger Church, how to hire for mission without narrowing the base of faculty talent and the range of views any university should examine, and how to sustain a context in which theologians as well as faculty in other disciplines can creatively work—these challenges, if handled thoughtfully, will continue to ensure that Catholic higher education will provide a truly distinctive alternative to the over 3,000 other institutions of higher learning in the United States.

Bibliography: "Academic Freedom: American and Catholic," in Origins 28, no. 35 (18 Feb. 1999). A. GALLIN, ed., American Catholic Higher Education: Essential Documents, 1967–1990 (Notre Dame 1992). P. GLEASON, Contending with Modernity (Oxford 1994). J. HEFT, ed., A Catholic Modernity? A Discussion with Charles Taylor (Oxford 1999). R. HOFSTADTER and W. METZGER, The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States (New York 1955). W. P. LEAHY, Adapting to America: Catholics, Jesuits, and Higher Education in the Twentieth Century (Washington, D.C. 1991). J. T. MCGREEVY, "Thinking on One's Own: Catholicism in the American Intellectual Imagination, 1928–1960,” Journal of American History 84.1 (June 1997): 97–131.

[J. L. HEFT]

ACCA OF HEXHAM, ST.

Bishop of Hexham; d. Hexham, England, Oct. 20, 740. A Northumbrian, he was fostered by Bosa (d. 705), who was afterward appointed bishop of York (678), and he became the devoted disciple and companion of WILFRID. When the latter was reinstated at Hexham in 705, he made Acca abbot of St. Andrew’s monastery there. Acca succeeded Wilfrid as bishop of Hexham in 709. In addition to ruling the diocese with zeal, he concerned himself with the promotion of the liturgy in all its splendor by procuring the service of the cantor Maban (fl. 720), who had inherited the Roman tradition of psalmody of GREGORY THE GREAT, brought to England by the monks of Augustine of Canterbury. He completed, decorated, and richly furnished the churches begun by Wilfrid. He promoted learning, built and equipped a famous library, and, above all, encouraged BEDE, who wrote about him and dedicated several books to him. He was expelled from Hexham in 732 for some unknown reason; he sought refuge in Galloway but returned to die and be buried in his diocese.

Feast: Oct. 20.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 5:19–20; ed. C. PLUMMER 1:330–332. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge, England 1962), passim. A. S. COOK, “The Old-English Andreas and Bishop Acca of Hexham,” Transactions of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences 26 (1924) 245–332. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65)1:103; Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:200–203.

[C. MCGRATH]

ACCEPTANTS

Members of the clergy, especially in France and in the Netherlands, who accepted the bull Unigenitus, dated Sept. 8, 1713, and known in France as early as September 25. At this time, in France, a pontifical declaration had no effect until after it had been accepted by parliament and the Assembly of the Clergy. Parliament discussed the bull UNIGENITUS on September 27 and 28. The opposition was led by Attorney General H. F. Daguesseau, who maintained that he saw in it proof of the fallibility of the popes, and parliament refused to endorse the bull, at least for the time being. The King then brought together the bishops present in Paris in an Assembly of the Clergy.

The debates began on October 16. The Acceptants were immediately in the majority; supported by those in power and influenced especially by Cardinals A. G. de Rohan and H. de Bissy, they were nevertheless unable to attain unanimity and subdue their opponents, grouped around Cardinal L. A. de Noailles, Archbishop of Paris. Louis XIV, annoyed, sent the opponents to their dioceses and on Feb. 15, 1714, by a lettre de cachet, imposed on parliament the acceptance of the bull. In Aug. 1714, 112 bishops had accepted it, while only 16 refused it. Some Acceptants retracted their submission in 1716, during the brief period in which the Regent was favorably disposed toward Jansenism; but shortly afterward the Acceptants again had the support of those in power, and the Archbishop of Sens, Languet de Gergy, assumed a leading position in the group. The victory was practically assured them after the royal declaration of March 24, 1730, which made Unigenitus a law of the land.

[L. J. COGNET]

ACCESSUS

In order to expedite the papal election, each cardinal, immediately after an inconclusive ballot, was allowed an additional vote in favor of a candidate other than the one for whom he had voted in the ballot; such additional votes were added to those cast in the ballot in the hope of effecting a two-thirds majority. This procedure was known as accessus, i.e., acceding to the latter candidate. A cardinal could use this right of accessus only once after each ballot; after 1621 he could not use it in his own favor. The complications involved in ensuring that a cardinal did not use it in his own favor or in favor of the candidate for whom he had already voted in the ballot prompted St. Pius X in 1904 to abolish it, replacing it with a second ballot that should take place immediately after each morning and evening ballot.

Bibliography: PIUS X, “Vacante Sede Apostolica” (apostolic constitution, Dec. 25, 1904), Codex iuris canonici, Document 1, par. 76. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St Louis 1938–61) 27:117.

[B. FORSHAW]

ACCIAIOLI

A celebrated Florentine family whose name (spelled also Acciaiuoli or Acciajuoli) derives from acciaio (steel), in which the family dealt in the Brescia-Bergamo area until Frederick Barbarossa’s depredations against the Guelfs of Lombardy forced them to move into Tuscany. From the year 1161, when Guigliarallo Acciaiuoli settled in Florence, until his last male descendant died in 1834, the family was renowned for its merchants, bankers, scholars, statesmen, and patrons of the arts. Wealth amassed in their mercantile enterprises, which extended into North Africa and the eastern Mediterranean, became the capital for a lucrative banking business that counted kings and popes among its clients. The most important churchmen in the family were Angelo, Niccolò, and Filippo.

“Niccolo Acciaiuoli,” painting by Andrea del Castagno. (©Arte & Immagini srl/CORBIS)

Angelo, cardinal, supporter of the Roman popes during the Great WESTERN SCHISM (1378–1417); b. Florence, April 15, 1340; d. Pisa, May 31, 1408. In 1375 he was named to the bishopric of Rapolla in the Kingdom of Naples by Gregory XI (1371–78), and in 1383 he was appointed archbishop of Florence by Urban VI (1378–89). During this period his eloquent defense of the Roman pontiff against the pretensions of the Avignon claimant, Clement VII (1378–94), was rewarded by his elevation to the cardinalate with the titular see of South Lorenzo in Damaso. In the papal election of 1389 Angelo was the choice of half of the cardinals, but he directed this support to Cardinal Pietro Tomacelli, who assumed the tiara as Boniface IX (1389–1404). The pope entrusted Angelo with several difficult missions, especially that of assuring the accession of Prince Ladislaus to the throne of Naples and of Hungary, as well as conducting the young king’s coronations at Gaeta and at Zara. Angelo restored peace between the pope and the powerful Orsini family and settled ecclesiastical difficulties in Germany and in the Balkans. In common with other cardinals, hitherto unquestioningly loyal to the Roman pontiff, he concluded that a council was the only solution to the Western Schism and was attending a preliminary session of the Council of Pisa at the time of his death. His body was transferred to the Certosa in Florence in the 16th century.

Niccolò, cardinal, papal diplomat; b. Florence, 1630; d. Rome, 1719. Niccolò attended the Roman Seminary and completed his clerical studies at the Roman College, where he received a doctorate in law. Under Alexander VII (1655–67), Niccolò had charge of paying and equipping the militia of the Papal States. In 1667 he administered the papal treasury and two years later was made cardinal deacon of Saints Cosmas and Damian by Clement IX (1667–69). During the reign of Alexander VIII (1689–91), Niccolò, with the clumsy assistance of Cosimo III, grand duke of Tuscany, attempted to prevent the marriage of his nephew Roberto Acciaiuoli to Elizabeth Mormorai, a widow. When Elizabeth was forcibly placed in a convent, her fiancé delivered an uncomplimentary account of his uncle’s part in the episode to each of the cardinals who had assembled to elect a successor to Alexander VIII. The embarrassing narrative did much to defeat Niccolò’s otherwise excellent chances of election. In the conclave of 1700 Niccolò, who was identified with the “Zelanti,” was again among the favored candidates but was ruled out of contention by the powerful “Imperialist” faction. For 12 years Niccolò served as papal legate to Ferrara, and in 1715, four years before his death, he was made bishop of Ostia and dean of the Sacred College.

Filippo, cardinal, papal nuncio to Portugal at the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits; b. Rome, March 12, 1700; d. Ancona, July 4, 1776. Filippo’s first ecclesiastical appointment was as vice legate to Ravenna (1724), where he remained for four years. This was followed by other minor assignments until 1743, when he was made titular archbishop of Petra in Transjordan and sent to Lucerne as papal nuncio to Switzerland. In 1753 he was appointed nuncio to Portugal, where Sebastião POMBAL was beginning his campaign of vilification against the Jesuits. Filippo endeavored to refute or mitigate each charge against the society and kept Pope Benedict XIV (1740–58) informed of developments. Filippo was advised by Benedict to remain near the Spanish border so that he could escape if necessary and send or receive messages with less danger of their interception. Despite Filippo's efforts, all Portuguese Jesuits were either jailed or expelled in January of 1759, eight months before Filippo was elevated to the cardinalate by Clement XIII (1758–69), with the titular see of South Maria degli Angeli. The following year he was ordered to leave Portugal. After his return to Rome, Filippo was made bishop of Ancona.

Bibliography: C. UGURGIERI DELLA BERARDENGA, Gli Acciaioli di Firenze, 2 v. (Florence 1962). E. SAPORI et al., Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929–39) 1:259–261. Enciclopedia universal ilustrada Europeo-Americana, 70 v. (Barcelona 1908–30) 1:967–971. F. BOCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:103–104. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v. 36, 37. G. MOLLAT and P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 1:263–265. A. D'ADDARIO and G. PAMPALONI, Dizionario biografico degli Italiani, ed. A. M. GHISALBERTI (Rome 1960—) 1:76, 82–83. P. LITTA et al., Famiglie celebri italiane, 14 v. (Milan 1819–1923).

[R. F. COPELAND]

ACCIDENT

A word with various meanings in ordinary usage and with precise technical significations in law, philosophy, and theology. The term may generally mean a chance occurrence, or it may be used to describe a fall or collision, as in vehicular traffic, with or without personal injury. The adjectival form, moreover, is frequently used to refer to the less important or more superficial aspect of a thing or event. Though these meanings may be different, there is a common element among them. If used as CHANCE, accident contrasts with the stability of ORDER; if used as less important, accident contrasts with the essential or the necessary. The note of contrast, then, is implicit in most usages of the term. Its varied meanings are set over against a more basic, more important, usually more enduring reality that is implied in the very usage itself.

Ancient and medieval philosophers thus employed the term in enumerating accident among the PREDICABLES and in contrasting accident with SUBSTANCE. In their analysis, man is essentially what his substance is. While this substance remains unchanged, man remains. But man does change accidentally. He may gain weight, increase in size, become tanned in the summer, develop his knowledge, exercise his muscles, and move about from place to place in time. All of these changes are real. The essential sameness of man throughout this type of change indicates a difference of levels, that of independent and dependent, basic and proximate, fundamental and phenomenal, substantial and accidental.

When modern philosophers rejected substance and substituted phenomenon for accident, they eliminated any contrasting note from phenomenon. The phenomenon began to play the dual role of substance or SUBJECT as well as the manifestation or appearance of that subject. Hence, the terms accident and phenomenon cannot always be read simply as translations of each other or as necessarily contrasted with their correlatives, substance and noumenon respectively (see NOUMENA; PHENOMENA). The context must be consulted before deciding how the term accident is being used by a particular author.

This article first discusses the historical development of the concept and then presents a systematic analysis that justifies its understanding in the Aristotelian-Thomistic tradition and explains its uses in Catholic theology.

Historical Development

The main stages in the evolution of the concept of accident include its origins in Greek philosophy; its development in the medieval period, particularly by St. Thomas Aquinas; and later formulations that led to the gradual rejection of the concept in modern and contemporary philosophy.

GREEK NOTIONS

The key to the historical development of the meaning of accident is the kind of relation an accident bears to a more fundamental subject. The relative and dependent character of accident was clearly taught by ARISTOTLE in his classic resolution of the Greek philosophical controversy over the fact and nature of change. Accident was to substance as the superficial to the fundamental. But PLATO had prepared for the Aristotelian answer by asking in what sense being (εἶναι, οὐσία) could be predicated of things that were different, such as rest and motion. For Plato, the problem also centered on a plurality of predicates for one subject. In the Sophist (c. 255) he states that “of those which are, some are per se, and some are related to others.”

Aristotle developed these insights. He says in his Metaphysics (1030a 20–23), “For as ‘is’ belongs to all things, not however in the same sense, but to one sort of thing primarily and to others in a secondary way, so too ‘what a thing is’ belongs in the simple sense to substance, but in a limited sense to the other categories.” In contrast with οὐσία for substance as primary being, Aristotle used συμβεβηκός for accident. This Greek term connoted “going along with” or “occurring with” something else. For Aristotle, there were nine different ways, classes or categories in which there was an “occurring with” the primary being, substance. These nine classes of accident together with substance constitute the ten CATEGORIES OF BEING. When the Greek συμβεβηκός came to be translated into the Latin accidens, the latter's etymology of "happening" or "falling upon" accented the notion of relative and dependent; it also provided the form for the later English term.

THOMISTIC CONCEPT

St. THOMAS AQUINAS further emphasized the relative and dependent aspect of accidents. "In the definition of an accident something is placed which is outside the essence of the thing defined; for it is necessary to place the subject in the definition of an accident" (In 2 de anim. 1.1). The reason for this necessity is that accidents "do not have a perfect essence; whence it follows that they must admit into their definition the subject, which is outside of their genus" (De ente 2).

Essence of accidents. Accident is said not to have a perfect ESSENCE; yet it does have some kind of essence. Its very state of imperfection or of being a lesser essence emphasizes a dual character: its reality as distinct from substance and its dependence on substance. In the Aristotelian and Thomistic view, an accident always has a dependent mode of existence. An accident expresses more than itself in its very aspect of lacking independence: its referent is not size alone, but the size of something; not shape alone, but the shape of something.

Though having an imperfect essence, accident nonetheless has an essence and may thus be compared to substance. As essences, both substance and accident are alike in that they have a capacity for EXISTENCE. "In its own nature being is substance or accident" (De nat. gen. 2). Substance and accident are distinguished from each other by the precise, opposite modes of existence proper to each. The mode of existence proper to substance is per se, or independent, whereas that proper to accident is in alio, or dependent. "Similarly, 'to exist in a subject' is not the definition of accident, but on the contrary 'a thing which is due to exist in another'" (In 4 sent. 12.1.1.1 ad 2). What is properly characteristic of accident is its need or aptitude for existence in another. Even in the Eucharist, after the change of the substance of the bread and the wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, the accidents of bread and wine do not cease to have aptitude for inherence in a subject; thus, although sustained by divine power, they never cease to be accidents (Summa theologiae 3a, 77.1 ad 2).

In both the natural and supernatural orders, accident is within the order of BEING, and it is most properly called a being of a being (ens entis) to emphasize its ever-present dependent mode. It is also characterized as a being secundum quid (that is, relatively) in contrast with substance, which is a being simpliciter (that is, absolutely). This latter contrast also emphasizes a development in the terminology of St. Thomas for substance and accident. In his commentary on the Sentences, he uses res (THING) when speaking of substance or accident; in his later writings, however, his terminology indicates that substance and accident are principles within the order of being. Each is an essence, but only substance is perfect; accident is imperfect. By reason of the different status of their essence, they have differing capacities for existence. Substance is essence in its capacity for an independent, or per se, mode of existence. Accident is essence in its capacity for a dependent, or in alio, mode of existence. They are distinguished by their differing capacities for distinct modes of existence, while remaining interrelated as the dependent on the independent.

Distinct existence of accidents. This principle of distinction between substance and accident also serves to answer the controverted question of the distinct existence of the accident. The majority of St. Thomas's commentators, including JOHN OF ST. THOMAS and T. de Vio CAJETAN, hold that in a thing there is one substantial existence with many distinct accidental existences. Some distinguished contemporary commentators, however, point to various passages in St. Thomas and advance their reasons for holding that the one substantial existence is also that whereby accidents exist [R. G. FONTAINE, Subsistent Accident in the Philosophy of St. Thomas and in His Predecessors (Washington 1950) 74–76]. The author of this article takes the position that substance and accident have distinct existences within the one concrete thing. The argument for this view may be put as follows: "An accident really exists as a modification of a really existent substance. Only in real dependence upon substantial existence can the accidental existence be had. An identical existence could not be really dependent and really independent in the same respect. The one has to be really distinct from the other" [J. OWENS, An Elementary Christian Metaphysics (Milwaukee 1963) 159–160].

THOMISTIC CLASSIFICATION

In treating the real distinction between substance and accident, one may easily create the false impression that there is but a single kind of substance and a single kind of accident. Actually, there are many specifically different substances, and it is the substance itself that specifies the difference. "For when we say that some substance is corporeal or spiritual, we do not compare spirituality or corporeity to substance as forms to matter, or accidents to a subject; but as differences to a genus. Thus it is that a spiritual substance is not spiritual through something added to its own substance, but is such through its own substance. In the same way, corporeal substance is not corporeal through something added to substance, but according to its own substance" (De subs. sep. 6).

In a somewhat similar fashion, accident in general is distinguished into ultimate classes or genera. Aristotle, Augustine, and Aquinas treat the nine genera of accidents as classifications of real being. Of these nine genera, Aquinas observes that two points must be noted. "One is the nature belonging to each of them considered as an accident, which commonly applies to each of them as inherent in a subject, for the existence (esse) of an accident is existence in another (inesse). The other point to note is the proper nature of each one of these genera" (ST 1a, 28.2).

St. AUGUSTINE has given examples of the nine genera. "When the question is asked, how large is he? and I say he is . . . four feet in measure, I affirm according to quantity . . . I say he is white, I affirm according to quality . . . I say he is near, I affirm something according to relation . . . I affirm something according to position when I say he lies down . . . I speak according to condition (habitus) when I say he is armed . . . I affirm according to time when I say he is of yesterday . . . And when I say he is at Rome, I affirm according to place . . . I affirm according to the predicament of action when I say he strikes . . . and when I say he is struck, I affirm according to the predicament of passion" (Trin. 5.7).

A list of the predicamental accidents in more precise terminology would include QUANTITY, QUALITY, RELATION, ACTION AND PASSION, position in time (quando), LOCATION (ubi), SITUATION (situs), and condition, or habit (habitus). It is well, however, to remember that "the original terms that Aristotle used to name the accidental categories were not substantive in form. . . . The proper designation of the category of quantity, for instance, was to poson, the quantitative. That of quality was to poion, the qualitative. Corresponding to these adjectival forms, adverbial and verbal forms were used to name the other categories. . . . 'The quantitative' helps keep in mind that it designates not something self-contained and as it were standing in its own right, but rather a way in which a substance happens to be" [J. Owens, An Elementary Christian Metaphysics (Milwaukee 1963) 166].

Absolute and intrinsic accidents. Of these predicaments, quantity and quality are absolute accidents and the rest are relative. While each of the predicamental accidents is, as an accident, related to the subject or substance on which it depends, only the accidents other than quantity and quality put the substance in which they inhere into relation with other things. Quantity and quality alone modify the substance in itself, that is, without further reference to other substances. Quantity confers EXTENSION on corporeal substance. Quality modifies a substance, whether spiritual or corporeal, either in itself or in its operation. Both quantity and quality thus serve in an absolute or intrinsic way for the immediate grounding of relative or extrinsic accidents; these enable substance further to relate to other things and to manifest itself in a variety of ways.

Relative and extrinsic accidents. Accidents other than quantity and quality are sometimes designated as extrinsic, a term that serves to contrast them with the two intrinsic accidents. Just as all accidents are in a sense relative, because their very essence is to have aptitude for inherence in a subject, so too are all accidents in a sense intrinsic. A real accident of its very nature belongs to a substance, and in this way is intrinsic. Those accidents, however, that put their substance into relation with other substances are properly called extrinsic. Their role and function are directed outward toward other substances, even though the accident itself is rooted in the relating substance.

The most obvious of the extrinsic or relative accidents is relation. As real, predicamental relation is distinguished from the logical relation, or the relation of reason, which exists only within the mind. As predicamental, it is distinguished from the transcendental relation, which is the very nature of some essence or principle as this relates to a complementary principle. Predicamental relation is a distinct reality by means of which the substance to which it belongs is related to another subject; its very essence is reference or order to another. Such a relation must be distinguished from the foundation that serves as the cause of relation. For example, the quality of tallness is the foundation for the real relation of SIMILARITY between tall people.

The correlative accidents of action and passion are related to the operation of an AGENT, although each stands in different relation to that agent. Action is the second actuality of the creature at the operational level. Since it involves the exercise of CAUSALITY, it cannot be understood without an appreciation of the notion and reality of cause. Action is a further perfection of the agent, but it is extrinsically denominated by reference to the patient upon which the agent operates. Passion, on the other hand, is the accidental modification that the patient undergoes by receiving in itself the efficiency of the agent. Action and passion are really distinct categories, although both are intimately related to the EFFICIENT CAUSALITY of the agent.

Finally, there are four extrinsic accidents based on quantity. The accident "when" (quando) is sometimes, although incorrectly, identified with TIME. Time is based on the reality of MOTION, whose inner relationships provide the basis for the measuring or numbering in which time consists. Corporeal objects, existing in the changing world of time, have a type of accidental existence by reason of their temporal situation. “When” is thus a category of real being; it has extrinsic denomination from time as a measure.

Location in PLACE provides the basis for another category, the accident “where” (ubi). This inheres in a subject through its quantity, because of the circumscriptive containment of the subject arising from the surrounding quantities of other bodies. The ninth category, situation or posture, is an accident presupposing the category “where,” which it further determines by specifying the order of the parts of the body in place. Being a passenger on the subway or bus would answer to the category “where,” whereas the various stances one chooses or is forced to take on the vehicle as it becomes crowded are examples of the further determination that is situation or posture.

The tenth category, condition or habit (habitus), is the accident proper to a body by reason of something extrinsic and adjacent to it that does not measure it, as does place. An example would be “clothed,” in which case the body that is the subject of the accident is denominated by something extrinsic to it, namely, clothing.

LATER CONCEPTIONS

St. Thomas reconciled the unity of a thing with its many divergent characteristics, activities, and changes by acknowledging the complexity within the structure of a finite thing. Unity is preserved through the uniqueness of a specific substantial nature with its proportioned substantial existence, which in turn allows for a variety of lesser perfections or accidents that have a basic exigency for inherence in the substance. Though having real status in the order of being, the accident is nonetheless a lesser being; as has been said, it is but a being of a being.

This delicate balancing of unity and plurality within the one concrete thing was not preserved by much of 14th century scholasticism. The most prominent spokesman was WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, who rejected any real distinction other than between thing and thing. “In creatures there cannot be any distinction whatsoever outside the soul, except where there are distinct things” (Summulae in lib. phys. 1.14). Renaissance scholasticism, in the person of F. Suárez, lost still more the Thomistic appreciation for unity within complexity. Suárez’s distinctive teaching was that “being can be predicated absolutely and without qualification of the accident” (Disp. meta. 32.2.18).

The extreme view of the distinction of accident from substance that thus developed evoked opposing reactions in modern philosophy. Authors tended to suppress either the reality of accident or the reality of substance. Although it would be simplistic to ascribe these two tendencies solely to the teaching of Suárez, it may be noted that R. DESCARTES and G. W. LEIBNIZ read him and that I. KANT knew his teaching through the Ontologia of C. WOLFF. The more basic reason for these opposing tendencies in modern philosophy, however, lies in the differing epistemologies of RATIONALISM and EMPIRICISM. Rationalism, by exalting the intellectual power of man, freed man’s reason from dependence on the data of sense and ascribed to reason the power of attaining easily the essences of things. Empiricism, reacting against this abandonment of the sense origins of knowledge, so deeply immersed itself in the conditions of the empirical that it precluded any intellectual discovery of the substantial essence.

Thus Descartes opted for two kinds of substance, the bodily and the spiritual, each of which he really identified with its primary property, extension and thought respectively. All other properties he regarded as but varieties of the primary property. B. SPINOZA sought to resolve the basic problem of unity and plurality in things by considering the Cartesian extension and thought as two modes of a unique, infinite substance. Yet Spinoza carefully refrained from calling the modes accidents. All multiplicity and apparent finiteness, for him, are mere modifications of the two attributes of extension and thought that are characteristic of the one, infinite, divine substance.

J. LOCKE opposed the innate ideas of Descartes but accepted the Cartesian criterion of truth as the clear and distinct idea. He applied the criterion of distinctness to the point of isolating empirical qualities from any known bond with the thing of which they were supposed to be qualities. Instead of stressing the interdependence and interrelation between quality and substance, he gave to each a separate and independent status. One may speculate what influence Locke’s training in Ockhamist philosophy at Oxford, had on this extreme separation of substance and accident.

Whereas Locke would allow that substance is at least an unknown support of qualities, D. HUME, going further than G. BERKELEY in the rejection of material substance, could find no philosophical need for substance in any sense whatever. Restricting his knowledge to distinct perceptions, each of which he considered as existing independently, Hume in effect identified the accidental with the substantial. Since “every perception may exist separately, and have no need of anything else to support their existence, they are therefore substances, as far as this definition explains a substance” (Treatise 1.1.5).

Modern and contemporary philosophers have tended to repeat the position of Hume. A common view is that there is no need of substance to explain reality because everything that substance is supposed to contribute can be ascribed to phenomena. Hence, although Kant provided for the unknowable thing-in-itself, the noumenon, in contradistinction to the empirically known phenomenon, the more dominant theme in contemporary thought has been a rejection of substance.

Systematic Analysis

While many contemporary philosophers thus tend to disregard the distinction between substance and accident, and therefore to reject the concept of accident itself, this concept continues to be important in scholastic philosophy and theology. The following more systematic explanation may serve to justify the retention of the concept in philosophy and to outline its many important uses in Catholic theology.

JUSTIFICATION IN PHILOSOPHY

The various philosophical positions with respect to accident in modern thought may be grouped under four headings, namely, (1) rationalist, (2) empiricist, (3) Kantian and (4) contemporary scientific. Though differing superficially, these positions have much in common; moreover, they must all confront the perennial problem of reconciling unity and plurality as these are found in the concrete existing thing.

Rationalism, as exemplified in the thought of Descartes and Spinoza, really identifies substance and accident or substance and mode while accenting the reality of substance. Empiricism, as exemplified in Hume's formulation, rejects substance while ascribing to perceptions or phenomena the substantial mode of independent existence. Kantian criticism explicitly retains the unknown noumenon, or thing-in-itself, and the known phenomena that, together with the space-time forms within the knower, are materially constitutive of sensible intuition; with the noumenon unknown and unknowable, however, for all practical purposes only the phenomena are retained. Hence rationalism, empiricism, and Kantian criticism effectively retain only one ultimate level of reality. The same may be said of the contemporary scientific view; so far as it accords any objectivity to accident, it regards phenomena such as light, color, heat and sound as various types of motion. Physical scientists and contemporary naturalistic philosophers speak of systems rather than of substance, although they continue to designate the entities and particles within their systems in terms once used to describe substance. Since this manner of thinking equivalently rejects a substance-accident dualism, it amounts to maintaining that matter and motion (or matter in motion) exist either independently or dependently—in other words, are either substances or accidents. Hence, the contemporary scientific position, like its three predecessors, reductively retains but one ultimate level of reality.

The basic issue is whether reality is sufficiently explained when only one level of reality is retained or whether the facts expostulate a radical dualism that accentuates the relatedness and dependence of realities at different levels. In effect, the philosophical problem may be stated either as the problem of substance or as the problem of accident. If substance is rejected, either theoretically or practically, its intelligible characteristics, both generic and specific, are transferred to the phenomena. But then what is to be said of the phenomena? A duality of levels of reality is denied while a term is retained, namely, phenomenon, whose etymological meaning is "that which appears or is manifest," and which itself connotes the presence of something else that does not appear or is not manifest. The same is true of the term accident, which means "occurring with" or "happening to" something else.

The resulting inference is more than a carry-over of Aristotelian prejudices that have been inherited along with a Greek-derived language. What it indicates is, rather, that the mind dealing with the data of experience recognizes two complementary, mutually related roles within a thing, one of which is dependent, the other independent. Plato sought answers to the problem that arises when one subject is considered to be the recipient of many different predicates. The full answer is more than the substance-accident dualism as elaborated by Aristotle, but this dualism is integral to the solution of the problem. As Aquinas has demonstrated, beneath such diversity there must be something basic, primary, and independent, for this alone can account for the unity that is known. The alternative is a meaningless regression to infinity. The basic and independent source of a thing's unity and the ultimate subject of all predication is substance (ST 1a, 11.1 ad 1).

Substance-accident dualism cannot be appreciated in any epistemology that severs the bond of relatedness between substance and accident and presumes to treat of either as though it were independent of the other. Original knowledge of substance and accident in any explicit way is a simultaneous recognition of the independent-dependent duality found in the things of experience. By a gradual process of increasingly perfected knowledge, the mind comes to know the precise characteristics of substance and of accident in general. Proper knowledge of the specific kind of substance, while varying in its degree of difficulty, corresponds to the perfection of knowledge of its accidents, for these both manifest the substance and are dependent on it.

USES IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

A proper understanding of the nature of accident is of special importance for Catholic theology and doctrine. For example, a sound theological statement of the mystery of human and angelic supernatural participation in the divine life requires the utmost precision regarding the substantial and accidental orders, for only if this distinction is maintained can both the reality of the divine indwelling be preserved and the error of PANTHEISM be avoided. The meaning of created grace as a prerequisite for man's living union with God involves a new mode of accidental existence within man, while preserving intact man's essential humanity and God's transcendent deity.

EUCHARISTIC DOCTRINE

The doctrine most commonly associated with philosophical teaching on substance and accident is that of the EUCHARIST. Of this mystery, the Council of Trent declares: "This Council teaches the true and genuine doctrine about this venerable and divine sacrament of the Eucharist—the doctrine which the Catholic Church has always held and which she will hold until the end of the world, as she has learned it from Christ our Lord himself, from his Apostles, and from the Holy Spirit, who continually brings all truth to her mind. . . . The Council forbids all the faithful of Christ henceforth to believe, teach, or preach anything about the Most Holy Eucharist that is different from what is explained and defined in this present decree" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1635). "If anyone says that the substance of bread and wine remain in the holy sacrament of the Eucharist together with the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ and denies that wonderful and singular change of the whole substance of the bread into the body and the whole substance of the wine into the blood, while only the species of bread and wine remain, a change which the Catholic Church has most fittingly called transubstantiation: let him be anathema" (Denzinger 1652).

Four hundred years after Trent, Pope Pius XII stated in Humani generis (1950): "Some even say that the doctrine of transubstantiation, based on an antiquated philosophical notion of substance, should be so modified that the real presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist be reduced to a kind of symbolism, whereby the consecrated species would be merely efficacious signs of the spiritual presence of Christ . . ." (Denzinger 3891). In 1965 some Catholic theologians continued to question the relevance of the substance-accident dualism for Eucharistic theology. They denied that the Council of Trent used substance as a technical philosophical term and maintained, on the basis of contemporary science, that fundamental changes within a thing, such as bread, are not substantial changes. Further, their argument calls attention to the fact that Trent did not use the term accident but the term species.

In reply, one must distinguish the scientific, the philosophical, and the theological levels involved in this questioning. The critique given for the rejection of substance-accident dualism by contemporary science and by modern philosophy may be taken on face value for purposes of argument. But one may add a further question: What evidence is there that contemporary scientists use the expression SUBSTANTIAL change in the same way as philosophers use it, especially scholastic philosophers whose terminology is a requisite for understanding the statements of the Council of Trent? As Pope Pius XII insisted in Humani generis, "the things that have been composed through common effort by Catholic teachers over the course of the centuries to bring about some understanding of dogma are certainly not based on any such weak foundation. These things are based on principles and notions deduced from a true knowledge of created things. . . . Hence, it is not astonishing that some of these have not only been used by the Ecumenical Councils, but even sanctioned by them, so that it is wrong to depart from them" (Denzinger 3883).

Historical development. The fact is that the Eucharistic teaching of the Council of Trent represents a definitive formulation culminating the gradual growth of the Church's understanding of its traditional belief in the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist. The Fathers of the Church all taught that after the consecration, Christ is truly present and that bread and wine are no longer present. Further statements seeking greater understanding of the mystery were a later development beginning with PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, who in 844 published the first monograph on the Eucharist, De corpore et sanguine Domini. Paschasius raised the problem of the objectivity of the appearances of bread and wine while affirming the real presence of the Body and Blood of Christ. Two centuries later BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, maintaining that his position had the support of the New Testament and the Fathers, taught that the doctrine of the real presence and of substantial conversion is against reason. LANFRANC, in his De corpore et sanguine Domini, replied: "We believe that the earthly substances . . . are converted . . . into the essence of the Lord's body, the species of the things themselves being preserved and certain other qualities." The teaching of Berengarius was condemned by several synods, including those at Paris, Tours, and Rome, and also by the Sixth Council of Rome (1079) at which Pope Gregory VII required that Berengarius profess his belief that "the bread and wine . . . are substantially changed into the true, proper, and life-giving flesh and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Denzinger 700; cf. 690).

From the middle of the 11th century onward, theologians used accident interchangeably for appearances, species, and qualities when dealing with the Eucharistic transformation of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ. The term TRANSUBSTANTIATION was used by ALAN OF LILLE in his Theologicae regulae (c. 1200) to indicate the type of change that is there taking place.

It remained for St. Thomas Aquinas to treat extensively of substance and accident as these relate to the intelligibility of statements concerning the Eucharist. By developing Aristotelian insights on the interdependent, but really distinct, character of substance and accident, and their simultaneous knowability through the natural functioning of the intellect in its dependence on the senses, Aquinas was able to formulate an acceptable accounting of the mystery of transubstantiation. The divine power in and after the consecration, in a manner transcending man's comprehension, sustains the real accidents of bread and wine without their connatural substances. Since the species of bread and wine are the natural objects of the senses and declare to reason the presence of bread and wine, the species serve as a sacramental sign; these require an act of faith in the presence of the Real Food, who is the living Christ physically present beneath the appearances. St. Thomas in his explanation uses the terms accidents and species interchangeably (ST 3a, 75.5).

The formulations of the dogma of the Eucharist as proposed by Trent should thus be understood against the background of their development within the living theology of the Church, which includes not only the work of the great scholastic theologians, but especially other conciliar teachings, such as those of the Councils of Rome, Constance and Florence.

See Also: EUCHARIST (AS SACRAMENT);
SUBSTANCE; ACT; FORM; QUALITY

Bibliography: C. FERRO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:29–38. R. J. DEFERRARI et al., A Lexicon of St. Thomas Aquinas (Washington 1948–53) 1:9–10. R. E. MCCALL, The Reality of Substance (Washington 1956). L. DE RAEYMAEKER, The Philosophy of Being, tr. E. H. ZIEGELMEYER (St. Louis 1954) 195–204. C. A. HART, Thomistic Metaphysics (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1959) 215–239. M. M. SCHEU, The Categories of Being in Aristotle and St. Thomas (Washington 1944). A. J. OSGNIACH, The Analysis of Objects (New York 1938). C. DAVIS, “The Theology of Transubstantiation,” Sophia (Melbourne, Australia, April 1964). H. B. GREEN, “The Eucharistic Presence: Change and/or Signification,” Downside Review, 83 (1965) 32–48. PAUL VI, “Mysterium fidei” (encyclical, Sept. 3, 1965), The Pope Speaks, 10 (1965) 309–328.

[R. E. MC CALL]

ACCOLTI, MICHAEL

Jesuit missionary; b. Conversano, Italy, Jan. 29, 1807; d. San Francisco, Calif., Nov. 7, 1878. Both of his parents were of ancient and noble families. In 1830 he was appointed to the Pontifical Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics in Rome and enrolled for two years. He then entered the Jesuit novitiate of Sant' Andrea in Rome, and was ordained on Sept. 24, 1842, in the Basilica of St. John Lateran. A year later he was assigned to accompany a group of Jesuits led by Pierre DE SMET to work among the Flathead Indians in the Northwest of North America.

Accolti spent several years working in Jesuit missionary stations in Oregon. With the discovery of gold in California by James Marshall on Jan. 24, 1848, the rapid increase in population there made the need for priests imperative. Accordingly, Accolti and a companion, John NOBILI, arrived in San Francisco on Dec. 8, 1849, marking the first return of the Society of Jesus (SJ) to California since its expulsion in 1768 from the lower, or Mexican, part of the area.

Within a few months Accolti was recalled to Oregon as superior of the Jesuits of the Northwest. Because he was convinced of the need to establish the Jesuits permanently in California, he went to Rome in 1853 and secured from the father general, Peter Beckx, a decree (1854) assigning the Jesuit effort in the Oregon country and California to the care of the Italian Jesuit province of Turin. This arrangement ensured a flow of manpower to the missions confided to Accolti. In 1855 he was relieved of his office of superior in Oregon and returned to San Francisco, where he assisted Anthony Maraschi, SJ, to found St. Ignatius College (later University of San Francisco). From 1860 until his death he served alternately in San Francisco and at Santa Clara College (later University).

Bibliography: G. J. GARRAGHAN, Jesuits in the Middle United States, 3 v. (New York 1938). J. W. RIORDAN, The First Half Century of St. Ignatius Church and College (San Francisco 1905).

[J. B. MCGLOIN]

ACCOLTI, PIETRO AND BENEDETTO

Members of a Tuscan family notable for its ecclesiastics and poets.

Pietro, cardinal of Ancona; b. Florence, March 15, 1455; d. Rome, Dec. 12, 1532. In 1505 he was consecrated bishop and received the See of Ancona. Pope Julius II made him a member of the college of cardinals on March 17, 1511. Leo X placed Cardinal Accolti in charge of the papal letters during his pontificate, and in this ca-capacity he drew up Exsurge Domine, which condemned Martin Luther on 41 accounts of heresy. In keeping with the pluralism of the times, Cardinal Accolti held the bishoprics of suburban Albano and Sabina, and the Sees of Maillezais, Arras, Cadiz, and Cremona. In 1524 Clement VII bestowed upon him the archbishopric of Ravenna. The Cardinal resided in Rome during the last years of his life. He was survived by his brother Bernardo (1465–1536), who gained considerable fame as a poet. Because of confusion with respect to the Accolti family in the 15th and early 16th centuries, Pietro has been mistaken for his nephew Benedetto.

Benedetto, cardinal-archbishop of Ravenna, papal secretary; b. Florence, 1497; d. there, Sept. 21, 1549. Benedetto, the son of Michele Accolti, was named cardinal in 1527 by Clement VII. Much of the confusion resulted from the granting of several of the bishoprics held by Pietro to Benedetto upon his uncle's death. Furthermore, Benedetto has also been identified with the 15th century jurist and historian who bears the same name (Benedetto Accolti, 1415–66). Cardinal Benedetto Accolti made his reputation as a poet and defender of papal rights in the early years of the Protestant revolt.

Bibliography: A. POSCH, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65)² 1:104–105. P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 1:270–271. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v.7, 9–12, passim. G. B. PICOTTI, La Giovinezza di Leone X (Milan 1928). G. K. BROWN, Italy and the Reformation to 1550 (Oxford, Eng. 1933). E. P. RODOCANACHI, Histoire de Rome: Le Pontificat de Léon X (Paris 1931).

[J. G. GALLAHER]

ACCUSATION

Accusation, commonly, is the act of charging one with a fault or offense (from the Latin accusare, to call to account).

In moral theology accusation can be either evangelical (CORRECTION, FRATERNAL) or judicial; the latter is the type of accusation considered here. Public officials, who have been appointed for the preservation of the common good, are obliged, more or less gravely, depending on the possibility of injury to the community resulting from silence, to make accusations against those who violate the law. Such officials, if bound by their oath to the fulfillment of their office, are the more gravely obliged. However, such oaths of office are generally understood to impose no graver obligation than is proportionate to the importance of a case and to its bearing on the common good.

Private individuals also may be bound to accuse violators of the law. Every member of society is obliged to come to the aid of the society when peace and order are endangered. There are times when this duty makes it seriously obligatory to accuse criminals. For example, to keep silent when one has information about persons who are a threat to the community's peace can be a grave sin. Duty to oneself or one's family may also indicate an obligation to lodge an accusation against a wrongdoer. Apart from obligations in justice, anyone may be gravely obliged in charity to save another from a grave evil, especially if this can be done without serious inconvenience to self.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (12th ed. Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 2:159.

[J. D. FEARON]

ACEDIA

Acedia, more commonly called sloth through confusion with its most notable effect, is a disgust with the spiritual because of the physical effort involved. If the spiritual good from which acedia recoils has a necessary connection with the divine good, which should be the subject of Christian joy, it can be a sin, and even serious. Moreover, acedia is one of the capital sins, a common distraction from virtue, producing other, even quite distinct, sins.

The word describing this constant human phenomenon is found not only in the Septuagint Bible (e.g., Sir 6:26) but in Greek and Latin pagan authors; etymologists show that the word should not be derived from Latin ac-idus but from the Greek $\alpha\text{-}\kappa\eta\delta\omicron\varsigma$ (not caring). Whatever its possibly Stoic origins may be, the psychology of the temptation received most careful attention from the desert fathers of the fourth century, who discussed it in the context of other evil thoughts as the daemon meridianus (Ps 90:6). Evagrius Ponticus in 383 seems to be the first to have written a description of acedia in his De octo vitiiosis cogitationibus (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 40:1274), obviously drawing more from actual experience than literary antecedents. The loneliness of the hermitage in the barren desert, a body worn out by fasting, and a mind fatigued by long prayers were conditions calculated to bring on the ennui and restlessness that was called acedia. John Cassian faithfully reported this fairly common trouble to the West in his On the Spirit of Acedia (Conferences 10; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 49:359–369). The description of Cassian luxuriates in psychological detail, showing that acedia can express itself not simply in laziness but even in nervous activity. Evagrius, Cassian, and in fact the entire Oriental tradition had spoken of melancholy (λυπή) as a distinct sin though closely connected with acedia. St. Gregory the Great in his commentary of Job (Moralia 31.45; Patrologia Latina 76:620) omitted acedia from his list of principal sins and included only sadness (tristitia). Nevertheless, as later commentators have pointed out, in one respect the more ancient tradition—the use of the word acedia, or its corruption accidia—prevailed. Moreover six “daughter” sins are for the first time explicitly named in connection with this melancholy: malice, rancor, pusillanimity, despair, torpor concerning commandments, and a wandering of the mind around forbidden things. Finally, St. Gregory, or at least the Gregorian pastoral tradition, is responsible for the removal of acedia from its original context in which it was a special temptation for monks, and for viewing it as an interior malaise that expressed itself most frequently in a tardy and slothful performance of religious and other duties (cf., e.g., Rabanus Maurus, De ecclesiastica disciplina, Patrologia Latina, 112:1251–53; Jonas of Orleans, De institutione laicali, Patrologia Latina, 102:245–246; Alcuin, Liber de virtutibus c.32, Patrologia Latina, 101:635; St. Antoninus, Summa theologiae moralis 2.10:933–938).

St. Thomas Aquinas opposed acedia to the joy of charity, and in a precise study demonstrated its sinfulness by showing the evil of sadness over a genuinely good object and likewise the excessiveness of even legitimate sorrow when it impedes the performance of duty. The specificity of acedia St. Thomas sees in its opposition to the divine good as man may participate in it, but the intimate connection of the other virtues with charity permits a wide scope for acedia. Nevertheless, acedia's direct attack on charity's act of rejoicing in the divine good makes it serious matter, although imperfect acts of acedia are found even in the holy. Finally, St. Thomas justified acedia's right to be called capital from its ability to produce other sins. The “daughter” sins associated with acedia in the Gregorian tradition, as well as their proliferation in the encyclopedic effort of St. Isidore (In Deut., Patrologia Latina, 83:366), are ingeniously explained (ST 2a2ae, 35; De malo 11). While the commentators have remained faithful to the Thomistic synthesis, a popular tendency to confuse acedia with its principal external effect, sloth (pigrity), developed. Those aware of more profound interior implications attempted the spiritualization of acedia by “baptizing” it spiritual sloth. This terminology, adapted from St. John of the Cross (Dark Night . . . 1.7), has the disadvantage of making acedia appear to be an exotic sin reserved for the spiritual elite, whereas the tradition and experience show it to be a very common difficulty.

Bibliography: E. VANSTEENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:2026–30.

G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:166–169. For an interesting survey of the development of the idea, A. L. HUXLEY, “Accidie,” in On the Margin (London 1923). E. WAUGH, “Sloth,” in A. WILSON et al., The Seven Deadly Sins, ed. I. FLEMING (New York 1962). A series of five articles by I. COLOSIO in Rivista di ascetica e mistica 2 (1958) 266–287, 495–511; 3 (1959) 185–201, 528–546; 4 (1960) 22–33, 159–169.

[U. VOLL]

ACHARD (AICHARDUS), BL.

Architect; d. c. 1170. From CLAIRVAUX, St. Bernard sent him as architect to several new monasteries. The Romanesque church of HIMMEROD was one of Achard's buildings. Two of his writings as novice master, “On the Seven Deserts” and “On All the Saints,” are extant in manuscript (Montfaucon 1299).

Feast: Sept. 15 (Cistercians).

Bibliography: A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 4:88. P. FOURNIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:306. A. SCHNEIDER, Die Cistercienserabtei Himmerod im Spätmittelalter (Himmerod 1954) 131–132. KONRAD VON EBERBACH, Exordium magnum Cisterciense, ed. B. GRIESSER (Rome 1961).

[A. SCHNEIDER]

ACHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR

Theologian, bishop; b. England, early 12th century; d. Avranches, France, 1171 or 1172. A canon regular of Saint-Victor, Paris, he was its abbot in 1155, succeeding the abbey's first abbot, Gilduin. In 1162 he was consecrated bishop of Avranches. His major treatise, De Trinitate, was known for a long time only through two citations in the Eulogium ad Alexandrum III [N. Häring, ed. Mediaeval Studies 13 (1951) 267 by John of Cornwall (c. 1125 to c. 1199)]. It is preserved in a Padua manuscript [cf. M. T. D'Alverny, Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 21 (1954) 299–306]. Jean Chatilloon has maintained Achard's authorship of the treatise on spiritual psychology entitled De discretione animae, spiritus et mentis, even though Häring, who edited the work, attributes it to Gilbert de la Porrée [Mediaeval Studies 22 (1960) 148–191]. Also extant are 15 of Achard's sermons, now edited by Jean Chatilloon, some of which are really treatises, remarkable for their rich philosophical and theological content, especially Achard's christology and theological anthropology. Two of his letters are published in Patrologia Latina 196, 1381–82.

Bibliography: J. CHÂTILLON, “Achard de Saint-Victor et les controverses Christologiques du 12^e siècle,” Mélanges F. Cavall

era (Toulouse 1948) 317–337; “Les Régions de la dissemblance selon A. de S-V.,” Recherches Augustiniennes 2 (1962) 237–250; “A. de S-V. et le De discretione animae, spiritus et mentis, Archives d’histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 31 (1965). F. BONNARD, Histoire de l’Abbaye royale et de l’ordre des chanoines réguliers de Saint-Victor, 2 v. (Paris 1904–08) 1:120, 144, 203–209. P. DELHAYE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:107. ACHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, Sermons inédits, ed. J. CHÂTILLON (Paris 1970). L’unité de Dieu et la pluralité des créatures (De unitate Dei et pluralitate creaturarum), ed. and tr. E. MARTINEAU, Saint-Lambert des Bois: Franc-Dire, 1987. J. CHÂTILLON, Théologie, spiritualité et métaphysique dans l’œuvre oratoire d’Achard de Saint-Victor: études d’histoire doctrinale précédées d’un essai sur la vie et l’œuvre d’Achard (Paris 1969). “Les régions de la dissemblance et de la ressemblance selon Achard de Saint-Victor,” Recherches augustiniennes, 2 (1962) 237–250.

[J. CHÂTILLON/G. ZINN]

ACHARIUS OF NOYON, ST.

Bishop; d. Nov. 27, c. 640. Though no medieval hagiographer has left a life of St. Acharius (Aigahardus), he is mentioned in several Merovingian sources. He was a monk at LUXEUIL under St. EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL, the successor of St. COLUMBAN. In 626–627 he signed the acts of the synod of Clichy as Aigahardus, Bishop of Tournai-Noyon. Most probably he was responsible for the appointment of St. OMER to the See of Thérouanne by King Dagobert I. He encouraged the missionary activities of St. AMANDUS, who in turn asked Acharius to have Dagobert force the rebellious pagans to receive Baptism. St. Acharius’s successor at Noyon was St. ELIGIUS OF NOYON.

Feast: Nov. 27.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 4:123 (Colomban); 4:695 (Eligius); 5:437 (Amand); 5:755 (Omer). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes 11:923–924.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

ACOLYTE

Historically, an acolyte (i.e., one who follows, a companion) referred to the fourth and highest of the minor orders. The ministry of the acolyte, as well as that of the subdeacon, arose from a division of the ministry of the deacon. The chief duties of the acolyte were to assist the deacon and the priest in liturgical celebrations. As an order instituted by the Church, it was not considered a Sacrament, but a sacramental participating in the order of the deacon. By the motu proprio Ministeria quaedam, dated Aug. 15, 1972, Pope Paul VI suppressed the four minor orders and, as replacement, instituted the ministries of acolyte and lector, both of which are open to qualified laity. Pope Paul VI laid out the responsibilities of an acolyte as follows: “The acolyte is appointed in order to aid the deacon and to minister to the priest” (see Ministeria quaedam, VI). Ministeria quaedam lists the responsibilities of acolytes as follows: (1) to assist at the altar, by aiding the priest or deacon, at the Preparation of the Gifts in Mass, (2) to assist deacons and priests in other liturgical celebrations, (3) to aid in the distribution of communion, where necessary, (4) in extraordinary circumstances, to be entrusted with publicly exposing the Blessed Sacrament for adoration and afterward replacing it, “but not with blessing the people,” and (5) “to the extent needed, take care of instructing other faithful who by temporary appointment assist the priest or deacon in liturgical celebrations by carrying the missal, cross, candles, etc., or by performing other such duties” (ibid.).

Although the minor order of acolyte as a stepping stone to the major orders has been abolished, the 1983 Code of Canon Law requires candidates to the permanent or transitional diaconate to have received the ministries of lector and acolyte (c. 1035 §1). Canon 1035 §2 stipulates that there is to be “an interval of at least six months between the conferral of the ministry of acolyte and the diaconate.”

Altar Servers. The substitution of altar servers for minor clerics dates back more than 1,000 years. In the 9th century at the Synod of Mainz it was decreed that “Every priest should have a cleric or boy (scholarem) to read the epistle or lesson, to answer him at Mass, and with whom he can chant the psalms” (Admonitio Synodalis, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 132:456). For more than 1,000 years, only boys were permitted to be altar servers. The 1983 Code of Canon Law confirms the traditional practice of male altar servers when it permitted qualified lay men to be admitted, among other things, to the ministry of acolyte (Codex iuris canonici [Rome 1918; repr. Graz 1955] c. 230 §1). At the same time, c. 230 §2 states, among other things: “All lay persons can also perform the functions of commentator or cantor, or other functions, according to the norm of law.” By an instruction dated June 30, 1992, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments held that the use of female altar servers was permissible under c. 230 §2. Pope John Paul II confirmed this interpretation on July 11, 1992 [see AAS 86 (1994) 541, Origins 23 (April 28, 1994) 777–779]. The Congregation reminded bishops that boys should remain servers at the altar, since this is a source of vocations to the priesthood.

Bibliography: Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, Study Text III, Ministries in the Church: Commentary on the Apostolic Letters of Pope Paul VI, "Ministeria quaedam" and "Ad pas-cendum" (Washington, D.C. 1974). International Commission on English in the Liturgy, Institution of Readers and Acolytes (Washington, D.C. 1976). Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments, "Instruction on Female Altar Servers," Origins 23 (April 28, 1994) 777–779.

[T. J. RILEY/J. A. GURRIERI/EDS.]

ACOSTA, GABRIEL (URIEL)

Jewish rationalist and religious dissenter; b. Oporto, Portugal, c. 1590; d. Amsterdam, Holland, April 1640. He was called originally Gabriel da Costa, and he himself always used the family name of da Costa, but he is more generally known by its Latinized form of Acosta. He was born into a family of MARRANOS, his father having escaped the stake by accepting Catholicism. However, according to Gabriel's autobiography, his family observed the tenets of the Catholic faith punctiliously. Young Gabriel was reared as a noble; he studied law and prepared himself for an ecclesiastical career. Despite this background he began to doubt the truth of Christian dogma, became increasingly disenchanted, and found no solace in the resolute doctrines of the Catholic Church. Circumstances, however, had compelled Acosta to conceal his theological views, for in 1615, after the death of his father, in order to support his family, he accepted a semiec-clesiastical office as chief treasurer of an abbey, the collegiate church of Oporto. But his spirit became more restless and his conscience more disquieted. Secretly he began to delve into the faith of his ancestors, and the doctrines of Judaism brought repose to his mind. Gabriel then determined to forsake Catholicism and return to Judaism. Cautiously, he conveyed his intention to his mother and brothers, and they too resolved to expose themselves to the great danger of secret emigration and to the perils of an uncertain future. About 1617 the Acosta family arrived in Amsterdam, where they were admitted into the covenant of Abraham and where the baptismal name Gabriel was exchanged for the name Uriel.

Soon, however, it became apparent that in Judaism as well, Uriel's wayward disposition could find no satisfaction. From his readings of the Old Testament he had constructed an ideal of Judaism that clashed sharply with the realities of Jewish life. Liberal Mosaic and prophetic doctrines, he believed, were being discarded for rigid and prosaic ritual and observance, and the religious life of Judaism seemed to be as clogged with petty detail as the Catholic faith that he had abandoned. He had expected that Judaism would resolve for him the puzzles that the Church could not solve and that the rabbis could offer what he could not obtain from his Catholic confessors. Acosta had sacrificed much for his convictions, and he believed he had earned thereby his right to protest and to propagate his views. In a lengthy pamphlet (Proposals against Tradition), which he had written from Hamburg and directed to the Sephardic community of Venice, he challenged and denounced the "offensive" traditional laws and customs, and with arrogant expressions he decried their rabbinic guardians and cavilled at their authority. His revolutionary ideas had aroused a vigorous opposition, and upon his refusal to recant he was promptly placed under the ban at Hamburg and publicly excommunicated at Venice (Aug. 14, 1618).

In the interim he had returned to Amsterdam, where he was held in great contempt and isolated from all human intercourse. This forced severance only served to increase his passion for speculation, and he resolved to publish a work in which he would deny the doctrine of immortality and indicate the "glaring contrasts" between the Bible and rabbinical Judaism. But Acosta's intention was anticipated by his former friend, the physician Samuel da Silva, who in 1623 had published a book in Portuguese entitled A Treatise on the Immortality of the Soul in order to Confute the Ignorance of a Certain Opponent, Who in Delusion Affirms Many Errors. Believing that the opposition had commissioned Da Silva, he hastened to publish his retort (1624), also in Portuguese, An Examination of the Pharisaic Traditions Compared with the Written Laws, and a Reply to the Slanderer Samuel da Silva. He now denied not only the belief in immortality but also the doctrines of the resurrection and of reward and punishment. By denying such concepts he had challenged Christian dogma as well. He was again denounced, arrested, imprisoned for several days, and fined 300 florins, and his work was condemned to the flames. For 15 years (1618–33) Acosta lived as an outcast; unable to bear it any longer, he agreed to recant and to be, as he phrased it, "an ape among apes."

He had submitted not from conviction but from despair, and consequently he became embittered to the point of disbelief in the divine origin of the Bible itself. Word had now gotten out that he dissuaded three Christians from their intention of embracing Judaism, and he was once more placed under the ban. After seven years of total ostracism he succumbed. His tortured spirit now longed for tranquility, and the price required of him this time was severe and cruel. Before huge audiences he was ordered to recite his public penance, was given 39 lashes, and then trampled upon as he lay prostrate upon the threshold of the synagogue. His proud and indomitable spirit had now been broken; with shame and humiliation he arrived home, poured out his feelings in a short autobiographical sketch entitled Exemplar Humanae Vitae (A Specimen of Human Life), and then shot himself. A refutation of the Exemplar was made by Philip Limborch, a Dutch theologian, as an appendix to his Amica collatio cum erudito Judaeo (Gouda 1687; repr. 1847).

Bibliography: S. BERNSTEIN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 1:72–74. F. DE SOLA MONDES, The Jewish Encyclopedia 1:167–68. C. GEBHARDT, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart 5:678–80. J. CANTERA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:113. I. SONNE, “Da Costa Studies,” Jewish Quarterly Review 22 (1932) 247–93. H. H. GRAETZ, History of the Jews, ed. and tr. B. LÖWY, 6 v. (Philadelphia 1945) 5:56–65. J. WHISTON, The Remarkable Life of Uriel Acosta (London 1740).

[N. J. COHEN]

ACOSTA, JOSÉ DE

Philosopher and theologian; b. Medina del Campo, Spain, September or October 1540; d. Salamanca, Feb. 15, 1600. He took vows in the Society of Jesus Sept. 24, 1570. In 1572 he went to Peru, where he was provincial and rector of the Colegio of Lima. He served as theologian of the Third Provincial Council of Lima (1582–83), and participated in the composition and publishing of the books ordered by the council. In 1586 he went to Mexico, where he remained until his return to Spain in May 1587. He was visitor of the provinces of Aragon and Andalusia, and, in 1592, provost of the Casa Profesa of Valladolid. In connection with the convocation of the Fifth Congregation of the Society of Jesus he was in Rome until 1594, engaged in negotiations that caused him difficulties with Father General Claudio Aquaviva. He spent the rest of his life in Spain. In 1597 he was named rector of the Colegio of Salamanca.

Acosta's writings are many and varied, but the following works brought him fame: De natura novi orbis, De procuranda indorum salute (both published Salamanca 1588), and the Historia natural y moral de las Indias (1590; new ed. Mexico City 1962). He translated De natura into Spanish and included it with the Historia as books 1 and 2, so that those two works came to form a single whole.

In the De procuranda Acosta examined the problems of evangelization in America in his day. He discussed the doubts as to the capacity of the Native Americans (book 1), the legality of the employment of force (book 2), the rights and obligations of the civil authority and of the colonists (book 3), the special requisites for being a missionary in America (book 4), the parochial functions of the missions (book 5), and the casuistic difficulty in the administration of the Sacraments to the Native Americans (book 6). This work was the first systematic and complete presentation of the missionary problems provoked by the appearance of a new and unforeseeable pagan world in the midst of the inhabited world. It is noteworthy, also, for the practical and balanced solutions proposed by its author, in contrast to the unfair exaggerations of impassioned men such as Fray Bartolomé de LAS CASAS and Ginés de Sepulveda. The Historia (including the De natura) reflects Acosta's scientific concerns, which were never divorced from his missionary interests. A new entity, America, had appeared within the heart of Christendom, and it was necessary to show that, despite its novelty, it did not mean any derogation of the order God had assigned to nature and the course of history. This was the great task Acosta performed in his Historia. The highly varied subjects are grouped in accordance with the scientific view of reality then current, and thus the author placed the American world within the system of the universe (book 1), the sphere of the world (book 2), the concept of matter (book 3), the hierarchy of living beings (book 4), the idea of man as a spiritual being (book 5) and man as a rational being (book 6), and, finally, within the providential system of history (book 7).

Acosta's two great works represent the ideological culmination of the initial period (16th century) of the religious conquest and the philosophical and scientific conquest of the New World, of the great historical and ontological process of its incorporation into Western culture. For this reason, both works occupy unique positions in early American bibliography and have a historical value that is both irreplaceable and permanent.

[E. O'GORMAN]

ACQUAVIVA

Prominent Neapolitan family, which gave several leading members to the Church.

Giulio, cardinal, of the family of the Duke of Atri; b. Naples, 1546; d. Rome, July 21, 1574. In 1568 he was sent to Spain to settle a controversy between (St.) Charles Borromeo and the governor of Milan, and to offer the pope's condolences to Philip II, recently bereft of his third wife and his son Don Carlos. On May 9, 1570, he was created cardinal deacon of St. Callistus, and later of St. Theodorus, by Pius V, who held him in great esteem and asked for his spiritual assistance at his deathbed.

Ottavio (the elder), cardinal; b. Naples, 1560; d. there, 1612. He was summoned to Rome by Sixtus V, and held various offices under him and his successors. On March 16, 1591, Gregory XIII created him a cardinal and sent him as vice-legate to Campania. Two years later, Clement VIII sent him to Avignon as his representative, a difficult mission because at that time relations were tense between the Church and the neighboring Protestant subjects of Henry IV. The conversion and coronation of this monarch took place while Ottavio was in Avignon. As a tactful and efficient administrator, he reorganized the administration of justice, implementing reforms that lasted until the end of the papal administration. On his return to Rome in March 1597, he was given impressive popular acclaim. Leo XI appointed Ottavio archbishop of Naples in 1605, in which office he distinguished himself by his ability and charity. He sought to alleviate the consequences of the famine of 1607, built two monasteries for the Minorites, and left a few manuscripts, one a commentary on the Summa.

Ottavio (the younger), cardinal; b. Naples, 1608; d. Rome, 1674. As governor of Jesi (1638), Orvieto (1642), and Ancona (1643), he organized the defense of these cities against Parma and the French. Innocent VI summoned him to Rome, where he held various posts. In March 1664 he became cardinal with the title of St. Bartholomew-of-the-Island, and later of St. Cecilia (1668). As a papal legate in Bologna, he led a campaign against outlaws; in 1655 he was host to Christine of Sweden.

Trojano, cardinal; b. Naples, Jan. 24, 1695; d. Rome, March 24, 1747. A vice-legate to Bologna under Clement XI, Trojano was appointed governor of Ancona by Innocent XIII, and master of the Sacred Palace by Benedict XIII. Titular archbishop of Larissa, he was created cardinal of St. Cecilia by Clement XII in 1732. At the request of Philip V he became archbishop of Toledo; in 1739, of Monreale. He was on friendly terms with Charles III, and represented Spain and Naples in the Roman Curia. He favored the reforms of B. Tanucci and negotiated the concordat of 1741, which abolished certain privileges of the clergy, among them, exemption from taxation. He played a major role in the conclave of 1740, which elected Benedict XV. The 1744 edition of Giambattista Vico's Scienze Nuova was dedicated to him.

Bibliography: P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:359–363. L. CARDELLA, Memorie storiche dei cardinali, 9 v. (Rome 1792–97). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61): from 1st German ed. Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters (Freiburg 1885–1933; repr. 1955–) v.17, 18.

[E. J. THOMSON]

ACQUAVIVA, CLAUDIUS

Fifth general of the Jesuits; b. Atri, Sept. 14, 1543; d. Rome, Jan. 31, 1615. He was the youngest son of the Duke of Atri, Giovanni Antonio Donato A. d'Aragona.

Octavo Cardinal Acquaviva, ca. 1612.

He studied jurisprudence in Perugia, entered papal service and was appointed a chamberlain by Pius IV.

On July 22, 1567, he entered the Society of Jesus after learning about it from Francis Borgia and Juan de Polanco. In 1574 he was ordained, and became a professor of philosophy at the Roman College. The next year he was named rector of the Collegium Maximum in Naples. In 1576 he was provincial of the Neapolitan province and three years later, of the Roman province. On Feb. 19, 1581, with 32 of the 57 votes, Acquaviva was elected general of the society; he had the longest term of office to 1664.

His administration was marked by a very sharp increase of the society in Europe and in the missions. The number of members grew from approximately 5,000 to more than 13,000, and colleges, from 144 to 372. To the tasks posed by this expansion, Acquaviva brought a disciplined handling of his office, judged by many to have been too authoritative. He molded the society as no other general had since its founder, Ignatius of Loyola. His chief concern was the maintenance and promotion of religious spirit during this period of rapid growth. In the resultant regimentation that seemed necessary, the individual initiative envisioned by Ignatius was perforce retarded. During Acquaviva's long term, the standardization that had actually begun earlier was conclusively established, e.g., a binding regulation for the daily hour of mental prayer, annual repetition of the Exercises, and a one-year tertianship. Significant is his letter Quis sit orationis et paenitentiae usus of 1590, in which Acquaviva, as did his predecessor Everard Mercurian, takes an open-minded attitude on the question of extent and type of mental prayer and external penitential exercises. Differences of opinion on this point led to a clash with the German assistant and admonitor, Peter Hoffaeus, who subsequently was relieved of his office.

In 1599 the final Directorium for making and conducting the Spiritual Exercises appeared, which, although in use for centuries, is today not considered to correspond completely with the intentions of St. Ignatius. Acquaviva also provided the definitive text of the Ratio Studiorum, which regulated Jesuit learning and higher studies until the society's suppression on Aug. 16, 1773. He issued as well the Industriae . . . ad curandos animae morbos, directed to superiors and reflecting wide experience and genuine piety. Among the many difficulties that tested his brilliant talent for diplomacy and administration were: the movement among Spanish Jesuits toward a national independence which was supported by Phillip II and had an influential advocate in Francesco Toletus, who was elevated to the cardinalate in 1593; the intention of Sixtus V to amend the constitution of the society on very significant points; and the plan of Clement VIII to name Acquaviva archbishop of Naples in order to remove him from control of the society. There were also the controversies on theological questions, such as the doctrine stated by St. Robert Bellarmine on the potestas indirecta of the pope; the debates on grace caused by Luis MOLINA's Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis that led to the CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS; and the doctrine of Juan de Mariana on the murder of tyrannical leaders. Through these difficulties Acquaviva was able to consolidate the society into its ultimate stability with circumspection and tenacity.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890-1931) 1:480-491; 8:1669-70; 12:46-48, 318-319, 910-911. B. SCHNEIDER, Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 26 (1957) 3-56; 27 (1958) 279-306. J. DE GUIBERT, La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus, ed. E. LAMALLE (Rome 1953).

[B. SCHNEIDER]

ACROSTIC

Acrostic is an anglicized Greek word signifying a composition, usually in verse, in which initial (or occasionally middle and final) letters are arranged in such an order as to form words. When middle and final letters are so employed, there is question rather of mesostichs and telestichs respectively. The word type, as well as the alphabetical form of acrostic, is Oriental in origin. The earliest Greek example dates from the beginning of the 2nd century B.C. The word form of acrostic was a characteristic feature of the pagan Sibylline Oracles (see Cicero, Div. 2.54.171-) and other oracular or magico-religious texts. Hence, it was only natural that the Christian Sibylline books should make use of the same device. In book 8, 217-250 (written near the end of the 2nd century A.D.), one finds the well-known acrostic: Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Ὑιὸς Σωτὴρ σταυρὸς (Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior, Cross), which—with the omission of σταυρὸς—furnishes also the widespread acrostic ΙΧΘΥΣ (in Greek, fish, a basic early Christian symbol). The passage from the Sibyllines is presented in Latin translation by St. Augustine (Civ. 18.23) in such a way that the initial letters of each Latin verse reproduce the Greek verse cited—but without the word σταυρὸς—in Latin transliteration. In the Pectorius inscription found near Autun, the initial Greek letters of the first five verses furnish the acrostic ΙΧΘΥΣ also. In keeping with the Oriental background, frequent use of acrostics is noted likewise in Christian Syriac poetry, especially in the hymns of St. Ephrem. Optatianus Porphyrius (first half of 4th century A.D.), Ausonius, and Commodian employed elaborate acrostics, and acrostics became common as a device for indicating the name of the deceased in Christian funeral epigrams, especially the name of a martyr.

The alphabetic acrostic, familiar from the Lamentations of Jeremia and from a number of Psalms, is the obvious source for Christian Greek and Latin acrostics of this kind. St. Hilary of Poitiers has two abecedarian hymns, and St. Augustine made use of this form as a memory aid in his famous Psalmus abecedarius contra partem Donati. The abecedarian hymn (A solis ortus cardine) of Sedulius has become a part of the Christmas liturgy. In the tradition of Optatianus Porphyrius, acrostics were developed to a fantastic degree in the carmina figurata of Rabanus Maurus in the Carolingian age. Acrostics of the earlier and simple form continued to flourish throughout the Middle Ages and have had a sporadic life down to the present time (see PECTORIUS, EPI-TAPH OF).

Bibliography: A. KURFESS and T. KLAUSER, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)-] 1:235-238, an excellent treatment with bibliog. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 1.1:356-372, with full texts and plates. F. DORNSEIFF, Das Alphabet in Mystik und Magie (2d ed. Leipzig 1925) 146-151. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31), Indexes s.v. “Akrosticha.”

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

ACT

Considered analogically and in its own right, act denotes perfection just as POTENCY denotes imperfection. Hence, potency plays a determining, limiting role in relation to act. Thus we say that God is PURE ACT, because He is not limited by any potency, while the created being is a mixture of potency and act. Since act in itself is said to denote perfection, it is not limited except by a principle distinct from itself, namely, potency; wherefore the axiom: actus non limitatur a seipso. Both potency and act should be considered as principles of being, not as beings themselves. It is also important not to confuse potency and act as principles in the structure of being with two successive stages in the development of a being, as when one speaks of being first in potency (in potentia) and then in act (in actu).

Kinds of Act. To make use of the following classification one must be aware of the ontological scope of its application. The notions of potency and act are basically analogical. Hence, what might perfectly fulfill the notion of act from one point of view might be considered as potency from another point of view, at the same time. Thus the form of a being is act in relation to the matter that it actuates, while the essence of that which is composed of matter and form, in its turn, is potency in regard to the esse that actuates it.

Act That Is Neither Received nor Receptive. This is pure act, subsistence act, which is neither received into a limiting potency nor susceptible of receiving an act superior to it.

Act That Is Received but Is Not Receptive. This is substantial existence or esse, limited by essence, that in turn, plays the role of limiting potency in its regard. Esse, as such, is not in its own turn susceptible of receiving an act in the substantial order that would be superior to it. What is composed of essence and esse, however, is said to be ordered to activity as to an accidental act that perfects an individual substance. Operation is also an act in this category, for it perfects the faculty and through it the individual in which it is received and from which it emanates. But it too, in itself and in its own right, is not ordered to a superior act.

Act That Is Receptive but Not Received. The separated form belongs to this classification. It is not received into quantitatively signed matter (signata quantitate), which would otherwise make it some type of individual being, but it does receive an act to which it is ordained and which is its proper substantial esse. An act that is not received, inasmuch as it is pure form, is called “infinite” because it is not limited by matter. Yet it is “finite” in the order of existence since it is not esse subsistens, but has a finite mode of existing. This category of act has the role of being a limited potency to esse.

Act That Is Received and Receptive. This is the category of all forms received into a limiting principle, that in their turn, are ordained to a further act that perfects them. Such, for example, is the form of a composite being received in the limiting matter that it actuates, but that, together with this matter, is ordained to the act of the composite, namely, the substantial esse. The same applies to any accidental form that is act in relation to its subject but is also potency in relation to a superior act that perfects it. An example would be a faculty that perfects an individual but is ordained to operation as to a superior act that in turn perfects the individual.

Pure and Mixed Act. What has been said thus far leads to the distinction between pure act and mixed act (purus and non purus). In itself the first is not received and limited, whereas the second is. Again one must specify the given context in stating whether an act is pure or not. In relation to esse, God alone is Pure Act. In the order of essence, separated forms, that is, beings that are not composed, can be called pure and infinite inasmuch as they are not limited by potency.

First and Second Act. First act is often opposed to second act (actus primus and actus secundus). This usage designates either form or essence in relation to the esse that perfects them, or the individual in relation to the operation that perfects it. That which perfects as an ultimate actualization is called second act.

One can sum up the different kinds of act as follows: (1) MOTION, act of the changeable, (2) substantial or accidental FORM (faculty, HABIT), (3) esse (EXISTENCE) and (4) operation. Each in its own way is act and as such conveys the notion of perfection. Substantial esse and operation are alone, strictly speaking, terminal acts and are not further receptive in their own proper order.

Historical Development. The notion of potency as opposed to act, and as uniquely definable by it, was introduced into philosophy by ARISTOTLE. He first used these notions in the Physics to explain change, which he defined as “the act of that which is in potency, precisely as such” (201a, 10). In the Metaphysics he introduced act and potency as general divisions of being (1045b 34). Here also he arrived at the notion of pure act (1071b, 20).

Scholastic Thought. St. THOMAS AQUINAS applied the notions of potency and act in a context to which Aris-total could not have given thought, that of the real distinction between essence and existence. Here the notions attain a level of ontological profundity never before known (see ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE). Potency and act are also basic to the Thomistic thesis on PARTICIPATION and to the notion of BEING proper to St. Thomas (see below).

With John DUNS SCOTUS one finds an early attempt to introduce an entity, unknown to Aristotle and St. Thomas, intermediate between potency and act, that is, virtual act (actus virtualis). Virtual act is that which without the agency of any extrinsic causality, reduces a being from potency to act. Thus it is the complete power to pass into act by itself; all being that possess it are self-moved. Wherefore, Scotus reasons, the inefficacy of Aristotle's attempt to prove that whatever is moved is moved by another; for Scotus, the fact that motion involves passage from potency to act is no proof of that. For arguments against the virtual act of Scotus, see Sylvester of Ferrara, Comm. in 1 C. gent., Leon. ed., c. 13, p. 35, nn. 6–7. Francisco SUÁREZ rejects the distinction between essence and existence as part of his refusal to use the principle of the limitation of act by potency to prove the real distinction. Suárez admits neither this distinction nor the Thomistic concept of being upon which it is based. Instead he attempts to base the fundamental distinction between God as infinite and creature as finite on the notions of ens a se and ens ab alio. But he does not perceive the ties that unite the thesis of the distinction between ens a se and ens ab alio with the distinction in the Thomistic tradition between pure act and created being that is necessarily composed of potency (essence) and act (existence). Finally, Suárez subscribes to the notion of virtual act, with the consequences inherent in it (confer Disp. Meta., disp. 29, sect. 1, n. 7, ed. Vives, 26:23).

Leibniz and Descartes. Gottfried LEIBNIZ is situated, consciously or not, in the line of Scotus and Suárez inasmuch as he employs the notion of “active force” and replaces the notion of potency with that of “impeded act.” For Leibniz, forces are always active. If they appear to be at rest, it is because their activity is impeded.

René DESCARTES' elimination of the notions of potency and act is part of his deliberate rejection of all ontology. He combines both scientific reasons (for example, the principle of inertia) and philosophical arguments to condemn the principle that whatever is moved is moved by another. His reasoning rests generally on his opposition to the notions of potency and act. In all this there is a conscious rejection, a reflective break with the world of the ancients and the Middle Ages, in which the notions of being, act and potency occupy a central place. The consequences of this break were destined to become immeasurable.

Modern and Contemporary Period. Little by little, the notion of act came to be employed in one of its many senses. The moderns designate activity by it, and more particularly, the free intellectual activity of self-proper to man. The metaphysics of act now becomes subjectivistic, and this phenomenon is realized most characteristically in such philosophies as those of HEGEL or GENTILE. The latter attacks Aristotle, gratuitously at that, for regarding act as static, as an object, whereas it is grasped interiorly by consciousness. Louis LAVELLE shows a different emphasis; while maintaining the interiorization of act, he views act in relation to being, potency and choice, and thus avoids the strictly idealistic viewpoint of Gentile.

Recent Thomism. Since the appearance of Aeterni Patris, there has been a revival of the classic doctrine of potency and act. At the same time, discussions relative to its interpretation, its role in the Thomistic synthesis, its value in itself and its applications have been encouraged. The same can be said for the principle actus non limitatur a seipso and the conclusions that can be drawn from it.

Outside of SCHOLASTICISM, the analogical notions of potency and act have on the whole lost their significance. One cannot, without great equivocation, connect scholastic usage with what contemporary thinkers make of these notions. Regrettable though this may be, it is a fact that must be faced.

Act and Being. The first of all notions is that of being, not of act. Potency and act divide being as such. Also, being is defined as that which is either in potency or in act, and not as that which exists; whence, the definition: ens est id quod habet relationem ad esse sive actualitatis sive possibilitatis. With St. Thomas the notion of being is profoundly “existentialized” by the fact that for him esse is the act of acts, the most profound, intimate and formal element in being. Unless one reverts to “essentialism,” being is inconceivable without this reference to esse. Thus the whole metaphysics of St. Thomas is founded upon the notion of being understood with explicit relation to esse as act. This notion is what enables him to argue to the real distinction of essence and existence in FINITE being.

Act and Participation. The problem of the one and the many is at the heart of metaphysics. As St. Thomas saw it, PARTICIPATION is in turn basic to the solution of the problem of the one and the many. Numerically multiplied and limited beings are possible because they are beings by participation. They are not instances of esse per se subsistens, which is necessarily unique (God), but of esse received into limiting potencies, that is, into essences. The notions of potency and act, Aristotelian in origin, enabled St. Thomas to systematize the doctrine of participation, of Platonic origin, into a conceptualization that is precise and free from equivocation. St. Thomas's stroke of genius consists in having united these two perspectives into a new and irreducible synthesis that profoundly transformed the elements it assimilated, thanks in no small part to his distinctive notion of esse as act.

This notion also gives an essential profundity to his metaphysics of CAUSALITY. For St. Thomas, the efficient cause touches the esse rerum, allowing him to conceive of God as cause of this esse, and even its proper cause. Creatures merely confer esse as secondary causes under God's premotion (see PREMOTION, PHYSICAL). Thus God is not merely a final cause, moving by desire (as was taught by Aristotle), nor merely the first formal and exemplary cause (as for the Platonists). It is in these perspectives that one must locate the secunda via of St. Thomas.

Act and Change. Historically in Aristotle and psychologically in human consciousness, act and potency are linked with the perception of movement and with one's own activity. This includes continuous movement, substantial change and the personal operation that precedes any discovery. To be grasped intelligibly and without contradiction, change presupposes: (1) a point of departure—potency, (2) a point of arrival—act, and (3) the imperfect act (actus imperfectus) between these—essentially act in relation to the prior potency, that of the point of departure and at the same time potency in relation to the perfect act (actus perfectus) at the terminal point of the movement. Wherefore, the classical definition of MOTION as “the act of a being in potency precisely as such.”

See Also: POTENCY AND ACT; POTENCY; ACTION AND PASSION; ENTELECHY; EXISTENCE; FORM; PURE ACT; HUMAN ACT; MOTION; PARTICIPATION.

Bibliography: C. A. HART, Thomistic Metaphysics: An Inquiry into the Act of Existing (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1959). H. REITH, The Metaphysics of St. Thomas Aquinas (Milwaukee 1958). F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Ontology, tr. M. FLYNN (New York 1952). A. FOS-SATI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:464–475. A. SMEETS, Actus en potentie in de Metaphysica van Aristoteles (Conférences d'Histoire et de Philologie ser. 3.49, Louvain 1952). G. MANSER, Das Wesen des Thomismus (Thomistische Studien 5; 3d ed. Fribourg 1949). C. GIACON, Atto e potenza (Brescia 1947). W. N. CLARKE, “The Limitation of Act by Potency,” The New Scholasticism, 26 (1952) 167–194. J. D. ROBERT, “Le Principe: Actus non limitatur nisi per potentiam subjectivam realiter distinctam,” Revue philosophique de Louvain, 47 (1949) 44–70. G. GENTILE, Genesis and Structure of Society, tr. H. S. HARRIS (Urbana 1960). L. LAVELLE, La Dialectique de l'éternel présent: de l'acte (Paris 1946).

[J. D. ROBERT]

ACT, FIRST

As used in theology indicates the universal principle of all actuality, namely, God. Whatever is finite actuality is so because it participates in the infinite actuality of the first act (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 1a, 75.5 ad 1). Creatures can no more act without a positive divine influence than they can begin or continue in existence independently of it. God as the first act is the cause of created action, not only by giving the created agent its form, which is the principle of action, but by conserving that form and its powers, and by concurring in the operations that flow from those powers. Since every reduction of power to operation, whether in the material or spiritual order, is a transition from POTENCY to ACT, effected by something in act, God must be the first act (ST 1a, 2.3).

While God is first act, the acts of creatures as secondary agents, nevertheless, are real, efficacious, and according to their proper forms and powers (ST 1a, 105.5). Since the cause of an action, however, is more the one whose power effects it than the one who acts, God as first act is more the cause of created action than its secondary agents. How God moves the created free will freely, yet efficaciously, so that it acts freely under divine influence, is a problem about which theologians have speculated through the centuries.

See Also: CAUSALITY; CAUSE, FIRST; FREE WILL AND GRACE; PURE ACT

Bibliography: A. GARDEIL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:337–339, Tables générales 1:557–560. J. MÖLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65). T. T. PAINE, H. F. DAVIS et al., A Catholic Dictionary of Theology (London 1962–) 1:23–25.

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN]

ACT OF SETTLEMENT, IRISH

Decisive legislative measure of 1662; it began the reduction of land owned by Irish Catholics from 61 percent in 1641 to 22 percent in 1688 and 15 percent in 1703. Consequently, the Protestant ascendancy dominated Ireland until, after Catholic Emancipation (1829), Daniel O'CONNELL compelled the English government to give equality to Catholics. Socially and economically, the landed system of Ireland remained stereotyped except for the brief Catholic ascendancy under James II, for 200 years, from Oliver CROMWELL until after the famine of the 1840s.

Provisions of the Act. The act, which was passed on July 31, 1662, virtually confirmed the Cromwellian settlement in favor of the adventurers who invested money in the parliamentary war in Ireland and the soldiers who fought against the Catholics and Royalists. Charles II was restored on terms that maintained political power in the hands of the English conquerors in the Irish Civil War (1641–53), except for the regicides. Some initial endeavor was made to be favorable to those Catholics who had supported the king in arms, notably in the king's declaration of Nov. 30, 1660, but in Ireland pressure from the ex-Cromwellians was so great that it diminished the chances of Catholic Restoration in succeeding months. Finally, even those who were made secure by the Act of Settlement were denied justice. The government became alarmed at the Puritan Castle Plot of May 1663 that nearly succeeded in capturing James, Duke of Ormond, the Lord Lieutenant; as a result, before the end of 1665 the Act of Explanation was passed, restricting to some 50 the restoration of Catholics under the preceding act, but also compelling the new Protestant interest to surrender one-third. The Declaration of November 1660 had promised to restore royalist Irish who were "innocent" of rebellion against Charles I, but it also had confirmed to the adventurers all lands possessed by them on May 7, 1659, with provision for deficiencies claimed before the following May. In regard to the soldiers, the lands already assigned to them to compound for wages due, even if only in valuation at 13 in every pound sterling (20), were confirmed, except where it could be established before the following December twelvemonth, that there had been bribery or false admeasurements in allotting their land.

Exceptions involved those regicides and others exempted from pardon by the English Act of Oblivion (1660), the Protestant Church of IRELAND lands, the estates of those opposing the Restoration, and the estates restored to "innocent" owners by decree of the king's courts, although previously set out to adventurers and soldiers. Satisfaction would be given to adventurers and soldiers holding lands when it could be proved that these properly belonged to legal encumbrancers from before Oct. 22, 1641 (the day before the outbreak of the Irish Catholic Rebellion). Provision was to be made, where this had not already been done, for those officers who had served Charles II or his father before June 5, 1649, at a rate comparable to the provision for parliamentary soldiers, but they were to be satisfied with sixpence less on the pound. Protestants were to be restored to their estates where these had been taken from them under the Cromwellian Settlement, and a reprisal of equal value was to be assigned to the adventurers and soldiers who would have to be removed for this purpose. There was to be no benefit for those persons who entered the rebellion before Sept. 15, 1643 (the date of the cessation of hostilities between the Catholic Confederates of Kilkenny and King Charles I, leading to their payment of subsidies and lending of troops to him). Nor was there to be any benefit for those who had taken out decrees in land in Connaught or Clare (under the Cromwellian provision transporting innocent Catholics from their lands east of the Shannon so as to leave the three other provinces for the adventurers and soldiers).

Special provisions in favor of the Earl of Ormond and his wife and the Earl of Inchiquin safeguarded such actions as they had taken in mortgaging their lands. "Innocent papists" who had never acted against the king since Oct. 22, 1641, were to be restored by May 2, 1661 (subsequently extended by a further Act for one year), provided they restored to the king those transplantees' lands to which they had been removed compulsorily in Connaught and Clare. This provision marked them off from those who had voluntarily taken out decrees for Connaught and Clare land, as these were held bound by their own decision. Again "innocent popish inhabitants" of towns, especially of Cork, Youghal, and Kinsale, were not to be restored specifically to their own property, but instead were to be allotted undisposed lands near these towns. Lands set out to persons for money lent for the army in the beginning of the rebellion were to remain disposable for the most deserving.

Lands allotted by the Cromwellians to certain persons, notably George Monck, Duke of Albemarle; Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery; and the orphans of Owen O'Connell, who had revealed the 1641 rising plans, were confirmed. The Declaration provided for a sequence of priorities in accommodating these various interests. Those who had adhered to the articles of peace deserved consideration, but not those who rejected or abandoned them or those who took Connaught certificates, unlike those who served the king's ensigns abroad, some of whom were specifically named for restoration. Many others were also named ("nominees"), but not for immediate restoration.

Enactment. The Declaration of 1660 had provided for action in this order. First, the English who were to be dispossessed were to be settled; then precedence was to be observed in restitution as follows: (1) innocent Protestants and papists without decrees in Connaught and Clare; (2) those with such decrees being innocents; (3) transplanted persons dispossessed hereby of lands decreed in Connaught and Clare; and (4) Irish papists who served the king's ensigns abroad. After these reprisals, the debts for the army before 1649 were to be satisfied. Rents were reserved on lands of every adventurer, soldier, and person settled, restored, or reprised. The Declaration was followed by a commission for its execution on April 30, 1661. Meanwhile, the Catholic position had been worsened by the production at court of the Catholic Confederates' negotiations with Urban VIII in the 1640s, making him their final court of appeal in their disputes with the king. In consequence, the instruction for the execution of the commission discriminated specifically against those who had supported the papal nuncio Giovanni Battista RINUCCINI or who, having opposed him, subsequently sought absolution from excommunication. The act itself, incorporating the Declaration and the commission, was passed only under threat that the government would not pardon activities during the interregnum. Subsequently, the court of claims to determine those who were innocent operated for nine months before the termination of such restorations by the Act of Explanation. An abortive attempt to reopen the question in 1672 by individual royal grants led to parliamentary pressure in England to banish the Catholic clergy. In 1864 a Commission of Grace restored a few others, and the abortive Irish Parliament of James II attempted to repeal the Restoration acts. The Act of Settlement remained a standing grievance with the Catholic aristocracy.

Bibliography: Statutes at Large, Passed in the Parliaments Held in Ireland, 20 v. (2d. ed., Dublin 1786–1801). W. S. MASON, Collation of the Irish Statutes (Trinity College, Dublin, MSS Add. w.8). Calendar of the State Papers Relating to Ireland . . . 625–1670, 8 v. (London 1900–10). Irish Manuscripts Commission, The Civil Survey . . . 1654–1656, 10 v. (Dublin 1931–61). J. G. SIMMS, Williamite Confiscation in Ireland, 1690–1703 (London 1956). W. F. T. BUTLER, Confiscation in Irish History (Dublin-London 1917).

[R. D. EDWARDS]

ACTA APOSTOLICAE SEDIS

The official journal of the Holy See, established in accord with the constitution Promulgandi of St. Pius X, Sept. 29, 1908. Its first issue appeared Jan. 1, 1909, replacing the Acta sanctae sedis which since 1865 had been presenting, on an unofficial basis (until 1904 when it became "official"), the various documents of the Holy See; subsequent issues have generally been issued monthly. The Acta is the exclusive and prescribed means for promulgating the laws of the Holy See, unless otherwise provided. Prior to its establishment in 1908, promulgation was often effected by posting documents at the entrance of the papal residence. According to canon 8, §1 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law, laws come into force only on the expiry of three months from the date appearing on the particular issue of the Acta, unless because of the nature of the case they bind at once (for instance, if the law involves a substantial matter of faith or declares the divine law), or if a shorter or a longer interval has been specifically and expressly prescribed in the law itself (as was the case with the Code of Canon Law, which went into effect on Nov. 27, 1983, some ten months after promulgation). Not all laws of the Church are published in the Acta (for instance, many liturgical documents are issued elsewhere), nor is every published document a law requiring promulgation (for instance, various allocutions of the pope). Although the official language is Latin, more and more of the documents are published in the language in which they were first given. In general, its contents consist of documents and addresses of the Holy Father; decrees and decisions of the various departments of the Roman Curia, a diary of the Curia, a list of officials appointed or honored by the Holy See, and a necrology of bishops.

Bibliography: R. P. MCBRIEN, ed., Encyclopedia of Catholicism (San Francisco 1995). E. MAGNIN, "Acta Sanctae Sedis, Acta Apostolicae Sedis," R. NAZ, ed., Dictionnaire de Droit canonique (Paris 1935), I, col. 158. Annuario Pontificio 2000 (Città del Vaticano 2000) 1934–35.

[F. G. MORRISSEY]

ACTION AND PASSION

Two of the ten Aristotelian CATEGORIES OF BEING; ποιεῖν and πάσχει in Greek, actio and passio in scholastic Latin. The history of these concepts reveals a shift of emphasis between ARISTOTLE himself and modern Aristotelians. In Aristotle, action and passion are uniformly taken for granted. The Categories—presumably because action and passion are assumed to be obvious—merely give examples, "to lance," "to cauterize," "to be lanced," "to be cauterized" (2a, 3). The Physics is concerned directly with questions about motion, and detailed consideration of action is given only because of a difficulty based on the reality of action (202a, 16; 202b 22). The same is true in the Metaphysics, where the difficulty is based on the actuality of action (1050a, 30). Among the Greek and Latin commentators as well as in St. THOMAS AQUINAS there is no dissent with respect to Aristotle's answer to these difficulties, that action is in the "patient" or recipient of the action. However, St. Thomas does give an occasion for later controversies by devoting a separate, formal consideration to action as being in the patient (In 3 phys. 5), and by making incidental statements that seem to contradict Aristotle's opinion (for example, C. gent. 2.9; De pot. 7.9 ad 7, 7.10 ad 1, 8.2). These apparent contradictions escaped early Thomistic commentators and it was left to T. de VIO CAJETAN to uncover the latent difficulty—though, curiously enough, even this discovery was not based on the difficult texts (In Summa Theologiae 1a, 25.1). After Cajetan, the shift in emphasis of the discussion was complete and the focus then shifted to various theories with respect to the subject of inherence of action considered as an ACCIDENT.

This brief history omits the opinion of John DUNS SCOTUS (Oxon. 4.13.1) and the Scotists, who, considering action as an extrinsic relation to the patient, maintained against Aristotle that action is in the agent.

Definitions. Action and passion, in this context, are limited to the sphere of physical or predicamental action. Predicamental action, which constitutes the category of action, is regularly distinguished from “immanent action,” which belongs to one of the species of QUALITY. The former is often called “transient” (or “transitive”) action, since it affects something outside the AGENT because of its nature, whereas immanent action perfects the agent itself. In general, predicamental or transient action has the meaning of physical activity—any activity that because of its nature brings about some change or MOTION in another body. Thus, pushing, striking, painting, and even feeding are transient actions; knowing, willing and feeling, on the other hand, are not (St. Thomas, C. gent. 1.100; In 9 meta. 8.1862–65; etc.).

In the older Aristotelian tradition (with the exception of the Scotists), it was generally accepted that Aristotle meant this predicamental action, when he said that the action is in the patient. His argument is straightforward: “A thing is capable of causing motion because it can do this, it is a mover because it actually does it. But it is only on the movable that it is capable of acting. Hence there is a single actuality of both” (Phys. 202a, 16–19). The conclusion is stated clearly in the Metaphysics in terms of a concrete example: “The act of building is in the thing being built” (1050a, 30).

Passion, in this understanding, is simply the reception of the single actuality, motion-action. The sole reality in all three—motion, action and passion—is the motion itself, though each is distinct from the others in definition (In 3 phys. 5.7, 5.10). Accordingly, in this straightforward view, action is defined simply as “motion from an agent”; passion, as “motion [received from an agent] in a patient.”

It is clear that this doctrine has a direct bearing on the Aristotelian notion of EFFICIENT CAUSALITY. An agent, according to St. Thomas, is denominated such, precisely because of its effect on the patient (In 3 phys. 5.15). It would also seem clear that such a notion, of the agents’ being determined from the effects they produce, could be of service in responding to difficulties raised by D. HUME against the perception of CAUSALITY in the physical order.

Subject of Predicamental Action. The straightforwardness of Aristotle’s view about the subject of inherence of predicamental action, is lost in controversies after the time of Cajetan. Cajetan did not deny Aristotle’s single actuality of action and motion, nor did he deny that this actuality is in the patient; but he added a second actuality—the perfecting of the agent whereby it actually comes to affect something else—to it and it is this, he claims, that is essential to action as a category and is subjected in the agent (In ST, 1a, 25.1). This subtlety, distinguishing two actualities with respect to action, one in the patient and one in the agent, led to a new definition of action as “the second act by which an agent is rendered actually causing” [as opposed to first act, in which it is only a potential agent; see F. SUÁREZ, Disp. meta. 48.1.15–20 (Vivès, 26:872–873); JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Nat. phil. 1.14.3–4 (Curs. phil. 2:304–305, 310)].

In the aftermath of Cajetan’s formulation, three well-defined schools of thought have developed relative to the subject of inherence of transient action: (1) many Thomists (for example, FERRARIENSIS, F. Suárez and P. FONSECA) continued to maintain the older view, that action is in the patient and the view still has its proponents (T. S. McDermott); (2) at the opposite pole, some Thomists [for example, J. P. Nazarius (1555–1646) and S. MAURUS], followed the lead of Cajetan, holding that action in the true sense is not in the patient but in the agent and again the view has contemporary proponents (J. Gredt, Elementa philosophiae 1.281); (3) finally, John of St. Thomas developed an intermediate position, maintaining that action is both in the agent and the patient, though in different senses, a view that also has present-day proponents (W. D. Kane).

Arguments can be proposed both for and against each of these positions, as follows.

Action Is in the Patient. Two arguments are presented in favor of this position. The first is based on the authority of Aristotle and maintains that the doctrine that action is in the patient, was universally held (with the exception of the Scotists) up to the time of Cajetan. Aside from the slighting of the Scotist position, this argument has little force apart from its further doctrinal justification; it can easily be countered, as is implicitly done by Cajetan: the traditional doctrine is not denied, but only complemented by a further consideration that is not touched on explicitly by the older tradition (In ST 1a, 25.1.6).

The formal argument in favor of action as in the patient is more cogent. In one form or another, it usually recapitulates the argument of Aristotle: since the whole reality of action is motion as from an agent (it is defined as motus ab agente), it follows that action will be found where motion is found. Therefore, since it is solid Aristotelian doctrine that motion is in its subject and not in the agent, action also must be in the subject (now denominated “patient,” as receiving motion from the agent). The counterargument proposed against this is that this action is not denied, but it is not the essential constituent of predicamental action. Such a counterargument is not convincing in every way, if only because it is precisely this notion of action in the patient that St. Thomas uses to establish action in his derivation of the categories (In 3 phys. 5.15).

Action Is in the Agent. The first argument in favor of this view, proposed by Cajetan, is based on a difficulty in theology. All the divine perfections are in reality identified with the divine essence. If, therefore, the perfection of an agent is in the patient, it is difficult to see how the action of God producing effects in creatures without the intermediate cause can be identified with the divine essence. If, on the contrary, action is taken to be the perfection of the agent as actually causing it, the difficulty vanishes. It is hard to see this as a serious difficulty; the question here is clearly one of an action properly immanent and only virtually transient.

What then of the argument occasioned by this difficulty? It states that, because action is the perfection of the agent as actually (and no longer only potentially) causing it, it must be in the agent. Confirmation is sought from St. Thomas's statement that action is the actualization of a power (actualitas virtutis—ST 1a, 54.1).

As opposed to this it can be argued that: (1) the distinction between immanent and transient action cannot be adequately sustained in such a formulation; (2) St. Thomas finds no difficulty in placing the perfection of a power in its affecting something outside itself—he does precisely this, in fact, in order to distinguish transient from immanent action (In 9 meta. 8.1864); and (3) in Aristotelian doctrine the primary type of motion is local motion. In such motion it is difficult to see what added perfection a moving body would acquire by moving another body in a collision—obviously a most important case of the action of a physical agent.

Action Is in Both the Agent and the Patient. To this formulation is usually added: in the agent “inchoatively,” in the patient “formally and terminatively [consummative].” Before arguments can be proposed in favor of this position, the very terms in which it is stated must be clarified.

John of St. Thomas, the chief proponent of this view, explains the term “inchoatively” in two ways. First he says that it means “after the manner of an emanation” (though obviously he does not mean this to exclude a secondary aspect of inherence in a subject). Then he shows how it is possible for something to be in two subjects at once, provided that it is formally or simpliciter in only one, by appeal to the way in which a virtue can be in the will as imperating and yet at the same time be formally in the sense appetites (ST 1a, 2ae, 50.3; 56.2).

The terms “formally and terminatively” are then clear from the preceding account: action receives its ultimate formality in producing its effect in the patient, and this formality lies in the completing of the emanation from the agent in the patient.

In defending this position, John of St. Thomas feels that the principal burden falls on the defenders of action as only in the patient, to explain away the apparently contrary texts in St. Thomas and to show that an aspect in the agent is unnecessary. (He feels that the position of those holding for action in the agent need not lead them to deny that it is also in the patient, but only to affirm that it is in some way in the agent.) His refutations of arguments in favor of action as only in the patient can be reduced to a distinction between “action-as-effected” and “action-as-effecting,” and he is forced to say that both Aristotle and St. Thomas, in the majority of texts, wished to lay such stress on the terminative and formal aspect that they passed over the inchoative or emanational aspect [Nat. phil. 1.14.3–4 (Curs. phil. 2:304–314)]. Such an argument seems odd for a professed Aristotelian and Thomist, and this aspect of the whole position can be countered by the same arguments proposed earlier against action as in the agent.

A Simpler Position. Finally, against all three positions adopted after the time of Cajetan, it can be objected that they are needlessly subtle and are based on a false notion of what is required to constitute a category (P. Hoenen, 237–247). This view has much to recommend it, both in its simplicity and its return to the traditional view. However, it must explain away the difficulties in St. Thomas's texts if it is to be completely successful as a Thomistic interpretation. In summary, this explanation runs as follows: For St. Thomas and the earlier scholastics in general, a purely extrinsic denomination—without any intrinsic form as foundation—was sufficient to establish the last six categories, and St. Thomas is explicit in affirming that action and passion are based on extrinsic denomination and not on any intrinsic form. Nevertheless, it is still the agent that is denominated by this extrinsic reality, and it is this aspect—the agent as denominated from its effect and as subject of predication—that is referred to whenever St. Thomas refers to action as in the agent (Hoenen, 245–246).

Importance. Whether in its simple or in its subtle form, this question has an important bearing on several areas of scholastic philosophy. One aspect, in the defense of a realistic view of causality against Hume, has already been touched upon. In addition, the theory has an important bearing on the proofs for the existence of God as an unmoved mover and on the way in which free agents move and are moved by God (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF). Further, the doctrine is of supreme importance both in explaining the difference between physical action, the acts of knowledge and affectivity, and in explaining the interaction of soul and body, knower and known, in psychology.

See Also: ACTION AT A DISTANCE.

Bibliography: P. H. J. HOENEN, Cosmologia (5th ed. Rome 1956). T. S. MCDERMOTT, "The Subject of Predicamental Action," Thomist, 23 (1960) 189–210. W. D. KANE, "The Subject of Predicamental Action according to John of St. Thomas," ibid. 22 (1959) 366–388. J. A. MCWILLIAMS, "Action Does Not Change the Agent," Philosophical Studies in Honor of the Very Rev. Ignatius Smith, ed. J. K. RYAN (Westminster, Md. 1952) 208–221.

[P. R. DURBIN]

ACTION AT A DISTANCE

The action of one material body on another across empty space, i.e., without mutual contact or without the presence of a third body or medium that is in contact with both. Whether such action is possible or not is discussed by both philosophers and scientists. The more common answer is that such action is impossible on both philosophical and empirical grounds; agreement is not unanimous largely because of differences over what is meant by "action," "matter" or "material," and "empty space" (see ACTION AND PASSION; MATTER). The possibility of a spirit's exercising influence upon a material body is not in question because the notions of action, distance, and contact—derived as they are from material and extended being—do not apply to a spirit except in an analogical sense. Two reasons are usually adduced for the necessity of mutual contact or for the presence of an intermediate body: first, to make it possible to speak of localization and distance; and second, to make possible the action of the AGENT upon the receiving subject. The present article discusses only the second reason, the first being treated elsewhere. [see PLACE; LOCATION (UBI)].

Various Positions. Among the philosophical proponents of the possibility of action at a distance are usually enumerated dynamists such as I. Kant (1724–1804), with his concept of attractive forces (Anziehungskräfte), R. Boscovich (1711–87), and I. J. J. Carbonnelle (1829–89); and various philosophers of science or of nature, including B. Bolzano (1781–1848), R. H. LOTZE (1817–81), K. Gutberlet (1837–1928), and J. Schwertschläger (1853–1924). Chief among those who oppose the possibility are the early Greek philosophers—particularly the atomists, the pre-Socratic cosmologists, and the Hippocratic medical writers—and 17th-century

Cartesians and mechanists. Similar opposition stems from Aristotle, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and most medieval and scholastic thinkers, all of whom reject the possibility on metaphysical grounds.

The founders of modern science were against action at a distance, generally because of the atomist and mechanist suppositions that underlay their thought. Supporters for the concept of such action first arose from the Newtonian theory of gravitation, although Newton himself opposed it. The express formulation of the concept came in the 19th century with various interpretations of the experimental work of A. M. Ampère (1775–1836) and Michael Faraday (1791–1867), and the mathematical theories of J. C. Maxwell (1831–79) and H. R. Hertz (1857–94). At the end of the century, the failure of the Michelson-Morley experiment to detect an ether gave further support to the concept. More recent thinkers variously accept the possibility because of the purely mathematical way in which they interpret field concepts, or reject it because of a realist commitment to fields as existent entities, or regard it as a pseudo-problem because of a positivist view of modern science in its entirety.

Metaphysical Impossibility. The various arguments for the metaphysical impossibility of action at a distance may be summarized as follows: (1) action requires the presence of an agent; (2) contact is necessary for the exercise of influence; (3) action, as an ACCIDENT of both agent and recipient, requires that both be present in the same place; (4) cause and effect must be together; and (5) the actual dependence of the recipient upon the agent requires local contact. Since a number of these arguments are considered elsewhere (see ACTION AND PASSION; CAUSALITY; MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF), only the last is explained here. The argument may be formulated in the following terms.

The action of one subject upon another requires that the recipient be dependent upon the agent in such a way that it be able to receive the agent's action. Where material bodies are involved, however, such dependence is possible only when there is local contact between agent and recipient. Therefore, action at a distance is impossible.

The major premise is universally true of action in general, even that of a spirit upon matter. The mere existence of two subjects is not sufficient for one to act upon the other, but a certain conditioning of the one for the other is required and this conditioning is prior in nature to the action itself.

In order for such mutual conditioning to occur, as stated in the minor premise, the agent and recipient must form one system in a material sense, i.e., one corporeal system with internal local relations. But such a system can be obtained only through local contact, and this either immediately or mediately, i.e., through a material medium that is again in immediate contact with both agent and recipient. If such contact does not exist, the bodies cannot influence one another. Moreover, while an inactive medium can register place and relative direction, it cannot determine an event that originates from one body and influences another at a particular time and with a particular intensity. Thus, when a medium is involved, it must play both an active and a passive role in the bodily interaction.

This argument is metaphysical in the sense that it presupposes the validity of such concepts as action, being, and causality, all of which are verifiable in ordinary experience without recourse to the experimental and conceptual developments of modern science. Those who reject metaphysics, of course, do not subscribe to an argumentation of this type (see METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF).

Physical Arguments. Physical proofs of the impossibility of action at a distance attempt to show that, as a matter of fact, such action does not take place in the physical universe. For this purpose, one may classify actions as either chemical, or mechanical, or those involving some type of field interaction. Regarding chemical activity, it seems generally agreed that chemical interaction occurs only if reagents are brought into contact, and thus there is no action at a distance. Again, if physical action is transmitted mechanically, either by streams of particles or by collision of macroscopic bodies, there is no action at a distance. This leaves only actions associated with field concepts—among which may be enumerated electricity, magnetism, electromagnetism, gravity, and nuclear and other forces—for detailed discussion.

One characteristic of such actions is their dependence upon the distance between agent and recipient, as, for example, the magnitude of the gravitational force between bodies being inversely proportional to the square of their distance. Again, in the case of the electric and magnetic phenomena, intermediary bodies can exercise influence, as in shielding effects. Moreover, such actions are propagated with a finite velocity, and the implied dependence on space and time is incompatible with action at a distance. Yet again, the existence of standing waves and of radiation quanta cannot be explained solely in terms of empty space. Finally, a field theory itself is opposed to the concept of action at a distance. Fields have properties that differ from point to point and that are describable in terms of potentials; they also contain a definite amount of energy. Thus they function as operational media and have a degree of reality corresponding to the action they transmit. Whatever phenomena urge scientists to admit the action of a field also urge the acceptance of a medium that supports such activity.

Such arguments, while not absolutely conclusive, argue strongly against the hypothesis of action at a distance.

Bibliography: P. H. VAN LAER, Actio in distans en aether (Utrecht 1947); Philosophico-scientific Problems, tr. H. J. KOREN (Pittsburgh 1953). M. B. HESSE, "Action at a Distance," The Concept of Matter, ed. E. MCMULLIN (Notre Dame, Ind. 1963) 372–90; Forces and Fields: The Concepts of Action at a Distance in the History of Physics (New York 1962).

[W. A. WALLACE]

ACTION FRANÇAISE

Action Française (A.F.) is the name of a political league and its journal that attempted, during the first four decades of the 20th century, to reestablish the monarchy in France.

Program and Influence. A first committee of A.F. was born in 1898 during the Dreyfus affair. It was transformed in 1905 into a league of A.F., which proposed to combat every republican regime and to re-establish the monarchy. It edited a biweekly periodical, called L'Action française. (1899–), and in 1908 launched a daily newspaper, with the same name. An institute of A.F. took charge of doctrinal propaganda. Charles MAURRAS was the unquestioned head and the theorist of the movement, which counted several other very talented leaders, such as Léon DAUDET, Henri VAUGEOIS, and Jacques BAINVILLE.

A.F. was never a mass movement, and played only a minor legislative role, although Daudet was for a time elected a deputy, but its intellectual influence was considerable, especially among Catholics. Although its principal directors were atheists, they believed that if French society was to prosper as it had in the past, it must return to both the political form and the religious practice of earlier times. The Church quickly became disturbed by the organization's influence over a section of the French clergy and faithful. Its journal taught that political laws proceed from experience, and that the national interest has an absolute primacy in moral matters. Its young partisans grouped under the name "camelots," and swore to promote royalist restoration by any means whatsoever. In brief, it was a political school whose concepts derived from a naturalist view of man, society, and religion; and this intellectual outlook obliterated the moral sense of its members in their concepts of foreign and domestic politics.

Attitude of the Church. Because of the complaints of French bishops, the Holy Office prepared a prohibition of seven books by Maurras, and the periodical, but not the newspaper, of the movement (Jan. 26, 1914). However, A.F.'s combat against anticlerical republicans and its struggle for a conservative type of Catholicism then in favor at the Vatican produced interventions in its favor at Rome. As a result, Pius X (1903–14) suspended publication of the decree. Benedict XV (1914–22) adopted the same attitude because of World War I. Pius XI (1922–39) received new complaints as a result of an investigation that revealed the extraordinary ascendancy of the movement over Belgian youth, and asked Cardinal Andrieu, Archbishop of Bordeaux, to publish a letter of disapproval, which appeared on Aug. 25, 1926, and received papal approbation. The Osservatore Romano printed articles on this subject to which A.F. replied violently, branding the editors a “small band of demoniacal agents,” and pretending in an article entitled “Non possumus” that treason and parricide were being asked of it. A decree of the Holy Office (Dec. 29, 1926) published the text of the 1914 condemnation, and added to it, with the ratification of Pius XI, the newspaper L'Action française “as it is published today” because of articles written “these recent days especially . . . namely by Charles Maurras and Léon Daudet, articles which every sensible man is obliged to recognize as written against the Holy Apostolic See and the Roman Pontiff himself.”

Reacting with fury, A.F. vilified the Osservatore Romano as “Diffamatore Romano,” and “an infamous rag”; resurrected all the familiar specters of anticlericalism, such as Galileo, St. Bartholomew's Massacre, Alexander VI, and the Borgias; and accused the pope of being the victim of a plot to restore the Holy Roman Germanic Empire. This led Bishop Ruch of Strasbourg to classify L'Action française the most anti-clerical newspaper in France.

Subsequent to the condemnation of Dec. 29, 1926, the Holy See published other documents that fixed the manner of treating the unsubmissive. Priests were forbidden to administer the Sacraments to them and were threatened with canonical sanctions if disobedient. Marriages of the rebellious were merely to be blessed in the sacristy, like mixed marriages. Dying rebels must make honorable amends or be deprived of the last rites, and go to their graves without the Church's prayers.

Several French bishops remained sympathetic to A.F., and at first refrained from commenting on the Roman condemnation or made very fine distinctions in their observations. Undoubtedly at the Holy See's demand, a long declaration appeared with 116 episcopal signatures (Mar. 8, 1927), but without the names of three bishops. One of these was later regarded by the Holy See as having resigned. Sanctions were taken against important ecclesiastics, such as Cardinal BILLOT, who was removed from the Sacred College and went to finish his days at the Jesuit novitiate in Gallora. Priests suspected of favoring the movement were gradually removed from influential posts, especially those dealing with young people. Jacques Maritain, in collaboration with P. Doncoeur and four other ecclesiastics, published a book defending the Holy See, Pourquoi Rome a parlé (1927). Maurice Pujo replied to it in a series of articles later gathered in book form as Comment Rome est trompé (1929), which drew from V. Bernadot and five authors the reply Clairvoyance de Rome (1929). Some bishops closed their eyes, but others applied the sanctions rigorously. Many cases gained notoriety and with the passage of time contributed to building hopes for a gradual appeasement of the affair. Some interventions occurred in Rome. Maurras wrote to Pius XI (January 1937), and received a reply. He then wrote two more letters to the Pope. Their correspondence made it clear, however, that their viewpoints remained irreconcilable.

The pontificate of Pius XII (1939–58) opened new perspectives. After long negotiations, the directive committee of A.F. sent a letter to the pope expressing their sincerest sorrow for anything in their polemics and controversies that had been injurious and even unjust. The Catholics on the committee rejected all their erroneous writings and every precept and theory contrary to Catholic teachings. Pius XII had not demanded the type of retraction required by his predecessor, but the text signed by the committee constituted an implicit retraction since it admitted that the prohibition's motives were just.

The Holy See triumphed in the end, for Catholic youths ceased joining the movement. Its defeat became more evident when the Duke of Guise, pretender to the throne, disassociated himself from A.F. (Nov. 1937). In 1944 the liberation government forbade the publication of L'Action française because of its attitude during World War II.

Bibliography: N. FONTAINE, Saint-Siège: Action française et catholiques intégraux (Paris 1928). D. GWYNN, The “Action Française” Condemnation (London 1928). L. WARD, The Condemnation of the Action Française (London 1928). J. BRUGERETTE, Le Prêtre français et la société contemporaine, 3 v. (Paris 1933–38) v.3. Dansette 2. S. M. OSGOOD, French Royalism under the Third and Fourth Republics (The Hague 1960). E. J. WEBER, Action Française (Stanford 1962). E. R. TANNENBAUM, The Action Française (New York 1962). H. DANIEL-ROPS, L'Église des révolutions: Un Combat pour Dieu, 1870–1939 (Histoire de l'Église du Christ 6.2; Paris 1963). J. GRISAR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (Freiburg 1930–38) 1:71–74. H. DU PASSAGE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:116–117.

[A. DANSETTE]

ACTIVE LIFE, SPIRITUAL

A life of external activity as opposed to contemplation. In the third century, Origen identified the active life with Martha and the contemplative life with her sister Mary. Before the Christian era the Greeks had differentiated the theoretical life from the practical life. The practical life was that which busied itself with the affairs of the family or the city. St. Paul used the Greek word "askein" to express the practical matter of working out one's salvation, of striving for perfection or making a spiritual effort to purify one's conscience in the sight of God. Gradually this word acquired the meaning of an exercise of the spiritual faculties in the acquisition of the virtues of learning, or exercise, in a physical sense. St. Paul often made reference to the efforts of athletes in the games when urging his Christians to the practice of perfection.

Origen was again the first to apply the word "ascetic" to Christians who practiced virginity and devoted themselves to works of mortification. With St. Augustine, the term active life became almost synonymous with ascetical striving, by making it consist of the practice of virtues, as apart from contemplation of truth. St. Gregory the Great, seconded this doctrine by identifying the active life with the practice of the corporal works of mercy, and to some extent the spiritual works and this tradition persisted through St. Thomas and Suárez.

The active life reaches a new plane when it concerns itself with the care of souls. From the time of Augustine authors point out that bishops, to whom the care of souls properly belongs, lead the active life in its fullest sense, as well as the contemplative life, since all their activity must be richly impregnated with contemplation. It follows that those who are not bishops lead the active life more fully, the more they participate in the care of souls, a work that is proper to bishops. That is why St. Thomas can rank those religious orders whose concern is to give to others the fruit of their contemplation in the first place. Historically, religious orders, at the beginning, were concerned only with the perfection of their own members. Gradually, the needs of souls forced them into the apostolate proper to bishops. Religious orders, such as the Franciscans and Dominicans in the 13th century, were founded with a view of doing the work that bishops could no longer handle alone. The revolutionary Society of Jesus (1540), which set the pattern for many of the more modern religious institutes, moved into whatever area was necessary for the good of souls, whether it was the corporal and spiritual works of mercy, or preaching and the administration of the Sacraments. In modern times, the next logical step was taken by the participation of the laity in the apostolate of the hierarchy, or what is known as Catholic Action, a way of living the active life of the spirit while remaining in the world.

The secret of the successful practice of the active life is charity in action. As St. Thomas teaches, charity is the root of merit. Affective charity, consisting in internal acts of the love of God is common to both the active and the contemplative lives, and must be made effective in the external worship of God in the contemplative life. St. Augustine says that it is "only the compulsion of charity that shoulders necessary activity" (Civ. 19.19). Affective charity is the real measure of perfection, but is itself best gauged by this effective charity of good works. Effective charity means carrying out God's commands. The whole purpose of the active life is to attain union with God by service to the neighbor, whom God has commanded us to love. One leading the active life does not so much leave God for God, as the popular phrase puts it, but finds God always and everywhere in activity done for the love of God.

Obviously the term "active life" is an analogous term. In a non-spiritual sense it would be the opposite of quiet. In a spiritual sense it is ambiguous, for it can either mean the opposite of the contemplative life or the life that flows from contemplation. When used in the context of the spiritual as a univocal term, it usually refers to the life of virtue, the pursuit of virtue, the life of the corporal and spiritual works of mercy, and all those things that are indirectly connected with charity.

Bibliography: E. C. BUTLER, Western Mysticism (2d ed. London 1927). P. T. CAMELOT and I. MENNESSIER, "The Active Life and the Contemplative Life," The Virtues and States of Life, ed. A. M. HENRY, tr. R. J. OLSON and G. T. LENNON (Theology Library 4; Chicago 1957) 645-683. J. DE GUIBERT, The Theology of the Spiritual Life, tr. P. BARRETT (New York 1953). E. CORETH, "Contemplative in Action," Theology Digest, 3 (1955) 37-45.

[J. F. CONWELL]

ACTIVISM

A teaching or orientation that emphasizes action in contradistinction to passivity. Thus, in a learning situation, the functionalism advocated by John Dewey or the method of teaching children promoted by Maria MONTESORI is sometimes called activism. As a philosophic notion, it is opposed to intellectualism and gives precedence to practice and activity over theory. In this sense contemporary EXISTENTIALISM can be called activism in that it repudiates speculation in favor of action.

However, in Catholic circles, particularly in the U.S., it has come to denote an excessive activity of the apostolate that is detrimental to the spiritual life, especially in religious orders and congregations: exterior work of the apostolate absorbs the interest of the one engaged in it to the extent that his interior life suffers as a consequence.

It is also referred to as naturalism. Although such activism is not a formal doctrine, but rather a tendency of human nature, it is sometimes called the “heresy of action” and may be said in a general way to have a spirit opposed to the QUIETISM promoted by Miguel de MOLINOS and condemned by Innocent XI in 1687 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 2201–69).

Activism should not be confused with the salutary work of the apostolate performed with the proper spiritual motives. Far from being an obstacle to spiritual growth, the giving of oneself in the service of others out of charity fosters the interior life of the soul. Activism, therefore, should not be equated with activity or a multiplicity of works. In its modern connotation, it has reference only to spiritual activity prompted by an indiscreet zeal and lacking a spiritual foundation. In the encyclical Menti nostrae Pius XII refers to it as “that kind of activity which is not based on divine grace and does not make constant use of the aids provided by Jesus Christ for the attainment of holiness” [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 42 (1950) 677].

Safeguards against activism include proper spiritual formation, the constant exercise of humility and prayer, and a wholesome spiritual outlook concerning the work of the apostolate. Those engaged in the apostolate should keep the words of St. Paul foremost in mind: “So then neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the growth” (1 Cor 3.7). The avoidance of activism should not, on the other hand, give way to a negativism characterized by a turning away from the performance of good works. In fact, there is great necessity for an increase in apostolic work to counteract growing materialistic tendencies.

Activism is also called AMERICANISM. Such a spiritual pragmatism was condemned by Leo XIII in the apostolic letter TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE, addressed to Cardinal James Gibbons in 1899. While the pope praised the Church and the people of the U.S. for their spirit of progress and accomplishment, he nevertheless cautioned them, among other things, not to place too great an emphasis on externals and outward activity to the detriment of the spiritual life. Thus the term Americanism is often used, especially by European writers, to denote an excessive apostolic activity lacking the proper spiritual motivation.

See Also: APOSTOLATE AND SPIRITUAL LIFE; GRACE

Bibliography: M. BLONDEL, “Theory and Practice of Action,” tr. J. M. SOMERVILLE, Cross Currents 4 (1954) 251–61. J. B. CHAUTARD, The Soul of the Apostolate, tr. J. A. MORAN (Trappist, Ky. 1941). J. AUMANN, “The Heresy of Action,” Cross and Crown 3 (1951) 25–45. L. J. PUTZ, “Toward a Spirituality of Action,” Proceedings of the 1958 Sisters’ Institute of Spirituality 6 (1959) 96–105. R. BRADLEY, “Activity or Activism,” Sister Formation Bulletin 4.2 (1957) 1–6. F. KLEIN, Americanism: A Phantom Heresy (Cranford, N.J. 1951) reproduced from W. ELLIOTT’s Life of Father Hecker (4th ed. New York 1898).

[L. F. BACIGALUPO]

ACTON, CHARLES JANUARIUS

Cardinal; b. Naples, Italy, March 6, 1803; d. there, June 23, 1847. He was the son of Sir John Acton, sometime prime minister of the Kingdom of Naples. After his father’s death (1811), Charles went to England, where he studied at Westminster School and then at Magdalene College, Cambridge (1819–23). He then returned to Rome to attend the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics previous to ordination. In 1828 he was made a papal chamberlain and was appointed secretary to the nuncio in Paris. His next appointment was that of vice legate at Bologna. Before the uprising in Bologna (1831), Gregory XVI named him secretary to the Congregation of Regulars. Later he became auditor of the Apostolic Chamber. He was proclaimed cardinal (June 24, 1842) after being created in petto nearly three years previously. At the meeting between Gregory XVI and Czar Nicholas I (1845), Acton was the interpreter and sole witness. Later he wrote an account of the conversation at the pope’s request. As adviser to the Holy See on matters concerning England, he recommended in 1840 an increase in the number of English vicars apostolic from four to eight but opposed the restoration of the hierarchy (1850). Although urged by the king of Naples to do so, he refused to accept the archiepiscopal See of Naples.

Bibliography: C. S. ISAACSON, The Story of the English Cardinals (London 1907). B. N. WARD, The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation, 2 v. (New York 1915) 1:154–66. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 1:3–6.

[B. FOTHERGILL]

ACTON, JOHN EMERICH EDWARD DALBERG

Historian; b. Naples, Italy, Jan. 10, 1834; d. Tegernsee, Bavaria, June 19, 1902. The later eighth baronet and first baron, Acton was the only child of Sir Richard Acton and Marie Louise Pellini de Dalberg. At the age of three, upon the death of his father, he succeeded to a baronetcy in England. With his mother as his guardian, he was brought to his estate at Aldenham. After spending a year at St. Nicholas, a preparatory school near Paris (1842), he enrolled for four years at St. Mary’s College, Oscott, whose president was Nicholas (later Cardinal) WISEMAN. Acton continued his studies at Edinburgh under a private tutor, Dr. Logan, a former vice president of Oscott. Unable to gain admission to Cambridge University, Acton went to Munich in 1850 to become the pupil and traveling companion of Johannes Ignaz von DÖLLINGER. He traveled widely throughout Europe and visited the U.S. in 1855. His German training developed in him a profound love for historical learning and critical scholarship. His cosmopolitan background and knowledge of languages assisted him greatly in his historical pursuits.

Acton returned to England in 1859 with the intention of introducing the isolated English Catholic community to progressive Catholic thought. He believed that England, better than any other Western country, had preserved a true Catholic spirit in its political institutions and that Catholics had a special duty to maintain the Christian character of the English constitution. He sat as a Whig member of Parliament for Carlow, an Irish constituency (1859–65). During this period he formed a close friendship with William GLADSTONE and became his lifelong political supporter and confidant. With his interests and talents, Acton found the world of practical politics thoroughly uncongenial, and he took little part in parliamentary affairs. In 1858 he purchased part ownership of a liberal Catholic journal, the Rambler (called in 1862 The Home and Foreign Review). Until 1864 he devoted most of his energies to writing articles and reviews for this enterprise. This was his most prolific period as a writer and saw the production of some of his best works.

Encouraged by NEWMAN and ably assisted by Richard SIMPSON, Acton followed a progressive line that gave offense to the ultraconservatives who represented the dominant group in the Church. Because of his insistence, often in provocative, arrogant fashion, that the Catholic scholar should be free to discuss without restriction all religious questions that were not defined doctrines, and his coolness toward the papal temporal power, the English hierarchy and Rome viewed him with suspicion. By 1864, when Pius IX issued the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, Acton was convinced that the Holy See favored a restrictive policy that ran counter to his own deepest convictions. In a spirit of frustration he withdrew from Catholic journalism. He continued to contribute to the Chronicle (1867–68) and the North British Review (1867–71), but his most productive period was at an end. On Gladstone's recommendation he was raised to the peerage in 1869.

During VATICAN COUNCIL I, Acton was one of the most vociferous opponents of a solemn definition of papal primacy and infallibility. Despite his close association with Döllinger, he refused to identify himself with the German scholars who repudiated the conciliar definitions of the papal prerogatives and who were, as a result, excommunicated (see OLD CATHOLICS). Although fanatically opposed to the growing ULTRAMONTANISM, he taught his son in 1890: “A Church without a pope is not the Church of Christ.” He remained a devout Catholic in his private life, but after 1875 he grew more isolated from his coreligionists.

John Emerich Edward Dalberg Acton, ca. 1879, painting by Franz Seraph von Lenbach.

Contemporary ideas of progress and human perfectibility exercised a powerful influence on his thoughts. Acton came to view the course of history as one of progress toward freedom. With a fervor that at times approached hysteria he denounced all forces, past or present, that restricted liberty. He subjected the popes to special condemnation, and he was no less severe on saints who had countenanced the INQUISITION. He collected voluminous notes for a major work on the history of liberty that was never completed. He was one of the founders of the English Historical Review (1886). On the nomination of Lord Rosebery, Acton was appointed (1895) regius professor of modern history at Cambridge. As his final project Acton drew up the plans and acted as editor for the Cambridge Modern History, but this 14-volume monument of cooperative scholarship appeared (1902–12) only after his death.

Apart from periodical articles, Acton published little during his lifetime. Since his death, however, most of his major essays and lectures have appeared in book form. His writings reflect immense learning and moral earnestness, but they are marred occasionally by a Whig bias that led him to be unfair in his historical judgments. His influence on Catholic thought during his lifetime was minimal, but he has since been recognized as the most farsighted Catholic historical thinker of his generation.

Bibliography: Works. Lectures on Modern History, ed. J. N. FIGGIS and R. V. LAURENCE (London 1906; repr. 1930); Historical Essays and Studies, ed. J. N. FIGGIS and R. V. LAURENCE (London 1907); Essays on Freedom and Power, ed. G. HIMMELFARB (Boston 1948); Essays on Church and State, ed. D. WOODRUFF (New York 1953); Letters to Mary Gladstone, ed. H. PAUL (New York 1904); Selections from the Correspondence of the First Lord Acton, ed. J. N. FIGGIS and R. V. LAURENCE (London 1917); Lord Acton and His Circle, ed. F. A. GASQUET (New York 1906). A. WATKIN and H. BUTTERFIELD, "Gasquet and the Acton-Simpson Correspondence," Cambridge Historical Journal 10 (1950–) 77–105, points out defects in Gasquet's editing. V. CONZEMIUS, ed., Ignaz von Döllinger: Briefwechsel 1820–90 (Munich 1963–), to be completed in 5 v., contains D's correspondence with Acton. Literature. U. NOACK, Katholizität und Geistesfreiheit nach den Schriften von J. Dalberg-Acton, 1834–1902 (Frankfurt 1936). F. ENGEL-JANOSI, "Reflections of Lord Acton on Historical Principles," American Catholic Historical Review 27 (1941) 166–85. F. E. LALLY, As Lord Acton Says (Newport, R.I. 1942). D. MATHEW, Acton: The Formative Years (London 1946). H. BUTTERFIELD, Lord Acton (London 1948), pamphlet; "Acton: His Training, Methods, and Intellectual System," in Studies in Diplomatic History and Historiography in Honour of G. P. Gooch, ed. A. O. SARKISSIAN (London 1961) 169–98. G. HIMMELFARB, Lord Acton (Chicago 1952). H. A. MACDOUGALL, The Acton-Newman Relations (New York 1962). G. E. FASNACHT, Acton's Political Philosophy (London 1952). L. KOCHAN, Acton on History (London 1954). J. L. ALTHOLZ, The Liberal Catholic Movement in England (London 1962).

[H. A. MACDOUGALL]

ACTS, NOTIONAL

In Trinitarian theology notions are characteristics proper to each Divine PERSON, by which man is able to know the Persons as distinct. These are innascibility, paternity, filiation, active and passive spiration (ST 1a, 32; Scotus adds the inspirability of the Second Person: In 1 sent. 28.1–3). The adjective notional is applied to whatever is proper to one Person and not common to all. In God "all is one, save where there is relative opposition" (Council of Florence; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1330); therefore all that is notional is really identical with the divine relations of rigin, but man's abstractive mode of thought makes it necessary to introduce further mental distinctions if he is to think or speak of this mystery.

By the term notional acts theologians designate those divine acts that enable one to come to the knowledge of the distinct Persons; these are the GENERATION OF THE WORD and the SPIRATION of the Spirit. The magisterium unhesitatingly applies the corresponding verbs (generare, gigni, procedere) to each Person (Fourth Lateran Council; Enchiridion symbolorum, 800, 804). Considered as the way by which the Persons and their opposed relations originate, these enable one to discern each Person. Some theologians speak simply of two acts (generation, spiration); the majority speak of four, considering each act both as emanating from a principle (active generation, spiration) and as received in a term (passive generation, spiration).

Certain conceptual problems arise (ST 1a, 40.4; 41.1–6). (1) One cannot think of origin save in terms of action, but, applied to God, man's concept of action must be purified of all created imperfection. God's immanent activity of knowing and loving is identical with His essence, pure act; one must exclude all idea of motion, passive potency, and determinability and speak simply of God's active power, exercise of activity, the active and actual influence of principle on term. Thus, by a mental distinction, one expresses the dynamic aspect of the relation of producing principle to term produced. (2) Notional acts are necessary, for God's activity is identical with His essence. This is not to suggest coercion; indeed notional acts are voluntary, not that the Father could have refrained from begetting the Son, but because God wills and loves all the perfection that He necessarily is. (3) Does the notional act presuppose (logically) the corresponding property, or vice versa? When one considers generation and spiration as received in the Son and the Spirit, the act is clearly prior to the property (filiation, passive spiration). Active spiration, common to two Persons, obviously presupposes those Persons. But what of active generation? This presupposes the First Person, constituted by the property of paternity. How can that property be logically prior to the act of generation? St. Thomas answers (ST 1a, 40.4 ad 1) by distinguishing between paternity as a property of the First Person (prior to generation) and as a relation to the Second Person (subsequent to generation).

See Also: PROPERTIES, DIVINE PERSONAL; RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN; PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:802–805. Commentaries on ST 1a, 41. Somme théologique: La Trinité, ed. and tr. H. F. DONDAINE, 2 v. (Paris 1942–46) 2:354–366. P. VANIER, Théologie trinitaire chez saint Thomas d'Aquin: Évolution du concept d'action notionnelle (Montreal 1953).

[R.L. STEWART]

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

A book of the New Testament that presents the life of the early Christian community in Jerusalem after the Ascension of Jesus and narrates the progress of the Christian movement from Jerusalem to Rome.

A Sequel to the Gospel of Luke. The canonical place of the Acts of the Apostles between the gospels and the letters of Paul is appropriate since its narrative of the development of Christianity not only continues the gospel story of Jesus but also provides a framework for understanding the letters of Paul. Although it appears in the canon after the Gospel of John, the Acts of the Apostles is really to be regarded as a sequel to the Gospel of Luke. Both contain a dedicatory preface addressed to a certain Theophilus. The reference to a “first book” in prologue of Acts (1:1–5) suggests that Acts was meant as a continuation of an earlier work. The identification of this “first book” with the Gospel of Luke is based on the relation of the two prologues as well as the connection between the first chapter of Acts and the last chapter of Luke. Verbal and thematic correspondence exist between Acts 1:4 and Lk 24:49, the instruction of Jesus to the disciples “not to depart from Jerusalem” and “to wait for the promise of the Father”; Acts 1:8 and Lk 24:47–48, they will be witnesses in Jerusalem; Acts 1:2.9 and Lk 24:51, the ascension of Jesus as the conclusion of his earthly career. Apart from these, thematic continuity, parallelisms and geographical pattern substantiate the view that the Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles were written by the same author who meant them to be two volumes of a single work. The literary unity of Luke-Acts is now generally acknowledged though each represents a different genre. Some would, however, see both works as historical monograph, with the gospel having a biographical interest while Acts is focused on historical events.

Authorship. The name of the author is not mentioned in the text of Acts or in the Third Gospel. The earliest attributions of authorship can be found in the Anti-Marcionite Prologue to Luke; Irenaeus’ Adversus Haereses, 3.1.1; 3.14.1; and the Muratorian Canon. These writings of the late second century identify the author with Luke, the physician, an attendant and inseparable companion of Paul. It is said that he was an eyewitness of some of the events narrated in Acts, particularly those in the “we-passages” (Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16). It was also believed that Luke came from Antioch (cf. Irenaeus and Eusebius), that he wrote for the Gentiles (cf. Origen) and that he composed the Acts of the Apostles in Rome (Jerome, De Viris Illustribus 7). The Church Fathers did not mention the source of their information about Luke, but some could be inferred from 2 Tim 4:11 (companion of Paul); Col 4:14 (beloved physician); Phlm 24 (Paul’s co-worker).

St. Peter and St. Paul. (©Archive Photos)

It is possible that the Luke mentioned in these letters was the same Luke whom tradition acknowledges as the author of Luke-Acts. It cannot be ascertained, however, that he actually wrote them. Whoever the real author may be, he has come to be known as Luke.

From the text of Luke-Acts, something can be said about the implied author. In the gospel prologue (Lk 1.1–4), he sees himself as a link in the chain of tradition but distinguishes himself from “the eyewitnesses and ministers of the word.” His claim to write “an orderly account” subtly expresses a critical appraisal of his predecessors and offers a reason for his own literary endeavor. He presents his credential as a historian by assuring his addressees that his composition is based on reliable tradition and his own thorough investigation. His involvement in some of the events he narrates is supported by the impression of an eyewitness report in the “we-passages” in Acts.

The prologues and the language of the two-volume work suggest that the (implied) author’s native tongue is Greek, that he is well educated and knows the conventions of Greco-Roman rhetoric. He is aware of the philosophical currents of his time and has a clear knowledge of the Septuagint, of Jewish culture and of Christian traditions. He is a well-traveled, cosmopolitan person with a broad vision of the Christian movement.

Date and Place of Composition. The connection to the Gospel of Luke makes the dating of Acts dependent on the dating of this gospel and the gospel of Mark. Since internal evidence makes it most plausible that Luke made use of the gospel of Mark, written ca. 68–73 CE, his gospel must have been written some time after Mark's gospel had been circulated and attained recognition. Luke's gospel was written after the destruction of Jerusalem but before the persecution of Christians in the latter part of the reign of Domitian (ca. 81–96) and even before the bitter controversy of Christianity and Pharisaic Judaism (ca. 85–90). Thus, the gospel of Luke is dated in the 80s and the Acts of the Apostles must have been written shortly after the gospel. A group of scholars date Acts before 64 CE on the basis of the traditional view of Lukan authorship and the ending of Acts which mentions Paul's house arrest in Rome but not his martyrdom. The lack of any mention of Paul's death cannot be a determining factor in dating Acts since it can be explained by the author's literary purpose and theological intention. A late dating of Acts, ca. 95–100, has also been proposed based on the view that Luke was dependent on Josephus' Antiquities which was published ca. 93. This is a minority opinion. The place of composition is uncertain. It could be Antioch or Rome. Tradition connects Luke with Antioch in Syria. Jerome says the Acts was written in Rome but also suggests other places such as Achaia and Boetia.

Audience. Luke dedicates his two-volume work to Theophilus. There is no reason to doubt that a particular person is meant. The address Luke uses for him, kratiste, indicates a person of high social status. For Luke to write his books with skill and grace, he must have relied on his own financial resources or on the support of a well-to-do person. The dedicatory preface suggests that Theophilus could have been his patron. Luke assumes a shared knowledge between him and his reader. He assumes that the reader has some knowledge of the Christian tradition and can understand his allusions to the Hebrew Scriptures. To appreciate his language and literary style, the reader must have had some Hellenistic education. Theophilus could not have been a total outsider to the Christian movement. He could be a recent convert to Christianity, of Jewish or Gentile origin, with a Hellenistic education. Luke certainly did not intend his works only for Theophilus. Following the literary convention of prologue means that he intended his works for a wider audience. Theophilus, thus, also represents the implied readers of Luke-Acts.

Texts and Sources. The early witnesses for the text of Acts fall into two distinct text types: (1) the Alexandrian text represented by p45 p74 Sinaiticus A B C 81, Clement of Alexandria (2) the so-called Western text represented chiefly by D and the fragmentary papyri p29, p38 and p48, Old Latin, the Harclean apparatus, Irenaeus, Cyprian and Augustine. The Western text is about ten percent longer than the Alexandrian text. Notwithstanding its early date, the Western text appears to be secondary and paraphrastic. Generally the more reliable text is the Alexandrian text. In some instances the Western text may preserve an original reading. Each reading must be judged according to its own merits.

The search for the sources of Acts has not been successful primarily because of Luke's tendency to rewrite his sources thoroughly. In the case of the gospel, if we did have the gospel of Mark with which to compare Luke's gospel, it would be very difficult to ascertain that Luke was using Mark as a source. The detection of sources in the case of Acts is even more difficult since there is no standard of comparison. This is not to deny Luke's use of sources for Acts. It is not improbable that he had access to written sources and oral traditions of Christian communities, stories about Peter and Paul, other personalities in Acts such as Philip, Stephen, Cornelius and other converts to the Christian faith. The "we-passages" could have been based on his own experiences or could have come from a missionary travel diary. Although the narrative of Acts 16–20 agrees with some facts from 1–2 Corinthians, 1 Thessalonians, Galatians and Romans, it is not likely that Luke made use of Paul's letters in constructing his story. The many points of discrepancy in the places of overlap preclude literary dependence. Not only does Luke not mention Paul's letters, his picture of Paul and his theology does not quite agree either with the portrait and theology of Paul in the letters.

Structure and Content. The story of Acts may be divided according to the stages of the progress of the Christian movement. Some scholars have seen in the summaries of growth (6:7; 9:31; 12:24; 16:5; 19:20) an indication of the division of Acts into six panels. There are, however, other summaries which make this division questionable. Recognizing the significance of the Jerusalem council some scholars divide Acts into two parts (1:1–15:35; 15:36–28:31).

Jesus' commission to the disciples in Acts 1:8 is considered a key to the development of the narrative in Acts. Its geographical outline shows how this commission is fulfilled in Jerusalem (1:1–5:42), in Judea and Samaria (6:1–12:25), and to the end of the earth (13:1–28:31).

Following the dedication to Theophilus and a summary of the first book (1:1–2), the prologue provides a background to the narrative of Acts by recalling the final events recounted in the gospel, the appearances, instruction and promise of the Risen Jesus to the disciples. Jesus' response to the disciples' question about the restoration of Israel focuses on what their concern should be. The promise of receiving power when the Holy Spirit comes upon them is coupled with a commission to be witnesses (1:8). After the brief and vivid portrayal of Jesus' ascension, the heavenly messengers challenge the disciples to shift their attention from future concern to present responsibility (1:9–11).

The Community of Believers in Jerusalem. The story of the believers properly begins after the ascension with the return of the disciples to Jerusalem. The community of the eleven, introduced by name, with Mary, the mother of Jesus, the women and the brothers of Jesus, stay in the upper room and devote themselves to prayer (1:12–14). Peter takes the initiative as the leader of the group in the choice of a replacement for Judas Iscariot. The Twelve is reconstituted upon the election of Matthias (1:15–26). In fulfillment of Jesus' promise, the disciples receive the gift of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. Speaking in tongues, the visible manifestation of this gift, draws reactions of wonder, amazement, doubt and mockery from the crowd. Peter addresses the people and interprets the event in the light of Jesus' resurrection. His proclamation and call to repentance brings about the conversion of three thousand people (2:1–41). The remarkable increase in the number of believers is followed by a summary description of the life of the community (2:42–47). The communal life of the believers is characterized not only by prayer but also by the teaching of the apostles, the fellowship and the breaking of bread. Community solidarity is expressed in the sharing of meals and of possessions. The dynamic impact of the reception of the Holy Spirit is vividly illustrated. From an inconspicuous group gathered in the upper room, the believers now gather in the temple. They begin to witness to Jesus through their communal life and through the signs and wonders of the apostles. The witness of Peter and John is dramatically portrayed in the events that follow (3:1–4:22). The healing of the lame in the name of Jesus (3:1–10) provides the occasion for Peter's proclamation. His teaching in the temple draws the attention of the temple authorities. Peter and John are arrested, imprisoned and brought to trial. The trial becomes another opportunity for Peter to bear witness to Jesus (4:8–12.19–20). They are released without punishment after being warned no longer to speak or teach in the name of Jesus (4:17). Peter and John return to the community and their prayer for boldness is granted with a new outpouring of the Spirit (4:23–30).

A second portrait of the community of Jerusalem (4:32–35) signals a stage in the development of the community. The focus is on the unity of heart and soul of the community manifested in the sharing of possessions. The apostles continue their witness to the resurrection of the Lord (4:33) and take on the role of administrator and distributor of community property. Barnabas' sale of his property is a positive example of the practice of communion of goods. It is done according to the spirit of the community (4:36–37) whereas the act of Ananias and Sapphira is tainted with dishonesty (5:1–11). Their deceit threatens the unity of the community and the credibility of the apostles. Both incur death as punishment when they persist in their deceit even after Peter confronts them. The story of Ananias and Sapphira provides a transition from the theme of communion of goods to the wonders and signs of the apostles, the focus of the third description of the community of Jerusalem (5:12–16). This is followed by another dramatic presentation that parallels the plot of Acts 4. This time, not only Peter and John, but all the apostles arouse the jealousy and opposition of the high priest and the Sadducean party. They are arrested but are miraculously released by an angel. They are found by their captors in the morning teaching in the temple, are again arrested and then brought to trial (5:17–25). The scene before the council becomes another opportunity to bear witness (5:29–32). Heeding Gamaliel's advice, the council releases the apostles after being beaten and charged not to speak in the name of Jesus (5:33–40). The episode ends with the picture of the apostles joyfully and boldly proclaiming Jesus as the Christ (5:42).

Judea and Samaria. The transition from Jerusalem to Judea and Samaria is provided in the story of the Hebrew and Hellenist widows, the institution of the seven deacons and the ministry of Stephen (6:1–8:1). The increase of the disciples also leads to a problem. A conflict ensues because of the neglect of the Hellenist widows in the daily distribution. This is solved by the community through the institution of the seven deacons among whom are Stephen and Philip (6:1–7). Stephen and Philip will be instrumental in the spread of the mission to Judea and Samaria. Stephen's preaching before the council leads to his martyrdom and the disciples are scattered because of the persecution that follows (6:8–8:3; 11:19–21). The scattered disciples continue to preach the word. Philip converts many in Samaria through his preaching and miracles (8:4–13) and baptizes an Ethiopian eunuch (8:26–40). The Samaritan converts receive the Holy Spirit when Peter and John, who are sent by the Jerusalem community, lay their hands on them.

Another significant development is the conversion of a persecutor, Saul, who becomes an active preacher after his conversion (9:1–22). When his life is threatened, he escapes and comes to Jerusalem. Barnabas brings him to the apostles. Saul continues to preach in the name of the Lord and is sent off to Tarsus when his life is again threatened. Peter, on the other hand, is also drawing converts in Lydda, Sharon and Joppa (9:32–43).

To the end of the Earth. The conversion of Cornelius (10:1–49) is an interesting development because it opens the way for the mission to the Gentiles. The story is narrated three times (11:1–18; 15:7–11.14) for emphasis like the threefold repetition of the summary description of the Jerusalem community (2:42–47; 4:32–35; 5:12–16) and the conversion of Saul (9:1–22; 22:1–21; 26:1–23). The story shows how God directs the progress of the Christian movement and how Peter becomes instrumental in the conversion of the first Gentile. The event leads to a conflict as Peter is questioned by the circumcision party. Peter's report to the Jerusalem community silences the objection (11:1–18). The episode is followed by a reference to the martyrdom of Stephen that results in the geographical spread of the Christian message and the formation and growth of the community in Antioch where the believers are first called Christians (11:19–26). The role of Barnabas and Saul in this community and the relation of this community to Jerusalem are also noted (11:27–30). The Jerusalem community experiences famine and persecution. James is killed and Peter is arrested. Peter is then miraculously delivered from prison and justice is served when Herod dies (12:1–23).

Missionary expansion begins with the sending (13:1–3) of Barnabas and Saul, who becomes known as Paul (13:9). They carry the word of the Lord to Asia Minor (13:4–14:26) and returning to Antioch, they report missionary success among the Gentiles. The issue of circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic law raised by some men from Jerusalem is resolved in a meeting in Jerusalem. After Peter, Barnabas and Paul narrate what God has done through them among the Gentiles (15:6–12), James gives his judgment. The decision not to require the Gentile converts to be circumcised is accepted. Judas and Silas are chosen to go to Antioch with Barnabas and Paul and deliver the letter giving the minimum dietary and moral requirements for Gentile converts (15:22–29). This decision gives a greater impetus to the Gentile mission. Barnabas and Paul spend some time in Antioch before embarking in another missionary journey. But a conflict between the two over John Mark results in their separation (15:36–40). Paul takes Silas with him and from this point onward, he emerges as an independent missionary and the main character in the narrative of Acts. Directed by the Spirit (16:6–10), he brings the Christian message beyond Asia Minor to Greece (15:40–18:22). In his third mission journey (18:23–21:16), Paul pays a visit to some of the communities he founded. After winning converts in Ephesus, he heads towards Jerusalem (20:16.22; 21:17). When he reaches Jerusalem and goes to the temple, he is arrested and imprisoned. When he invokes his Roman citizenship and appeals to Roman justice, he is brought to Caesarea before governor Felix (21:17–26:32). Paul stays two years in prison until Felix is succeeded by Porcius Festus. During the trial, Paul makes an appeal to Caesar (25:11) which is granted by Festus. When King Agrippa arrives in Caesarea to welcome Festus, the latter lays Paul's case before the king. King Agrippa declares to Festus Paul's innocence (26:10–32) but his appeal to Caesar ironically becomes the obstacle to setting him free. Paul, thus, sails to Rome as a prisoner (27:1–28:16). The story of Acts ends with Paul in house custody in Rome still proclaiming his witness to Jesus Christ and the kingdom of God.

Bibliography: C. K. BARRETT, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles. Vol. 1, Preliminary Introduction and Commentary on Acts I–XIV (Edinburgh 1994). Vol 2, Introduction and Commentary on Acts XV–XXVIII (Edinburgh 1998). F. F. BRUCE, The Acts of the Apostles. The Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary, 3d ed. (Grand Rapids, MI 1990). J. D. G. DUNN, The Acts of the Apostles (Peterborough 1996). J. DUPONT, Nouvelles études sur les Actes des Apôtres (Paris 1984). J. A. FITZMYER, The Acts of the Apostles: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (New York 1998). E. HAENCHEN, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Oxford 1971). L. T. JOHNSON, The Acts of the Apostles (Collegeville 1992). G. LUDEMANN, Early Christianity according to the Traditions in Acts: A Commentary (Minneapolis 1987). J. B. POLHILL, Acts (The New American Commentary, vol. 26. Nashville, Tennessee 1992). C. H. TALBERT, Reading Acts. A Literary and Theological Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (New York 1997). R. C. TANNEHILL, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts. A Literary Interpretation, Vol. 2, The Acts of the Apostles (Minneapolis 1990). J. VERHEYDEN, The Unity of Luke-Acts (Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologiarum lovaniensium, 142. Leuven 1999). B. WITHERINGTON, The Acts of the Apostles. A Socio-rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids, MI 1998).

[S. MARIA ANICIA BATION CO]

ACTS OF THE MARTYRS

The official court records of the trials of early Christians for their faith. Taken in a broader sense, the Acts of the Martyrs, or Acta Martyrum, include all the varied accounts (acta, gesta, passiones, martyria, and legenda) of the arrest, interrogation, condemnation, execution, and burial of the martyrs of the first centuries. These narratives make up an extensive and important body of Christian literature, but are of unequal value, ranging from authentic accounts of trustworthy eyewitnesses to complete fictions, and even forgeries. The Bollandist H. DELEHAYE has divided the Acts into six categories accepted by other hagiographers, even though differences of opinion exist about the value of any particular Acts.

“The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian,” painting by Antonio and Piero del Pollaiuolo, c. 1475, National Gallery, London. (© National Gallery Collection; By kind permission of the Trustees of the National Gallery, London/CORBIS)

Christian martyrs in the Circus Maximus, after a painting by Jean Leon. Gerome. (The Bettmann Archive)

Acta, or Court Proceedings. In a Roman criminal court, the questions asked by the judge and the responses of the defendants, along with the official verdict, were taken down in shorthand by professional notaries (notarii, exceptores, or censuales). These notes were then transcribed in regular characters and deposited in the archives (instrumentum provinciae) where they could be consulted years, and even decades, later as is attested by Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 5.18.9; 7.11.6), St. Augustine (Contra Cresconium 3.70), St. Jerome (Adv. Rufinum 2.3), and Lydus (De magistratibus populi Romani 3.29). Copies of the proceedings could be obtained for private circulation and were used for public reading in the liturgy. Within less than a year after Cyprian's first interrogation at Carthage the acta proconsulis were in the hands of confessors in the mines of Numidia (Cyprian, Epistles 77.2). The earliest of the authentic Acts are those of JUSTIN MARTYR and his six companions, executed at Rome c. 164 by order of Junius Rusticus, prefect of the city. The Acta Martyrum Scillitanorum report the trial and condemnation of 12 Christians from Scilli on July 17, 180, by the proconsul Saturninus at Carthage.

The Proconsular Acts of Cyprian, one of the most important and moving documents of the early Church, contains a transcript of his first trial in 257; another of his second the following year; and a description by an eyewitness of his execution on Sept. 14, 258. The Acts of Fructuosus preserve the protocol of the trial of the bishop and his two deacons, Augurius and Eulogius, along with a description of their deaths by fire (Jan. 21, 259). Other authentic Acts from the time of Diocletian are those of Maximilianus, who was executed at Theveste in Numidia in 295 for refusing to enter military service, and of the centurion Marcellus, beheaded at Tangier in Mauretania in 298 for throwing away his military belt. A number of other Acts are occasionally placed in this first category, but in general they seem to be interpolated or to be of somewhat doubtful authenticity.

Passiones and Martyria. Accounts of eyewitnesses or well-informed contemporaries are frequently called passiones in Latin and in Greek martyria. They were written by Christians and are of a more personal and literary character than the acta. The earliest of these writings is the Martyrdom of POLYCARP of Smyrna, composed by a certain Marcion and sent in the name of the Church of Smyrna to the Christian community at Philomelium in Greater Phrygia. These Acts describe the arrest, trial, and heroic death of the aged bishop in the arena at Smyrna, most likely on Feb. 22, 156. Another report of this same type is the encyclical letter preserved by Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 5.1.1–2.7), sent by the Churches of Lyons and Vienne to the Churches in Asia and Phrygia, describing the persecution of the Christians at Lyons in 177. Among the numerous victims was Bishop Pothinus “over ninety years of age”; Blandina, a slave girl; Sanctus, a deacon of Vienne; and Ponticus, a boy of 15. This famous letter, the first important document of Gallic Christianity, may have been composed by St. IRENAEUS OF LYONS, disciple of Polycarp and successor of Pothinus. The Passio SS. Perpetuae et Felicitatis gives an engaging account of the imprisonment and death in the amphitheater at Carthage on March 7, 202, of Saturus Saturninus, Revocatus, and two young women, a slave Felicitas and her mistress, Vibia Perpetua, 22 years of age, “well born, liberally educated, honorably married, having father and mother and two brothers, one like herself a catechumen, and an infant son at her breast.” The longest portion of the passio (ch. 3–10) was written by Perpetua herself, and another section, by Saturus, (ch. 11–13) while they were waiting execution. The two documents were given an introduction and conclusion describing the deaths of the saints by a contemporary of considerable literary talent, possibly TERTULLIAN.

The Acts of SS. Carpus, Papyrus, and Agathonice is a description of the trial and deaths of three saints at Pergamum under Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus (A.D. 161–169) or, more likely, during the persecution of Decius (250–251). A similar chronological problem is connected with the death of Pionius at Smyrna. His passio was taken by an unskilled editor from three sources: a memorial left by Pionius himself or one of his companions, and two official interrogations. The structural and ideological resemblances between the passio of Marion and James, that of Montanus and Lucius, who suffered in Africa (c. 259), and that of Perpetua and Felicitas have raised questions regarding their authenticity, but they are probably genuine. The Acts of Phileas, Bishop of Thmuis, condemned by Culcianus, Prefect of Egypt, at Alexandria early in the fourth century also belong to this category.

Interpolated Accounts. The third class of martyrs’ Acts is much more extensive. It consists of accounts drawn from written documents that have been more or less extensively edited at a later date to suit the purpose of the author. An example of this type of development may be seen in seven different redactions of the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs. Among the pieces in this class are the passiones of Maximus, CRISPINA, Irenaeus, Pollio, Euplus, Philip, Quirinus, Julius; of AGAPE and Chionia; of Saturninus, Dativus and their companions, Claudius, Asterius and their companions; and of the Persian martyrs Simeon, Pherbuta, Sadoth, and Bademus. Many of the narratives in the Menology of Symeon Metaphrastes also belong here. Since the mid-19th century, numerous attempts have been made, using both internal and external criteria, to sift the facts from the fiction in these Acts, but the conclusions reached are often uncertain.

Historical and Imaginative Romances. These are late works based on neither written documents nor definite oral traditions. A few facts are set down in an elaborate, imaginary framework. Usually what is historical in these compositions is the saint’s name, the date of his feast, and the existence of his shrine. Acts of this type are very numerous. They include those of Vincent, Peter Balsam, George, Cyricus and Julitta, Lucianus and Marcianus, Firmus and Rusticus, and the series of cycles of the Roman legendarium that include the martyrdoms of SS. AGNES, CECILIA, HIPPOLYTUS, LAWRENCE, Sixtus, SEBASTIAN, JOHN AND PAUL, and COSMAS AND DAMIAN. Here also belong the Acts of St. Felicitas and her seven sons. The execution of seven martyrs at Rome on July 10 (their feast) is guaranteed by the Philocalian calendar (354); the account of their kinship is probably due to the influence of the Biblical story of the heroic Jewish mother and her seven sons tortured to death by Antiochus the Great (2 Mc 7.1–42).

Imaginative romances were likewise written using the martyr story as a theme. In legends of this type not only are the narrated events fictitious, but the saint’s existence has no foundation in fact. The Acts of Didymus and Theodora, of GENESIUS The Comedian who was converted while ridiculing Baptism, and of SS. Barbara and CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA are apparently of this category. The Acts of Theodotus of Ancyra were woven about an ancient tale already known to Herodotus (Hist. 2.121); and the story of BARLAAM AND JOASAPH, which contains the greater portion of the Apology of the second-century ARISTIDES, is essentially a Christian retelling of the ancient Buddha legend from the East. Stories of this type that followed the tradition of the Hellenistic novel were extremely popular in the sixth and seventh centuries. Unfortunately, Christians of later times took these tales for history.

Hagiographical Forgeries. These accounts about the death of martyrs were written for neither the edification nor the amusement of readers, but to deceive them. The Acts of Paul and Thecla are the earliest examples of this type. They were composed out of excessive devotion to St. Paul by a priest of Asia who was later deposed for his pains (Tertullian, De baptismo 17). Such stories were also fabricated to substantiate the Apostolic founding of Gallic sees; and in most instances it is impossible to determine the real authors of the frauds since the writer may simply be elaborating an already current tale.

Growth of Martyr Literature. Several factors contributed to the growth of martyr literature. There was, first of all, the natural desire to preserve the memory of those who had died for a cause. Jewish counterparts of the Christian Acts are found not only in the Book of Machabees, but also in the martyrdoms of Akiba and Jehuda ben Baba. Pagan parallels existed in the political martyrs of the Acta Alexandrinorum and in the trial of Secundus, the Silent Philosopher, at Athens by the Emperor Hadrian. There was an appreciation of the apologetic value of martyrdom as a proof of the divine origin of Christianity (Tertullian, Apologeticum 50; Justin, 2 Apoloogy 13) and of the theological notion that the martyr was the perfect imitator of Christ in his passion, and there was the edification that could be derived from a reading of the sufferings of the saints.

In Africa, Gaul, and Spain the custom quickly rose of reading in the liturgy the Acts of the martyrs on their feasts. The practice was not introduced at Rome until a much later date. This seems to explain why, with the exception of the account given by Justin Martyr of the condemnation of three Christians by Lollius Urbicus (c. 160; 2 Apoloogy 2) and the Acts of Justin and his companions, there are no authentic records of the trials and executions of the numerous Roman martyrs. During the centuries following the persecutions, anonymous writers tried to make up for this deficiency. According to a late fifth-century document, the so-called Decretum Gelasianum 1 (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 59:171–172), the gesta sanctorum martyrum were not read in church at Rome since their authors were unknown and they could be a source of ridicule. Later centuries were less critical; and by the end of the eighth, a martyr's Acts were liturgically read at Rome on his feast (Hadrian I, Epistolae ad Carolum Regem; Patrologia Latina 98:1284).

The legendary Acts of the martyrs are historically useful for the knowledge they supply regarding popular beliefs and social, political, and legal institutions during the centuries in which they were composed. The authentic Acts are important for the direct and indirect evidence they afford of practices and beliefs traditional in the early Church: a reverence for Scripture (Passio SS. Scillitanorum 12); the preservation of relics (Acta Procons. Cypriani 5); infant Baptism (Martyrdom of Polycarp 9); martyrdom as a second Baptism (Passio SS. Perpetuae et Felicitatis 21; Passio SS. Jacobi et Mariani 11); prayers for the souls of the departed (Passio SS. Perpetuae et Felicitatis 7–8); devotion to “Mother” Church (Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne; in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 5.2.6–7); the observance of fasts (Acta SS. Fructuosi, Eulogii et Augurii martyrum 3), particularly before the reception of the Eucharist (Passio SS. Jacobi et Mariani 8); and the essential difference in the veneration shown to Christ and to the saints: “For Him, who is the Son of God, we adore; but the martyrs, we love as disciples and imitators of the Lord” (Martyrdom of Polycarp 17). Even more intimately than the arguments of the apologists and the speculations of the Alexandrian theologians, the authentic Acts make contact with our spiritual ancestors, the common Christians called to make a heroic confession. They present the moving spectacle of men and women of every age and every walk of life dying for their faith in the firm hope of attaining everlasting life.

Bibliography: E. C. E. OWEN, ed. and tr., Some Authentic Acts of the Early Martyrs (Oxford 1927). H. DELEHAYE, The Legends of the Saints tr. D. ATTWATER (New York 1962). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:373–446. A. HAMMAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:133–134. W. H. C. FRENCH, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church (Oxford 1965). G. A. BISBEE, Pre-Decian Acts of Martyrs and Commentarii (Philadelphia 1988).

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

ACUÑA, CRISTÓBAL DE

Spanish Jesuit missionary, explorer of the Amazon; b. Burgos, 1597; d. Lima, Peru, Jan. 14, 1670. He entered the Jesuit Society in 1612 and made his profession in 1634. In 1630 he was the first rector of the College of Cuenca (Ecuador), the base for the Jesuit mission of Maynas in the upper Amazon. Acuña was appointed by the royal court to take part in a scientific expedition to the Amazon River because he had “journeyed through almost all Provinces of Peru, Quito, Chile, Tucumán, and Paraguay, including the coast of Brazil, La Plata, and Pará,” according to reports from his superior, Francisco Fuentes. Acuña and a companion, Father Andrés de Artieda, left Quito on Feb. 16, 1639, investigating the characteristics of the Amazon River, native population, products, and various other items of interest. They arrived in Pará Dec. 12, 1639, and in March 1640 both returned to Spain. In Madrid Acuña gave an account of his observations to Philip IV and the Council of the Indies, and requested permission and assistance to carry out further evangelization along the great river. A result of his exploration was the Nuevo descubrimiento del Gran Río de las Amazonas (Madrid 1641), immediately translated into several languages. With the political separation of Portugal from Spain in 1640, projects of colonization and missionary work came to a standstill, and Acuña returned to South America in 1644. He stayed in the New Kingdom of Granada and Quito, until he was persuaded to return to Lima in 1659.

Bibliography: J. JOUANEN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la antigua provincia de Quito, 1570–1774, 2 v. (Quito 1941–43). E. TORRES SALDAMANDO, Los antiguos Jesuítas del Perú (Lima 1882).

[F. MATEOS]

AD BESTIAS

Beast hunts and fights were a favorite entertainment at Rome from the middle of the 2d century B.C. and subsequently throughout the cities of the Roman world. Gladiators—who were slaves—and criminals were required to fight various kinds of ferocious wild animals in the amphitheater. The gladiators often survived, but criminals, who were under the formal sentence, datio or damnatio ad bestias, were doomed to die in the arena. This criminal sentence was imposed on men guilty of tampering with coinage, of parricide, murder, or treason, and to some extent also on prisoners of war. In the age of the persecutions, Christians, who were accused of treason for not worshiping the emperor, were often condemned ad bestias, as is evident from numerous references to this form of punishment in the passions of the martyrs and in the works of early Christian writers. As the Christians were unpopular, the cry, Christiani ad leones, was often raised by spectators. Contrary, however, to the modern widespread view, the majority of the early Christian martyrs did not perish in the arena, but were executed by the sword.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 1:449–462, with full presentation of the literary, epigraphical, and archeological evidence. A. PILLET, Étude sur la "damnatio ad bestias" (Lille 1902).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

AD LIMINA VISIT

(Visitatio ad limina apostolorum) Refers to the periodic visit to Rome required of each residential bishop (CIC c. 400; Pastor bonus, no. 28) and military vicar approved by apostolic authority (S.C. Consist., Feb. 28, 1959, AAS 51:272). This visit is directly tied to the quinquennial report that is required of each residential bishop every five years in c. 399, as the visit is to be made the same year as that in which the report is submitted (c. 400 & sect.1). The 1983 Code of Canon Law has made the bishop's obligation to make the ad limina visit personally, and only if he is impeded may he satisfy the obligation through another, i.e. his coadjutor, the auxiliary, or a suitable priest who resides in the diocese (c. 400 & sect. 2). Since auxiliary and other titular bishops are not the primary pastors of a particular church and have no quinquennial report to make, they are not held to the ad limina visit. This visit has a sacred meaning, since "the bishops with religious veneration pay a visit to the tombs of Peter and Paul." It has a personal meaning, "because each individual bishop meets the successor of Peter and talks to him face to face," and it has a curial meaning, that is a "hallmark of community, because the bishops enter into conversation with the moderators of the dicasteries, councils, and offices of the Roman Curia" (Appendix 1, no. 6, of Pastor bonus). The purpose of the visit, for the bishops, is "the strengthening of their own responsibility as successors of the Apostles and of their hierarchical communion with the Successor of Peter" (Congregation for Bishops, "Directory for the 'ad limina' visit," in L'Osservatore Romano, July 11, 1988). The ad limina visit has changed considerably under the pontificate of John Paul II from a canonical formality into a genuine exercise of the pope's care for all the Churches. As stated in the "Directory for the 'ad limina' visit," it is "an important moment in the exercise of the Holy Father's pastoral ministry," because he receives the bishops and discusses personally with them their questions concerning "their ecclesial mission." Though there is no concrete date in which the visits started, "There are, however, numerous testimonies which speak of its existence from the 4th century" (Orti, Accompanying Historico-Juridical Notes to the "Directory for the 'ad limina' visit").

[T. C. KELLY]

AD MAJOREM DEI GLORIAM (A.M.D.G.)

Often taken to be the sign manual of the Society of Jesus from its frequent use in the writings of St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, the founder. Father Brou says: "The haunting idea which summons a formula to the tip of a writer's pen reveals the dominant thought of his soul: in the Constitutions alone, St. Ignatius makes mention of the greater glory of God 259 times, almost once for every page." Another writer, Father Lawlor, says: "I have made the count twice over, and the truth is that Ignatius uses the formula about 135 times . . . locutions such as 'ad majus servitium Dei,' 'ad majus Dei obsequium,' etc., are repeated about 157 times in the Constitutions." Probably the most dramatic presentation of the formula is seen in the silver statue, modeled in Rome by Francisco de Vergara and erected in 1741 as an ex voto over the high altar in the Basilica of St. Ignatius at Loyola. The saint is represented bearing a large open book on his left forearm, and pointing with his right hand to the formula inscribed across both pages. It can be safely assumed that in St. Ignatius's vocabulary, the words obsequium, servitium, and gloria Dei are practically synonymous, and that consequently the idea occurs 1,000 times or more, if to the Constitutions we add the occurrences in the 12 volumes of his letters. Most interpreters agree that the dynamic word is the qualifier Majorem.

Francis Cardinal Spellman meets with Pope Pius XII in Rome, 1954. (© Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: A. BROU, The Ignatian Way to God, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Milwaukee 1952). F. X. LAWLOR, "The Doctrine of Grace in the Spiritual Exercises," Theological Studies 3 (1942) 513–532. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:149.

[W. J. YOUNG]

AD PERENNIS VITAE FONTEM

The first line of the De gaudio paradisi, the first part of a rhythmical eschatological tetralogy traditionally ascribed to PETER DAMIAN. Its meter is accentual trochaic tetrameter, maintained flawlessly throughout the 20 three-lined strophes of this rhythm on the joys of paradise, and continued in the 35 additional strophes on death, judgment, and hell. The Ad perennis has received several excellent translations into English. Abounding in Biblical imagery, the poem captures the longing of the soul to be released from the bonds of earth to abide in the heavenly Jerusalem, especially in the unending possession of the Source of life itself. Damian's authorship is questioned, not only because of a doubt in the MS ascription in Vat. lat. 3797, fol. 362–363, and of the admittedly dubious claim of Peter the Deacon of Monte Cassino that it was written by Alberic of Monte Cassino, but for the further reason that its meter seems to be foreign to that appearing in the poetic works of Damian that have been definitely authenticated.

Bibliography: Analecta Hymnica 48:66–67. O. J. BLUM, “Alberic of Monte Cassino . . .,” Traditio 12 (1956) 87–148, esp. 128–130. S. A. HURLBUT, The Song of St. Peter Damiani (Washington 1928). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry (Oxford 1953) 250–256; A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1957) 1:369–374. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (London 1907) 1:13. J. LECLERCQ, Revue Bénédictine 67 (1957) 151–174. P. MEYVAERT, ibid., 175–181. K. REINDEL, ibid., 182–189. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:391–397.

[O. J. BLUM]

AD REGIAS AGNI DAPES

An Ambrosian hymn by an unknown author; it was used for Vespers on the Saturday after Easter and subsequent Sundays and ferials until the feast of the Ascension. The Roman Breviary had an earlier version, Ad coenam agni providi, which seemed to reflect the Ambrosian Milanese thought of the sixth century or earlier. It may very well be the work of NICETAS OF REMESIANA, a near contemporary of St. Ambrose. When this hymn was included in the 1632 reform of the Roman Breviary, it lost in its revision much of the rhythm of the primitive text, only three original lines being retained unchanged. The hymn is the song of a people newly redeemed, glorying in the triumph of their Leader, who invites them to a banquet celebration. As the Israelites were spared by the avenging angel (Ex 12.23) and as they passed miraculously through the Red Sea (Ex 14.22–23), so Christ has become Pasch and Victim (1 Cor 5.7–8) to break the bonds of Satan and offer the faithful the trophies of the spirit, especially joy.

Bibliography: H. A. DANIEL, Thesaurus hymnologicus, 5 v. (Halle-Leipzig 1841–56) 1:88, text. Analecta hymnica 51:87. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry (Oxford 1953) 41. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 140–143.

[M. M. BEYENKA]

AD SANCTAM BEATI PETRI SEDEM

A bull of Alexander VII dated Oct. 16, 1656, that states precisely that the five propositions condemned in 1653 by the bull CUM OCCASIONE of Innocent X came from C. JANSEN and that they had been condemned in the sense in which Jansen understood them. The pope recalled that he had, while cardinal, taken part in the commissions held in 1653 and that he had thus formed a personal opinion on the subject. Nevertheless, in Jansenist circles there was a persistent rumor that, in order to obtain this bull, their adversaries had showed the pope a falsified copy of AUGUSTINUS into which had been introduced the last four propositions, which were not there expressed in proper terms. For somewhat obscure reasons, the bull Ad sanctam was held in reserve for quite a long time, and it was not until March 2, 1657, that the nuncio Piccolomini sent it to Louis XIV. Cardinal Mazarin had it immediately accepted by the Assembly of the Clergy, and in the following November, not without some difficulty, by parliament.

Bibliography: H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (Freiburg 1963) 2010–12.

[L. J. COGNET]

AD TUENDAM FIDEM

Apostolic letter, “To Protect the Faith,” issued motu proprio by Pope John Paul II, May 28, 1998, adding to the codes of canon law for the Latin and the Eastern churches. The additions add a third distinction in the levels of teaching of the Magisterium, stipulate the adherence this teaching requires and the penalties to be imposed for violation, thereby making the adjusted canons reflective of the levels of teaching set out in the Profession of Faith and Oath of Fidelity issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 1989.

The first paragraph of the motu proprio explicitly states that it is written in response to concern for errors, especially “from among those dedicated to the various disciplines of sacred theology” (Introduction). Following some comments on the history of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed as a summation of the faith, the document turns to an explanation of the 1989 Profession of Faith and Oath of Fidelity, which is composed of not only the Creed but also three paragraphs “intended to describe the truths of the Catholic faith” (no. 2). The text continues with an explanation of these three paragraphs, pointing out that while the levels of teaching described in the first and third paragraphs are provided for in the codes of canon law, the level of teaching mentioned in the second paragraph is not. Ad tuendam fidem then supplies for this omission since the level of teaching omitted illustrates “the Divine Spirit’s particular inspiration for the Church’s deeper understanding of a truth concerning faith and morals, with which they are connected either for historical reasons or by a logical relationship” (no. 3).

The levels of teaching mentioned in the Profession of Faith and Oath of Fidelity and already provided for in the law are found in canons 750, §1, and 752 of the Latin code, and canons 598 and 599 of the Eastern code. Patterned closely on the wording of the Profession of Faith, the motu proprio adds the following paragraph to the law:

Each and every thing which is proposed definitively by the magisterium of the Church concerning the doctrine of faith and morals, that is, each and every thing which is required to safeguard reverently and to expound faithfully the same deposit of faith, is also to be firmly embraced and retained; therefore, one who rejects those propositions which are to be held definitively is opposed to the doctrine of the Catholic Church. (Translation from Code of Canon Law: Latin English Edition, rev. ed. [Washington: Canon Law Society of America, 1998] 247.)

The same text is added to the Code of Canon Law for the Eastern Churches. A cross reference to canon 1371 of the Latin code stipulates that violations of this canon are met with a “just penalty.”

Questions surrounding this document focus on the meaning of the word “definitive” as that is applied to official teaching, and also on which teachings fall into this second category of teaching rather than the third. When issued, the motu proprio was accompanied by a doctrinal commentary issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The commentary states that “the correct explanation” of the three final paragraphs of the Profession of Faith and Oath of Fidelity deserve “a clear presentation, so that their authentic meaning, as given by the Church’s Magisterium, will be well understood, received and integrally preserved.”

Bibliography: For the text of Ad tuendum fidem, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 90 (1998) 457–461 (Latin); Origins 28, no. 8 (16 July 1998) 113–116 (English); The Pope Speaks 43 (1998) 327–330 (English).

[E. RINERE]

ADALAR, ST.

Priest and martyr, also known as Adalher; d. Dokkum, Netherlands, June 5, 754. He was a companion of St. BONIFACE and shared the martyrdom of that great missionary in Frisia. Little more is known of him, but there is an unsubstantiated tradition that he was the first bishop of Erfurt, consecrated by Boniface himself in 741. The Acta sanctorum, however, lists him as only a priest in its account of Boniface’s last days. Adalar’s relics were taken to Erfurt c. 756, and he was honored by special veneration in that city during the Middle Ages. His relics, along with those of St. EOBBAN, rediscovered during the construction of a new church in 1154, were translated, and are now in the Erfurt cathedral.

Feast (of translation): April 20.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:450. M. OPPERMANN, Der hl. Adalarius, Erfurts erster und einziger Bischof (Paderborn 1897). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:78–80. A. BIGELMAIR, “Die Gründung der mitteldeutschen Bistümer,” in Sankt Bonifatius: Gedenkgabe z. 1200. Todestag (Fulda 1954) 247–287, esp. 279. U. TURCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:119.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

ADALARD, ST.

Carolingian abbot of Corbie, author (known also as Adalhard of Corbie); b. c. 750; d. January 2, 826. The grandson of CHARLES MARTEL and the nephew of King PEPIN III, Adalard was educated at the Frankish court. At the age of 20, in protest over CHARLEMAGNE’s repudiation of his wife, the daughter of the Lombard king DESIDERIUS, Adalard left the court and entered the Benedictine monastery of Corbie. But for ascetic-monastic, and perhaps, dynastic reasons he soon transferred to Monte Cassino. Later, probably c. 780, the monks of Corbie in conjunction with Charlemagne himself brought Adalard back to the Frankish kingdom and made him abbot at Corbie. Thenceforth Adalard, himself an important representative of the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, was in active intellectual contact with PAUL THE DEACON, ALCUIN, ANGILBERT OF SAINT-RIQUIER and others, and was reputed to be one of the more influential advisers of Charlemagne. In 809 and 810 Adalard was in Rome on the emperor’s business and met with Pope LEO III to consider the differences between Rome and the Franks on the filioque question. Possibly chief minister of the young King Pepin of Italy even at this time, Adalard was the tutor of Pepin’s son Bernard, and was Charlemagne’s missus to the Lombard Kingdom from 811 to 814, the year he was banished by Emperor LOUIS THE PIOUS for unknown reasons (perhaps at the instigation of BENEDICT OF ANIANE). He was not recalled from the island monastery of Noirmoutier until 821. Thenceforth he was active in the reorganization of his Abbey of Corbie, in founding (with WALA) the new Abbey of Corvey in Saxony, and as adviser to Louis the Pious on questions of ecclesiastical policy (e.g., his penance at Attigny, 822). As monk and abbot, Adalard enjoyed great prestige (whence his sobriquet “Antonius”), but he preserved some practices of the monastic regula mixta and came out, sometimes rather sharply, against Benedict of Aniane. His remains were elevated Oct. 10, 1040; since then he has been locally venerated as a saint. Adalard’s writings include De ordine palatii, now lost [but see M. Prou in Bibl. de l’École des Hautes Etudes 85 (Paris 1885) and Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Capitularia 2:517–530]. His De ratione lunae paschalis is also lost (cf.

Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 4:566.9 and Flodoard of Reims in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 13:531). Extant are Adalard's Statuta seu brevis Corbeiensis monasterii [ed. J. Semmler, Corpus Consuetudinum Monasticarum 1 (Siegburg 1963) 355–408] and his Capitula . . . de admonitionibus in congregatione (ed. J. Semmler, ibid. 408–418).

Feast: Jan. 2

Bibliography: Vita by PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, Patrologia Latina 120:1507–56; Charlemagne's cousins: contemporary lives of Adalard and Wala, tr. A. CABANISS (Syracuse, N.Y. 1967). Vita II and Miracles, J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti 5:289–355. B. KASTEN, Adalhard von Corbie (Düsseldorf 1986). H. PELTIER, Adalhard, abbé de Corbie (Amiens 1969). S. ABEL and B. VON SIMSON, Jahrbücher des fränkischen Reiches unter Karl dem Grossen, 2 v. (v.1 2d ed. Leipzig 1883–88), passim. B. VON SIMSON, Jahrbücher des fränkischen Reiches unter Ludwig dem Frommen, 2 v. (Leipzig 1874–76), passim. J.L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bien-heureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 1:35–38. D. A. BULLOUGH, "Baiuli in the Carolingian Regnum Langobardorum and the Career of Abbot Waldo," EngHistRev 77 (1962) 625–637. J. SCHMIDT, Hinkmars De ordine palatii und seine Quellen (Diss. Frankfurt 1962). A. E. VERHULST and J. SEMMLER, "Les Status d'Adalhard de Corbie de l'an 822," Moyen-âge 68 (1962) 91–123, 233–269. L. WEINRICH, Wala: Graf, Mönch und Rebell (Lübeck 1963). H. PELTIER and H. WIESEMAYER, in Corbie, abbaye royale (Lille 1963) 61–94, 105–133. J. SEMMLER, "Die Beschlüsse des Aachener Konzils im Jahre 816," ZKirchgesch 74 (1963) 15–82, esp. 76–82. C. BRÜHL, "Hinkmariana," Deutsch v.1 (Düsseldorf 1965) 81.

[J. SEMMLER]

ADALBALD OF OSTREVAND, ST.

Nobleman; d. near Perigueux in Aquitaine, c. 650. Information about Adalbald of Ostrevand is mainly derived from the ninth-century Life of St. Rictrude by Hucbald of Saint-Amand (Acta Sanctorum May 3:81–89). It relates that Adalbald was the grandson of St. Gertrude of Hamage, and the husband of St. Rictrude, by whom he had four children. He was the brother-in-law of St. Bertha, and friend of St. Amandus, the Apostle of Belgium, with whom he founded the abbey of Marchiennes in Flanders. He had been very active in the court of Dagobert I. Vindictive in-laws assassinated him.

Feast: Feb. 2.

Bibliography: L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude . . . saints merovingiens (Louvain 1907). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 2:44–46. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 1:236.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

ADALBERO OF AUGSBURG, BL.

Bishop; d. April 28, 909. He was highly regarded for his great erudition and his proficiency in liturgical chant, and through his zeal for regular observance the Abbey of LORSCH became a model of monastic discipline under his guidance. He was instrumental in obtaining royal favors for the monastery of SANKT GALLEN, with which he maintained close spiritual ties. Little is known of his activity while bishop of Augsburg from 887 to 909. REGINO OF PRÜM sent his Chronicon (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 1:543–612) to Adalbero for approval and correction where such might seem necessary to the bishop. This prominent churchman supervised the education of Louis the Child (d. 911), the last of the CAROLINGIAN dynasty to rule in Germany, and was his trusted adviser and loyal supporter. The tomb of Adalbero is in the church of St. Afra in Augsburg.

Feast: Oct. 9.

Bibliography: L. BOITEUX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 2:429–430. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 10:252–253. F. ZOEPLF, Neue deutsche Biographie (Berlin 1953–) 1:39–40; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:119. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung, (Berlin 1964–65) 1:268. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:155, 158. F. ZOEPLF, Das Bistum Augsburg und seine Bischöfe im Mittelalter (Augsburg 1955) 55–59.

[H. DRESSLER]

ADALBERO OF METZ

Two bishops of the See of Metz.

Adalbero I, bishop, statesman, monastic reformer; d. Saint-Trond, Belgium, April 26, 962. Son of Count Wigerich and brother of Duke Frederick of Upper Lorraine, Adalbero succeeded BENNO as bishop of Metz, the chief see of Lorraine, in 929. Always politically active, he joined the rebellion against OTTO I (938–940), with the intention of transferring Lorraine to French suzerainty. Failing in this enterprise, he thereafter remained on close, friendly terms with the German court. In 950 Adalbero intervened in France as mediator between Hugh the Great and Louis IV. He gave vital support to the monastic reform movement by reforming GORZE ABBEY in 933 and appointing Abbot Ainald. Subsequently he introduced Gorze monks into his own cathedral chapter at St. Arnulf's, and reformed other houses including Moyerfontaine and Saint-Trond, of which Adalbero himself was abbot.

Adalbero II, bishop, monastic reformer; b. c. 955–962; d. Dec. 14, 1005. Nephew of Adalbero I, and son of Duke Frederick, he was reared at Gorze and elected bishop of Verdun in 984. He was then transferred immediately to Metz through his mother's influence. More ascetic and less interested in politics than his uncle, he devoted his attention chiefly to his spiritual tasks. He introduced the Cluniac reform into Lorraine, rebuilt the dilapidated Abbey of St. Symphorian, founded three abbeys for women, and seconded, but not always wisely, Emperor HENRY II's ecclesiastical policy. He promoted education and made Metz the intellectual center of Upper Lorraine. He enjoyed a local, unofficial cult as a beatus.

Feast: Dec. 15.

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

ADALBERO OF WÜRZBURG, ST.

Bishop; b. c. 1010; d. Lambach Abbey, Oct. 6, 1090. Last of the Carinthian counts of Lambach Wels, he studied at Paris, became a canon of the cathedral of Würzburg, and, named by Emperor Henry III, was consecrated bishop of Würzburg (June 30, 1045). He was a zealous if litigious bishop, maintaining his episcopal rights against both the monastery of Fulda (1049) and the Diocese of Bamberg (1052). During the struggle between King (later Emperor) Henry IV and Pope Gregory VII, he remained loyal to the imperial cause until Henry "excommunicated" the pope (1076). He then broke with Henry and participated actively in his deposition (1077). In 1085, forced from his see by an antibishop, Meginhard, he found final refuge at Lambach, his ancestral monastery, which he himself had reestablished as a Benedictine abbey. His cultus was approved in 1883.

Feast: Oct. 6.

Bibliography: Kirche in der Gesellschaft: Dimensionen der Seelsorge, eds. R. SCHNEIDER and L. BRANDL (Passau 1992). P.-W. SCHEELE, Die Herrlichkeit des Herrn: die Lambacher Fresken aus der Zeit des heiligen Adalbero (Würzburg 1990). P. J. JORG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:120.

[S. WILLIAMS]

ADALBERT OF BREMEN

Archbishop of Bremen-Hamburg, royal adviser; b. Thuringia, c. 1000; d. Goslar, March 16, 1072. Born of noble parents, he was educated at Halberstadt, where he became canon and, by 1032, provost. Then through royal favor he was made archbishop of Bremen-Hamburg (1045–72). Under him the see's efforts to convert the northern Slavs and Scandinavians were intensified. Denmark was deeply influenced by Bremen, Sweden only temporarily, and Norway hardly at all; missionaries sailed to Iceland, Greenland, the Orkneys, and Finland; in 1060 Slavic sees were erected at Mecklenburg and Ratzeburg. After the Council of SUTRI (1046) Adalbert refused Emperor Henry III's offer of the papacy. He hoped instead to establish his see as a patriarchate (probably over a Danish archbishop), but was only appointed papal agent for the evangelization of northern Europe, i.e., he was made legate, and then vicar in 1053. In German politics he played a leading role as adviser to Henry III and guardian to young HENRY IV, and virtually ruled (1064–66) until rival nobles exiled him from court (1066–69). This reversal prevented the realization of his greatest ambition, to make his see into a compact duchy in which the archbishop would be the leading economic, religious, and political power; nonetheless, he enlarged its power and prestige substantially. He is typical of the great German prelates who served the Salians on the eve of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE. Adam of Bremen's history is the best source for Adalbert's life.

Bibliography: E. N. JOHNSON, "A. of Hamburg-Bremen: A Politician of the Eleventh Century," Speculum 9 (1934) 147–79. O. H. MAY, Regesten der Erzbischöfe von Bremen, v.1 (Hanover 1928–37) 53–79, with full bibliog.; Neue deutsche Biographie 1:42–43. H. FUHRMANN, "Studien zur Geschichte mittelalterlicher Patriarchate," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 41 (1955) 120–70.

[R. KAY]

ADALBERT OF PRAGUE, ST.

Bishop, martyr; b. probably at Libice, the ancestral stronghold of his family, 956; d. near Danzig, April 23, 997. He was baptized Vojtech and was a member of the East Bohemian princely dynasty of Slavnik. At confirmation he took the name Adalbert, the name of the first archbishop of Magdeburg, who had supervised his education. Because of his great piety and demonstrated ability, the young Adalbert was chosen bishop of Prague in 982, after the death of Thietmar, the first bishop of Prague, a German by birth. Thus Adalbert was the first Czech to occupy the See of Prague. His position was particularly important owing to the great influence of the Slavnik family to which he belonged. A man of austerity, energy, and zeal, Adalbert strove to improve and reform his clergy, to suppress abuses and pagan survivals, and to spread Christianity throughout Bohemia and neighboring Hungary. His activity, however, aroused the enmity of the extreme nationalists, who sympathized with the old pagan traditions, and led to a conflict with the Duke of Bohemia, St. Adalbert of Prague receiving the crozier from Otto II, detail of bronze doors, Cathedral at Gniezno, c. 1175.

Boleslas II. Adalbert, when forced to leave Prague, went to Rome, where he became a monk at the Benedictine Abbey of SS. Alexius and Boniface. In 992 he was persuaded to return to Prague, but found it necessary to leave again in 995. In that same year Boleslas II treacherously attacked Libice and massacred all the members of the Slavnik family and their principal supporters. Refused permission to return to his see, Adalbert obtained a release from his episcopal obligations from John XV and dedicated himself entirely to missionary activity. A close friend of Emperor OTTO III, Adalbert was his trusted adviser on problems concerned with the progressive Christianization of the Slavs. Adalbert was also a close friend and collaborator of SS. ROMUALD and BRUNO OF QUERFURT. In 995 he accepted the invitation of King Boleslas I the Great of Poland to organize missionary work among the heathen Prussians on the Baltic coast, where he met a martyr's death. His body was ransomed by King Boleslas and buried at Gniezno, Poland, and in 1039 was translated to Prague.

Feast: April 23.

Bibliography: Adalbert von Prag: Brückenbauer zwischen dem Osten und Westen Europas, ed. H. H. HENRIX (Baden-Baden 1997). Svatý Vojtech: sborník k mileniu, ed. J. V. POLC (Prague 1997). J. CANAPARIUS, Vita s. Adalberti in v.1 of Fontes rerum Bohemicarum, 7 v. (Prague 1873–1932). E. JOHANSSON, Studien zu Nicolaus von Jeroschins Adalbertübersetzung (Lund 1967). BRUNO OF QUERFURT, Vita s. Adalberti, ibid. H. G. VOIGT, Adalbert v. Prag (Berlin 1898). F. DVORNIK, The Making of Central and Eastern Europe (London 1949); The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956); Svatý Vojtech: druhý pražský biskup (Olomouc 1997). J. KRASÍNSKI, Milenium sw. Wojciecha, 997–1997 (Sandomierz 1997). J. WYROZUMSKI, Legenda pruska o swietym Wojciechu (Krakow 1997). Ezer év Szent Adalbert oltalma alatt, ed. A. HEGEDÜS and I. BÁRDOS (Esztergom 2000).

[O. P. SHERBOWITZ-WETZOR]

ADALBERT THE DEACON, ST.

Missionary; b. England, late seventh century; d. Egmond, Holland, June 25, 705. Possibly a member of the English royalty, he devoted himself to missionary work. Under the leadership of St. WILLIBRORD, Adalbert left his monastery in 690 to evangelize Friesland. Though he never advanced beyond the rank of deacon, Adalbert's patience and kindness made him an effective witness to the faith. He became archdeacon of Utrecht, a position entailing considerable responsibility. In about 702 he went to preach in northern Holland and built a church in Egmond, where he is buried. After his death his tomb became a place of pilgrimage, and his cult had the support of the counts of Holland, who in 923 founded the Abbey of Egmond in his honor. Adalbert's first biographer, Rupert, wrote almost 200 years later, and hence the details of his vita are largely conjectural. He should not be confused with the Abbot Adalbert of Echternach.

Feast: June 25.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 3:586–600. Acta Sanctorum June 7:82–95. A. BUTLER, Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:641–642.

[J. F. FAHEY]

ADALDAG, ST.

Seventh archbishop of Bremen-Hamburg; b. c. 900; d. Bremen, Germany, April 28 or 29, 988 (commemorated, April 28). A Saxon and canon of Hildesheim, Adaldag was the chancellor of Emperor OTTO I when he succeeded UNNI as archbishop of the great northern See of Bremen-Hamburg in 937. Adaldag remained one of Otto's principal advisers, and when Otto deposed and abducted Pope BENEDICT V (964), it was Adaldag who served as the pope's custodian. As archbishop, Adaldag proved energetic and effective and carried on extensive missionary activities. Under him the Danish suffragan Sees of Schleswig, Ribe, Aarhus, and Odense were founded. The Diocese of Oldenburg in Holstein was set up as a base for a reinvigorated mission to the Wends. He successfully ward off the claim of the archbishop of Cologne to metropolitan jurisdiction over Bremen.

Bibliography: ADAM OF BREMEN, History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen, tr. F. J. TSCHAN (New York 1959). O. H. MAY, Regesten der Erzbischofe von Bremen, v.1 (Hanover 1928). G. DEHIO, Geschichte des Erzbistums Hamburg-Bremen (Berlin 1877). G. GLAESKE, Die Erzbischöfe von Hamburg-Bremen als Reichsfürsten (937–1258) (Hildesheim 1962).

[J. F. FAHEY]

ADALGAR OF BREMEN, ST.

Third archbishop of Bremen-Hamburg; d. Bremen, May 9, 909. Having proved a pious, wise, and zealous monk and deacon at Corvey, he was assigned (865) by his abbot—also named Adalgar—to assist Abp. REMBERT OF BREMEN-HAMBURG. Adalgar became Rembert's coadjutor and then his successor (889) after confirmation by King Louis II and his sons Louis III and Carloman, by Emperor Arnulf, by the abbot and monastery of Corvey, and by a local synod. He received the pallium from Pope STEPHEN V, was consecrated by Abp. Sundrold of Mainz, and received his crozier from Arnulf. Adalgar traveled throughout his see and attended the royal court; his missionary activity was somewhat limited by the Norman wars. He was involved in a dispute with Abp. Herman of Cologne, who forced Bremen into the status of suffragan bishopric by means of the Synod of Tribur (895) presided over by Abp. Hatto of Mainz. However, Pope SERGIUS III abrogated this decision at the end of Adalgar's life. Adalgar appointed a coadjutor, Hoger of Bremen-Hamburg, and five bishops. He is buried in the basilica of St. Michael in Bremen. TRITHEMIUS was the first to call him a saint (De Viris illustribus 3.214); northern writers say nothing of canonization. There is a baroque statue of him in the choir at Corvey.

Feast: May 15.

Bibliography: ADAM OF BREMEN, History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen, ed. and tr. F. J. TSCHAN (New York 1959). Leben der Erzbischöfe Anskar und Rimbert, ed. W. WATTENBACH (Die Geschichtschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit 22; 3d ed. Leipzig 1939). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:174.

[G. SPAHR]

ADALGIS OF NOVARA, ST.

Bishop; d. c. 850. According to a constant tradition, Adalgis (or Adelgis) was of Lombard origin and possibly belonged to the same family as DESIDERIUS, the last Lombard king. Though nothing is known of his early life, it is likely that Adalgis was a canon of the church of San Gaudenzio in Novara. It is not clear whether his nomination to the episcopacy (c. 830) was because of his merits or his family connections. He seems to have been a man of considerable importance, for his name is found on many documents during the years 835 to 848. He was buried in the church of San Gaudenzio, which he had endowed a short while before; his remains were transferred to the cathedral c. 1590.

Feast: Oct 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 3:945–947. V. G. GREMIGNI and A. CARDINALI, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961–) 1:194–196.

[J. E. LYNCH]

ADALGOTT, SS.

Two abbots of Disentis with this name.

Adalgott I, abbot; d. Nov. 1, 1031. A Benedictine monk from the abbey of Einsiedeln, he became abbot of Disentis in 1016. He was interested in monastic reform and the elaboration of the liturgy. According to the Einsiedeln chronicler, who preserves a verse epitaph of him, he was popularly honored as a saint immediately after his death. In 1672 his relics were enshrined in a new church at the abbey.

Feast: Oct 26.

Adalgott II, abbot, and bishop of Chur; d. abbey of Disentis, Switzerland, Oct. 3, 1160. A disciple of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, he became abbot of Disentis and bishop of Chur, Switzerland, in 1150 and served in both offices with outstanding devotion until his death. He appears to have been a great benefactor of other religious houses, such as Münster and Schännis, where commemoration of him was later made. He was a figure of some importance in the affairs of the time, being connected with Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA and the prince bishop of Constance and also with Pope Stephen III, whose fellow student he had been. His feast is still kept in the Diocese of Chur, and his relics were enshrined along with those of Adalgott I in the abbey church in 1672.

Feast: Oct. 3.

Bibliography: Adalgott. Acta Sanctorum Nov. 1:385. I. MÜLLER, Disentiser Klostersgeschichte (Einsiedeln 1942) 75, 81, 236, 268; Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:124. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:222, 224. Adalgott II. I. MÜLLER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:124. J. G. MAYER, Geschichte des Bistums Chur (Stans 1907) 206–212. L. BURGNER, Helvetia sancta, 2 v. (New York 1860) 1:7–9. A. M. ZIMMERMANN Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:133, 135.

[J. L. GRASSI]

ADAM

The name given in the genealogical lists of Gn 4.25–5.5 to the first human being, identical in form with the Hebrew word for man, 'ādām. He is named simply Man, not merely because he was the first man, but rather because he was regarded as the type of all mankind (Gn 5.2). However, in the story of PARADISE and the Fall of Man in Gn 2.4b–3.24 the term is always preceded by the definite article in Hebrew, hā-'ādām, "the man," and therefore in this section it should not be translated as if it were a proper noun. The Hebrew word 'ādām means man in the sense of "mankind"; to designate an individual man, Hebrew must use the term ben 'ādām, son, i.e., member, of the human race. This fact is of some importance in the interpretation of the story of the fall of man, in which the inspired author is speaking not so much about an individual man as about the whole human race typified by this individual.

The derivation of the Hebrew word 'ādām is uncertain. Probably there is nothing more than a folk etymology in Gn 2.7 where it is implied that man is called 'ādām because God formed him out of the dirt of the 'ādāmâ (ground). But in any case, the author of Gn 2.4b–3.24 makes skillful use of this derivation: because man (’ādām) was formed from the ground (’āḏāmā), he is destined to till the ground (Gn 2.5) in hard labor (3.17, 23) and ultimately go back to it in death (3.17).

“Creation of Adam,” detail of a fresco cycle by Michelangelo, 1508–1512, Sistine Chapel. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

According to the genealogies of the PATRIARCHS, Adam lived for 930 years (Gn 5.5). The children that EVE bore him were Cain, Abel and Seth (4.1–2, 25).

After these first few chapters of Genesis, Adam is not mentioned again in the Old Testament until the books written in the last few centuries before Christ (1 Chr 1.1; Tb 8.6; Sir 17.1–4; 49.16; Wis 2.23–24; 9.2–3; 10.1–2), when people began to speculate about the first man. Several curious tales are told about Adam in the apocryphal and rabbinical writings.

In the New Testament, besides the passing references in Lk 3.38, Acts 17.26, and Jude 14, Adam is mentioned in connection with the Christian doctrine on marriage (Mt 19.4–6; Eph 5.31), the position of women

(1 Cor 11.7–12; 1 Tm 2.13–14), and especially the teachings of St. Paul on the universality of grace (Rom 5.12–21), the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15.21–22), and the state of the glorified body (1 Cor 15.45–49). Paul draws an important contrast between “the first, the old, the earthly Adam” of Genesis and “the second, the new, the heavenly Adam” who is Christ; the former is the “figure” (τύπος) of the latter (Rom 5.14). The Christian must “strip off the old Adam and his deeds and put on the new Adam, so that he may be renewed unto perfect knowledge according to the image of his Creator” (Col 3.9–10).

In theology both Greek and Latin fathers affirmed a privileged state for Adam, head of the human race, before his sin, but the enumeration and analysis of his gifts were arrived at slowly. Some, such as Gregory of Nyssa, tended to elaborate; others, such as Irenaeus, tended to attenuate the Genesis paradisaical passages. Augustine formulated the traditional gifts: immortality, IMPASSIBILITY, INTEG-

Adam and Eve after the expulsion from paradise, painting by Veronese. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

RITY, a marvelous knowledge. He made the gift of original justice seem the same as sanctifying GRACE. Anselm followed Augustine but saw ORIGINAL JUSTICE as pertaining to the nature of man. Aquinas taught that Adam was created in grace but left room for a distinction between sanctifying grace and original justice, the former regarded not as a formal constituent of original justice but as efficient cause. He followed Augustine's enumeration of the gifts, as did most scholastics up until the present century. A triple subordination existed in Adam. His reason was subject to God, the lower powers to reason, the body to the soul; and the first subjection was the cause of both the second and third (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 95.1). The Church is more cautious than its theologians. Nowhere are the gifts singly defined. Trent uses the phrase "holiness and justice" to indicate them (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1511).

The theory of evolution and the findings of paleontology have proposed many questions about the first man (see EVOLUTION). Were there many Adams or just one? Was Adam the paragon of creation or a cave man? Did he know the natures of all created things or was his knowledge very primitive? Contemporary sciences dealing with the origin of man seem to contradict the traditional concept of Adam. "If the details of the evolutionary theory regarding man are still hypothetical, its general direction is uncontestedly shown [and] the conception of a primitive paradisaal state would seem to be absolutely outside the facts" (Gardeil).

Contemporary theology on Adam has accepted, in general, this trend in scientific thought. Pius XII in 1950 reminded Catholics that "the Catholic faith obliges us to believe that souls are immediately created by God" and that Adam cannot be regarded as representing a certain number of first parents since "it is in no way apparent how such an opinion can be reconciled with what the founts of revelation and the pronouncements of the magisterium of the Church set forth concerning original sin” (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3896–97).

“Creation of Adam,” detail of Fresco cycle by Michelangelo. (Scala/Art Resource, NY)

Toward a harmony of science and revealed truth, theologians make many points. Three may be mentioned here. There is a parallel between the production of the first man and that of any man. As in the latter case biology cannot ascertain the fact of the infusion of the soul by God, so in the former paleontology cannot ascertain the fact of the divine intervention. Again, sanctifying grace is not to be judged or measured by technology. The first man may indeed have been a primitive; this does not rule out his FRIENDSHIP WITH GOD. Finally, the special endowments of Adam may be interpreted now as “germs or possibilities rather than perfections actually realized” (Gardeil).

See Also: EVE; CREATION, ARTICLES ON; ORIGINAL SIN.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951-), Tables générales 1:30–33. J. SCHILDENBERGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:127–130. A. ROBERT and A. TRICOT, Guide to the Bible, tr. E. P. ARBEZ and M. P. MC GUIRE, 2 v. (Tournai-New York 1951–55; v. 1 rev. and enl. 1960) 1:174, excellent bibliog. on European and American lit. to 1960. L. PIROT and J. B. FREY, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928-) 1:86–134. J. JEREMIAS, in G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935-) 1:141–143. J. DANIELOU, From Shadows to Reality, tr. W. HIBBERD (Westminster, Md. 1960). A. VITTI, “Christus-Adam,” Biblica 7 (1926) 121–145, 270–285, 384–401. C. WESTERMANN, Genesis 1–11 (Minneapolis, 1984–86). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 1a, 90–102, and commentary by H. D. GARDEIL in Somme théologique 1.90–102: Les Origines de l’homme, tr. A. PATFOORT (Paris 1963) 423–451. J. COPPENS, La Connaissance du bien et du mal et le péché du Paradis (Louvain 1948), also in Revue biblique 56 (1949) 300–308. J. DE FRAINE, The Bible and the Origins of Man (New York 1962). A. M. DUBARLE, Le Péché originel dans l’Écriture (Paris 1958). C. HAURET, Beginnings: Genesis and Modern Science, tr. and ed. E. P. EMMANS (Dubuque 1964). M. M. LABOURDETTE, Le Péché originel et les origines de l’homme (Paris 1953). J. L. MCKENZIE, Myths and Realities (Milwaukee 1963) 146–181. R. J. NOGAR, The Wisdom of Evolution (Garden City, N.Y. 1963). H. RENCKENS, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. NAPIER (New York 1964). L. F. HARTMAN, "Sin in Paradise," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly, 20 (1958) 26–40, with fine bibliog. C. REILLY, "Adam and Primitive Man," The Irish Theological Quarterly 26 (1959) 331–345. C. VOLLERT, "Evolution and the Bible," Symposium on Evolution (Pittsburgh 1959) 81–119.

[E. H. PETERS/T. R. HEATH/EDS.]

ADAM, KARL

Historian of dogma and dogmatic theologian; b. Purbruck, Bavaria, Oct. 22, 1876; d. Tübingen, April 1, 1966. After ordination in 1900, Adam continued his studies at Munich, later devoting himself to teaching and pastoral duties there and in Strasbourg. In 1919 he became professor for dogmatic theology at the University of Tübingen, a post which he held until his retirement just after World War II.

At Tübingen his lectures and books enjoyed a favorable reception, especially The Spirit of Catholicism (1924). This book, his masterpiece, was translated into 11 languages; it communicated to Catholics all over the world a truly theological view of the Church with emphasis on the doctrine of the Mystical Body. Another much-translated work, The Son of God (1933), presented Christology in a language suitable to the needs of his contemporaries. His historical sense and sincere piety gave an added dimension not often found in theological popularizations. In his retirement he gave vigorous support to ecumenicism (One and Holy, 1948). His last major work was The Christ of Faith (1954).

Bibliography: AUBERT in Tendenzen der Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert, ed. H. J. SCHULTZ, (Stuttgart, Olten 1966) 156–162. A. AUER, "Karl Adam 1876–1966," Theologische Quartalschrift 150 (1970) 130–143. J. STELZENBERGER, "Bibliographie Karl Adam," Theologie Quartalschrift 138 (1958) 330–347. R. A. KRIEG, Karl Adam: Catholicism in German Culture (Notre Dame 1992).

[P. MISNER]

ADAM EASTON

English cardinal, theologian responsible for the papal condemnation of John Wyclif in 1377, author of several important spiritual and liturgical works; b. Easton, England, c. 1330; d. Rome, Sept. 20, 1397. Easton, a monk of Norwich cathedral priory, studied at Oxford and graduated there as master of theology in 1366. Two years later he accompanied the Benedictine cardinal, SIMON LANGHAM of Canterbury, to the papal Curia at AVIGNON and completed there by 1377 his Defensorium ecclesiastice potestatis, a systematic refutation of the antipapal writings of MARSILIUS OF PADUA and John WYCLIF. He was an eyewitness of the disputed election of Pope URBAN VI, the validity of which he consistently maintained. In 1381 he was promoted to cardinal and wrote the Office of the Visitation of the BVM, promulgated in 1389 in the cause of Church unity. Another major work, Defensorium s. Birgittae led to the canonization of BRIDGET OF SWEDEN in 1391. Easton's extant writings reveal him to have been one of the greatest biblical scholars and Hebraists of the 14th century.

Bibliography: L. MACFARLANE, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, Doctrine et histoire 4.1:5–8; The Life and Writings of Adam Easton, 2 v. (U. of London thesis, 1955). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Review of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 1:620–21.

[L. MACFARLANE]

ADAM MARSH

English theologian (also known as de Marisco); b. in Diocese of Bath and Wells, late 12th century; d. Nov. 18, 1258. He studied arts under ROBERT GROSSETESTE at Oxford, where he had become master by 1226. He became a Franciscan at Worcester in 1232 or 1233. He returned to Oxford to study theology under Grosseteste until the latter became bishop of Lincoln in 1235. As intimate friend and adviser of Grosseteste, he accompanied the bishop to the Council of Lyons (1244–46). Around 1247, he became the first Franciscan master in theology at Oxford, where he taught until 1250. He was constantly summoned by King Henry III for official business; by BONIFACE OF SAVOY, Archbishop of Canterbury, for counsel; and by the pope for settling local disputes. In 1256, the king and the archbishop tried unsuccessfully to secure his appointment to the See of Ely. He explored the possibilities of making peace with France in 1257. In his lifetime he had the title of "Doctor illustris." ROGER BACON spoke of Adam and Grosseteste as "the greatest clerics in the world," (Opus Tertium, 22, 23, 25). His 247 letters, published by J. S. Brewer [Monumenta Franciscana (Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores 1858) 1:77–489], are of unusual historical interest, but the theological and exegetical works ascribed to him have not yet been studied or edited.

Bibliography: A. G. LITTLE, The Gray Friars in Oxford (Oxford 1892) 134–39; "The Franciscan School at Oxford in the 13th Century," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 19 (1926) 831–38. D. DOUIE, "A. de Marisco," Durham University Journal 32 (1940) 81–97. G. CANTINI, "Adam de Marisco," Antonianum 23 (1948) 441–74. M. CREIGHTON, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 1:79. A. DE SERÉNT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:482–84. A. B. EMDEN A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:1225–26.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ADAM OF BUCKFIELD

Aristotelian philosopher of Oxford; b. Bockenfield, Northumberland, c. 1220; d. between 1279 and 1294. He was a student at Oxford in 1238, and by 1243 he became a master in arts. In 1249, then a subdeacon, he was recommended by ADAM MARSH to ROBERT GROSSETESTE for the rectory of Iver, Buckinghamshire, and was praised highly for his piety and learning. In 1264 he held a canonry and prebend at Lincoln, probably having abandoned the schools of Oxford. There is no contemporary evidence that he was a master in theology.

All his extant writings relate to his teaching career in the faculty of arts at Oxford. The precise determination of his writings is a delicate matter. Some are ascribed to Adam Buckfield, some to Adam Bouchermeftort, others vaguely to Magister Adam Anglicus; and six works survive in two versions. M. GRABMANN, the first to consider the problem seriously, assumed that Buckfield and Bouchermeftort were distinct individuals and assigned one set of writings to each on the basis of the manuscript tradition. Later, Grabmann himself acknowledged that Buckfield and Bouchermeftort are the same person. A diversity of names for a single individual is not unusual, since medieval scribes were frequently unfamiliar with the place name being copied; Emden has noted 22 different forms for Adam of Buckfield.

His works, commonly called notulae, glosae, or sententiae, cover all the libri naturales of Aristotle and the Metaphysica nova, the version from the Arabic. His method of exposition was one used early in the schools and later popularized by Averroës. It consists in a literal exposition and analysis of each section of the text that had been divided and subdivided. Buckfield's exposition is remarkable for its clarity, conciseness, and accuracy. He used the Latin version of Aristotle known as the corpus vetustius, although he sometimes referred to other versions. Occasionally he inserted short questions to clarify difficult points. A notable one, the only fully developed quaestio, occurs at the end of De anima, Bk. 1. Although he utilized Avicenna, ALGAZEL, and others, his principal source was Averroës, often to the point of simply paraphrasing him. However, unlike Averroës, Buckfield maintained a plurality of forms in material substance (see FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF).

Besides commenting on Aristotle he also wrote glosses on the pseudo-Aristotelian De plantis and De differentia spiritus et animae, and a Quaestio de augmento. The authenticity of In metaph. vetus and De causis, sometimes ascribed to him, is doubtful. The De anima in the Berlin manuscript is a compilation drawn from Buckfield and ALBERT THE GREAT.

The 45 surviving manuscripts, widely scattered, indicate that his works were considerably popular in the Middle Ages. The importance of Buckfield lies in the range of his commentaries, the perfection of his technique, and the indication of the curriculum of arts at Oxford in the middle of the 13th century.

Bibliography: ADAM OF BUCKFIELD, "Super secundum Metaphysicae," ed. A. A. MAURER in Nine Medieval Thinkers, ed. J. R. O'DONNELL (Toronto 1955) 99–144. D. A. CALLUS, Revue néoscholastique de philosophie 42 (1939) 413–24, 433–38; "Introduction of Aristotelian Learning to Oxford," Proceedings of the British Academy 29 (1943) 255–56. M. GRABMANN, Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, 3 v. (Munich 1925–56) 138–82, 614–16. F. PELSTER, Scholastik 11 (1936) 196–224. S. H. THOMSON, Medievalia et humanistica 2 (1944) 55–87; 3 (1945) 132–33; 12 (1948) 23–32. L. BATAILLON, ibid. 13 (1960) 35–39. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 1:297.

[D. A. CALLUS]

ADAM OF EBRACH, BL.

Abbot; b. near Cologne, c. 1100; d. Nov. 20, 1161. He is probably to be identified with Adam, monk of MORIMOND, to whom BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX wrote two surviving letters (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 182:91–105). Adam was originally a monk of MARMOU-TIER who by 1121 had become a CISTERCIAN at Foligny, whence he went to Morimond and became abbot. In 1125 he and many of the monks abandoned Morimond, and only considerable pressure from Bernard induced them to return. Adam founded the Abbey of EBRACH, near Mannheim, in 1127 and became its first abbot. His high and saintly reputation so assured the house of success that he was able to make new foundations: at Reun (1129), HEILSBRONN and Langheim (1133), Nepomuk (1145), Alderspach (1146), and Bildhausen (1158). In his final years he was a correspondent of the mystic St. HILDEGARDE OF BINGEN and an ardent supporter of the CRUSADES. His cult has never been officially recognized, but his feast is kept by the Cistercians.

Feast: Feb. 25.

Bibliography: F. X. VON WEGELE, "Relacio . . . et . . . Narratio foundationis monasterii Eberacensis," Monumenta Eberacensis (Nördlingen 1863) 3–7. R. TRILHE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 1:461–463. F. J. SCHMALE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:131–132. SELNER, Brevis notitia monasterii B.M.V. Ebracensis (Rome 1749) 99–102.

[J. L. GRASSI]

ADAM OF ORLETON

Master of arts; doctor of canon law, Oxford (1310); bishop of Hereford (1317), Worcester (1327), Winchester (1333); d. Farnham Castle, Hampshire, July 18, 1345. He sided with the Mortimers against Edward II and engineered the escape of Roger Mortimer of Wigmore from the Tower (1323). When charged with treason, Orleton refused to plead before a civil court and was condemned in absence (1324). Protected meanwhile by the other bishops, he joined Queen Isabella's forces (1326) and played a leading part in securing Edward's abdication (1327). He served on Edward III's regency council as treasurer, and he represented Edward in dealings with JOHN XXII and with France, retaining the king's favor even after Mortimer's fall (1330). His conviction was annulled (1329). He quarreled with Archbishop JOHN STRATFORD (1341) and may have written the king's answer to Stratford's criticisms of the government. Modern writers tend to accept the view of the chronicles of Geoffrey le Baker (ed. E. M. Thompson, Oxford 1889) that Orleton was able, but opportunist and unscrupulous.

Bibliography: Registrum Ade de Orleton, Episcopi Herefordensis, A.D. MCCCXVII–MCCCXXVII, ed. A. T. BANNISTER (Canterbury and York Society; London 1908). H. R. LUARD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 1:79–81. J. C. DAVIES, Baronial Opposition to Edward II (Cambridge, Eng. 1918). E. L. G. STONES, "The Date of Roger Mortimer's Escape from the Tower of London," English Historical Review 66 (1951) 97–98. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:1402–04. M. MCKISACK, The Fourteenth Century, 1307–99 (Oxford 1959).

[R. W. HAYS]

ADAM OF PERSEIGNE

Cistercian abbot, spiritual writer; b. Champagne; d. Perseigne, 1221. After entering the clerical state, Adam received an excellent education in philosophy and theology. He was first attached to the court of the Count of Champagne as chaplain and confessor of Countess Marie. The chronology of Adam's life is uncertain but it is generally assumed that he successively joined the Canons Regular, the Benedictines of MARMOUTIER, and finally the Cistercians at PONTIGNY, where he served as master of novices. In 1188 he was elected abbot of Perseigne near Alençon. Adam's public career reached its climax in the service of Innocent III. In 1199 he mediated the feud over royal succession following the death of King Richard I, the Lionhearted. In 1200 he participated in the organization of the Fourth Crusade (see CRUSADES); in 1203 he arbitrated the disputed episcopal election at Reims; and in 1208 he acted as peacemaker between PHILIP II AUGUSTUS of France and King JOHN of England. He was venerated in his abbey as blessed. Much of Adam's literary work has been lost. The surviving portion consists of letters of spiritual guidance and of sermons on the Blessed Virgin or on various scriptural passages. He was a master of medieval Latin style, was well acquainted with the Bible and with patristic and Cistercian sources such as the works of St. Bernard and St. Aelred. He was warm, sympathetic, and sincere, a man of piety and practical wisdom.

Bibliography: Sources. Lettres (Sources Chrétiennes 66; Paris 1960-) v.1, Texte latin, introduction, traduction et notes, ed. J. BOUVET; Patrologia Latina 211:579–779. J. BOUVET, "Correspondance d'Adam, Abbé de Perseigne, 1188–1221," Archives Historiques du Maine 13 (1953) 101–60. Literature. L. T. MERTON, "La Formation monastique selon Adam de Perseigne," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum 19 (1957) 1–17. J. BOUVET, "Biographie d'Adam de Perseigne," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum 20 (1958) 16–26. B. LOHR, "The Philosophical Life According to Adam of Perseigne," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum 24 (1962) 225–42; 25 (1963) 31–43. A. MIGNON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1:387–88. L. CALENDINI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:488–90. A. LE BAIL, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire 1:198–201.

[L. J. LEKAI]

ADAM OF SAINT-VICTOR

Victorine canon and liturgical poet; b. probably in Britain or Brittany, c. 1110; d. apparently c. 1180. Little exact biographical information is known about Adam since no account of his life was written before that by William of Saint-Lô (d. 1349). Educated in Paris, Adam entered the monastery of SAINT-VICTOR c. 1130; there he followed the lectures of HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR. His theological ideas are Augustinian, as is evidenced in his poem on mankind, Haeres peccati (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 196:1422), which served as his epitaph. At one time he was thought to be the author of scholastic and Biblical works, but this is now challenged (F. Stegmüller, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi [Madrid 1949–61] 1:14). However, he is known and praised for the composition of approximately 45 SEQUENCES, rhythmic pieces to be used in the liturgy of the Mass preceding the Gospel. At the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215) INNOCENT III gave Adam's Sequences a general approbation. He is credited with having brought to perfection the Sequence poetry that had been initiated by NOTKER BALBULUS and nurtured at Saint-Victor even before Adam's time. His poetry is based on accent, rhyme, and a fixed number of syllables, 4, 6, 8, 10, or 12 (J. De Ghellinck, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle [Brussels-Paris 1946] 2:295–298). After the invocation of the first strophe, his Sequences describe the virtues and the miracles of the saint whose feast is being celebrated (e.g., St. Geneviève, the patron of Paris, Sequence 10). In his Sequences on Christ and the Blessed Virgin, Adam made use of the allegory typical of his day (F. J. E. Raby, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages [Oxford 1953] 345–375).

See Also: HYMNOLOGY.

Bibliography: Oeuvres poétiques, ed. L. GAUTIER, 2 v. (Paris 1858–59); Les Proses: Texte et musique, ed. E. MISSET and P. AUBRY (Paris 1900); Sämtliche Sequenzen, lateinisch und deutsch, ed. and tr. F. WELLNER (2d ed. Munich 1955). Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 8:53–55. Histoire littéraire de la France (Paris 1865–) 15:40–45; 29:589–98. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 3:1002–08. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 345–375. H. SPANKE, “Die Kompositionskunst der Sequenzen Adams von St. Victor,” Studi medievali 14 (1941) 1–29.

[P. DELHAYE]

ADAM PULCHRAE MULIERIS

Secular master of theology at Paris; fl. 1210–1250. The personage designated by this perennially enigmatic name is gradually becoming better identified. He was Master Adam who read the Sentences at Paris (1243–1245) under Peter of Lamballe (d. 1256), the text of which is preserved in Paris MS, Bibl. Nat. Lat. 15652. He was a contemporary of Eudes Rigauld (fl. 1236–75), Peter the Archbishop (fl. 1245–48), Stephen of Poligny (fl. 1242–48), and John Pagus (fl. 1231–46), but older than Bertrand of Bayonne (fl. 1240–59), ALBERT THE GREAT, Eudes of Rosny, and John Pointlasne (Pungens asinum; fl. 1245–48). Having been a master of arts, he was probably fairly well known in his day, for he composed De intelligentiis (or Memoriale rerum difficilium) between 1210 and 1240. In it he manifests knowledge of various writings of ARISTOTLE, notably the Metaphysics, and at least one treatise by AVICENNA. He seems to have been inspired by the hierarchical illumination theme of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS and to have had a profoundly voluntaristic conception of man and life. His activities and influence cannot be fully appreciated until publication of numerous treatises attributed to “Master Adam,” including those of ADAM OF BUCKFIELD or Bouchermefort.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) v. 17–18 of Bibliothèque Thomiste, 1:288; “Les Années 1242–1247 à la Faculté de Théologie de Paris,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 29 (Louvain 1962) 234–249. C. BAEUMKER, Witelo, ein Philosoph und Naturforscher des XIII. Jahrhunderts (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 3.2; Münster 1908); Miscellanea Francesco Ehrle, v.1 (Studi e Testi 37; Rome 1924) 87–102.

[P. GLORIEUX]

ADAM WODHAM

English Franciscan theologian; b. c. 1295; d. Babwell, England, 1358. Also known as Adam Wodeham. He seems to have studied at Oxford (c. 1317–19), for he attended disputations given by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM and WALTER OF CHATTON. He lectured on the Sentences in the Franciscan friary in London (1328–30) before presenting a revised version at Oxford (1330–32). A marginal note in manuscript Vat. Latin 955, folio 1v, refers to a collection of the lectures made at Oxford in 1331. Later Adam prepared a definitive text (Ordinatio) and a shorter version (Editio media). He also lectured on the Sentences at Norwich (1332–34). The Editio media was abbreviated by Henry (Totting) of Oyta c. 1373 (ed. Paris 1512). Adam is also credited with a revised text of disputed questions (Determinationes); however, there is no manuscript evidence for the writings on Scripture attributed to him by L. Wadding and others. Adam is frequently called an Ockhamist. Not only did he accept the dedication of Ockham’s Summa logicae, but he seems to have written the prologue to the work, stating that he was not ashamed to have been under the rod of such a master. Because of this intimacy, he is often called the “imitator of Ockham.” However, Adam belonged to no one school, for he criticized Ockham as well as DUNS SCOTUS. He was an independent thinker, quoted by Peter of Candia as on par with THOMAS AQUINAS, Duns Scotus, Ockham, and JOHN OF RIPA.

Bibliography: W. J. COURTENAY, “Ockhamism Among the Augustinians: The Case of Adam Wodeham” in Scientia Augustiniana (Wurzburg 1975), 267–275; Adam Wodeham: An Introduction to His Life and Writings (Leiden 1978). R. WOOD, ed. Lectura Secunda in Librum Primum Sententiarum (St. Bonaventure, New York 1990).

[I. C. BRADY]

ADAMNAN OF IONA, ST.

Also known as Adamnan McRonan, Adam, Aunan, and Eunan; abbot; b. Drumhome, County Donegal, Ireland, c. 625; d. Iona, 704. Adamnan embraced the monastic life and later went to Scotland to the abbey of Iona, becoming its ninth abbot in 679. When required to go to England in 685 on behalf of some Irish held captive there, he was converted to the Roman system in the Easter controversy and to the Roman tonsure. He went back to Iona and later to Ireland pleading for this latter change, and it was adopted in many places, though not in Iona. At the Synod of Tara (697) he insisted that women should not take part in warfare, and the Old Irish Cáin Adamnáin (Canon of Adamnan) is attributed to him. He wrote also the life of his predecessor, COLUMBA OF IONA, as well as the treatise De locis sanctis, an account of Arculfus's trip to the Holy Land. The ascription of a Vergil commentary to him is uncertain, and the Old Irish Fís Adamnáin is certainly not his. An Old Irish life, the Betha Adamnáin, is still extant.

Feast: Sept. 23.

Bibliography: ADAMNAN, The Life of Columba, ed. W. REEVES (Dublin 1857), ed. and tr. A. O. and M. O. ANDERSON (New York 1961); De locis sanctis, ed. D. MEEHAN (Scriptores latini hiberniae 3; Dublin 1958); Cáin Adamnáin, ed. and tr. K. MEYER (Oxford 1905); "Betha Adamnáin," ed. R. I. BEST, in Anecdota from Irish Manuscripts, ed. O. J. BERGIN et al., 5 v. (Halle 1907–13) 2:10–20, tr. M. JOYNT Celtic Review 5 (1908–9) 97–107. Betha Adamnáin=The Irish life of Adamnán, ed. M. HERBERT and P. Ó RIAIN (London 1988). J. HIRSCHMAN, Adamnan (Santa Barbara, Ca. 1972). Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:642–649. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31)1:236–239. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v. 1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 283–287.

[R. T. MEYER]

ADAMS, HENRY BROOKS

Writer, novelist, and historian; b. Boston, Mass., Feb. 16, 1838; d. Washington, D.C., March 27, 1918. He was descended on both sides from wealthy and distinguished New England ancestors, two of whom were presidents of the United States. He was raised as a Unitarian, but rejected his Protestant orientation because he felt it was complacent ("Boston had solved the universe . . .") and unrealistic ("all the problems which had convulsed human thought from earliest recorded time . . . were not worth discussing"). His most significant effort in a lifetime of inquiry was to understand and recover the religious instinct.

At Harvard College (1854–58) he was influenced by Louis Agassiz to devote himself to the intellectual life. He sailed for Germany to study law, but decided to become a writer instead. He returned to America in 1860, and served as private secretary to his father, Charles F. Adams, who had been reelected to Congress. When the elder Adams was appointed minister to Great Britain, Henry accompanied him to London (1861–68). To strike the strongest blows for reform, he became a freelance journalist and covered the Washington political scene (1868–70). He was appointed assistant professor of medieval history at Harvard (1870) and was named editor of the North American Review (1870–76). In 1872 he married Marian Hooper.

In 1877, Adams moved back to Washington, where he devoted himself full time to writing and to his self-appointed function as "stable-companion to statesmen."

Henry Brooks Adams with his dog. (© Bettman/CORBIS)

The next eight years were highly productive. He started the monumental History of the United States during the Administrations of Jefferson and Madison (9 v. 1889–91), which has been hailed by some as the greatest work of its kind since GIBBON'S. He was also an able biographer, author of Albert Gallatin (1879), a study of Jefferson's secretary of the treasury, and John Randolph, a partisan view of the brilliant Southern spokesman. In later life Adams returned to biography, publishing The Life of George Cabot Lodge (1911). Both of his novels were published anonymously. Democracy, An American Novel (1880), a best-selling succès de scandale, was a satire on the Washington of his time, centering on the career of Mrs. Lightfoot Lee. Esther (1884) also features a cultivated and charming heroine, probably modeled on his wife, who makes an earnest but futile effort to accept a religious view of life.

His wife's suicide in 1885 was a severe blow to his psychic equilibrium. Although Adams was by nature an inveterate traveler, his journey to Japan (1886) with his close friend, artist John LA FARGE, was meant, in part, to be recuperative. With La Farge he visited Hawaii, the Pacific Islands, Australia, and Europe (1890–92). This journey occasioned one of his most interesting and curious volumes, Memoirs of Marau Taaroa (1893), a history of Tahiti from a non-Western perspective, revised and reprinted (1901) as Memoirs of Arii Taimai E. During the 1890s he spent much of his time abroad, traveling from the Near East to Russia and Scandinavia. In his mid 60s he undertook the completion of his two most important books—Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1902), a study of medievalism rather than medieval history, and The Education of Henry Adams (1906), at once an intellectual autobiography in the third person and a study of 20th-century multiplicity. Both books were privately printed. “The Rule of Phase Applied to History” (1908) and “A Letter to American Teachers of History” (1910) were collected along with an earlier essay, “The Tendency of History” (1894), in The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma (1919). In 1912 he suffered a heart attack, but recovered sufficiently to go to France, where he remained until the outbreak of World War I. In 1918 he returned to Washington and died there.

Adams was not generally regarded as a literary figure until Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres and The Education won an audience after his death. He prophesied the “darkening chaos of the modern world” in The Education, predicting the moral bankruptcy of a materialistic society. Using the 12th century, presented poetically and passionately in Chartres, as a touchstone by which to judge the 20th century, he looked with nostalgia at the unity of that far time, the Middle Ages, and with fear at the “multiplicity” of the time to come. The Virgin was the chief symbol in his studies of 13th-century unity, “the point of history when man held the highest idea of himself as a unit in the unified universe”; the Dynamo symbolized 20th-century multiplicity, marked by a “great influx of new forces . . . violently coercive” and “rapid in acceleration.”

Bibliography: J. BLANCK, Bibliography of American Literature, 4 v. (New Haven 1955–63) v.1 contains a descriptive listing of separate editions. Literary History of the United States, ed. R. E. SPILLER et al., 3 v. (New York 1948) v.3 and its Bibliography Supplement, ed. R. M. LUDWIG (New York 1959), the best general bibliography. H. ADAMS, Letters of Henry Adams, 1858–1918, ed. W. C. FORD, 2 v. (Boston 1930–38); Henry Adams and His Friends, ed. H. D. CATER (Boston 1947). W. C. FORD, ed., A Cycle of Adams Letters, 1861–65, 2 v. (Boston 1920). E. SAMUELS, The Young Henry Adams (Cambridge, Mass. 1948); Henry Adams: The Middle Years (Cambridge, Mass. 1958); Henry Adams: The Major Phase (Cambridge, Mass. 1964). E. STEVENSON, Henry Adams, a Biography (New York 1955). W. H. JORDY, Henry Adams: Scientific Historian (New Haven 1952). J. C. LEVENSON, The Mind and Heart of Henry Adams (Boston 1957). Y. WINTERS, In Defense of Reason (New York 1947).

[J. SCHWARTZ]

ADAMS, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1543 at Winterbourne or Martin’s Town, Dorsetshire, England; d. Oct. 8, 1586, hanged, drawn and quartered at Tyburn (outside London), England. He had been a Protestant minister. Upon his conversion to Catholicism, he went to Rheims, where he was ordained a priest (1580). He returned to England in March 1581, where he labored at Winchester and in Hampshire, especially among the poor. He was also a noted exorcist. Adams was imprisoned in 1584 and banished the following year with 72 other priests. He returned, was again arrested for high treason, and executed, with two others, BB. John LOWE and Robert DIBDALE. According to Anthony Tyrrell’s Confessions, Adams and Lowe were specifically selected for execution by Justice Young on the advice of Tyrrell, who was chagrined by his failure to implicate the Jesuit William WESTON in the Babington Plot and knew they exercised the greatest influence over imprisoned Catholics. William Warford, who knew Adams, described him as a man of “average height, with a dark beard, a sprightly look and black eyes. He was a very good apologist, straightforward, very pious, and pre-eminently a man of hard work.” Adams was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ADDAI AND MARI, SS.

According to Syrian Christian legend, Addai (Thaddeus) and Mari were two of the Lord’s 72 Disciples, and were sent by Christ to establish the Church in Syria and Persia. Addai is named in the Acta Edessena, partly preserved by Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 1.13), which recounts the legends of ABGAR and part of the “Doctrine of Addai.” The Doctrine is a fourth-century apocryphal account of the founding of Christianity in Edessa; it gives the story of the finding of the holy cross by Protonica, describes the Emperor Tiberius as punishing Jews for the crucifixion of Christ, and mentions Palut as one of the earliest bishops of Edessa. The Edessan portrait of Christ attributed in the account to Ananias, the messenger of King Abgar V, must be later than 394 for it is not mentioned by Aetheria in her Peregrinatio ad loca sancta.

Mari is considered the disciple of Addai and one of the 72. He is said to have founded the Persian Church in Kōē near Seleucia-Ctesiphon, and the monastery at Dair Qunnā. The Acta S. Maris was written probably in the ninth century. The Nestorians trace the foundation of their liturgy to SS. Addai and Mari.

Feast: Aug 5.

Bibliography: LABUBNĀ BAR SENNĀK, The Doctrine of Addai, ed. and tr. G. PHILLIPS (London 1876). H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:136. J. ASSFALG, ibid. 7:24. A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922). B. BOTTE, "L'Anaphore Chaldéenne des Apôtres," Orientalia Christiana periodica 15 (1949) 259–276.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ADELA, ST.

Benedictine abbess; b. c. 675; d. near Trier, c. 734. Probably the daughter of Dagobert II, she is quite surely identical with the abbess Adola, to whom a letter of Abbess Alffled (Monumenta Germaniae Epistolae selectae 1.3: letter 8) is addressed. She is said to have founded the Abbey of Pfalzelt at Trier. In 722 BONIFACE visited her and took her grandson (later Gregory of Utrecht) away as a student. She died about 734, but her remains were not discovered until 1072. Other information about Adela is based on a will, regarded as unauthentic by Pertz, but accepted by some scholars today. Her cult has not been confirmed, and she is not generally venerated in the liturgy of the Church.

Feast: Dec. 24.

Bibliography: M. WERNER, Adelsfamilien im Umkreis der frühen Karolinger (Sigmaringen 1982). R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:136–137. A. HEINTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:140.

[L. MEAGHER]

ADELAIDE OF VILICH, ST.

Abbess. b. Cologne, last half of the tenth century; d. Cologne, Feb. 5, probably 1015. She was the daughter of Count Meginoz of Gelder. At an early age, Adelaide (Adelheid) entered the convent of St. Ursula in Cologne, where the Rule of St. Jerome was observed. As first abbess of the convent founded by her parents in Vilich (Bellich or Willich, today Beuel, near Bonn), on the Rhine River, she introduced the Benedictine Rule, which she considered stricter than that of St. Jerome. It was said that she had her nuns learn Latin so that they might better understand the Divine Office. While remaining abbess of Vilich, Adelaide succeeded her sister Bertrada, after the latter's death, as abbess of St. Maria im Kapitol in Cologne. She was buried in Vilich, where her relics are preserved. Adelaide was the friend and adviser of Heribert, Archbishop of Cologne; and according to legend, she showed great prudence in providing for the poor during a severe famine.

Feast: Feb. 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 1:719–727. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–83)1:170–173. A. SCHÜTTE, Handbuch der deutschen Heiligen (Cologne 1941) 27–28. A. GROETEKEN, Die l. Aebtissin Adelheid von Vilich (2d ed. Kevelaer, Ger. 1956). J. TORSY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:142.

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

ADELARD OF BATH

English translator, writer of scientific treatises, philosopher; b. c. 1070; d. after 1142–46. A Benedictine, he was educated at Tours, taught at Laon, and then spent seven years traveling in Italy, Sicily, possibly Spain, and Jerusalem, learning as opportunity offered. He is thought to have taught again in France, and an entry in the Pipe Roll for 1130 indicates that he had already returned to England.

A letter to his nephew, De eodem et diverso (On the Identical and the Diverse), written between 1105 and 1110, and dedicated to William, Bishop of Syracuse, records a conversation of the author with Philosophia and Philocosmia—the former representing the realm of reason, possibly the liberal arts and unchanging values, the latter the shifting world encountered through the senses. Its main interest lies in its remarks on UNIVERSALS.

His Quaestiones naturales or 76 Questions on Nature composed 1111–16, deal with a variety of the natural sciences based on Arabic learning. [An English translation by H. Gollancz is included in Berechiah Ben Natronai, Dodi ve-nichdi—Uncle and Nephew (Oxford 1920)]. He acquired an Arabic copy of Euclid's Elements c. 1120, and being competent in both Greek and Arabic, he was the first to translate this work into Latin. He also rendered into Latin an Arabic Introduction to Astronomy, the astronomical tables, and an Introduction by Mohammed ben Moses al Khwarizmi (fl. c. 830) either to astronomy or to the quadrivium as a whole, as well as other works of Greco-Arabic science. He is the author of Rules for the Abacus, Function of the Astrolabe (c. 1141–46), and a treatise On Falconry.

Adelard was the first of the twelfth-century scholars to give learning in England its bias toward the investigation of nature and mathematics, a bias later conspicuous in the works of ROBERT GROSSETESTE and ROGER BACON.

Bibliography: H. E. WILLNER, ed. "Des Adelard von Bath Traktat De eodem et diverso," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 4.1 (1903). L. THORNDIKE, A History of Magic and Experimental Science (New York 1923–53) 2:19–49. C. H. HASKINS, Studies in the History of Medieval Science (2d ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1927). M. MÜLLER, "Die Quaestiones naturales des Adelardus. . .," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 31.2 (1934). F. P. BLIEMETZ-RIEDER, Adelhard von Bath (Munich 1935). D. A. CALLUS, "Introduction of Aristotelian Learning to Oxford," Proceedings of the British Academy 29 (1943) 229–281. A. C. CROMBIE, Augustine to Galileo (London 1952). E. J. DIJKSTERHUIS, The Mechanization of the World Picture, tr. C. DIKSHOORN (Oxford 1961).

[E. A. SYNAN]

ADELELM OF BURGOS, ST.

Known also as Lesmes and, in French, Aleaume, patron of Burgos and one of four famous Benedictine abbots in Castile in the eleventh century; b. Loudon, near Poitiers, date unknown; d. Burgos, Jan. 30, 1097. His vita was written soon after his death by Rudolph, a monk of Chaise-Dieu in Auvergne. Adelelm gave up wealth and a military life and at Chaise-Dieu became famous for asceticism and miracles. He sent the Queen of England (Matilda of Flanders) blessed bread that reportedly cured her lethargy. At the request of Alfonso VI and his wife, Constance, he came to Burgos about 1081 and ministered to pilgrims and the sick. He crossed the swollen Tagus River Moses-like (reputedly without getting wet) in front of Alfonso's army when it took Toledo in 1085. The miracles attributed to him in France and in Spain were chiefly cures of sickness effected by means of blessed bread or water.

Feast: Jan. 30.

Bibliography: A. DE VENERO, Vida del confessor San Lesmes (Burgos 1563). L. SERRANO, El obispado de Burgos, 3 v. (Madrid 1935) v.2. K. LECHNER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:141.

[E. P. COLBERT]

ADELHELM I, BL.

Abbot; d. Feb. 25, 1131. A BENEDICTINE monk at the Abbey of SANKT BLASIEN, he was chosen c. 1122 to be the first abbot of Engelberg, near Stans in Switzerland, soon after its foundation by Conrad of Seldenbüren (d. 1125). He worked to secure the exemption of his abbey from outside controls and won royal and papal confirmation of its status in 1124. Although his life was reputed to have been a saintly one, and miracles and wonders were reported at his tomb, almost no details beyond his activity as abbot are known. Having been venerated from the middle of the 12th century, his relics were enshrined in a chapel at the abbey at Engelberg in 1744.

Feast: Feb. 25.

Bibliography: M. BESSON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:528. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für

*Theologie und Kirche*² 1:142. Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3 (1863) 490. L. BURGNER, Helvetia Sancta, 2 v. (New York 1860). H. MAYER, Geschichte des Klosters Engelburg (Ei 1891). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:252–254.

[J. L. GRASSI]

ADELPHUS OF METZ, ST.

Bishop; d. fifth century. Apart from the undoubted existence of his cult in Metz from an early date, everything about Adelphus is conjectural. He is believed to have succeeded St. Rufus as bishop of Metz in the fifth century, and to have ruled the diocese for 17 years, converting many pagans. The solemn translation of his relics to Neuweiler in 836 was an occasion of great popular rejoicing. Neuweiler became a center of pilgrimage. A great church was built in the eleventh century to enshrine the relics, but during the Reformation they were restored to their former repository in the abbey church.

Feast: Aug. 29; Sept. 1 in Neuweiler.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:504–512. Bibliotheca hagiographia latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:76. Pauli Warnefridi Liber de episcopis Mettensibus, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 2:260–270. Gesta episcoporum Mettensium, ed. G. WAITZ, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 10:531–551, esp. 536. Translatio et miracula S. Adelphi episcopi Mettensis, ed. L. DE HEINEMANN, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 15.1:293–296. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaul (Paris 1907–15) 3:45–54. L. PFLEGER, "Zur Gesch. des Adelphikultus in Elsass," Archiv für el-sässische Kirchengeschichte 2 (1927) 443–444. J. M. B. CLAUSS, Die Heiligen des Elsass (Düsseldorf 1935). A. M. BURG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:144.

[M. B. RYAN]

ADENULF OF ANAGNI

Secular Parisian scholastic; b. Anagni, c. 1225; d. Paris, Aug. 26, 1289. A nephew of GREGORY IX, he studied arts and theology at Paris, being regent master in theology c. 1272 to 1288. Of his works there are extant two commentaries on Aristotle, a quodlibet, about ten sermons, and a canonical treatise. He may have written the commentaries on the Psalms and Apocalypse published under the name of ALBERT THE GREAT. A canon of Paris, provost of Saint-Omer, a rich and liberal man, he fostered studies, students, and the transcription of manuscripts, among them the commentary of St. THOMAS AQUINAS on St. John. He was twice proposed for a bishopric (Narbonne and Paris), but found refuge among the canons of Saint-Victor. He bequeathed almost 40 magnificent manuscripts to Saint-Victor and the Sorbonne.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) v. 17–18 of Bibliothèque Thomiste, 1:376–377; La Littérature quodlibétique v.1 (Kain 1925) 1:99–100. M. GRABMANN, Traditio 5 (1947) 269–283. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:541.

[P. GLORIEUX]

ADEODATUS (DEUSDEDIT) II, POPE

Pontificate: April 11, 672 to June 16, 676; b. Rome, the son of Jovinian. Adeodatus succeeded VITALIAN and, like him, defended orthodoxy against MONOTHELITISM. He was remarkable for his generosity and for inaugurating the practice of dating events in terms of his reign. He enlarged and enriched the Benedictine monastery of St. Erasmus on the Coelian Hill, where he had been a monk. Two letters defending monastic exemptions are attributed to him (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 87: 1141–46). Some martyrologies celebrate his feast on June 26, but the BOLLANDISTS say he had no cult.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:346–347. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al. (Graz 1956) 166. J. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificia (Berlin 1906–35) 1:43, 176. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.2:17–19. C. CASPAR, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:587. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 1:144. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 76–77

[C. M. AHERNE]

ADESTE FIDELES

Hymn used during the Christmas season, found neither in the Breviary nor in the Missal. Its origin is variously accounted for, although it is generally thought that both hymn and music were composed together in the early 18th century. Many scholars today think that it was written by John Francis Wade (1711–86), who was a teacher of Latin and church song at Douai, France, between 1740 and 1743. J. Stéphan in 1947 bolstered a plausible theory of Wade's authorship of an earlier version of the hymn and chorus, Venite, adorete, and the later more liturgical Venite, adoremus. He maintained that the hymn antedated 1744, when in a disguised form it was used as an "Air anglais" in a Paris vaudeville Acajou. It exists today in three versions, the first, with four strophes beginning with the words (stanza 1) Adeste, (2) Deum de Deo, (7) Cantet, and (8) Ergo qui natus; the second, with additional strophes inserted beginning (3) En grege relicto, (4) Stella duce, (5) Magi aeterni patris, and (6) Pro nobis egenum; a third version used in France has strophes 1, 3, 5 and 6. The hymn urges the faithful to approach the crib of the Word made Flesh, in the company of shepherds, magi, and angels. There are numerous English translations of the hymn.

Bibliography: J. STÉPHAN, The Adeste Fideles (Buckfastleigh, Eng. 1947). A. MOLIEN, Catholicisme 1:140–141. P. DEARMER, Songs of Praise Discussed (New York 1952). M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948).

[M. M. BEYENKA]

ADJUTOR, ST.

Crusader, hermit, and Benedictine monk; b. late eleventh century; d. Tiron, France, April 30, 1131. His parents were Jean, Seigneur de Vernon, and Rosemonde de Blaru. A devoutly religious youth, Adjutor attempted to live as austerely as possible, and HUGH OF AMIENS, Archbishop of Rouen, his friend and biographer, recounts his compassion and charity in great detail. He was one of a group of Norman knights who in 1095 set out on the First Crusade. The expedition was reputedly attended by many miraculous occurrences including Adjutor's escape from a Moslem prison. On his return to France, he became a monk at the Abbey of Tiron, where he earned a reputation for sanctity. He spent his last years as a hermit in a small cell he had built near the monastery.

Feast: April 30 (Rouen, Évreux, Chartres).

Bibliography: A. DELLA PORTA, S. Adiutore, patrono della diocesi di Cava dei Tirreni (Cava dei Tirreni 1968). Acta Sanctorum April 3:832–836. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–83) 2:78–81. H. LAHRKAMP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:147. J. THÉROUDE, La Vie et l'office de s. Adjuteur (Rouen 1864), hist. and bibliog. introd. by R. BORDEAUX; repr. of Vie de S. Adjuteur, pub. by D. LANGLOIS in 1638 and of Officium s. Adjutoris (Paris 1639).

[V. L. BULLOUGH]

ADMINISTRATOR, APOSTOLIC

In the Latin Church, an apostolic administrator is a priest, and usually a bishop, who is assigned by the pope to govern an apostolic administration (Codex Iuris Canonici [CIC] [Rome 1918; repr. Graz 1955] c. 371 §2). Alternately, by an extraordinary measure, the apostolic administrator may be assigned to govern a diocese in serious spiritual or temporal difficulty. As is evident from the nature of his mission, the history of the office, and canonical discipline, the latter kind of administrator is a papal "troubleshooter" sent to a distressed diocese.

Mission. Ordinarily, an apostolic administrator would be sent to represent the pope to a portion of God's people who are in an area where, due to special and particularly grave reasons, a diocese has not been erected (CIC c. 371 §2). An administrator could also be sent to a diocese whose diocesan bishop might be, for example, under a canonical penalty suspending his jurisdiction, guilty of gross mismanagement in financial affairs, incapacitated by bodily or mental illness, or physically prevented from exercising jurisdiction because of banishment or detention. An administrator's appointment to a vacant diocese might be prompted, for example, by the need for special investigation into past administration or for delicate diplomacy during a period of political discord.

Unlike a diocesan bishop, the administrator has only vicarious power, governing not in his own name, but in the name of the pope whose jurisdiction he exercises (CIC c. 371 §2). When the situation in the diocese has been normalized, administration is resumed by a diocesan bishop who rules by proper power in his own name, not as a delegate of the pope (CIC c. 381 §1).

Historical Evolution. Although the title "apostolic administrator" was stabilized only in 1908 by Pius X's constitution Sapienti Consilio, the existence of the office that it represents is discernible as far back as the 5th century. The Fifth Council of Carthage (401) and the Council of Macriana (419) in Africa speak of the interventor or intercessor, appointed by the metropolitan or a provincial council to oversee the smooth succession of government in a vacant diocese. He was usually the bishop of a neighboring diocese whose task as interventor was to conduct the funeral of the deceased bishop, to administer provisionally the affairs of the diocese, and to supervise the election of the new bishop.

In Italy and France a similar office was called that of visitator, the earliest record of which appears in the Council of Riez (439). From this time it became the common practice in France for the metropolitan to send a visitator to a diocese immediately upon its vacancy in order to prevent, among other things, the plundering of the bishop's property by clergy and laity alike. The prerogative of appointing visitators soon devolved to the papacy. From the time of Pope St. Gregory the Great (c. 540–604) well into the 9th century there were numerous examples of papal visitators sent throughout Italy and France, as well as Spain where the similar office of commendator had been common since the Council of Valencia (524).

From the 8th century the office began to suffer limitations as the institute of the cathedral chapter developed. When the Second General Lateran Council in 1139 granted the cathedral chapter the right to hold episcopal elections, the office of visitator became one of extraordinary and less frequent application, and in 1298 Boniface VIII reserved the appointment of administrators to the Holy See (Corpus iuris canonici, VI^o, ed. E. Friedberg, 1.8.4). Sixtus V in 1588 assigned competence over such appointments to the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, and in 1908 Pius X, in reorganizing the Roman CURIA, re-assigned competence to the Congregation of the Consistory and consecrated the title apostolic administrator, which, since the time of decretal law, had been used interchangeably with the title Vicar Apostolic. The two are now distinct offices, the latter generally denoting a papal deputy sent to a missionary territory (CIC c. 371 §1).

Law Governing the office in the Latin Church. In default of special contrary provisions of the Holy See in a particular case, the Code of Canon Law determines various details in the office of apostolic administrator. After taking possession of the government of his territory, the apostolic administrator is a local ordinary (CIC c. 134). The administrator's jurisdiction does not cease on account of the death of the pope; normally it expires according to the wishes of the Holy See and, generally, when a new bishop takes possession of the see.

Unless there are contrary conditions in his mandate, the apostolic administrator generally enjoys the same rights, honors, and duties as a diocesan bishop (CIC c. 381 §2).

Office in the Eastern Churches. In the Eastern Catholic Churches, an apostolic administrator is appointed by the pope to govern an eparchy, whether vacant or not, for serious and special reasons (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium [CCEO] c. 234 §1). The apostolic administrator has the rights, honors, and duties that are given to him in his letter of appointment (CCEO c. 234 §2). He is a local hierarch (CCEO c. 984 §2).

Bibliography: T. J. MCDONOUGH, Apostolic Administrators (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 139; Washington, D.C. 1941). P. HOFMEISTER, "Von den Apostolischen Administratoren der Diözesen und Abteien," Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht 110 (1930) 337–392. J. A. RENKEN, in New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, ed. J. P. BEAL et al. (New York 2000) 508–509, 518–520.

[J. R. KEATING/J. STAAB]

ADMONT, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey on the Enns River, Diocese of Graz-Seckau, central Austria; dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and St. BLAISE. The place (in valle Ademundi) is first mentioned in a document of Louis the German (859). In 1074 Abp. Gebhard of Salzburg built the abbey on an earlier cloister of St. Emma of Gurk (d. 1045), who also endowed the monastery of Gurk (1043). A reform cloister in the spirit of CLUNY, Admont reached its first peak under Abbots Gottfried (1138–65) and Irmbert (1172–77) with a scriptorium famous for illuminations and script. The abbey cleared land, founded parishes, opened mines, fostered viticulture, and kept a hospital for the poor, the sick, and lepers; 13 monks became abbots elsewhere. From the 12th century, the abbot was archdeacon of the Enns, Palten, and Liesing valleys. A brief decline was followed by economic and spiritual revival under Henry II (1275–97) and ENGELBERT (1297–1327). Protestantism and the Turks caused great harm; and the cloister of Benedictine nuns, founded in 1120, came to an end. Johann IV Hoffmann (1581–1614), Mathias von Preininger (1615–28), and Urban Weber (1628–59) restored and rebuilt Admont. The Latin school was succeeded by a gymnasium (1644) and a school of theology (1711); monks from Admont taught in the state Gymnasiums of Graz, Leoben, and Judenburg (1750–1900). During the Napoleonic Wars, the abbey was plundered four times (1798–1809). Benno Kreil (1823–63) restored its finances, but a fire destroyed part of the cloister, the abbey church, and the nearby market (1865). Admont was rebuilt, only to be expropriated by Nazis (1938).

Since 1945 Admont has been slowly rebuilding and regaining its lost possessions and art treasures. It now has extensive farms and forests with modern equipment, workshops, and two power plants. The ornate library (236 by 46 feet and 36 feet high) has seven ceiling frescoes by B. Altomonte (1776) and baroque carvings by J. T. Stammel (d. 1765); it holds 130,000 volumes, 1,100 MSS, and 900 early printed works. The archives, a natural history museum with a collection of insects, and an art museum with a 1,000-year-old collection are noteworthy. The neo-Gothic abbey church (1869) has sacred art objects, a Christmas crib by Stammel (1745), and precious vestments from the abbey's embroidery school (17th and 18th centuries).

Bibliography: P. J. WICHNER, Geschichte des Stiftes Admont, 4 v. (Graz 1874–80). P. A. KRAUSE, Die Stiftsbibliothek in Admont (Linz 1962). U. BERLIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:574–576. A. KRAUSE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:150. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:19–20. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List (Collegeville, Minn.) 2:184. P. A. KRAUSE, Das Blasiusmünster in Admont (Linz 1965).

[A. KRAUSE]

ADO OF VIENNE, ST.

Historian, archbishop of Vienne; b. Archdiocese of Sens, France, c. 800; d. Vienne, France, Dec. 16, 875. He was born of a Gâtinais family, who offered him as a child to the Benedictine Abbey of Ferrières-en-Gâtinais, where he was trained under Abbot Lupus of Ferrières. He later spent some time studying at Prüm under Abbot Markward, and went also to Rome or Ravenna for some years—perhaps five—to gather hagiographical materials. Given charge of the parish of Saint-Romain in Lyons, Ado was later promoted to the See of Vienne some time between July 6, 859 (when Aglimar, his predecessor, died), and Oct. 22, 860 (when Ado signed the acts of the Council of Thusey).

Library of Admont Abbey, designed by Josef Huber with frescoes by Bartolomeo Altomonte. (© Josi F. Poblete/CORBIS)

As archbishop of Vienne he won the esteem of popes NICHOLAS I and ADRIAN II, and kings Charles II the Bald and Louis the German alike, especially for his firm stand against the divorce of King LOTHAIR II. He was active in his archdiocese as well, holding councils to reform clerical morality and to regulate the celebration of the Divine Office. The acts of these reforming councils have disappeared except for a fragment from one held in 870.

Ado is also important as an author. In his Chronicum sive Breviarium de sex mundi aetatibus ab Adamo usque ad annum 869 (Patrologia Latina 123:23–138; Monumenta Germanica Historica: Scriptores 2:315–323), a chronicle of world history that depends on similar works by Bede, Orosius, and Isidore and on contemporary Frankish sources, he treated in interesting detail the Diocese of Vienne, listing 47 bishops accurately (Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule 150–162). But he identified the first bishop, Crescens, with the person of that name mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tm 4.10). Bishop Crescens actually lived in the third century. Ado himself may have wrenched the chronology or may simply have repeated an earlier legend. He reedited a life of St. DESIDERIUS of Vienne, one of his predecessors in the See of Vienne, who died as a result of courageously rebuking the redoubtable Brunhilde, and composed a life of St. Theuderius, a sixth-century abbot in Vienne. Ado published a martyrology called Passionum codices undecumque collecti (Patrologia Latina 123:143–436), nine-tenths of which was taken from a similar work by FLORUS OF LYONS. The remaining text Ado claimed to have derived from an ancient collection copied by him when he was in Italy at Ravenna. This portion of the text has been condemned as sheer forgery on Ado's part; it only added to the already complicated problems concerning martyrologies. USUARD was much influenced by Ado's work.

Feast: Dec. 16.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 6:278–290. W. L. KREMERS, Ado von Vienne (Steyl 1911). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:571–572. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 12:482–494. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:150–51.

[C. M. AHERNE]

ADONAI

This term comes from the Canaanite and Hebrew word 'ādōn, which means lord. The word is a plural form to which the personal suffix “my” has been added. In order to distinguish this form, which means “my lords,” from the same word used in speaking of the one Lord, a special plural form featuring a long “a” before the “i” was evolved. (For an example of these different forms cf. Gn 18.3 with 19.2, Hebrew text.) The suffix “my” gradually lost its significance, as happened also in the case of the word “Rabbi” (my Master). (For Adonai as a substitute for Yahweh, see ELOHIM; JEHOVAH; YAHWEH.)

Bibliography: B. W. ANDERSON, The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 2:414. H. JUNKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:152. P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56).

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

ADOPTION (IN THE BIBLE)

The legal action by which a minor is made the equivalent of a child born in a family and given corresponding inheritance rights. Adoption was practiced in the ancient Near Eastern civilizations of the second millennium, and traces of the custom can be found in the Bible, especially in the stories of the PATRIARCHS. For example, Abraham's expectation that Eliezer would be his heir (Gn 15.2–3) seems to reflect the practice of the Hurrians preserved in the Nuzu (Nuzi) documents. From these texts it appears that even a slave could be made an heir when there was no son. Such a person would be considered an adopted child. The action of Sara in giving her servant girl HAGAR to Abraham as a concubine in order that Sarah might accept the child born of this union as her own (Gn 16.2–5) is a case of adoption paralleled in the Nuzu texts. The same is true of the story of the birth of Jacob's sons, Dan and Nephthali, whom Bala, Rachel's maid, bore on her mistress's “knees” (Gn 30.3–8), and of the account of Israel's action in regard to Joseph's sons (Gn 48.5–20); the sons of Machir (the son of Manasseh) also “were born on Joseph's knees” (Gn 50.23). These parallels to the Hurrian practice reflect the ancient Near Eastern background of the patriarchal narratives and are not surprising since HARAN, a patriarchal center, was part of the Hurrian territory. However, it would seem that these practices of adoption were not made part of the Israelite legal traditions, since there is no trace of them in the biblical law codes. Other examples of adoption in the Old Testament are the cases of Moses (Ex 2.10), Genubath (1 Kgs 11.20), and Esther (Est 2.7, 15); these, however, took place in foreign lands and do not necessarily reflect Israelite practice.

Another instance of adoption customs that appears in the Bible is the relationship of the king to Yahweh, expressed by the formula of Ps 2.7, “You are my son; this day I have begotten you,” which, in turn, is based on Nathan's oracle to David (2 Sm 7.8–16). Since the king represented the people, the people as a whole share in the adoption. This is not a new idea in Israel, for in the Exodus from Egypt God had already entered into a father-son relationship with the people (Ex 4.22; Dt 32.6). The use of the metaphor of Yahweh as father to Israel is expressed in many other texts (Is 63.16; Jer 3.19; 31.9; Os 11.1; etc.).

This concept reached its full flowering only in the New Testament. There Our Lord taught His disciples to address God as their Father (Mt 6.9; Lk 11.2). Similar references are found in the Gospel of St. John (Jn 20.17), and St. Paul refers to the Christian adoption as sons of God as the result of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8.15, 23; Gal 4.5; Eph 1.5).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN, (New York 1963) 36–37. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. HUGHES (New York 1961) 51–52. E. A. SPEISER, Genesis (Anchor Bible 1; Garden City, N.Y. 1964) 112, 120–121, 230. R. T. O'CALLAGHAN, Aram Naharaim (Analecta orientalia 26; Rome 1948) 73–74. R. J. TOURNAY, "Nouzi," Dictionnaire de la Bible (Paris 1928) 6:646–674. S. O. MOWINCKEL, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, tr. D. R. AP-THOMAS (Nashville 1962) 54–58.

[S. M. POLAN]

ADOPTIONISM

A heresy that proclaimed a double sonship of Christ and maintained that as divine He was the natural Son of God, but as man He was only the adopted Son. In origin, the heresy goes back to PAUL OF SAMOSATA, although it has been ascribed to THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, and NESTORIUS. Adoptionism was first officially taught by ELIPANDUS, Archbishop of Toledo, Spain, c. 785, in his attempt to correct the errors of Migetius concerning the Incarnation. Elipandus believed that he could best safeguard the distinction between the divine and human natures in Christ by designating the eternally begotten Logos as God's natural son; and the Son of Mary, which the Logos assumed, as God's adopted son. Two monks, Beatus and Etherius, challenged the orthodoxy of this explanation and referred the matter to Pope ADRIAN I. In a letter to the Spanish hierarchy the Pontiff condemned the term "adopted son" as applied to Christ because it was contrary to Sacred Scripture and to the teaching of the most reliable Greek and Latin theologians, and because it constituted a revival of Nestorianism.

Elipandus refused to submit and found a staunch supporter in Felix, bishop of Urgel. Since the latter's diocese was in Charlemagne's kingdom, Felix was obliged to appear before a council at Ratisbon in 792 and swear never to employ the words "adopted son" in speaking of Christ. At this point the Spanish hierarchy intervened and wrote a defense of Elipandus to Charlemagne and the bishops of Gaul. The king, with the approval of the Sovereign Pontiff, summoned a council at Frankfort in 794 to settle the controversy.

The council was one of the largest assemblies in the history of the Church, with two papal legates present and representatives of every country of western Europe except Mozarabic Spain. It opened with the reading of a letter from Pope Adrian in which he unconditionally condemned Adoptionism as heretical. In accordance with the papal teaching a definition was drawn up that can be summarized as follows: "The Son of God became the Son of man, but He still kept the title of a real son; there is only one Son and He is not an adopted son." It indicated the basic fallacy of Adoptionism, which applied the word son to a nature and not to a person. Finally, texts from Scripture and quotations from the Fathers of the

Detail of the "Pope Giving Privileges to the Hospital Director," by Domenico di Bartolo. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Church were cited to prove the correctness of this definition. This patristic section seems to have been the work of the scholarly monk ALCUIN. The condemnation of Adoptionism at Frankfort was repeated at councils in Friuli, Italy (796), Rome (799), and Aix-la-Chapelle (800). As far as is known, Elipandus and the Spanish bishops adhered to their opinion, but did not break formally with the Holy See.

In the 12th century, Abelard, Folmar of Trier, and Gilbert de la Porée maintained that the union between the Logos and His human nature could be only external and accidental; for, if it were substantial, it would constitute a finite quality in the Blessed Trinity. Hence they concluded that Jesus Christ as man was not the natural, but only the adopted, son of God. On Feb. 18, 1177, Pope Alexander III condemned the teaching that Jesus Christ as man is not a substantial reality, and added, "as He is truly God, so He is also truly man, composed of a rational soul and a human body." Two centuries later Durandus and some Scotists taught that Jesus Christ is, at the same time, the natural and the adopted Son of God, because He has received the fullness of sanctifying grace. However this opinion is also to be rejected, for adoption implies that the one adopted was previously a stranger to the person who adopted him, and Christ, as at once God and man, could never be a stranger to His heavenly Father. Besides, one and the same person cannot be both the natural and the adopted son of the same father.

Bibliography: H. QUILLIET and E. PORTALIÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:403–421. J. POHLE, Christology, v.4 of Dogmatic Theology, tr. and ed. A. PREUSS, 12 v. (St. Louis 1950–53). É. AMANN, A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 6:129–152. H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMEYER (Freiburg 1963) 595, 610–611.

[S. J. MCKENNA]

ADORO TE DEVOTE

A rhymed prayer marked by deep personal faith and theological insight, and addressed to Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. Although never a part of the Breviary, it appeared in various collections of popular devotions until Pope PIUS V inserted it in the Roman Missal among the prayers of thanksgiving after Mass. All extant MSS attribute the poem to St. THOMAS AQUINAS; however, his authorship has been contested. No MS is known from the first 50 years after Aquinas's death, nor does anyone during that time refer to Thomas as its author. Two of the 14th century codices state that Thomas composed or recited the prayer on receiving Viaticum. On this point the silence of the saint's biographer, William de Tocca, is significant. Dom André WILMART, who made the most thorough study of the manuscript and literary tradition of the Adoro Te, concluded that documentary evidence is insufficient to affirm Aquinas's authorship. Furthermore, some theologians doubt Thomistic origin because of divergences of thought and expression between the Summa and this poem. However, M. GRABMANN has maintained the genuineness of authorship because all MSS indicate it, and in his judgment the poem breathes the Eucharistic theology of Aquinas. F. Raby pointed out that a certain poem of JACOPONE DA TODI (written c. 1280–94) would be unexplainable had the Adoro Te not existed. Although this fact does not prove Thomistic origin, it makes possible the assigning of a date that falls within the lifetime of Thomas (d. 1274). In Raby's opinion the earliest MSS may be correct in stating that Aquinas wrote the Adoro Te, even if they report incorrectly the circumstances of its composition. There are many English translations. One of the most effective is that of Gerard Manley Hopkins beginning "Godhead here in hiding, Whom I do adore."

Bibliography: A. WILMART, "La Tradition littéraire et textuelle de l'Adoro te devote," Recherches de Théologie ancienne et médiévale 1 (1929) 21–40, 149–176; repr. with appendices in Auteurs spirituels et textes dévots du Moyen Âge latin (Paris 1932) 361–414. F. J. E. RABY, "The Date and Authorship of the Poem Adoro Te Devote," Speculum 20 (1945) 236–238. M. GRABMANN, Die Werke des heiligen Thomas von Aquin (3d ed. Münster 1949) 367–370, with refs. cited in nn. 184–186. J. P. CAVARNOS, "Greek Translations of the Adoro Te Devote and the Ave Verum," Traditio 8 (1952) 418–423.

[M. I. J. ROUSSEAU]

ADRAGNA, ANTONIO MARIA

Theologian; b. Trapani, Sicily, Oct. 1, 1818; d. Rome, Oct. 14, 1890. He entered the Conventual Franciscans in 1834 and was ordained in 1841. He taught in Würzburg and Assisi, was named consultor of the Holy Office in 1861, and member of the dogmatic commission for Vatican Council I in 1866. Adragna was given the task of preparing a schema on the temporalities of the Church for the council. From 1872 to 1879 he was minister general of his order. As a result of the religious suppressions in Rome he was forced to live in Holland (1876–78). None of his works have been published and many have been lost. He was generally considered a conservative in his theology.

Bibliography: A. M. GHISALBERTI, ed., Dizionario biografico degli Italiani 1:306. D. SPARACIO, Frammenti bio-bibliografici di scrittori ed autori minori Conventuali dagli ultimi anni del '600 al 1930 (Assisi 1931).

[P. FEHLNER]

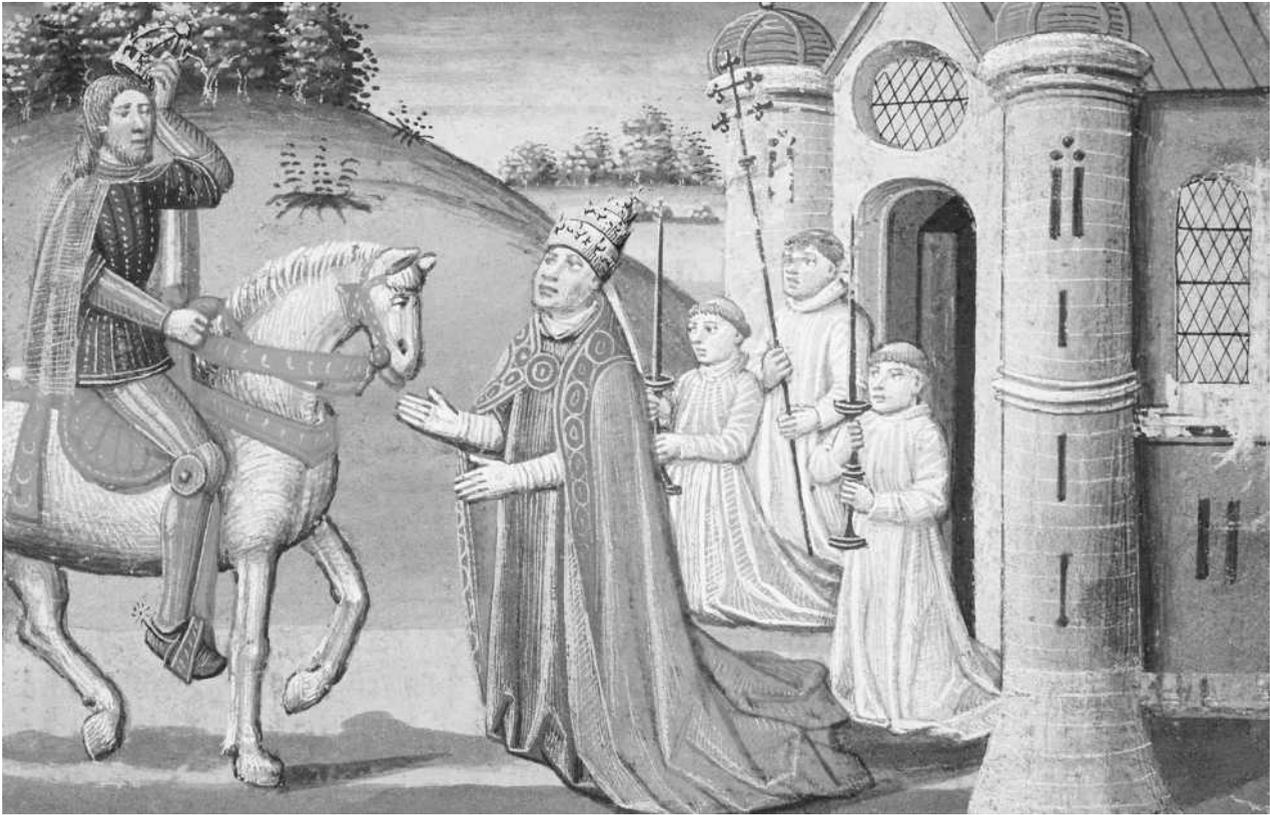

ADRIAN, ST.

Ninth-century bishop and martyr; b., according to legend, in Hungary, of royal stock. Adrian (Hadrian, Odhran) is supposed to have been consecrated bishop there. No reliable information on him is extant. Apparently he went to the British Isles and as a missionary bishop had no settled see, but preached especially to the Picts of Fifeshire. Legend has it that he was archbishop of St. Andrews in Scotland. However, it may well be that this is the Irish St. Odhran who reputedly arrived in Scotland with 6,606 companions of various nationalities, possibly driven out of Ireland by the invading Danes. Adrian established a monastery on the Isle of May (Firth of Forth). In 875 the Danes and the Scots fought at the Firth of Forth, and most of the Scots were killed. The Aberdeen Breviary (1509) commemorated the martyrs who had died in the monastery on the Isle of May on Holy Thursday.

Feast: March 4.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:324–326. L. MACFARLANE, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1310–11. W. F. SKENE, Celtic Scotland, 3 v. (2d ed. Edinburgh 1886–90) 2:311–316.

[R. T. MEYER]

“Great Chronicles of France: Charlemagne Meets Pope Adrian I near Rome,” illuminated manuscript. (© Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

ADRIAN I, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 1, 772 to Dec. 25, 795. A member of a prominent Roman family representing the military aristocracy, Adrian began his career in the service of the papal bureaucracy, eventually becoming a deacon with a reputation for learning. His election as pope represented a reconciliation of the clerical bureaucracy and the military aristocracy, two elements in the PAPAL STATE whose rivalry for control of the papal office during the pontificate of Pope STEPHEN III (768–772) posed major challenges for Adrian. The Lombard king, DESIDERIUS, had exploited the turmoil in Rome to establish his agent, Paul Afiarta, as the dominant figure in the papal administration. More importantly, Desiderius had taken advantage of developments in the Frankish kingdom to create uncertainty about the Frankish protectorate over the Papal State.

Adrian responded decisively to those challenges. He extended amnesty to those who had suffered as enemies of Paul Afiarta and moved skillfully to eliminate Afiarta from his position of power. The new pope indicated a willingness to establish peace with the LOMBARDS, but only on condition that Desiderius restore territories promised to the papacy in earlier agreements. The Lombard king responded with renewed assaults on territories claimed by the papacy. One of his goals was to pressure Adrian into anointing the heirs of the recently deceased Frankish king, CARLOMAN, as kings, thereby recognizing their rights to their father’s kingdom. Desiderius hoped that success in this venture would disrupt the Frankish-papal alliance by alienating CHARLEMAGNE, who had taken over Carloman’s kingdom and whose claim to it would be threatened by papal recognition of the rights of his nephews. Adrian firmly resisted this pressure, all the while continuing his demands for territorial restoration and imploring Charlemagne to fulfill his responsibility as protector of the Papal State. Finally in 773, after Charlemagne’s efforts to mediate a peace settlement between the papacy and the Lombards were rebuffed by Desiderius, the Frankish king decided on military action against the Lombards to remove the threat to the realm of St. Peter. While his campaign was in progress Charlemagne traveled to Rome in 774 to celebrate Easter. On that occasion he renewed the promise made in 754 to Pope STEPHEN II by his father, PEPIN III, at Quierzy; the specific terms of that promise, now put into writing, served as the basis for papal claims to territory embracing more than two thirds of the peninsula, including, besides the duchy of Rome, the former Byzantine Exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, Spoleto, Benevento, Venetia, Istria, Lombard Tuscany, and Corsica. After demonstrating his loyalty to the alliance formed by his father, Charlemagne returned to Pavia, where Desiderius soon surrendered. Charlemagne thereupon deposed the Lombard king and took control of the kingdom, becoming king of the Lombards as well as king of the Franks and patricius Romanorum.

During the next few years after 774 Adrian was chiefly concerned with efforts to extend the boundaries of the Papal State and to safeguard papal autonomy in the face of the yet unknown Italian policy of his Frankish protector, now also the neighbor of the Papal State. At first Adrian was persistent in seeking from Charlemagne restoration of all the territories granted to the papacy in the document drawn up in 774. Charlemagne paid little heed to these claims, partly because he was too occupied with his wars against the Saxons and the Muslims to deal with problems in Italy. In time he began to come to grips with his role as king of the Lombards; in doing so he realized that conceding all the territory which Adrian claimed would irreparably damage his Lombard kingdom. As a consequence, Adrian was forced to scale back his claims substantially. On the occasion of trips to Rome in 781 and 787–788 Charlemagne favored Adrian with territorial concessions that enlarged the Papal State, but these concessions fell far short of the claims of the papacy based on its understanding of earlier Frankish promises made in 754 and 774.

In his relationship as ruler of the Papal States with Charlemagne as patricius Romanorum Adrian insisted on the autonomy of the Papal State and as a rule acted like an independent ruler in full control of the administration and the resources of his realm. However, there was resistance to papal authority in some parts of the Papal State, especially in Ravenna, where the archbishop sought to establish his own autonomy. Occasionally Adrian clashed with Charlemagne over issues affecting the internal governance of the Papal State, but usually these conflicts were worked out amicably. The Frankish king did put limits on the freedom of Adrian in conducting the external relations of the Papal State, but even in those cases Charlemagne never acted in ways that suggested that he was the pope's overlord. His actions usually worked to the pope's advantage by securing the boundaries of the Papal State.

Freed from the threat of outside intervention and recognized as the unquestioned master of the government of the Papal State, Adrian proved himself an effective ruler. Through skillful management of revenues derived from the patrimonies of St. Peter located within the Papal State and beyond its borders, he was able to repair the city walls, improve the aqueduct system, and expand the charitable activities of the Church. Especially impressive were his initiatives in restoring old churches and in building new ones. In this respect Adrian gave fresh impetus to efforts begun by his predecessors that resulted in the physical transformation of Rome from a classical to a medieval Christian city, a transformation that had no small effect on the mentality of Rome's citizenry.

All of these activities did not prevent Adrian from discharging the responsibilities implicit in the alliance of friendship, love, and charity made between Stephen II and Pepin III in 754 and renewed between Adrian and Charlemagne. Adrian made special provisions for public prayers for the success of Charlemagne's military undertakings leading to the expansion of Christendom, especially against the Saxons. He repeatedly praised the Frankish ruler for his service in the cause of the Christian community, thereby enhancing Charlemagne's image as guardian of God's people. In 781 Adrian stood as godfather for Charlemagne's son Pepin, and then anointed Pepin and his brother, Louis, as kings of Italy and Aquitaine, thereby helping Charlemagne to put the rulership of his sprawling empire on a sounder footing. He agreed to help Charlemagne maintain control over Bavaria by threatening to excommunicate its rebellious duke unless he abided by his oath of obedience to the Frankish king. He lent his full support to Charlemagne's efforts to reform the Frankish religious establishment, giving advice on proper ecclesiastical organization and providing liturgical texts and a canon law collection known as the Dionysio-Hadriana to serve as guides in revitalizing Christian life in Francia.

Despite the mutually friendly and beneficial relationships between Adrian and Charlemagne, tension did emerge in an unexpected area involving the locus of authority in spiritual affairs. At least since the days of Pope GELASIUS I (492–496) it had been widely accepted that there was a unique sphere of human activity involving spiritual affairs over which the Church and its leaders exercised authority. A long succession of popes held that position and resisted the intrusion of secular authorities, including emperors in Constantinople, into spiritual matters, especially those pertaining to the definition of doctrine. Although the liberation of the papacy from imperial control during the eighth century seemed to resolve that issue in favor of papal precedence in spiritual affairs at least in the Latin West, the issue began to emerge in new form during Adrian's pontificate. Increasingly Charlemagne expanded his claim to a directive role in religious affairs, a claim nourished by his actions to renew religious life in his kingdom. Justification for his involvement in religious affairs was provided by religious leaders formed by the intellectual renaissance accompanying Charlemagne's religious reform. They interpreted Old Testament history and St. Augustine's writings in a way that led to a concept of kingship which vested both spiritual and temporal authority in the hands of a single figure, a priest-king responsible to God for the spiritual and temporal well-being of his subjects. Charlemagne increasingly shaped his actions according to this model of ministerial kingship which strongly resembled the CAESAROPAPISM of the imperial government in Constantinople; as a result he assumed undisputed direction of religious life in his realm.

Adrian made no effort to curb Charlemagne's control of ecclesiastical affairs within the Frankish kingdom, partly because he welcomed the success of the king's religious reforms but chiefly because it was beyond his power to restrain Charlemagne. But when matters of doctrine came up, the pope's position was different. One such case involved the Adoptionist heresy which developed in Spain in the 780s. Although Adrian collaborated with the Frankish king in the effort to end this heresy, Charlemagne and his religious advisers took the decisive action by officially condemning ADOPTIONISM at the Council of Frankfurt in 794 and by preparing the theological case upon which the condemnation was based. The issue was posed even more sharply by a significant development surrounding the iconoclastic heresy which took shape during Adrian's pontificate. Like all his predecessors since Pope Gregory II (715–731), Adrian opposed the policy instituted by Emperor LEO III to outlaw the veneration of icons. He thus welcomed the initiative taken by Empress IRENE after she became regent for her infant son in 780 to reverse the iconoclastic policy of the imperial government. He gave his approval to the summoning of the second Council of NICAIA in 787 and sent a letter to Constantinople that provided the theological grounds for the council's condemnation of ICONOCLASM and its sanction of the veneration of images in religious worship. But when a badly translated Latin version of the acts of the council reached Charlemagne's court, the Frankish reaction was anything but approving. Miffed at being denied any part in Nicaea II and confident of the theological prowess of his advisers, Charlemagne took steps to produce a refutation of the acts of the council. The result was a compilation called the LIBRI CAROLINI, which among other things condemned the Nicaea II for theological innovations concerning icons, mounted a savage attack on the Greek church and its leaders, and argued for the key role of the Frankish church in guarding orthodoxy and judging departures for it. As work on the Libri Carolini proceeded, Adrian was informed of the Frankish position and asked to disavow the acts of the Council of Nicaea despite the fact that he had played an decisive role in shaping its decisions. Adrian responded in a long document defending the position on images taken at Nicaea, but he did agree to withhold his official approval of the council's position on images until the emperor met certain other conditions. Disregarding Adrian's teaching on images, the Franks officially condemned the position taken at Nicaea II at the Council of Frankfurt in 794. On still another theological issue, the Franks challenged Adrian by insisting that he condemn the Greeks for excluding the FILIOQUE phrase from the NICENE CREED used in the liturgy of the Mass. Adrian, whose Roman Church followed the Greek custom, responded by providing evidence from ancient authorities refuting the Frankish position and upholding the Greek-Roman position. In each of these cases the Frankish church and its leader, the king, were claiming a role in the definition of dogma even to the point of challenging positions taken by the pope. Although Adrian stood his ground in this matter, he was by no means able to put limits to the intrusion of an ambitious king and his aggressive, educated clerical supporters into a realm where the Church's spiritual leaders claimed precedence.

Although his pontificate was marked by challenges, Adrian I proved remarkably creative in advancing the interests of the papacy and in shaping a mutually beneficial working arrangement with the increasingly powerful Frankish state and its most famous ruler, Charlemagne. Through Adrian's efforts the Papal State was enlarged, its boundaries secured, its administration given firm direction, and its role in Italian affairs expanded. During his pontificate papal influence spread beyond Rome to contribute to the quickening of religious and cultural life over large areas of the West, especially where the Franks dominated. Perhaps it was his understanding of the magnitude of Adrian's accomplishments that, according to Charlemagne's biographer, Einhard, caused the king to weep like one who had lost a brother or a child when he received news of the death of the pope in 795.

Bibliography: Sources: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2d ed. (Paris 1955–1957), 1: 486–523; Eng. tr. in The Lives of the Eighth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of Nine Popes from AD 715 to AD 817, tr. with intro. R. DAVIS (Liverpool 1992) 107–172. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2d ed. (Leipzig 1885–1888) 1: 289–306. Codex Carolinus, Epp. 49–97, ed. W. GUNDLACH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae Merovingici et Karolini, v. 1 (Berlin 1892) 567–648, 654–655. Epistolae selectae pontificum Romanorum Carlo Magno et Ludowico Pio regnantibus, ed. K. HAMPE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae Karolini Aevi, v. 3 (Berlin 1899) 3–57. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum conciliorum, nova et amplissima collectio, 54 v. (Paris 1901–20; repr. Graz 1960–61), 12: 951–1154; 13: 1–820. Literature: L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, A.D. 754–1073, tr. A. H. MATTHEW (London 1908) 87–111. C. J. HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ, v. 3, part 2 (Paris 1910), 741–804, 1001–1091. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte des Papsttums. Eine Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zum Tod Pius X, v. 2: Das Papsttum im Frühmittelalter. Geschichte des Päpste von Regierungsantritt Gregors des Grossen bis zum Mitte des II. Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1934) 158–184. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di Fronte a Bisanzio e ai Langobardi, (Storia di Roma 9, Bologna 1941) 665–698. É. AMANN, L'Époque carolingienne, Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN 6 (Paris 1947) 49–70, 107–127, 129–148, 173–177. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum: Idee und Wirklichkeit, v. 1: Die Grundlagen (Basel 1951) 448–462; v. 2: Der Aufbau (Basel 1951) 1–16. J. DEÉR, “Die Vorrechte des Kaisers im Rom (772–800),” Schweitzer Beiträge zur allgemeinen Geschichte 15 (1957) 5–63. É. GRIFFE, “Aux origines de l'État pontifical: Charlemagne et Hadrian I^{er} (772–775),” Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 55, 65–89. W. OHNSORGE, “Der Patricius-Titel Karls des Grossen,” Byzantinische Zeitschrift 53, 300–321. F. KEMPF, H.-G. BECK, E. EWIG, and J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Church in the Age of Feudalism, tr. A. BIGGS (New York and London, 1968) 32–41, 54–88. J. T. HALLENBECK, “The Election of Pope Hadrian I,” Church History 37 (1968) 261–270. W. H. FRITZE, Papst und Frankenkönig. Studien zu den päpstlich-fränkischen Rechtsbeziehungen von 754 bis 824 (Vorträge und Forschungen, Sonderband 10; Sigmaringen 1973) passim, especially 44–62. J. JARNUT, “Quierzy und Rom. Bemerkungen zu den Promissiones Donationis Pippins und Karls,” Historische Zeitschrift 220 (1975) 265–297. A. DRABEK, Die Verträge der fränkischen und deutschen Herrscher mit dem Papsttum von 754 bis 1020 (Vienna, Cologne, Graz 1978) 13–35. G. DUMEIGE, NICÉE II (Paris 1978). D. S. SEFTON, “Pope Hadrian I and the Fall of the Kingdom of the Lombards,” Catholic Historical Review 65: 206–220. R. KRAUTHEIMER, Rome: Profile of a City 312–1308 (Princeton, N.J. 1980) 109–142. A. ANGENEDT, “Der geistliche Bündnis der Päpste mit dem Karolingern (754–76),” Historisches Jahrbuch 100 (1980) 1–94. H. FUHRMANN, “Das Papsttum und der kirchliche Leben im Frankenreich,” in Nascita dell'Europa ed Europa carolingia: Un'equazione da verificare, 2 v. (Spoleto 1981) 1: 419–456. J. T. HALLENBECK, Pavia and Rome: The Lombard Monarchy and the Papacy in the Eighth Century (Philadelphia 1982) 132–155. T. F. X. NOBLE, The Republic of St. Peter. The Birth of the Papal State, 680–825 (Philadelphia 1989) 127–183, 277–290. V. PERI, “Il Filioque nei magisterio di Adriano I e de Leone III. Una plausibile formulazione del dogma,” Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia 41, 5–25. P. DELOGU, “The Rebirth of Rome in the 8th and 9th Centuries,” in The Rebirth of Towns in the West, A.D. 700–1050, ed. R. HODGES and B. HIBLEY (London 1988) 33–42. M. MACCARRONE, “Il papa Adriano I e il concilio di Nicea del 787,” Annuario Historiae Conciliorum 20, (1988) 53–134. G. THOMA, “Papst Hadrian I. und Karl der Grosse. Beobachtungen zur Kommunikation zwischen Papst und König nach den Briefen des Codex Carolinus,” in Festschrift für Eduard Hlawitzschke zum 65. Geburtstag, ed. K. R. SCHNITH and R. PAULER (Munich 1993) 37–58. P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993) 150–156; 227–255. E. LAMBERZ, “Studien zur Überlieferung der Akten des VII. Ökumenischen Konzils: Der Brief Hadrians I. am Konstantin IV. und Irene (JE2448),” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 53 (1997) 1–43.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

ADRIAN II, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 14, 867 to November or December 872; b. Rome, 792. He was of a distinguished Roman family, from which two previous popes had come—STEPHEN IV (816–817) and SERGIUS II (844–847). In 842 Adrian was named cardinal priest of San Marco. He was elected pope as a compromise candidate in the struggle between those who favored and those who opposed the strong policies of his immediate predecessor, NICHOLAS I (858–867). After approval by German emperor Louis II, Adrian was consecrated on Dec. 14, 867. Though he attempted to maintain the policies of Nicholas, the papal power declined during his reign, for conciliatory by nature and already advanced in age, he was confronted with serious conflicts. Great influence was exercised in papal affairs by the pontifical secretary and archivist, ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN, a member of a powerful family with which Adrian had personal differences. The reason for this difficulty was his daughter, born to him in a marriage contracted before he was ordained a priest. Believing Anastasius to be in part responsible for the subsequent murder of both the daughter and her mother in 868, Adrian dismissed him under the severest ecclesiastical penalties. Not long afterward, however, the secretary was reinstated, and he continued to dominate.

Among Adrian's conflicts with the German princes was that over the attempted divorce of LOTHAIR II, king of Lorraine, who sought to put away his wife, Theutberga, in order to marry his concubine, Waldrada. Adrian's efforts at reconciliation were unsuccessful, and the problem was resolved only upon the death of Lothair in 869. In the subsequent contention over the kingdom of Lorraine, Adrian supported the claims of Louis II against those of Charles II the Bald, who was supported by the redoubtable Bishop HINCMAR OF REIMS. Louis II was excluded when the German princes, Charles the Bald and Louis the German, came to an agreement among themselves at the Treaty of Mersen in 870. Later efforts by Adrian to intervene in the civil and ecclesiastical disputes in the Carolingian domains met with strong rebuffs from Hincmar. Anastasius, then in control of the papal chancellery, was found to be the true author of these attempts at intervention although papal prestige was somewhat restored when Adrian reaffirmed Louis II's imperial title in 872, following a revolt in Benevento.

In his relations with the BYZANTINE EMPIRE, Adrian was only partially successful. A synod held at Rome in June of 869 severely condemned PHOTIUS and his partisans. Three papal legates were dispatched to the Council of Constantinople (see CONSTANTINOPLE IV) in 869 and 870, where the position taken by Adrian and his predecessor, in regard to Photius, was upheld. Rome's claims to jurisdiction in the Balkan area were defeated, however, when IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, accepted the invitation of BORIS I OF BULGARIA to evangelize his people. This defeat was to a degree offset by Adrian's sponsoring of the mission of CYRIL (Constantine) and Methodius among the Slovak people of Central Europe and his allowing the use of old Slavonic in the liturgy.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878–90) 122:1245–1320. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (Graz 1956) 368–375. A. NOYON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 1:619–624. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 6:395–412. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge 1948); The Patriarch Photius in the Light of Recent Research (Munich 1958). F. X. SEPPÉL, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:289–306, 433–434. Archivum historiae pontificiae 1 (1963). L. BELLINGERI, Dizionario biografico degli italiani 41 (Roma 1986), s.v. "Donato, tit. [vesc.]. di Ostia." A. GUILLOU, "Invocation à la Vierge pour le pape Hadrien II," Recueil des inscriptions grecques médiévales d'Italia (Rome 1996). W. HARTMAN, "Gespräche in der 'Kaffeepause'—am Rande des Konzils von Attingy 870," Annuario Historiae Consiliorum (Paderborn 1995/1996) 137–145. P. RATKOŠ, "Les lettres disparues d'Adrien II aux princes slaves des années 867–870" Slovenskà Arhivistica 19 (1984) 75–95. S. SCHOLTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg 1995) ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 4:524. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 109–110.

[A. J. ENNIS]

ADRIAN III, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: May 17, 884 to August or September 885; b. Rome; d. near Modena, Italy. Little is known of him; he was the son of Benedict, member of a Roman family. His brief reign was disturbed by the continuing conflict of contending factions in Rome. It appears that he represented the policies of Pope JOHN VIII (who was assassinated in 882) rather than those of Pope MARINUS I, Adrian's immediate predecessor. In the spirit of the age, Adrian dealt severely with the opposition: by his order a certain George, an official of the Lateran palace, was blinded and a woman named Mary, a member of the aristocracy, was subjected to disgraceful punishment. Adrian's policy regarding the problems with the Byzantine emperor, and especially with PHOTIUS, was probably a conciliatory one, but he did not live long enough to accomplish anything of note. Emperor Charles III the Fat, who at that time was in control of nearly all of the former empire of Charlemagne, invited Adrian to come to an imperial diet, chiefly for the purpose of settling the question of the imperial succession, since Charles had no legitimate male heir. Leaving an imperial missus in charge of the government of Rome, Adrian set out for Germany. En route, he fell ill and died. He was buried in the nearby Abbey of Nonantola. His cultus, which developed in the locality, was approved by the Holy See on June 2, 1891.

Pope Adrian II in the procession for the translation of the relics of St. Clement, detail of an 11th-century fresco in the Basilica of St. Clemente at Rome.

Feast: July 8.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Graz 1956) 1:426–427; 2:705. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 2:225; 3:127. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 v.3 (London 1902–32). P. VIARD, Catholicisme 5:474. K. HERBERS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 112–113.

[A. J. ENNIS]

ADRIAN IV, POPE

Reigned Dec. 4, 1154, to Sept. 1, 1159; born Nicholas Breakspear, Abbot's Langley, on land belonging to St. Albans' abbey, c. 1100; d. Anagni; buried in St. Peter's, Rome, beside Pope Eugenius III; son of Robert of the Chamber, a clerk in royal service and later monk at St. Albans; created cardinal bishop of Albano (c. 1149–50). The young Breakspear left England to study in France, eventually joining the reformed canonical congregation of St. Ruf near Avignon in the Arelate. Elected prior and then abbot (c. 1135) of this prestigious house, he more than once pursued the community's business at Rome before apparently so alienating his fellow canons that they petitioned the pope for his removal. Eugenius, however, acknowledging his potential by a direct promotion to the cardinalate, later entrusted him with the legation to Scandinavia (1152), his high-profile mission being to reorganize and reform the Church there.

In Norway, he established a metropolitan see at Nidaros (Trondheim), thus breaking the control of the Danish archbishopric of Lund over that country. He introduced the payment of an annual census to Rome and limited royal influence over clerical appointments by insisting on canonical elections. In Sweden, he held a council at Linköping (1152) which facilitated the elevation of Uppsala to metropolitan see (1163) and confirmed the payment of census: however, he failed to impose clerical celibacy in the face of local rivalries between Goths and Swedes. He returned to Rome before November 1153, having earned from the Scandinavians the epithet “the Good Cardinal,” and received full support for his work from the recently elected Anastasius IV. On Anastasius’s death, he was unanimously chosen as pope, the first Englishman to attain this position.

The pontificate was dominated by interrelated problems, including tensions over the Roman Commune; the imminent coronation of Frederick Barbarossa and the resumption of imperial rights over Lombardy; William I of Sicily’s request for papal recognition; the Italian aspirations of Byzantine emperor Manuel I Comnenus; and the security of the Patrimony of St. Peter. Following disturbances among the Romans after his election, Adrian was immediately forced to take refuge inside the Leonine City, placing Rome under interdict until the Wednesday of Holy Week, March 23, 1155. On the following day, the Senate expelled Arnold of Brescia, heretic and chief perpetrator of violence, leaving Adrian free at last to move to the Lateran, where he celebrated Holy Friday with his cardinals. In spite of slightly improved relations with the Commune, nearly half his pontificate of 56 months was spent outside Rome.

Early in 1155, Adrian renewed the Treaty of Constance (March 23, 1153), which was negotiated by his predecessor, Eugenius III, and the German king, Frederick Barbarossa. Adrian’s promise of imperial consecration aimed to bind Barbarossa into an agreement to defend the status of the papacy and the integrity of the Patrimony, and he insisted on a sworn undertaking to respect the person of the pope and cardinals. After a destructive progress across Lombardy, the king marched on Rome (April 1155), seeking the promised imperial coronation “in such haste that he seemed to be an enemy rather than a friend.” Following complicated diplomatic manoeuvres, Adrian and Barbarossa finally met (June 9, 1155) at Campo Grasso outside Sutri where the king performed the office of strator, leading the pope’s horse, holding his stirrup, and receiving the kiss of peace. The long-awaited coronation (June 18, 1155), marred by violence between Romans and Germans, was followed by a processional crown-wearing ceremony at Ponte Lucano (June 29, 1155), cordiality between pope and emperor being reinforced by Barbarossa’s instruction to the people of Tivoli to maintain their allegiance to the pope. Frederick then returned to Germany to avoid the heat of summer, looting Spoleto on the way.

At precisely the same time a crisis broke out in the south, following William I’s failure to obtain prior papal consent for his coronation as king of Sicily (April 5, 1154) and his illegal retention of papal lands. In winter 1154–55, William offered his submission to the new pope, but refused to confirm papal overlordship of his kingdom. In May 1155 William was excommunicated for besieging Benevento and burning several unfortified places in the southern Patrimony. The pope hoped to win Barbarossa’s assistance against Sicily through the good offices of Wilbald, abbot of Corvey and Stavelot, who was engaged at the time in sensitive negotiations with Manuel I Comnenus. The increasing significance of Byzantine power in southern Italy was to prove a difficult problem for the pope. The Greeks had never accepted the Norman conquest there, while the Normans had, from time to time, shown themselves willing to attack the Byzantine Empire. Manuel I had agreed to the Treaty of Thessalonica (1148) with Conrad III of Germany whereby the two rulers would together attack Sicily.

However, the “accord and agreement” made by Eugenius and Barbarossa in March 1153 at Constance had been intended to keep the Greeks out of the peninsula. Manuel, nonetheless, remained sufficiently confident to send a mission to Ancona late in 1154. In spring 1155, the nobles of Apulia, encouraged by Barbarossa’s entry into Italy, launched a rebellion against their new ruler. William I of Sicily appealed for assistance, but the emperor refused and returned to Germany. In September 1155, Adrian gathered an army to march on Benevento and remained there until mid-July 1156, the Greeks offering him unlimited supplies of men and money in return for their acquisition of three cities in Apulia, but ultimately failing in their invasion.

The Treaty of Benevento (June 1156) forced Adrian into recognizing William and his heirs as kings of Sicily in return for liege homage, an annual tribute in gold, and far-reaching concessions over the churches of southern Italy and Sicily. Papal recognition of the Sicilian monarchy ultimately worked to the advantage of Adrian’s successors by bringing stability in the south for more than 20 years, but it caused Barbarossa grave displeasure. In 1157 when the Greeks again tried to intervene, Adrian held firm to his agreement with William but, in a famous letter to Patriarch Basil of Ochrida, the pope pursued his idea of a possible future union between the Greek and Latin churches.

In September 1157, Adrian sent a letter to Barbarossa, then at Besançon, complaining that Eskil, archbishop of Lund, being held for ransom in Burgundy, had not yet been released. The pope's use of the word beneficium in relation to the imperial crown and its translation into German by Rainald of Dassel, the emperor's chancellor, in such a way as to imply that the empire was a fief of the papacy, helped both to manufacture and inflame this dispute. Relations with the emperor rapidly deteriorated, Fredrick unfairly impugning Adrian's legitimacy by calling him the son of a monk. The pope refused to confirm Barbarossa's nominee to the archbishopric of Ravenna; in April 1159 at Bologna, Adrian protested against the imposition of imperial rights announced at the Diet of Roncaglia (Nov. 12–13, 1158) which involved not only Lombardy, but also parts of the Patrimony. In mid-June 1159, the pope, already known to be unwell, withdrew to Anagni with the so-called Sicilian group of cardinals and made common cause with four anti-imperial cities in Lombardy.

Among Adrian's significant promotions to the cardinalate were figures chosen for their ability to serve the Church: Albert de Morra, later pope Gregory VIII; Walter, successor to the cardinal bishopric of Albano; Boso, papal scriptor, friend and biographer, appointed papal chamberlain (1154–55) and cardinal deacon of SS Cosma e Damiano (1156); and Roland Bandinelli, the future Alexander III, retained as chancellor. Adrian made no canonizations, nor have any sermons, treatises or commentaries survived from his pontificate. However, nearly 700 letters and privileges indicate some of the many difficult problems he addressed, attempting to mediate between conflicting claims.

Two particular decisions passed into Canon Law: Commissum nobis (X, 3.30.4) restricted monastic exemptions on tithe payments, while Dignum est (X.4.9.1) proclaimed the absolute right of the unfree to contract valid marriages. The authenticity of Adrian's letter Laudabiliter, once alleged to have permitted the invasion of Ireland by Henry II, is now regarded with much more caution than previously. In collaboration with Boso, Adrian put in place throughout the Patrimony a whole network of castra specialia, military and administrative strongholds under the special protection of the Holy See, that bound the local nobles in a system of feudal dependency, and it was this model which Innocent III used to recover the position of the papacy in the early thirteenth century.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 188, 1349–1644; Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, ed. P. JAFFÉ, G. WATTENBACH, et al. (Leipzig 1888) 102–145, 760–61. L. DUCHESNE, Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1958) 2:388–397. P. FABRE and L. DUCHESNE, Le Liber Censuum de l'Église romaine (Paris 1910) 385–400, 425–427. J. M. BRIXIUS, Die Mitglieder des Kardinalskollegiums 1130–1181 (Berlin 1912) 56, 111. B. ZENKER, Die Mitglieder des Kardinalskollegiums 1130–1159 (Würzburg 1964) 36–38. D. MACKIE, Pope Adrian IV (Oxford 1907). P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:625–27. A. O. JOHNSEN, Studier vedrørende Kardinal Nicolaus Breakspears legasjon til Norden (Oslo 1945). W. ULLMANN, "Cardinal Roland and Besançon," Miscellanea Historiae Pontificiae 18 (1954) 107–125; "The Pontificate of Adrian IV," Cambridge Historical Journal 11 (1953–55) 233–252. R. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957) 199–200. M. MACCARRONE, Papato e Impero dalla elezione di Federico I alla morte di Adriano IV, 1152–1159 (Rome 1959). M. P. SHEEHY, "Laudabiliter," Pontificia Hibernia, Medieval Papal Chancery Documents concerning Ireland, 640–1261 (Dublin 1962) 15–16. J. G. ROWE, "Hadrian IV, the Byzantine Empire and the Latin Orient," Essays in Medieval History presented to Bertie Wilkinson, ed. T. A. SANDQUIST and M. R. POWICKE (Toronto 1969) 3–16. R. W. SOUTHERN, Medieval Humanism and Other Studies (Oxford 1970) 234–52. P. TOUBERT, Les structures du Latium médiéval. Le Latium méridional et la Sabine du IX^e siècle à la fin du XII^e siècle, 2 v. (Rome 1973). M. T. FLANAGAN, Irish Society, Anglo-Norman Settlers, Angevin Kingship. Interactions in Ireland in the Late Twelfth Century (Oxford 1989) 7–55, 277–78. R. L. BENSON, "Political Renovation: Two Models from Roman Antiquity," Renaissance and Renewal in the Twelfth Century, ed. R. L. BENSON and G. CONSTABLE (Oxford 1982) 339–386. P. LAMMA, Enciclopedia dei Papi (Rome 2000) 2:286–26; Adrian IV (1154–59): The English Pope, ed. B. M. BOLTON and A. J. DUGGAN (Aldershot 2002).

[B. M. BOLTON]

ADRIAN V, POPE

Pontificate: July 11, 1276, to Aug. 18, 1276; b. Ottobono Fieschi, Genoa, Italy, early 13th century; d. Viterbo, Italy. He came from an influential Italian family and was created cardinal deacon of S. Hadrian by his uncle, Pope INNOCENT IV, in September 1244. In May 1265 he was sent to England as the envoy of Pope CLEMENT IV to defend the rights of the Holy See there and to resolve the conflict between King HENRY III and his barons. He successfully completed this task and returned in June 1268 to the Roman CURIA, where he worked in support of the Angevin policy in Italy. Elected to the papacy on the death of INNOCENT V, he died before he could receive either ordination to the priesthood or episcopal consecration. His attempt to repeal the second canon of the Second Council of LYONS concerning papal elections was ignored by his successors. Adrian was buried in the basilica of S. Francesco at Viterbo, where his epitaph may still be seen.

Monument of Pope Adrian V by the 13th-century sculptor Arnolfo di Cambio, in the basilica of S. Francesco, Viterbo, Italy. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY.)

Bibliography: R. GRAHAM, "Letters of Cardinal Ottoboni," English Historical Review 15 (1900) 87–120. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 2:457. N. SCHÖPP, Papst Hadrian V (Heidelberg 1916). A. VACANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:458–459. É. GRIFFE, Catholicisme 5:476–477. A. POTTHAST, Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a. 1198 ad a. 1304 2: 1709–10. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. 3:536–540. P. HERDE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed., 4 (1995), s.v. "Hadrian V., Papst." J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 199.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

ADRIAN VI, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 9, 1522, to Sept. 14, 1523; b. Adrian Florensz Dedal, Utrecht, March 2, 1459. He was the last non-Italian pope until the election of John Paul II in 1978. His widowed mother secured a good education for him with the Brothers of the Common Life at Zwelle and Deventer, and this enabled him to enter the University of Louvain when he was 17. There he studied and taught theology; in 1497 he became dean of St. Peter's Church, Louvain, and chancellor of the university, of which he was twice rector magnificus. One of his students published his notes on the Sententiarum Petri Lombardi (1512), and some of his disputations (Quaestiones quodlibeticae, 1515).

In 1515 Margaret of Burgundy chose him as a member of her household, and Emperor Maximilian appointed him tutor to his grandson, the future Emperor Charles V, who remained grateful throughout his life for Adrian's religious instruction. In the same year Adrian was sent on a difficult diplomatic mission to Spain, where he became the friend of Cardinal XIMÉNEZ OF CISNEROS. Upon the death of Ferdinand V of Castile in 1516, he was appointed sole administrator of the kingdom until the arrival of Charles I. He was named bishop of Tortosa (1516), viceroy of Spain (1517), and inquisitor of Aragon and Navarre (1517) and Castile and Leon (1518). At the request of Emperor Charles he was created cardinal of Utrecht on June 1, 1517.

In Rome, at the death of Leo X and after turbulent deliberations, he was unanimously elected pope. He was shocked by the news, conveyed to him in Spain, but accepted the will of God and took his own name as Pope Adrian VI. As he had labored in Spain in complete ignorance of the language and customs of the country, where he was resented as a foreigner, so in Italy he was a stranger to his environment. He had little sympathy with Renaissance art and culture, though he valued the learning of the humanists, Johann ECK and Juan Luis Vives, and tried to secure the support and advice of Erasmus. The difficulties he encountered in Rome were overwhelming.

"Pope Adrian VI," 16th-century portrait by an unknown artist.

The principal Catholic princes, Francis I of France and Emperor Charles V, whose help he needed, were at war with one another. In the Turkish advance, Belgrade had fallen, and the Island of Rhodes was threatened. He was the first pope to face the full impact of the Lutheran revolt, which was making rapid advances, and to deal with the pressing necessity of reform of the Church.

With confusion in the Papal States, lack of financial resources, and reluctant allies, he failed to save Christianity from disunity and from the Turks. The Island of Rhodes fell in December 1522, and the way to Hungary was open. His call for reform alienated the cardinals as well as the members of the Diet of Nuremberg (1522–23), where his "Instructio" to the German nation was ill received and unheeded. Practically alone and exhausted by the opposition on all sides, he died, only 20 months after his accession to the papacy.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61). L. P. GA-CHARD, ed., Correspondance de Charles-Quint et d'Adrien VI (Brussels 1859). C. BURMAN, Hadrianus VI (Utrecht 1727). E. H. J. REUSENS, Syntaxma Doctrinae Theologicae Adriani sexti (Louvain 1862). L. E. HALKIN, La Réforme en Belgique sous Charles-Quint (Brussels 1957). A. MERCATI, ed., Dall'Archivio vaticano: . . . Diarii di concistori del pontificato di Adriano VI (Rome 1951). Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses (Bruges 1959) 520–629 (commemorative issue on the 500th anniversary of his birth). C. A.

C. VON HÖFLER, Papst Adrian VI (Vienna 1880). P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:628–630. W. O. O'MALLEY, Praise and Blame in Renaissance Rome (Durham, N.C. 1979). P. PARTNER, Renaissance Rome, 1500–1559 (Berkeley 1976). Epistolae ad Principes. Leo X–Pius IV (1513–1565) ed. L. NANNI (Vatican City 1993). C. L. STINGER, The Renaissance in Rome (Bloomington, Ind. 1985).

[K. M. SAUM]

ADRIAN OF CASTELLO (DE CORNETO)

Cardinal and humanist; b. Corneto, 1458 or 1459; d. 1521. In 1488 Innocent VIII sent him to Scotland as papal nuncio to reconcile James III and his dissident nobles. James was killed before Adrian's arrival, but Adrian reached England, where he gained favor with King Henry VII and became his agent in Rome. He returned to England in 1489 for the collection of Peter's Pence. He was made bishop of Hereford in England, Feb. 14, 1502, and was raised to the cardinalate, May 31, 1503, by Alexander VI. He also acted as secretary of the Papal Treasury and ambassador of Henry VII. After the death of Alexander VI, his involvement in politics incurred the displeasure of Julius II. In 1509 he left for Venice and later for Trent, where he remained until the death of the pope. In 1511 he returned to Rome for the election of Leo X; became implicated with Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci in a plot to poison Leo X; confessed to being privy to it, and although forgiven by Leo, found it safer to reside in Venice. At the insistence of Henry VIII, he had been deprived of his office as collector of Peter's pence, and on July 5, 1518, he was degraded from the cardinalate and the bishopric of Bath, England, and the honors were given to Thomas Wolsey. A probable rumor mentions that Adrian was murdered in 1521 on his way to Rome after the death of Leo X. Among his writings are De vera philosophia ex quatuor doctoribus ecclesiae (Bologna 1507) and De sermone latino et modo latine loquendi (Basel 1513).

Bibliography: B. GEBHARDT, Adrian von Corneto (Breslau 1886). J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:158.

[M. I. C. DUFFEY]

ADRIANUS

Exegete of the Antiochene School; flourished first half of the fifth century A.D. He was a Greek-speaking Syrian and author of a little work remarkable both in method and content, Ἐισαγωγή εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς (Introduction to Holy Scripture), the first extant work to bear this title. No details whatever are available about his life. He was monk and priest, if he is to be identified with the Adrianus (or Hadrianus) to whom St. Nilus (d. c. A.D. 430) addressed three letters. He was certainly mentioned by Cassiodorus in his list of exegetes as coming after St. Augustine, but before Eucherius and Junilius (Inst. 1.10.1). Photius (c. A.D. 820–91) also speaks of Adrianus in his Bibliotheca and characterizes his work as a “book useful to beginners” (Patrologia Graeca 103:45 C). The Ἐισαγωγή deals with figures of thought (chiefly anthropomorphisms), word figures, and figures of composition (τῆς συνθέσεως) and their subdivisions. By way of illustration he quotes the Septuagint about 360 times, and the New Testament about 60 times. He was influenced clearly in his work by Theodore of Mopsuestia and Theodoret of Cyr, and possibly by St. John Chrysostom.

Bibliography: J. P. MIGNE, ed., Patrologia Graeca 98:1273–1312. ADRIANUS, Ἐισαγωγή εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς, ed. F. GOESSLING (Berlin 1887), this is the modern critical edition that should be used. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur 4:254–55. G. MERCATI, “Pro Adriano,” Revue biblique NS 11 (1914) 246–55.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

ADSO OF MONTIER-EN-DER

Benedictine author and teacher (called also Azo, Asso, Hermericus); b. Jura, France, first half of the tenth century; d. at sea, 992. He was a monk at Luxeuil, then schoolmaster at Saint-Evre (Aper) at Toul, and later abbot at Montier-en-Der (Haute-Marne) c. 960, before finally becoming abbot of Saint-Bénigne at Dijon. While on pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he died at sea and was buried in the Cyclades. The friend of such important figures as ABBO OF FLEURY, Gerbert (later Pope SYLVESTER II), and Adalbero of Reims, Adso is remembered especially for his writings. The most important is De Antichristo (Patrologia Latina 101: 1291–98), among the writings attributed to ALCUIN; it is addressed to Gerberga, wife of Louis IV of France. He wrote about the lives of many saints, namely, St. Frodobert (Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 1:505–13), St. Mansuetus (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 1:637–51), St. Basolus (Patrologia Latina 137:647–68), St. Bercharius (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 7.2:1010–31), and St. Waldebert (Acta Sanctorum, May 1:282–87).

Bibliography: J. P. MIGNE, ed., Patrologia Latina 137:599–700. Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Scriptores) 4:487–90, 509–20. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi 1:16. E. MARTIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:636. G. HOCQUARD, Catholicisme 1:164–65. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:159.

[C. DAVIS]

ADUARTE, DIEGO FRANCISCO

Dominican chronicler and bishop in the Philippines; b. Zaragoza, Spain, 1569; d. Nueva Segovia, 1636. He took the Dominican habit in 1586 and made his profession in the order the next year in Alcalá de Henares. He was already a priest when he went to the Philippines in 1594. In Manila he taught Christianity to the Chinese residents. From there his missionary zeal took him to Cambodia, Canton, Malacca, and Cochin China, where he underwent many hardships and met only failures for his efforts. He was convinced of the need for more missionaries in the Far East and made trips to Spain in 1603 and in 1607 to get them. On the second trip he went to France and got two missionary expeditions sent out. He himself prepared a third group and accompanied it as far as Mexico; he then returned to Spain for a fourth expedition, which he led to Manila. He was named bishop of Nueva Segovia in 1632 and governed wisely and charitably. He died a holy death. His body was found incorrupt, even though it had been buried in such damp soil that the casket was full of water. His chief work was Historia de la Provincia del Santo Rosario de la Orden de Predicadores en Filipinas, Japón y China, 2 v. (Manila 1640; Zaragoza, Spain 1693). It was reprinted with many additions in 1742, 1783, and 1870–72. In 1962 an edition containing a biography and bibliography of the author was published in Madrid.

[E. GÓMEZ TAGLE]

ADULTERY

Defined by moral theologians as the act of sexual intercourse between a married man and a woman not his wife, or between a married woman and a man not her husband. The special note here is that at least one of the two parties concerned is married. If both are married, the guilt, of course, is compounded. As to the specific guilt of adultery, it adds a sin against justice to the intrinsically grave malice of fornication, which in itself is a deordination of sex from its true and appointed end. The victim of the injustice is, of course, the innocent spouse, whose marital rights are violated by the sinning parties.

Authors are agreed that the special malice of adultery remains even if the injured spouse should consent to the evil action. The reason is that marriage is an indissoluble contract, and hence no one can waive his rights in this matter, and they are in fact inalienable.

As to the consequences of adultery, Canon Law makes it clear that if one party is guilty of adultery, the other has the right to effect a permanent separation, and this indeed without any intervention of ecclesiastical authority. The marriage bond itself remains, however, and precludes remarriage. Canon 1152 of the code notes also that this right is forfeited if the other party consented to the crime, was the cause of it, expressly or tacitly condoned (i.e., pardoned) it, or was guilty of the same crime. The innocent party is considered to have condoned the crime if, having learned of it, he or she continued to live with the guilty one in marital relations. The law presumes this to be the case unless the innocent party within six months has turned the adulterer out of doors, or has left, or brought legal action against, him or her.

When separation has taken place because of adultery, the innocent party is never again under obligation to readmit the adulterer to a community of married life. If the innocent party freely desires this readmission, however, it is his privilege to grant it, unless the adulterer in the meantime, with the consent of the innocent party, has assumed new obligations, such as the vows of the religious state. In general, it may be said that the Church favors the condoning of the adultery by the innocent party, out of a spirit of Christian charity, for the sake of keeping the family together, unless circumstances clearly make this inadvisable.

If the party accused of adultery denies the crime, objects to the departure of the spouse, and takes his case to an ecclesiastical court, the other party must furnish proof of the adultery.

The right to separate belongs to the innocent party, not to the guilty one, and the adulterer must stay with his spouse if the latter desires this. Once the innocent party has decided on this course of action, the adultery ceases to be a cause of separation, and the innocent party may not at some future disagreement or quarrel threaten to separate because of the adultery.

Bibliography: J. AERTNYS and C. A. DAMEN, Theologia moralis, 2 v. (16th ed. Turin 1950). S. WOYWOD, A Practical Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, rev. and enl. C. SMITH (New York 1963).

[L. G. MILLER/EDS.]

ADULTERY (IN THE BIBLE)

In the ancient Near East adultery was sexual intercourse between a married or betrothed woman and a man who was not her husband. Adultery was prohibited in the Decalogue (Ex 20:14; Dt 5:8), the Holiness Code of Leviticus (Lv 20:20), and Deuteronomy's collection of miscellaneous laws (Dt 22:22), but is not mentioned in the Covenant Code of Ex 20:22–23:33. The presence of a prohibition of adultery in the Decalogue shows that adultery was not only a matter of concern for the aggrieved husband, as it was generally considered throughout the ancient Near East, but that it was also and primarily a source of concern for the community. Israel's identity as a covenantal people was at stake when adultery had been committed. A husband's exclusive sexual rights over his wife were violated when his wife committed adultery. What was really at stake, however, was the purity of the family line and the inheritance of a family's possessions by legitimate offspring.

"Christ and the Adulteress," oil painting by Lorenzo Lotto, 1530–1535, the Musée du Louvre, Paris. (© Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Lv 20:10 and Dt 22:22 portray adultery as a capital crime. The death penalty was to be meted out to both the woman and the man involved in the act. Contemporary scholarship shows that there is considerable debate about this punishment. Some scholars consider that the death penalty was "on the books" but that actual practice was somewhat different. Hos 2:4 and later rabbinic texts suggest that divorce was a penalty actually incurred by an adulterous woman. Being stripped of her clothes seems to be the penalty suggested by Hos 2:5, 12; Jer 13:22–26; Ez 16:37, 39; 23:26, 29. It may be that stripping was either part of the divorce procedure or a preparation for execution. If the penalty of death were actually inflicted, it probably took place by stoning (Sus 62; see Dt 19:16–19; Jn 8:5) but burning may have been the instrument of death (Gn 38:24).

Some of the ambiguity related to the interpretation of the penalty for adultery arises because the Bible's prophetic literature used adultery as an image for Israel's departure from its covenantal relationship with Yahweh (Hos 1–3; Jer 2:23–25; 3:1–13; Ez 16:23; see Rv 17–18). Biblical wisdom literature says that "the commandment" preserves a man from the wife of another. The one who commits adultery has no sense and arouses the wrath of the aggrieved husband (Prv 6:20–35; see also Prv 2:16–19, 5:1–23; 7:4–5).

“Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery,” painting by Nicholas Colombel, 1702. (© Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

The New Testament reprises the Decalogue’s prohibition of adultery (Mt 5:27; 19:18; Mk 10:19; Lk 18:20; Rom 2:22; 13:9; Jas 2:11). The Sermon on the Mount interprets the commandment “you shall not commit adultery” as also prohibiting lust, probably masturbation, and divorce (Mt 7:27–32). Matthew’s explanation of the commandment is similar to the midrashic interpretation of the early rabbinic tradition. Matthew, along with the Book of Revelation, followed the Bible in using adultery as a metaphor for apostasy and religious infidelity (Mt 12:39; 16:4; Rv 2:22; 17:1–18:24; see Mk 8:38).

Hellenistic catalogs of vices listing adultery as a kind of behavior that is inconsistent with discipleship appear in Mt 15:19; Mk 7:22; Lk 18:11; 1 Cor 6:9. Exhortations urging the avoidance of adultery are occasionally found in the New Testament (1 Thes 4:6; Heb 13:4; Jas 4:4). A story of a woman caught in the act of adultery has been incorporated into the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7:53–8:11). While Jesus urges the woman to sin no more (Jn 8:11), the purpose of the story is not to teach about the evil of adultery. Rather, the story is one that contrasts the opponents of Jesus’ readiness to condemn others with Jesus’ readiness to forgive sinners.

Bibliography: R. F. COLLINS, Sexual Ethics and the New Testament: Behavior and Belief, (Companions to the New Testament;

New York 2000). E. A. GOODFRIEND, “Adultery,” Anchor Bible Dictionary (New York 1992) 1:82–86.

[R. F. COLLINS]

ADVENT

From the Latin adventus, meaning coming; the season immediately before Christmas, beginning on the Sunday nearest the feast of St. Andrew (November 30) and lasting for four weeks. In about the 9th century the First Sunday of Advent became the beginning of the Church year.

Meaning. Because Advent is so closely related to Christmas it can scarcely be understood apart from that feast. It was not until the birth of Christ was celebrated throughout the Church that Advent came into existence at all. Its name is derived from the ancient name for the feast, for Adventus, Epiphania and Natale are all synonymous first for the Incarnation itself, then for the feast that commemorates and celebrates the Incarnation. Christmas, as well as Epiphany, is not only the commemoration of the birth of Christ as a historical event, it is also and much more the celebration of the coming of God in the flesh as a saving event. The very celebration itself is a saving event that brings about the coming of Christ among humanity and anticipates his return in glory.

The term Advent gradually came to designate the time before Christmas. The ancient Introit for the Epiphany begins with the words “Ecce advenit Dominator Dominus” (Behold the Lord the Ruler is come.) Advent is a comprehensive name for the Incarnation and all that the Incarnation accomplishes.

History. The remote origin of Advent is to be found in the Gallican custom of having a time of preparation for the Feast of the Epiphany, which was a baptismal feast in that part of the West and consequently had its season of preparation for Baptism similar to Lent. This took the form of a period of fasting and prayer that at first lasted three weeks but in time was lengthened to 40 days similar to Lent. It came to be known as St. Martin’s Lent because it began on that saint’s feast, November 11. This early Advent was an ascetical rather than a liturgical season.

In 380 the Council of Saragossa ordered that there be a three-week fast before the Epiphany, beginning on December 17. About 100 years later the diocese of Tours kept a fast three times a week beginning with St. Martin’s Day, a custom that the Council of Mâcon (581) extended to all the dioceses of France. During the next two centuries the practice found its way to England.

At Rome Epiphany had never been a baptismal feast, so the same reason for having a “Lent” preceding it did not exist. When Advent first appeared at Rome it was a preparation for Christmas and not the Epiphany, and it was a liturgical season rather than an ascetical period. There was no Advent at Rome until the second half of the 6th century. The Gelasian Sacramentary (6th century) was the first to provide an Advent liturgy, possibly originating not at Rome but in Ravenna in the 5th century.

Gregory I the Great (d. 604) shortened the season from six weeks to four, composed liturgical texts, and arranged the Lectionary for the Mass and the Office. When the Roman rite was introduced into Gaul in the 9th century, it was enriched there with Gallican prayers and rites. Rome adopted the fast and penitential spirit of the Gallican Advent, along with its emphasis on the second coming of Christ. This fusion of the Roman and Gallican Advents found its way back to Rome in the 10th century.

Liturgy. Advent has a twofold character: as a season to prepare for Christmas when Christ’s first coming to us is remembered; as a season when that remembrance directs the mind and heart to await Christ’s Second Coming at the end of time. Advent is thus a period for devout and joyful expectation. (General Norms of the Liturgical Year and Calendar [GNLYC], no. 39) While the period up to December 16 more strongly focuses on Christ’s return in glory, December 17 to 24 serve more immediately as a preparation for the feast of the incarnation. Throughout, the liturgy celebrates Christ’s continual presence in the World (cf. Wednesday of the First Week of Advent, Office of Readings). The first reading for the Sundays of Advent in all three years presents the main messianic prophecies. The gospel reading for the first Sunday exhorts Christians to watch and be ready; the second and third Sundays highlight the figure and message of John the Baptist; and the fourth Sunday of Advent tells of the annunciation to Mary (year A), the annunciation to Joseph (year B), and the Visitation (year C.)

A characteristic feature of the Advent liturgy for December 17 to 23 are the traditional “O” antiphons. Originally found as the antiphon preceding the Cantic of Mary in Evening Prayer, these are popularly known through the hymn, “O Come O Come Emmanuel.”

The domestic custom of the wreath has been taken into the liturgy of Advent in many places in North America. The Book of Blessings, nos. 1510 to 1513, provides an order for blessing the Advent wreath the first Sunday of Advent, and provides for the silent lighting of the candles on successive Sundays. It indicates that four white candles or three purple and one rose candle may be used. The first purple candle is lit on the first Sunday of Advent, the second purple candle on the second, the rose candle on the third Sunday traditionally known as “Gaudete” (“Rejoice”) Sunday, and the fourth purple candle on the fourth Sunday of Advent. A white candle may be lit on Christmas Eve.

The use of rose is a remnant of Medieval practice when Advent was strongly penitential in character. The change of color on Gaudete Sunday marked a lessening of the penitential practices in expectation of Christmas joy. The use of all white candles is suggested by the renewal of the whole period of Advent as “one of devout and joyful expectation” (GNLYC, no. 39).

Theology. Advent is a liturgical season, a mystery in the ancient sense of the word, a present reality that contains and mediates salvation. It deepens and strengthens the awareness of Christ’s presence in his Church and in its members. Advent is at once a celebration of his first coming and his presence in the midst of his Church, and an anticipation of his full and final coming when he will complete the work of the redemption. The word Advent must therefore be taken in the fullest sense: past, present and future. The Church not only prepares to welcome him at Christmas time or to greet him in the hour of his final triumph; it rejoices even now in the presence of its Lord in its midst. All through the year Christians are summoned to prepare the way of the Lord who will come again by living the mystery of Christ in the present.

Bibliography: A. G. MARTIMORT, The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville 1986). J. N. ALEXANDER, Waiting for the Coming (Washington 1993). F. X. WEISER, Handbook of Christian Feasts and Customs (New York 1958).

[W. J. O'SHEA/S. K. ROLL]

ADVENTISTS

Adventists are various groups of Christians who since apostolic times have believed that the Second Coming of the Lord was imminent (see PAROUSIA). Adherents of MONTANISM in the 2d century looked for an early end of the world, as did the ANABAPTISTS during the Reformation. Modern adventism began in the early 19th century in America with the biblical prophecies of William MILLER (1782–1849). Seeing signs of widespread moral deterioration, Adventists believe that the world is evil and must soon be destroyed. They foresee a final battle between the forces of good and evil, usually identified as the battle of Armageddon, and the victory of Jesus Christ, who will then establish a kingdom of righteousness that will last for 1,000 years. Miller set definite dates for the Second Coming in 1843 and 1844 but when these dates passed, his followers became disillusioned. Only a remnant continued to proclaim the imminent Second Coming and these adventists usually refused to specify a date.

Largest of the adventist bodies that stem from Miller's preaching is the SEVENTH DAY ADVENTIST Church. Along with adventism it teaches the observance of the Jewish Sabbath, conditional immortality, and the prophethood of Mrs. Ellen G. White (1827–1915). The general conference of the church was organized in 1863 and since then Seventh Day Adventism has spread throughout the world. A much smaller adventist body, the Advent Christian Church, was organized in 1855 by Jonathan Cummings, who taught doctrines similar to those of the Seventh Day Adventists, but his followers observed Sunday instead of Saturday. JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES is an adventist body that denies the Trinity and the deity of Jesus Christ. The founder of this sect, Charles Taze RUSSELL, was influenced by adventist preachers early in his career. The Church of Jesus Christ of LATTERDAY SAINTS originally stressed adventism, but this emphasis in Mormonism gradually diminished. Many of the PENTECOSTAL churches include a strong adventist position among their beliefs, as do the CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH and the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH. Other small adventist bodies include the Life and Advent Union, the Church of God (Abrahamic Faith), the Primitive Advent Christian Church, and the United Seventh Day Brethren.

[W. J. WHALEN/EDS.]

A close-up of the top of the Church of Seventh Day Adventists in downtown Chicago. (© Sandy Felsenthal/CORBIS)

ADVERTENCE

The act of the mind heeding, attending to, or taking note of something. The term is used by moralists to signify actual attention given by an agent to what he is doing or to some morally significant circumstance. Thus a man who is habitually aware of his obligation to abstain from meat on Friday may eat meat without advertent to the fact that it is Friday. Advertence admits of varying degrees of clarity and of distinctness. Inadvertence is a kind of actual ignorance, and the general principles governing its effect upon the morality of human action are the same as those that determine the influence of ignorance.

See Also: IGNORANCE.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 6.8. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, 4 v. (rev. ed. New York 1958) v.1. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (8th ed. Paris 1949) 1:351–352, 355–356, 435–438.

[F. D. NEALY]

ADVERTISEMENTS, BOOK OF

A set of instructions regulating the conduct of religious services, issued in 1566 by Matthew PARKER, Archbishop of Canterbury, as a means of securing uniformity in public worship. The legislation of 1559 had brought about a church compounded of Protestant doctrine and Catholic ceremonial. This compromise was abhorrent to the extreme Protestant reformers who wished to see a form of worship that was purified from all taint of popery (the so-called PURITANS). The Puritan dispute with the established church developed slowly. In its early stages it was concerned with the vestments prescribed for use by the Royal Injunctions of 1559, which the Puritans regarded as the "livery of Antichrist." Neither side was prepared to yield; the Puritan objections were grounded in conscience, and Elizabeth I refused to waive the exercise of her prerogative to regulate worship. Other items were, in time, added to the list of Puritan objections, such as the use of organs, the ring in the marriage service, the sign of the cross in Baptism, and other "dregs of popery." Sympathy with the Puritans was considerable; in 1563 articles embodying their objections were introduced into the lower house of convocation, where they were rejected by only one (proxy) vote.

The disorder prevailing in the church alarmed the Queen, and on Jan. 25, 1565, she instructed Parker to secure "one manner of uniformity through our whole realm" and to eradicate variety "by order, injunction, or censure according to the order and appointment of such laws as are provided by act of parliament." Accordingly, in March 1566, he issued a set of instructions, known as the Book of Advertisements, which laid down fixed rules for the conduct of public services. The delay in issuing the Advertisements was due to the fact that Parker had been anxious, in order to lessen his own difficulties, to obtain royal authority for them; this was, however, withheld by the Queen. From the outset they met with opposition. At a meeting held at Lambeth on March 26, 1566, to which more than 100 of the London clergy were summoned, 37 refused to comply with the Advertisements; these men were suspended from office and then deprived. Nevertheless, they continued to preach and conduct services, and they may be regarded as the first English Nonconformists.

Bibliography: R. W. DIXON, History of the Church of England, 6 v. (Oxford 1878–1902) v.5, 6. J. STRYPE, The Life and Acts of Matthew Parker, 3 v. (Oxford 1821) v.1. V. J. K. BROOK, A Life of Archbishop Parker (Oxford 1962). H. GEE and W. J. HARDY, comps., Documents Illustrative of English Church History (London 1896) 467–475 (text). J. I. DAELEY, "Pluralism in the Diocese of Canterbury during the Administration of Matthew Parker, 1559–1575" Journal of Ecclesiastical History 18 (1967) 33–49. M. E. VANDER SCHAFF, "Archbishop Parker's Efforts Toward a Bucarian Discipline in the Church of England," Sixteenth Century Journal 8:1 (1977) 85–103. B.S. ROBINSON, "'Darke Speech': Matthew Parker and the Reforming of History," Sixteenth Century Journal 29:4 (1998) 1061–1083.

[G. DE C. PARMITER/EDS.]

AELFRIC GRAMMATICUS

Benedictine abbot of Eynsham, greatest Anglo-Saxon author of the 10th and 11th centuries; b. c. 950 to 955; d. Eynsham, c. 1020. He was trained in the ideals of the 10th-century English Benedictine revival by ETHELWOLD at WINCHESTER and as a monk and priest was sent (c. 987) by ALPHEGE OF CANTERBURY, Ethelwold's successor, to Cerne (Dorset), founded by ealdorman Aethelmaer. There Aelfric conducted the monastic school. In 1005 he became first abbot of Eynsham, another foundation of Aethelmaer. His Anglo-Saxon writings, composed in lucid, precise, often alliterative style, included, among other works, the Catholic Homilies (991–992), two series of 40 sermons each, dedicated to Abp. Sigeric of Canterbury, derived mainly from Church Fathers and intended for use throughout the liturgical year; Lives of the Saints (before 998), a third homiletic collection, concerning saints "whom monks honor"; paraphrases of parts of the Heptateuch; and a treatise on the Old and New Testaments. His Latin Grammar, the source of his appellation "the Grammarian," was the first in a medieval vernacular. This work, his Latin Glossary and the famous Colloquy, with its informative and amusing conversations, were all educational works for monastic schools. Aelfric also condensed the Regularis concordia for Eynsham; he authored a vita of Ethelwold and pastoral letters for Bp. Wulfsgie of Sherborne and Abp. Wulfstan of York. Sixteenth-century English reformers believed his Easter homily on the Real Presence supported their views against transubstantiation; but his position, influenced by RATRAMNUS OF CORBIE and affirming the "spiritual" (gastlice) presence in the Eucharist, antedated the precise distinctions of medieval scholasticism.

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 1:164–166. C. L. WHITE, A.: A New Study of His Life and Writings (Boston 1898). S. H. GEM, An Anglo-Saxon Abbot: A. of Eynsham (Edinburgh 1912). M. M. DU-BOIS, A.: Sermonnaire, docteur et grammairien (Paris 1943). P. CLEMOES, "The Chronology of A.'s Works," The Anglo-Saxons, ed. P. CLEMOES (London 1959) 212–247.

[W. A. CHANEY]

AELFRIC OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Archbishop; d. Nov. 16, 1005. A monk of Abingdon and possibly of Glastonbury, he was abbot of St. Alban's and bishop of Ramsbury and Wilton (c. 990) before his election to Canterbury on Easter Day 995. Installed in 996, he received GREGORY V's own pallium in Rome (997). The expulsion of secular clergy and the substitution of monks at Canterbury Cathedral are now generally attributed to either Aelfric (Alfrick) or his predecessor, Sigeric. Buried at Abingdon, his body was translated to St. John's, Canterbury, and (after 1067) to his Cathedral. His will is extant. Reference to Aelfric is found in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, the Vita Dunstani auctore B (dedicated to Aelfric), in Florence of Worcester, the Chronicon monasterii de Abingdon, and the Chronicon monasterii sancti Albani. Matthew of Paris, however, is unreliable.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: J. M. KEMBLE, ed., Codex diplomaticus aevi saxonici, 6 v. (London 1839–48). C. COTTON, The Saxon Cathedral at Canterbury and the Saxon Saints Buried Therein (Manchester 1929). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (Cambridge 1962) 696–697.

[W. A. CHANEY]

AELFRYTH OF CROWLAND, ST.

Anglo-Saxon virgin, recluse; d. after 833. She was the daughter of King Offa of Mercia, but unfortunately neither he nor his family found a biographer. Aelfryth (Alfreda, Elfriede, Ethelfreda, Etheldritha, etc.) is said to have been betrothed to St. Ethelbert, King of East Anglia, who was executed on her father's orders c. 790. Surviving her father (d. 796) by many years, she seems to have lived a solitary life at Crowland (Croyland), one of the great Midland monasteries. She is often confused with her sister Aelfleda, whose husband was murdered through treachery.

Feast: Aug. 2 (Crowland).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum August 1:173–175. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum, ed. J. CALEY et al. (London 1817–30) 2:109–111. R. STANTON, A Menology of England and Wales (London 1887) 22. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:527.

[E. JOHN]

AELRED (AILRED), ST.

Abbot and writer; b. Hexham, Northumberland, 1110; d. Rievaulx, Jan. 12, 1167.

Life. He was of a noble family, the son of Eilaf, the last of the hereditary priests of Hexham in Northumberland on the English-Scottish border. He attended schools at Hexham and Durham, and possibly at the old Scottish capital, Roxburgh. Much of his youth he spent at the court of the half-English King David I of Scotland. Aelred entered the Cistercian Abbey of Rievaulx in Yorkshire probably in 1134. His monastic life falls into three periods: for nine years he was at Rievaulx as novice, monk, and confidential adviser to Abbot William; for about four years he was abbot of Revesby, a newly established daughterhouse of Rievaulx; and from the end of 1147 until his death he was abbot of Rievaulx.

Aelred was known to his contemporaries as the “Bernard of the North” because of the warmth of his sentiment, the attractive power of his mind, and his wondrous gift of writing and preaching for monks and clergy. He was one of the most influential persons of his time. His life was marked by tireless activity, even during the chronic illness that plagued his later life. The duties of administering a large and prosperous community and the many visitations to the daughterhouses of Rievaulx were a constant responsibility. Moreover, he kept up an extensive correspondence and was much in demand as friend and counselor to abbots, bishops, and kings. His writings reveal Aelred as a person of warmth and simplicity, deeply imbued with the Christian humanism of his day.

His life, the Vita Aelredi, was written by a contemporary monk, Walter Daniel, who lived for 17 years under Aelred's rule and who sought to illustrate Aelred's sanctity. The supposed canonization of Aelred by Celestine III in 1191 is false. In 1476 the general chapter at Cîteaux allowed a more solemn celebration of Aelred's feast in England and gave a formal authorization of the local cultus.

Writings. Only part of the literary heritage of Aelred is extant. His extensive correspondence with popes and kings, his rhythmic prose in honor of St. Cuthbert, his homily for the feast of St. Edward the Confessor have been lost. The Vita Aelredi is the starting point for the authentic list of Aelred's works. This list does not include the Oratio pastoralis and four historical works, although these are well attested by twelfth-century Rievaulx manuscripts. The manuscript tradition of the corpus aelredianum tells an interesting story. Some 180 manuscripts have been listed. The great number of thirteenth-century manuscripts (71) is due partly to the fact that several works of Aelred were ascribed to St. Bernard and St. Augustine. The greatest number of manuscripts were copied at the Benedictine Abbey of Reading, and most are preserved today in England.

The first attempt to edit a series of Aelredian works was made by Richard Gibbons in the 17th century. A complete and critical edition of the Opera Omnia was published in 1971 for the 800th anniversary of Aelred's death.

The writings of Aelred are usually divided into ascetical or devotional works and historical works.

Ascetical Works. Aelred's first work, Speculum caritatis, was written at the instigation of St. Bernard of Clairvaux while Aelred was novice master. In a fluent and fine style, he treated of the excellence and practice of charity. The De Iesu puero duodenni was written at the request of a friend, Ivo of Wardon. Quoting the text of Luke (2.41–52), Aelred gave a literal, an allegorical, and a spiritual or moral exposition. His most famous work, De spiritali amicitia, was based on Cicero's De amicitia but was influenced also by Augustine and Bernard. Written in dialogue form, it has as its theme that truly spiritual friendship never concerns two persons only. It always involves Christ, who is the source from which the friendship springs, the framework in which it grows, and the final end at which it aims.

The De institutione inclusarum is a rule for recluses, written at the request of Aelred's sister. According to the author's own words, it contains "a way of life to govern the body, a way of purifying the inward man of vices, and an example of three-fold meditation." The De anima consists solely in a synthesis of Augustinian doctrine and deals with fundamental questions concerning the nature of the soul—a common preoccupation for contemporary Cistercian psychologists. Aelred's ascetical works include also Sermones de tempore et de sanctis, 31 Sermones de oneribus, and a fine pastoral prayer of the abbot for his monks.

Historical Works. The historical writings of Aelred have long been neglected on the assumption that they are not of spiritual interest. However, they reveal much of Aelred's personality and of the spiritual environment of the country in which he lived. In chronological order, they are: Genealogia regum anglorum, Vita s. Niniani, De bello standardii, De sanctimoniali de Watton, Vita s. Eduardi Confessoris, De sanctis Ecclesiae Hagulstadensis.

Doctrine. Aelred's love for Ciceronian literature could no longer predominate after he entered the cloister. The lectio divina led him to a love of the Scriptures. As a monk he was oriented toward the writings of the fathers of the desert, the Rule of St. Benedict, and the whole patristic learning, especially the Confessions of St. Augustine. Faithful to the Cistercian formation, he showed great devotion to the humanity of Christ, wrote with Bernardine accents about charity and spiritual friendship, composed a treatise on the nature of the soul, and wove beautiful prayers into his sermons for the monks. His meditation on the incidents of Our Lord's life and Passion had a remarkable influence on the later development of Christian spirituality. Aelred's insistence on monastic experience as a way that leads to God, his affective spirituality, his Christocentric devotion, especially to the Child Jesus, make him one of the greatest monastic writers of medieval England.

Feast: March 3 (Dioceses of Liverpool, Hexham, and Middlesbrough and in Cistercian houses).

Bibliography: W. DANIEL, The Life of Ailred of Rievaulx, ed. and tr. F. M. POWICKE (New York 1950; reprinted Oxford 1978). M. A. CALABRESE, Bibliotheca sanctorum 1:276–279. B. P. MCGUIRE, Brother and Lover: Aelred of Rievaulx (New York 1994). A. SQUIRE, Aelred of Rievaulx: A study. (London 1969; reprinted Kalamazoo, Mich. 1981). C. M. SAGE, "The MSS of St. Aelred," American Catholic Historical Review 34 (1949) 437–445. A. HOSTE, Bibliotheca Aelrediana (The Hague 1962), a survey of the MSS, old catalog, eds., and studies of Aelred. Aelredi Rievallensis Opera omnia, A. HOSTE and C. H. TALBOT (Turnhout, Belgium 1971) in the series Corpus Christianorum. Continuatio Medievales. Aelred of Rievaulx, historical works, ed. J. P. FREELAND and M. DUTTON (Kalamazoo, MI 1994). R. GIBBONS, ed., Opera divi Aelredi Rievallensis (Douai 1618; repr. 1655), includes most of the ascetical works. Critical eds. of individual works: De Iesu puero duodenni, ed. A. HOSTE, tr. J. DUBOIS, as Quand Jésus eut douze ans (Sources Chrétiennes 60; 1959); Eng. tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER, On Jesus at Twelve Years Old (London 1956). De institutione inclusarum, ed. C. H. TALBOT, in AnalOCist 7 (1951) 167–217; Eng. tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER, A Letter to His Sister by Saint Aelred of Rievaulx (London 1957). De anima, ed. C. H. TALBOT, in Medieval and Renaissance Studies Suppl 1 (1952). De spiritali amicitia, see A. HOSTE, "The First Draft of Aelred of Rievaulx' De spiritali amicitia," Sacris erudiri 10 (1958) 186–211. For thirteenth- and fourteenth-century summaries of De spiritali amicitia, see A. HOSTE, "Le Speculum spiritalis amicitiae, compilation du XIII e siècle de deux traités d'Aelred de Rievaulx par Thomas de Frakaham," Studia monastica 3 (1961) 291–323, Eng. tr. H. TALBOT, Christian Friendship by S. Aelred of Rievaulx (London 1942). C. DUMONT, ed. and tr., Saint Aelred de Rievaulx (Les Écrits des saints; Namur 1961), extracts of the ascetical writings. R. TWYSDEN, ed., Historiae anglicanae scriptores X (London 1652), includes most of the historical writings. See also A. SQUIRE, "Historical Factors in the Formation of A. of R.," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensis Reformatorium 22 (1960) 262–282. CETEDOC, Universitas Catholica Lovaniensis Lovanii Novi, ed., Aelredus Rievallensis, opera ascetica, ed. (Turnhout, Belgium 1989); Aelredus Rievallensis, Sermones I–XLVI (Turnhout 1989). R. L. G. RITCHIE, The Normans in Scotland (Edinburgh 1954) 246–257. A. HALLIER, Un Éducateur monastique: Aelred de Rievaulx (Paris 1959), Eng. tr. C. HEANEY as The Monastic Theology of Aelred of Rievaulx: An experiential theology (Shannon, Ireland 1969). C. DUMONT, "L'Équilibre humain de la vie cistercienne d'après le Bs. A. de R.," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensis Reformatorium 18 (1956) 177–189; "A. de R.," Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris 1961) 527–538. A. HOSTE and S. ROSE DE LIMA, For Crist Luve: Prayers of Saint Aelred, Abbot of Rievaulx (The Hague 1965). Literature. G. FÖSGES, Das Menschenbild bei Aelred von Rievaulx (Altenberge 1994). J. J. JUSSERAND, English essays from a French Pen (New York 1970). A. MAIORINO TUOZZI, La conoscenza de sé nella scuola cisterciense (Naples 1976). W. M. WRIGHT, A retreat with Francis de Sales, Jane de Chantal, and Aelred of Rievaulx: Befriending Each Other in God (Cincinnati, Ohio 1996).

[A. HOSTE]

AEMILIAN, SS.

The Roman martyrology lists eight saints by this name; other martyrologies list more. The most noteworthy are the following:

Aemilian, martyred at Dristra (Romania) under the Emperor Julian the Apostate.

Feast: July 18.

Aemilian of Cogolla (also called Emilian Cucullatus and Emilian-with-the-Hood), hermit, parish priest; d. Tarazon, Aragon, 574; the abbey of S. Millán de la Cogolla was built at his hermitage and has his relics. His life was written by BRAULIO; he is regarded as a patron of Spain.

Feast: Nov. 12.

Aemilian, Bishop of Cyzicus, ninth century; he opposed Emperor Leo V the Armenian in the controversy over iconoclasm and died in exile as a result.

Feast: Aug. 8.

Aemilian, Bishop of Nantes, perhaps in the eighth century; though he is not named in the early lists of bishops of Nantes, legend claims he fought against the Saracens near Autun.

Feast: Sept. 3.

Aemilian (also Eminian) of Lagny, abbot, d. c. 648; an Irish disciple of St. FURSEY (FURSEUS), he succeeded him as abbot of Lagny-sur-Marne.

Feast: March 10.

Bibliography: B. DUTTON, La "Vida de San Millán de la Cogolla" de Gonzalo de Berceo (London 1967). Acta Sanctorum July 4:370–376. J. DUBOIS, Catholicisme 4:52. I. M. GOMEZ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 15:406–412. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:321–322. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:438. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:353; Oct. 11:196. V. GRUMEL, Catholicisme 4:51–52. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:105. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 9:75–76. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:52–53. Acta Sanctorum March 2:45.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

AEON (IN THE BIBLE)

An indefinitely long period of time. The Biblical use of the term can be seen best by examining how it is employed in the OT, in intertestamental Judaism, and in the NT.

In the Old Testament. The Greek word αἰών, from which the English word is derived, first occurs in the Greek versions of the Bible as a translation of the Hebrew word 'ōlām, meaning an indefinitely long period of time of greater or lesser extent. The terms express especially the notion of the duration of time in which one generation succeeds another (Eccl 1.4) or indefinite periods of time long since past (Jos 24.2) and thus come to mean age (Ez 26.20). Moreover, 'ōlām and αἰών come to take on the more precise meaning of eternity or unlimited, endless time in some passages in which Yahweh is said to live "from of old" (mê-'ōlām), as one generation succeeds another. He is "the everlasting God" ('ēl 'ōlām: Gn 21.33). He swears "As I live forever. . ." (Ie 'ōlām: Dt 32.40). The eternal King (melek 'ōlām: Jer 10.10) is, in the later, deuterocanonical books, He who lives forever (hê-'ōlām: Dn 12.7; Sir 18.1).

In Intertestamental Judaism. In addition to the two meanings of αἰών, "long duration of time" and "eternity," that later Judaism received from the OT, two new and often related meanings emerged: (1) The apocalyptic literature in particular distinguishes between the present "age," which is "the aeon of injustice" (Ethiopic Enoch 48.7) and the future "age" of holiness (Syriac Baruch 15.7–8). In the eschatology of this period [see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)] there is postulated a moral difference between the present evil aeon and the future aeon with its promise of happiness for the just (cf. even the deuterocanonical Tb 14.5). (2) The present "age" was easily identified with the world that has existed from creation up to the present [see WORLD (IN THE BIBLE)] or to the future golden "age," and thus the temporal meaning of αἰών tends sometimes to merge with a purely spatial sense of this material world (4 Esdras 7.50).

In the New Testament. The NT authors use αἰών to mean (1) age in the sense of a certain period of time of greater or lesser duration, (2) age meaning an indefinite period of years or of generations, (3) eternity properly speaking, and (4) world either as the present material world, especially the world of sin and darkness that is opposed to the kingdom of God, or the "world to come" that has already begun.

(1) The word αἰών sometimes means simply age or era as a more or less defined number of years or generations. Thus in 1 Cor 10.11, St. Paul refers to the limited "ages" of the past when he says that "the end of the ages" has come.

(2) As an indefinite duration of time, αἰών may have been used several times (e.g., in 1 Cor 2.7, where "before the ages" may refer to the limited but indefinite period of time between creation and the end of the world), but such usage readily passes over into the following meaning.

(3) The term αἰών can signify eternity in the sense of an unlimited, endless period of time, either backward and forward or simply the future duration of time without end. Thus in Col 1.26 ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων apparently means “from all eternity,” but perhaps equivalently, “before the foundation of the world,” as in Eph 1.4; Jn 17.24; 1 Pt 1.20; see also εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (forever) in Jn 6.51; εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ αἰῶνος and εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων in Heb 1.8; Gal 1.5; 1 Tm 1.17 meaning “forever and ever,” and αἰῶνιος (everlasting) in Rom 16.26; Heb 9.14.

(4) Finally, αἰών very frequently has the sense of world (Heb 1.2; 11.3), especially in those passages where “this present aeon” is contrasted with “the aeon to come” (Mt 12.32; Mk 10.30; Rom 12.2). As in Jewish usage there is often a moral difference between “this aeon” and “the aeon to come”; so in Lk 16.8, “the children of this aeon” are distinguished from “the children of light.” St. Paul expressly speaks of “the present evil aeon” (Gal 1.4), and Jesus refers to its end (Mt 13.39). The future aeon has, indeed, already begun in the present aeon by means of Christ’s Redemption (Gal 1.4; Heb 6.5), but there remains the tension between the present world and the growing realization of the kingdom of God.

Bibliography: H. SASSE, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 1:197–209. O. CULLMANN, Christ and Time, tr. F. V. FILSON (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1964). J. BARR, Biblical Words for Time (Naperville, Ill. 1962). A. LUNEAU, L’Histoire du salut chez les pères de l’église (Paris 1964). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, trans. and ed. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 662–664. F. J. SCHIERSE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:680–683.

[J. L. RONAN]

AEONIUS OF ARLES, ST.

Bishop; fl. 494–500. Little is known of his life before he became bishop and metropolitan of Arles on Aug. 23, 494. On Sept. 29, 500, he was succeeded at his own request by his friend CAESARIUS OF ARLES, with whom he had founded Châlon-sur-Saône. Two important items were settled during his episcopacy, the diocesan boundary with Vienne and the primacy of the See of Arles (Jaffé K 753, 754). Popes ANASTASIUS III and Symmachus corresponded with him on TRADUCIANISM and the date of Easter in certain doubtful cases (Jaffé 751, 754). There are also letters to him from Ruricius I of Limoges (d. 507; PL 58:87, 97). Aeonius contributed much to the development of monasticism in France and was instrumental in bringing Caesarius to Arles. His name does not appear in the Roman Martyrology.

Feast: Aug. 18.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin) 3:460–462, 469. Patrologia Latina

67:1005–06. Sancti Caesarii opera omnia, ed. G. MORIN, 2 v. in 3 (Maredsous 1937–42) 2:300. E. EWIG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:683. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:279–280. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. F. KALTENBRUNNER (Graz 1956).

[T. P. HALTON]

AERTNYS, JOZEF

Redemptorist moral theologian (known also as Josef Aertnijs); b. Eindhoven, in the Diocese of s’Hertogenbosch, Holland, Jan. 15, 1828; d. Wittem, Holland, June 30, 1915. After being educated by the Redemptorists, Aertnys made his profession Oct. 15, 1846, and was ordained Sept. 14, 1854. He served as professor of moral theology at Wittem from 1860 to 1898 and was a consultant in theological and canonical problems for the bishops and priests of his native land. Among his writings, the more important were: Caeremoniale solemnum functionum juxta liturgiam Romanam (s’Hertogenbosch 1880; 3d ed. 1921); Compendium liturgiae sacrae (Tournai 1895; 11th ed. 1943); and Theologia moralis juxta doctrinam S. Alphonsi (Tournai 1886–87), a work that went through 17 editions, of which the ninth to 16th were made by A. Damen and the 17th was provided by J. Visser (1956–58), professor at the Urbaniana University in Rome. The 18th edition is being prepared. Aertnys also wrote Theologia pastoralis (Tournai 1892; 6th ed. 1916). He published many articles in scholarly publications and served as one of the original founders of the Nederlandse Katholieke Stemmen, for which he wrote frequently on moral questions of the day.

Bibliography: “In Memoriam,” Nederlandse Katholieke Stemmen 15 (1915) 210–11. M. DE MEULEMEESTER et al., Bibliographie générale des écrivains Rédemptoristes, 3 v. (Louvain 1933–39) 2:9–11; 3:246.

[A. SAMPERS]

AESCULAPIUS, CULT OF

Greek hero and god of healing, known also by the Greek form of his name, Asklepios. He is mentioned in the Iliad and by Pindar (Pyth. 3) and is treated extensively by Pausanias (Description of Greece, bk 2). The town of Epidaurus claimed to be his birthplace and here was built the greatest of the temples and healing establishments dedicated to him. Other outstanding centers were on the island of Cos and at Pergamum and Smyrna in Asia Minor. The cult was brought to Rome in 293 B.C.

The practice of healing at temples of Aesculapius usually required that the patient stay within the sacred enclosure of the temple, where the god would send dreams prescribing treatments to effect cures. The treatments prescribed were frequently of an unexpected character and involved physical exertion, regardless of the patient's condition. In addition to balms, poultices, warm baths, purges, bloodletting, diet and fasting, the god frequently prescribed horseback riding, cold baths, going barefoot, smearing the body with mud from the sacred spring, and outdoor exercises, even in the coldest weather.

Many votive inscriptions from the temple at Epidaurus are known (published in Inscriptiones Graecae v. 4 and in other collections). These, along with the data supplied by Aristophanes (Plut. 653–747) and the great 2d-century Sophist Aelius Aristides (Sacred Discourses) and others, furnish a fairly full literature on the kind of ailments treated and miraculous cures attested to. These include cures of barrenness, paralysis of the fingers, blindness, dumbness, removal of branding marks, kidney stones, tumors, skin diseases, fevers, and bronchial ailments—in fact, almost all the diseases known to man.

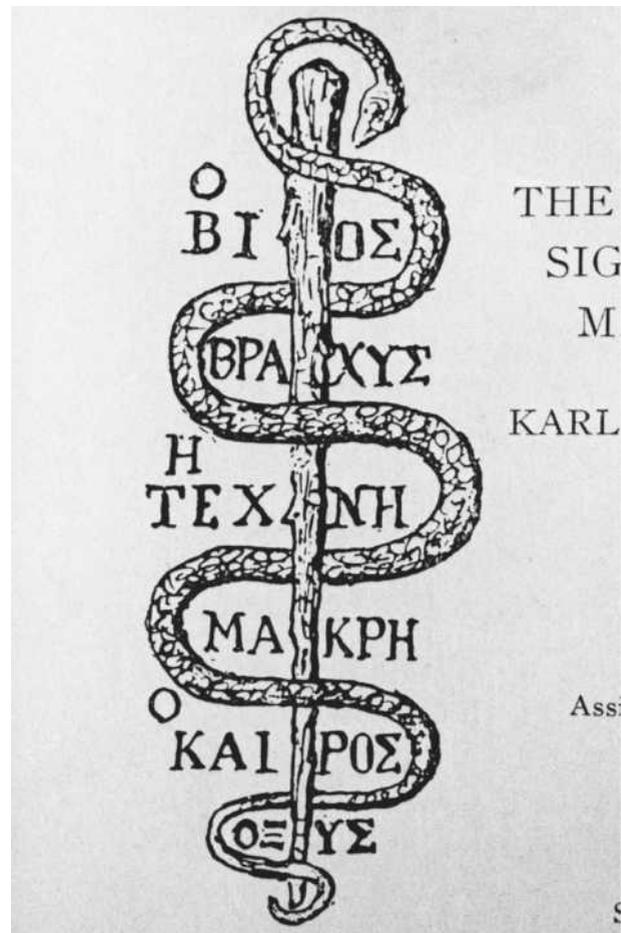

Some modern scholars have maintained that priests at the temples of Aesculapius often administered medicines and sometimes even performed operations, inducing the patient to believe that such events had occurred while they were asleep and were due to the intervention of the god himself. It is indeed probable that much of the medical lore contained in the so-called Hippocratic Corpus was collected, and perhaps used, at temples of this deity. The cult of Aesculapius was very popular and flourished until it was suppressed by Christian emperors.

Bibliography: F. R. WALTON, The Oxford Classical Dictionary (Oxford 1949) 16:106–107. K. PRÜMM, Religionsgeschichtliches Handbuch für den Raum der altchristlichen Umwelt (Rome 1954) 447–453. E. J. and L. EDELSTEIN, Asclepius, 2 v. (Baltimore 1945). A. M. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Personal Religion Among the Greeks (Berkeley 1954) 85–104.

[T. A. BRADY]

AESTHETICS

The term has been used in several significantly different ways since it was first introduced by A. G. Baumgarten (Meditationes philosophicae de nonnullis ad poema pertinentibus, 1735), who defined it as “the science of sensory cognition.” In one more recent but well-established use (as in the Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Cleveland), it embraces all comparatively broad and searching questions about art, its nature, conditions, and consequences, and is roughly equivalent to the philosophy and psychology of art. Many modern thinkers maintain a sharp distinction between psychological aesthetics, considered as a branch of empirical psychology, and philosophical aesthetics. Of these thinkers, some regard the latter as a special application of philosophical analysis to those problems that arise from reflection on the presuppositions and methodological principles of criticism, i.e., the description, interpretation, and evaluation of works of art. Others would define philosophical aesthetics as the investigation of the nature of art, of beauty, and of aesthetic value.

Serpent of Aesculapius. (Bettmann/CORBIS)

Each of the arts (and, it might be added, certain aspects of nature and of man) presents its own special problems to the aesthetician, for example, the alleged “meaning” of music, the relation between representation and design in visual art, and the relevance of truth and credibility to the greatness of literature. But there are also general problems that cut across these special ones. The aesthetic study of literature may begin with an examination of the foundations of literary criticism and with such questions as: Are explications of poems objective and interpersonally valid? What reasons can be given for judging a poem to be good, or better than another poem? Such questions, persistently pursued, lead to fundamental problems about the essential nature of poetry and of literature, about the relation of literature to the other arts, and about the values that may be ascribed to art in general. This article reviews three of these broad problems.

Theories of Art. The concept of the fine arts as a special class (comprising such major arts as painting, sculpture, architecture, music and literature as well as hundreds of minor arts, such as flower arranging and the fashioning of jewelry) is a modern achievement. It first clearly appears in Les beaux arts réduits à un même principe (1746), by the Abbé C. Batteux, and in D'Alembert's Discours préliminaire to the Encyclopédie (1751). The formation of this concept made it possible to state one of the fundamental aesthetic problems in the modern way: What is the common and central character of works of fine art (or art, for the purposes of the present discussion)? Much of the thinking about aesthetics in the past 200 years has been a search for a general theory of art. But the earliest sustained reflections on aesthetic problems, by Plato and Aristotle, as well as later medieval and Renaissance discussions of the similarities and differences among the arts, had led to important ideas (such as the idea of "imitation," Batteux's "single principle") that could be put to use by later aestheticians.

The various answers to the question, What is art?, may be placed in three main categories, though it will be evident that within each category there are many divergent views; and it must be borne in mind that individual philosophers may straddle two theories.

Referentialism. It was plain to those who first philosophized about art that at least some works of art are partly derivative from what is to be found in the world: the sculptor gives his figure a recognizable human visage; the dramatic poet presents the words and deeds of actual or possible people. The theory that art is essentially mimesis (still, for want of a better term, translated as imitation) was a reasonable generalization from these observations, since ancient visual art was representational and ancient music was wedded to dance and song. Under Plato's dialectical manipulations, mimesis took on several senses—most prominently and pejoratively, the sense that the artist makes an image (phantasma) or deceptive semblance (see Soph. 236B; Tim. 19D; Gorg. 463–65; Rep. 600C). In Aristotle's use of the term (Poet. 1447a, 1460b), as applied to poetry and painting, no such denigration is implied.

Whatever else it has come to mean—and it has meant many things in the course of its long history—imitation involves some kind of reference of the work of art to the outside world by means of an important similarity between them, though with something left out or added (abstraction or distortion). Thus HEGEL's view that art embodies the Ideal in sensuous form (see Philosophy of Fine Art, tr. F. P. B. Osmaston, London, 1920, 1:53, 77, 154) and SCHOPENHAUER's that art embodies the Platonic Ideas (see The World as Will and Idea, book 3, tr. R. B. Haldane and J. Kemp, 4th ed. London, 1896, esp. 1:231, 252, 272) may be regarded as variants of the same theory (see PLATO; PLATONISM). Sophisticated 20th-century versions of the theory of "imitation" hold that a work of art is an "iconic sign" [see C. W. Morris, "Esthetics and the Theory of Signs," Journal of Unified Science (Erkenntnis), Leipzig, 8:131–50] or "presentational symbol" (see S. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key, Cambridge 1942). A musical composition, for example, is said to designate a type of mental state or process in virtue of its kinetic similarity to its referent; in this view, every work of art is or contains a reference to the world outside it.

Expressionism. The source of the artist's creative impulse was the subject of speculation in the earliest times, as for example by Homer and Hesiod, who ascribed it to divine inspiration. Plato's observations on the "madness" or "frenzy" of the poet (see Phaedrus 245A; Ion 533E, 536B; Meno 99C) emphasized the artist's irrationality and lack of genuine wisdom. In this light a work of art has been understood by many as a manifestation, or objectification, of its creator's feelings.

The view of art as essentially expression of emotion was widely accepted during the Romantic period (cf. Wordsworth's description of poetry as "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings," 1800 Preface to the Lyrical Ballads). In a more complicated form, as developed by Benedetto CROCE (Estetica, Milan 1902) and clarified by others (e.g., R. G. Collingwood, The Principles of Art, Oxford 1938), the expression theory has become a pervasive influence in 20th-century aesthetics. Croce's identification of expression and intuition is variously interpreted; but his primary thesis, that through the act of expression the artist becomes able to articulate his own feelings and impressions, has been widely accepted.

Formalism. The self-containedness and self-sufficiency (that is, the high degree of unity and order) of works of art were somewhat emphasized by St. Augustine (see Vera Relig. 23.59; 41.77; Musica 1.13.28; Ordine 2.15.42; Lib. Arb. 2.16.42). Drawing on suggestions from Plato (Philebus 64E, 66AB) and Plotinus (Enneads 1.6.2), he developed the connection between beauty, order, and numerical proportion and related art to the divine order. The same interest in the internal nature of the aesthetic object is seen in St. Thomas's three conditions of beauty, integritas sive perfectio, debita proportio sive consonantia, and claritas (Summa theologiae 1a, 39.8; cf. 2a2ae, 145.2, 180.2).

These formal concepts—but detached from metaphysical and theological contexts—commended themselves to some 19th-century aestheticians who were eager to defend the autonomy of art against various encroachments: the neo-Hegelian reduction (or elevation) of art to a sensuous form of religion and philosophy; the realist theory that art is a mirror of social and cultural conditions; the socialist theory that art exists mainly to promote justice and human understanding. Eduard Hanslick, in his highly significant work, Vom Musikalisch-Schöne (Leipzig 1854), argued that the beauty of music is peculiar and internal to it, not depending on its relation to anything else.

This so-called formalist theory was generalized to the fine arts by Clive Bell (Art, London 1914) and Roger Fry (Vision and Design, London 1920) and has been defended in various qualified versions. Its insistence that literary works, for example, should be respected as objects in their own right has inspired such movements as Russian formalism of the prerevolutionary and early postrevolutionary period, and the New Criticism of England and the United States, and it is reflected in such works of the phenomenological school as Roman Ingarden's Das Literarische Kunstwerk (Halle 1930).

Highly generalized theories like the foregoing are not always incompatible with each other. Indeed, they may be construed as attempts to answer different questions: the first group, questions about the semantics of art; the second group, questions about the pragmatics of art; and the third group, questions about the syntax of art (to borrow the terminology of C. Morris, "Foundations of the Theory of Signs," Encyclopedia of Unified Science, Chicago 1938). Nevertheless, these positions reflect significant differences of opinion about the factors that are basic and decisive in art; and the critic's assumptions about the precise nature and degree of autonomy that can be ascribed to art will have consequences for his practical criticism.

Aesthetic Value. The existence of criticism as a distinctive intellectual activity appears to presuppose that there is a certain "point of view" from which aesthetic objects are most appropriately regarded (the aesthetic point of view) and a special kind of "value" (aesthetic value) to be found, or at least looked for, in them. Criticism has almost always been taken to include the evaluation, or appraisal, of aesthetic objects, issuing in such judgments as "The Windhover is a good poem," or "This is a poor painting," which are normally supported by reasons ("The poem is subtle and profound," "The painting is disorganized"). Many of the fundamental issues in the philosophy of criticism concern the logic of critical reasoning—whether, for example, originality or success in fulfilling the author's intention ought to count as a relevant and convincing ground for judging a work to be good.

To justify the critic's appeal to certain reasons—or, in other words, his use of certain criteria of judgment—seems to require the discrimination, or isolation, of aesthetic value. Once we are clear concerning what sort of goodness is to be sought in art, we can ask what features of the work are likely to enhance or to diminish that goodness. This is essentially the procedure followed by Aristotle when he asked what is the proper pleasure (oikeia hedone) of tragedy, and proceeded to analyze those elements of tragedy that bear upon its tendency to provide this pleasure (see Poet. 1453b, 1459a, 1462b).

The attempt to work out a satisfactory account of aesthetic value encounters a number of very difficult problems, some of them pervasive in general value theory, some of them peculiar to aesthetics. They can be only very briefly indicated here.

Value and Beauty. Is aesthetic value the same as beauty? Until the concept of the sublime came to be considered seriously and carefully in the 18th century, judgments of aesthetic value were characteristically stated as judgments of beauty. In this usage, "This is a beautiful poem" means the same as "This is a good poem." Beauty is today more often considered as a ground of aesthetic value (the painting is good because it is beautiful), but not necessarily the sole ground, since expressive distortion may approach ugliness (or, some would say, achieve it); yet its power and vitality may make the painting great. (On this issue, contrast J. Maritain, Art and Scholasticism, tr. J. F. Scanlan, New York 1930, with S. C. Pepper, Aesthetic Quality, New York 1937.)

Value and Naturalness. Is aesthetic value natural or nonnatural? For some, to give a naturalistic definition of aesthetic value is to equate it with a psychological fact, such as giving pleasure or being desired. Whether it is inherently fallacious to propose such a definition has been much discussed. Many philosophers contend that a normative term (such as value or good) can never be reduced to nonnormative terms (such as pleasure or satisfaction), for any of several reasons: (1) that normative terms refer to a special nonempirical property, (2) that normative terms have a commending function that is absent from nonnormative terms, (3) that normative terms express attitudes and nonnormative terms do not. Others hold that a naturalistic definition framed with sufficient care—that is, by qualifying the conditions of the pleasure, or the nature of the satisfaction, involved—can correctly indicate what a normative term actually means in ordinary usage.

Value—Objective or Subjective? The objectivist regards the aesthetic value of an object as an internal property of it, which it possesses independently of any relation to a human perceiver who enjoys, approves, or admires it. The subjectivist takes aesthetic value to consist in some relation between the object and the perceiver (including the reader). The principal defense of subjectivism is that it is difficult to conceive of an object as having any value apart from some interest that is taken in it or apart from some desire that is satisfied by it. Objectivism, on the other hand, is often supported by the claim that it provides the only escape from relativism.

Value—Relative or Nonrelative? To say that aesthetic value is relative is to say that there can be two persons, one of whom says that a work of art is good and the other that it is not good, yet without really contradicting each other. If aesthetic value is objective, then it is not relative; but the subjectivist can choose between relativistic and nonrelativistic definitions. For example, if the subjectivist can first formulate the concept of the “perfect critic,” as one who has all the desirable qualifications we could ask for in a critic—sensitivity, learning, sympathy, impartiality, etc.—then he might define the term “has aesthetic value” as “would be approved and admired by a majority of all perfect critics.” This definition is subjective, but it is not relative, since whenever A says that a poem is good in this sense and B denies it, A and B are contradicting each other, no matter who A and B may be. On the other hand, the subjectivist might define aesthetic value in relation to a particular culture or historical epoch; by this definition, when a critic praises a poem, he is saying that it is, or will be, or under certain conditions would be, enjoyed and approved by sensitive people in his own culture. According to such a definition, if A and B belong to different cultures, they cannot contradict each other by respectively affirming and denying that the poem is good.

The relativist usually argues that tastes vary and that what can be enjoyed by some people cannot be enjoyed by others; he urges that our definition of aesthetic value reflect this fact. In rebuttal it may be pointed out that there are all sorts of factors that affect this variability and no particular definition can accommodate them all. The only safe recourse for the relativist, then, is complete personal relativism, which transforms the critical judgment “This is a good poem” into something like “I now like this poem.” This personal definition does bring out the alleged “noncognitive” features of critical evaluations: that their utterance reveals the speaker’s attitude, his desire to commend something, or his hope of influencing others. But it seems to leave out the logical features of critical evaluations that allow disputes to arise over them; and it is implausible to claim that the personal definition correctly describes what most people mean when they praise poems.

Value a Capacity? It is also argued that we must distinguish between aesthetic value as something available to those properly prepared for it and the actual realizations of this value in experience. This distinction can be preserved by defining aesthetic value as the capacity to provide a certain kind of (presumably desirable) experience or a certain kind of (desirable) pleasure. This instrumentalist definition of aesthetic value would be subjective, but nonrelative; it would not be a naturalistic definition, since a normative term (desirable) would be retained in the definiendum. Then critical disputes over, say, the merits of a poem, would concern the question how great an aesthetic experience (or how intense an aesthetic pleasure) can be obtained from it under optimum conditions. If someone actually does derive a genuine aesthetic experience of some magnitude from the work, that will be sufficient evidence of its aesthetic value. If no such experience occurs, the critic may be able to show, by an analysis of the work, either that it is unlikely to occur or that it may occur in more adequately prepared perceivers. In any case, it will be possible to support the critical evaluation by reasons. But the appeal to such reasons will presuppose, what the aesthetician must also at some point justify, that the aesthetic experience is itself desirable.

Aesthetic Experience. The experience of listening to music or contemplating a painting is more different from the experience of reading a poem or novel than these are from each other. This is evident to the careful observer, even though there is much that we do not yet understand (but hope in time to learn by psychological investigation) about the exact nature of these experiences. The aesthetician asks whether there is such a thing as an aesthetic experience common to all the arts. It is important to know this if we wish to group all the arts together in one genus, and especially if aesthetic value is to be defined in terms of aesthetic experience.

There is general agreement that aesthetic experience is characterized at least by unusually intense absorption in a phenomenal object—in visual or auditory patterns or, in the case of prose fiction, the ostensible world of the work. Beyond this, the chief point at issue is the remoteness of aesthetic experience from the experiences of everyday life. A number of questions and positions are on hand, difficult to sort out satisfactorily. They range from Clive Bell’s claim (in Art, 3–7) that there is a unique “aesthetic emotion”—the response to “significant form”—utterly different from any other emotion and owing nothing to life experiences, to I. A. Richards’s contrary insistence (Principles of Literary Criticism, London and New York 1924, chapters 2, 32) that art differs only in degree from other things in its effects upon us.

“Moving” Quality of Art. Ancient and medieval philosophers were aware of something puzzling about the state of mind induced by works of art. That this response involves the emotions in a central way was suggested (and deplored) by Plato, who noted the excited state of the rhapsode (in the dialogue Ion) and of the theater audience (Rep. 603–10). When psychological aesthetics came into its full development during the 18th century, a major aim of British aesthetic investigation was to explain the characteristic effects of art—its capacity to move us and the special sort of enjoyment it provides. Various contributions to a solution of this problem were made by J. Addison, in his account of the “pleasures of the imagination” (Spectator, Nos. 409, 411–21; 1712), by F. Hutcheson (An Inquiry into the Original of Our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, London 1725) and by E. BURKE (A Philosophical Inquiry into the Sublime and the Beautiful, London 1756), and by A. Alison (Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste, Edinburgh 1790), among many others. These writers aimed to discover (some of them with the aid of associationist psychology) the nature of our feelings about the beautiful and the sublime and the basis of our pleasure in these qualities.

Detachment of Aesthetic Experience. It was Kant (Critique of Judgment, Berlin 1790) who attempted a radical separation of aesthetic enjoyment from ordinary enjoyments and identified the experience of beauty as one in which we take “pleasure without interest” in an object exhibiting “purposefulness without purpose,” an object capable, by its form, of arousing the “free play” of the reproductive imagination in harmony with the general cognitive conditions of the understanding. By emphasizing this disinterestedness of aesthetic experience, Schopenhauer made of art an escape from the horror of life under the dominion of the Will to Live, with its ceaseless alternation between boredom and unsatisfied desire. He described aesthetic experience as a state of “will-less contemplation” of timeless Ideas, when the drives are laid temporarily to rest, as the self loses consciousness of itself and is no longer constrained to view the world under the “principle of sufficient reason.”

This opposition between the aesthetic point of view and the practical point of view—between, for example, the painter’s and the real-estate developer’s way of looking at a landscape—has been widely emphasized in modern aesthetics. Several writers have stressed the “isolation” and “detachment” of aesthetic experience, its wholeness and self-sufficiency—notably E. Bullough in his famous paper “‘Psychical Distance’ as a Factor in Art and an Aesthetic Principle” (British Journal of Psychology, 5, Cambridge 1912–13, 87–118). An object, according to Bullough, is psychically “distanced” when disconnected from ordinary practical needs and ends and regarded for its surface qualities and internal form. Nearly any object can be so regarded, but aesthetic objects are designed to facilitate this response, though they differ considerably in their degree of distance, ranging from geometrical abstraction to pictorial realism.

Intensity of the Aesthetic Experience. Schopenhauer’s emphasis on denial of the Will was violently rejected by Nietzsche (see the posthumously collected notes, The Will to Power, tr. A. M. Ludovici, 2d ed., New York 1910–11). Art, he insisted, does not induce resignation but “affirmation” of life in all its aspects; it is an expression of the Will to Power. Later writers have tried to make room for something of this view in stressing the intensity of aesthetic experience, its “heightened consciousness” and the sense of increased vitality—not the absence of emotion, or its release, but its ordering into a harmonious tension. This has been called “synaesthesia,” the balance or poise of impulses, opposed without frustration (see I. A. Richards et al., The Foundations of Aesthetics, London 1922, 72–91).

Attempted Synthesis. A significant attempt to do justice to these divergent (though not necessarily incompatible) points, as well as others, is that by John Dewey in Art as Experience, New York 1934, especially chapter 3. Dewey’s aim was to show how the special traits of aesthetic experience, those we cherish most, grow out of a natural setting, as intensifications of traits found valuable in all experience. The organism interacts with its environment, doing and undergoing. Sometimes stretches of continuing experience take on an unusual degree of completeness: the impulses that are aroused at the start run their course; there is consummation and fulfillment. Then we have, not just experience, but “an experience.” And when an experience is controlled by attention to sensuous quality, and takes on a pervasive and distinct character, it is aesthetic experience, continuous but articulated, coherent but rhythmic, dynamic, cumulative, and inherently satisfying.

The Thomistic Tradition. This tradition also, as carried on by a number of contemporary thinkers (see e.g., J. Maritain, Art and Scholasticism; É. Gilson, Painting and Reality, New York 1957), has aimed to do justice to the dominant traits, as well as the wide range, of aesthetic experiences and to correct other accounts by keeping more firmly in view the intellectual aspect of aesthetic enjoyment. St. Thomas’s pregnant definition of beauty as id quod visum placet (Summa theologiae 1.5.4 ad 1; cf. 1a2ae, 27.1) implies that in the perception of beauty, the exquisite intelligibility of the object, its possession of a form proportionate to the intellect itself (proportio sive consonantia), affords that delight mixed with exaltation that characterizes aesthetic experience. This relation to the cognitive faculty, which is essential to beauty, explains its restriction to sight and sound—we derive sensuous pleasure from perfumes, for example, but odors are not (strictly speaking) beautiful.

General Conclusion. These theorists and others have guided us to an understanding of many important features of aesthetic experience, though some questions remain unsettled. Roughly speaking, we can locate the peculiar character of that experience in the combination of two distinguishable objects of delight. First, we respond to pattern or gestalt as such; we desire the perception of order: symmetry, geometrical regularity, rational arrangement. Second, we respond to human qualities that emerge in the phenomenal field: to embodied energy, calmness, joy, force, tenderness, etc. With the first is connected the unity and repose of aesthetic experience; with the latter, our capacity to be moved and shaken. Works of art differ enormously according to which aspects are dominant. But speaking generally, in art we confront and cognize a complex of elements and relations making up, through formal cooperation, a satisfactory whole. Out of this whole emerge certain qualities, of various degrees of intensity, that engage our attention and our feelings. In a way subtly different from the feeling of ordinary life, we are lifted to a fresher and more vital plane of awareness, the joy of the spirit answering to the radiance of the object.

See Also: ART (PHILOSOPHY); BEAUTY.

Bibliography: Among the useful anthologies in English are E. VIVAS and M. KRIEGER, eds., The Problems of Aesthetics (New York 1953). M. M. RADER, ed., A Modern Book of Esthetics (3d ed. New York 1960). M. WEITZ, ed., Problems in Aesthetics (New York 1959). W. ELTON, ed., Aesthetics and Language (New York 1954). W. E. KENNICK, ed., Art and Philosophy (New York 1964). A. HOFSTADTER and R. KUHN, eds., Philosophies of Art and Beauty (New York 1964). K. ASCHENBRENNER and A. ISENBERG, eds., Aesthetic Theories (New York 1965). A. SESONSKE, ed., What Is Art? (London 1965). On the history of aesthetics, see K. E. GILBERT and H. KUHN, A History of Esthetics (rev. ed. Bloomington 1953). M. C. BEARDSLEY, A Short History of Western Aesthetics (New York 1965). E. DE BRUYNE, Études d'esthétique médiévale, 3 v. (Bruges 1946). A. FONTAINE, Les Doctrines d'art en France (Paris 1909). S. H. MONK, The Sublime: A Study of Critical Theories in 18th Century England (New York 1935; Ann Arbor pa. 1960). E. CASSIRER, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment, tr. C. A. KOELLN and J. P. PETTEGROVE (Princeton 1951). W. J. HIPPLE, The Beautiful, the Sublime, and the Picturesque in Eighteenth-Century British Aesthetic Theory (Carbondale, Illinois 1957). G. MORPURGO-TAGLIABUE, L'Esthétique contemporaine (Milan 1960). On classical and contemporary problems of aesthetics, see M. C. BEARDSLEY, Aesthetics (New York 1958). F. E. SPARSHOTT, The Structure of Aesthetics (Toronto 1963). J. STOLNITZ, Aesthetics and Philosophy of Art Criticism (Boston 1960).

[M. C. BEARDSLEY]

AETERNA CAELI GLORIA

The office hymn that was historically assigned for Lauds in the ferial office on Fridays throughout the year. Originally the initial letter of each line was in alphabetic sequence through the letter "T," except that the fourth line repeated initial "C." To maintain the correct alphabetic sequence the orthography of the manuscript tradition must be retained in lines 9 and 11 (see Anal Hymn 51:33). The meter of the hymn is the iambic dimeter. The author, once thought to be Pope Gregory I (the Great), is unknown. In content this hymn is a prayer to Christ for light to see one's duties and for the increase of the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity.

Bibliography: J. JULIAN, A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 24–25. Analectica Hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 51:32–34. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 276–279. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948) 68–69. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinische Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:142, 214.

[H. DRESSLER]

AETERNA CHRISTI MUNERA

An Ambrosian hymn written in iambic dimeter. The authorship of this hymn is generally attributed to St. AMBROSE. The author intended this composition of eight strophes to be used on the feast days of martyrs. In the course of time, however, the hymn was selected for use on the feast days of Apostles also, and this entailed certain changes in the sequence of lines and adaptations especially notable in the first strophe. The first (with adaptations), second, sixth, and seventh strophes, with an added doxology, was traditionally used as the breviary hymn for Matins in the Common of Apostles outside of Easter-tide. In the Common of Martyrs both in and out of Easter time the first (with adaptations), third, fourth, fifth, and eighth strophes was traditionally used for the hymn at Matins. In each case the hymn praises the victory of the Apostles or martyrs and expresses admiration for their constancy in specifically described trials and sufferings.

Bibliography: J. JULIAN, A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 24–25. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 104–108. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948) 325–326. W. BULST, ed., Hymni Latini antiquissimi LXXV (Heidelberg 1956) 52, 185. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinische Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 50–52, 62, 66, 116, 174.

[H. DRESSLER]

AETERNE RERUM CONDITOR

The words of the opening line of the first strophe of the office hymn which was historically assigned for Lauds for the Sundays from Jan. 14 to the first Sunday in Lent and from Oct. 1 to the first Sunday in Advent. The use of this hymn at the early canonical hours goes back to CAESARIUS OF ARLES (d. 542), who prescribed its use in his Rule (Sanctarum virginum regulae 69; S. Caesarii opera omnia 2:121). The text in the Roman Breviary of 1632 altered the older reading in the second, third, and seventh strophes. This hymn is generally acknowledged as an authentic work of St. AMBROSE. Augustine (Retract. 20.2; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 36:97–98) quotes two lines of the fourth strophe and names Ambrose as the author. The thought and at times the very wording of several lines bear a striking similarity with passages in Ambrose's Hexaemeron (CSEL 32.1:201). The meter of the hymn is the iambic dimeter. In five successive strophes, Ambrose gives a mystical interpretation of the significance of the crowing of the cock (gallicinium). Barring the purely scriptural animal metaphors, such as the lamb, the wolf, and the lion of Juda, the usage of this hymn is one of the few animal motifs in early Latin hymnology.

Bibliography: U. CHEVALIER, Repertorium hymnologicum (Louvain-Brussels 1892–1921) 1:647. J. JULIAN, A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1:26. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 192) 27–34. A. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 33–41. W. BULST, ed., Hymni Latini antiquissimi LXXV (Heidelberg 1956) 39, 162. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinische Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:56–58.

[H. DRESSLER]

AETERNE REX ALTISSIME

Opening words of three hymns written in iambic dimeters. The best known of the three is that which was historically prescribed for the Feast of the Ascension. This hymn celebrates Christ's victory over death, recalls the homage due to Him from those in heaven, on earth, and beneath the earth, and begs Him for forgiveness and the crown of eternal glory when He shall come again as Judge. Two forms of this hymn are extant. There is a shorter eight-strophe form that was assigned in the Breviary for Matins in the ferial and Sunday Offices during Ascension time. The text in the 1632 revision of the Roman Breviary was heavily edited; only the third and sixth strophes follow the manuscript reading. The author of this hymn is unknown. F. J. Mone conjectured that originally it consisted of the present first four strophes written by

St. AMBROSE and that an inferior fifth-century poet added four more strophes. The longer text of 14 strophes is the form of the hymn as found in the MOZARABIC RITE.

The second hymn dates from the 13th century and was written for use at Vespers on the feast of Christ's crown of thorns, which was reputedly brought to France by King Louis IX and venerated in the Ste. Chapelle in Paris. The author is unknown. The hymn has five strophes, of which the first four have alternating rhyme. The composition expresses the great joy of Paris at being the repository of Christ's crown, which mystically signifies Christ Himself, the crown of men and women living in chastity and the reward of those living in the married state.

The third hymn also honors the crown of thorns. Similar in structure and content to the previous composition, it incorporates two complete strophes from yet another hymn in honor of the crown of thorns, Corona Christi capitis.

Bibliography: F. J. MONE, ed., Lateinische Hymnen des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Freiburg 1853–55) 1:228–229. Analecta Hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 12: 20–21; 27:96–97; 51:94–95; 52:15. G. M. DREVES and C. BLUME, eds., Ein Jahrtausend lateinischer Hymnendichtung, 2 v. (Leipzig 1909) 2:136. J. JULIAN, A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1:26–27. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 361–364. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948). Connelly Hymns 102–103. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinische Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 202–203; 254–255; 258; 449.

[H. DRESSLER]

AETERNI PATRIS

The name of two papal documents of Pius IX and Leo XIII. The first is the apostolic letter of June 29, 1868, convoking the Vatican Council I; it indicates the office of the pope as guardian of faith and morals, the role of ecumenical councils, and summarizes the then prevailing dangers to faith and morals. The second document is the encyclical of Leo XIII, dated Aug. 4, 1879, and written to restore scholastic philosophy in general and that of St. Thomas Aquinas in particular. Beginning with a consideration of the Church's concern for teaching true philosophy because of its relation to theology, the pope declares that many modern evils stem from false philosophy. The encyclical mentions the esteem in which St. Thomas has been held and urges the revival of St. Thomas's philosophy and of his spirit of investigation.

Bibliography: PIUS IX, Acta Pii IX 4:412–423. R. AUBERT, Le Pontificat de Pie IX, 1846–1878 (Paris 1952). LEO XIII, Acta Leonis XIII 1 (1878–79) 255–285. Denz 3135–40. J. COLLINS, "Leo XIII and the Philosophic Approach to Modernity," Leo XIII and the Modern World, ed. E. GARGAN (New York 1961) 181–209. C. A.

HART, "America's Response to the Encyclical Aeterni Patris," American Catholic Philosophical Association Bulletin (1929) 98–117. G. F. RITZEL, "Some Historical Background of the Encyclical Aeterni Patris," Nuntius Aulæ 38 (1956) 135–155. A. ALEXANDER, "Thomas Aquinas and the Encyclical Letter," Princeton Review N.S. 5 (Jan. 1880) 245–326. PEDRO RODRIGUEZ, Fe, razon y teologia en el I Centenario de la Enciclica "Aeterni Patris" (Pamplona, Spain 1979); Atti del'VIII Congresso Tomistico Internazionale: L'Enciclica Aeterni Patris (Studi Tomistici, 10–12, Vatican City 1981). V.B. BREZIK, CSB (ed.), One Hundred Years of Thomism: Aeterni Patris and Afterwards, A Symposium (Houston 1981).

[W. F. HOGAN]

ÆTHELFLÆD, LADY OF THE MERCIANS

Æthelflæd, Lady of the Mercians, was the first-born child of King Alfred the Great (r. 871–99) and his wife Ealswith, a princess of Mercia. Throughout her life, Æthelflæd worked with her father, brother, and husband to reclaim English Mercia from the Danes. Her birth date is unknown, but she married Ethelred, Ealdorman of Mercia, in 886, and had one daughter, Ælfwyn. Both she and Ethelred were fiercely loyal to Alfred, who placed the governance of London in their hands.

Æthelflæd supported her father, and later her brother Edward the Elder (r. 899–925) through a vigorous program of building fortresses and fortifying towns, and by actually leading campaigns against the Danes. A charter (S223) issued by Ethelred at some time during the decade before Alfred's death states that he and his Lady "ordered the borough at Worcester to be built for the protection of all the people and also to exalt the praise of God therein." They also fortified the walls of Chester and refurbished London's defenses. The boroughs were designed to act as points of defense, and also to work in conjunction with Alfred's reformed fyrð, or standing army. These boroughs were part of England's national defense, marking an offensive line against the Danes while protecting the English frontier.

Æthelflæd and her husband were supported the Church in many ways. Several of their charters consist of grants to religious communities; one in particular (S223), in response to a request from Wærferth, Bishop of Worcester, states that "they will grant to God and St. Peter" and to the Lord of that Church half of their rights within the newly fortified borough of Worcester. Another charter (S221) refers to a grant of a gold chalice in honor of an Abbess Mildburg. Æthelflæd also used relics to provide spiritual blessings and protection. When she encountered various saints' relics during her campaigns against the Danes, she moved them to the West Saxon boroughs.

St. Oswald was translated from Bardney to Gloucester, St. Werburg from Hanbury to Chester, and St. Ealhmund from Derby to Shrewsbury, all from Danish lands into those held by the West Saxons.

A contemporary source, The Three Fragments, implies that Ethelred was ill from 902 onwards and incapable of governing Mercia on his own. Æthelflæd, being half Mercian by birth, was accepted by the people of Mercia and began to act in Ethelred's stead. In 907 she granted land to Ingemund, a leader of the Norse-Irish, in Wirral and rebuilt Chester to ensure their loyalty. The Mercian Register records that in 910 the English successfully fought the Danes, and Æthelflæd built a fortress at Bremesburh. Ethelred died in 911, and Æthelflæd was immediately acclaimed Myrcna Hlæfdige, Lady of the Mercians, which was the exact feminine equivalent of Ethelred's title.

Æthelflæd continued her building program, working closely with her brother Edward to destroy the independent Danish armies in England. Between 912 and 915 she built fortresses at Scergate, Bridgnorth, Tamworth, Stafford, Chirbury, Weardburh, and Runcorn, and refortified existing strongholds at Eddisbury and Warwick.

Toward the end of her life, Æthelflæd began to take an active part in battle. On June 16, 916, an English abbot, Ecgberht, was murdered along with his companions on a trip to Wales. Three days later, Æthelflæd sent an army into Wales to punish the king of Brycheiniog, who was responsible, and took the king's wife and 33 other people hostage. In July 917, when the main army was away fighting Edward, Æthelflæd captured the Danish military center at Derby. In the early part of 918, Æthelflæd peacefully took possession of the borough of Leicester, and accepted the submission of many of the Danish forces that were stationed there. The people of York had also promised to accept her rule, but she died before receiving their submission.

Æthelflæd died on June 12, 918, and was buried in the east chapel of the monastery of St. Peter at Gloucester, which she and Ethelred had built.

Bibliography: R. ABELS, Lordship and Military Obligation in Anglo-Saxon England (Los Angeles 1988). P. BLAIR, An Introduction to Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Cambridge 1977). C. BROOKE, From Alfred to Henry III 871–1272 (London 1969). G. GARMON-SWAY, ed. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (London 1992). D. ROLLASON "Relic Cults as an Instrument of Royal Policy, c. 900–c.1050" Anglo-Saxon England 15 (1986). F. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (Oxford 1971). R. THOMSON and M. WINTERBOTTOM, eds., William of Malmesbury: Gesta Regum Anglorum (Oxford 1999). F. WAINWRIGHT, Scandinavian England. Collected Papers (Chichester 1975).

[L. A. LEHTOLA]

AETHELRED II, KING OF ENGLAND

Reigned from March 978 to December 1013 and March/April 1014 to April 23, 1016. Born to Edgar the Peaceable and to Edgar's second wife, Aelfthryth, in or near 968, Aethelred became the center of factional strife along with his older half brother, Edward, when their father died in 975. Edward and his supporters were successful in securing the crown, but his reign was brief, less than three years. At Corfe Passage in March of 1078, Edward was murdered. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicles do not identify his murderers, but instead state that Aethelred came to the throne very soon thereafter and was consecrated king. Although the chroniclers condemned the murder of Edward and reported disapprovingly that it was not avenged, they attached no blame to the young Aethelred.

The monastic reform, begun in earnest under his father, Edgar, continued under Aethelred. The idea that the disputed succession between Edward and Aethelred grew out of a party that opposed reform seems unlikely since the movement went forward under both men with the exception of some disputed lands that specific magnates attempted to recover during the confusion following Edward's murder. Aelfthryth had supported the reform under Edgar, and she founded two nunneries, Amesbury in Wilshire and Wherwell in Hampshire, during Aethelred's reign. Aelfhere, a magnate often suspected of complicity in the murder, was a notable benefactor of Glastonbury. There was a brief period that Aethelred was visibly at odds with particular members of the clergy, demonstrated particularly in his abuse of the diocese of Rochester in 986, which was ostensibly caused by a dispute with the bishop. However, he attempted to correct any indiscretions or illegal appropriations of church lands as he reached maturity and recognized that some of the lay leaders at court had misled him. By 995 Aethelred was supporting the replacement of all secular clergy with regular clergy. The church leaders, though critical of Aethelred's ineptness at prosecuting the war against the Danes, supported him tirelessly as their true Christian king, since his defeat spelled an unknown but dreaded fate at the hands of a heathen Viking king.

Had the pacific times of his father, Edgar, continued, Aethelred may have had a very unremarkable career. However, the opportunistic Vikings, recognizing the potential for weakness in a young king, returned to England within two years of Aethelred's coronation after a hiatus of nearly 50 years. The renewed attacks, which developed into a serious design to conquer the whole island under the leadership of the Danish king, Swegn Forkbeard, eventually brought an element of treachery to Aethelred's court that went beyond the normal intriguing for power and place. Many at court died of natural causes throughout the long and conflicted reign, but others fell violently if not in the many battles that decimated the nobles regularly, then in political murders that were often sanctioned by the king. These murders occurred within the context of relationships between the south of England and the House of Wessex, out of which Aethelred came, and the north of England, which was still a very recent and vulnerable part of the realm. Not only was Aethelred's father the first to establish a peaceful hegemony over the north, the north had a very large population of Norwegian and Danish descent. He and Aethelred both promoted accord among the disparate parts of the realm by integrating northern leadership into the king's court.

The harmony between north and south was often accomplished through marriage, a practice Aethelred was following when he married Aelfgifu, traditionally identified as the daughter of Thored, earl of Northumbria, whom Aethelred then made an important member of the court. The date of this marriage is not recorded, but it occurred early in the reign since Aethelred had sons and daughters approaching marriageable ages by the time he made a second political marriage in 1002 to Emma, sister of the Duke of Normandy. Three of the daughters married earls appointed to northern areas, and a fourth married a nobleman presumably of the north, since he died at the Battle of Ringmere in 1010. Such marriages were intended to signal a sharing of power between the king from the south and his northern magnates. However, the Vikings easily exploited any weaknesses that appeared between the king and local leaders; local leaders, on the other hand, had difficulty putting their resources together in the interests of a realm that still consisted of diverse and differing parts.

Aethelred departed England after Christmas in 1013, following his wife, Emma, and their two sons into exile at the Norman court of her brother. Defections to Swegn had begun in the north in 1012 and by December 1013, even Wessex and finally London had submitted to him. Aethelred returned to England after Swegn died in February 1014, at the behest of the English magnates. The struggle for the crown continued when Swegn's son, Cnut, chose to press his own claim as Swegn's heir. The realm suffered as previously from the same lack of cohesive determination to fight the Danes and ineffective leadership from the king. Aethelred died at Cosham April 23, 1016, leaving an unresolved conflict and a kingdom divided in its loyalty between his son by Aelfgifu, Edmund Ironside, and Swegn's son, Cnut.

Bibliography: G. N. GARMONSWAY, The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (Rutland, Vermont 1992) 118–149. E. JOHN, Reassessing Anglo-Saxon England (Manchester 1996) 139–150. S. KEYNES, The Diplomas of King Aethelred 'the Unready' 978–1016 (Cambridge 1980) 176–186. P. STAFFORD, Unification and Conquest: A Political and Social History of England in the Tenth and Eleventh centuries (London 1989) 45–68.

[P. TORPIS]

AFFINITY

Affinity is a relationship of persons deriving from marriage. It arises from a valid marriage, whether consummated or not, and constitutes an impediment to subsequent marriages between a man and blood relations of his wife, and vice versa (Codex Iuris Canonici cc. 109, 1092; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium cc. 919, 809). Affinity does not beget affinity; therefore, the blood relations of a man are not impeded by affinity from contracting marriage with the blood relations of his wife, nor are those of the woman with the blood relations of her husband.

In the direct line, the impediment of affinity extends indefinitely either ascending or descending. The impediment of affinity in the collateral line was abrogated in the Latin Church by the 1983 Code of Canon Law, but this impediment is retained in The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. Affinity in the second degree of the collateral line invalidates marriage in the Eastern Catholic churches (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 809 §1).

History. Affinity was an impediment to marriage already in the Mosaic Law. A man was prohibited in the direct line from marrying his stepmother (Lv 18.8, 20.11; Dt 22.30, 27.20); his daughter-in-law (Lv 18.15, 20.12), his stepdaughter, stepson's daughter and stepdaughter's daughter (Lv 18.17), his mother-in-law (Lv 18.17, 20.14, Dt 27.23), and his stepsister (Lv 18.11); in the collateral line, his paternal uncle's wife (Lv 18.14, 20.20), his brother's wife (Lv 18.16, 20.21) except where the levirate law would apply, and the sister of his wife, the latter still living (Lv 18.18). Contrary to the last example, a man could marry two sisters simultaneously before the time of Moses; e.g., Jacob married Leah and Rachel simultaneously (Gn 29).

Although the above texts are addressed to the male, they are applicable reciprocally to the female also. Affinity in each case did not cease through death or divorce of the spouses who created it. The penalty for disregarding the impediment in the direct line was most frequently death (Lv 20.11, 12, 14). In the collateral line the penalty probably did not exceed the legal illegitimizing of offspring.

Carnal relations, licit or illicit, did not produce affinity. Nor was it marriage alone that created affinity but rather the contract of solemn engagement or sponsalia, which would be the equivalent of a ratified marriage. Reasons for declaring affinity an impediment might be cited as: (1) the respect and reserve that a person should naturally possess toward near relatives through blood or marriage, for marriage identified husband and wife in their unity of flesh (Gn 2.24); (2) the scandals that could arise from marriages between persons of close familial ties, in view of Oriental residence customs.

In the New Testament two instances reflect the application of affinity to marriage. The first was Herod Antipas's marriage with his brother's wife, Herodias (Mt 14.3, 4). The union was both adulterous, since Herod's brother was probably still living, and incestuous, as violating the Mosaic Law of affinity, which also obligated strangers living among the Jews (Lv 18.26). The second was the case of incest at Corinth mentioned in 1 Corinthians 5.1, in which a man was rebuked for marrying his stepmother, a crime punished by excommunication. Outside of these two cases, nothing more about affinity appears in the New Testament.

Roman Law. The Roman law concerning affinity (adfinitas) was founded upon valid marriage (justae nuptiae) and related one consort to the kin of the other (Corpus iuris civilis, Digesta, ed. T. Mommsen and P. Krueger, 38.10.4.3, 8; Inst 1.10.6–10). Apparently affinity was considered an impediment only in the direct line reaching to infinity, but not in the collateral line (Dig 23.2.14.4). Prohibition of marriage was limited to affinity involving one's stepfather or stepmother and stepdaughter or stepson; and between father-in-law or mother-in-law and daughter-in-law or son-in-law (Dig 38.10.4.3–5), not descending one from another or from a common stock.

Conciliar Decrees. The Mosaic Law and Roman law were the sources used by the Church to formulate its own rules of affinity. For the first three centuries, the Mosaic Law was probably the only source. With decrees of Church councils such as those of Elvira (300–06) and Neo-Caesarea (314–25), and the Council of Rome (402), there were departures made from the Mosaic law, extending the impediment beyond the limits set by the Old Testament. Elvira forbade marriage with a stepdaughter and stepsister (c. 61, 66; J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2.15, 16; C. J. von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux 1.256–57); Neo-Caesarea forbade marriage of a woman with her brother-in-law (c. 2; Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2.540; Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux 1.328). The Council of Rome forbade marriage with the deceased wife's sister and a deceased uncle's wife (c. 9, 11; Sacrorum Concili- orum nova et amplissima collectio 3.1137; Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux 2.136–37). These decrees easily passed into the civil codes in the middle of the 4th century (Corpus iuris civilis, Codex Iustinianus, ed. P. Krueger, 1.5.5.9). Later councils extended the impediment still further to the widow of the paternal or maternal uncle, reaching as far as the seventh degree, and civil codes followed suit (e.g., Law of Visigoths 1.3.5.1 in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Leges 1).

The ambit of affinity gradually evolved, particularly in the collateral line. From the 8th century the basis of affinity was changed from the marital contract (justae nuptiae) to carnal intercourse (unitas carnis). With corroboration from Scripture (Gn 2.24; 1 Cor 6.16), Saint Basil (379) had condemned marriage between a brother-in-law and sister-in-law (Letter 160, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 32:623). Saint Augustine mentioned the case later (Contra Faustum 1.22.61; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 42:438; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 25.1.656–57; Civ Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 40.2), and so did the author of a letter attributed by Saint Bede to Saint Gregory (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10.407; Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.27 in Patrologia Latina 95.60). The practical rule that resulted from this was that unitas carnis—carnal intercourse—made two persons one and established identity of relationship between oneself and relatives of a spouse, hence putting affinity on a plane with consanguinity. The Synod of Rome (721) then made this a juridic rule (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 12.263), and Gratian made it an adage of law (Corpus iuris canonici, ed. E. Friedberg, C.35 q.2, 3 c.15; C.35 q.5 c.3). The classical definition of affinity through Gratian became relationship of persons emanating from carnal intercourse.

By the 10th century the similarity between the impediments of affinity and those of consanguinity became complete. Roland Bandinellus (Pope Alexander III, 1159–81), a disciple of Gratian, concerning their mutual computation of degree stated: “The first type of affinity walks abreast [aequis passibus ambulat] with consanguinity” (Corpus iuris canonici C.35 q.1). In the many vicissitudes during this period the two impediments reached as far as the seventh degree, although the actual force of the last two degrees fluctuated from one area to the next between diriment and impedient.

Since carnal relations (unitas carnis) alone formed the basis of affinity, it was calculated identically with consanguinity. Most commentators became adherents of this principle with, however, some notable exceptions such as Saint Thomas, who maintained against the majority that it was marriage and not copula that formed the true basis of affinity (Summa theologiae Supplement 55.4.2). From the basis of unitas carnis, logic pushed the experts to develop their speculations about affinity unhindered. They distinguished four kinds of affinity. The first was that arising from marital (licit) or extramarital (illicit) sexual relations. Just when or where the concept of illicit affinity arose is unknown; however, some authors find the first trace in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals of the 9th century. Once affinity was based upon sexual intercourse, the lack of ecclesiastical precepts respecting a public form of marriage created the difficulty of distinguishing between licit and illicit affinity.

The second kind of affinity arose between the man and the affines of the woman by the first type of affinity and vice versa. In this type a man could become related to the affines of a widow whom he married, and vice versa. Extending this still further, the third kind of affinity would appear in a marriage between a man and the affines related to the woman by the second kind of affinity. These three main classes of affinity are illustrated by this example: Roger and Sylvia are married. The latter’s first cousin, Catherine, is married to Julius. Catherine is associated with Roger by the first kind of affinity, Julius with Roger by the second kind of affinity, and following the death of Julius’s wife and his remarriage, his new wife will be associated to Roger by the third type of affinity. The fourth type arose not from the sexual act but from generation and touched the offspring born of a second marriage, making them affines to the relatives of the first parent within the fourth degree (soboles ex secundis nuptiis).

The principle of exogamy was not without benefit in the fusing of diverse peoples, but it caused inconveniences also in its subtle and complicated computations. The fourth Council of the Lateran (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 22.1028) in its 50th canon abolished all but the first kind of affinity and restricted its prohibitive power to the fourth degree in the collateral line arising from conjugal or extramarital carnal intercourse. The ancient rule had stated: affinity begets affinity. The new position stated the contrary: affinity does not beget affinity. The simple ancient definition of affinity, “relationship of persons proceeding from sexual intercourse” had to be augmented to read, “between a man and the blood relations of the woman, and vice versa.” However valuable were these changes, illicit affinity remained to vex legalists. Also, legitimate affinity upheld to the fourth degree in the collateral line and to infinity in the direct line was still somewhat awkward to deal with.

The Council of Trent (1563) was unsatisfied with the work of the Lateran Council. In the collateral line it limited illicit affinity to the second degree. It upheld licit affinity to the fourth degree, as had the Lateran Council. It did not completely solve the difficulties of which it so vehemently complained in reforming the former law, and subsequent appeals from many bishops appeared in the Curia for relaxation of the impediment. Vatican Council I (1869–70) made no further changes.

It was left to the 1917 Code of Canon Law to make radical and far-reaching changes. Its most extreme modification was the change of the very basis of affinity from sexual intercourse to valid marriage entered into according to proper form. This represented a regression to the Roman civil law. As an impediment, it bound each spouse to the blood relations of the other. In the direct line the impediment extended to infinity but was limited in the collateral line to the second degree of affinity (1917 Codex Iuris Canonici c.1077). The 1983 Code of Canon Law further refined church discipline regarding affinity.

Extent of Impediment. Because the marital impediment of affinity is a merely ecclesiastical law, it applies only to Catholics. Non-Catholic Christians and non-Christians are not considered bound by this impediment. However, the impediment would invalidate the marriage of a Catholic who has left the Church by a formal act.

Dispensation. Affinity is perpetual as an impediment and is not extinguished by passage of time or death of one of the parties. It is certain that it is an impediment of merely ecclesiastical law, therefore, the Church can and has dispensed from it. Dispensation from the impediment may be granted by a local ordinary or according to other provisions in Codex Iuris Canonici cc. 1079–80 or Codex Coannonm Ecclesiarum Orientalium cc. 796–97.

Bibliography: P. DIB, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 1:264–85.

[C. HENRY]

AFFLIGEM, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey in Hekelgem, Brabant, Archdiocese of Mechelen-Brussels, Belgium; dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul. It owes its origin to the conversion (c. 1083) of six thieving knights who were moved by the preaching of Wéry, a monk of Saint-Pierre (Ghent). They were soon joined by two monks from Saint-Airly (Verdun), one of whom, Fulgentius, became the first abbot (1088). In 1519 monks from EGMOND introduced at Affligem the reform of BURSFEELD. Affligem was incorporated into the episcopal mensa (mensal income) of Mechelen (1560) and governed thereafter by provosts, among whom was Benedict of Haefden. In 1628 Affligem adopted the reform of Lorraine and affiliated with the Congregation of the Presentation of Notre Dame, which was dissolved in 1654. The abbey was suppressed by French revolutionaries (1796), but the community regrouped at Termonde (1838) and affiliated with the Congregation of Subiaco (1857). A colony from Termonde regained possession of the ruins of Affligem (1870). Many priories depended on this abbey; three of them became abbeys—Vlierbeek (near Louvain), MARIA LAACH, and SAINT-ANDRÉ-LEZ-BRUGES. Currently the monks of Affligem participate actively in the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT in the Dutch-speaking provinces of Belgium. Affligem missionaries have gone to South Africa.

Bibliography: U. BERLIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:672–674. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:168–169. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:23–24.

[N. N. HUYGHEBAERT]

AFGHANISTAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A landlocked, mountainous country in south-central Asia, the Islamic State of Afghanistan is bounded on the north by Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, on the northeast by China, on the east and south by Pakistan, and on the west by Iran. Although the region is crossed by several fertile river valleys, rugged terrain to the north, frequent earthquakes, expanding desert areas to the south, and an arid climate punctuated with violent rains have done little to aid Afghan natives in advancing beyond subsistence farming or the raising of sheep and goats. Crops include wheat, barley, and fruit and nuts; deposits of iron ore, coal, copper, natural gas, and oil provide the region with some natural resources. While the economy was devastated by years of civil war at the end of the 20th century, the production of opium poppies and narcotics trafficking did provide the economy with a stabilizing source of revenue.

The country, known in ancient times as Aryana or Khorasan, was first conquered by Alexander the Great, then formed part of the Kingdom of Bactria c. 150 B.C. Persia and India later influenced Afghanistan, which was overrun by ISLAM in the 7th century A.D. Political unity was achieved in 1747 under the Arab leader Ahmad Shah. Great Britain gained control over Afghan foreign affairs in 1879 as a way of controlling the Khyber Pass, a strategic trade route between India and Asia. At the end of World War I, on Aug. 19, 1919, the country achieved complete independence from Britain, and was governed by a constitutional monarchy until 1973. After 1973 a series of military governments formed a dependency on Soviet military assistance which culminated in the December 1979 invasion of Afghanistan by the USSR. However, Soviet forces were forced to withdraw on Feb. 15, 1989, a result of U.S. and Arab backing of the armed resistance of Islamic Mujahidin rebels. The fragmented region gradually fell under the control of various political factions, the most powerful of which were the Islamic Taliban fundamentalists, who declared victory over both the communists and the Mujahidin in 1996. In 1999 the Taliban drafted a new constitution based on Islamic law.

The Christian Church in Afghanistan. There is a tradition that the Apostles Thomas and Bartholomew first brought Christianity to this region. Mention is made of the Diocese of Herat, which existed in the 5th century and which was a metropolitan see in the 6th, 10th, and 11th centuries. Christian communities, largely Nestorian, flourished in Afghan cities located along caravan routes, but they eventually disappeared. Balkh, in the northern section, served as an important mission center from whence Christians of the Syrian rite spread the faith to China. Jesuit missionaries came to Kabul in the 17th century, but the number of conversions within this predominately Muslim country was small.

After 1932 a Barnabite priest was attached to the Italian embassy and resident in Kabul, the capital. After the government fell into the hands of Islamic fundamentalists in the late 20th century, Christian missionaries were forbidden to proselytize, their presence in Afghanistan only tolerated because of their willingness to provide humanitarian aid. While Catholic chaplains from Pakistan regularly visited Afghanistan, their purpose was only to minister to the few Catholic non-residents living in the country while engaged in technical work. In 1999 non-Muslims were ordered to mark their homes with a yellow cloth placed on the rooftop, and to identify themselves with yellow clothing so that they might be avoided by Muslims. In January 2001 Taliban government leader Mullah Mohammad Omar announced that conversion to Christianity was punishable by death, the government's reaction to reports that aid workers had engaged in missionary activity proscribed by Afghan law. Church officials around the world were alarmed not only by the lack of religious freedom in Afghanistan, but also by the increasing repression of all Afghan citizens, and in particular women, who were being gradually excluded from public life. In response, in February of 2001, Pope John Paul II cited the "grave humanitarian crisis" taking place in Afghanistan, and encouraged human rights organizations to continue their attempts to aid the Afghan people. But in August 2001, eight Christian aid workers were charged by the Taliban with spreading Christianity in the fundamentalist Muslim country and imprisoned.

Capital: Kabul.

Size: 251,825 sq. miles.

Population: 25,838,797 in 2000.

Languages: Afghan Persian (Dari) and Pashtun; Turkic and other languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 21,904,589 Sunni Muslims (84%), 3,875,820 Shi'a Muslims (15%), 58,388 other (1%)

Following the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, DC, the international community gave the United States government its full backing to pursue military action against the Taliban government and the Al Qaeda terrorist network that operated out of Afghanistan, Al Qaeda being held responsible for the September 11 attacks.

On November 14, 2001, as coalition and anti-Taliban forces swept across the country, US forces freed the eight Christian aid workers from a location outside Kabul and moved them to safety into Pakistan, and then on to their individual countries.

With the collapse of the Taliban and the installation of Hamid Karzai as the interim leader of a new Afghan coalition government in 2002, it was hoped that Afghan people might return to a life of greater intellectual freedom, religious freedom and tolerance as they moved forward in the 21st century.

Bibliography: K. S. LATOURETTE, A History of the Expansion of Christianity (New York 1937-45). Bilan du monde 2:23-24.

[L. MASCARENHAS]

AFRA, ST.

Martyr at Augsburg during the persecution of DIOCLETIAN, patron of the Diocese of Augsburg. The Martyrology of St. Jerome witnesses to her life and martyrdom, and this information is confirmed by Venantius Fortunatus, who visited her grave in 565. A passio represented by a long and short recension and a conversio depict her as a repentant prostitute. This legend began apparently in the eighth century and spread rapidly (there is even an Armenian version) but has no historical foundation. It arose through confusion with the martyr of Antioch, Venerea, whose name was interpreted in relation to Venus, and was inscribed in the Martyrology of St. Jerome on the same day as Afra's. Several ancient calendars of Augsburg assert that Afra was a virgin. The body of a woman discovered in a sarcophagus in the Roman Church of St. Afra in the eleventh century is honored today under the altar dedicated to the saint. In a later pas- sio the martyrdom of an Afra at Brescia is fused with that of SS. Faustinus and Jovita. It is obviously a version developed from the original legend of the eighth century.

Feast: Aug. 5.

Bibliography: A. BIGELMAIR and A. P. FRUTAZ, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:169–170. A. BIGELMAIR, “Die heilige Afra,” Lebensbilder aus dem bayerischen Schwaben, ed. G. VON PÖLNITZ, 4 v. (Munich 1952–55) 1:1–29. W. BRAMBACH, Die verloren geglaubte Historia de Sancta Afra martyre und das Salve regina des Hermannus Contractus (Karlsruhe 1892). H. GOUSSEN, Theologie und Glaube 1 (1909) 791–794. H. ROSENFELD, Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 37 (1955) 306–335. F. SAVIO, Analecta Bollandiana 15 (1896) 5–72, 113–159, Afra of Brescia.

[P. ROCHE]

AFRICAN AMERICAN CATHOLICS IN THE UNITED STATES (HISTORY OF)

Catholics first arrived in what is now the United States in the middle of the sixteenth century. The settlement, named in honor of St. Augustine, was made in what is now the northern part of Florida by Pedro Menéndez de Avilés in 1565. These first settlers were Spanish speaking, all were Catholics, and some were white and others black. In fact, on the first page of the baptismal register appear the names of infants who are described as black or mulattoes. The history of African American Catholics has its beginning with the history of the Catholic Church in America.

Colonial period in Florida. The Spanish government considered the Florida settlement as an outpost against attacks by the British and the French to guard its Caribbean possessions in Cuba and the Gulf of Mexico. The black settlers who settled in Florida in the second half of the sixteenth century were mainly from Spain. Many were free; others were slaves. From the beginning the slaves in the Florida territory enjoyed certain rights and privileges coming from the slave codes based on Roman Law drawn up by Alfonso the Wise (1221–1284) known as the Siete Partidas. By 1683 free blacks had formed a militia in St. Augustine. A decade later, the crown promised freedom to runaway slaves from the English colonies who reached the Spanish settlement and converted to the Catholic faith. In 1738 the Spanish governor built the first all-black town in the future United States. Known as the Gracia Real de Santa Teresa de Mose, this palenque, that is a settlement of freed persons, had Francisco Menéndez as its designated black leader. A courageous soldier and a daring leader, he led both blacks and the Yamasee Indians against the English settlements in Georgia. In 1763 the Spanish in Florida, both whites and blacks, free and slave, were forced to withdraw to Cuba, leaving Florida to the British. This was the result of the Spanish defeat in the Seven Years War. In 1784 the Spanish returned, but the town of Fort Mose was not restored. The baptismal, marriage, and death registers of blacks reveal a society that was bi-racial, Catholic, and Latin. The registers reveal that the soldiers garrisoned in St. Augustine were blacks and mulattoes from Cuba with one or the other coming from West Africa. The Spanish laws governing slavery were more tolerant and emancipation much easier to win than in the British and American societies. In 1793 there were 2,000 whites and 1,600 blacks of whom 1,500 were slaves. In 1814 there were 1,300 whites and 1,770 blacks of whom 1,600 were slaves. Over half of the population was black.

Colonial period in the Southwest and the Louisiana Territory. In 1781 the city of Los Angeles was settled with families from two villages in northern Mexico. Of the eleven families that settled in Los Angeles, only two persons were white and two were blacks, seven were Native Americans, four were mestizos, and seven were mulattoes. Not only in Los Angeles but in much of the Southwest a large proportion, especially soldiers, were of mixed race.

The French began the settlement of the Gulf Coast at the end of the seventeenth century. African slaves were introduced into the colony in the first quarter of the eighteenth century. On the eve of the Civil War there were 330,000 slaves; 18,000 free blacks, and 360,000 whites. The Code Noir was the slave code drawn up by the authority of Colbert in the France of Louis XIV to control the slave population in the French colonies. The code made slaveholders responsible for the baptism and the religious instruction of their slaves, slaves were to have opportunity to attend church and were to be free from labor on Sundays and feasts, neither marriage nor concubinage was permitted between whites and blacks, and children under fourteen could not be sold away from their parents. Other provisions in the code were extremely harsh and even inhuman. Despite the Code Noir, concubinage between white men and black women was a salient feature of Louisiana society. French slaveholders very often freed their slave children, thereby creating a distinct social class known as the “free people of color.”

The free people of color or Afro-Creoles were to be found in the cities of the Gulf Coast and in Florida. This social and ethnic class created a distinct Afro-French culture that was Catholic, African, and Latin in religion, language, and art. From this social class came entrepreneurs, skilled craftsmen, business women and men, landowners, and philanthropists. Specific Afro-Creole settlements like Mon Luis Island south of Mobile, Chastang in southern Alabama, and Isle Brevelle outside of Natchitoches in northern Louisiana presented a distinctive Afro-Creole Catholic folk culture.

Many free people of color, like many blacks in other parts of the country, owned slaves. This would include people who were themselves former slaves. The reasons were not always simple. Many free blacks had funds sufficient to purchase a slave, often one’s own children, or relatives, or one’s spouse. Having funds to purchase a slave did not mean having sufficient funds to post a bond often demanded by local governments to insure that the former slave would not become a public charge. In some places, the freed slave was forced to leave the state or risk being enslaved again. In the years leading up to the Civil War, it became increasingly difficult to free a slave. Finally, there were free blacks who bought and sold slaves for the same reasons that many whites owned slaves. They bought and sold slaves for profit and one’s own service.

French settlements in the Midwest, like St. Louis, Vincennes, Cahokia, Kaskasia, and Ste.-Genevieve, were also settlements of black Catholics, slave and free. One of the best-known black Catholic leaders of the antebellum period was Jean-Baptiste Pointe du Sable. A trapper, a trader, a wealthy merchant, married to a member of the Potawatomi tribe, he was a French-speaking black man possibly of Haitian origin. Considered to be one of the first settlers of Chicago, he was buried in 1818 in a Catholic cemetery in St. Charles, Missouri.

Slavery and the Catholic Church. Four years before he became the bishop of Baltimore in 1889, John CARROLL in a letter to the Holy See described the situation of Catholics in the newly established United States. He noted that there were 3,000 African slaves in Maryland in a population of 15,000 Catholics. They were a concern for him. The Jesuits had arrived in Maryland in the seventeenth century. With land grants received from Lord Baltimore, they relied upon slave labor to exploit the land and bring in the income needed for their pastoral work. By the early nineteenth century, the ownership of many slaves who were elderly or children was no longer profitable. In 1837, the Jesuits had sold almost 300 slaves to slave brokers in the South. Assurances were given that families would be kept together and the slaves would be sold to Catholic slaveowners. Nevertheless, some families were divided and more seriously, many were sold to non-Catholics, which meant that they would not be able to practice the Catholic faith. In Maryland, this action scandalized even the slaveholding Catholic laity.

The Catholic Church in the United States was implicated in slavery on many levels. The slaveholding class included members of the clergy and religious orders as well as laypersons. Bishops like John Carroll (1735–1815), Louis William DUBOURG (1766–1833) of Louisiana, Benedict FLAGET (1763–1850) of Louisville, Michael PORTIER (1795–1859) of Mobile owned slaves. The VINCENTIANS in Missouri and the Sulpicians in Maryland and Kentucky were served by slaves in their seminaries. The Carmelite nuns in Maryland; the Ursulines in New Orleans; the Dominican sisters, the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, and the Sisters of Loretto in Kentucky were all slave owners. Most of the religious communities in the South were slaveowners. It can be said that in the period before the Civil War, the Catholic Church in the South was built and maintained by the labor of black Catholic slaves.

Abolitionism. In the United States, the opposition to slavery and the call for its abolition was the work of Protestant religious leaders, most of whom were Quakers, Presbyterians, and Methodists. Many Protestant churches were split in half over the slavery issue. The opponents to slavery were, for the most part, motivated by deep religious convictions regarding the morality of slavery. These same religious leaders were often harsh critics of the Catholic Church, which they saw as a narrow-minded religious faith, foreign to an American mentality. Catholics in the United States reciprocated with suspicion of the abolitionists, whom they saw as fanatics. Many Catholics, especially members of the hierarchy, considered slavery to be a political issue.

In 1839, Pope Gregory XVI wrote an apostolic letter condemning the slave trade and by implication the institution of slavery itself. John ENGLAND (1786–1842), bishop of Charleston, wrote a series of letters in his diocesan newspaper (the first of its kind in the United States) in which he sought to prove that the pope was not an abolitionist as some had charged and had no intention of condemning the domestic slavery that existed in the United States. He sought to prove that the Church had never condemned slavery. Finally, acknowledging that he personally did not approve of slavery, he added that he saw no way of bringing it to an end.

On the eve of the Civil War, the first bishop of Natchitoches in Louisiana, Auguste Martin (1803–1875) wrote a pastoral letter in French, defending slavery as a blessing in disguise whereby God in his providence had brought the “children of the race of Canaan” to these shores to receive the blessings of faith and grace. The authorities in Rome were ready to condemn the bishop’s theological conclusions when the war ended and the issue was no longer relevant. Only two American bishops publicly called for an end to slavery, John Baptist PURCELL (1800–1883), archbishop of Cincinnati, who called for an end to slavery in 1862, and Josue Moody Young (1808–1866), bishop of Erie. It would take leaders in Europe, like the champion of Irish freedom, Daniel O’Connell (1775–1847), and Félix-Antoine-Philibert DUPANLOUP (1802–1878), bishop of Orléans in France, to speak out against the inhumanity of slavery in the context of Catholic teaching.

Although the 54th Massachusetts Regiment is seen as the first regular all black Union regiment in the Civil War, the first black troops to fight and die in the Civil War were the Louisiana Native Guards. Organized by free men of color as a regiment in the Confederate forces in Louisiana, many of the same Native Guards offered themselves to the Union General Benjamin Butler after New Orleans was captured by the Union Army in April of 1862. They were mustered into the Union Army as the Louisiana Native Guards, forming three regiments. Most of them were French-speaking blacks, and most were Catholics.

The great hero of the African American community in New Orleans was André Cailloux., captain in the First Regiment of the Louisiana Native Guards. A former slave, he was a daring, fearless, natural-born leader, whose finest hour was the moment when he led his men up the bluff at Port Hudson. His regiment was to lead the attack. There André Cailloux was the first of the black soldiers to die on May 27, 1863. The bodies of the black soldiers were left unburied on the battle ground for almost a month. The black soldiers were scorned and they and their families were openly insulted by the general New Orleans populace. The white clergy of New Orleans, like the white population, were in opposition to the Union forces occupying the city. Consequently, the only priest who would minister to the black soldiers and their families was Claude Pascal Maistre (1820–1875). Maistre, who had been born in the département of Aube in the northwest of France, regularly condemned slavery in his sermons, despite the summons of his archbishop to desist. He gave aid and comfort to the black soldiers and full support to the black community as the free people of color rallied to the Union cause. Despite his suspension by the archbishop of New Orleans, Jean-Marie Odin (1800–1870), Maistre continued his ministry to the black community and in that capacity he preached at the public military funeral of André Cailloux.

Second Plenary Council of Baltimore. The American bishops came together for the second Plenary Council in Baltimore in October of 1866. Martin J. Spalding (1810–1872), archbishop of Baltimore, had expressed his concern for ministry to the freed slaves. He spoke of the “golden opportunity for a harvest of souls.” In planning for this council with the approval of Rome, he suggested to the members of the Curia that there should be a discussion on the possibility of a prefect apostolic or some other ecclesiastical official, preferably with the status of a bishop, who might coordinate on a national basis the pastoral work for African Americans. The Curia considered this a capital idea. It was included in the agenda. The bishops did not take up the subject until the very end of the allotted time for discussion. In fact, the meeting was held in an extraordinary session on October 22. The minutes of the extraordinary session were never translated into English or published in Latin. The bishops were most unhappy with such a proposal because they felt that it would diminish their authority. The proposal was met with sarcasm, anger, ridicule, and also some bitterness was expressed toward the ex-slaves themselves. The tenor of the discussion was such that Spalding never revealed during the meeting that the idea was originally his own. Ultimately, the assembled bishops made no move to adopt the proposal. It was decided to leave the evangelization of the African American community in the hands of the individual bishops who had African Americans in their respective dioceses. The bishops expressed the hope that missionaries might come from Europe to evangelize the black population.

In 1871, Spalding welcomed the MILL HILL FATHERS, a missionary society from England, into his archdiocese. In 1892, the American branch of Mill Hill separated from the English headquarters and became the Society of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart. Dedicated exclusively to the apostolate among blacks, they had their headquarters in Baltimore but with parishes and missions throughout the South. Later in 1906 the Society of the Divine Word, a German missionary congregation, came to the United States and also began work in the African American Apostolate. A community of sisters was founded by St. Katherine DREXEL (1858–1955), a Philadelphia-born heiress, who used her immense fortune to establish a religious community known as the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament in 1891. St. Katherine Drexel opened schools and began missions for both Native Americans and African Americans.

Religious congregations of black women. The African American Catholic community also played an active role in its own evangelization. Two religious orders of women were successfully established in the darkest days of slavery. As early as 1824 a community of black religious women was established in Kentucky. Unfortunately, the effort was unsuccessful.

The second attempt was made possible by the arrival of black refugees from the revolutionary turmoil of Haiti (then referred to as St.-Domingue) into Baltimore. They worshipped together in the lower chapel of St. Mary’s Seminary on Paca Street in Baltimore. A Sulpician priest, Jacques Joubert de la Muraille, was assigned to minister among them. After he noted that a group of young black women, three of whom were originally from Haiti, had begun teaching the young children in the community, Joubert inquired about the possibility of their forming a sisterhood and discovered that this was their fondest desire. With Elizabeth Lange (d.1882) as their leader, the women became a religious community in 1829. Two years later in 1831, they received papal approval. Joubert gave them the name of OBLATE SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE. From the beginning, the education of black children was their ministry. At the same time an orphanage was created. The community attracted vocations. Some who were ex-slaves came to the community with their manumission papers in their hands. Nevertheless, the sisters often faced insults and contempt from the wider community. As time went on, the convent played a central role in the religious life of black Catholic community of Baltimore.

One of the original group who founded the Oblates was Therese Duchemin Maxis, who left the Oblates with another sister and went to Monroe, Michigan, where with the assistance of a Belgian Redemptorist priest, she founded the Sisters, Servants of the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY. Because of a misunderstanding about roles, Therese Maxis was forced to leave the community by the bishop of Detroit, Peter Paul Lefevere (1804–1869); she eventually found refuge with the Grey Nuns in Canada. Toward the end of her life, in 1885, she was allowed to return to a convent of the I.H.M. Sisters in West Chester, Pennsylvania, where she died in 1892.

In New Orleans, a young woman of color, Henriette Delille (1812–1862), a descendant of one of the first settlers in New Orleans and his slave, began to live a life of devotion and service with two other women of color, Juliette Gaudin (1808–1887), originally from Haiti, and Josephine Charles (1812–1885). Under the leadership of Henriette, the three women organized catechism classes for young girls of color and for slaves. Classes were also given to the young girls. The three women acted as sponsors for the baptism of slaves and as witnesses for their marriages. They nursed the sick, especially the poor and the derelict among the abandoned slaves. The community grew and during the 1840s the community evolved from the status of pious women to sisters living a consecrated life. They would become known as the Sisters of the HOLY FAMILY. Racial feelings prevented them from wearing the religious habit on the streets of New Orleans until 1872, ten years after the death of Henriette Delille.

Both the Oblate Sisters of Providence and the Sisters of the Holy Family had to fight for recognition. For many the concept of black nuns was difficult to accept. But their very existence is a testimony to the deep religious faith within the African American community. Today they continue their works of service and education primarily on behalf of the African American community. In 1916 another community of black sisters was founded by Ignatius Lissner, SMA and Mother Theodore Williams (1868–1931) in Savannah, Georgia. Originally founded to teach in the black Catholic schools of the Savannah diocese, the Handmaids of Mary found little opportunity for this task. Mother Theodore Williams relocated the community to New York at the invitation of Cardinal Hayes (1867–1938). There in Harlem, the third religious congregation of black sisters, now known as the Franciscan Handmaids of Mary (see FRANCISCAN SISTERS), continue their work of service to the poor and education for black children in the heart of the city.

African American priests. The first African American priests were three sons of an Irish slaveholder and his female slave. Michael Morris Healy, a former soldier from Ireland who fought with Great Britain during the War of 1812, built for himself a plantation in central Georgia. His slave, Mary Eliza, bore him ten children. Through his friendship with the future bishop of Boston, John Fitzpatrick (1812–1866), he was able to send his children for education in the North. Although his children were legally still slaves, his first four sons were among the first graduates of Holy Cross College in Massachusetts. Three of them studied abroad and became priests. James Augustine Healy (1830–1900) studied for the priesthood in Paris and was ordained in 1854 for the diocese of Boston. He would be named the second bishop of Portland, Maine in 1875 and the first black bishop in the United States. His younger brother, Alexander Sherwood Healy (1836–1874), was also ordained a priest for the diocese of Boston in Rome in 1858. Sherwood was a brilliant canonist, who was secretary of Bishop John Williams (1822–1907), and who served as his theologian at the First Vatican Council in 1870. He had a brilliant future before him, when he died in 1875. The second oldest brother, Patrick Francis Healy (1834–1910), became a Jesuit and was ordained a priest in Liège in 1864. Patrick Healy became the rector of Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., and was later named its first president. He was responsible for making the university a modern, updated seat of higher learning. Patrick Healy passed for white; Georgetown University would accept no black students until the Civil Rights Movement in the mid-twentieth century. Two of the Healy sisters became nuns in Canada. One of them, Eliza Healy (1846–1919), known as Sister St. Mary Magdalen, became a nun in the Congregation of Notre Dame in Montreal. She served as superior in several of the congregation's foundations. Another sister, Amanda Josephine (1845–1879), became a religious in a nursing community, the Religious Hospitallers at the Hospital of the Hôtel-Dieu in Montreal. Although born in slavery, the Healy children had little contact with the African American population. Although both Bishop Healy and his brother, Alexander Sherwood Healy, were recognized as black, neither the bishop nor any of the other children truly identified with the black Catholic community.

On the other hand, Augustus Tolton (1854–1897), born a slave in Ralls County, Missouri, was clearly recognizable as an African American. Despite many setbacks, Tolton was finally admitted into the Urban College in Rome, where he studied for the priesthood and was ordained in 1886. Stationed first in Quincy, Illinois, he soon moved to Chicago as a result of the hostility of a neighboring priest. In Chicago he organized the parish of St. Monica, the first black parish in the city. Tolton's career was short but impressive. During the eleven years of his priesthood, he became for so many black Catholics a sign of hope and pride. He did not spare himself in responding to the needs of black Catholics both in Chicago and throughout the nation. He died suddenly from heat stroke in July of 1897.

The condition of the first black priests in the United States was an unenviable one. Unlike the tradition of the Church elsewhere, the American Catholic Church would not encourage a native clergy from the African American Catholic community. Between 1891 and 1910 only five black priests were ordained. From 1910 to 1930 only three priests were ordained. Thanks to the insistence of the Holy See, the number of black priests gradually increased. In 1934 four black priests of the Society of the Divine Word were ordained in St. Augustine Seminary in Bay St. Louis, Mississippi. A first all-black seminary had been established by the Divine Word Fathers first in 1920 in Greenwood, Mississippi, and was later moved to Bay St. Louis in 1923. Between the years 1934 and 1944, twenty-three black men were ordained to the priesthood.

Piety of black Catholics. In the Sulpician archives in Baltimore are found two notebook-size documents that reveal the piety of the black Catholic community. At the end of the eighteenth century and in the first part of the following, African American Catholics along with their fellow Catholics joined the different confraternities, the oldest of which was the Confraternity of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, begun by Bishop Carroll in 1796. Fifty-five pages of the notebook list the names of over 1,000 members from 1796 to 1858. Roughly a third of the names were blacks or mulattoes, men and women, slave and free. In two other confraternities, Our Lady of Help and of the Holy Rosary, both of which began in the early nineteenth century, the lists contained a representative number of members, who were designated as black or mulatto. The appearance of these names might serve as a barometer suggesting that the level of piety and devotion was as elevated among black Catholics as it was among whites.

In the same archives is found the Journal of the Commencement and of the Proceedings of the Society of Coloured people, a handwritten account of the weekly meetings of some 200 or more black men and women who met from 1843 to 1845 in the basement of Calvert Hall, attached to the Baltimore cathedral. The journal, kept by the white priest who acted as chaplain, gave detailed information regarding the prayers, the hymns, the spiritual conferences, and such practical affairs as the disbursement of funds to those in need and the maintenance of a lending library. The notebook affords one a bird's-eye view of a gathering of very pious black Catholics who were doing more than the minimum in their religious practice.

The Society of the Holy Family was in the form of a mutual benefit society for black Catholics. Prior to the Civil War, there were many such societies among black Catholics. These self-help organizations, although prevalent among African American Protestants, have been little studied among black Catholics. In the Catholic Directory for Baltimore at least three other mutual benefit societies were mentioned, one of which was named the Tobias Society. Other examples of black Catholic mutual benefit societies were found in New Orleans.

From the pain and humiliation that was the experience of all American blacks, there emerged individual examples of holiness and piety. The Venerable Pierre TOUSSAINT (c. 1756–1853) was born a slave in Haiti. His owner, Jean Bérard, his owner's wife, his sister, and his aunt were brought to New York in 1787. Toussaint, like most urban slaves, learned a trade which would bring remuneration to his owner. He learned the trade of coiffeur or hairdresser, a lucrative trade for those who worked for the distinguished women of New York society. Jean Bérard returned to Haiti to wind up his affairs and unexpectedly died, leaving his wife practically penniless. Madame Bérard, without knowing it, was totally indebted to Toussaint, who supported her by his earnings. Eventually freed in 1807 by Madame Bérard on her deathbed, Toussaint bought the freedom of the woman he married and that of his sister. He was not poor, for he owned his own home and had adequate funds to support his family. He was childless but he reared his niece, who died young. Toussaint exercised a very practical charity. He disbursed funds to those in need, lent money to those who sought help, nursed the sick even in his own home, and offered violin lessons and shelter to young homeless black youths. His charity, his piety and cheerfulness, his deep attachment to his wife, his friendship to many of all stations and background revealed a man who was considered a saint by both blacks and whites, and even by Protestants at the time of his death in 1853. From that time his reputation for sanctity has not ceased to grow and his cause has been introduced in Rome.

Black Catholic lay leadership. Unlike other ethnic groups within the American Catholic Church in the nineteenth century, black Catholics did not have the clerical leaders as had other ethnic groups in which clerical leaders wielded influence over many aspects of religious and civic life. Black Catholics are almost unique in that from the end of the nineteenth century to the middle of the twentieth century, the leadership role was carried out by lay persons. At the end of the nineteenth century, it was a man named Daniel Rudd, a journalist, a lecturer, a polemicist, and a devout Catholic who spoke out on behalf of the black Catholic community. He was born a slave in 1854 in Bardstown, Kentucky. One of twelve children, he was baptized and reared as a Catholic from infancy. After the Civil War, he joined his brother in Springfield, Ohio and finished there his secondary schooling. He began publishing a black newspaper in Springfield that in 1886 was transformed into The American Catholic Tribune, a black Catholic weekly newspaper, the first of its kind. Rudd moved to Cincinnati and then to Detroit, and finally the newspaper ceased publication after 1895. Rudd was convinced that the Catholic Church would become the champion for the rights and the improvement of the black race. He had a vision of a massive conversion of blacks to Catholicism and that this would raise up the entire race just as the Church had done so for other racial groups in the past.

In 1889 there was held in Washington, D.C., the first black Catholic lay congress. There would be four more such congresses, the second one in Cincinnati in 1890, Philadelphia in 1892, Chicago in 1893, and Baltimore in 1894. Inspired by the Catholic lay congresses in Germany and Belgium, the congresses were Rudd's idea. He wished to bring together black Catholic lay leaders from all over the country. Rudd succeeded better than he knew. He was able to imbue the congress members with his own vision of the Catholic Church's role in lifting up the African American race. The Congress members went even further. They began to initiate several actions. They called for better urban living conditions, for education, especially vocational schools that would train black youth to be skilled laborers, and for an end to unions' blocking the entry of blacks to membership. They sent questionnaires to all of the United States bishops, inquiring about the presence of racial discrimination among the institutions of their respective dioceses. More than two-thirds of the bishops responded. It was the intention of the committee of grievances set up by the fourth black lay Catholic congress to report the results to the Holy See.

The present state of research does not allow any clear-cut conclusions as to which communications regarding the status of black Catholics influenced the Roman authorities. Documentation in the apostolic delegation files clearly indicates that the curial officials did know of the complaints regarding the situation of black American Catholics. In 1904, Archbishop Falconio, OFM (1842–1917), apostolic delegate, received a letter from the Prefect of the Congregation of the Propaganda, concerning the “humiliating” way that black Catholics were treated by the clergy and the bishops. The letter went on to say that this treatment was to be “lessened and thus little by little entirely removed.” The apostolic delegation files now in the Vatican Archives reveal that between 1912 and 1921, the Roman Curia in its missives to the apostolic delegate were not impressed by the efforts made on behalf of black Catholics by the bishops in the United States. The curial officials could not understand why there were not more black priests and how a pontifical university like the Catholic University of America could refuse to admit black Catholics.

Thomas Wyatt Turner and the Federated Colored Catholics. After 1894, the black Catholic lay congresses ceased to exist and would not be revived until the end of the twentieth century. Daniel Rudd died relatively unknown in the town of his birth in 1933. Many of the congress members, like Fredrick McGhee (1861–1912), of St. Paul, Minnesota, friend of both Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. DuBois, one of the founders of the NAACP Legal Fund and William Henry Smith (1833–1903) of Washington, D.C., assistant librarian of the House of Representatives, highest ranking black in the federal government, were both significant leaders in their respective communities. In their talks and speeches at the congresses and in the mutual addresses to their fellow Catholics delivered at the end of most of the congresses, these leaders expressed a deep sense of loyalty to their Church. They articulated the meaning of this faith to their situation as blacks. In fact, it could be said that a design for black Catholic theology emerged from these congresses at this time.

Thomas Wyatt Turner (1877–1978), college professor, activist, founder of the Federated Colored Catholics in 1924, was a man ahead of his time. Firmly attached to his Catholic faith, he did not hesitate to denounce racism and discrimination within the Catholic Church in the United States. He believed in direct action. He believed that blacks must be in charge of their own battles and that whites should cooperate under black leadership. Turner and his followers had three important goals: making Catholic education available to all black Catholics, opening the Catholic University of America to black students, and opening the seminaries for the education of more black priests. Turner's direct action methods brought him into conflict with two leading Jesuit priests who were also working on behalf of blacks and interracial justice. William Markoe, SJ (1892–1969) of St. Louis, pastor of St. Elizabeth Parish, led the charge against racial discrimination and injustice in St. Louis. In the beginning he sought to collaborate with Turner, but later he denounced Turner's program as establishing a “Jim Crow” organization. He saw “integration” and “interracial” as the watchwords for the movement. John LaFarge, SJ (1880–1963), intellectual leader and spokesman for interracial justice within the Catholic Church, gave support to Markoe's strategy to take over the Federated Colored Catholics. LaFarge saw the importance of providing a space for black Catholics and white Catholics to meet and discuss the issues of justice and Catholic social teaching so that through dialogue racial discrimination and injustice could be eliminated. From this sprang the Catholic Interracial Councils. Unwittingly, the work of the two priests helped destroy the organization built by Turner. Turner realized that in the issue of race relations, black empowerment, black leadership, and black direction would be the only way racist practices would be stopped.

Civil Rights Movement. Turner's methods and goals were taken up again by black Catholic leaders in the post–World War II movement for civil rights. Black Catholics were not on the forefront of the Civil Rights Movement. By and large it was Protestant clergymen who worked with Martin Luther King, Jr. On the local level many Catholics did play an important part, but further research is still necessary to reveal more specific examples. One of the most important civil rights attorneys was Alexander Pierre Tureaud (1899–1972), who successfully fought in the courts to bring about the desegregation of the schools in Louisiana. He was a close collaborator with Thurgood Marshall and his partners.

Following the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. in April of 1968, black Catholic priests were called to meet as a caucus to respond to the deteriorating situation where some had called for the shooting of looters. This meant the killing of young people, many of whom would have been minorities. A scheduled meeting of the Catholic Clergy Conference on the Interracial Apostolate, an organization for white and black priests working in black parishes, was to begin its meeting in Detroit on April 16. A message was sent to all of the African American priests to come a day earlier in order to discuss the civil disturbances in the inner cities across the nation. The one day was lengthened to a night and another day. Some 60 or more black priests who had never met with each before began to look at the issues of what it meant to be a black priest in the time of black consciousness. It was a time for many to share their experiences of racial injustice and racial animosity in the seminary, religious congregations, or with their fellow white priests. For many it was a time to reveal hidden wounds and to talk about deeply felt pain. The newly found unity encouraged many of the black clergy to look at plans of action. It was agreed that a letter from the black clergy should be directed to the hierarchy of the Catholic Church in the United States. In it were a series of demands. Many of the demands were the same as blacks across the nation were addressing to white American authority figures. The letter began with the jolting words that the Catholic Church in the United States was a white racist institution.

April of 1968 was a turning point in the history of black Catholics in the United States. For the first time black priests as a body had addressed the issue of race and racism in the Catholic Church. Although agreement was not unanimous, it was clear that the issue of race was a hidden wound in the hearts of nearly all of the black Catholic clergy. It is for this reason that the caucus was transformed into a permanent organization of black priests, now known as the National Black Catholic Clergy Caucus. It continues under this title as a fraternal organization of priests. It seeks to offer support and on-going education to its members. The National Black Clergy Caucus still seeks to be an advocate for issues dealing with race and to serve as a reminder of the Catholic Church's teaching on racial justice and related social issues. The action of the black priests resulted in the formation of the National Black Sisters' Conference later that same year. Later black seminarians organized the National Black Catholic Seminarians' Association. In 1970 the National Office of Black Catholics was established as a coordinating committee for dialogue with the American bishops. In 1988 this task would be taken over by the creation of the Secretariat of African American Catholics for the National Council of Catholic Bishops.

African American Catholics come of age. American Catholics have experienced the same forces of resistance and change that have characterized the modern world. With the creation of more black bishops beginning with the ordination of Harold Perry, SVD, as auxiliary bishop of New Orleans in 1966, the number of bishops has reached the total of thirteen bishops with one retired bishop and three deceased at the beginning of the twenty-first century. The number of African American Catholics is close to 2.5 million. The current influx of Africans into the black community has slowly increased this number. While the number of African American priests has dwindled to fewer than 300, the number of permanent deacons is more than twice that number. The number of African priests working in the African American community, along with an increase in African religious women, has almost doubled the number of black priests and sisters.

The new millenium and the black community. W. E. B. DuBois wrote at the beginning of the twentieth century that the problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the color line. The same problem exists at the beginning of the twenty-first century. The American bishops addressed the issue of racism in a pastoral letter entitled Brothers and Sisters to Us in 1979. This letter charged that racism was a sin. The changing face of racism in the United States in the last quarter of the twentieth century has lessened the impact of the document, although the problem has not ended. In 1984 the black bishops issued a pastoral letter What We Have Seen and Heard. The bishops spoke of the black Catholic community as having "come of age," and these same black Catholics were now called upon to evangelize themselves, their community, and the Church.

Race was not absent from the schismatic movement when George Stallings, a priest of the archdiocese of Washington, D.C., and Bruce Greening, a Salvatorian, severed ties with the Catholic Church in 1989. Because the cardinal archbishop of Washington would not authorize an independent congregation for the African American Rite, George Stallings broke with the Catholic Church and established the African American Catholic Congregation. Stallings was ordained a bishop by an Old Catholic archbishop.

Bruce Greening, who followed Stallings in his criticism of the Catholic Church, broke ranks with Archbishop Stallings when the initial break with Rome was made. Bruce Greening formed the Independent African American Catholic Rite. His initial desire to remain within the bounds of the Catholic Church had not been possible. Much smaller in number than the Imani Temple of Archbishop Stallings, Greening was ordained a bishop by the patriarch of the African Orthodox Church.

The theological movement begun by black Protestant thinkers (e.g. James Cone) created a like movement among black Catholic theologians who met as a group called the Black Catholic Theological Symposium in 1978. This was the beginning of a permanent summer school institute at Xavier University in New Orleans, the first and only black Catholic university founded by St. Katherine Drexel in 1925. The Institute for Black Catholic Studies began in 1980 with courses in Black Approaches to Theology, Sacraments, and Scripture, Catechetics, History of Black Catholicism, and related subjects. Among the first faculty members was Sister Thea Bowman, FSPA (1937–1990), a gifted teacher and a charismatic speaker who enthralled her listeners.

At the same time, a new organization began to reinstate the meetings of the Black Catholic Congress. The sixth Black Catholic Congress was held in Washington, D.C., in 1987, the seventh was held in New Orleans in 1992, and the eighth was held in Baltimore in 1997. These congresses have revealed the extraordinary liturgical and aesthetic gifts of African American Catholics. The black Catholic Hymnal, Lead Me Guide Me (published in 1987), is a reminder of the impact made by black Catholic musicians like Clarence Rivers, Rawn Harbor, Edward Bonnemere, Grayson Brown, and others on the Catholic Church in the United States and abroad.

Black Catholics were among the first who figuratively and literally helped lay the foundations of Catholicism in the territory that would become the United States. Their contribution to American Catholicism, so often overlooked and unsung, has been ongoing and substantial, both spiritually and tangibly. Without their presence, much of the movement, tempo, and vibrant colors of American Catholicism would have been muted and less dynamic. Without their presence, the note of catholicity would have been less evident, the story of faith would have been less apparent, and the mystery of the cross less powerful.

Bibliography: C. DAVIS, The History of Black Catholics in the United States (New York 1990). J. LANDERS, "Free and Slave," in The New History of Florida, ed. M. GANNON (Gainesville, Fla. 1996) 167–82. M. J. MACGREGOR, The Emergence of a Black Catholic Community: St. Augustine's in Washington (Washington, D.C. 1999). M. NICKELS, Black Catholic Protest and the Federated Colored Catholics, 1917–1933: Three Perspectives on Racial Justice (New York 1988). S. J. OCHS, A Black Patriot and a White Priest: André Cailloux and Claude Paschal Maistre in Civil War New Orleans (Baton Rouge, La. 2000); Desegregating the Altar: The Jose- phites and the Struggle for Black Priests, 1871–1960 (Baton Rouge, La. 1990). D. W. SOUTHERN, John LaFarge and the Limits of Catholic Interracialism, 1911–1963 (Baton Rouge, La. 1996).

[C. DAVIS]

AFRICAN MISSIONS, SOCIETY OF

The Society of African Missions (SMA, Official Catholic Directory #0110), of pontifical right, was founded in Lyons, France, on Dec. 8, 1856, by Bp. Melchior de MARION-BRÉSILLAC for missionary work in Africa. It is a clerical society of apostolic life.

In 1858, as its first mission, the society was given the vicariate apostolic of SIERRA LEONE, where, the following year, Brésillac and most of his missionaries perished during a fever epidemic. Leadership then passed to Father Augustin Planque, whom Pius IX confirmed as the first superior general of the society. In 1861 a group of missionaries left for the newly erected vicariate of Dahomey, where successful foundations were made at Ouidah, Porto-Novo, and Lagos. The missionaries established stations along the West Coast of Africa, from Liberia to the Niger River. In 1875 Planque founded the Congregation of Our Lady of the Apostles to provide sisters to assist in establishing schools, orphanages, dispensaries, model farms, and workshops.

The society spread throughout Europe and the U.S.; in 1912 the Irish province was established; in 1923 the Dutch province; in 1927 Eastern France (Alsace); in 1941 the American province. The motherhouse was transferred to Rome in 1937. The U.S. provincialate is in Tenafly, NJ.

The society arrived in the U.S. in 1904, answering a call from Bp. Benjamin J. Keiley of Savannah, Ga., who had appealed to the society for priests to work among the African-Americans of his diocese. From the Savannah mission, begun in 1904 and directed by Rev. Ignatius Lissner, priests spread to various parishes throughout the U.S. In 1917, Lissner founded the FRANCISCAN HANDMAIDS OF THE MOST PURE HEART OF MARY, a congregation for black American sisters. In 1941, when the American province was canonically erected in Tenafly, N.J., he was named its first provincial.

Bibliography: R. F. GUILCHER, La Société des missions africaines: Ses origines, sa nature, sa vie, ses oeuvres (Lyon 1956). J. BONFILS, L'Oeuvre de Msgr. De Marion Brésillac en faveur du clergé local dans les missions de l'Inde au XIX^e siècle (Lyon 1959). M. J. BANE, Catholic Pioneers in West Africa (Dublin 1956); Heroes of the Hinterland (New York 1959). J. M. TODD, African Mission (London 1962).

[E. J. BIGGANE/EDS.]

AFTERLIFE

Although belief in a continuing or new life after death is widespread among the peoples of the world, there are profound differences among cultural traditions in conceptions of this afterlife; and even in those civilized societies in which a sharp division between the here and the hereafter is theologically postulated and conventionally accepted, there are personal variations in specific images of the afterlife. Despite the latter, two elements—belief in a final moral judgment of personal conduct in the world and belief in the specific existence of an afterworld distinct from this world—define Christian, Christian-influenced, and to a lesser degree Jewish and Islamic conceptions of the afterlife. For the developed doctrinal and theological concepts, see HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); HELL (THEOLOGY OF); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); PURGATORY. This article treats within the perspective of the comparative study of religion the differing conceptions found (1) in primitive societies, (2) in the Bible, and (3) in Greco-Roman religion.

1. In Primitive Societies

Generally speaking, primitive peoples do not share the twin assumptions of a final moral judgment of behavior in the world and the specific existence of an afterworld. Accordingly, most anthropologists would not agree with Wilhelm SCHMIDT's assumption of moral judgment and an associated belief in an afterworld as co-extensive with primitive MONOTHEISM. It seems more acceptable historically to reason that as society becomes increasingly secularized, and in the literal sense civilized, the sphere of moral action contracts and grows more complex; correlatively, the idea that the ultimate loci of the consequences of morality and immorality are in the afterworld emerges with great clarity.

Continuity of the Self. Primitive societies are, as Robert Redfield and Paul Radin have indicated, moral at their core; persons relate to each other in a moral nexus, not as contracting partners in a legal, technical, commercial, that is, civilized order. This sacred quality of primitive life is evident in the ritually celebrated cycles of birth, death, and rebirth of the person, of society, and of nature at large. In these primitive rites of passage and ritual dramas, persons may be, for example, conceived as dying to a given status in the world and being reborn into another status, but without destroying the continuity of self. The self is never merely reduced to the status; rather, it is enriched by experiencing the pain of internal growth and diversification. In a sense, the passage of the person through primitive societies can be understood as a progressive spiritualization. In the Winnebago medicine rite described by Radin, the goal is what Mircea Eliade has called the “perpetual regeneration of the initiate,” the “eternal return” to mythical origins, implying an abolition of time and a “reinstatement of the miraculous moment of creation” (Shamanism 319–20). Historical, progressive, lineal time, central to the modern scientific world view and expressed in the Hebraic and Christian cosmogonies (in the Christian context based on the historicity of Jesus), is not a primitive conception.

The cyclic and sacred character of primitive life is similarly evident in the common belief, as among the Anaguta of Northern Nigeria, that an infant is the reincarnation of an ancestral spirit in the grandparental generation; hence the person, who has literally died to the world, begins a new spiritual existence, is reborn. The critical point is that primitive society itself emerges as the arena of the original drama of creation and transcendence, of Eliade's “irruption of the sacred into the world” occurring in “primordial” time (The Sacred and the Profane 72). The passage through life takes on the aspect of a moral drama, culminating, as among the Winnebago people of Wisconsin, in the initiate's ultimate effort to grasp the meaning of creation and so win eternal life or rebirth. In these primitive rites, the forerunners of the more explicit and historically specific Christian Sacraments, that which Eliade terms a “nostalgia for Paradise” (Shamanism 508), for the instant of pure being, is evident.

Identity of World and Afterworld. It is clear that the antinomies life-death, natural-supernatural, sacred-profane, and spirit-flesh that weigh so heavily in civilized Christian thought are, in primitive societies, largely irrelevant. Life moves on all levels simultaneously. Ordinary events are suffused with sacred meaning, everything has personality; God, spirits, ancestors—dreamt of, seen, or felt—exist. The mode of primitive thinking is existentialist in the most comprehensive sense. Therefore, the split between this world and the afterworld is of little moment. Where conceptions of the afterlife are present, they typically assimilate, as Franz Boas put it, the “social life of the dead [to] . . . the living” (606–07). The deceased may maintain an active position in the kinship structure. The afterworld is, with minor exceptions, quite the same as this world; throughout North Asia, as elsewhere, the former is simply a mirror image of the latter. Frequently, the souls of the dead, on their passage to this inverted world, must pass over some obstacle or across a narrow bridge. But this seems to be related to the psychology of mourning and the consequent need for ritualizing the trauma of separation, rather than to a permanent journey to a distinctly conceived afterworld.

Despite the contradictions inherent in certain technical aspects of the primitive view of the afterlife (e.g., the social immediacy of souls versus their indeterminate existence in a “double” of this world), neither the idea of hell nor of other-worldly reward for moral behavior are important themes in primitive religions. This is true even where, as among the Anaguta, there is a clear-cut belief in an accessible supreme creator.

See Also: RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE).

Bibliography: F. BOAS, Race, Language and Culture (New York 1940). S. DIAMOND, “Plato and the Definition of the Primitive” in Culture in History: Essays in Honor of Paul Radin, ed. S. DIAMOND (New York 1960) 118–141; “The Search for the Primitive” in Man’s Image in Medicine and Anthropology, ed. I. GALDSTON (New York 1963) 62–115. M. ELIADE, The Sacred and the Profane, tr. W. R. TRASK (New York 1959; Torchbook 1961); Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, tr. W. R. TRASK (Bollingen Series 76; rev. ed. New York 1964). R. FIRTH, “Fate of the Soul” in Anthropology of Folk Religion, ed. C. M. CHARLES (pa. New York 1960). P. RADLIN, The World of Primitive Man (New York 1953; repr. 1960). R. REDFIELD, The Primitive World and Its Transformations (Ithaca, New York 1953). W. SCHMIDT, The Origin and Growth of Religion, tr. H. J. ROSE (2d ed. London 1935).

[S. DIAMOND]

2. In The Bible

The Israelites believed in some kind of ghostlike afterlife. According to their ideas, all the dead go to SHEOL, the nether world. Kings and slaves, old and young, “all go to one place” [Eccl 6.6; Ps 88(89).49; Jb 3.13–19; 30.23].

Location and Nature of the Abode of the Dead.

The Babylonians refer in their myths, e.g., the GILGAMESH EPIC, to the abode of the dead as a place under the earth or on the other side of the world sea. The dead reach it by descending into the earth or by traveling to the farthest point west. Before entering, they must cross the underground river or the “waters of death.” The Scriptures, too, refer to its locality by the direction in which the dead go, “down to Sheol” (Is 38.18; Ez 31.14; 1 Kgs 2.9). Even the New Testament localizes the abode of the dead in the depths of the earth (Mt 16.18; Lk 16.26; Acts 2.24, 27, 31; Rom 10.7; Rv 1.18; 20.13). According to mythico-dynamic thinking, this realm of death is constantly overflowing its banks. It is present wherever death exercises its sovereignty. Consequently, not only the grave [Ps 39(40).3; 54(55).24; 142(143).7; etc.] and the depth of the earth are linked with it [Ps 62(63).10; 138(139).8; Is 7.11], but also the sea [Ps 68(69).2, 16; Jon 2.4] and the desert (Jer 2.6, 31; Hos 2.5). These “three non-worlds” (J. Pedersen) are considered manifestations of death and belong to the realm of death. In each diminishing of life, the realm of death disrupts the world of the living. Thus illness [Ps 12(13); 21(22); 29(30); 87(88); etc.], captivity [Ps 141(142); 142(143)], persecution and hostility [Ps 17(18); 143(144)], misfortune, poverty, and hunger are all a foretaste of the descent into Sheol and abandonment by Yahweh. The sinner is already living in Sheol (Ps 9A.16–18).

The texts of the preexilic as well as most of the post-exilic books draw a most uninviting picture of Sheol. This realm of death is described as an eternal house (Eccl 12.5) with chambers and rooms (Prv 7.27) and gates [Ps 9A.14; 106(107).18; Jb 38.17; Sir 51.9; Wis 16.13; Is 38.10; Mt 16.18; Rv 1.18], a prison (Eccl 9.10) with bars (Jon 2.7) and bolts and bonds [Ps 115(116).3], the land of oblivion [Ps 87(88).13; 114(115).17], a land whence no one can return (Jb 7.9–10; 10.21; Prv 2.19; Sir 38.21). Sheol is called the “no more” (Is 38.11), destruction [Ps 87(88).12], dust [Ps 21(22).30; 29(30).10; 145(146).4; Is 26.19; Jb 17.16; Dt 12.2]. It is a place of horror [Ps 115(116).3], complete darkness [Jb 10.21–22; 17.13; 18.18; 38.17; Ps 87(88).7; 142(143).3], and remoteness from Yahweh. Even so, Satan does not have any influence in the abode of the dead, but Yahweh controls Sheol through His power [Ps 138(139).8; Jb 26.6; Prv 15.11; Is 7.11; Am 9.2].

State of the Dead in the Afterlife. In the Old Testament, death is conceived as the end of the entire living man. Yet this basic conception does not exclude a further existence of the deceased in the realm of the dead, as can be shown by the frequent mention of the dead, of graves, and of funeral customs. For the Israelite, life is life only as it is filled with joy, fortune, wealth, and Yahweh’s presence. [See LIFE, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE).] These marks of life are not present in the deceased, who are referred to as repa'im, the “weak” [Jb 26.5; Ps 87(88).11; Is 14.9] or as those who have descended into the pit [Ps 27(28).1; 29(30).4; Is 38.18; Ez 26.20; 31.14, 16]. In Sheol, the dead were thought to remain in a state of suspended animation, phantoms of the entire former living man, devoid of all power and vitality (Is 14.10). There is no activity (Eccl 9.10), no pleasure (Sir 14.11–17), no participation in or knowledge of what is happening on earth (Eccl 9.5; Jb 14.12–17; 21.21). In the older books of the Old Testament there is no doubt that the deceased are taken away from the vital union with Yahweh. In the nether world, no one praises God any more [Ps 6.6; 29(30).10; 113B(115).17; Sir 17.22–23; Is 38.18b].

However, the older, pessimistic concept of Sheol as the one place for all the dead, irrespective of the moral value of their lives, begins to change in the later books of the Old Testament. The doctrine of RETRIBUTION gradually leads to a distinction between the lot of the good and that of the wicked [Ez 32.17–32; Is 26.8, 14–21; 66.24; Ps 33(34).22–23; Wis 3.2–10, 19; Prv 14.32]. The just man has hope because there will be a reward for his work (2 Chr 15.7; Wis 4.7–17, 20). In the writings of the postexilic period, a real change in the attitude toward afterlife is observable in the expectancy of resurrection (see RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, 1). Israel's faith in its election by Yahweh and in His mercy and omnipotence, a faith that was justified by His constant intervention in the nation's history and by its experience of the loving union between God and the pious man, had to develop into a trust in Yahweh that amounted to an undocumented guarantee of resurrection and immortality (see IMMORTALITY, 3). This doctrine developed gradually [Jb 14.14–17; Hos 13.14; Is 25.9; 57.1–2; Wis 1.13–16; Ps 36(37).3–7; 64(65).5a], and some of its theological reasonings were worked out by Isaiah. One finds it in plain words in Dn 12.1–3; Jb 19.25–27; Is 26.19–21; 2 Mc 7.9–11, 14, 22–23, 34–36. However, even at the time of Christ, the doctrine of individual resurrection, which was explicitly rejected by the SADDUCEES, was not commonly accepted in Israel (Mt 22.23–34 and parallels; Acts 23.6–10). The New Testament hardly speaks about the state of the dead. The afterlife was of little concern for the primitive Christian community because the parousia of the Lord (see PAROUSIA, 1) and the fulfillment of the eschatological promises were really the heart of the Christian expectation for the future: union with Christ, experienced in faith and in the sacramental life, is but an anticipation of eschatological salvation; this union will be continued, intensified, and fulfilled in the life to come (Phil 1.21–26; etc.).

See Also: HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE); HELL (IN THE BIBLE); PURGATORY; ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; HADES; GEHENNA; PARADISE; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 508–10. P. ANTOINE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 2:1063–76. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:890–92. H. EISING, ibid. 9:391–93. H. J. KRAUS and B. REICKE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:403–06. A. JEREMIAS, Die babylonisch-assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode (Leipzig 1887). P. DHORME, “Le Séjour des morts chez les Babyloniens et les Hébreux,” Revue biblique 16 (1907) 59–78; “L’Idée de l’au-delà dans la religion hébraïque,” Revue de l’histoire des religions 123 (1941) 113–42. J. P. E. PEDERSEN, Israel: Its Life and Culture, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1926–40; repr. 1959). E. F. SUTCLIFFE, The Old Testament and the Future Life (2d ed. Westminster, Maryland 1947). O. KUSS, Der Römerbrief (Regensburg 1957) 1:241–75, with bibliography. A. FEUILLET, “Mort du Christ et mort du chrétien d’après les épîtres pauliniennes,” Revue biblique 66 (1959) 481–513. R. H. CHARLES, Eschatology (New York 1963).

[H. KÖSTER]

3. In Greco-Roman Religion

At the outset, from an extrinsic point of view, it should be observed that Greco-Roman beliefs on the life after death did not come from a revealed religion; they were not fixed once and for all in sacred books; nor were they dictated, maintained, and controlled as dogmas by a religious authority. They were the product of a slow and steady evolution that corresponded closely, although often with marked lags and uncertainties, to the trends or stages in the development of classical culture in general. Belonging as they did to the domain of tenacious traditions no less than to that of innate anxieties and forebodings, they were in no wise monolithic. New beliefs were superimposed on old conceptions without adjustment or elimination. Rites that belonged to an outmoded faith continued to be performed, even when no one any longer understood their precise bearing or original signification. Conceptions that were basically divergent were found not only side by side in a given cultural period but also together, apparently without conflict, in the soul of one and the same individual.

In General. The mingling of markedly diversified ethnic elements, especially in the great Hellenistic and Roman centers, created a mixture of opinions and beliefs that would be difficult to reduce to its primary components. In view of the shortcomings of official religion in the sphere of death and the hereafter, religious conceptions were so exposed to the strong influences of old wives' tales, superstitions, and black magic, that, in the Hellenistic Age and under the early empire, the educated classes abandoned themselves to unbelief, skepticism, or indifference. The masses, who were long isolated from the progress of philosophy and literature, were too deeply engulfed in the precarious conditions of material subsistence to attempt—at least on their own initiative—a separation of religious rites from superstitious practices or of sound religious sentiments from chimerical fictions.

Intrinsically, Greco-Roman views on the life beyond the grave were conditioned by the evolving ideas of ancient man respecting anthropology, the image of the universe, ethics, and human destiny. From the viewpoint of the earliest beliefs on death, the earliest notions on man were neither spiritual nor materialistic in the modern sense of the terms, but simply “human,” in the sense that man did not originally think of himself as a being composed of two “principles.” The human being was one, possessing a unity that death did not split into a “lifeless body” and a “surviving soul.” The shade in the lower world or the soul in heaven was most commonly only man in his entirety, viewed from the angle of his corporeal dematerialization. The development of the concept of man gradually arrived at an increasingly sharp dichotomy between body and soul. The explanation for the distinction is not to be sought in the different opinions that were held on the nature of the vital principle (breath, blood, heat, eidolon, spark), but rather, on the one hand, in the practice of incineration, which by the very fact that it destroyed the body emphasized the soul, and, on the other, in the influence exercised by dualistic currents in philosophy.

The ancient image of the world passed from the stage in which the earth was looked upon as a flat disk floating on the waters of Ocean to the lofty concept of a universe consisting of concentric spheres in harmonious movement, circumscribed by the sphere of the fixed stars. Yet it did not detach itself from the proud and touching idea that the earth, where man reigned as master, formed the center of the universe in question. Since what survived of man did not attain a degree of dematerialization that would have permitted it to escape the category of "place," the soul found a localization beyond the grave in the precise region to which the scientific image of the world and the ideas on the survival and nature of the soul suggested that it be assigned.

Ethical concepts acquired real influence only from the time when death ceased to be considered a mere passage to another world, where the lot of the dead man was simply a repetition of his social condition on earth. Notions of moral responsibility, of personal conscience, of virtuous conduct, and of sinful life could not make their appearance, however, before the individual as such became conscious of himself. From that time he had to abandon the idea that life was lived on earth only, and he had to submit to moral demands with their inevitable sanctions whereby he could hope, in an existence beyond the grave, for the stern justice and the strict recompense that he had vainly expected on earth.

Human destiny was at first confined within the narrow limits of a terrestrial life, from which man escaped only to the extent to which he, on his part, assured the continuity of his family, tribe, and community. When this restricted cadre was broken to the benefit of the emerging individual human person, the way was open for a concept of survival that, in combining the idea of a reward beyond the grave with the notion of an immortal soul, eventually far surpassed in both duration and intensity the possibilities of life on earth. Thus, the true life could begin or rebegin only after death, which, far from diminishing the significance of the human soul, sent it back to its heavenly and divine home.

Early and Classical Greek Beliefs. According to a notion that was held for many centuries, the dead man survived in his tomb. This notion was the source of the meticulous care devoted to funerals, funeral furniture and offerings, and the cult connected, on certain days of the year (e.g., at the Anthesteria at Athens), with the tomb of the dead individual or with the tombs of the dead in general. This was the source too, from Mycenaean times, of the family cult, and then of the community cult of dead men who were especially significant, namely, the "heroes." Subsequently, society, cut off from its ancestral tombs by emigration, apparently was not acquainted with either the cult of the dead or that of heroes. Hence arose the general Greek belief—reinforced by the authority of Homer—that the dead were all found together in the subterranean realm of Hades. In the absence of any moral perspective, Hades was not yet a place of retribution. Given the absolute value of life on earth, it was the exact negative replica of that life. It was marked by the absence of the positive features of earthly existence both on the physical plane—countryside, light, warmth, color, and sound—and on the psychological plane—security, freedom, and joy of existence. It was a life in which, by the law of repetition, shades continued the shadow of their earthly sojourn. However, Minoan religion had postulated the existence of Isles of the Blest, located at the end of the world beyond Ocean, to which the gods transported men of divine lineage while they were still alive. This transatlantic eden of living heroes was subsequently changed into the underworld Elysium of the blessed dead—most probably under the influence of the Mysteries of Eleusis. The initiates, in keeping with the law of repetition, continued to celebrate their joyous feasts in their new abode, while the noninitiates had to be satisfied with a shadowy existence in mire (ἐν βορβόρῳ). This, however, was not yet a form of punishment in the strict sense but a deprivation of true life.

Orphic Conceptions. From the 7th to the 6th century B.C., the Orphics, taking over certain popular beliefs regarding the hereafter, went beyond the ritual demands of the Eleusinian Mysteries and substituted for them prescriptions of moral purity. They spread the idea that the noninitiates would be punished in hell for their unworthy lives. Developing also a vague popular notion respecting the transmigration of the soul, the Orphics, from the 6th century, adopted the doctrine of metempsychosis. They maintained that the soul, divinely immortal and essentially independent of the body in which it was entombed (σῶμα, σῆμα), was able, by virtue of upright conduct in the course of successive incarnations, to free itself finally from all dependence on a carnal body. It could then live its own proper and true life in an Elysium, which Orphic "teaching" (except in Pindar) has not described in detail.

Pythagorean Conceptions. From the end of the 6th century, Pythagoreanism borrowed from the Orphic Mysteries its views on metempsychosis and the popular notion of a recompense after death. It thus contributed in its turn to the establishment of the belief according to which, in the lower world, Elysium was reserved for the pious, while Tartarus in Hades was a place of punishment for sinners.

Judgment, and Reward or Punishment in the Hereafter. In the classical period (5th and 4th centuries B.C.) the Orphico-Pythagorean belief in the punishment of Hades spread widely, as is evidenced by literature (Aristophanes, Plato) and art (vase paintings). The majority of people were hardly reached by the philosophical arguments of Plato, who sought to prove scientifically the immortality of the soul, but they were deeply influenced by the mythico-religious representations of a rewarding hereafter, of which they learned from mythology and the mysteries. Thus most probably c. 400 B.C., the idea of a iudicium post mortem took definite shape, as is known through the writings of Plato and the south Italian funerary vases of the 4th century. After death every soul appeared before a tribunal in Hades, where a college of three heroes (Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Aeacus) judged it according to its merits. Pious souls were rewarded with the Elysian dwellings as their abode; those of less perfect conduct had to undergo a kind of purgatory; and hardened sinners were condemned for all eternity to the punitive and exemplary tortures of Tartarus.

Hellenistic Beliefs. Plato's affirmation of the divine affinity and immortal nature of the soul ended in the skepticism of the New Academy, while EPICURUS, following the atomic theory of Democritus, taught that after death the soul, like the body, dissolved into atoms. The early Stoics recognized in their vital principle, which was related to the fiery ether, a vague form of survival, but it was quite impersonal and limited in time. However, with Posidonius and his Platonic leanings, the soul regained a true immortality. The mystery religions and the strong Orphico-Pythagorean beliefs in Magna Graecia promised a hereafter to their adherents. The aspects of this paradise were not so much an indication of a relatively low level of morality as they were a reflection of and transfer of deep longings for a felicity that was no longer threatened by trials or death. According to popular belief, the firmness of which was not influenced by skepticism or by the denials of the educated class, the hereafter was usually located under the earth. This fact is indicated by metrical epitaphs, curse tablets consigning their victims to the infernal deities, Orphic gold plates found in south Italy, and paintings on funerary vases from the same region, etc. Similarly, the allegorical interpretation of the punishments of Tartarus as worked out by the Pythagoreans had no effect whatever on the popular notions respecting reward or punishment in the next world.

Nevertheless, the progress of Hellenistic civilization brought about marked changes regarding the location of the hereafter. On the one hand, in accordance with the new scientific theories on the structure of the earth and the universe, Hades had to be moved either to the dark antipodes of the inhabited earth or to the non-illuminated hemisphere of the world. On the other hand, philosophico-religious teaching on the divine, and therefore heavenly, origin of the soul; astrological cosmology, which turned man's eyes heavenward; the increasing importance of the symbolism of fire and light; and the astral myths telling of great mortals being changed into stars, all combined to exert an influence on beliefs. Men gradually adopted the revolutionary idea that after death souls were changed into stars, or rather flew off to the starry sky. Under the Roman Empire, this lunisolar or astral immortality received support from solar pantheism. It would be wrong, however, to exaggerate the expansion of the new belief. Only limited circles were affected. In the leisured class as a whole, skepticism was the rule, whereas the lower strata of the population continued to stick to their old idea of an underworld Hades.

In Early Rome. Primitive Roman beliefs regarding the hereafter were very restricted in scope and character. The dead man was placed in a tomb that was built in the form of a house. He led there a kind of weak existence, and the living had to sustain him by funeral offerings. At the same time he was to be feared, as is evidenced by references to apparitions in dreams, to ghosts, to the role of the ahori or premature dead, and to necromancy. On certain days of the year, too, the dead had official access to the world of the living by the removal of the lapis manalis covering the entrance to the lower world (mundus). In so far as the dead man was a link in the long chain of his gens or clan, he belonged to the divine ancestral spirits, the Di Parentes. Mixed in the mass of the dead, he formed a part of the Lemures, spirits of the dead who were divided into Lares and Larvae according as they were benevolent or malevolent, respectively. Furthermore, these various connections were all brought under the head of Di Manes, to whom specific rites were assigned: the Parentalia, Lemuria, Larentalia, and later the Rosalia and Dies Violaes.

Before the 4th century B.C., the Romans do not seem to have been familiar with an infernal lower world common to all the dead nor with any form of punishment beyond the grave. From this time the Etruscans acquainted them with the Greek representation of Hades, but in the form that the terrifying Etruscan demonology had given it. In the course of the 3d century B.C., Magna Graecia invested this Etrusco-Roman world of the dead, Orcus, with all its rich infernal mythology and with all the Orphico-Pythagorean acquisitions to which the Greek genius had given birth. Through the direct contact between the Greco-Oriental and Roman civilizations, all these ideas and beliefs became more and more thoroughly acclimated at Rome. They received a quasi-sacred and definitive expression in the 6th book of Vergil's Aeneid.

Greco-Roman Beliefs. From the end of the republic, the Greco-Oriental and Roman worlds were fused into a great cultural commonwealth in which the active, general circulation of religious ideas occasioned the flourishing of various forms of syncretistic religion. Still, old conceptions persisted, whether they took on a new life under their old patrons (the various philosophies), whether they adjusted themselves to the form and organization of religious practices coming from the East (the mystery cults), or whether they simply maintained themselves against the winds and waves of innovation, firmly anchored as they were in the hearts of the masses (popular beliefs).

With regard to the concern of philosophy with the problem of the hereafter, Neo-Pythagoreanism (1st century B.C.–2d century A.D.) and Neoplatonism (c. A.D. 250–c. 500)—despite some Oriental elements—represented basically currents and ideas of Greek origin. According to the Neo-Pythagoreans, souls, on being freed from the body, escaped into the atmosphere, where they were purified by the winds before they re-entered their original home, the starry spheres. The Neoplatonists taught that the soul, buffeted in some way between the material many and the spiritual One, had the duty to apply itself to the noble task of regaining suprasensible divine life. The syncretistic teachings of the Hermetic literature and of Gnosticism (2d and 3d centuries A.D.) held in common that the soul, having once been cast into matter, could return to its heavenly source only through “true knowledge.” Besides the old mysteries, whose promise of immortality was reinforced through contact with Orphico-Pythagorean and Neoplatonic elements, various cults, under a flexible form of mystery religion probably borrowed from the Greek mysteries, honored divinities imported from the East (Cybele-Attis, Isis-Osiris, Sabazios, Mithras), and they attracted the intensely emotional devotion of the masses, among whom the earlier native stock was being submerged by cosmopolitan elements.

It is desirable, however, to give a just evaluation of the expansion of the philosophico-religious doctrines, which appealed strictly to the intellectual aristocracy insofar as it had not limited its hopes to the immortality of fame, and also to appraise the content of the message of salvation afforded by the mystery religions. Several lofty ideas that belonged to philosophy and the mysteries—freedom from death of the body by resurrection, deliverance from the death of the soul by spiritual rebirth and divine illumination, deification, divine filiation—had little or no influence on the rank and file of people before Christianity spread among them. Such ideas acquired their real efficacy, expansion, depth, and, in a certain measure, their existence only through the victorious progress of Christianity.

The popular conceptions, which are so vividly revealed by the metrical funeral inscriptions, indicate that common people were practically impervious to the Pythagorean idea that placed Hades in the sublunary region or in the moon itself, and that they had no interest in the system of solar pantheism or in the Gnostic teachings on the fall and ascent of souls through the planetary spheres. The old believers clung obstinately to the cult of the dead at the tomb and to the idea of a lower world in which the shades lived the barest kind of existence in darkness, although they granted that in rare cases the dead, as a reward for a pious life, enjoyed in the Elysian Fields a happy existence of eternal feasting. However, as the gods—and light—had their abode in the heavens, the blessed Hereafter tended to be moved to the celestial heights. There the elect received as their portion the immortal happiness that the philosophicoreligious teachings, the mysteries of Gnostic coloring, and imperial apotheosis had offered to a select few. Hell, in the modern sense, remained fixed in the traditional lower world; its punishments, to which Christianity made its contribution (e.g., in the Apocalypse of Peter), attained a diversity and refinement that emanated less from a conscience motivated by the unfulfilled desire for perfect justice than from the lower level of human thinking, over which neither the noblest pagan ideas nor the Christian gospel of salvation had effective control.

See Also: CRETAN-MYCENAEAN RELIGION; ETRUSCAN RELIGION; GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS); GREEK RELIGION; MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL; NEOPLATONISM; NEO-PYTHAGOREANISM; ORPHISM; ROMAN RELIGION; STOICISM.

Bibliography: J. T. ADDISON, Life Beyond Death in the Beliefs of Mankind (Boston and New York 1932). F. CUMONT, Lux perpetua (Paris 1949). A. DIETERICH, Nekyia (2d ed. Leipzig 1913). L. R. FARNELL, Greek Hero Cults and Ideas of Immortality (Oxford 1921). F. HEILER, Unsterblichkeitsglaube und Jenseitshoffnung in der Geschichte der Religionen (Munich 1950). O. KERN, Die Religion der Griechen, 3 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1963). K. LATTE, Römische Religionsgeschichte (Munich 1960). R. A. LATTIMORE, Themes in Greek and Latin Epitaphs (2d ed. pa. Urbana, Illinois 1962). M. P. NILSSON, Geschichte der griechischen Religion, 2 v. (2d ed. Munich 1955–61). W. F. OTTO, Die Manen oder von den Urformen des Totenglaubens (3d ed. Darmstadt 1962). C. PASCAL, Le credenze d'oltretomba nelle opere letterarie dell' antichità classica, 2 v. (Catania 1912). G. PFANNMUELLER, Tod, Jenseits und Unsterblichkeit (Basel 1953). E. ROHDE, Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality among the Greeks, tr. W. B. HILLIS from 8th German ed. (New York 1925).

[G. SANDERS]

AGABUS, ST.

An early Judaeo-Christian endowed with the charism of prophecy. Agabus is first mentioned in Acts 11.27–28, where he is spoken of as accompanying a group of prophets who journeyed from Jerusalem to Antioch. There he predicted that a famine would soon overtake the world. Luke notes the fulfillment of his prophecy in the reign of the Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54). This is most probably the famine of Judea that Josephus describes in Ant. 3.15.3; 20.2.5; 5.2. As a result of Agabus's prediction, the Antiochian community collected alms for the Jerusalem Church, which had become impoverished through its charity to the poor. Agabus is almost certainly the same prophet who met Paul at Caesarea c. A.D. 58 and, through a symbolic action, predicted that Paul would be imprisoned in Jerusalem and given over to the Gentiles (Acts 21.10–11). In the Eastern Church Agabus is venerated as a martyr whose feast day is celebrated on March 8; in the West, he is included as a confessor in the Roman Martyrology on February 13.

Bibliography: A. WIKENHAUSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1314; Die Apostelgeschichte und ihr Geschichtswert (Münster 1921) 407–409. B. H. THROCKMORTON, The Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed. (Nashville 1962) 1:52. K. S. GAPP, “The Universal Famine under Claudius,” Harvard Theological Review 28 (1935) 258–265.

[J. A. GRASSI]

AGAGIANIAN XV, GREGORY PETER

Cardinal and Catholic Armenian patriarch; b. Akhaltsikhe, Russian Georgia, Sept. 18, 1895; d. Rome, May 16, 1971. Agagianian's intellectual gifts were recognized early, and at 11 he was sent to Rome for education at the Urbanian Athenaeum. He received doctorates in philosophy, theology, and Canon Law.

After ordination in 1917, Agagianian taught for two years in Rome and then from 1919 to 1921 did pastoral work among Armenian Catholics in Tiflis, Georgia. He was recalled to Rome and appointed vice rector of the Pontifical Armenian College, becoming rector in 1932. He also taught at the Urbanian. In 1935 he was consecrated titular bishop of Comana and appointed papal emissary to Lebanon. In 1937 the Synod of Catholic Armenian Bishops elected him patriarch of the Catholic Armenians and catholicos of Cilicia, near Beirut. Baptized Lazarus A., he assumed the name Gregory, along with Peter, which Catholic Armenian patriarchs take as a symbol of loyalty to Rome.

In 1946 Pope Pius XII made Agagianian a cardinal. In 1958 he became prelate of the Congregation for the

Cardinal Agagianian, 1961, Rome. (© David Lees/CORBIS)

Propagation of the Faith, and in 1960, prefect, holding the post until his retirement in 1970. As head of the Vatican congregation concerned with mission work he traveled widely, and because of this and his duties on other Vatican congregations and commissions he resigned his office as patriarch. He was a key figure at the Second Vatican Council, serving as a presiding officer and helping to draw up the missionary decree Ad Gentes.

[T. EARLY]

AGAPE

Technical name for a love feast in the early Christian Church.

Origin of the Term. The verb ἀγαπάω (to love) was common in classical Greek, but the derivative noun ἀγάπη was unknown. Borrowed from the popular Egyptian dialect, the noun occurred in the Septuagint (LXX) version of the Scriptures (e.g., Jer 2.2; Ct 3.5, 10). In the NT it was used to designate a beneficent love, a predilection of God for men, or a love of men for God or of men among themselves, i.e., a fraternal charity. In all three meanings it was suitable for appropriation by the early Christians as a technical term or proper name for various forms of fraternal meals of a semi-liturgical nature. Although not without certain analogies in the Jewish and pagan world of antiquity (e.g., The Letter of Aristeas 187–300; the sacred meals of the QUMRAN COMMUNITY, Manual of Discipline 1QS 6.2–5; Plato’s Symposium; and the meals of Greek religious fraternities), the Christian love feasts had as their specific and basic purpose a practical imitation of Christ’s love for men (Lk 14.12–14; 22.26–27) by expressing and fostering fraternal love. The poor and widows were invited to share in both the charitable agapae and those celebrated to honor the dead and the martyrs. Since they were inspired by Christ’s love for men, the agapae were related also to the Eucharist, even when they did not include a Eucharistic banquet. Jesus had instituted the Eucharist at the LAST SUPPER in the form of a banquet at which His love attained its full perfection (Jn 13.1), and it was at Eucharistic feasts that the union of Christians in Christ’s love was most concretely manifested (1 Cor 10.16–17).

Agape in the New Testament. If agape is understood in a wide sense, many of the communal meals in the NT may be classified as love feasts. The only certain instance of the use of agape as a technical term for love feast in the NT is found in the Epistle of St. Jude, v. 12, “These men are stains [or hidden reefs] at your love feasts, carousing impudently and feeding themselves alone.” (The plural form ἀγάπαις occurs here for the first time in extant Greek literature and for the only time in the NT.) However, in a passage suggesting literary dependence, 2 Pt 2.13 reads, “These men are stains and blemishes, reveling in their deceits [or lusts, ἀπάταις, instead of ἀγάπαις, which occurs in some MSS as a variant reading], while they carouse with you” (author’s translations).

According to Acts 2.42–47 the primitive Jerusalem community habitually practiced the breaking of bread, an early name for the Eucharist. This Eucharistic rite was probably the essential part of a fraternal meal that recalled and continued the meals of Jesus’ public ministry (Mk 6.34–44; Jn 12.1–2), the Last Supper (at which Jesus had gathered with His disciples according to Jewish custom in a ḥābūrā, a religious fellowship, for the PASSOVER Meal), and the joyful, post-Resurrection feasts with the risen Lord (Lk 24.30–35, 41–43; Jn 21.9–13; Acts 1.4). It was quite fitting and convenient that such feasts, since they reenacted Christ’s loving and victorious presence among His disciples, should have included the Eucharist, as a general rule. In Acts 6.1–6, however, the “daily ministrations” to widows was simply a work of mercy rather than a liturgical service that included prayer, preaching (the service of the word), and, very likely, the Eucharist.

That abuses occurred when such fraternal feasts were being adapted for recently converted Greeks is clear from 1 Cor 11.17–34. Drunkenness, factions, and dishonoring of the poor at these meals led St. Paul to complain that the sacred meaning of the Lord’s Supper was being ignored and corrupted; he insisted on the reform of such gatherings (on their complete elimination according to W. Goossens and L. Thomas) and reemphasized the traditional doctrine about the Eucharist: it was a proclamation of the value of the Lord’s death in view of His final PAROUSIA (v. 26). Their meals were to be sober and sacred feasts, convoked not to satisfy hunger (v. 34), but to express fraternal love: “Wherefore, my brethren, when you come together to eat [the meal that signifies your unity], wait for one another” (v. 33). In this way they would not “. . . despise the church of God and put to shame the needy” and would merit Paul’s commendation (v. 22). A communal breaking of bread at Troas is also described in Acts 20.7–11.

Agape in the Post-Apostolic Church. The letter of Pliny the Younger to Trajan (10.96, c. A.D. 112) describes a Christian fraternal meal, at which food of a “common and innocent” kind was eaten. The quoted words do not necessarily exclude an accompanying Eucharist. In the DIDACHE (ch. 9–10) certain prayers have been interpreted as referring either to the Eucharist, or an agape, or both together, a fact that indicates the rites were similar and not mutually exclusive. The phrase, “to celebrate an agape,” of St. IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH’S Epistle to the Smyrnaeans (8.2) refers apparently to a love feast that was related to, but distinct from, the Eucharist. Other Ignatian references to agape as a meal (e.g., Smyrn. 6.2; 7.1) are uncertain. TERTULLIAN (Apology ch. 39, late 2d century), after speaking of monetary contributions for the relief of the poor, gives the name agape to a meal of which the main purpose, probably on private initiative, was such relief. In this most celebrated description of an agape, prayers were said, food was eaten in moderation, the Scriptures were read, and hymns were sung, although there is no mention of an officiating cleric. In the First Apology of St. JUSTIN MARTYR (ch. 65–67) it is the Eucharist itself, not an agape, that served as the occasion for social relief of the needy. An agape for widows is mentioned in the Apostolic Tradition of HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME (early 3d century), as well as in the dependent Canons of Hippolytus (183). Other forms of agapae in which the poor could share were adapted from pagan funeral feasts, such as those on the Roman feast of the Parentalia held in honor of the dead, or on the feasts of martyrs (Canons of Hippolytus 169). The so-called fractio panis (breaking of bread) scene of the Cappella Greca of the catacomb of Priscilla illustrates a Christian funeral banquet. Such a banquet symbolized the heavenly meal desired for the dead in the place of peace and refreshment (REFRIGERIUM) and recalled Jesus’ words, “. . . that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom'' (Lk 22.29–30). The Church defended the legitimacy of such practices (St. Augustine, Contra Faustum Manichaeum 20.21; De civitate Dei 8.27), but abuses often caused their regulation or suppression (St. Augustine, Conf. 6.2; Council of Laodicea cc.27–28). After the 4th century, social changes and the growth of ecclesiastical organization brought about the gradual disappearance of the agape.

The fragmentary nature of the early texts and their difficulty of interpretation make it impossible to trace a really systematic view of the history of the agape. As seen from the foregoing considerations, the practice seems to have followed few general rules and differed widely according to the various local churches. Never a universal custom, it was replaced by more efficient, if less personal, manifestations of Christian charity.

Bibliography: B. REICKE, Diakonie, Festfreude und Zelos in Verbindung mit der altchristlichen Agapenfeier, Uppsala Universitets Årsskrift No. 5 (1951), a fundamental work with many penetrating insights. C. SPICQ, Agapè: Prolégomènes à une étude de théologie néo-testamentaire (Studia hellenistica 10; Louvain 1955), presenting the pre-Christian background of the term. W. GOOSSENS, Les Origines de l'Eucharistie: Sacrement et sacrifice (Paris 1931) 127–146. DENIS-BOULET, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui, et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947) 1:192–193. J. A. JUNGSMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:180–181. J. LEIPOLDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:169–170. L. THOMAS, Dictionnaire de la Bible supplement, ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928) 1:134–153. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:775–848.

[C. BERNAS]

AGAPE, SS.

The name of several saints honored as martyrs in the early Church. The name Agape (Charity) is sometimes confused with Agatha.

Agape (Charity), daughter of St. Sophia (Wisdom), is associated with SS. Pistis (Faith) and Elpis (Hope) and, according to a seventh- or eighth-century passio written by John the Priest, she was allegedly put to death at Rome during the persecution of Hadrian. The ITINERARIA located her grave on the Via Aurelia, while the Notula of Olea of Monza placed it on the Via Appia. Ansa, wife of King Desiderius of the Lombards (756–774), gave her relics to the monastery of St. Giulia in Brescia.

Feast: Aug. 1 in the Roman Church; Sept. 17 in the Greek Church.

Agape of Thessalonika, honored with her sisters SS. Chionia and Irene in the Syrian Breviary on April 2, in the Roman Martyrology on April 3, and among the Greeks on April 16. The sisters, after a legal process under the Roman prefect Dulcitus on April 1, 304, were allegedly burned to death for refusing to eat food sacrificed to the Roman gods and for hiding Christian books. Irene survived her sisters and companions for two days. The Basilica of Thessalonika was erected in their honor. The acts of the three judicial processes have been preserved.

Agape, associated with St. Marina, is mentioned in the Syrian martyrology as having been martyred at Antioch on March 11, 411. According to later Spanish legends she is said to have been put to death with the Bithynian martyrs in Spain during the Decian persecution, but this story resulted from a misreading of the Roman martyrology by the Spanish hagiographer Galestinus.

Agape of Terni, mentioned in the Roman martyrology as a virgin and martyr for Feb. 15. A protégé of Bishop Saint Valentine of Terni, she was reputedly beheaded in the Aurelian persecution on Feb. 15, 273, and her body buried on a spot known as Inter Turres. In 550 Bishop Anastasius erected a church there in her honor, confiding the body to a Benedictine monastery. In 1174 the church was in ruins; St. Agape's head was then sent to Rome and kept in the Basilica of the Apostles.

St. Jerome's martyrology mentions another St. Agape for Aug. 8, supposedly honored at Trier, but there is no mention of her in the liturgical books of the diocese.

Bibliography: A. FRUTAZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:182; G. DE TERVARENT, Analecta Bollaniana 68:419–423; "Passio" in Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 2966–73. A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et du géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:876–877. S. SALAVILLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et du géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:875–876. H. DELEHAYE, "Les Martyrs d'Interamna," Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétiennes 1 (1911) 161–168; Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae (Brussels 1902) 605–606. F. DE' CAVALIERI, ed., "Nuove note agiografiche: Martyrium SS. Agapes, Irenes et Chiones," Studi e Testi 9 (1902) 1–20.

[E. G. RYAN]

AGAPETUS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: May 13, 535 to April 22, 536. The successor of Pope JOHN II was the archdeacon Agapetus, member of an old Roman family and the son of Gordianus, priest of the titular church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo. He appears to have been the candidate of the party that had supported DIOSCORUS some years before. Immediately after the election, a council was held, and the document that Pope BONIFACE II had forced the supporters of Dioscorus to sign was solemnly burned. This was a conciliatory gesture that was much appreciated by the clergy. So too was his repudiation of the uncanonical attempts of recent popes to appoint their own successors. He took a hard line against Arianism, even forbidding converts from Arianism to serve as clergy.

Since Queen Amalasantha had placed herself under imperial protection, Justinian I decided to use her assassination by King Theodatus (535) as an excuse for liquidating Ostrogothic rule in Italy. He ordered his commanders to occupy Sicily and Dalmatia. King Theodatus threatened to put to death all the Roman senators, with their wives and children, unless the emperor desisted from his purpose. Under this pressure Agapetus agreed to the king's request to go to Constantinople and persuade the emperor to give up his plans. The Byzantines gave him a triumphant reception, but the emperor ignored his request to cancel the invasion. Nothing could deflect the emperor from his designs, and BELISARIUS began the reconquest of Italy in July 536. During his brief stay in Constantinople, however, Agapetus was able to accomplish a few successes. Either shortly before or soon after his arrival, he was informed by some of the clergy that Patriarch ANTHIMUS, installed on the throne of Constantinople through the influence of Empress THEODORA (1), was tainted by the Monophysite heresy. When the fact came to light, Agapetus ordered the patriarch's deposition on the grounds that he had been uncanonically translated from the See of Trebizond to Constantinople. The emperor supported this order. Agapetus then secured the election of an orthodox patriarch, MENNAS, whom he personally consecrated (March 13, 536). His firm stand strengthened the Chalcedonian cause in Constantinople.

Agapetus praised the profession of faith that the emperor submitted to him, but refused to acknowledge the right of laymen to teach in the Church. Shortly afterward he became ill and died. Before expiring, he begged the emperor to summon a general council to condemn Anthimus and submitted to him a petition from the monasteries of Constantinople, Syria, and Palestine, urging that the Monophysites, protected by Empress Theodora, should be expelled from Constantinople. But Theodora's influence upon her husband was immense, and nothing came of this request. The pope's body was sealed in a leaden coffin and taken back to Rome, where he was buried in the portico of St. Peter's. Agapetus converted his own family house on the Clivus Scauri into a library, which was intended to form part of a Roman university he hoped to found with the help of CASSIODORUS. The library was later incorporated by Pope GREGORY I in his own monastery nearby on the Caelian. Six genuine letters of Agapetus are extant.

Feast: April 22 and Sept. 20.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Strasbourg 1961) 1693. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 66:35–76. Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 1:287–289; 3:91. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1217–18. F. DVORNIK, Byzance et la primauté romaine (Paris 1964). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:25–26. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:444–445; 627. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 58–59. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 126–127.

[J. CHAPIN]

AGAPETUS II, POPE

Pontificate: May 10, 946 to December 955; b. Rome. He was lauded in contemporary sources as “sanctissimus” and as a man “of wondrous sanctity.” Interested in monastic reform, Agapetus, with the help of the despot of Rome, Alberic II of Spoleto, established a Cluniac foundation at ST. PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE-WALLS with monks from the Abbey at GORZE. Despite the political preponderance of Alberic in Rome, Agapetus—at least at the beginning of his pontificate—made some notable decisions demonstrating independent papal action and real authority. A struggle over the archbishop of REIMS had developed when Count Herbert of Vermandois appointed his five-year-old son Hugh as archbishop. Raoul, one of the later Carolingians, conquered Reims and appointed the monk Artaud archbishop. At first the pope supported Artaud; then deceived by forged documents, he turned to Hugh. But when several synods (Verdun, 947; Mousson, 948) and especially the council of Ingelheim (948) called by OTTO I and presided over by Marinus, papal legate, decided in favor of Artaud, Agapetus confirmed their decisions at a council in Rome (949). The pope in effect ratified Otto's wide powers of administration over Danish bishops in a bull of 948 extending the jurisdiction of the metropolitan of Hamburg over Denmark. Within Germany he likewise gave Otto broad jurisdiction over monasteries and sent Otto's brother, Abp. BRUNO OF COLOGNE, the PALLIUM, which he permitted Bruno to wear at will. But in spite of the pope's desires to crown Otto I emperor during Otto's Italian expedition (951–952) to rescue Adelaide, dispossessed widow of Lothair II of Italy, Alberic would have none of it. Alberic effectively controlled Rome until his death in 954, and Agapetus played a continually diminishing role in Roman affairs. In the pope's presence Alberic had the nobles and clergy swear they would elect his son Octavian (later JOHN XII) as Agapetus's successor. Octavian succeeded to the temporal government of Rome in 954 and awaited only the pope's death to gain the papacy itself. Agapetus was buried in the Lateran basilica.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 2:245. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Graz 1956)1:459–463. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 4.2:757–788. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 4:224–240. J. P. KIRSCH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:890–892. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) 2:357–362, 366. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). A. ERLER, “Die Synode von Ingelheim [948] und die Kirchengeschichte” in In memoriam Adalbert Erler (1994) 145–150. E. D. HEHL, “Erzbischof Ruttbert von Trier und der Reimser Streit,” in Deus qui mutat tempora. Menschen und Institutionen im Wandel des Mittelalters. Festschrift für Alfons Becker zu seinem 65. Geburtstag (1987) 55–68. F. LOTTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 125–126.

[C. M. AHERNE]

AGAPIOS OF HIERAPOLIS

Bishop of Hierapolis in Syria (Manbij, northeast of Aleppo), whose Arabic name was Mahbūb ibn Qustantin, a contemporary of EUTYCHIOS OF ALEXANDRIA (877–940), whom he outlived by some years. His general history, Kitāb al-'Unwān (Book of the Title), for which he is known, is quite independent of the Annals of Eutychios. It covered the period from the beginning of the world to A.D. 941 or 942. The original text is no longer extant, however, beyond the year 776 or 777, the second year of the caliphate of al-Mahdī. For the ancient history of Christianity Agapios uses, without criticism, a great deal of the apocryphal and popular legendary literature. For later ecclesiastical and profane history, he uses the Syrian sources, including the Maronite chronographer Theophilus of Edessa (785), whose World Chronicle was amply exploited by Agapios in explaining the downfall of the dynasty of the Umayyads and the rise of the 'Abbāsids. He knew also the Church History of Eusebius of Caesarea, which he uses indirectly by short citations. His special merit lies, however, in his sometimes unidentifiable source materials, offering at times historical details no longer preserved in other extant sources. Most important are his list of the Eastern metropolitans, and his references to the famous text of Papias of Hierapolis in Phrygia (whom he does not cite by name) concerning the four Gospels. Agapios is MICHAEL I THE SYRIAN's source on Bardesanes.

Bibliography: AGAPIOS OF HIERAPOLIS, Kitāb al-'Unwān, ed. and French tr. A. VASILIEV, Patrologia orientalis 5:565–691; 7:459–591; 8:399–547. C. KARALEVSKY, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:899–900. G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur 2:39–41.

[L. MALOUF]

AGATHA, ST.

Martyr and patroness of Catania, Sicily; d. possibly in the Decian persecution, 249 to 251. The martyrology of Carthage and that of St. Jerome mention her death on February 5. Legend alleges that she was sent to a brothel to induce her to repudiate her faith. After the removal of her breasts, the Apostle Peter is supposed to have appeared and cured her; but the next day she died in prison of new cruelties. From the sixth century, claims were made for Palermo as the place of her birth; but the older versions of the legend testify for Catania. Her passio is recorded in many Greek and Latin versions, but the Greek seems to be the oldest.

The cult of St. Agatha quickly spread beyond Sicily, and her name was inscribed in the Canon of the Roman Mass. It is probable that her remains were translated to Constantinople. Pope Symmachus had a church erected in her honor on the Via Aurelia; and Gregory I (d. 604) reconsecrated an Arian church as S. Agata dei Goti in her name. Her intervention was credited with stilling an eruption of Mt. Etna the year after her burial; and in the Middle Ages, particularly in south Germany, bread, candles, fruits, and letters were blessed in her name to ward off destruction by fire. The popular merrymaking that accompanied her cult in Sicily was probably related to ancient pagan festivals, but the claim that her cult prolonged that of Isis is untenable. She is considered the patron of foundrymen, miners, Alpine guides, and nurses. Since the fourteenth century she has been depicted with her severed breasts on a plate, with a candle, or with a house in flames.

Feast: Feb. 5.

Bibliography: S. D'ARRIGO, Il martirio di sant'Agata nel quadro storico del suo tempo, 2 v. (Catania 1988). V. J. CAMILLERI, Saint Agatha: an archaeological study of the ancient monuments at St Agatha's building complex, crypt, catacombs, church, and museum (Rabat, Malta 1984). B. KÖTTING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:183–184. H. DÖRRIE, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1970) 1:179–184.

[P. ROCHE]

AGATHO, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: June 27, 678 to Jan. 10, 681. He helped conclude the struggle against MONOTHELITISM, supporting the council convened by CONSTANTINE IV POGONATUS, 680–681 (see CONSTANTINOPLE III, COUNCIL OF). Agatho achieved fullest Western participation through local synods in Milan, England, Gaul, and in Rome (Easter, 680), where 125 bishops, mostly from Italy, met and appointed three legates to Constantinople. Presiding over the council, which also condemned HONORIUS I, they signed its acts and delivered a letter from the Roman synod describing the lack of clerical education resulting from poverty in the western Church and the consequent obligations upon clerics to support themselves. A second letter from Agatho to Constantine IV, inspired by the Tome of LEO I, combined clear teaching with a firm proclamation of Roman infallibility. He likewise praised Constantine's toleration of Monothelites. Agatho upheld Bishop WILFRID OF YORK's appeal to Rome against his metropolitan's unexpected division of Wilfrid's diocese, sent the archcantor John to introduce the Roman liturgy into England, secured the remission of an imperial tax on newly elected popes, and regularized the See of RAVENNA.

Feast: Jan. 10.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 1:350–358. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Graz 1956) 1:238–240; 2: 699, 741. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 3.1:475–484. J. P. KIRSCH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 1:916–918. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.2:23–48. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 1:332–339; 545. S. BROCK, Syriac Perspectives on Late Antiquity (London 1984). H. CHADWICK, “Theodore of Tarsus and Monotheism” in Logos. Festschrift für Luise Abramowski zum 8. Juli 1993 (Berlin/New York 1993) 534–44. A. CHAVASSE, “Le sanctoral et le temporal grégoriens, vers 680. Distribution et origine des pièces utilisées,” Ecclesia: orans 3 (Rome 1986) 263–88. M. GIBBS, “The Decrees of Agatho and the Gregorian Plan for York” Speculum 48 (Cambridge, MA 1973) 213–46. C. O'DONNELL, Ecclesia: A Theological Encyclopedia of the Church (Collegeville MN 1996). I. G. ROSESCU, “Principes et dispositions d'organisation et de discipline dans les canons du VI^e Concile oecuménique [roumain],” Studii Theologica Varsaviensia (Warsaw 1983) 64–78. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (1993). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 77–78.

[C. M. AHERNE]

AGE (CANON LAW)

Age is one of the elements, along with mental condition, residence, legal relationship, and rite, which qualify the status of a “person.” It is the intent of the Roman Catholic Church in its 1983 Code of Canon Law to harmonize the provisions of ecclesiastical law with those of civil law regarding age.

The 1983 code considers an “adult” to be anyone who has completed 18 years of age (c. 97.§1). Those who have completed seven years of age until their eighteenth year of age are considered to be “minors.” An “infant” is one who has not yet completed seven years of age (c. 97.§2). This same canon of the code decrees that a “minor” is presumed to have the use of reason, while an “infant” is not responsible for his or her actions.

Provisions concerning age appear frequently in the code. These provisions are governed by the principle that the more difficult the office or state of a person, the greater the maturity that is required. For example, a bishop must be 35 years of age (c. 378.§1,3) as must the diocesan administrator (c. 425.§1). However, the vicar general of a diocese (c. 478.§1) and the judicial vicar (c. 1420.§4) need be only 30 years of age. A priest may be ordained at age 25 (c. 1031.§1), and a religious may make final profession of vows at 21 (c. 658.§1).

The new code states the minimum age for reception of the Sacrament of Confirmation, but grants to the conference of bishops the jurisdiction to determine the actual age for reception of this sacrament (c. 891.§1). The 1983 code also gives the minimum age for valid marriage as 14 years for a woman and 16 years for a man (c. 1083.§1), but, again, permits the conference of bishops to establish a higher age for the licit celebration of marriage (c. 1083.§2).

The law of abstinence binds those who have completed their fourteenth year until completion of their fifty-ninth year, while the law of fasting now binds those who are “adults” through their fifty-ninth year of age (c. 1252).

[G. CARIE]

AGE (IMPEDIMENT TO MARRIAGE)

In legislating for the minimum age at which her subjects are capable of a valid marriage, the Church declares that males must have completed their 16th year and females their 14th year of age (Codex iuris canonici c. 1083 §1; CCEO c. 800). Nonage is, therefore, one of the diriment impediments to marriage in the Latin Church as well as in the Eastern Churches; it has its origin in Roman law that required puberty for iustae nuptiae. Natural law imposes no such impediment of nonage; it requires only that the parties be capable of marriage and have sufficient psychological maturity to give matrimonial consent (cf. Codex iuris canonici c. 1095; CCEO c. 818). Since the impediment of nonage established in canon law is a merely ecclesiastical law, it binds only in marriages involving those baptized into the Catholic Church or received into it (Codex iuris canonici c. 11; CCEO c. 1490). The unbaptized are, however, bound by a reasonable and just impediment of nonage established by the competent civil authority. In addition, non-Catholic Eastern Christians are bound by an impediment of nonage in their own law (CCEO c. 780 §1, 2^o). As a matter of ecclesiastical law, this impediment can be dispensed by a local ordinary if the occasion and sufficiently grave causes warrant it. In the Latin Church, conferences of bishops may establish a higher age for the licit celebration of marriage in their territories (Codes iuris canonici c. 1083 §2). While regulating the minimum age for a valid marriage, the Catholic Church establishes no age after which a marriage would be invalid.

Bibliography: J. C. O'DEA, "The Matrimonial Impediment of Nonage" Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 205 (Washington 1944). J. ABBO and J. HANNAN, The Sacred Canons 2:1067. J. P. BEAL et al., New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000) 1283–1284.

[J. D. MCGUIRE]

AGENNĒTOS

In the early formative period of Christian doctrine prior to NICAEA I (325) ἀγέννητος was a Greek adjective employed to signify the self-existence or uncreatureliness of the Godhead. And ἀγέννητος (spelled with two ν's) was indeed a term used in the philosophy of the day to designate God's self-existence. Etymologically, however, the adjective with the two ν's would not have meant self-existence or uncreatureliness—as ἀγέννητος (spelled with one ν)—but ungenerateness.

Now if, regardless of etymology, the sense is to be uncreated, ἀγέννητος must be said of both Father and Son. But if, on the other hand, etymology is restored and the sense is ungenerated, then ἀγέννητος can be said only of the Father. For obviously, the Son, precisely as Son, is generated from the Father. ARIANISM, however, almost systematically blurred this difference: first, by using the term in the etymological sense of ungenerated; but then, by taking ungenerated to mean the same thing as uncreated. But the Son was generated, not ungenerated; hence, the Son was a creature.

In its rejection of Arianism, the NICENE CREED clarified the problem (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 125–126). The Son is generated (γεννηθέντα); by implication, ἀγέννητος in this context can be said only of the Father. Yet, if the Son is "begotten," the Son is nevertheless "not made" (οὐπονηθέντα); again by implication, ἀγέννητος in this further context, that of creation, characterizes not only the Father but the entire Godhead as such.

See Also: ASEITY; GOD THE FATHER; PATERNITY, DIVINE; PROPERTIES, DIVINE PERSONAL; GENERATION; GENERATION OF THE WORD; LOGOS; GOD (SON); TRINITY, HOLY; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON; WORD, THE.

Bibliography: M. SCHMAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:187–188. J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960) 226–237. G. W. H. LAMPE, ed., A Patristic Greek Lexicon (New York 1961–).

[R. L. RICHARD]

AGENT

A transliteration of the scholastic Latin agens, in general having the same meaning as mover (movens), efficient cause, or simply cause. St. THOMAS AQUINAS regularly uses agent and efficient cause indiscriminately, often combining them as causa agens or causa movens. In dependence on Aristotle, he defines an agent as "that whereby a change or state of rest is first produced" (a quo est principium motus vel quietis—In 2 phys. 5.5). In this St. Thomas differs in no significant respect from the general scholastic tradition. At least the older scholastic tradition is also in agreement that agents in the physical order are denominated such from the effect produced by their action in the "patient," or recipient (see ACTION AND PASSION).

Other aspects of the scholastic notion of agent can be seen in the various assertions commonly accepted with respect to agents: "Every agent acts for an end." "Every agent acts insofar as it is in act, and according to its form." "An agent, precisely as such, is more noble than its patient or effect." "Every agent produces an effect similar to itself." "Agent and patient must exist together," and "every physical agent acts by contact" (see SCHOLASTIC TERMS AND AXIOMS).

The principal kinds of agent recognized by the scholastics include: (1) The perfecting (perficiens), counseling (consilians), and disposing agents—the last being subdivided into primary (praeparans) and secondary (adjuvans). (2) Equivocal (or analogical) and univocal agents, depending on whether or not the agent is on the same metaphysical level as the patient; this distinction is closely related to that between universal and particular agents and that between incorporeal and corporeal agents. (3) Principal or instrumental and primary or secondary (sometimes "first" and "second") agents. (4) Natural and nonnatural agents, the latter including many other types, such as violent, chance, artificial, and voluntary; a related distinction contains necessary, chance, and free agents. (5) Finally, agents that are causes of BEING or causes merely of BECOMING, according as the effect continues to depend on the cause after it is produced or not.

Intellectual agents are included in this list, especially under artificial and voluntary nonnatural agents, but the “agent intellect” (intellectus agens) is not. The latter is the intellectual faculty rendering abstract knowledge possible, and it is treated under INTELLECT.

See Also: CAUSALITY; EFFICIENT CAUSALITY.

Bibliography: R. J. DEFERRARI et al., A Lexicon of St. Thomas Aquinas (Washington 1948–53). L. SCHÜTZ, Thomas-Lexikon (New York 1957).

[P. R. DURBIN]

AGGRESSION

An act of hostility in which the individual clashes with some facet of reality (persons, things, himself) to reduce tension arising from frustration. This distinguishes aggression from aggressiveness, which aims at the completion of a task with energy, initiative, and determination. Aggressive behavior ordinarily fits the pattern of normal adjustment, while aggression veers toward maladjustment and abnormality. Aggression is direct if the attack is against the frustrating object; displaced, if against a neutral object. Sometimes it is directed inward, and the aggressor punishes himself or herself. When fear inhibits a frontal attack, displaced aggression occurs. The object of the displaced aggression must resemble the original and yet be dissimilar enough that the inhibitions against the act of aggression are overcome.

Some signs of aggression are fighting, bullying, teasing, swearing, carrying of grudges, and ridiculing. They range from self-assertiveness and dominance to revenge and brutality. Some internal determinants of aggression are feelings of guilt, inadequacy, and inferiority; some external are lack of discipline and self-control, rejection, overprotection, and frustrating home or school situations. To the extent that aggression is disruptive of social, psychological, or moral life, it is maladjustive and abnormal.

Bibliography: A. A. SCHNEIDERS, The Anarchy of Feeling (New York 1963) 65–79; Personal Adjustment and Mental Health (New York 1955) 329–363. N. R. F. MAIER, Frustration: A Study of Behavior without a Goal (New York 1949). J. DOLLARD et al., Frustration and Aggression (New Haven 1939). L. J. SAUL, The Hostile Mind: The Sources and Consequences of Rage and Hate (New York 1956).

[E. J. RYAN]

AGIL, ST.

Missionary and abbot; b. Franche-Comté, c. 580; d. Abbey of Rebais near Meaux, France, c. 650. At the age of about seven, Agil (also called Aile, Ail, Aisle, Ayeul, Ely) was received at the abbey of Luxeuil by COLUMBAN and trained there in the religious life by EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL. He probably followed Columban into exile in 610, returning to Luxeuil with Eustace, and after his ordination as a priest accompanying Eustace on a missionary journey to Bavaria c. 617. When elected bishop of Langres in 628, Agil refused the dignity. OUVEN OF ROUEN chose him to be the first abbot of his new foundation at Rebais, and Agil was consecrated in the presence of Dagobert I at Clichy in 636, when the king also granted the abbey a charter of immunity (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Diplomata 1:16). Agil died at the age of 66 and was buried in St. Peter’s church at Rebais. There are two biographies of the saint, one from the late seventh century and the other a composite of the eleventh and twelfth centuries.

Feast: Aug. 30.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedictii (Venice 1733–40) 2:301–320. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:574–597. Bibliotheca hagiographia latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 148–149. E. VACANDARD, Vie de saint Ouen, évêque de Rouen (Paris 1902) 61–69, 169. P. FOURNIER, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:957–958. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:634. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:245–246.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

AGILITY

That quality or endowment in virtue of which the risen body of the just “will be freed from the heaviness that now presses it down and will take on a capability of moving with the utmost ease and swiftness wherever the soul pleases” (Catechism of the Council of Trent 1.12.13). According to St. Paul, in the resurrection of the just “what is sown in weakness rises in power” (1 Cor 15.43). In these words Catholic theologians have seen a reference to the agility of the risen GLORIFIED BODY.

St. Thomas explains why this quality is postulated and what its nature is: “The soul which will enjoy the divine vision, united to its ultimate end, will in all matters experience the fulfillment of desire. And since it is out of the soul’s desire that the body is moved, the consequence will be the body’s utter obedience to the soul’s slightest wish. Hence, the bodies of the blessed when they rise are going to have agility. . . . For weakness is what we experience in a body found wanting in the strength to satisfy the desire of the soul in the movements and actions which the soul commands, and this weakness will be entirely taken away then, when power overflows into the body from a soul united to God" (C. gent. 4.86).

Traditional scholastic authorities are in substantial agreement with St. Thomas concerning the nature of this mysterious quality; its future existence, they maintain, is implicitly contained in the revealed fact of the glorious resurrection at the world's end. Agility therefore will be present in the complete and definitive transformation of the body of man's lowliness, which "our Lord Jesus Christ . . . will refashion . . . conforming it to the body of his glory by exercising the power by which he is able to subject all things to himself" (Phil 3.21).

See Also: RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Bibliography: A. CHOLLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 3.2:1879–1906. J. F. SAGÜES, Sacre Theologiae summa: Biblioteca de autores cristianos 4.6:295–309. M. A. GENEVOIS, Entre dans la joie (Paris 1960).

[C. J. CORCORAN]

AGILULF OF COLOGNE, ST.

Bishop; d. 750 or 751. He became bishop of Cologne after 745–746, supported the reforms of St. Boniface, and attended the Frankish Synod in 747. The cult of St. Agilulf (Agilulph) did not flourish until after July 9, 1062, when Archbishop ANNO II of Cologne translated the relics of St. Agilulf from the Abbey of Malmédy to St. Maria ad Gradus in Cologne, where they remained until their removal to the cathedral in 1846. According to the Passio sancti Agilolfi, composed probably before 1062, this Agilulf was a simple monk, martyred by the Neustrians at Amblève (Amel) on March 31, 716. Later sources wrongly identified him with Bishop Agilulf. Thus, c. 1160, Dietrich of Deutz added the title "martyr" to the entry Agilolfus episcopus in the list of bishops of Cologne. According to another account, the Miracula sancti Quirini, written at Malmédy late in the eleventh century, Agilulf was a Benedictine monk at the Abbey of Stavelot under Abbot Anglinus, whom he succeeded, apparently in 745, remaining abbot even after he became bishop of Cologne. This, too, is plainly inaccurate, since Anglinus was certainly abbot as late as 751.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: W. NEUSS, ed., Geschichte des Erzbistums Köln, v.1. Das Bistum Köln von den Anfängen bis zum Ende des 12. Jahrhunderts (Cologne 1964) 134–135. W. LEVISON, "Bischof Agilolf von Köln und seine Passio," Annalen des hist. Vereins für den Niederrhein 115 (1929) 76–97; repr. in W. LEVISON, Aus rheinischer und fränkischer Frühzeit. Ausgewählte Aufsätze (Düsseldorf 1948) 76–95. A. STEFFENS, Der heilige Agilolfus (Cologne 1893). Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 11:438–439, 482; 13:293. Acta Sanctorum July 2:714–726.

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

AGNELLI, GIUSEPPE

Jesuit writer of catechetical and devotional works; b. Naples, April 1, 1621; d. Rome, Sept. 8, 1706. Agnelli entered the Society of Jesus in 1637. For a time he was professor of moral theology, and was later rector of the colleges of Montepulciano, Macerata, and Ancona, where he was also consultor of the Inquisition of the March of Ancona. He spent the last 33 years of his life in the professed house in Rome. His chief writing was Il Catechismo annuale (Macerata 1657), or Il Parrocchiano istruttore (Rome 1677, Venice 1731), which was an adaptation for parish priests and contained an explanation of the Gospel for every Sunday in the year. In addition he wrote a week's devotion to St. Joseph for the Bona Mors Sodality, four commentaries on the Exercises of St. Ignatius, a collection of meditations for a triduum, a ten-day retreat for Jesuits about to make profession, and a series of sermons for Advent and Lent.

Bibliography: T. J. CAMPBELL, The Catholic Encyclopedia 1:212. C. SOMMERVOGEL, et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 1:65–68.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

AGNELLUS OF PISA, BL.

First Franciscan superior in England; b. Pisa, c. 1194; d. Oxford, March 3, 1232. He was sent (c. 1217) by St. FRANCIS to France, where he became custos of Paris. As a deacon in 1224 he was appointed to introduce the FRANCISCANS into England, where he became the first minister provincial. At the urging of his superior, he became a priest (before 1229). He successfully defended the rights of his order against the claims of the bishops (1231). He propagated the order throughout much of England and is chiefly responsible for the reputation for science of the English Franciscans, since he obtained ROBERT GROSSETESTE as a teacher for the Franciscan house of studies in Oxford. Agnellus was declared blessed in 1892.

Feast: March 13 (Archdiocese of Birmingham, Eng.).

Bibliography: FR. GILBERT, B. Agnellus and the English Grey friars (London 1937). J. HARDING, Agnellus of Pisa (Canterbury 1979). THOMAS OF ECCLESTON, De adventu Fratrum Minorum in Angliam, ed. A. G. LITTLE (2d ed. Manchester, Eng. 1951). C. MARI-

Statue of St. Agnes, 14th century, Church of Notre Dame, Ecouis, France. (© Geoffrey Taunton; Cordaiy Photo Library Ltd./CORBIS)

OTTI, Il b. Agnello da Pisa ed i Frati Minori in Inghilterra (Rome 1895). L. HARDICK, ed., Nach Deutschland und England (Werl 1957) 115–214.

[L. HARDICK]

AGNES, ST.

Virgin and martyr of Rome. Little is known about this popular Roman saint who was martyred in the middle of the third or in the early fourth century. Her feast is recorded in the Depositio martyrum contained in the Chronograph of 354. She is mentioned by Ambrose (De virginibus 1.2; De officiis 1.41), in the Ambrosian hymn “Agnes beatæ virginis,” by Pope DAMASUS in a still extant epitaph, and by Prudentius (Peristephanon 14). According to Ambrose and Prudentius she was beheaded, according to Damasus, burned to death, and according to the Agnes beatæ virginis, she was strangled. Despite this contradictory evidence, the sources agree in that she was young, only 12 or 13, when martyred. A fully developed legend of the sixth century describes her as a beautiful young girl with many rivals for her hand. When she rejected them, she was delated to the governor as a Christian and sent to a house of prostitution. Those who came to see her were struck with awe. One who looked lustfully at her lost his sight but regained it through her prayers. Brought before the judge, she was condemned and executed and buried on the Via Salaria, in a catacomb eventually named after her. Before 349 a basilica was built over her tomb by Constantina, daughter of Constantine. This was restored by Pope SYMMACHUS (498–514) and completely rebuilt by HONORIUS I (625–638). In the fourth century, Agnes was represented as an orant with arms outstretched in prayer. From the sixth century on she was portrayed as a young girl with a lamb in her arms or at her feet. Before the ninth century her head was removed from her tomb to the Sancta Sanctorum of the Lateran palace. When this was examined on April 19, 1903, it was seen to be that of a girl about 12 years old. Pius X gave the relic to the church of St. Agnes in Agone on the Piazza Navona in Rome.

Feast: Jan. 21.

Bibliography: L. ANDRÉ-DELASTRE, Saint Agnes, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1962). F. P. KEYES, Three Ways of Love (New York 1963). E. JOSI, Bibliotheca Sanctorum (Rome 1961) 1:382–407. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:133–137.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

AGNES OF ASSISI, ST.

Poor Clare abbess; b. Assisi, 1197; d. Assisi, Aug. 27, 1253. Sixteen days after her older sister, CLARE OF ASSISI, fled from home to follow (St.) FRANCIS OF ASSISI, Agnes joined her, first at San Angelo di Panzo, where she heroically withstood family opposition, and then at San Damiano. When the Benedictines of Monticelli asked to become POOR CLARES, Francis sent Agnes to them as abbess (1219 or 1221). After returning to San Damiano in 1253, she witnessed the death of Clare and died soon after. She is said to have had a vision of the Christ Child, which her iconography sometimes depicts. Benedict XIV approved her cult in 1753. She is buried in S. Chiara, Assisi.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: “Vita . . .,” Analecta Franciscana 3 (1897) 173–182. THOMAS OF CELANO, Legenda Sanctæ Clare virginis, ed. F. PENNACCHI (Assisi 1910). L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum 1:141–142; 2:18–19; 3:350–351. Vita di s. Agnese di Assisi, compilata da una suora Clarissa (Lecce 1913). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:358–359. Leben und Schriften der heiligen Klara von Assisi, ed. E. GRAU (2d ed. Werl 1953), legend ascribed to Thomas of Celano; Eng. tr. I. BRADY and M. F. LAUGHLIN (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1953) 35–37. C. GENNARO, “Clare, Agnes, and Their Earliest Followers: From the Poor Ladies of San Damiano to the Poor Clares,” in D. BORNSTEIN and R. RUSCONI, eds., Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy (Chicago, 1996) 39–55. M. CARNEY, The First Franciscan Woman: Clare of Assisi & Her Form of Life. (Quincy, IL 1993). E. PETROFF, “A Medieval Woman’s Utopian Vision: The Rule of St. Clare of Assisi,” in Body and Soul: Essays on Medieval Women and Mysticism (New York 1994) 66–82. P. RANFT, “An Overturned Victory: Clare of Assisi and the Thirteenth-century Church,” in Journal of Medieval History 17 (1991), 123–134. R. ARMSTRONG, Clare of Assisi: Early Documents (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1993).

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

AGNES OF BOHEMIA, ST.

Also known as Agnes of Prague; princess; Poor Clare abbess; b. Prague, Bohemia, c. 1200–1205?; d. Prague, Bohemia, March 2, 1281 or 1282; canonized by Pope John Paul II, Nov. 12, 1989.

Agnes, daughter of Ottokar I, King of Bohemia, and Constance of Hungary, the sister of King Andreas II of Hungary, received her early education from the Cistercian nuns of Trebnitz. This cousin of St. Elizabeth of Hungary (1207–1231) was betrothed at the age of three to Boleslaus, son of Duke Henry of Silesia. Later she appealed to Pope Gregory IX, and he intervened on her behalf to allow her to consecrate herself to virginity.

Agnes established two hospitals for the poor, and she persuaded members of the Military Order of Crusaders of the Red Star (Bethlehemites) to staff them. In 1232, Agnes accomplished the building of a Franciscan friary and the Poor Clare convent of Saint Savior in Prague. Saint Clare sent her five nuns from Assisi to help establish the convent, where Agnes received the veil in 1234 or 1236 and was later elected abbess. Four letters from St. Clare addressed to Agnes are extant.

Agnes is known for her humility and loving service to others. She enjoyed cooking for the sisters and mending the clothes of lepers. She is said to have been gifted with the working of miracles and prescience. She predicted the victory of her brother Wenceslaus over the Duke of Austria. Before her peaceful death, Agnes obtained permission to give up all revenues and property held in common.

Agnes was buried near her convent. About 1322, her body was exhumed and transferred to a special coffin that was lost during the Hussite uprising.

Feast: March 2 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: I. BRADY, ed., The Legend and Writings of St Clare of Assisi (New York 1953), 9–10, 88–98, 157–159. M. FASSBINDER, Die selige Agnes von Prag, eine königliche Klarissin (Werl 1957). T. JOHNSON, “To Her Who Is Half of Her Soul: Clare of Assisi and the Medieval Epistolary Tradition [Analysis of Clare’s Letters to Agnes of Prague],” Magistra: A Journal of Women’s Spirituality in History 2, no. 1 (Summer 1996): 24–50. J. NEMEC, Agnese Di Boemia: La Vita, Il Culto, La Legenda (Milan 1987). W. W. SETON, Some New Sources for the Life of Bl. Agnes of Bohemia (Aberdeen, Scotland 1915; New York 1966).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

AGNES OF MONTEPULCIANO, ST.

Dominican nun, patroness of Montepulciano; b. Agnes Segni, Gracciano-Vecchio, Tuscany, c. 1268; d. Montepulciano, Italy, April 4, 1317. At the age of nine she induced her parents to let her join a community at Montepulciano called “Sisters of the Sack” because of their coarse garments. Her holiness and intelligence impressed the nuns, and she was made bursar when only 14. A year later she accompanied an older nun to Proceno to found a new convent. She was soon elected abbess. In her new position she increased her austerities, fasting on bread and water, and sleeping on the ground. The citizens of Montepulciano, desiring her return, offered to build a convent in a place formerly occupied by a house of ill fame. Agnes became prioress there (1306) and placed the convent under Dominican patronage. She was a competent administrator, often providing miraculously for the needs of her sisters.

Simplicity and ardor were the keynotes of her spirituality. Her vita reports that she was favored by apparitions of the Blessed Virgin, the Christ Child, and the angels, and that showers of white, cross-shaped particles “like manna” fell upon her and the places where she prayed. She died after a painful illness. As patroness of Montepulciano, she is represented with a model of the city in her hands; in Italian art she is associated with CATHERINE OF SIENA and ROSE OF LIMA. She was canonized by Benedict XIII in 1726.

Feast: April 20.

Bibliography: RAYMOND OF CAPUA, Vita, Acta Sanctorum April 2:790–810. Année Dominicaine, 23 v. (Lyons 1883–1909) April 2: 519–546. A. WALZ, Die hl. Agnes v. Montepulciano (Dülmen 1922). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:135–137. G. DI AGRESTI and D. VALORI, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961) 1:375–381.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

AGNES OF POITIERS, ST.

Abbess; d. c. 589. She was the adopted daughter of St. RADEGUNDA, the wife of Chlotar I, King of the Franks

(d. 561). In 550 Radegunda fled from her husband after he killed her brother. She found temporary refuge in several communities and finally founded the convent of the Holy Cross in Poitiers, which was consecrated by St. GERMAIN in 561. About 570 Radegunda and Agnes visited Arles to study the rule of St. CAESARIUS. Subsequently the rule was adopted at Poitiers, and Agnes became the first abbess, but she was replaced in 589 after a revolt by dissatisfied elements in the convent. Agnes is remembered for her connection with the poet Venantius Fortunatus, who was also a correspondent of her mother. Her relics are preserved in the church of St. Radegunda, and her tomb is a popular place of pilgrimage in the area.

Feast: May 13 (Diocese of Poitiers).

Bibliography: GREGORY OF TOURS, Historia Francorum 9.39–42 in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1:393–404. F. G. HOLWECK, A Biographical Dictionary of the Saints (St. Louis 1924) 33. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:216. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 1:56. P. DE MONSABERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:973–974. G. ALLEMANG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:199.

[J. F. FAHEY]

AGNOSTICISM

An attitude of mind toward man's knowledge of God; namely, that God is humanly unknowable. Etymologically, agnosticism (Gr. agnostos) means an unknowing, a profession of ignorance. Historically, the word "agnostic" was first used by T. H. Huxley in 1869. Having joined the Metaphysical Society, a society whose members professed knowledge on all kinds of mysteries, and wishing to show his opposition to such extravagant claims, Huxley adopted the name "agnostic." Since his time, the term has been used to designate anyone who denies a knowledge of immaterial reality, and especially of the existence and nature of God.

Kinds of Agnosticism

An agnostic is not an atheist. An atheist denies the existence of God; an agnostic professes ignorance about His existence. For the latter, God may exist, but reason can neither prove nor disprove it. Agnostics have been divided into two groups: those who deny that reason can know God and make no judgment concerning that existence and those who deny that reason can prove it but nonetheless profess a belief in God's existence. A well-known contemporary instance of the first group is Bertrand RUSSELL; a famous example of the second is Immanuel KANT. With few exceptions, modern and contemporary agnostics belong to the second group.

Another division of agnosticism may be made in terms of the philosophical commitments that cause their adherents to deny the possibility of knowing God. These commitments are many and varied, but the principal ones in the history of thought may be enumerated as nominalism, empiricism, Kantianism, the theory of the unconditioned, logical positivism, and existentialism. The remainder of this article explains the philosophical grounds for agnostic attitudes within these schools and gives a critical evaluation of each.

NOMINALISM

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, the father of philosophical NOMINALISM, denied that the human intellect could with certitude demonstrate the existence of One, Infinite God. For Ockham, universality or community is only a condition of thought and in no sense a truth about being. There is nothing in things that allows the mind to transcend from them to God.

Argument. The line of reasoning for Ockham and his followers is clear. Unless there resides in the beings of man's experience a RELATION that orders them to God, the mind cannot demonstrate the existence of God from the existence of these beings. For the nominalist no such relation exists. Relation bespeaks an order between two things. And since order must include the things ordered, it implies a pattern of inclusiveness, or universality. Universality, however, cannot be part of the structure of being, but only of the signification of words. Nominalism thus erases universality from being. Each individual is simply itself—a singular instance of existence. To put universality in things, argue the nominalists, is to confuse the order of being with the order of signification. Things may be really dependent on God, but the mind could know this only if it could intuit some relation between things and God. But because of the atomistic (nonuniversal) nature of the singular, this is impossible. The singular can reveal to the intellect no illative force, no moment of transcendence. Analysis of the singular never uncovers objective universality. Thus does nominalism block off any philosophical ascent to God by way of intellectual inference. The fruit of nominalism in natural theology is agnosticism (see OCKHAMISM; UNIVERSALS).

Evaluation. What the nominalists fail to recognize is that, while each being is indivisibly singular, the INTELLECT has the power to consider one aspect of the singular while leaving others out of consideration. Thus the intellect can attain universal notions, such as man, animal, substance and so forth. Universality is in the thing, in the sense that the perfection that is considered is in the thing; but as in the thing, the perfection is inseparable from the very singularity of the thing. Moreover, the order that results from received existence is an intelligible datum that can be grasped by the intellect, though not by the SENSES. Change, imperfection, limitation, composition—these are all intelligible facts about the things of man's experience that spell out for his intellect the contingent condition of their being. Contingency, and hence order and dependence, may be impervious to his senses, for they are not sensible facts; but they are open to his intellect, because they are facts of existence. Thus the intellect is not only justified but necessitated to make an inference from caused to Uncaused Being.

EMPIRICISM

The central teaching of EMPIRICISM is that all knowledge comes through experience. While such a truism need not lead to agnosticism, historically it did so, because of the empiricists' quarrel with rationalism.

Argument. RATIONALISM maintained that such terms as "contingent" and "necessary" were both true in what they defined and actually descriptive of the real world. For the empiricist this is impossible. Man experiences what happens in the world, not that it must so happen, that is, happen contingently or necessarily. "Necessity," writes D. HUME, "is something that exists in the mind, not in objects." And since man does not experience necessity, he cannot say that the causal proposition, "every event has a cause," has been gained from experience. The necessity and universality found in the causal proposition is not grounded in objects, but in some condition of man's thinking about objects. Empiricism explains the origins of the causal proposition in terms of human habits of thought. Repeatedly experiencing B following A, one comes to anticipate B whenever he experiences A. But since he does not experience a connection between them, he cannot say that B must follow A.

This obviously means that the human mind can never reason with certitude to the existence of God. For this would be asserting a necessary connection between mundane events and a supramundane Being, a connection that falls outside human experience. To assert this connection is to commit the fallacy of rationalism; one inserts a necessity derived from his concepts into the world of events. As with nominalism, empiricism precludes a transcendence from effect to cause by rejecting for knowledge the objective value of the causal principle or of CAUSALITY.

Evaluation. The empiricists are guilty of a one-dimensional interpretation of human experience. As has been seen, imperfection, limitation, composition, relations, differences and so forth, are just as clearly facts about a thing as are its color, size, shape, motion, etc. While the former are not sense data, it would be arbitrary to argue that they are not facts of human experience. To limit experience to what is directly perceptible by the five senses is to eliminate a large part of experience and to go against experience itself. It is true that man does not sense causality, that he does not sense relations; but he does experience them, not with his senses but with his intellect. Sense experience is only one kind of experience. The activities one experiences among beings is attended by the intellectual INSIGHT that these beings are really related and hence are true causes and effects. The demonstration for the existence of God is grounded, above all, in an intellectual, rather than sensible, experience of reality (see EXPERIENCE).

Robert Green Ingersoll (1833–1899), Illinois attorney general and agnostic lecturer. (©CORBIS)

KANTIANISM

Kant subscribed to the Humean critique of causality. Yet he viewed the construction of his critical philosophy as the proper synthesis of rationalism and empiricism. The importance of Kant in the history of agnosticism cannot be overstressed. In the minds of most non-Catholic thinkers, Kant's Critique of Pure Reason has given the coup de grâce to any possible proof for the existence of God.

Kant's criticism. In removing necessity from things themselves, Hume seemed to be destroying the objective value of the necessary truths of the physical sciences, To mathematics, and metaphysics. To justify the necessity and universality of such truths (at least for science and mathematics), Kant proposed his theory of the synthetic a priori judgment. A judgment is synthetic, rather than analytic, when its content refers to empirical reality; and it is a priori when it involves elements not drawn from that reality. "Every event has a cause," is an example of a synthetic a priori judgment. It is a judgment that deals with events and hence refers to empirical reality; but it has elements not drawn from empirical reality, namely, universality (every event) and necessity (has a cause), and so is a priori. For as Hume had correctly pointed out, universality and necessity are not concepts drawn from the object (see CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL; KANTIANISM).

The important fact about such a judgment is that, though not drawn completely from empirical reality, it is always applicable to it. This is so because the judgment "every event has a cause" expresses a condition for the very experiencing of events, at least in a unified way. In a word, a synthetic a priori judgment contains two elements: one formal, the work of the understanding; the other material, the product of experience. Since such judgments express the very conditions that make knowledge of the world possible, they have objective validity whenever applied to this world. The way man knows empirical reality, and must know it, is as objective as the thing known. It now remains to be seen how this view of knowledge leads of necessity to agnosticism.

Argument. In order to be perceived, a thing must be experienced here and now. The here and now, or space and time, are not intrinsic properties of the thing, but necessary conditions for perceiving the thing. In like manner, cause, substance, and relation are not intrinsic properties of the thing, but necessary conditions for understanding it. And only those things that can be perceived in space and time can be understood. But God is a reality that is entirely outside space and time and so there are no conditions that could make any knowledge of Him possible. There is no way for the intellect of man to have an objective knowledge of God.

But obviously, says Kant, man can form an idea of God. The mind forms such an idea whenever it seeks for the cause of causes, for the ultimate unifying principle of all beings and of all thought. But God as a unifying principle is merely an idea, that is to say, a concept formed by the transcendental activity of human reason with no guarantee of an objective correlate outside the reason. To form an idea of God, then, is in no way to prove that there is a God. For as not subject to the conditions of space and time, God is not perceivable; and as unperceivable through sensibility, He must remain forever unknowable to understanding.

If all Kant were saying is that God in His own Being is in no way subject to the senses or intellect of man, so that one can never have any direct natural knowledge of Him, he would be no more agnostic than the most orthodox Catholic philosopher. His agnosticism consists in his absolute refusal to give to the understanding of man even an indirect knowledge of God. God cannot be known either in Himself (which all admit) or through creatures. The objective reality of God can never in any sense become a term for human understanding. Since God is outside all the conditions for human understanding, no category of the mind can be applied to Him. Thus the category of cause cannot be applied to Him. The application of causality is valid among the beings of empirical reality (PHENOMENA), but not among those of transempirical reality (NOUMENA). God's existence cannot be inferred or concluded to; for the reason in passing from phenomenal reality to noumenal steps outside the conditions of human understanding. Hence this transition results in no objective knowledge of reality, but only in empty concepts.

It is true that Kant, on moral grounds, saw the necessity for postulating a belief in God (or in the idea of God), but since such a postulate has no cognitive content and does not guarantee the actual existence of God, this aspect of Kant's critical philosophy in no way mitigates his agnosticism.

Evaluation. An analysis of Kant's epistemology makes it clear that he equated BEING with "being-sensible." If an absolute condition for knowing anything is that it be first perceived in human sensibility, then, of course, only sensibles are knowable. This would mean that all other facts in man's knowledge of being, for example, its distinction from other beings, its limitations, its composition, and so forth, belong not to the thing but only to the way man knows the thing. He could not predicate them about the thing itself, but only about the thing as in his knowledge. He could not say "man is limited," but only "man must be known as limited." In the view of Kant, one cannot say that limitation, imperfection, and composition (all the facts of being that lead one to God) are facts about being independent of the knowing process. And this is to equate being with "being-sensible." Admittedly, to grasp these facts (including the fact of existence itself) an intellect is needed; the senses are not enough. But to say that therefore they are the product of the intellect, they are due merely to the way the intellect knows, is a false conclusion. The way the eye sees color or the ear hears sound is certainly not the way color or sound is present in objects; but no one denies that there is in the object, the proper and sensible correlate of color and sound. So, too, with the intelligible elements of being. They will yield their presence only to an intellect, and in an intellectual way. But they are as much facts about a being as are its sensible facts. To deny this is to deny the very existence of things, for existence is not a sensible fact.

THEORY OF THE UNCONDITIONED

Under the influence of Kant, agnosticism began to assume the form of a philosophical theory, the theory of the unconditioned. The two names most commonly associated with this theory are Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON and Herbert SPENCER. The former develops it in his main work, Philosophy of the Unconditioned (Edinburgh 1829), and Spencer devotes the first 100 pages of his First Principles (London 1862) to "The Unknowable." While neither man is read much in the mid-20th century, their influence during their lifetime was considerable, and their views on man's knowledge of God have become accepted teaching.

Argument. The theory of the unconditioned is in its essentials, Kantian, and briefly it comes to this. To think of an object is to condition it, either by putting it into some class, as when one says "God is a substance," or by relating it to some other object, as when one says "God is a cause." Since all knowledge goes from the known to the unknown, every object must be known in terms of something else. An object that cannot be conditioned by either classification or relation is unknowable. For, to know, is to condition. But God, as Infinite and Absolute Being, transcends every condition. Thus God is unknowable and is the very negation of thought. To classify the infinite is to make it finite; and to relate the absolute is to make it relative. To say, therefore, that God is a substance, or a cause, or a being, are so many meaningless statements. There is only one meaningful statement that can be made about the unknowable—it cannot be known.

If this teaching simply meant that man can have no direct knowledge of God, in the sense that God in Himself can never be grasped as a term within man's knowledge, it would be acceptable. But it means more than this. For in an indirect knowledge of God through creatures, either God becomes a term of knowledge or not. If He does not, man does not know God, but only creatures; if He does, then He has been conditioned by a relation (cause), and so once more it is not God man is thinking about but only some subjective notion he calls God.

Evaluation. How does one break through the dilemma presented by this theory? By a close look at the act of existing of a finite being and a closer look at what it means to know. The very CONTINGENCY of an imperfect act of existing demands that it has grounds for existing that are outside itself. Its EXISTENCE is received existence. Contingent existence is a contradiction in terms unless it has its source in Necessary Existence. But can man know this Necessary Being? He cannot know it in itself, but he can know that there must be such a Being. In affirming the necessity of such a Being, what terminates his knowledge is not the being of God but the truth of the proposition "There must be a God." Thus the being of God is left unconditioned, but man's knowledge has been conditioned and determined to a truth about God, namely, that He exists. Moreover, this is a truth about an actually existing being (and not an empty concept), for man's knowledge has been determined by actually existing beings precisely as caused by God. And in this sense one can say that God is the indirect object, and the object that logically terminates one's thinking, for it is through His being that the things that determine one to know Him exist. The error of the theory of the unconditioned is that it equates conditioning in knowledge with conditioning in being. Man can know God through creatures without affecting God's being. In fact, though this is not the present concern, even a direct vision of God such as the angels and saints have in heaven, leaves the divine being completely unconditioned, unaffected; for the whole act of knowledge as such is in, and hence affects, the knower. Conditions concern the way one knows, not what one knows. The agnostics fail to make this important distinction.

LOGICAL POSITIVISM

A fashionable form of contemporary agnosticism, especially in the United States and Britain, is LOGICAL POSITIVISM. This school, whose methodology is linguistic analysis and whose theory of knowledge is empiricism, teaches that a proposition is true if its language elements are reducible to, or verifiable in terms of, some direct or indirect sense experience. Propositions that make no claim to describe reality, such as those of logic and mathematics, are true if consistent with themselves. Factual propositions belong to the empirical sciences and formal propositions to the logical and mathematical sciences. Both sets of propositions can be either true or false and both have their proper meaning; for they can be seen as either reducible to sense experience, as in the case of factual propositions, or as self-consistent, as with formal propositions.

Argument. Statements about God are neither factual nor formal. Since the subject of such propositions falls outside both direct and indirect sense experience, the elements of such propositions are not verifiable in terms of any knowable experience. They can be shown to be neither true nor false. Thus they are empty of all meaning; they are meaningless, "nonsensical" bits of language. Nor are they formally true, since they claim to bear upon a real object. If no such claim were made, the logical positivists would grant that statements about God would have formal (not factual) truth. For they could be viewed as instances of a consistent use of language or a possible way that ideas could be related.

Evaluation. As is clear, the agnosticism espoused by the logical positivists is simply a restatement, in terms of the analysis of language, of the basic positions of Hume on the origin of knowledge and of Kant on the noncognitive value of “transcendental ideas” (see VERIFICATION).

EXISTENTIALISM

The most important philosophical movement of the mid-20th century is undoubtedly EXISTENTIALISM. Briefly, this doctrine teaches that the only essence the individual man has is that which he freely creates for himself through the decisive realization of his human possibilities. Man in his existence is free tendency. He makes himself what he is. To say that he possesses a stable and determined essence is to rob him of his freedom and to make his being a fixed and formalized unfolding of a predetermined pattern. Moreover, as a continual flux of existential tendencies, man cannot grasp himself through any conceptual knowledge; for a concept immobilizes and so falsifies, reality. Man’s being, rather, is grasped by an encounter of experience with himself and others, and not by an insight into intelligible patterns, for there are none.

Argument. Existentialism is agnostic for several reasons. First, it refuses to man any rational or conceptual understanding of God. Second, even when some awareness of a ground of Being is suggested, one can never identify this ground with God. For these objects of “transcendence” (the All-Embracing in K. Jaspers, Being Itself in M. Heidegger, Nothingness in J. P. Sartre) are described in terms philosophically incompatible with a personal and genuinely transcendent God. Furthermore, one can never be sure, because of the type of awareness involved in PHENOMENOLOGY, that these objects are not the product of one’s own CONSCIOUSNESS. Third, existentialism is agnostic because in the horizontal movement of phenomenological awareness one never attains a moment of seen inference to a source of being. The roots of intelligibility having been removed from being, nothing remains in the flux of existential moments by which man can grasp a relationship to a Being that transcends the flux. In spite of their great concern for the freedom and openness of the human spirit, existentialists are still the victims of Humean empiricism; but now it is an inverted empiricism, the empiricism of consciousness.

Evaluation. The error of the existentialists is twofold. First, they fail to recognize that a FINITE BEING without an ESSENCE is a contradiction. For finite existence is always the existence of something, and this from its very beginning. Man without an intrinsic limit or essence would be an act of infinite existence. The second error is their failure to recognize that unless human FREEDOM is grounded in intelligence and dependent upon it, man cannot know the possibilities among which he can choose. Finally, these possibilities of man are really surreptitiously reintroduced essences; for an essence is a POTENCY that can be realized (made actual) through existence. There are many excellent and profound things in existentialism. But the suppression of the human essence and the apotheosis of freedom are not among them.

CONCLUSION

An interesting phenomenon attends the writings of an agnostic. He describes the Unknown God in the same terms as the theist: infinite, absolute, necessary, transcendent, and so forth. The impression is given that the agnostic knows no less about God than the theist and the theist no more than the agnostic. If God is unknowable, why does the agnostic know so much about Him? The touchstone of an agnostic is not what he says about God, but what he intends these statements to mean. The all-important difference is this: the theist claims his statements about God legitimately bear upon an existing object and give him true and valid knowledge of this object. The agnostic denies that his statements about God have any of these characteristics. They are not statements about an existing object at all, but only about an idea wholly constructed by his mind.

See Also: GOD 2; GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; GOD IN PHILOSOPHY; ATHEISM; DEISM; HUMANISM, SECULAR; NATURALISM; THEISM; THEOLOGY, NATURAL.

Bibliography: Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 1:214–220. R. FLINT, Agnosticism (London 1903). J. WARD, Naturalism and Agnosticism, 2 v. (New York 1899). J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959). H. DE LUBAC, The Drama of Atheist Humanism, tr. E. M. RILEY (New York 1949). R. JOLIVET, The God of Reason, tr. M. PONTIFEX (New York 1958). New Essays in Philosophical Theology, eds. A. G. N. FLEW and A. MACINTYRE, (New York 1955). A. E. TAYLOR, Does God Exist? (New York 1947). E. S. BRIGHTMAN, The Problem of God (New York 1930). A. C. COCHRANE, The Existentialists and God (Philadelphia 1956). F. E. ENGLAND, Kant’s Conception of God (New York 1930). T. H. L. PARKER, The Doctrine of the Knowledge of God (London 1952). F. R. TENNANT, Philosophical Theology, 2 v. (New York 1928–30). C. C. J. WEBB, Studies in the History of Natural Theology (Oxford 1915).

[M. R. HOLLOWAY]

AGNUS DEI

In the Roman Catholic Eucharist, the Agnus Dei (“Lamb of God”) is sung during the fraction rite when the consecrated bread is broken and the wine poured. According to the Liber pontificalis (ed. L. Duchesne, 1:376) it was Pope Sergius I (687–701) who first ordered that during the fraction rite, the clergy and people should sing “Lamb of God [Agnus Dei], who take away the sins of the world, have mercy on us.” (In the Ambrosian Rite a variable confractorium is chanted at this point in the liturgy). According to J. Froger, it is possible that Pope Sergius did nothing more than replace a variable chant in the earlier Roman liturgy with this fixed formula. M. Righetti (Manuale di storia liturgica, 3:444 and n.81), on the other hand, insists that the variable texts for the Fraction contained in many early Roman documents are of a later Gallican origin (see GALLICAN RITES). Thus, up to the time of Pope Sergius the Roman rite Fraction would have been carried out in silence. The Capitulare (ed. Silva-Tarouca, 200), which dates from a few years after the prescriptions of Pope Sergius, states that the Agnus Dei was to be sung by the entire assembly. Soon afterward, however, the Ordo Romanus I (ed. M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani 2:101) and the Ordo of St. Armand (ed. M. Andrieu, 2:165) directed that the clergy or the SCHOLA CANTORUM (also composed of clerics) were to sing the Agnus Dei. It seems, therefore, that by the second half of the eighth century it was a chant reserved to the clerics.

The phrase “qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis” is found also in the Gloria; both texts, however, are based on the testimonial of John the Baptist (Jn 1.29) with two grammatical changes. The vocative form “agnus” is treated as indeclinable because of a sense of reverence for religious terms. The plural “peccata” is substituted for the Biblical “peccatum.” The phrase “dona nobis pacem” does not occur in any of the ancient texts. The petition “miserere nobis” was always the same, and the entire invocation was repeated as often as needed until the fraction was finished.

When multiple fractions disappeared in the ninth century, the petitions were gradually reduced to the hallowed number three. According to classic Roman usage, only one all-inclusive petition, “miserere nobis,” was added to the invocation. Around the tenth and eleventh centuries the petition “dona nobis pacem” was substituted as the third and final response. The first occasion for this substitution was most probably the transfer of the Agnus Dei to accompany the Kiss of Peace (see Rabanus Maurus, De inst. cler. 1:33; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 107:324). As early as the eleventh century the words “dona eis requiem” were found in REQUIEM MASSES, while the third petition closed with “requiem sempiternam.”

The oldest melody for the Agnus Dei (Mass 18 in the Graduale romanum) is identical to that given for the same text in the Litany of the Saints. The only change is the addition of a note on the accent of “nobis” in the Mass melody. The “Agnus Dei” at the end of the litany is a self-sufficient song, giving a festive climax to the litany. The dating (twelfth century) given in the Graduale romanum for the Agnus Dei of Mass 18 is very misleading, since it refers to the earliest MS in which this melody is found; whereas the melody is actually of a much earlier origin. According to A. Gastoué (Le Graduel et l’antiphonaire 278), it is related to ancient Byzantine psalmody. The Agnus Dei in the Mass of the Dead is an adaptation of that of Mass 18. This melody is known as the minor in a twelfth-century Rheinau MS, to distinguish it from a more complex one (the major) in the same MS, destined to be sung by the schola on great feast days [M. Gerbert, De cantu et musica sacra (St. Blasien 1774) 1.1:457].

Page from the 14th-century Graduale of the monastery of Saint-Corneille at Compiègne, France (MS lat. 16823, fol. 222v). Two tropes for the “Agnus Dei” can be seen in the right-hand column.

The simple Agnus melodies (Mass 18, Mass of the Dead, Mass 16) show a structural relation to the simple Sanctus melodies (Masses 15, 16, 18) by their use of recitative patterns. Just as these simple Sanctus melodies are an extension of the dialogue recitation of the Preface, so also the Agnus melodies are an extension of the dialogue recitation of the Pax Domini. Among the chant settings (c. 300) of the Ordinary, as B. Stäblein notes, the Agnus melodies are most often related to the Sanctus but very seldom to the Kyrie melodies (Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. Blume, 1:150).

TROPES for the Agnus Dei began to appear as early as the tenth century. Eighty-six of these have been found, consisting mostly of three verses and, in great part, hexameters. One verse was inserted each time between the invocation and the petition. The following is an example (from MS BN lat. 16823, fol. 1.222v):

Agnus Dei . . . Fons indeficiens pietatis—Miserere nobis. Agnus Dei . . . Actor summe bonus bonitatis—Miserere nobis. Agnus Dei . . .
Pax eterna dator claritatis—Dona nobis pacem.

In the wake of the Vatican II liturgical reform, the Agnus Dei was restored to its original usage as an expandable litany to cover the entire fraction rite. Many vernacular musical settings in expandable litany form with variable invocations of the Lord's name have been introduced in different parts of the world.

Bibliography: J. FROGER, Les Chants de la Messe aux VIIIe et IXe siècles (Tournai 1950). J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 2:332–340. General Instruction to the Roman Missal. Music in Catholic Worship. Liturgical Music Today.

[C. KELLY/EDS.]

AGOBARD OF LYONS, ST.

Archbishop; b. Spain, 769; d. Lyons, France, 840. In 782 he moved to Narbonne, Gaul, and in 792 he went to Lyons as a companion to LEIDRADUS, Charlemagne's missus (delegate), on one of his tours of duty in the region of Narbonne and Seo de Urgel. Ordained a priest in 804 and named chorbishop for Leidradus in 813, Agobard ruled the See of Lyons at the retirement of Leidradus to Soissons (814), and in 816 was named his successor. Agobard was one of the greatest prelates of his day. Because of his opposition to Emperor Louis the Pious in the Council of Compiègne (833), he was compelled to leave Lyons after the Emperor's coronation in 835, taking refuge with Lothair I in Italy. In the meantime his position in Lyons was given to his opponent, AMALARIUS OF METZ. In 838, after his reconciliation with the Emperor, Agobard returned to Lyons. He composed many theological writings, e.g., against Felix de Urgel De insolentia Judaeorum against the Jews, and numerous political, juridical, and liturgical works. He wrote also against superstition. The Liber de imaginibus, often attributed to him, was composed by CLAUDIUS OF TURIN. His other authentic works—official documents from his see—are the product of collaboration with his deacon FLORUS OF LYONS. The De divina psalmodia, Contra libros IV Amalarii, and the hymn Rector magnificus are exclusively the work of Florus. His presence at the Council of Paris in 825 is uncertain, but it is clear that he did not participate in drawing up the synodal Libellus against images addressed to Pope EUGENE II.

Feast: June 6.

Bibliography: Annales Lugdunenses, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 1:110, autobiographical notes from the margin of Codex Vallicellianus E 26. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 104:29–352. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15.1:274–279. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 5:150–239. E. BOSHOF, Erzbischof Agobard von Lyon. Leben und Werk (Cologne 1969). A. BRESSOLLES, Saint Agobard, évêque de Lyon, 769–840, v.1 of Doctrine et action politique d'Agobard (Paris 1949). J. A. CABANISS, Agobard of Lyons (Syracuse 1953). P. BELLET, "El Liber de imaginibus sanctorum bajo el nombre de Agobardo de Lyon obra de Claudio de Turín," Analecta Sacra Tarraconensia 26 (1953) 151–194. L. SCHEFFCZYK, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:204.

[P. BELLET]

AGOSTINI, ZEFERINO, BL.

Founder of the Ursuline Daughters of Mary Immaculate; b. Verona, Venetia, Italy. Sept. 24, 1813; d. Verona, April 6, 1896. Agostini was the elder child of Antonio Agostini, a doctor, and Angela Frattini. His father died while Zeferino was still young, but his mother ensured that her two sons received a Christian education at local schools. Agostini entered the seminary as a day student and was distinguished by his piety, concern for contemporary problems, discipline, and success in his studies. He was ordained on March 11, 1837. Assigned to parish work, he took charge of catechesis and the recreational program for boys. In 1845, he was named pastor of a large, poor parish, a position he maintained until his death 50 years later. He started many social and pastoral initiatives in this highly populated district of the city, but his special concern was for the education of women and girls. He founded the Pious Union of Sisters, dedicated to St. Angela MERICI, in response to three young women who were volunteering themselves as religious to serve the poor; the rule received episcopal approbation in 1856. That same year, he founded a school for destitute girls and the congregation of the Ursuline Daughters of Mary Immaculate, primarily for those assistants in the school who wished to live in community. The first 12 Ursulines professed their vows in 1869. Agostini was beatified in Rome by John Paul II, Oct. 25, 1998.

Feast: April 6.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 21 (1998): 1049. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 43 (1998): 3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

AGRAMUNT RIERA, JUAN, BL.

Martyr, priest of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. Feb. 13, 1907 in Alzamora, Castile, Spain; d. Aug. 14, 1936. Fr. Juan was assigned to the Castellon school four kilometers from his home in Almazora. He fled to his parents' home at the end of July where he was arrested. The night of August 13–14, he was taken to prison along with a diocesan priest. They were shot en route, six kilometers from Almazora at the intersection of two roads. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: "Decreto Super Martyrio," Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 651–656. La Documentation Catholique 2125 (Nov. 5, 1995): 924.

[L. GENDERNALIK/EDS.]

ÁGREDA, MARY OF

Also known as Mary of Jesus, Poor Clare mystical writer; b. Ágrede, province of Burgos (Spain), April 2, 1602; d. Ágrede, May 24, 1665.

Mary was one of the 11 children of Francisco Coronel and Catalina de Arana. She is said to have made a vow of chastity at the age of eight and to have had a desire for religious life from early youth. In 1619 she became a Poor Clare at Ágrede. Her mother and one of her sisters entered with her; her father, although 63 years of age, took the Franciscan habit and thus made her mother's admission possible. Mary was made abbess at the age of 25 by papal dispensation. Except for a period of three years, she remained in office for life. In 1633 she founded a new monastery outside Ágrede, to which she transferred her nuns. In 1672, seven years after her death, Mary's cause was introduced at the request of the Spanish court, and she was declared venerable.

Mary of Ágrede's principal work was The Mystical City of God and the Divine History of the Virgin Mother of God (3 v. Madrid 1670). A concise narrative, written in a polished style (though critics differ on this), it is a life of Our Lady as seen by Mary in vision. It aroused considerable opposition in the Sorbonne, particularly the chapter on the Immaculate Conception, which, though perhaps crude, was not, as was alleged, immoral. Mary supported the doctrine. The book was condemned by the Inquisition and put on the Index of Prohibited Books on June 26, 1681. Almost immediately there were earnest appeals from Spain, and at the request of the king, Innocent XI suspended the decree of condemnation and had it removed on Aug. 4, 1681. Some held that this suspensory decree was intended only for Spain, but a decree of the Holy Office (Sept. 19, 1713) in reply to a query put by the bishop of Ceneda appears to have declared the decree to have the force of law throughout the whole Church.

Prominent among the opponents of the book were Bossuet and particularly Eusebius Amort. It was alleged that more importance was given to private revelations than to the Incarnation, that the term "adoration" was used for devotion to Our Lady, that the government of the Church was attributed to her, etc. On the other hand, it is said that the Sorbonne condemnation was based on a faulty translation and that evidence exists that Amort misunderstood the Spanish in 80 places.

Though the Mystical City of God was attacked, even Mary of Ágrede's enemies respected her holy life, and no accusation was ever made against her sincerity. In 1729, after a new examination, the work was approved by the universities of Salamanca, Alcalá de Henares, Toulouse, and Louvain.

Mary's letters to Philip IV cover a period of 22 years and deal with morals, asceticism, and politics. She is said to have been instrumental in the dismissal of the Conde-Duque de Olivares.

Bibliography: T. D. KENDRICK, Mary of Ágrede: The Life and Legend of a Spanish Nun (London 1967).

[K. E. POND]

AGRICIUS OF TRIER, ST.

Fourth-century bishop of Trier; d. c. 335. Agricicus (Agregicus, Agritius) took part in the Council of Arles (314) and was possibly the master and predecessor of Bishop Maximinus, who welcomed the exiled St. ATHANASIUS to Trier. The name of Agricicus is connected with the legend of the "Holy Tunic of Trier," which he allegedly received from the Empress (St.) Helena and brought to Trier along with the bones of St. MATTHIAS and other relics. An eleventh-century legend speaks of him as originally bishop of Antioch and says he changed Helena's palace into a cathedral.

Feast: Jan. 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:55–63. H. V. SAUERLAND, Trierer Geschichtsquellen des XI. Jahrhunderts (Trier 1889)

55–212. E. EWIG, Trierer Zeitschrift 21 (1952) 30–33. A. HEINTZ, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:207.

[P. ROCHE]

AGRIPPA I AND II

The last two Jewish kings of Palestine. Agrippa I, b. c. 10 B.C.; d. A.D. 44. His father was Aristobulus, son of HEROD THE GREAT and Mariamme I, and his mother was Berenice, daughter of Herod's sister Salome and her second husband, Costobar. Agrippa came to the throne of his grandfather Herod by a series of fortunate chances and useful friendships. His mother Berenice was intimate with Antonia, Tiberius's sister-in-law, and during his education in Rome, Agrippa cultivated his contemporaries in the emperor's family, Germanicus, Drusus, and Claudius. When the premature deaths of Germanicus and Drusus disappointed his prospects, Agrippa, along with his wife Cyprus, went to IDUMEA and later accepted a post in TIBERIAS under his uncle HEROD ANTIPAS, who had married Agrippa's sister HERODIAS. A quarrel with Antipas caused Agrippa to go to Flaccus, the Roman legate in Syria; expelled for bribery, he made his way with difficulty back to Italy in A.D. 36, borrowing money at every turn on his expectations and his connections with Antonia. During Tiberius's last year, Agrippa cultivated a friendship with the emperor's grandnephew Gaius Caligula. An indiscreet remark, expressing the hope that Gaius would soon succeed Tiberius, put Agrippa in prison for six months, but he was saved by Tiberius's death (A.D. 37) and Gaius's accession. Agrippa was awarded a kingship over the tetrarchy of his late uncle PHILIP and the tetrarchy of Abilene, with the titular rank of praetor; to this was added, in A.D. 39, the tetrarchy of Antipas, whom he had accused of treason. As king, Agrippa resisted Gaius's insistence that his imperial image be set up in Jewish places of worship, especially in the Jerusalem temple, and strove to protect the traditional privileges granted Jews throughout the empire. To win approval of the Pharisic party, Agrippa persecuted the Christians in Palestine (Acts 12.1–6). Gaius's assassination (A.D. 41) found Agrippa in Rome, and by his immediate support of the reluctant Claudius he ensured his favor as emperor. Claudius added Judea, Samaria, and Idumea to Agrippa's kingdom and raised him to the titular rank of consul. Agrippa thus ruled over a territory equal to that of Herod the Great. His reign was, however, inefficient and extravagant. Moreover, by taking initiatives forbidden to a vassal king, Agrippa foolishly strained relations with Rome. He died prematurely, after being seized by a sudden illness at a public event in Caesarea (Acts 12.20–23).

Agrippa II, b. A.D. 27; d. probably c. 93. Since he was only 17 at the death of his father Agrippa I, he was too young to succeed to the throne. Claudius placed the whole of the kingdom again under a Roman procurator; supervision of Jewish religious affairs was given over to Herod, King of Chalcis, Agrippa I's brother. In A.D. 50, two years after the latter's death, Claudius appointed Agrippa to take his uncle's place, and three years later he enlarged his holdings by substituting for Chalcis the former tetrarchy of Philip and the tetrarchies of Abilene and Noarus; Nero in the following year added four toparchies in Galilee and the Perea. Agrippa, though using the Roman name M. Julius Agrippa, conformed externally to the Jewish Law. He required that his sisters' non-Jewish husbands be circumcised; yet his sister Berenice lived with him, giving scandal to his Jewish subjects. In A.D. 60 the newly appointed Roman procurator Porcius Festus asked Agrippa to help him assess the case of Paul (Acts chapters 25–26). The high-handed behavior of Festus' successor Gessius Florus stirred the people to rebellion, and Agrippa was unable to persuade them to submit to Roman authority. In the revolt Agrippa consistently took the side of Rome; he accompanied both Cestius Gallus and Vespasian in their campaigns. Agrippa's close ties to both Vespasian and Titus served him well after the end of the revolt. Visiting Rome in A.D. 75 with Berenice, he was given the titular rank of praetor. He remained king until his death; his territory was afterward put under direct Roman administration.

Bibliography: J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:265–266. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 43–45. A. ROSENBERG, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al., 10.1 (1917) 143–150. A. H. M. JONES, The Herods of Judaea (Oxford 1938) 184–261. S. H. PEROWNE, The Later Herods (New York 1959).

[J. P. M. WALSH]

AGUADO, PEDRO DE

Chronicler of the conquest of Venezuela and Colombia; b. Valdemoro (Madrid), 1538; d. probably Bogotá, 1609? He became a Franciscan and in 1560 was included in an expedition of 50 missionaries who were being sent to Peru. He left Spain in 1561 and disembarked in Cartagena. After doing missionary work among the native tribes, he became guardian of the Franciscan convent in Bogotá and enlarged the establishment. As provincial, he went to Spain in 1573 on important business. He must have just written the Recopilación historial, based on Medrano's account, for he referred to it as having been completed in the petition he presented at court in 1575.

After reworking the chronicle, he presented it in 1579 to obtain permission for publication. Although permission was granted, the work was not published then. In 1583 he was back in Bogotá and in 1589 he was commissary in Cartagena.

Aguado wrote with the ideas of the COUNTER REFORMATION, presenting events as being the work of men in the exercise of their free will and asserting that therefore men were subject to disciplinary punishment if they acted against the right conscience. The work was divided into two parts, and it was not until 1906 that a partial version of the first part was published in Bogotá. In 1913 and 1915 the second part was published in Caracas. The entire work was published by the Academy of Madrid as Historia de Santa Marta (1916–17) and Historia de Venezuela (1918–19). It was published under the title Recopilación historial in Bogotá in 1956. The manuscripts have been preserved in the Academy of Madrid, and copies are in the library of the Royal Palace.

Bibliography: P. DE AGUADO, Recopilación historial, 4 v. (Bogotá 1956–57) 1:14–23. A. LÓPEZ, “Historiadores franciscanos de Venezuela y Colombia: Fray Pedro de Aguado y Fray Pedro Simón,” Archivo Ibero-Americano 14 (1920) 207–235. G. MORÓN, Los cronistas y la historia (Caracas 1957). O. FALS BORDA, “Odyssey of a Sixteenth-Century Document: Fray Pedro Aguado’s Recopilación historial,” Hispanic American Historical Review 35 (1955) 203–220. D. RAMOS, “El cronista Pedro Simon,” in Noticias historiales (Caracas 1963).

[D. RAMOS]

AGUILAR, NICOLÁS

Priest and revolutionist; b. Tonacatepeque, El Salvador, Dec. 15, 1741; d. San Salvador, Sept. 12, 1818. In 1755 he was sent to Guatemala, where he studied under the Jesuits. On April 18, 1767, he was ordained in Olocuilta, El Salvador. Shortly afterward, in a competition, he won the post of pastor of San Salvador and performed his duties faithfully there until his death. In 1811 when San Salvador was governed by the unpopular intendant Don Antonio Gutiérrez Ulloa, Aguilar and José Matías DELGADO led a group that rose, on November 5, in armed rebellion in favor of independence. Their plan was to depose the intendant and take possession of 1,000 new muskets in the court of arms and some 200,000 pesos in the royal treasury. The insurrection failed because it was not well planned. Later, from the pulpit, Aguilar urged the populace to be tranquil and urged obedience to the captive king, Ferdinand VII. Although he continued to be active, he vacillated: sometimes he harangued the crowds to rise up in arms; other times he tried to subdue them, preaching love of neighbor and pardon of one’s enemy. In 1814 he directed a new uprising, which failed also. In his last years, although he was respected because of his advanced age, he suffered bitterly because of what happened to his two brothers, Manuel and Vicente, exemplary priests and patriots. Manuel was deported to Guatemala, and Vicente, who was blind, was imprisoned.

[S. MALAINA]

AGUILAR ALEMÁN, RODRIGO, ST.

Martyr, pastor; b. Mar. 13, 1875, Sayula, Jalisco, Diocese of Ciudad Guzmán, Mexico; d. Oct. 28, 1927, Unión de Tula, Jalisco, Diocese of Autlán. He studied at the auxiliary seminary of Ciudad Guzmán, where he showed exceptional literary talent. Following his ordination to the priesthood (1905), Fr. Aguilar served in various parishes. He was serving as interim pastor of the Unión de Tula when he was persecuted for his priesthood. He took refuge on a farm from where he continued to minister to the faithful and direct spiritual exercises. He was betrayed by one of his flock and arrested by troops under the command of Brigadier General Juan Izaguirre. He was hanged from a mango tree in the town square the following day. Thereafter his body was translated to the parish church at Tula. Aguilar was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

See Also: MEXICO, MODERN.

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

AGUSTÍN, ANTONIO

Humanist, scholar, reform bishop; b. Saragossa, Feb. 26, 1517; d. Tarragona, May 31, 1586. He studied at Alcalá, Salamanca, Bologna (1536) and Padua (1537). In 1541 he became a doctor of laws at Bologna and three years later, at the request of Emperor Charles V, was appointed auditor of the Roman Rota. In 1555 Paul IV dispatched him to England as nuncio to Queen MARY TUDOR and councilor to Cardinal Reginald POLE. The following year he was appointed bishop of Alife, Kingdom of Naples, and in 1561 was made bishop of Lérida in his native Spain. His participation in and support of the Council of TRENT and its ecclesiastical reforms prompted Gregory XIII to create him archbishop of Tarragona (1576). Throughout his life Agustín was concerned with the history and study of Roman and canon law; his best-known work in Roman law is Emendationum et opinionum libri IV ad Modestinum. His critical work, De emendatione Gratiani, is noteworthy in canon law. Agustín was also a scholar of liturgical and catechetical theology, classical philology, and heraldry. His collected works were published in eight volumes at Lucca (1768–74).

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts 3.1:723–28. L. SERRANO, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1: 1077–80. E. MAGNIN, Dictionnaire de droit canonique 1:628–30.

[C. L. HOHL, JR.]

AHERN, BARNABAS MARY

Passionist priest, Old Testament scholar and writer; b. Chicago, IL, Feb. 18, 1915; d. Chicago, IL, Jan. 9, 1995. Barnabas Mary Ahern entered the Passionist Preparatory Seminary at Normandy, Missouri, in 1928, was clothed as a novice in Louisville in 1932, and simply professed in 1933. Following his ordination to the priesthood on June 7, 1941, he pursued further theological, biblical, and Semitic studies at the Catholic University of America, where he received the S.T.L. (1942); at the École Biblique in Jerusalem (1947–48); and at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome (1956–58). He received his S.S.D. from the Pontifical Biblical Commission.

Ahern taught scripture in Chicago 1943–1947, again from 1948 to 1956, and in Louisville 1959–1962. From 1962 to 1966, he was called to Rome to serve as peritus at Vatican II. He taught again in the United States from 1965 to 1970 (St. Meinrad's and the Catholic Theological Union). Ahern then returned to Rome, where he was involved with various congregations and commissions, and taught at both the Gregorian University and the Regina Mundi Institute. Poor health resulted in his returning to the U.S. in 1978, until he was able to travel to Africa to teach in Kenya from 1984 to 1989.

Among other scholarly activities, Ahern was involved in work on the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine's translation of the scriptures (later known as the New American Bible). He was president of the Catholic Biblical Association of America (1964–65), a member of both the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1969–75) and the International Theological Commission (1970–85). In addition to his scholarly contributions, Ahern is equally known for his work in publications such as the commentary series The New Testament Reading Guide, of which he became editor in 1960, and the periodical The Bible Today, which he edited from 1962 to 1975.

Bibliography: A bibliography of Ahern's publications, listing 12 books and 69 articles, can be found in A Voice Crying out in the Desert: Preparing for Vatican II with Barnabas M. Ahern, C.P., ed. C. STUHLMUELLER and S. MACDONALD (Collegetown 1996).

[J. JENSEN]

AHIKAR (ACHIOR)

Hero of a story found in several forms and in many places of the ancient Near East. The story itself is accompanied by a long series of maxims typical of the wisdom literature of that part of the world [see WISDOM (IN THE BIBLE)]. This article treats first of the story, then considers the relationship between the Ahikar of the story and the Achior of the Books of Tobit and Judith.

Ahikar of the Aramaic Story. The narrative portion of the text relates the experiences of Ahikar who was purportedly chancellor and adviser of the Assyrian Kings Sennacherib (705–682 B.C.) and Esarhaddon (681–670). Being childless, he adopted a nephew, Nadan (Nadab), to whose education he devoted much time and effort. Thanks to this careful grooming, Nadan was chosen his uncle's successor. Once established in power, Nadan forgot his benefactor and eventually became so antagonistic toward him that he had him condemned to death. By a clever ruse, however, Ahikar escaped execution and found safe refuge in a cave.

Sometime later, the pharaoh of Egypt sought the aid of Esarhaddon in his quest of a man wise enough to solve several profound riddles (such as how to construct a castle in the air). Esarhaddon turned to Nadan, but he declined the challenge, whereupon the king sorely regretted having consented to Ahikar's execution. At this propitious moment, the executioner presented himself and told how the doomed man had been spared. Ahikar was found; he readily solved all the riddles and was promptly restored to power. Nadan was flogged and cast into prison where he died miserably.

As might be expected, the 142 maxims that accompany the story are sage observations on such matters as education, obedience, filial respect, gratitude, and retribution. Both the story and the maxims enjoyed extraordinary popularity, as is evidenced by the traces of those that have been found in such varied sources as the Arabic Thousand and One Nights, the Greek edition of Aesop's Fables, the QUR'AN, and the Bible.

The oldest known text of the story is a fragmentary Aramaic version found among the Elephantine Papyri and dated in the late fifth century B.C. (tr. by H. L. Ginsberg, J. B. Pritchard, Ancient and Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament [Princeton 1955] 427–430). Other texts are available in Syriac, Arabic, and other languages (see F. C. Conybeare, J. R. Harris, and Agnes S.

Lewis, The Story of Ahikar from the Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Greek and Slavonic Versions, 2d ed., Cambridge 1913).

Scholars generally agree that the original story was written in Aramaic, in an Akkadian (Mesopotamian) milieu, perhaps as early as the seventh century B.C. and certainly no later than the sixth century B.C. They vary considerably, however, on their estimate of its historical reliability. All admit a degree of literary embellishment; some maintain that the essential elements of the narrative should be accepted as factual. This position has been strengthened by a text recently discovered at Uruk in which there is reference to a certain "Ahuqar" who was royal adviser under Esarhaddon. [Text first published by J. J. van Dijk. See report by J. C. Greenfield in The Journal of the American Oriental Society 82 (1962) 293].

Ahikar and the Achior of Tobit and Judith. A certain Achior is mentioned in four passages of the Book of TOBIT. He is presented as chief administrator and royal adviser ("keeper of the seal") under Esarhaddon and is claimed as Tobit's nephew (1.21–22) and friend (2.10). Both Achior and his nephew, Nadab, were among the guests at Tobias's wedding (11.18), and explicit mention is made of Nadab's ingratitude and disgrace (14.10). In view of these striking similarities there can be little doubt that this Achior is to be identified with Ahikar of the Aramaic Story. Moreover, the spelling of the name in the Greek text [$\text{A}\chi\iota(\alpha)\chi\alpha\rho\omicron\varsigma$] eliminates any difficulty on that score.

Some scholars have suggested that the story of Tobit was in fact a mere adaptation of the Ahikar story. However, a careful reading of Tobit reveals almost no similarity between the themes of these two works. In Tobit, there are no riddles to be solved and, more important, there is no ungrateful nephew; rather, there is a most obedient son. There is some slight evidence of literary influence (e.g., 4.17); beyond that, one can say only that the author of Tobit wished to associate his hero with a famous sage who had also known adversity and was rewarded at the end.

In the Book of JUDITH, one of the main characters is an Ammonite leader called Achior ($\text{A}\chi\iota\omega\rho$). He expounds at length on the theological implications of Israel's history for the benefit of a skeptical Holofernes (5.5–21), is scorned and reproached for his efforts (6.2–13), and is forced to share Israel's lot (6.14–21). Thus he shares eventually in her victory also (14.6–10). There does not appear to be any demonstrable connection between this Achior and the Ahikar of the Aramaic Story.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 1:198–207. A. E. GOODMAN, in Documents from

Old Testament Times, ed. D. W. THOMAS (London 1958) 270–275. T. NÖLDEKE, Untersuchungen zum Achiqar-Roman (Berlin 1913).

[D. R. DUMM]

AḤMADIYYA

A sect claiming to be part of Orthodox Islam, although repudiated by both the Sunni and Shī'a branches of ISLAM. The Aḥmadiyya movement was founded by Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad (1839–1908) at Qādiyān in the Punjab (India). In 1891 he formally claimed the titles "al-MAHDĪ" (the leader who is to return to humanity according to Islamic and, more emphatically, Shī'a doctrine) and "al-Masīḥ" (the Messiah). The main lines of his doctrine, embodied in the Bay'ah, followed Islam more or less closely. However, his personal claims to messiahship were so offensive and so far exceeded the bounds of Islamic orthodoxy that the Aḥmadiyya came to be regarded by Orthodox Muslims generally as simply another syncretistic sect of a type frequently bred in western India. After the death of Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad's first caliph (Arabic khalīfah, "successor") in 1914, the Aḥmadiyya was split by a schism that separated from the so-called Qādiyāni Aḥmadiyya repudiating some of the founder's claims and the political activity of the movement. Since then, further schisms have occurred.

Bibliography: H. A. WALTER, The Ahmadiya Movement (London 1918). M. BASHIR-AL-DIN, The Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam (Chicago n.d.). J. S. TRIMMINGHAM, Islam in West Africa (Oxford 1959) 230–232.

[J. KRITZECK/EDS.]

AHURA MAZDA (OHRMAZD) AND AHRIMAN

The good God and the Evil Spirit in Zoroastrianism. In ZOROASTER'S Gāthās, Ahura Mazda, "The Wise Lord" (the ancient name of Ohrmazd, and used by Darius and his successors), was the father of the twin spirits—the Holy One (Spenta Mainyu) and the Destructive One (Anra Mainyu, hence Ahriman), who at the origin of the world made a choice, respectively, in favor of good and evil. Later, in more recent parts of the Avesta, Ahura Mazda became identified with the Holy One, thus becoming the direct opposite of Anra Mainyu, and on a level with him. The origin of evil is no longer explained as the consequence of a choice, but is either left unaccounted for, Ohrmazd and Ahriman being coeval, or reinterpreted in the light of ZERVANISM, a Persian speculative doctrine on time. Zervan, "Time," is said to have offered sacrifice for 1,000 years before the world existed, in order to have an offspring. At the end of this period, Ohrmazd was born to him, but also Ahriman—the latter as the result of a doubt that came to Zervan about the efficacy of his sacrifice.

Bibliography: R. C. ZAEHNER, The Dawn and Twilight of Zoroastrianism (New York 1961). J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN, La Religion de l'Iran ancien (Paris 1962).

[J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN]

AIDAN OF LINDISFARNE, ST.

Monastic bishop; d. Bamborough, Aug. 31, 651. Aidan (Aedan) was of Irish descent and while a monk at Iona, was invited by King OSWALD to reconvert the lapsed Northumbrian race. Consecrated bishop in 635, he established his see in Lindisfarne. BEDE, almost the sole source of knowledge of the saint, praised his ascetic life and evangelical fervor, and told of his many miracles, but regretted his adherence to the schismatic practices of the Celtic Church, especially over the dating of Easter. Aidan had several famous pupils including SS. CHAD, Eata, and Hilda. Cuthbert, while keeping sheep, saw his soul being carried to heaven by angels. Some of Aidan's relics were taken to Ireland in 664. Others were removed from Lindisfarne in 875; in 995 they were translated to Durham with the body of St. Cuthbert of Lindisfarne.

Feast: August 31.

Bibliography: D. ADAM, Flame in my heart: St Aidan for today (Harrisburg, Pa. 1998). BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 3.5, 14–17. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6: 688–694. L. GOUGAUD, Christianity in Celtic Lands, tr. M. JOYNT (London 1932). A. THOMAS, Brands from the burning (London 1937). M. CREIGHTON, Dictionary of National Biography 1:182–183. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:644. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:451–452.

[B. COLGRAVE]

AIDS

An acronym for Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome, AIDS refers to a terminal condition of opportunistic infections resulting from the suppression of the immune system. In 1983, researchers working independently at the American Cancer Institute in the U.S. and at the Pasteur Institute in France simultaneously identified the cause of this immune suppression. Commonly known as the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV), this human retrovirus infects the T-4 Helper cells of the immune system, gradually destroying the person's ability to fight off what would normally be common infections.

It is estimated that between 20% and 30% of those who become infected with HIV will develop AIDS within five years. Others who become infected may develop AIDS Related Complex (ARC), a condition similar to AIDS, though generally less severe. A third group who become infected, while able to infect others, will remain healthy indefinitely.

Transmission. HIV is transmitted only through direct contact of one's own blood with infected blood, blood products, and bodily fluids which contain a large volume of white blood cells, such as seminal and vaginal fluids. The virus has been isolated in other bodily fluids such as tears and saliva, but this is rare, and only in situations where the person had AIDS rather than ARC or test HIV-positive. Infection through blood contact with these bodily fluids has never been proven, and has been deemed by the Center for Disease Control as extremely unlikely.

A primary means of infection is through the shared use of non-sterile needles and syringes by intravenous drug users. The other most common means of transmission is through sexual intercourse with an infected person. Lesions, often imperceptible, caused by penile penetration of the vagina or the anus may allow HIV infected seminal fluid to enter a person's blood. Studies have shown that transmission is most likely during anal intercourse with an infected male due to the more sensitive anal lining, and during vaginal intercourse when the woman has a history of previous sexually transmitted diseases which leave lesions likely to increase bleeding during intercourse. Infection of the male by the female during vaginal intercourse is less likely, but may result if infected vaginal fluid enters any sores along the penis or within the urethra which may result from intercourse or another sexually transmitted disease. Infection may also result when seminal or vaginal fluid is taken into the mouth, and if there are sores or cancers present which may bleed.

In the early stages of the AIDS epidemic some cases of infection were reported to have resulted from blood transfusions and clinical contact with infected specimens. Improved screening and blood testing procedures have effectively protected the national blood supply, and medical literature reports that, if normal procedures are followed for the handling of infectious patients and specimens, the risk of contracting HIV is actually less than that of contracting other infectious diseases.

Finally, children born to mothers who are HIV infected are at a high risk for themselves becoming infected. The child may become infected during pregnancy, during child birth, or during breast feeding.

Health Care. Although studies show a great concern among health care workers and their families about infection, the risks involved in caring for AIDS or HIV infected patients are well within the range deemed acceptable for other infectious diseases. Researchers have focused attention on the development of a vaccine to prevent infection, as well as treatment to prevent the development of AIDS among those who become infected.

Of great concern to health care workers is the successful treatment of opportunistic infections among those with AIDS. Care has been complicated by the fact that, among those with AIDS, conventional treatments for infections are often unsuccessful, and there is a high incidence of recurrence when infections are successfully treated. In addition, similar treatments for similar infections among different people, or even the same person in the case of recurrence, do not always result in similar responses. Decisions concerning appropriate treatment or prognosis are, therefore, difficult to make.

Moral and Pastoral Issues. The incidence of AIDS raises many moral and pastoral issues concerning an appropriate Christian response. A number of American dioceses, especially in metropolitan areas where the incidence of AIDS is high, have sought to address this issue. For example, they have sponsored Hospice care for AIDS patients, and have taken a leadership role in protecting such civil rights as housing, employment, insurance and education for those who become infected. The 1988 letter of the California Conference of Catholic Bishops, "A Call to Compassion: Pastoral Letter on AIDS to the Catholic Community of California," is just one example of the local church's involvement in the formation of educational, health care and public policy to address this issue.

Nationally, the administrative board of the United States Catholic Conference published "The Many Faces of AIDS: A Gospel Response" in November 1987. Although this letter precipitated a great deal of controversy over its statement that a discussion of condoms could be included as part of the broad factual picture concerning the spread of HIV, the principal focus of the letter concerned the protection of the dignity and rights of those who become infected. For example, they affirmed that AIDS is not the result of sin, expressed alarm concerning the increased violence against the gay and lesbian community as a result of AIDS, opposed quarantining persons infected with HIV, decried the exclusion of people infected from health insurance coverage, opposed mandatory antibody testing, and expressed concern that some in the healthcare industry refuse to provide medical or dental care to those with AIDS or presumed to be at risk.

The AIDS Quilt on Central Park's Great Lawn, New York City, June 1988. The quilt consists of panels bearing the names and images of people who have died of AIDS. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

They conclude by stating that "persons with AIDS, their families, and their friends need solidarity, comfort, and support," and encourage each local diocese to appoint a person responsible for coordinating its ministry to persons with AIDS and their loved ones. Quoting Pope John Paul II, they remind the reader to love others as God loves us, and that "God loves those of you who are sick, those who are suffering from AIDS and from AIDS-related complex."

Bibliography: D. BADER, OP, and E. MCMILLAN, AIDS: Ethical Guidelines for Healthcare Providers (St. Louis 1987). M. L. BROWN, "AIDS and Ethics: Concerns and Considerations," Oncology Nurses Forum 14 (January/February 1987) 69-73. R. C. GALLO, "The AIDS Virus," Science 256 (January 1987) 46-56. G. W. MATTERS and V. S. NESLUND, "The Initial Impact of AIDS on Public Health Law in the United States-1986," Journal of the American Medical Association 257 (January 1987) 344-351. R. H. SUNDERLAND and E. E. SHELP, AIDS: A Manual for Pastoral Care (Philadelphia 1987). "Surgeon General's Report on Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome," Journal of the American Medical Association tion 256 (November 1986) 2764–2789. USCC, The Many Faces of AIDS: A Gospel Response (Washington, D.C. 1987).

[J. F. TUOHEY]

AIGUANI, MICHELE (ANGUANI, ANGRANI)

Theologian; b. Bologna, c. 1320; d. Bologna, Nov. 16, 1400. He is commonly known as Michael of Bologna. After joining the Carmelite Order, he studied Scripture (1360) and theology (1362–63) at Paris, where in 1364–65 he obtained his master's degree. For years he taught theology at Bologna. He was elected definitor (1372) and provincial (1375 and 1379) of his own province of Bologna. In 1380, when the WESTERN SCHISM had divided also the Carmelite Order, Aiguani was nominated vicar-general of the whole order by Urban VI (d. 1389). In 1381 Aiguani was elected prior general, an office he retained until 1386 when Urban deposed him, probably because he was unjustly accused of opposition to the pope. However, he was vindicated by Boniface IX (d. 1404), who in 1395 nominated him again as vicar-general for the province of Bologna. Aiguani held a philosophical position between voluntarism and seminomialism. He long remained one of the main theologians of his order; this explains why so many manuscripts of his works are extant and why his principal works have been reprinted so often. His chief works were: Lectura Sententiarum (Milan 1510), Lectura super Psalterio (Compluti 1524).

Bibliography: B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, De Scriptoribus scholasticis saec. XIV ex Ordine Carmelitarum (Louvain 1931) 324–93.

[H. SPIKKER]

AIGULF OF LÉRINS, ST.

Abbot; b. Blois c. 630; d. c. 674. At 20, Aigulf (Aigulphus, Ayou, Ayoul) entered the monastery of Fleury. Abbot Mummolus commissioned Aigulf to go to Monte Cassino, which had been ravaged by the Lombards, and to bring back the remains of SS. Benedict and Scholastica. The success of his mission is questionable (Leccisotti, Il Sepolcro di s. Benedetto, Monte Cassino, 1951). In 671 Aigulf was made abbot of Lérins. His severe rule led to his abduction and martyrdom on Capri.

Feast: Sept. 3.

Bibliography: Vita, J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedictii (Venice 1733–40) 2:627–643, see also 338–344 for account of the translatio. Passio, Acta Sanctorum Sept. 1:728–763. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5.2:1709–60. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 9:77–79. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:244–245. E. EWIG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:226. C. LEFEBVRE, Bibliotheca Sanctorum 1:633–634.

[B. F. SCHERER]

AIKENHEAD, MARY

Foundress of the Irish Sisters of Charity; b. Cork, Ireland, Jan. 19, 1787; d. Dublin, July 22, 1858. Because of her early attraction toward the service of the poor, Daniel MURRAY, then coadjutor bishop of Dublin and later archbishop there, persuaded her to form a religious congregation and received authorization from the Holy See to establish it. Mary and one associate then spent a three-year noviceship at the Bar Convent of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, York, England. The IRISH SISTERS OF CHARITY began their institutional existence when the two women returned to the North William Street Orphanage, their new home in Dublin, and took the usual three vows of religion, plus a fourth vow of dedication to the poor. The sisters cared for the orphans, set up a day school, and visited neighboring poor families. Steady growth in numbers of recruits and of houses enabled the congregation to teach religion in parochial schools and to staff additional free schools and a Magdalen refuge. In 1834 the sisters opened St. Vincent's Hospital in Dublin, the first Catholic hospital in Ireland. In 1838 they became the first religious women to labor in Australia. For the last 27 years of her life, Mother Aikenhead directed her institute while prostrate on her bed with chronic spinal trouble. The decree introducing her cause of beatification in Rome was issued in 1921. Since her death the congregation has spread to England, Scotland, the United States, and Africa.

Bibliography: M. B. BUTLER, A Candle Was Lit: The Life of Mother Mary Aikenhead (Dublin 1953). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 13 (1921) 234–38.

[E. MCDERMOTT]

AIMERIC OF PIACENZA

Dominican master general; b. Lombardy; d. Bologna, Aug. 19, 1327. He entered the DOMINICANS at Bologna (1267), studied at Milan, and taught for 24 years at Bologna. He also served as provincial of the province of Greece. He was active in organizing studies in the order, but is best known for his role in the trial of the TEMPLARS. Ordered by Clement V (1309) to proceed against the Templars in Castile and Leon, Aimeric exonerated them after an investigation conducted without torture. He believed that his order's exemption allowed him to dispense with torture, evidently unaware that Clement had explicitly ordered it in a bull dated March 17, 1310. He was summoned to the Council of Vienne but did not attend. It is probable that he resigned as master general (May 30, 1311) rather than take part in the process against the Templars.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.2:494–496. D. A. MORTIER, Histoire des maîtres généraux de l'ordre des Frères Prêcheurs, 8 v. (Paris 1903–20) 2:421–473.

[P. M. STARRS]

AIN-TRAZ, SYNODS OF

Ain-Traz is the summer residence of the Melchite patriarch of Antioch when he is in Lebanon. This residence was purchased in 1811 by Patriarch Agapios Matar to be used as a seminary for married priests. It is here that the Melchite patriarch convenes with his bishops to study, discuss, and decide on the major issues concerning their community. In the course of modern Melchite history, two of the synods held at Ain-Traz deserve particular attention.

Ain-Traz Synod I was convoked and presided over by the then newly elected patriarch Maximos Mazloum on Dec. 13, 1835. The canons outlined by this synod relate to the Melchite discipline. They regulate Baptism, Confirmation, the Liturgy of the Presanctified, Confession, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, Matrimony, communication in sacris, the holy days of obligation, the clergy (garb, commerce, residence, catechism, exercise of medicine, inheritance), the religious (garb, exclaustation), pastoral visits of the bishops, alms to the seminary of Ain-Traz, charitable foundations, fast and abstinence, pilgrimages to different churches, usury, etc. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith confirmed in forma generali the 25 canons listed above with few modifications of the text submitted. In this manner the Melchite discipline, outlined at the Synod of Saint-Sauveur in 1790 and reaffirmed at the Synod of Qarqafee in 1806, received the official stamp of the Church on Jan. 13, 1838.

While the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was studying the acts of this synod, Patriarch Maximos Mazloum received a diploma from the sultan in Constantinople recognizing him as the sole civil leader of all the Melchites in the Turkish Empire, and from the Holy See in Rome, the right to add to his title the words “Alexandria and Jerusalem.” As a result, his jurisdiction was extended to encompass the territories of the old patriarchates of the East.

Mary Aikenhead on commemorative postage stamp.

Ain-Traz Synod II was called by Patriarch Cyril Jehunla and was held from May 30 to July 8, 1909. The acts are not printed. It is certain, however, that they have served as fontes to the modern codification of the Eastern Churches as it concerns the Melchite congregation.

Besides these two official synods, each successive patriarch meets regularly with his bishops at Ain-Traz to discuss current events. Their directives are printed in the major publications of the community, mainly Al Masarrat, published by the Paulist Fathers at Harrissa; Ar Risalat Al Muhalisiat, published by the Salvatorian Fathers at Saïda; and Le Lien, published by the Patriarchal clergy in Cairo.

Bibliography: C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 11:339–379. J. CHAMMAS, Hulasat Tarîh al-Kanîsat al-Malakîyat, 3 v. (Sidon, Leb. 1952) 3:185.

[L. MALOUF]

AINAY, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery of Saint-Martin and former collegiate church, located in the marshy peninsula

between the Rhone and the Saône, slightly upstream from the junction of the two rivers, in present-day Lyons, France, Diocese of Lyons (Latin, Athanacum monasterium or Interamnense mon.). Founded in the 6th century, it suffered a serious crisis in the mid-9th century, and was resettled by Benedictine monks who came apparently from the Paris area. The abbey church, wholly preserved today, was consecrated by Pope Paschal II on Jan. 27, 1107. The abbey prospered in subsequent centuries, and at the end of the 13th century it controlled 200 parishes in the southeastern part of present-day France. Yet this powerful abbey produced no great ecclesiastical writer and gave the Church no saint. Its temporal power, as well as its spiritual influence, was severely curtailed by the WARS OF RELIGION. It was secularized by a papal bull of Dec. 4, 1685, becoming a collegiate church; the former religious became a chapter of CANONS. During the French Revolution three of its canons were guillotined. The church is still used as a parish church and is the seat of an archpriest of the city of Lyons. It has been elevated to the rank of a minor basilica.

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana, v. 1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v. 14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 4:233–241. H. A. CHARPIN-FEUGEROLLES and M. C. GUIGUE, eds., Grand cartulaire de l'abbaye d'Ainay, 2 v. (Lyons 1885). J. B. VANEL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:1195–1201. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme, 1:248–249.

[L. GAILLARD]

AIRVAULT, MONASTERY OF

Former monastery of Canons Regular of St. Augustine in the Diocese of POITIERS, west central France. It was founded as a collegiate chapter c. 991 by Audéarde (d. c. 1013) and reformed with Augustinian canons from Lesterp by Bp. Peter II of Poitiers (1087–1115). It declined and was impoverished by the Hundred Years' War; the conventual buildings were destroyed in the Wars of Religion (1568). In 1477 the first commendatory abbot appeared, and by 1546 Airvault was definitely in COMMENDATION. The community of 12 canons, appointed by the abbot, joined none of the reform congregations of canons in the 17th century. The suppression ordered in 1768 by the COMMISSION OF REGULARS was not enforced, and the canons continued their services in the church of St-Pierre until 1791. The 11th-century church, redone in the 13th century, now serves a parish.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:39. P. DE MONSABERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:1219–23. H. BEAUCHET-FILLEAU, "Recherches sur Airvault: Son château et son abbaye," Memoires de la Société des antiquaires de l'Ouest, 24

(1857) 177–369. J. BERTHELÉ, "Les Voûtes Plantagenet des églises d'Airvault et de St. Jouin," Revue poitevine et saintongeaise, 4 (Melle 1887) 1–15.

[N. BACKMUND]

AIX, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Also known as Aquensis In Gallia; located in southeastern France, 20 miles north of Marseilles; it corresponds to the arrondissements of Aix and Arles in Bouches-du-Rhône department and is 1,768 square miles in area; metropolitan see since 445. Since 1822 the archbishop has also held the titles of ARLES (once a metropolitan and for a while a primatial see) and Embrun (once a metropolitan see). The area of the diocese has varied greatly. Until 1789 it corresponded to the old Roman civitas (96 parishes). In 1802 it included the departments of Var and Bouches-du-Rhône. In 1822 it lost Marseilles arrondissement and Var department. Its suffragans c. 800 (Apt, Fréjus, Gap, Riez, and Sisteron) comprised the old Roman province Narbonensis II, less Antibes. ALGIERS (1838–67) and Nice (1860) were added later.

The 11th-century legend that the sees of the lower Rhône were founded by disciples of Christ (Lazarus, Mary Magdalen, and Martha) is without value. The first known bishop dates from c. 379. Until c. 1000 the history of Aix is very obscure. Many lacunae in its list of bishops correspond with the domination of the Arian Goths and to the years when Saracens raided from their base at Garde-Freinet (until 972). After the Muslims were expelled, Aix revived and became the capital of the County of Provence, with which its history then merged. Despite Abp. Jean de Saint-Chamond, who in 1566 announced from the episcopal throne his apostasy to Protestantism and married, the diocese remained strongly Catholic. The Catholic reform followed the rulings of the Council of Aix (1585); but Jansenism, supported by members of the Parlement of Provence (1501–1789), troubled the diocese, especially in the 17th century.

Of 34 synodal statutes known (1362–1760), 22 date from the 18th century. Provincial councils were held in 1103, 1112, 1409, 1585, 1838, and 1850. The most important was that of 1585, under Abp. Alexandre Canigiani (1576–91), an Italian who attended the Councils of Milan held by St. Charles BORROMEO, whose disciple he was. The decisions at Aix in 1585 contained the essence of Borromeo's rules and spirit: definition of an ideal bishop, rules of the episcopal life, and relations with clergy and faithful; pastoral duties, which were also insisted upon, included preaching, administration of the Sacraments, pastoral visitations, validation of Baptism, strict rules on the Sacrament of Reconciliation, the spirit of Rome in the liturgy, rules for seminaries (Canigiani founded one in 1580), and division of the diocese into itinerant vicariates with regular inspection. Borromeo's spirit and methods thus were introduced before the spirit of French reform developed. Other archbishops of Aix were PETER AUREOLI (1321–22), Guillaume FILLASTRE (1420–22), Gilbert GÉNÉBRARD (1593–97), Alphonse du Plessis de Richelieu (1626–29, Carthusian brother of Cardinal Richelieu and later archbishop of Lyons), Jérôme de Grimaldi (1648–85, who left his goods to the seminary he started), Charles de Vintimille (1708–29, transferred to Paris), Jérôme Champion de Cicé (1771–1801, ecclesiastical minister of Louis XVI who played a role in the Estates General of 1789), and François Xavier Gouthe-Soulard (1886–1900).

Famous people in Aix's history include St. EUCHERIUS OF LYONS (d. c. 450); St. ELZÉAR OF SABRAN (1285–1323), canonized with his wife Delphine in 1369; Abp. Honoré de Laurens of Embrun (1600–12); Ignace Cottolendi, vicar apostolic of Nanjing (1630–62); and Cardinal Abp. J. H. Guibert of Paris (1871–86). The former Cistercian Abbey of Silvacane (1147–1440) and the 12th-century Benedictine MONTMAJOUR in Arles were distinguished. The archbishop was chancellor of the university founded in Aix (1403) by the Pisan Pope Alexander V, with faculties of theology, law, and medicine. Aix, once known for baths (Aquae Sextiae, after the consul Sextius who founded it in 123 B.C.), has beautiful monuments: the 12th-century Cloister of Saint-Sauveur; the composite (5th–16th century) Cathedral of Saint-Sauveur with a 5th-century tomb of St. Mitrias (d. c. 300) and a 5th-century baptistery; Sainte-Madeleine and the Jesuit chapel (17th century); and Saint-Jean-de-Malté (13th–15th century). Arles has the church and cloister of Saint-Trophime (11th–15th century), Notre-Dame de la Major (12th century), and the Romanesque Saint-Honorat. Sainte-Marthe is a shrine in Tarascon. Among other shrines in the diocese, many to the Blessed Virgin, is that of Saintes-Maries of the Sea (for gypsies) in honor of St. Sarah, the gypsy (servant) of Mary Magdalen and Martha.

Bibliography: É. GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, 2 v. (Paris 1947–58; rev. ed. 1965—).

[E. JARRY/EDS.]

AKATHISTOS

From the Greek ἀ-κόθιστος, meaning not seated, standing. It is perhaps the most celebrated hymn of the Byzantine Church, and belongs to the poetical genre known as kontakion (see BYZANTINE RITE, CHANTS OF). It is performed at the vigil service of the fifth Saturday in

Church in Aix-en-Provence, France. (©Ric Ergenbright/CORBIS)

Lent, a calendar position that it occupied from an early date; its original association, however, was more probably with the Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.

The body of the poem comprises 24 stanzas (oikoi) linked by an alphabet acrostic—the first 12 treating of the Incarnation and the infancy of Christ, the last 12 alternating the praises of God and His Mother in the even- and odd-numbered stanzas respectively; the concluding stanza, by exception, is addressed to the Virgin. Each of the stanzas presents the same seven-line metric pattern, but the odd ones add to this a series of salutations to the Virgin: 12 lines in metrically matching pairs, each line beginning with Χαῖρε (Hail), and the entire stanza concluding with the unvarying refrain Χαῖρε, νύμφη ἀνύμφευτε (Hail, unwedded Bride). The even stanzas have simply “Alleluia” as refrain. As an introduction (prooimion) to the 24 stanzas, early MSS give another stanza, of independent metrical design and standing outside the alphabet acrostic: τῆ ὑπερμάχῳ στρατηγῷ . . . (To the invincible Leader. . .), a hymn of thanksgiving to the Virgin for the delivery of Constantinople from siege; in fact, the chronicles mention several such occasions at which the Akathistos was presumably sung. It has been conjectured that the original prooimion was not this but another stanza, now found as an independent hymn for the same office: Τὸ προσταχθὲν μυστικῶδ λαβὼν . . . (Receiving secretly the command. . .), which corresponds more closely to the 24 stanzas in wording and theme. But quite possibly neither stanza was part of the original composition of the hymn.

The authorship and date of the Akathistos have been the subject of much discussion; the medieval sources offer different attributions, and modern scholars in turn have advanced the claims of various candidates for the honor: Romanos in the sixth century, Patriarch Sergios and George Pisides in the seventh, Patriarchs Germanos and Photios in the eighth and ninth centuries respectively. The latest of these claimants has been eliminated by the discovery of a Latin translation of the Akathistos that can hardly be later than the early ninth century. As for the others, the prevailing tendency in more recent scholarship has been to assign the hymn to the sixth century, or even somewhat earlier; and the case for the authorship of Romanos himself has been forcefully argued, notably by Wellesz, despite its weakness in the MS tradition. For other scholars the hymn remains anonymous, perhaps the work of some imitator of Romanos; thus the question of attribution seems unlikely to receive any definitive solution.

The earliest extant musical sources for the Akathistos, completely notated, date from the thirteenth century; there is little reason to suppose that the music they contain was that originally accompanying the text. The melody conforms to the highly ornate and formulaic style characteristic of the kontakion in that period; the service book in which it occurs was, in all likelihood, of a type designed for the use of soloists. The music is written out in full over the individual stanzas, suggesting that, at a time when virtually all kontakia had been reduced to prooimion and a single oikos, the Akathistos, at least on occasion, was performed in its musical entirety. In the present-day service the medieval melody has been replaced by one of more recent origin, and the stanzas succeeding the first are generally read, not sung.

As mentioned previously, the Akathistos existed in a Latin version by the late eighth or early ninth century; thereafter, its rhetoric and imagery appear as the inspiration of a considerable repertory of Latin hymns. The subject is given detailed exposition in the study of G. G. Meersseman cited below.

Bibliography: E. WELLESZ, A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography (2d ed. Oxford 1961). The Akathistos Hymn, introd. and transcribed by E. WELLESZ (Monumenta musicae byzantinae, Transcripta 9; Copenhagen 1957). E. WELLESZ, "The 'Akathistos': A Study in Byzantine Hymnography," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 9 and 10 (1956) 141–174. C. DE GRANDE, L'Inno acatisto (Florence 1948). G. G. MEERSSEMAN, "Der Hymnos Akathistos im Abendland," in Spicilegium Friburgense, v. 2–3 (Fribourg 1956–60). P. MAAS, "Das Kontakion," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 19 (1910) 285–306. P. F. KRYPIAKIEWICZ, "De Hymni Acahisti auctore," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 18 (1901) 357–382. M. HUGLO, "L'Ancienne version latine de l'hymne acathiste," Muséon 64 (1951) 27–61. For a more recent English translation, see MOTHER

MARY and K. WARE in The Lenten Triodion (London-Boston, 1978) 422–37.

[I. THOMAS/EDS.]

AKHNATON (AMENHOTEP IV)

Akhnaton is the name that Amenhotep IV gave to himself, although Egyptologists, following the practice of Manetho, usually call him Amenophis IV. He was the son and successor of Amenhotep III and ruled for some 17 years, about the middle of the 14th century B.C. (1372–1354, according to E. Drioton and J. Vandier, L'Égypte, 3d ed., 631; 1353–1336, according to W. Helck-E. Otto, Kleines Wörterbuch der Ägyptologie 37). His mother was Tiye. His wife, Nefertiti, cannot be identified, as some have claimed, with Princess Tadukhepa, the daughter of the Mitannian King Tushratta; her nurse was Teye, the wife of Ay, and she had a sister in Egypt named Benremut. The history of the reign of Amenhotep IV is dominated by the religious revolution that he unleashed against Amon and the other Egyptian gods. This revolt so engaged his energies that it caused the collapse of the empire that Thutmosis III had built up in Syria and Phoenicia.

The Aton Reform. From the beginning of his reign, Amenhotep IV showed his devotion to a particular form of the sun-god, the solar disk, which was called Aton. Aton appears more and more frequently on the monuments and in the texts that date from the beginning of the New Empire, especially under Amenhotep III; but from this it does not follow that the solar disk had already been the object of a special cult. East of the temple of Amon at Karnak, Amenhotep IV built for Aton a solar temple like the one in Heliopolis. Its god was represented under the form of a solar disk, the rays of which ended in human hands. It is important to note that the colossal statues of the king that adorned this temple were made in a new style that was to become characteristic of the Amarna Art, as it is called. In the tombs of his officials, e.g., that of the vizier, Ramose, the traditional art is also suddenly replaced by this realistic style. This shows that the sovereign was able to impose his novel ideas on his contemporaries, and we can suppose that these art forms served merely as means to express his equally revolutionary notions in religious matters. Thereupon the conflict that this involved with the traditionalists reached a critical point, and things began to happen quickly. In the sixth year of his reign Amenhotep IV left Thebes and founded a city, halfway between Luxor and Cairo, on a site that is currently known as el-Amarna, but that he called Akhetaton (the Horizon of Aton). Here he surrounded himself with officials who were homines novi and were totally devoted to him. Soon he proscribed the cult of most of the other gods, particularly that of Amon. Their temples were closed, their statues smashed, and their names chiseled out of every monument, whether big or little. His own name, Amenhotep, "Amon is merciful," he changed to Akhnaton, "Useful to Aton."

Akhnaton's new doctrine finds its best expression in the famous hymn to Aton that appears in certain tombs of his officials at el-Amarna, most notably the tomb of Ay, who later succeeded Tut-ankh-Amon on the throne of Egypt (see J. B. Pritchard's Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 369–71). Akhnaton himself is credited with its composition. The tenor of this hymn is thoroughly monotheistic; yet a careful study of it shows that it does not really contain much that had not been said before in the hymns to Amon and various other gods. Actually, the traditional cults also showed a strong monotheistic tendency (see EGYPT, ANCIENT), but the syncretism that is the basis of the old religion is entirely absent here, and it is precisely this that constitutes, above all else, the novelty of the hymn. The new faith ignored all the old gods that were venerated under animal or human forms and worshiped only the sun-god, under the form of the solar disk. An exception, however, must be made for the cult of the bull, Mnevis, which was also introduced at Akhetaton. This detail shows how much the religion of Akhnaton was indebted to the Heliopolitan cult. The conclusion can be drawn that what the king really did was to carry to its extreme the ideology of the ancient solar religion by abolishing, as E. Drioton expresses it, "the contradiction, that had always been felt by the more enlightened thinkers, between the monotheism professed by the educated classes and their official polytheism" ["Le monothéisme de L'Ancienne Égypte" Cahiers d'histoire égyptienne (Cairo 1949) 167]. There is no need, therefore, to look outside of Egypt, as some have done, for the motives that inspired this reform.

The relations with Heliopolis are evident also in the plan of the sanctuary at Akhetaton, which, though more complicated, belongs to the general type of solar temples. The first part consisted of the per-hat, "house of jubilation," a courtyard with two altars, and of the gem-Aton, "Aton was found," a series of courtyards with altars. The second part, the house of benben, likewise comprised two courtyards, one of which was enclosed with a peristyle within which was probably an obelisk.

End of the Reign. Such simple and rational doctrine, however, proved insufficient, even though it was propagated by a fanatical prophet, who was at the same time both a poet and an originator of a new aesthetic ideal. Immemorial tradition showed itself still stronger. The Aton doctrine won few adepts apart from Akhnaton himself, and scarcely was he dead when even his former friends returned to the old religion. The last years of his life were not happy. His second daughter, Meketaton, died. His wife, Nefertiti, fell into disgrace, and in her palace to the south of Akhetaton her name and image were everywhere replaced by those of her oldest daughter, Meritaton, the wife of Akhnaton's younger brother, Smenkhkarē, who began to make conciliatory gestures to the Amon priesthood. Tut-ankh-Aton, the husband of Akhnaton's third daughter and later his successor, changed his name to Tut-ankh-Amon for his short reign at Thebes, during which he officially restored the Amon cult. Horemheb, when ascending the throne, wiped out the last traces of the Aton heresy. It was probably at this time that Akhnaton suffered his damnatio memoriae and that his body was doomed to destruction, though perhaps secretly saved by some of the small group of his loyal followers. Succeeding generations regarded him merely as "the enemy at Akhetaton."

Bibliography: J. A. WILSON, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago 1951) ch. 9; also available as The Culture of Ancient Egypt (Chicago 1956). A. H. GARDINER, Egypt of the Pharaohs (Oxford 1961) ch. 9. L. G. LEEUWENBERG, Echnaton (The Hague 1946).

[J. VERGOTE]

AKIBA BEN JOSEPH

The leading rabbi of his time and one of the founders of Talmudic JUDAISM; b. Palestine c. A.D. 50; d. there, c. 135. He took no interest in learning until he was well on in years, when he studied under Rabbi JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI at Jabneh (Jamnia). Later he founded his own academy, first at Lydda (Lod) and then at Bene Barak. He was the main spiritual force behind BAR KOKHBA in the latter's revolt against the Romans (132–35). After being arrested and tortured by the Romans, he died reciting the Shema Yisrael ("Hear, O Israel . . .," Judaism's profession of faith, citing Deuteronomy 6.4).

Rabbi Akiba (Akiva, Aqiba) was the first to make a systematic collection of the halakic traditions (see HALAKAH) of the Tannaim ("repeaters," the rabbis of the first two Christian centuries) who handed down the Oral Law (as distinct from the Written Law of Moses); this work of his, as continued by his disciple Rabbi Meïr and still in oral form, was further systematized and recorded in writing in Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI's MISHNAH. Another original contribution made by Akiba was his doctrine that the Oral Law was not immutable, but could be adjusted to changing conditions; since this is the basic principle guiding all Talmudic development, he is regarded as father of the TALMUD.

Exterior of Spring Hill College, Mobile, Alabama, 1830.

Bibliography: L. GINZBERG, The Jewish Encyclopedia 1:304–10. D. J. BORNSTEIN, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:7–22. S. COHEN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 1: 144–50. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:778–79. L. FINKELSTEIN, Akiba: Scholar, Saint and Martyr (New York 1936). A. GUTTMANN, “Akiba, ‘Rescuer of the Torah,’” Hebrew Union College Annual 17 (1942–43) 395–421. S. A. BIRNBAUM, “Bar Kokhba and Akiba,” Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement 86 (1954) 23–32. P. BENOIT, “Rabbi Aqiba ben Joseph, sage et héros du Judaïsme,” Revue biblique 54 (1947) 54–89.

[J. J. DOUGHERTY]

ALABAMA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Initially designated a part of the Diocese of Quebec, the region that now constitutes the State of Alabama was organized as the Vicariate-Apostolic of Alabama and the Floridas in 1825. The Diocese of Mobile was erected on May 15, 1829, and its name was changed to the Diocese of Mobile-Birmingham on July 9, 1954. The Diocese of Birmingham was created as a separate entity in 1969. Finally, the Archdiocese of Mobile was established on November 16, 1980, comprising the lower 28 counties of the State of Alabama (22,969 square miles), with the suffragan dioceses of Birmingham, and Biloxi and Jackson, Mississippi. Though Catholicism in the region remained below five percent of the total population at the beginning of the new millennium, it has enjoyed steady growth amid varied challenges, which have included economic, political and anti-Catholic sentiment.

Catholic Origins. Catholicism first came to the region with early Spanish and French exploration and a permanent settlement at Mobile in 1702, with Father Henry Rolleaux de las Vente as its first pastor. The parish register, intact from 1704, documents the unsettled conditions of those early years in which the faith expanded. One such condition was the dilemma of maintaining an adequate number of clergy to minister to the growing Catholic population. Yet, amid the transition of the varied political entities (French, Spanish and British) governing the region, secular and religious priests, in turn, functioned as pastors, without too much interference from civil authorities.

With the territory passing from French, British and Spanish rule, the ecclesiastical responsibility shifted from Quebec, Canada, to Santiago de Cuba, and finally in 1793, to the mainland diocese of New Orleans. With the Gulf Coast area becoming part of the United States, the State of Alabama and the Territory of Florida were erected into a vicariate apostolic in August 1825, and Bishop Michael PORTIER (1795–1859) was appointed to head the new jurisdiction.

Diocese. Portier, a native cleric of Lyon, France, developed and structured religious life in the Gulf Coast area. The vicariate was raised to a diocese in May 1829, and in 1850 was reduced in geographical size, when part of the panhandle of Florida was transferred to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Diocese of Stt. Augustine, Florida. Portier was most successful in founding institutions of education and welfare, which allowed the Catholic presence further influence and visibility in the greater community. Such institutions included Spring Hill College, founded in 1830, and entrusted to the Jesuits in 1847. At the time of Portier's death in 1859 there were 10 priests serving nine parishes and nine missions, and the Catholic population had grown from 6,000 to an estimated 10,000, most of it centered along the Alabama-Florida Gulf coast.

Bishop John Quinlan (1826–83) was consecrated as the second bishop of Mobile in New Orleans on December 4, 1859. A native of County Cork, Ireland, Quinlan immigrated to the United States in 1844, and was ordained for the Diocese of Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1852. He spent his early years in the diocese shepherding a region in turmoil due to the national debate over slavery and "states' rights." With the coming of the Civil War, and the consequent economic plights during and after the conflict, there was a greater commitment of Church resources to the poor. Yet, this commitment also hampered efforts to expand a parochial Catholic presence in the region.

Amid such challenges Quinlan secured clergy from Ireland, attained financial resources, and furthered construction on the cathedral. The northern half of the diocese received resident pastors for the first time, thanks to the arrival of monks from the Benedictine abbey of St. Vincent Abbey (later arch-abbey), Latrobe, Pennsylvania. The eventual establishment of the independent Benedictine Abbey of St. Bernard's in Cullman (1891) also provided the diocese with a second Catholic college, St. Bernard's. By the time of Quinlan's death, the clergy population had increased to 45, evenly divided between secular and religious priests. The Catholic population had also increased to about 18,000. Unfortunately, the diocese continued to be burdened with significant financial obligations.

Although growth of the Catholic population continued in the Diocese of Mobile, throughout the 1800s the local church could be characterized more by retrenchment and consolidation than by new gains. The vast majority of the relatively small Catholic population remained along the Gulf coast of Alabama, primarily in the city of Mobile, but small and steadfast Catholic populations were found in Montgomery, Tuscaloosa, and the expanding "new city" of Birmingham.

The third bishop, Dominic Manucy (1823–85), was born in St. Augustine, Florida, and had been ordained by Portier in 1850. He was transferred to Mobile in March 1884, while retaining the administration of his former jurisdiction, the Vicariate Apostolic of Brownsville in Texas. But ill health and difficulties in Mobile led Manucy to resign before the end of 1884. Jeremiah O'Sullivan (1844–96), a native of Ireland and priest of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, was consecrated the fourth bishop of Mobile, Sept. 20, 1885. He was instrumental in resolving the financial difficulties of the diocese, yet no substantial growth of institutions or Catholic population took place. Hard economic times in the South, particularly in Mobile, made immigration to the region unlikely. By the close of the 19th century, the State of Alabama had suffered a slight decline in Catholic population.

The cultural and political situation in the United States at the beginning of the following century, as well as the leadership of the next two bishops, were instrumental in the expansion of Catholic institutions and the spiritual good of the slowly growing Catholic population. Edward Patrick Allen, who had been president of St. Mary's College in Emmitsburg, Maryland, was consecrated bishop in Baltimore on May 16, 1897. During his 30 years as bishop in Mobile the Catholic population grew to 48,000, new churches were built, and there was an increase in the number of clergy. Particular emphasis was placed upon the spiritual well being of Catholics in the rural areas outside of Mobile, and the Josephite Fathers began their ministry to the African American population in the area.

Efforts by the Josephite, the Trinitarian, and the Edmundite Fathers fostered an environment of evangelization in the African American community, as well as in the general Alabama population, particularly in the rural areas and among the poor. These religious communities of men also promoted the development of Catholic education throughout the diocese, especially in the Black communities, which at this time were denied quality education, due to segregation and the infamous "Jim Crow" laws. The diocese also benefited from the endowments established by the McGill family of Mobile.

The 20th century brought monumental change for the State of Alabama and her Catholic population. The city of Mobile experienced steady growth throughout the century, due in part to the expanding paper and chemical industry, as well as the construction of a military air base. The city of Birmingham had the greatest increase in population thanks to the expansion of the steel and coal industries found there. This increase included Catholic immigrants, particularly Italians, attracted to the region by the new employment opportunities.

The city of Montgomery, also witnessed an increased Catholic population due to the expansion of Maxwell Field (now Maxwell Air Force Base) at the onset of World War II. This military base eventually became the home of the United States Air Force War College, which has continued to draw Catholics to the region. The Cold War period created the conditions for the rapid expansion of the Catholic population, through the continued building of the chemical and steel industries, as well as the increasing military presence in the region. Yet in rural Alabama, the Catholic community struggled to maintain a visible presence in the midst of an anti-Catholic environment. At the same time that the State of Alabama witnessed new economic opportunities, it was also faced with the challenge to address the tragic historical issue of racial inequality.

For the first half of the 20th century the man who personified “Catholic” in Alabama was Bishop Thomas Joseph TOOLEN (1886–1976). From the time of his appointment as the sixth bishop of Mobile on February 28, 1927 until his retirement in 1969, Toolen instilled and fostered a greater unity and self-respect among the Catholic faithful. Toolen mandated religious education in every parish and established parochial schools, as well as Catholic healthcare facilities in the three metropolitan areas of the State of Alabama. He also addressed the plight of the poor through the establishment of the Catholic Charities Office during the Great Depression. Toolen also expanded the participation of the laity through the efforts of the Diocesan Council of Catholic Women, the Holy Name of Jesus Fraternity, and grand Catholic gatherings such as Christ the King celebrations, held throughout the diocese. In 1954 Pope Pius XII designated Toolen an “archbishop ad Personam.”

Catholic Life Today. Archbishop Toolen continued the expansion of Catholic institutions and presence throughout Alabama. He gave particular attention to Catholic education in the African American parishes, and invited religious communities to serve in ministry to the rural areas of the diocese. He sought to maintain Catholic social agencies concerned with the poor and healthcare facilities. By 1969, an extensive “Catholic structure” has been developed to address the pastoral and fiscal needs of the Catholic population, as well as those of the greater community. These developments and the rapid growth in the Catholic population following World War II caused the Holy See to establish two new dioceses from out of the territorial jurisdiction of Diocese of Mobile: the Diocese of Pensacola-Tallahassee was established in 1968, and in 1969, the Diocese of Birmingham.

The newly created Diocese of Birmingham experienced an amazing growth in Catholic population through the migration of Catholics into the northern half of the state, mainly due to the relocation of the steel industry to the South, the growth of technological and medical research in the Birmingham metropolitan area, and the establishment of NASA’s jet propulsion headquarters in Huntsville. Prior to the mid-20th century, Catholicism in Alabama had been shaped and identified along the Gulf Coast region of the state, primarily in the city of Mobile. But the once “Protestant interior” of the state saw a dramatic increase in the Catholic population in Birmingham, Anniston, and in other once-small communities throughout the northern tier of the state. By the late 1950s the Catholic population in northern Alabama was growing at a faster rate than that of the Gulf Coast region. Thus there came to be a pattern of two experiences of Catholic life in the State of Alabama: a predominance of native, Southern Catholics along the Gulf Coast, with long roots in the coastal region, and the more recent immigrant Catholics in the northern part of the state, with family roots in other areas of the country as well as other nations. The only “ethnic parishes” in the state are found in Birmingham.

When Pope Paul IV established the Diocese of Birmingham on June 28, 1969, the newly created diocese included the upper 39 counties of the state and had an initial Catholic population of 39,828 among the general population of 2,134,396. By 2000, the Catholic population of the diocese had nearly doubled, to 76,941. Thus, the once “mission” area of the state that a few years previously had only a few established Catholic communities in Tuscaloosa, Birmingham, and Cullman came to have a greater Catholic population than the “mother diocese” of Mobile. Catholics in the region, with strong Eucharistic and Marian devotions, often still face misconceptions about Catholics beliefs as well as direct and indirect anti-Catholicism.

In 1969 John L. May was appointed the seventh bishop in Mobile. He was a native of Chicago and head of the Catholic Extension Society, which has continued to forward grant monies to many of the mission parishes in the state. Bishop May was noted for implementing the “vision” of the Second Vatican Council, being an advocate of adult faith formation, and for the establishment of mission parishes in counties with growing, yet small Catholic populations. He also helped in the formation of the longest ongoing Christian-Jewish dialogue in the United States: Mobile Christian-Jewish Dialogue.

In January 1980 May was appointed Archbishop of St. Louis, Missouri. In that same year the Holy See raised the Diocese of Mobile to an archdiocese. And on July 29, 1980, Monsignor Oscar H. Lipscomb, a native Mobilian and chancellor of the diocese, was appointed the first archbishop of Mobile. Lipscomb provided a continued vision for the newly established Archdiocese of Mobile, bringing qualities nurtured in his own experience of Catholic culture in the Deep South and his understanding of the documents of the Second Vatican Council.

At the beginning of the new millennium the Catholic population continued to grow, though not at the accelerated rate of that found immediately after World War II. Also, the efforts to establish a Catholic ethos in rural Alabama began to see fruit in the southeastern and northern regions of the state, where once-mission parishes were becoming large and dynamic centers of Catholic worship, contributing to the greater community. The Archdiocese of Mobile and the Diocese of Birmingham in Alabama continue to provide ministry to the poor of the region, most of whom are non-Catholics. Thus, the Catholic faithful continue to create ecumenical bridges, while still offering ongoing formation in and the celebration of Catholic culture in a rapidly changing “Deep South” state.

Bibliography: M. T. A. CARROLL, A Catholic History of Alabama and the Floridas (New York 1908). Catholic Culture in Alabama: Centenary Story of Spring Hill College (New York 1931). REVEREND O. H. LIPSCOMB, The Administration of Michael Portier, Vicar Apostolic of Alabama and the Floridas, 1825–1829, and First Bishop of Mobile, 1829–1859 (unpublished thesis, Catholic University of America, 1965). R. G. LOVETT, Catholic Church in the Deep South (Birmingham, Ala. 1981).

[M. FARMER]

ALACOQUE, MARGARET MARY, ST.

Contemplative nun of the VISITATION order; b. Lau-thecourt, France, July 22, 1647; d. Paray-le-Monial, Oct. 17, 1690. Margaret was the fifth of seven children of Claude Alacoque, a royal notary, and Philiberte Lamyn. The family was esteemed by members of the nobility, whose names appear frequently as sponsors on the Baptism register. Margaret’s education was limited to the training received in the home of her godmother and, after the death of her father, to the two years spent at the boarding school of the Urbanists, where she made her first Communion. Illness required her withdrawal, and the next 15 years were spent with her mother in painful dependence on nearby relatives. During this period, her attraction to suffering and her grace of contemplative prayer were intensified. On July 20, 1671, Margaret Mary entered Paray-le-Monial, and was professed Nov. 6 of the next year. Between 1673 and 1675 she received the revelations. The first commissioned her to spread devotion to the SACRED HEART; the second requested Communion and the HOLY HOUR of reparation; the last expressed a wish for a special feast day in honor of the Sacred Heart. Margaret Mary lived the devotion, and amid contradiction and opposition worked for its recognition within her order. The exterior apostolate was confided to the Jesuits, among whom Saint Claude de la COLOMBIÈRE had been chosen to sanction the revelations. She was beatified by Pius IX, Sept. 18, 1864, and canonized by Benedict XV, May 13, 1920.

Feast: Oct. 16.

Bibliography: M. M. ALACOQUE, Letters, tr. C. A. HERBST (Chicago 1954); The Autobiography, tr. V. KERNS (Westminster, Md. 1961); Vie et oeuvres de sainte Marguerite-Marie Alacoque, ed. R. DARRICAU, 2 vols. (Paris 1990–1993). P. BLANCHARD, Sainte Marguerite-Marie: Expérience et doctrine (Paris 1961). L. CRISTIANI, Saint Margaret Mary Alacoque and the Promises of the Sacred Heart, tr. M. A. BOUCHARD (Boston 1975). J. CROISSET, The devotion to the Sacred Heart of Our Lord Jesus Christ, tr. P. O’CONNELL from the French of the final edition published at Lyons, 1694 (Milwaukee 1976). H. GHÉON, Secrets of the saints, tr. F. J. SHEED and D. ATTWATER (London 1973). A. HAMON, Vie de Ste. Marguerite Marie (Paris 1924), with full bibliography. J. LADAME, Doctrine et spiritualité de sainte Marguerite-Marie (Montsûrs 1979); Les faits de Paray-le-Monial (Paris 1970). H. MONTAIGU, Paray-le-Monial, ou, Le Ciel intérieur (Paris 1979). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:134–138. J. BAINVEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 3.1: 320–351.

[M. L. LYNN]

ALAIN (ÉMILE AUGUSTE CHARTIER)

French philosopher, essayist, and schoolmaster, one of the great intellectual forces in France during the first half of the 20th century; b. Mortagne, France, March 3, 1868; d. Le Vésinet, June 3, 1951. Of Norman ancestry, he inherited the rugged common sense and obstinancy of the Norman peasant. Of Catholic parentage, he gave up his religious beliefs in youth and never became fully reconciled with Catholic dogma. After graduation from École Normale Supérieure, he taught in various lycées, finally becoming a professor of philosophy at Lycée Henry IV in Paris. His renown as philosopher and teacher extended to all parts of France, and many of his pupils attained eminence, among them the later biographer and historian André Maurois. Although after his retirement his home became a rendezvous for distinguished Frenchmen, he is not well-known outside his own country.

He wrote daily propos for the Dépêche de Rouen. These short essays, embodying his views on a variety of subjects, were collected from time to time and reissued. They form about half of his complete works and include Les propos d’Alain (1920), Propos de littérature (1933), and Propos de politique (1934). Among Chartier’s other published works are Le Citoyen contre les pouvoirs (1925) and Histoire de mes pensées (1936).

Although his life was devoted to teaching and many of his works contain references to education, he wrote only one book on the subject, his Propos sur l’éducation. The style, though informal, is forceful, displaying an original mind. His educational philosophy shows the influence of G. F. Hegel rather than of J. J. Rousseau. His educational views followed few of the accepted patterns of his day. The task of the school was twofold: (1) making of citizens; and (2) integration, by which he meant the maintenance of the moral and intellectual man, who in turn makes the nation. To achieve this end, he favored the Napoleonic system of centralized control in education and austere educational surroundings. He advocated the early intense and detailed study of the best literature, and stressed mathematics, history, and geography with particular emphasis on geometry and Latin. He aimed to induce pupils to think long and deeply on worthwhile things and insisted that progress be slow and thorough with excellence as the main goal.

Chartier was mainly a conservative and looked askance at the "new education." He objected to observation lessons, so much insisted upon in the Decroly system. He considered wasteful many of the motivational devices used in the modern school, holding that the child responds best to something challenging, and lightly dismissed the findings of psychology on individual differences. His own ideas on pupils' capacities were formed from his experiences with the select group that attended the French lycée. The concept of equality of opportunity did not interest him. The aim, he insisted, should be to discover and concentrate on excellence. He disregarded parental rights in education, holding that centralized state authority was best fitted to use the school as an instrument for achieving the "glory of France."

In France, between World Wars I and II, his teaching and extensive publications exercised a wide influence. This lay largely in strengthening and conserving the prevailing classical and French tradition of an elite excelling in scholarship and indirectly, therefore, obstructed the liberalizing and democratizing efforts of other educational leaders. He contributed nothing to furthering distinctly Christian ideals in French education.

Bibliography: J. CHATEAU, ed., Les Grands pédagogues (Paris 1956). A. MAUROIS, Alain (Paris 1949). G. PASCAL, La Pensée d'Alain (Paris 1946). "Hommage à Alain," Mercure de France 313 (1951) 581–661, made up of seven articles on various phases of Chartier's life and thought. C. L. HALL, "Alain, 1868–1951," School and Society 76 (1952) 289–92.

[M. R. MCLAUGHLIN]

ALAMANNI, COSMO

Italian philosopher, theologian, and commentator on the works of St. THOMAS AQUINAS; b. Milan, Aug. 30, 1559; d. Milan, May 24, 1634 (according to Sotwell) or July 24, 1634 (according to Ehrle). Alamanni entered the Jesuit novitiate at Novellara on Sept. 11, 1575, one of five brothers to do so; he studied theology at the Roman College under F. SUÁREZ and G. VÁZQUEZ, and taught at Brera College in Milan. In 1590 he prepared for publication a theological opusculum entitled Correctiones in Fonescam, but it remained in manuscript only. Delicate health forced him to interrupt his teaching career in Milan after 17 years. In 1606 he was called to be the bishop's theologian at the Pavia curia, where he remained for 17 years also. During his sojourn in Pavia, Alamanni completed his Summa totius philosophiae e divi Thomae Aquinatis doctrina (Pavia 1618–23). This was edited a second time with augmentations by J. Frontenau (Paris 1640) and again by F. Ehrle (Paris 1885–94). The Summa presented a clear and accurate exposition of the teaching of St. Thomas, and was considerably influential in the revival of THOMISM in the twentieth century.

Bibliography: Summa philosophiae, ed. F. EHRLE, 3 v. (Paris 1885–1894), pref. vi–viii. N. SOTWEL, Bibliotheca scriptorum Societatis Jesu (Rome 1676) 161–162, 519.

[F. J. ROENSCH]

ALAN DE LA ROCHE

A.k.a. Alanus de Rupe, founder of the modern rosary devotion and of the Confraternities of the Rosary; b. somewhere in Brittany, date unknown; d. Zwolle (Holland), Sept. 8, 1475. Although called blessed, he was never officially beatified. Little information about his life is historically certain. He entered the Dominicans probably at an early age at Dinan in Brittany. After his profession he was sent to the convent of St. Jacques in Paris for his philosophical and theological studies, and subsequently he lectured there. The date of his ordination is not known. He filled professorships in different convents of his order: from 1462 he was at Lille, where, from 1464, the Dominican convent belonged to the Congregatio Hollandica; in 1464 he was at Douai, and in 1468, at Ghent. It is questionable whether he went to the University of Rostock (Germany) in 1470. In 1474 he went to Zwolle. Along with his teaching he may have preached often, though there is no solid historical information on this point.

Alan's works on the rosary were printed after his death by J. A. Coppenstein, OP (B. Alanus de Rupe Redivivus, Freiburg 1619), but this edition exhibits a worked-over text and is uncritical and incomplete. Alan gave the Hail Mary, which existed in various forms, the precise form in which it became popular. He divided 150 Ave's into three series of 50, introduced the Our Father before each 10, and treated in accompanying articles or statements the mysteries of the birth, Passion, and glory of Christ. In 1470 he founded at Douai the first Confraternity of the Rosary. His fantastic visions, in which, for example, it was said that the Blessed Virgin commissioned

St. Dominic to institute the rosary, should be regarded as a quite normal means of religious propaganda in Alan's period.

Bibliography: Beatus Alanus de Rupe Redivivus, ed. J. A. COPPENSTEIN (Naples 1630), the most accessible ed. and later reprints. R. COULON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 1:1306–12. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 1.2:849–852. B. DE BOER, "De Souter van Alanus de Rupe," Ons Geestelijk Erf 29 (1955) 358–388; 30 (1956) 156–190; 31 (1957) 187–204; 33 (1959) 145–193, best study to date, with detailed bibliog.

[C. BRAKKEE]

ALAN OF LILLE

Alan of Lille (Alanus Insulis), Doctor Universalis, theologian, philosopher, poet, preacher, and polemist; b. Lille, c. 1116–1120; d. Cîteaux, 1202. During his life, Alan was renown for being the most widely learned person of his day. Although his fame during his life lay in teaching the liberal arts at Paris, he had great influence as a poet and theologian on later thinkers like Dante and Chaucer.

Life. It is difficult to create a sharp chronology of Alan's life; his early years are especially obscure. Yet, it is clear that Alan had exceptional training in the liberal arts and theology. Most likely he studied under Gilbert of Poitiers, at Paris or perhaps at Chartres, sometime between 1140 and 1142, before Gilbert became Bishop of Poitiers. Alan was a prominent teacher at Paris from around 1157 to 1170, which marked the apex of his career. Present scholarship points to his being at Montpellier perhaps first as student and later as teacher from c. 1171–85. At some point in the next decade he retired and lived with the Cistercians at Cîteaux, where he remained until his death in 1202. His remains were exhumed in 1960, when it was determined that he had been around 86 years old at the time of his death. Based on the pastoral tone of his writings as well as interest in the art of preaching, Alan appears to have been a secular cleric.

Works. Alan's literary production was large and diverse. His theological writings include his Summa, Quoniam homines, numerous Questiones disputatae, and his Theologicae regulae. In the last of these Alan sets out to prove theological truths by using the methods of geometry, a proto-scholastic method similar to Peter Lombard. Some of his conclusions are original, although others are borrowed. It is one of the first attempts to make a clear and systematic presentation of orthodox theological principles. We also have over seventy of his sermons, a Biblical dictionary entitled Distinctiones dictionum theologiarum, a small treatise on the De sex alis Cheru- bim, a confessional manual, and a commentary on the Song of Songs called Elucidatio in Cantica Cantorum. Other works include a list of moral principles, the Liber parabolarum, and his Ars praedicandi, one of the first works on the art of preaching. Alan also wrote an apologetic refutation of Christian heresies and against the Jewish and Islamic faiths entitled Contra haereticos.

The two of Alan's works that had the most lasting influence were his cosmological mythic poems, De Planctu naturae (c. 1160–70) and Anticlaudianus (c. 1183). In the former the goddess Nature, modeled on Boethius' Philosophia and Bernard Silvester's Natura, is the major protagonist. All of creation celebrates her arrival, but she complains to the narrator/poet that the actions of humanity violate reason and the natural order of the universe. This behavior is described in the language of sexual perversion and is symbolized by Nature's torn tunic, which is covered with the content of the cosmos. The poet, who plays both the foil and the representative of humanity, has a dialogue with her. Then the cosmos is once again brought into harmony with divine plan with the help of Genius, Nature's scribe and priest, who excommunicates the vices from the created order, and Hymen, who reconciles opposite forces of nature.

In the Anticlaudianus, Nature again is the main character who seeks to make a person who will renew the created order and fulfill the promise of humanity's destiny. This renewal is accomplished with the help of the heavenly virtues of Prudence and Ratio, who ascend into the heavenly spheres on a chariot made of the seven liberal arts, having been guided there by the five senses. Theologia and Fides lead them to God, who creates a perfect soul in His own image through the divine Noys. Nature then uses the elements to create the perfect body, which is bound together with the soul by Concordia, Music, and Arithmetic. After conquering an onslaught of Vices, this person becomes the archetypal human being and the new ruler of the new earth.

In both poems, pagan authors like Plato are vehicles for understanding Christian ideas. In doing this Alan follows Boethius, as well as his predecessor and inspiration Bernard Silvester. Alan's mythic poetry expresses his vision of the cosmos as a way by which the human race can approach divine truth. But our actions require more than reason, and ultimately it is theology and faith that will lead us to wisdom.

Bibliography: Most of Alan's works are compiled in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE [Paris 1878–90] 210. These include Distinctiones dictionum theologiarum (Patrologia Latina 210 685–1012), De sex alis Cherubim (Patrologia Latina 210 269–280), Elucidatio in Canticum Cantorum, (Patrologia Latina 210 51–110), Ars praedicandi (Patrologia Latina 210 111–195), Contra haereticos (Patrologia Latina 210 305–430). Several of Alan's sermons and other smaller works are edited by M. T. D'ALVERNY, Alain de Lille: Textes inédits (Paris 1965). Summa Quoniam homines, ed. P. GLORIEUX, AHDLMA xx: (1954) 113–364. Numerous Questiones disputatae, unedited but see L. THORNDIKE, Isis 51 (1950) 181–185. Theologicae regulae, ed. N. HARING, “Magister Alanus de Insulis, Regulae caelestis iuris,” AHDLMA XLVIII (1981) 97–226. De Planctu Naturae, ed. N. HARING, Studi Medievali ser 3, xix: (1978) 797–879. Anticlaudianus ed. R. BOSSUAT (Paris 1955), trans. J. J. SHERIDAN (Toronto 1973). De virtutibus et vitiis ed. O. LOTTIN in Psychologie et morale aux XIIe et XIIIe siècles VI (Gembloux 1960). Literature. G. RAYNAUD DE LAGE, Alain de Lille, poète du XIIe siècle (Paris 1951). R. GREEN, “Alan of Lille's Anticlaudianus: Ascensus mentis ad Deum” Annuaire medievale 8 (1976) 3–16. A. CIOTTI, “Alano e Dante.” Convivium 28 (1960) 257–88. M. T. D'ALVERNY, “Alain de Lille et la Theologia” in L'homme devant Dieu: Mélanges offerts au Père Henri de Lubac (Paris 1964) 111–28. Also see the extensive introduction in d'Alverny's critical edition of Alan's sermons listed above. P. G. WALSH, “Alan of Lille as a Renaissance Figure” in Renaissance and Renewal in Christian History (Oxford 1989). W. WETHERBEE, Platonism and Poetry in the Twelfth Century (Princeton 1972). G. EVANS, Alan of Lille: The Frontiers of Theology in the Late Twelfth Century (Cambridge 1983).

[P. ELLARD]

ALAN OF TEWKESBURY

Benedictine abbot, writer; d. 1202. Alan entered the monastery at Canterbury in 1174 on his return from Benevento where he had been a canon. When Herlewin resigned in 1179, Alan became prior. He incurred the enmity of HENRY II because he supported Thomas Becket, obtained the privilege of collecting PETER'S PENCE, and objected to the choice of Baldwin as archbishop of Canterbury. Though Alan later recognized BALDWIN OF CANTERBURY, the latter transferred him to the abbey of TEWKESBURY, where he was abbot in 1186. Alan wrote a life of Becket and an account of the Clarendon Council (see CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF). Also extant are his letters to Henry concerning the translation of Becket's remains, and to Baldwin claiming for Canterbury certain rights over the see of ROCHESTER.

Bibliography: Materials for History of Archbishop Thomas Becket, ed. J. C. ROBERTSON, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 67.2:299–352. GERVAISE OF CANTERBURY, Historical Works, ed. W. STUBBS, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 73.1:293. J. B. MULLINGER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 1:214–15. R. BIRON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:1318. J. DE GHEL-LINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XIIe siècle 1:132; 2:174–75.

[M. L. MISTRETTA]

ALANS

A nomadic Iranian people occupying the steppe region between the Caucasus Mts. and the Don and Ural Rivers early in the Christian era. They figured occasionally in Roman affairs before falling under the domination of the Huns c. A.D. 350, with whom they moved westward into Ostrogothic territory. One group advanced into central Germany, joined the Vandals in Gaul 406–409, and crossed into Spain under their chieftain, Respendial. Decimated there by Visigothic foederati in 418, the survivors merged with the Vandals and accompanied Gaiseric into Africa. Another Alan contingent near Orleans fought with the Roman general Aetius against Attila in 451. Liberated from the Huns after 455, the main body of Alans drifted back to the steppes. Muslims and Mongols dominated them during the Middle Ages. They finally withdrew into the central Caucasus where their descendants survive as the Osset nation. The only ancient report of the Alans' religion says that they worshipped a sword fixed in the ground. Those who associated with the East Germans probably absorbed some Arianism, but their conversion as a tribe came only after Patriarch NICHOLAS I OF CONSTANTINOPLE (901–925) sent the monk Euthymius to evangelize them. Nicholas then established the metropolitan see of Alania whose Orthodox history can be traced to 1590.

Bibliography: S. VAILHÉ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:1334–38. E. A. THOMPSON, A History of Attila and the Huns (Oxford 1948). F. DVORNIK, The Making of Central and Eastern Europe (London 1949). G. DEETERS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:265.

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

ALANUS ANGLICUS

A medieval canonist of Welsh origin, date and place of birth and death unknown. He was one of the leading professors at Bologna in the decade preceding the Fourth Lateran Council (1215); possibly he and his fellow countryman GILBERTUS ANGLICUS ended their days as Dominicans. Both DECRETIST and decretalist, his collection of decretals suggests English affiliations: he may have studied or taught law in England before the Bologna period or at least may have had some connection with John of Tynmouth and his associates in the English schools (see CANON LAW, HISTORY OF). Tancred, in the preface of his Apparatus to the Compilatio tertia antiqua, speaks of him simply as an English professor in the schools of Bologna. The extant works of Alanus are: Collectio decretalium (c. 1206), a critical register of which has been published by R. von Heckel (see bibliography); Apparatus to Compilatio prima antiqua (after 1207); glosses on Compilatio secunda antiqua (shortly after 1210 or 1212); and Apparatus Decretorum (Ius naturale). Some have held that he was the author of Compilatio quarta antiqua, but this was definitely JOANNES TEUTONICUS.

The apparatus Ius naturale is one of four great apparatuses on Gratian's Decretum that appeared at Bologna between 1190 and 1210. A first recension dates from about 1192, a second from some ten years later. As Stickler has shown (1959), the two recensions differ doctrinally: whereas, for example, Alanus originally was in the Gelasian-Gratian tradition of the juridical independence of the spiritual and secular powers, he had shifted by 1202 to a theocratic position. However, although some consider Alanus to be the architect of those curialist doctrines of papal sovereignty that eventually crystallized in the UNAM SANCTAM of Boniface VIII, he was simply responding to a wind that was blowing from the Summa of HUGUCCIO (see CHURCH AND STATE). The Collectio Decretalium of Alanus is one of the many systematic collections of decretals that appeared about this time. A first version had an appendix of 111 chapters; in a second version, which was that "received" at Bologna, Alanus inserted these chapters into the body of his collection, distributing 412 decretals in 484 chapters. Except for a division into six books instead of the classic five and some additional decretals, it follows the layout of the collection (1202–03) of Gilbertus Anglicus and appears to owe something to Anglo-Norman collections. With that of Gilbertus, the Collectio Alani is the principal source from which JOHN OF WALES formed his Compilatio secunda antiqua (1210–12) after the publication of Innocent III's official Compilatio tertia antiqua in 1210 (see QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE).

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts 1:84, 188–89. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik 67–75, 316, 325, 346. R. VON HECKEL, "Die Dekretalensammlungen des Gilbertus und Alanus nach den Weingartener Handschriften," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 29 (1940) 116–357. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini: v.1, Historia fontium 231. S. KUTTNER, "The Collection of Alanus: A Concordance of Its Two Recensions," Rivista di storia del diritto italiano 26–27 (1953–54) 39–55. A. M. STICKLER, "Alanus Anglicus als Verteidiger des monarchischen Papsttums," Salesianum 21 (1959) 346–406; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:265–66. "Bulletin of the Institute for Research and Study in Medieval Canon Law," Traditio 16 (1960) 557–58; 17 (1961) 534–36.

[L. E. BOYLE]

ALASKA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Evolution of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. Alaska (spelled variously during earlier times) is the name the native inhabitants of the Aleutian Islands, the Aleuts, gave to the landmass lying to the east of their ancestral homeland. It translates basically as "the Great Land." Comprising 591,004 square miles, this massive peninsula at the northwestern extremity of the North American con-

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Anchorage	1966
Diocese of Fairbanks	1962
Diocese of Juneau	1951

continent is nearly one-fifth the size of the rest of the continental states. "Discovered" in July 1741 by Vitus Bering sailing under the Russian flag, Alaska was known as "Russian America" up to the time of its purchase from Russia by the United States in 1867 for $7,200,000. Organized as a Territory in 1912, Alaska was admitted into the Union in 1959 as the 49th state.

According to reliable records, the first formal act of Christian worship in what is today the State of Alaska took place on Ascension Thursday, May 13, 1779, when the Franciscan priest Juan Riobó—a member of a Spanish exploratory expedition sailing out of San Blas, Mexico—celebrated Mass near present-day Craig in southeastern Alaska. Alaska remained, in terms of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, a "no-man's land" until 1847, when Modest Demers was consecrated the first bishop of Vancouver Island, Canada, and given jurisdiction "over the island of that name and all British and Russian possessions as far north as 'the glacial sea.'"

The first Catholic missionary priest to enter Alaska was an OBLATE OF MARY IMMACULATE, Jean Séguin, who, coming from Canada, spent a fruitless winter, 1862–63, at Fort Yukon. In 1870 Oblate Father Émile Petitot visited Fort Yukon briefly. Two years later Oblate Bishop Isidore Clut and Auguste Lecorre (still a diocesan priest) traveled to Fort Yukon in hopes of establishing a permanent mission there. Owing to an Anglican presence there, they met with little success. In the summer of 1873, the two went down the Yukon River to St. Michael, where they were favorably received and enjoyed a modest degree of evangelizing success. Lecorre spent the winter 1873–74 at St. Michael. In the summer of 1874, when he learned that Alaska was under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Vancouver Island, he returned to Canada. It was at the invitation of and thanks to the support of Francois X. Mercier, a French-Canadian Catholic from Montréal and agent of the Alaska Commercial Company, that the Oblates entered Alaska from Canada and were able to achieve some positive, if limited, evangelizing results there.

While Oblate missionaries were active in northern Alaska, diocesan priests from Vancouver Island were visiting Alaska's southeastern part and establishing missions there. In 1867 Father Joseph Mandart made a brief trip to the panhandle, and in 1873 Charles J. SEGHERS—born Ghent, Belgium, Dec. 26, 1839, and newly consecrated bishop of Vancouver Island as of June 29, 1873—made his first of five trips to Alaska, visiting Sitka, Kodiak, and Unalaska. In 1877, accompanied by Mandart, he traveled to the northern interior, arriving at Nulato in August. The two spent the next 12 months there, engaged in missionary activity in Nulato and in the surrounding area. In May 1879 Seghers founded a mission at Wrangell and put Father John Althoff in charge. In 1885 Seghers—now an archbishop—established a mission at Sitka with Father William Heynen in charge.

First Roman Catholic Church in Fairbanks, Alaska. (©Vince Streano/CORBIS)

In 1886 Seghers—rightly honored as “the Apostle of Alaska”—set out for Alaska on what was to be the last journey of his life. He had with him two Jesuits, Paschal Tosi and Aloysius Robaut. The party had as its goal the establishment of missions in Alaska’s northern interior, especially at Nulato, which Seghers fondly remembered from his earlier stay there. The archbishop, the two Jesuits, and a Catholic layman, Francis Fuller, left Victoria on July 13, 1886. On September 7, via the Chilkoot Trail, they arrived at the confluence of the Stewart and Yukon Rivers, still in Canada. It was decided that the two Jesuits would spend the winter there, while Seghers and Fuller pushed on downriver toward Nulato. It was getting late in the season for river travel, but Seghers was most eager to get to Nulato, driven, as he was, by the fear that Protestant ministers might get there before him and take over the area.

As Seghers and Fuller—who had already given clear signs of mental instability soon after the party left tidewater—made their way down the Yukon, their boat, traveling conditions, and Fuller’s mind deteriorated rapidly. On October 4 they arrived at the confluence of the Yukon and Tanana Rivers, where they abandoned their boat and waited for the river to freeze solid enough for sled travel. On November 19 they again set out for Nulato. On November 27, with Nulato still a good distance away and travel difficult because of deep snow, the party camped. Early the next morning, the demented Fuller fired a shot into Seghers as he bent over to pick up his mittens. He died instantly.

The following spring, 1887, Tosi and Robaut came down the Yukon into Alaska, where they learned of Seghers’s death. Immediately Tosi sailed for the Pacific Northwest to confer with Rocky Mountain Mission Superior Joseph M. Cataldo, S.J. When Seghers was given Tosi and Robaut for the trip north in 1886, they were intended simply as traveling companions. There was no intention to commit Jesuits to the Alaska Mission. Divine Providence ordained otherwise. Upon Tosi’s urging, Cataldo decided then and there that the Jesuits would, for the time being, take charge at least of parts of Alaska. A long-term commitment would need Rome’s approval. Armed with all the faculties the Vicar General of Vancouver Island could give him, Tosi returned to Alaska in the summer of 1887 to organize the systematic development of missions in northern Alaska. In 1892, during a private visit with Pope Leo XIII in Rome, Tosi so moved him with his account of Alaska that Leo told him: “Go, and make yourself the pope in those regions!”

Formal ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the whole of Alaska first came about in 1894, when the Holy See separated Alaska from the Diocese of Vancouver Island and made it a prefecture apostolic with Tosi as prefect apostolic. At the same time, Alaska became an independent mission, entrusted to the Jesuits, with Tosi as general superior. Failing health led to his being replaced as prefect apostolic in 1897 by John B. René, S.J. He, in turn, was replaced in 1904 by Joseph R. Crimont, S.J. In 1916 Alaska was raised to the next ecclesiastical level, that of a vicariate apostolic, and the following year Crimont was consecrated a bishop to serve as Alaska’s first vicar apostolic. (It was Crimont, who, in 1920, five years before she was declared a saint, placed the whole Alaska Mission under the protection of St. Thérèse.) Upon his death in 1945, he was succeeded by his coadjutor since 1939, Bishop Walter J. Fitzgerald, S.J., who died two years later. He was followed in 1948 by Bishop Francis D. Gleeson, S.J., Alaska's last vicar apostolic.

From time to time—beginning already during the Crimont years—Alaska's vastness and its varied geographic and ethnic makeup prompted those in authority, both in Rome and in Alaska, to consider the desirability of dividing it into several ecclesiastical districts. In 1951 Rome decreed the erection of Alaska's first diocese, the Diocese of Juneau, comprising at the time Alaska's panhandle—a coastal region, consisting in large part of many heavily forested, mist-shrouded islands sculpted by glaciers, and inhabited by a mix of many peoples, including some of Alaska's first people, the Haida and Tlingit—and much of south-central Alaska. Dermot O'Flanagan, a long-time diocesan priest in Alaska, was consecrated its first ordinary. He was the first bishop to be consecrated in Alaska, in Anchorage, by Bishop Gleeson on Oct. 3, 1951.

Up to 1951 all of Alaska's ecclesiastical leaders after Tosi had made Juneau their headquarters. When the Juneau diocese was established, Gleeson moved to Fairbanks, where he continued on as vicar apostolic of the rest of Alaska. In 1962, however, the vicariate became the missionary Diocese of Fairbanks (directly under the Propaganda Fidei in Rome) with Gleeson as its ordinary. In 1966 the 138,985-square-mile Archdiocese of Anchorage was established with Joseph T. Ryan as its first archbishop. This left the Juneau diocese with 37,566 square miles and the Fairbanks diocese with 409,849.

O'Flanagan resigned the Juneau See in June 1968, and for two years it was administered by Ryan. Gleeson retired in November 1968, and was succeeded as Bishop of Fairbanks by Robert L. Whelan, S.J. (George T. Boileau, S.J., was consecrated a coadjutor bishop with right of succession on July 31, 1964. However, he died soon thereafter, on Feb. 25, 1965.) In 1970 Francis T. Hurley was named auxiliary bishop for Anchorage and administrator of Juneau (as Ryan's vicar). In 1971 he was appointed ordinary of the Juneau diocese. In December 1975 Ryan became coadjutor military vicar of the U.S. Armed Forces, and the following year Hurley became Archbishop of Anchorage and administrator of Juneau. From 1979 to 1995—the year of his sudden death in Jordan—Michael H. Kenny was Juneau's Ordinary. Michael W. Warfel succeeded him in 1996. When, in 1985, Whelan retired as Bishop of Fairbanks, Michael J. Kaniecki, S.J., began his 15-year term as Bishop of Fairbanks. In the Eskimo village of Emmonak near the mouth of the Yukon River, on August 6, 2000, Kaniecki died suddenly of a massive heart attack. On Jan. 18, 2000, Roger L. Schwietz, O.M.I., was appointed Coadjutor Archbishop of Anchorage, taking possession of the archdiocese on March 4, 2001.

Apostolic Works. The first Religious women to undertake apostolic works in Alaska were the Sisters of St. Ann. In 1886 they opened a school and a hospital in Juneau. By the time they left Alaska over a century later, they had staffed schools and hospitals in various other places, but it was especially at Holy Cross on the Yukon that they had their greatest impact in Alaska, serving there for decades as teachers—along with Jesuits and, for a few years, with Brothers of Christian Instruction—and nurses. The Holy Cross Mission was founded in 1888 by Father Robaut, who died there in 1930 and lies buried there. In northern Alaska, however, it is Nulato, founded in 1887 by Father Tosi, that rightly claims primacy. Inseparably connected with the name of Nulato is the name of Fr. Julius Jetté, S.J. It was at Nulato that Jetté—who spent over 25 years in northern Alaska and was hailed as “the most distinguished scholar in Alaska”—began, in 1898, work on his monumental dictionary of the Koyukon Athabaskan language. He never lived to see it in print. A century later the Alaska Native Language Center at the University of Alaska, Fairbanks, published it—all 1212 pages of it—under the title of Koyukon Athabaskan Dictionary.

Evangelization among the Central Yup'ik people of western Alaska began in 1889 with the founding of the mission on Nelson Island by Joseph M. Tréca, S.J., “the Apostle of the Tundra.” The mission and boarding school at Akulurak near the mouth of the Yukon, St. Joseph's, staffed by Sisters of St. Ann and Jesuits, was opened in 1894. It was closed four years later. The mission at St. Michael dates from 1898. (At St. Michael lies buried Jesuit Brother Ulric Paquin, who froze to death on the trail, while bringing building supplies from St. Michael to Stebbins by sled and dogteam.)

The Nome parish was founded in 1901 for the whites and natives of the area. The Sisters of Providence operated a hospital there from 1902 to 1918, and a day school from 1904 to 1918. The Little Sisters of Jesus have been in Nome since 1952. In 1971 Nome's Catholic radio station, KNOM, went on the air. Now the oldest Catholic station in the United States, it has been winning top awards ever since.

The Fairbanks parish was founded in 1904 by Francis M. Monroe, S.J., “the Alaskan Hercules.” A hospital followed two years later. This was staffed briefly by Sisters of St. Ann, then by Benedictine Sisters, then, from 1910 to 1968 by the Sisters of Providence. When Immaculate Conception grade school opened in Fairbanks in 1946, it was Sisters of Providence that staffed it; and when Monroe Catholic High opened in 1951, Sisters of Providence—along with Jesuits and lay volunteers—served on the faculty for many years.

In 1905 the boarding school at Akulurak—staffed by Ursuline Sisters and Jesuits—was reopened, and renamed St. Mary's. The school flourished until 1951, when it was moved into new facilities built by James C. Spils, S.J., (known as "God's Builder," who also built Copper Valley School and Fairbanks' Sacred Heart Cathedral) and crew at the site of new St. Mary's on the Andreafsky River. There, still staffed by Ursulines and Jesuits, and assisted by many dedicated members of the Jesuit Volunteer Corps—who at the time were serving also in many other places throughout Alaska—it continued to flourish until the 1980s. It graduated its last class of high school seniors and was closed in the spring of 1987.

In Alaska's north, other missions, schools, and programs continued to spring into being. In 1918 the Pilgrim Springs mission and boarding school north of Nome began to care for many children left orphaned by the influenza epidemic of that year. The mission, staffed by Ursuline Sisters and Jesuits, closed in 1941. Frederick A. Ruppert, S.J., lies buried there. He froze to death, in December 1923, while on the trail with sled and dogteam, headed for the mission with oranges for the orphans for Christmas.

The mission on King Island was founded in 1929 by Fr. Bellarmine Lafortune, S.J. It was he who—during the course of his 44 years in the Seward Peninsula area—had founded, among others, the Pilgrim Springs mission. By the time he built the church on the island and spent his first winter there, most of the King Islanders were Catholic, having been received by him into the Church during their summer sojourns in Nome. The Kotzebue Mission—the first Alaskan mission beyond the Arctic Circle—was also founded in 1929, by the diocesan priest William F. Walsh. Walsh, along with Philip I. Delon, S.J., and pilot Ralph Wien, died the following year in an airplane crash at Kotzebue.

The last mission of major importance to be established in northern Alaska is that of St. Patrick's at Barrow, established in 1954 by the legendary Thomas P. Cunningham, S.J. Cunningham, widely known as "Father Tom," also pioneered the mission on Little Diomed Island, and served on King Island. He became a recognized expert on polar pack ice, and the United States Air Force turned to him as its principal adviser, when it set up scientific stations on the polar ice cap.

In 1956 Copper Valley School, near Glennallen, opened. It was staffed by Sisters of St. Ann, Jesuits, and numerous lay volunteers. Its founder, John R. Buchanan, S.J., intended the primary purpose of the school to be that of preparing Alaska Natives for college and for positions of leadership in Alaska. It—as did the other Catholic schools in northern Alaska—had the strong support of Gleeson, a promoter of education on all levels. (For a time he had four different priests on the faculty at the University of Alaska-Fairbanks.) Copper Valley School closed in 1971.

Gleeson is given credit not only for supporting a tradition of solid Catholic education in northern Alaska, but also for the restoration of the permanent diaconate in the United States. Upon his urging, the U.S. bishops petitioned Rome in 1968 for approval of the restoration of the permanent diaconate. Approval was given. Under Whelan, Gleeson's successor, the Diocese of Fairbanks's diaconate program came to full flower. In the year 2000 there were 18 native deacons, all Inuit, and seven urban deacons serving in the Fairbanks Diocese. The deacons, a nucleus of diocesan priests, Franciscan Friars (serving in Alaska's northern interior since 1986), and religious men and women of various communities have all served to lessen the long dominance in northern Alaska by Jesuits as apostolic workers and helped the diocese along its road to becoming a diocese of age.

Meanwhile, pioneer parishes and apostolic works were being founded also in Alaska's panhandle. The Wrangell parish dates from 1879, those of Sitka and Juneau from 1885. The Skagway parish was founded in 1898. Skagway's Pius X Mission, a boarding school founded by Father G. Edgar Gallant—the first Catholic priest ordained in Alaska, by Crimont, in Juneau, on March 30, 1918—opened in 1931. The Ketchikan parish was founded in 1903. In 1923 the Sisters of St. Joseph of Peace began operating a hospital there.

In Alaska's South-Central area the parishes of Seward and Valdez were established in 1905, that of Cordova in 1908, that of Anchorage in 1915. Anchorage's Providence Hospital under the care of the Sisters of Providence opened in 1939. Parochial schools, a retreat house, and social outreach programs have been part of the Anchorage scene for decades. The parish of Kodiak came into being in 1944. That same year the Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart took over the management of the hospital there. A Catholic grade school flourished there for decades. The Dillingham parish dates from 1948. For some years there was also a Catholic day-boarding school in Dillingham.

Needless to say, during the latter half of the 20th century many additional parishes and apostolic works, too numerous to mention, came into being in all three of Alaska's dioceses. While Catholic Alaska is not overly impressive in terms of numbers (according to the 2000 Official Catholic Directory, the Archdiocese of Anchorage had 20 parishes and eight missions serving 31,071 out of a total population of 396,801; Fairbanks had 46 parishes and seven missions serving 17,068 out of total population of 155,224; and Juneau had 10 parishes and 10 missions serving 6,049 out of a total population of 73,302), it has achieved a certain degree of maturity, and its three dioceses resemble for the most part other U.S. dioceses. However, the geographic and ethnic makeup of Alaska gives rise to some major differences. Many communities are “bush” communities—communities widely separated from one another and unconnected by roads. They can be reached only by airplane, boat, or snow machine. At certain times of the year, Little Diomed Island can be reached only by helicopter. To save time and to cut costs several of Alaska’s bishops and many of its priests have flown and fly their own airplanes. The Anchorage and Juneau dioceses have relatively few Alaska Native Catholics, while Fairbanks has many—most of them Athabaskan and Central Yup’ik.

From the day they first set foot in Alaska to the present, Catholics have, in all areas of life—whether in academia, in the business world, in the arts—been part of mainstream Alaskan life. This is strikingly evident, above all, in the area of politics. Among the more prominent Catholics in Alaska’s political life have been: Mike Stepovich, Alaska’s last territorial governor; William A. Egan, the state of Alaska’s first governor; Walter J. Hickel, twice Alaska’s governor and Secretary of the Interior under President Nixon; Frank Murkowski, U.S. Senator; George Sullivan and Tom Fink, mayors of Anchorage; Edward Merdes, President of the International Junior Chamber of Commerce and Alaska State Senator.

As with the state of Alaska, the Catholic Church in Alaska is still young and still on the road to full maturity.

Bibliography: M. CANTWELL, North to Share (Victoria, Canada 1992). J.-É. CHAMPAGNE, “First Attempts at the Evangelization of Alaska,” Études Oblates 2 (1943) 13–22. P. HIGGINS, Providence in Alaska: Sisters of Providence Education Ministry in Alaska, 1902–1978 (Seattle 1999). S. LLORENTE, Jesuits in Alaska (Portland, Ore. 1969). G. MOUSSEAU, “L’Affaire d’Alaska. À propos du Voyage de Msgr. Clut dans l’Amérique Russe en 1872,” Études Oblates 5 (1946) 161–88. L. L. RENNER, Pioneer Missionary to the Bering Strait Eskimos: Bellarmine Lafortune, S.J. (Portland, Ore. 1979); “Fr. Aloysius Robaut, S.J.: Pioneer Missionary in Alaska.” Eskimo 37 no. 20, (New Series, 1980–81) 5–16; “Diocese of Fairbanks, Alaska: The Eskimo Diaconate Program.” Eskimo 37 no. 20 (New Series, 1980–81) 5–16. A. H. SAVAGE, Dogsled Apostles (New York 1942). W. P. SCHOENBERG, Paths to the Northwest: A Jesuit History of the Oregon Province (Chicago 1982). J. C. SHIDELER and H. K. ROTHMAN, Pioneering Spirit: The Sisters of Providence in Alaska (Anchorage 1987). G. G. STECKLER, “The Diocese of Juneau, Alaska,” Historical Records and Studies 47 (1959) 234–54; “The Foundation of the Alaskan Catholic Missions,” Studies in Mediaevalia and Americana: Essays in Honor of William Lyle Davis, S.J. (Spokane, Wash. 1973) 129–50; Charles John Seghers, Priest and Bishop in the Pacific Northwest, Sketch of priest tying alb with cincture. (The Catholic University of America)

1839–1886: A Biography (Fairfield, Wash. 1986). V. A. YZERMANS, St. Rose of Wrangell: The Church’s Beginning in Southeast Alaska (St. Paul, Minn. 1979).

[L. RENNER]

ALB

A long white linen tunic worn as an undergarment for most liturgical functions. It is gathered in about the waist by means of a cincture. It has its origin in the Greco-Roman tunica talaris, a garment of daily use reaching to the ankles and decorated at the bottom and extremities of the sleeves with colored bands. Even though the influence of the short garments of the Germanic peoples brought about a change in fashion, the clergy did not follow it, continuing instead to dress in the traditional Roman style. By the 6th century, the wearing of albs was an established custom for the celebration of the liturgy. Although the interest in color during the Gothic period brought about the appearance of colored albs, white has always been traditional. The 16th century saw the rise of the lace industry; only then did lace appear on albs—an innovation that was a regression from the masculine and dignified robe of the past. Eventually lace, at first a mere ornament, covered most of the garment. The liturgical renewal of the 20th century brought about the return of the all-linen alb.

Bibliography: H. NORRIS, Church Vestments (New York 1950). E. A. ROULIN, Vestments and Vesture, tr. J. MCCANN (Westminster, Md. 1950). J. BRAUN, Die liturgische Gewandung im Occident und Orient (Freiburg 1907).

[M. MCCANCE]

ALBAN, ST.

Protomartyr of the English Church. He was a pagan soldier serving in the Roman army at Verulamium (now the city of Saint Albans, Hertfordshire, England). GILDAS and BEDE, both of whom wrote their histories long after the episode, relate Alban's martyrdom to the persecution of DIOCLETIAN (302–305). Some historians doubt that this movement reached England and have attempted to connect the death with the earlier persecution of Decius (249–251). Still others have suggested that the execution was carried out under martial law in 283 or 286 and not as a result of a general edict against Christians. According to tradition Alban protected a Christian priest from his persecutors and was converted by him. Alban was then summoned before a military tribunal, where he admitted to being a Christian and was scourged and later beheaded. A church and, later, the Abbey of Saint Albans were erected on the site of his martyrdom.

Feast: June 21.

Bibliography: R. G. COLLINGWOOD and J. N. L. MYRES, Roman Britain and the English Settlements (2d ed. Oxford 1937). J. A. DUKE, The Columban Church (London 1932; repr. 1957). L. F. RUSHBROOK WILLIAMS, St. Alban in history and legend: A critical examination (Kingston 1914). K. MORVAY, Die Albanuslegende: dt. Fassungen u. ihre Beziehungen zur lat. überlieferung (Munich 1977). C. E. STEVENS, "Gildas Sapiens," English Historical Review 56 (1941) 353–373, esp. app. W. LEVISON, "St. Alban and Saint Albans," Antiquity 15 (1941) 337–359. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:612–614.

[B. F. BYERLY]

ALBANI

Distinguished Umbrian family of Urbino who were prominent in the Church in the 18th and 19th centuries. The most influential member of the family was Pope CLEMENT XI (1700–21); three of his nephews and a grandnephew were cardinals, all of them closely associated with the papal curia.

Annibale, papal diplomat; b. Urbino, Aug. 15, 1682; d. Rome, Sept. 21, 1751. He was created cardinal in 1711 by his uncle and was appointed bishop of Sabina in 1730. During most of Clement's reign, Annibale was one of the most active diplomats in the Vatican service, occupying in succession the post of nuncio in Vienna, Dresden, and Frankfurt. He exerted considerable influence in the elections of both Innocent XIII and Benedict XIV. He left a valuable library, gallery of paintings, and a collection of coins and antiques to the Vatican collection. Among his literary works was the edition of the writings of Clement XI.

Alessandro, brother of Annibale; b. Urbino, Oct. 19, 1692; d. Rome, Dec. 11, 1779. He was created cardinal by Innocent XII (1721), after he had distinguished himself in the papal diplomatic service. While he was always involved in the political life of the curia, he was primarily a scholar, and after 1761 he was director of the Vatican Library. He was a patron of the arts and a friend of the foremost collectors of antiques; he gained renown for his building of the Villa Albani in Rome, in which he housed a valuable collection of Greek and Roman sculpture.

Giovanni Francesco, a third nephew of Clement; b. Rome, Feb. 26, 1727; d. Rome, September 1803. He was cardinal bishop of Ostia. He was spokesman for the Austrians in the papal curia, and toward the end of his career, was dean of the Sacred College of Cardinals and particularly influential in the election of PIUS VII.

Giuseppe, Giovanni Francesco's nephew; b. Rome, Feb. 26, 1750; d. 1834. He, too, was created cardinal (1801) after some years of service in Vienna. He was secretary of state to PIUS VIII.

Bibliography: E. RE, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze lettere ed arti (Rome 1929–39) 2:95. L. PASTOR, The History of Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61): from the 1st German ed. Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters (Freiburg 1885–1933; repr. 1955–) v.33, 34, 35. P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:1369–73.

[C. B. O'KEEFE]

ALBANIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Bordered by Yugoslavia to the north, Macedonia to the east, and Greece to the south, Albania lies across the Adriatic Sea from Italy. A mountainous country, Albania's northern regions contain the Dinaric Alps, while small plains dot the coastal regions. Although Albania is among the poorest of European countries, it contains petroleum, natural gas, coal, and mineral resources; industries include lumber, textiles, and mining. Ethnic Albanians were originally a tribal people descended of the ancient Illyrians; they refer to themselves as Shqipë-tars and to their country as Shqipëria. The Albanian language belongs to the Indo-European family, and is written in Latin characters with numerous diacritical marks.

Most Catholics living within Albania are members of the Orthodox Church. The Orthodox Church has a metropolitan see in Tirana that oversees suffragans Berat, Korçë (Korçë), and Gjinokastër. The Latin rite Church has as its metropolitan archdiocese Shkodër, which oversees suffragan sees Lesh (Lezhë), Pult, Rreshen, and Sapë. The Archdiocese of Durrës-Tirana is immediately subject to the Holy See. The Byzantine rite Church, with a membership of only 2,500, has an apostolic administration located in southern Albania.

A History of Conquest. As a combined result of the Roman occupation from the north in the 2d century B.C. and the adoption of a Hellenistic tradition to the south as a result of its proximity to Greece, Albania developed divergent cultures north and south, with the line of demarcation the Skhumbi River. In Gratian's administrative division of the Roman Empire in 379, under the Roman emperor Theodosius I, Albania was placed in the eastern section, then later pertained to the Byzantine Empire. As part of the Prefecture of Illyricum Orientale, it formed the provinces of Epirus Vetus (with its capital in Nicopolis, modern Preveza), Epirus Nova (with its capital in Dyrhacium, modern Dürres), and Praevalitana (with its capital in Scodra, modern Shkodër). During the Middle Ages this area changed masters several times, being subject to Goths, Slavs, Avars, Serbs, Bulgaro-Macedonians, Normans, and Venetians. From the 15th century to 1912 Albania was under Turkish rule; it became a principality in 1912, a republic in 1925, and a kingdom in 1928. From 1946 to 1991 the country was under communist domination and was known as the People's Republic of Albania. A new democratic government came to power during elections held in 1992.

Development of Christianity in Albania. Christianity came to northern Albania from Rome in the form of the LATIN RITE and to southern Albania from Greece in the form of the BYZANTINE LITURGY. There is, however, no evidence about the time and manner of its arrival. It antedated the Council of Sardica (343–344), since five bishops attended this synod from Epirus Nova and Dardania. The Slav invasion (c. 600) destroyed the ecclesiastical organization and caused the inhabitants to retire to Capital: Tirana.

Size: 11,100 sq. miles.
Population: 3,490,435.
Languages: Albanian.
Religions: 2,443,305 Muslims (70%); 698,087 Orthodox (20%); 346,543 Latin rite Catholic (9.5%); 2,500 Byzantine rite Catholics (.5%).

the mountainous districts, where they lived as shepherds, gradually reverting to primitivism. Mention of Albanians in the Church's historical record is nonexistent from the 7th to the 11th centuries, when it is known that groups moved southward and settled extensively in Greece as far south as Attica, where they adopted the Byzantine rite and adhered to the EASTERN SCHISM of 1054. Northern Albania remained Catholic and retained the Latin rite. After the formation of the Slav principality of Dioclia (modern Montenegro), the metropolitan See of BAR was created (1089), and dioceses in northern Albania became its suffragans. From 1019 Albanian dioceses of the Byzantine rite were suffragans of the autocephalous (independent) Archdiocese of Ohrid (or Okhrida) until Dyrhacium and Nicopolis were reestablished as metropolitan sees. Thereafter only the dioceses in inner Albania remained attached to Ohrid. In the 13th century during the Venetian occupation, the Latin Archdiocese of Dyrhacium was founded.

Turkish invaders in the 15th century met heroic resistance in northern Albania from the Catholic tribes under the leadership of George Castriota (1403–68), known as Scanderbeg. After Scanderbeg's death the Turks occupied Albania, except for some sections held by Venice, until 1912. During over four centuries of Turkish rule most Albanians converted to Islam, especially in central Albania during the 17th and 18th centuries. Frequently this change of religion was merely external; many families remained crypto-Catholics and preserved Christian traditions and usages, such as Baptism, veneration of saints, pilgrimages, and dietary regulations. As a result there evolved a kind of Islamo-Christian syncretism. The expansion of Islam diminished during the 19th century under Austrian protection, but it did not cease until 1912, after Albania proclaimed its independence.

Latin-rite Catholics. For several centuries the care of Catholics in northern Albania was confined almost exclusively to the Franciscans. Pope Clement XI (1700–21) was particularly eager to help these Catholics, because his family, the Albani, had migrated from Albania to Italy in the 15th century. At his insistence the first Albanian national synod convened in Shkodër in 1703. Attempts to establish a seminary were made in the 18th century, but they did not succeed until 1856, when Italian Jesuits opened in Shkodër a pontifical college, to which a seminary was later attached. The Jesuits set up a printing press. In their popular missions they strove to abolish the custom of blood vendetta. The Archdiocese of Bar became part of the newly established principality of Montenegro in 1878, and by the terms of the concordat with Montenegro (1886) it ceased to be the metropolitan see for Albania. Shkodër replaced it the same year, with all Albanian dioceses except Durrës as its suffragans.

Orthodox Christians. The Byzantine tradition established in the Orthodox Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE prevailed in southern Albania and among the Albanians in Greece and Italy. The Eastern Schism entered Albania gradually. Union with Rome persisted in some mountainous districts until the 17th century; it was supported by national opposition to the Greek and Slav hierarchy, by some archbishops of Ohrid, and especially by the populace in the Chimarra district that repeatedly petitioned during the 16th and 17th centuries to have clergy sent there from Rome. In 1628 the Italian Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith dispatched both graduates of the Greek College in Rome and a group of Basilian monks to Chimarra. Athanasius II, Archbishop of Ohrid and a refugee in Chimarra, united with Rome in 1660 and consecrated one of the missionaries as bishop of the Byzantine rite. This mission was abandoned in 1765 when entry was barred to Catholic missionaries; it was not restored until Basilian monks came from Italy (1938–45).

By the early 1900s, following the country's independence, the religious composition of Albania was estimated as 70 percent Muslim, 20 percent Orthodox, and 10 percent Roman Catholic. Muslims were present throughout the country, but especially in central and southern Albania (a mufti was located at Tiranë; other strongholds were Elbasan and Vlora). Orthodox Christians were concentrated mainly in the south around the city of Korçë, while a small but unified Catholic community was centered in the northern city of Shkodër and the surrounding area, including Montenegro, Kosova, and Macedonia. Albania's status as an independent state prompted Fan Noli, a priest, to claim for the Albanian Orthodox the status of an autocephalous church. Noli also replaced the traditional Greek of the Byzantine liturgy with the vernacular, although this change was not recognized by the Patriarchate of Constantinople until 1937.

The Arrival of Communism. During World War II Albania was invaded, first by Italy, then by Greece, and then finally by the German Army. In November 1944 the country found itself independent but in financial ruin, and by January 1946 had declared itself a communist republic. Immediately, communists began a severe persecution of the Catholic Church on the pretext that Catholics sided with the former occupying government of Italy. All Italian missionaries were imprisoned, several were eventually put to death, and others were banished, including the apostolic delegate. The persecution extended equally to the native hierarchy and clergy and to Catholic schools and the seminary. Two Albanian bishops were sentenced to death; others were imprisoned. The Apostolic Administration of South Albania, which had been established in 1939 for Catholics of the Byzantine rite, was destroyed and its administrator expelled. The Albanian Catholic Church was cut off from all contact with Rome or with other countries. While in 1951 a law enforcing intervention in church matters still permitted Catholic clergy to continue relations with the Holy See, such permission would be rescinded several years later. The Orthodox Church imitated the Russian Church's method of adapting to the onset of communism by recognizing the Communist government and its proceedings. As a result it received better treatment than the Catholic Church.

A small chapel on the hills above the Muslim town of Berat, Albania. (©Arne Hodalic/CORBIS)

Bibliography: D. FARLATI and G. COLETI, Illyricum sacrum, 8 v. (Venice 1751–1819), v.7. L. VON THALLÓCZY et al., Acta et diplomata res Albaniae mediae aetatis illustrantia, 2 v. (Vienna 1913–18), contains documents for period 344–1406. M. ŠUFFLAY, “Die Kirchenzustände in vortürkischen Albanien,” Illyrisch-albanische Forschungen, ed. K. JIREČEK, 2 v. (Munich 1916) 1:188–281. M. E. DURHAM, Some Tribal Origins, Laws, and Customs of the Balkans (London 1928). G. PETROTTA, “Il cattolicesimo nei Balkani. L’Albania,” La Tradizione 1 (1928) 165–203; Popolo, lingua, e letteratura albanese (2d ed. Palermo 1932). F. W. HASLUCK, Islam and Christianity under the Sultans, ed. M. HASLUCK

(Oxford 1929). M. SPINKA, A History of Christianity in the Balkans (Chicago 1933). N. BORGIA, I monaci basiliani d’Italia in Albania, 2 v. (Rome 1935–42). G. STADTMÜLLER, “Altheidnischer Volksglaube und Christianisierung in Albanien,” Orientalia Christiana periodica 20 (1954) 211–246; “Die Islamisierung bei den Albanern,” Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, NS 3 (1955) 404–429; “Das albanische Nationalkonzil vom Jahre 1703,” Orientalia Christiana periodica 22 (1956) 68–91.

[M. LACKO]

Religious Persecution. The persecution and isolation of the Catholic Church that began in 1944 under the Communist regime grew more intense with the passage of time. In 1966 the Albanian government promulgated Decree Number 4337, which extended the 1951 law empowering the state to control religious activity and annulled the Church's ability to maintain spiritual ties with the Holy See. The new decree prohibited all public and private religious rites and imposed great penalties on violators. Within a short time, the government seized and closed all churches and mosques in the country. In 1967 officials proclaimed Albania “the first atheistic state in the world.” Of the 2,000 churches and mosques seized, 327 were Catholic churches. Most churches were destroyed while some were converted to secular uses or retained as historical monuments. The Shkodër Cathedral was converted to a sports arena; the Jesuit National Shrine of the Sacred Heart in Tiranë became a concert hall, while the National Shrine of Our Lady of Shkodër was razed.

Catholic bishops and priests courageously resisted the closing and destruction of churches and other religious buildings. In retaliation many of the clergy were publicly humiliated. Priests who spoke out were arrested and, after show trials, condemned to hard labor or executed. In 1968 Bishop Antonin Fishta was arrested for conducting religious services, and soon after he died in a labor camp. Bishop Ernest Çoba was arrested in 1976 and died under torture in prison in 1980. At this point Bishop Nikollë Troshani, who was serving a 25-year prison sentence, remained the sole surviving member of the Albanian hierarchy.

In 1975, emboldened by the failure of the world community to act on behalf of Albanian believers, Albanian dictator Enver Hoxha led the communist government in taking yet another step to eradicate all religious influence from society. Decree Number 5339 prohibited religious names for newly born children. By 1976 the government judged that it had achieved its goal of eliminating religion. Antireligious policies were written into the new Albanian constitution: article 37 declared, “The State recognizes no religion whatever and supports atheist propaganda”; article 55 forbade the formation of any religious organization. Meanwhile, Albanian exiles in the diaspora attempted to counteract this persecution by enlisting the support of Amnesty International, the International Association for the Defense of Religious Freedom, Pax Christi, and the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

The Underground Church. Despite the constitutional ban on religion, the Church continued to operate underground. Priests and bishops who had not been imprisoned or exiled secretly ministered to the faithful. The famous 15th-century baptismal formula of Pál Engjulli, archbishop of Durrës, was used by parents and elderly Catholics to baptize infants when a priest could not be found. The formula, the oldest extant written document in the Albanian language, had been used by the faithful during the many centuries of Turkish rule. The blessings of marriages and prayers for the dead were conducted by elderly Catholics. Devout holy women and men became active in towns and villages, serving as indispensable helpers to the few priests who were still free and who would dare to officiate in the underground Church.

Because of the Church’s isolation from Rome during the country’s period of communist persecution, no Albanian bishops were allowed to participate in the deliberations of the Second Vatican Council. In fact, Catholics were prevented from learning about, let alone implementing the decrees of the council. Catholic prayer books and catechisms were also forbidden to be published or circulated in Albania. However, the Albanian Catholic Archdiocese of Bar and the Diocese of Shkup-Prizren, both in what was then the bordering nation of Yugoslavia, published several pocket catechisms and manuals in Albanian. These books were intended for Albanian Catholic refugees living in these diocese, but copies were also smuggled into communist-dominated Albania.

New Freedom. In April 1985 Albanian dictator Hoxha, the man behind the antireligious movement, died. Gradually the faithful began to identify themselves as Christians and practice their faith openly. Under international pressure from human rights organizations, the government’s total ban on religion weakened. In May 1990 the government announced reforms, one of which was the lifting of the ban on religious practice. Religion could be practiced in private. In defiance of the still-existing ban on public practice of religion, Simon Jubani, who had spent 26 years in prison, illegally celebrated mass in the old cemetery of Shkodër in November 1990. Some 50,000 faithful, including Orthodox and Muslims, joined in the liturgy, ignoring the security police who surrounded the cemetery grounds.

In March 1991 the first free elections in over 40 years were held, and newly elected socialist prime minister Ylli Bufi visited Pope John Paul II in Rome. There Bufi apologized to the pontiff for the harmful and unjust policies of the previous government toward the Catholic community, paving the way for diplomatic relations to be re-established between Albania and the Vatican. In 1992 elections brought to power the democratic party—which included several Catholics—and initiated a social order based on freedom and democracy, with full religious rights.

With the new freedom, the Catholic Church stirred to life. The Jesuits and Franciscans reopened their seminaries in Shkodër. The Albanian clergy began the re-evangelization of the faithful aided by Albanian priests and sisters from Kosovo in the Yugoslavian Federation. Clergy, religious, and laity from Italy, Malta, other European countries, and the United States arrived to assist. Albanian parishes in New York City and Detroit sent help, which was badly needed given that only Bishop Troshani, 31 priests, and 44 sisters had survived the five decades of communist persecution. Many churches that had escaped destruction in 1967 were reopened and those damaged restored.

Albanian-born Nobel Peace Prize winner MOTHER TERESA opened the first house of her Missionaries of Charity in Albania in 1991; by 1994 the number had grown to 11. Although she was not directly involved in the movement for religious freedom, Mother Teresa served as an ambassador for the Albanian Church throughout the period of persecution and in 1997, shortly before her death, addressed the nation in an effort to help end outbreaks of street violence.

The resurrected Catholic Church in Albania, eager to reunite itself with the universal Church, quickly introduced the reforms of Vatican II throughout the country. New missals were translated into Albanian and published by the Congregation for the Evangelization of the People, under whose jurisdiction Albania belongs. Copies of sacramentaries and lectionaries printed in Albanian were a personal gift of Pope John Paul II to the Church, and were distributed to Albanian Catholics through their dioceses and parishes. An Albanian translation of all the major documents of Vatican II became available in 1993. The Catholic press in Albania, which enjoyed considerable prestige in the precommunist era, returned to publishing. A translation of the Catechism of the Catholic Church into Albanian was published in 1996.

The Bill of Rights adopted by the Albanian parliament in March 1993 guaranteed among its articles the freedom of thought, conscience, and religion; the freedom to change one's religion; and the freedom to manifest one's religion privately and publicly. A month later, Pope John Paul II visited Albania, where he was greeted by President Sali Berisha who pledged that the past wrongs inflicted on the Church by the previous government would never be repeated. During his visit, the pope ordained four bishops to fill sees vacant since the communist insurgence. The creation of the first Albanian cardinal, Msgr. Mikel Koliqi, by the pope in November of the following year gave new impetus to evangelization among the Albanian people. Koliqi, a living witness among the Catholics in communist prisons and labor camps for 41 years, represented for all Albanians not only a symbol of courage and hope in the face of persecution, but also a shining example of the traditional Albanian values of faith and homeland. By early 2000 there were two archbishops, four bishops, 97 priests, 13 brothers, and 277 sisters in Albania, and in June of that year the ordination of more five priests trained in Albania was deemed by the Archbishop of Scutari "a sign of hope that shows how the Albanian Church is growing rapidly after so many years of state atheism and martyrdom."

As the Church made great progress in reclaiming its place in the national life of Albania, it also renewed its traditionally cordial ecumenical ties with the Albanian Orthodox Church and reopened a friendly dialogue with Muslim leaders. Catholics and Orthodox cooperated with a small Evangelical Christian Brotherhood to make available for the first time an Albanian translation of the entire Bible, the work of a Catholic priest in Montenegro. However, competition in the form of new Protestant groups and other religious sects entering the country and threats from anti-Christian Muslim groups showed religious freedom to be somewhat of a double-edged sword to a Church attempting to reestablish its footing after so many years of suppression.

Continuing Political Turmoil. Unfortunately, the new freedoms failed to bring peace and prosperity to the Albanian people. During the 1990s, a failed nationwide pyramid scheme left many citizens bereft of life savings and others desperate enough to vandalize private, public, and even Church property. On June 29, 1997, with help from the European Union, free elections were held that brought to power a socialist president and the hope that the new government could restore public order. In October 1997 a high-ranking representative of the Albanian government traveled to the Vatican, receiving the support of the Church in all efforts at "material and spiritual reconstruction" during a private audience with John Paul II.

As acts of religious intolerance and other social protests continued to surface within Albania, they were dramatically overshadowed by events a few miles away, in the Serbian province of Kosovo, where ethnic Albanians—most of them practicing Muslims—were subjected to Serbian violence following a regional request for political autonomy from the Yugoslavian Federation. Many thousands fled to their historic home in Albania, where they were welcomed by the Church. Catholics responded to the crisis by sending humanitarian aid to ethnic Albanians within Kosovo, resulting in the bombing of an Orthodox Church in northern Albania in 1998 and the vandalization of three other churches in 1999. Communications between the pontiff and the Albanian government continued throughout the crisis, as both representatives of the Albanian people sought a way to end what quickly turned into an effort at "ethnic cleansing." The Church was also involved in ecumenical councils formed to address the needs of the over 270,000 Kosovar refugees that remained sheltered in Albania until the end of the Serbian violence in 1999.

Bibliography: The Albanian Catholic Bulletin 1–15 (1980–94), published by the Albanian Catholic Institute, University of San Francisco, contains Albanian documents from 1966–94. AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL, Albania, Political Imprisonment, and the Law (London 1984). R. BEQAJ, Veprimtarija Antikombetare e Klerit Katolik Shqiptar (Tiranë 1969); Veprimtarija Armiqësore e Klerit Katolik Shqiptar 1945–1971 (Tiranë 1973). S. BOWERS, "Church and State in Albania,” Religion in Communist Lands 6:3 (1978) 148–152. J. BROWN, “The Status of Christianity in Albania,” Journal of Church and State 28 (1986) 43–60; Conscience and Captivity: Religion in Eastern Europe (Washington DC 1988). G. CARRARO, Albania Cristiana (Padova 1985). G. GARDIN, Banishing God in Albania (San Francisco 1988). C. GIRAUDDO, Già dato per martire: i fioretti di un gesuita albanese (Rome 1993). I. GOGAJ, Mbi Qendrimin Reaksionar të Klerit në Fushen e Arësimit (Tiranë 1972). A. GUIDETTI, Padre Fausti-Martire in Albania (Rome 1974). L. GUSSONI and A. BRUNELLO, The Silent Church (New York 1954). P. HODGES, “Albania after Hoxha’s Death,” Religion in Communist Lands 14:3 (1986) 268–272. Human Rights in the People’s Socialist Republic of Albania, Minnesota Lawyers International Human Rights Committee Report (Minneapolis 1990). J. J. OROSHI, “The Twentieth Anniversary of the Elimination of the Catholic Hierarchy and the Final Blow to All Religions in Albania,” Catholic Albanian Life 11 (1968) 1–14. PUEBLA INSTITUTE, Albania: Religion in a Fortress State (Washington DC 1988). G. RULLI, “Dove va l’Albania?” Civiltà Cattolica 136 (1985) 496–506. Z. SIMONI, ET AL., Martirizimi në Shqipëri 1944–1990 (Shkodër 1993). G. SINISHTA, The Fulfilled Promise: A Documentary Account of Religious Persecution in Albania (Santa Clara, CA 1976). G. SINISHTA and B. GRAHAM, Sacrifice for Albania 1946–1966 (Detroit 1967). B. TÖNNES, “Religious Persecution in Albania,” Religion in Communist Lands 10:3 (1982) 242–255. J. TORRENS, “Albania: Never or Next?” America 164:8 (1991) 232–235; “Albania, Here Come the Missionaries,” America 171:1 (1994) 6–9.

[G. SINISHTA/EDS.]

ALBELDA, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery of St. Martín in the Diocese of Calahorra, Spain, six miles south of Logroño. The fortress Albailda (Arabic: “white”) built by Muza II of Saragossa in 850 was destroyed by Ordoño I of Oviedo in 851. Hermits, however, there as monks probably before 850, formed a monastery soon afterward and in 924 grouped themselves under the Benedictine rule with a large number of monks sent there from León by Ordoño II. In 951 the abbey had 200 monks and was a famous center of learning. In 976 the monks (Vigila) completed the beautifully illuminated codex Albeldensis (Escorial d-I-2) that contains a collection of 61 councils, the valuable Chronicle of Albelda of 883, and other items in Visigothic script. A copy of the Albeldensis (Escorial d-I-1) completed in 994, a Liber ordinum of 1052 (now in SILOS) sent to Rome in 1064 for the approval of the Mozarabic liturgy, several other extant codices of the 10th century, and several lost codices (including works by Salvus, d. 962) gave the scriptorium of Albelda a fame that Alfonso X recognized in 1270. From 1033 to 1092 the bishops of Calahorra-Nájera resided in Albelda, and the monks became secularized canons. In 1435 the canons, the treasure, and many documents of Albelda were moved to Santa María la Redonda in Logroño. The cartulary of the abbey (891–1092) went to Simancas. Archeological remains of the monastery, recently discovered, seem to be Visigothic in style.

Bibliography: C. J. BISHKO, “Salvus of Albelda . . .,” Speculum. A Journal of Mediaeval Studies 23 (1948) 559–590. M. ALAMO, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 11:327–333.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

ALBERDINGK THIJM, JOSEPHUS ALBERTUS

Dutch poet and pioneer of Catholic emancipation; b. Amsterdam, Aug. 13, 1820; d. Amsterdam, March 17, 1889. He grew up in a middle-class family and embarked on a business career, but he soon started to write romantic poems with a mystical tinge. He later developed a theory that the connection of art and beauty with religion should be an intrinsic part of human life and of society. A militant Catholic, he combatted the mediocrity and narrow-mindedness of many fellow Catholics. Against them he defended the necessity of good theater and a friendship with non-Catholic authors, in whose periodicals he wrote essays and poetry. He equally contested growing agnostic materialism, for example, in Het Voorgeborchte (1851) and Magdalena van Vaernewijck (1851). In this respect he followed his admired master, Willem Bilderdijk (1756–1831), Holland’s first romantic poet and the protagonist of a Protestantism based on sentiment. The poet E. J. Potgieter (1808–75) gave his friend Thijm the title of Catholic romantic and encouraged him to elevate Catholic culture.

Under this impulse, Thijm began to understand the greatness of Holland’s 17th-century “golden age,” a period he had considered pagan and heretical. He became the enthusiastic admirer of Vondel, Holland’s greatest poet. Thijm’s Portretten van Joost van den Vondel (1876) inaugurated a long series of studies of Vondel by Catholic scholars. Prior to his interest in the 17th century, Thijm had seen in the Middle Ages, then generally thought of as “dark,” support for his ideals of Catholic unity and harmony. Several of his short stories recapture medieval life and thought, e.g., De klok van Delft (1846), Legenden en Fantasien (1847), De organist van de Dom (1849), Karolingische verhalen (1851, Carolingian Tales), and Geertrude van Oosten (1853). He was also active in the field of art, especially in architecture. One of his best essays, De heilige Linie (1875, The Holy Line), discusses the symbolism of church architecture. In 1876 he was appointed professor in art history at the Academy of Arts in Amsterdam. He was unable to understand younger authors, however, including his own son, Karel (pseudonym, Lodewijk van Deyssel), and lost contact with the young painters, who, like the authors, tended toward naturalism. They in their turn respected him, but considered him the representative of an era that had lost its reason for existence.

Bibliography: Werken, ed. J. F. M. STERCK, 7 v. (The Hague 1908–20). A. J. (pseud.), J. A. Alberdingk Thijm (Amsterdam 1893), biog. by his son. W. BENNINK, Alberdingk Thijm: Kunst en Karakter (Nijmegen 1952). G. BROM, Alberdingk Thym (Utrecht 1956).

[J. I. MENDELS]

ALBERGATI, NICCOLÒ, BL.

Carthusian bishop and cardinal; b. Bologna, 1375; d. Siena, May 9, 1443. Nobly born, Albergati abandoned the law for the Carthusian house of San Girolamo di Casara, where he became prior (1407) and visitor (1412). Appointed bishop of Bologna (1417), cardinal (1426), and eventually grand penitentiary and camerlengo, he served both MARTIN V and EUGENE IV as legate to England, France, Germany, and Italy and at the councils of Basel, Ferrara, and Florence. For example, in 1422 Martin V sent him—albeit unsuccessfully—to reconcile the rulers of England, France, and Burgundy. Later (1435), Albergati won Philip the Good of Burgundy over to Charles VII, thus contributing materially to the Peace of Arras. He was buried in the Charter House at Florence. Benedict XIV authorized his cultus on Oct. 6, 1744.

Feast: May 9.

Bibliography: M. ZANOTTI, Vita del b. Niccolò Albergati (Bologna 1757). S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1396–97. P. DE TÖTH, Il beato cardinale Niccolò Albergati e i suoi tempi, 1375–1444, 2 v. (Acquapendente 1934). J. G. DICKINSON, The Congress of Arras, 1435 (Oxford 1955) passim.

[J. G. ROWE]

ALBERIC OF OSTIA

Cardinal bishop, papal legate; b. Beauvais, France, c. 1080; d. Verdun, 1148. Alberic became a monk in Cluny, where he rose to the rank of subprior; he held the same office at the Abbey of Saint-Martin-des-Champs. At the instance of PETER THE VENERABLE, he was appointed abbot of Vézelay (1131) despite the opposition of the monks of that abbey. In the schism of Anacletus II (see PIERLEONI) he supported Pope INNOCENT II, who created him cardinal bishop of Ostia and papal legate (1138) to England. A strong representative of the Gregorian Reform, Alberic was the first papal legate in more than 70 years to enter England with unrestricted powers. In Scotland he won the clergy to recognition of Innocent (Synod of Carlisle, Sept. 26, 1138); but his primary business was to visit the chief monastic and episcopal centers of England and Scotland, to hold a council in which recent reform decrees might be applied, and to supervise the election of the archbishop of Canterbury. Assisted by two assessors, the Austin Canon Robert of Hereford and Abbot Richard of Fountains, he brought the mission to a successful conclusion with the synod of Westminster (Dec. 11, 1138) and the election of THEOBALD OF CANTERBURY, the former abbot of Bec. After affording his good offices to the establishment of peace between England and Scotland, he returned to Rome (January 1139), where he participated in the Second Lateran Council.

Appointed legate to Antioch, he deposed Radulph, the second Latin patriarch (Nov. 30, 1139), and in 1140 presided at a synod in Jerusalem. His last years were spent as legate in southern France, where he opposed the Albigenses, Éon of Stella, and the followers of Henry of Lausanne.

Bibliography: JOHN OF HEXHAM, Chronicle in The Priory of Hexham, ed. J. RAINE, 2 v. (Surtees Society 44, 46; London 1864–65) 1:107–172. RICHARD OF HEXHAM, ibid. 1:63–106. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 5:721, 745–746, 817. H. TILLMANN, Die päpstlichen Legaten in England (Bonn 1926). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Orders in England, 943–1216 (Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 237, 253.

[O. J. BLUM]

ALBERIC OF ROSATE

Italian jurist; b. Rosciate, near Bergamo, Italy, 1290; d. Bergamo, Sept. 14, 1360. He was descended from a family of judges and notaries, and he studied law in Padua under Oldradus de Ponte and Richard Malombra. After returning to Bergamo in the second decade of 1300, he practiced law and continued to cultivate juridical and literary studies, though it appears he never taught. He was one of the principal exponents of the Italian juridical school of commentators at the time of its most glorious flourishing and was the promoter of the first real lexicographic attempt in the juridical field. In his Quaestiones statutorum, which had several reprints, he left a fundamental work in statutory legislation, and perhaps the first doctrinal treatise on private international law. His contemporaries and posterity described him as summus practicus; he wrote commentaries on various parts of Justinian's Digest and Code. The influence of the De regulis iuris, included in the Liber Sextus of Boniface VIII, is clearly evident in Alberic's commentary on title De regulis iuris of the Digesta (Corpus iuris civilis, Digesta, ed. T. Mommsen and P. Krueger [Berlin 1928] 50.17). His Dictionarium iuris, which was reprinted several times, is the first ample lexicon of civil and canon law. Finally, he revised in Latin the commentary of Jacopus della Lana to Dante's Comedy (the work is not edited).

Bibliography: G. CREMASCHI, "Contributo alla biografia di Alberico da Rosciate," Bergomum 30 (1956) 3–102. G. BILANOVICH, "Epitafio, libri e amici di Alberico da Rosciate," Italia Medioevale e Umanistica 3 (1960) 251–261.

[R. ABBONDANZA]

ALBERIC OF UTRECHT, ST.

Benedictine monk, bishop of Utrecht; d. Aug. 21 or Nov. 14, 784. He was a nephew of an earlier bishop of Utrecht, St. GREGORY, the successor of BONIFACE. Alberic participated in the mission to the Frisians, directing LUDGER OF MÜNSTER's activity there. He was a friend of such intellectual leaders of the Carolingian Renaissance as ALCUIN and Ludger. He received episcopal consecration in 780 at Cologne. As bishop of Utrecht he reorganized the cathedral school, dividing the teaching among four masters. Alberic's relics are preserved at Susteren.

Feasts: Nov. 14, Aug. 21, March 4 (translation).

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 16:497. J. TORSY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:277.

[R. BALCH]

ALBERONI, GIULIO

Cardinal and statesman; b. Firenzuola d'Arda, Piacenza, Italy, May 31(?)1664; d. Piacenza, June 27, 1752. Although of humble origins, Alberoni was educated by Barnabites and Jesuits and enjoyed the protection of Bishop Barni, who sponsored his ecclesiastical career. Alberoni, ordained and appointed a canon (1698), began his diplomatic apprenticeship as a secretary to the Duke of Vendôme, supreme commander of the French army in Italy, whom he followed to France (1706), Holland, and Spain (1711). After the general's death (1712), Alberoni remained in Madrid as an agent of the duchy of Parma. In 1714 he successfully negotiated the marriage of Philip V, a widower, to Elizabeth Farnese of Parma.

As prime minister (1716) and cardinal (July 12, 1717), Alberoni implemented domestic reforms in agriculture, trade, manufacturing, and welfare that were decidedly in advance of his times. In foreign policy, fully cognizant of the ambitions of Philip V, he boldly sought to restore Spanish prestige in Italy and to vindicate his sovereign's rights to the French throne. To this end, he reorganized the army and navy and engaged in intrigues against the empire and its allies. Compelled to declare war prematurely by the irresponsible actions of Parma and the urging of Philip, Alberoni ordered the invasion of Sardinia (1717) and Sicily (1718), in spite of formal assurances to the contrary given to Clement XI. Diplomatic and military disasters followed. Alberoni failed to secure the support of Russia and Sweden in restoring James Stuart, "the Old Pretender," and in overthrowing Philip, Duke of Orléans. The Quadruple Alliance (Empire, France, England, and Holland) reconquered the islands of Sardinia and Sicily and invaded Navarre. Alberoni, held responsible by the king, the pope, and the Quadruple Alliance for this ill-starred venture, was expelled from Spain (Dec. 5, 1719). Hiding in Italy, he evaded arrest and assassination, while a commission of 15 cardinals investigated charges of treason brought against him.

Alberoni attended the conclave that elected Innocent XIII (1721); he was given a relatively mild sentence of four years' imprisonment but was completely exonerated by the pope (Sept. 18, 1723). When created bishop of Malaga and reconciled with Philip V (1725), the aging cardinal hoped to spend his remaining years in peaceful retirement in his estate of Castelromano. Instead, he was appointed by Clement XII to the legation of Ravenna (1735), where he promoted public works. In 1739 he occupied San Marino, a controversial move that was later disavowed by the pope for political reasons. His last post was the legation of Bologna (1740–43). He spent the last years of his life in Piacenza in charitable and scholarly pursuits. Alberoni is buried in the church of the college San Lazzaro-Alberoni, which he founded in 1732 for the education of clerics.

Bibliography: S. BERSANI, Storia del Cardinale G. Alberoni (Piacenza 1861). A. ARATA, Il processo del Cardinale Alberoni (Piacenza 1923). P. CASTAGNOLI, Il Cardinale G. Alberoni, 3 v. (Piacenza 1929–32). S. HARCOURT-SMITH, Cardinal of Spain: The Life and Strange Career of Alberoni (New York 1944). G. F. ROSSI, Cento studi sul cardinale Alberoni, 4 v. (Piacenza 1978). E. BOURGEOIS, Le Secret des Farnèse: Philippe V et la politique d'Alberoni (Paris 1909). P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1425–28.

[E. J. THOMSON]

ALBERT (ADALBERT), ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: 1101. Albert was probably made bishop and then cardinal bishop of Silva Candida by the antipope Clement III (1080–1100). After Clement died and his first successor, Theodoric (1100–01), had been imprisoned by Pope Paschal II (1099–1118), Clement's Roman followers elected Albert as the third in what was now a line of antipopes. For his part, Emperor Henry IV (1056–1106) was uninterested in supporting a Roman antipope, and riots broke out when news of Albert's election became public. Albert hid in the home of a Clementine sympathizer, who quickly turned him over to Paschal in exchange for a bribe. He was imprisoned for a time at the Lateran. Finally, like his predecessor Theodoric, Albert was sentenced to confinement in a monastery in Norman territory, in this case the monastery of St. Lorenzo at Aversa (a few miles north of Naples). Nothing more is known of his life or death.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.298, 345. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.773. Monumenta Germaniae historica, Libelli de lite 2.405–07. P. KEHR, “Zur Geschichte Wiberts von Ravenna (Clemens III),” Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin (1921) 980–88. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). C. SERVATIUS, Paschalis II (Stuttgart 1979) 42ff, 70ff, 339. J.N.D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 162.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

ALBERT, FEDERICO, BL.

Priest and founder of the Congregation of Vincentian Sisters of the Immaculate Conception (Albertines); b. Turin, Piedmont, Italy, Oct. 16, 1820; d. Lanzo, Torinese, Italy, Sept. 30, 1876. Although Federico Albert recognized his vocation to the priesthood early in life, he could not afford to attend seminary. As an adult he passed the required examinations for candidates to the priesthood and was ordained. Albert was an able pastor of souls in several Torinese parishes, as well as a spiritual guide for other priests. He was a friend and early collaborator of St. John BOSCO, and himself served the young and old with special zeal. To provide the needy with further assistance, Albert founded and directed the Albertines. He was beatified by John Paul II, Sept. 30, 1984.

Feast: Sept. 30.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 77 (1985): 1020–1023. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, 44 (1984): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ALBERT I OF RIGA, ST.

Bishop; b. near Bremen, Germany, c. 1165; d. Riga, Latvia, Jan. 17, 1229. He came from a Buxhövdén ministerial family, was a canon at Bremen after 1189, and was consecrated bishop of Livonia by Archbishop Hartwig II on March 28, 1199. After negotiations with the pope, the king, and Denmark, he landed at the mouth of the Düna in 1200 with a large force of crusaders. He founded the city of Riga in 1201 and made it a bishopric. By 1207 the area between the Düna and the Aa (Lielupe) Rivers was under his control. Soon Albert became involved in the great controversies in the territory during that time. The Roman Curia wished to establish a protective state (Marienland) itself and distrusted Albert because of his connection with the Hohenstaufen, who had recognized him as an imperial prince in 1207 and 1225; therefore the Holy See strengthened the Order of the KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD, which was supported by the empire (1210) as well. Although Riga remained a bishopric, it was no longer a suffragan of Bremen after 1214, and received metropolitan privileges over mission dioceses. It became an archbishopric only in 1253. Rome supported the Danes in Estonia. Meanwhile Albert, forced against his will by the Knights of the Sword to submit temporarily (1219–22) to Waldemar II, came into conflict with the Russians, who supported an aimless pagan revolt (1217–24). This ultimately led to a compromise among the Germans, so that the conquered territory was divided between Albert and the Knights. This division became a source of future weakness for the region, a part of which the city of Riga later claimed as its territory.

Feast: June 1 (prior to the Reformation).

Bibliography: HEINRICUS LETTUS, Chronicon Livoniae, ed. A. BAUER (2d ed. Würzburg 1959). Baltische Lande 1 (Riga 1939). F. KOCH, Livland und das Reich bis zum Jahre 1225 (Posen 1943). M. HELLMANN, Das Lettenland im Mittelalter (Münster 1954). G. ALLMANG, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1440–41.

[H. WOLFRAM]

ALBERT II OF RIGA

Archbishop of Riga; b. Cologne, late 12th century; d. 1273. Albert Suerbeer is frequently said to have been a Dominican, though this is probably an error. The assertion that he studied at Paris and took a master's degree there is also doubtful. He taught at the cathedral school in Bremen and in 1229 was nominated bishop of Livonia, but the chapter at Riga refused to accept him, choosing instead a Premonstratensian, Nicholas. In 1240 Albert was appointed archbishop of ARMAGH, where he supported the English king, Henry III, against the rebellious barons in the struggle over church property and promoted the canonization of EDMUND OF ABINGDON. Albert took part in the First Council of Lyons, 1245, and in 1246 was appointed archbishop of Prussia, Livonia, and Esthonia and papal legate for these countries and adjacent lands. Local opposition prevented him from exercising his authority in these posts, and from 1247 to 1253 he acted as apostolic administrator of the See of Lübeck. In 1253, on the death of the incumbent Nicholas, he was elected by the chapter to the See of Riga; two years later he was confirmed by ALEXANDER IV as archbishop and metropolitan.

His efforts to extend the influence of his see met with strong opposition from the powerful local military order, the KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD, which in 1238 had been assimilated to the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS. This opposition caused the archbishop to be imprisoned briefly in 1268, though his cause was supported by the citizens of Riga.

Bibliography: P. VON GOETZE, Albert Suerbeer, Erzbischof von Preussen, Livland, und Ehistland (St. Petersburg 1854). M. H. MACINERNY, A History of the Irish Dominicans (Dublin 1916). G. ALLMANG, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:1563. M. HELLMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:281.

[P. M. STARRS]

ALBERT BEHAIM

Papal legate, anti-imperialist; b. Bavaria, c. 1180; d. probably in Passau, c. 1260. In 1212 Albert received a canonry at Passau, the first of many benefices he accumulated, shortly after entering the papal Curia, where he served under INNOCENT III and HONORIUS III. Later, after returning to Germany, he became a violent agitator against the Hohenstaufen dynasty even before the final papal controversy with FREDERICK II. When GREGORY IX excommunicated the emperor in 1239, he commissioned Albert to promulgate the sentence in Bavaria and compel obedience, which brought Albert into conflict with almost all the Bavarian clergy. Albert employed so many excommunications and interdicts that Duke Otto expelled him in 1241. He finally found refuge at Lyons in 1244 with INNOCENT IV, whom he advised on German affairs, playing a part in the election of the antiking. Not until 1250, after the emperor's death and the forceful deposition of Albert's chief foe, Bishop Rudiger of Passau, could he return home and recover his prebends. Always aggressive and anxious to promote his own interests, Albert continued to make enemies. His own bishop imprisoned him for some obscure reason, but in 1258 Pope ALEXANDER IV intervened to secure his release. Details of his death are not known.

Bibliography: Alberts von Beham Conceptbuch, ed. C. HÖFLER (Stuttgart 1847). R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns, 5 v. (St. Ottilien, Ger. 1949–55; 2d ed. 1958). A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands v. 4. J. OSWALD, Neue deutsche Biographie 2:1.

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

ALBERT OF JERUSALEM, ST.

Patriarch of Jerusalem; b. Parma, Italy, c. 1149; d. Acre, Holy Land, Sept. 14, 1214. He studied theology, civil law and Canon Law before becoming a canon regular in the monastery of the Holy Cross in Mortara. In 1184 he was made bishop of Bobbio whence he was soon transferred to Vercelli in Lombardy. A skilled diplomat, he served as mediator between Pope CLEMENT III and Emperor FREDERICK I Barbarossa, and later as a legate of Pope INNOCENT III in the north of Italy, where he brought about peace between Parma and Piacenza.

His reputation for diplomacy and piety led to his selection as patriarch of Jerusalem in 1205. Since the Muslims held Jerusalem after 1187, he established his residence in St. Jean d'Acre where he worked hard to keep peace between all factions. In his capacity as patriarch he was requested by Burchard (d. 1221), prior of the hermits living on Mt. Carmel, to give them a rule, which he did in 16 short chapters (see CARMELITES). He was assassinated on the Feast of the Exaltation of the Cross by a disgruntled former master of the Hospital of the Holy Spirit at Acre whom he had deposed (see HOSPITALERS). His feast was first introduced by the Carmelites in 1411 and was formally approved in 1666.

Feast: Sept. 25.

Bibliography: B. EDWARDS, tr., The Rule of St. Albert, Latin text with an English tr. (London 1973). V. MOSCA, Alberto Patriarca di Gerusalemme: tempo, vita, opera (Rome 1996). Acta Sanctorum April 1:764–799. P. MARIE-JOSEPH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1564–67. J. BAUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:279.

[V. L. BULLOUGH]

ALBERT OF PONTIDA, ST.

Monastic reformer; d. Pontida, Italy, May 1, 1095. After recovering from a near mortal wound, he gave up the life of a soldier, made a pilgrimage to SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA, and entered the BENEDICTINE Order during the height of the reform movement led by HUGH OF CLUNY. He founded the monastery of Saint James at Pontida, located between the towns of Bergamo and Lecco, c. 1080 and became its first prior. He continued to direct the fortunes of this foundation as part of the Cluniac organization until his death, and he was buried there. When the monastery was destroyed by fire in 1373, his remains were transferred to the church of St. Mary Major in Bergamo, where they were honored until 1911, when they were returned to Pontida to the restored abbey church.

Feast: Sept. 5, Sept. 2 in Pontida.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, 6 v. (Lucca 1739–45) 5:322. L. SECOMANDI, S. Alberto di Pontida ed il suo monasterio (Bergamo 1895). P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontifica. (Berlin 1906–35) 6.1:392–394. R. BIRON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed.

A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1545–46. G. MORIN, in Revue Bénédictine 38 (1926) 53–59. J. BAUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:280.

[K. NOLAN]

ALBERT OF SARTEANO, BL.

Franciscan missionary; b. Sarteano, near Siena, Italy, 1385; d. Milan, Italy, Aug. 15, 1450. He received his early education from Guarino of Verona and in 1415 joined the FRANCISCAN order. From 1435 to 1437 he worked as a preacher under the direction of BERNARDINE OF SIENA in the Holy Land. As a delegate of Pope EUGENE IV, Albert made a second journey to the Near East (1439–41), during which he helped win the good will of the Coptic Patriarch John of Alexandria, and so prepared the way for the reunion realized at the Council of FLORENCE in 1442. He was vicar general of the Franciscan Order from 1442 to 1443. His cult has not been publicly approved, but he is honored in the Franciscan order as blessed.

Feast: Aug. 15.

Bibliography: B. NERI, La vita e i tempi beato Albertio da Sarteano (Florence 1902). A. DE SÉRENT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 1:1554–56. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum, 86 v. (Lyons 1625–54) v.9, 10, 11. G. HOFMANN, “Kopten und Aethiopier auf dem Konzil von Florenz,” Orientalia Christiana periodica 8 (1942) 5–39. G. FUSSENEGGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:282.

[K. NOLAN]

ALBERT OF SAXONY

Nominalist philosopher of Paris and bishop; b. Rickmersdorf, lower Saxony, 1316; d. 1390. He was an outstanding master in arts at the University of Paris from 1351 to 1362 and rector of the University in 1357 and 1362. In his Quaestiones super libros Physicorum (Venice 1504), Quaestiones in libros de caelo et mundo (Venice 1520), and Quaestiones in libros de generatione (Venice 1504) he was much influenced by the teaching of JOHN BURIDAN and NICHOLAS ORESME, notable on the theory of IMPETUS and on the configuration of forms that can be increased and decreased. In his Logica (Venice 1522), Quaestiones super libros Posteriorum (Venice 1497), and Sophismata (Paris 1489) he was greatly influenced by the NOMINALISM of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. His Tractatus obligationum and Insolubilia (Paris 1490) clearly show the influence of Oxford logicians. He promulgated and developed the new physics initiated by THOMAS BRADWARDINE and John Buridan. He wrote a number of short treatises on proportionality and the square of the circle that became popular textbooks in universities. In his unedited commentary on the Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle he followed closely the commentary of WALTER BURLEY. In 1365 he was named the first rector of the new University of Vienna. In 1366 he was nominated and consecrated bishop of Halberstadt; he served in this office until his death. His writings in natural philosophy were widely read until the 17th century.

Bibliography: B. NARDI, Enciclopedia filosofica 1:128. A. MAIER, Die Vorläufer Galileis im 14. Jahrhundert (Rome 1949); An der Grenze von Scholastik und Naturwissenschaft (2d ed. Rome 1952). M. CLAGETT, The Science of Mechanics in the Middle Ages (Madison, Wis. 1959). É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages 516–20. P. HOSSFELD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:281.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ALBERT OF TRAPANI, ST.

Carmelite; b. Trapani, Sicily, c. 1240; d. Messina, Sicily, Aug. 7, 1307. By 1280 he had entered the CARMELITE monastery in his native town, and despite his own humble opinion of himself he prepared for the priesthood and was ordained by 1289. He effected numerous conversions throughout Sicily and was made religious superior of the Sicilian province in 1296. By the time of his death, he had gained an extraordinary reputation for sanctity. He was buried at Messina, where he is honored as the patron because of his miraculous assistance to the city during a siege in 1301. His head is preserved at Trapani. His cult was approved by CALLISTUS III in 1457 and by SIXTUS IV in 1476. His relics are widely disseminated because of the currently used blessing of the water of St. Albert in the Carmelite ritual; his aid is invoked against fever. The oldest biography dates from 1385, and few details of his life are certain. He is often shown holding a lily, or receiving the Christ Child from Our Lady. There are paintings of him by Francesco Francia and Bernardo Monaldi.

Feast: Aug. 7.

Bibliography: L. M. SAGGI, Dizionario biografico degli Italiani, ed. A. M. GHISALBERTI (Rome 1960–) 1:740–741. B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, “Catalogus sanctorum ordinis carmelitarum,” De visione sancti Simonis Stock (Rome 1950) 281–307. P. MARIE-JOSEPH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:1558–59. G. MESTERS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:282–283. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 3.1:47. Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 2:215–239.

[E. R. CARROLL]

ALBERT THE GREAT, ST.

Dominican bishop, Doctor of the Church, patron of scientists, and philosopher; b. Lauingen on the Danube, near Ulm, Germany, c. 1200; d. Cologne, Nov. 15, 1280; variously referred to as Albertus Magnus, Albert of Lauingen, Albert of Cologne, and Albert the German; honored under the scholastic titles of Doctor universalis and Doctor expertus. Although in his own right Albert was an outstanding figure of the Middle Ages, he is best known as the teacher of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and as a proponent of ARISTOTELIANISM at the University of Paris. He combined interest and skill in natural science with proficiency in all branches of philosophy and theology.

LIFE

Early Life. Albert was the eldest son of a powerful and wealthy German lord of military rank. After his elementary training, he studied the liberal arts at Padua while his father fought in the service of Frederick II in Lombardy. Early in the summer of 1223, JORDAN OF SAXONY, the successor to DOMINIC as master general of the Order of Preachers, came to Padua in the hope of bringing young men into the order by his preaching. At first he found "the students of Padua extremely cold," but ten of them soon sought admission, "among them two sons of two great German lords; one was a provost-marshal, loaded with many honors and possessed of great riches; the other has resigned rich benefices and is truly noble in mind and body" (Jordan, Epistolae 20). The latter has always been identified as Albert of Lauingen.

After overcoming fierce opposition from his family, he entered the novitiate and later was sent to Germany to study theology. Shortly after 1233 he was appointed lecturer of theology in the new priory at Hildesheim, then, successively, at Freiburg im Breisgau, at Regensburg for two years, and at Strassburg. During these years he wrote his treatise De natura boni, influenced largely by HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR and WILLIAM OF AUXERRE.

Teaching at Paris. Around 1241 he was sent to the University of Paris to prepare for the mastership in theology. The intellectual climate of Paris, "the city of philosophers," was vastly different from his native Germany, for here he encountered the "new Aristotle," recently translated from Greek and Arabic, and the wealth of Arabic learning introduced from Spain. Albert arrived in Paris just as the commentaries of Averroës on Aristotle were becoming available. At the Dominican convent of St. Jacques, he fulfilled the university requirements for bachelors in theology, lecturing cursorily on the Bible for two years, responding in disputations, and then expounding the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD for two years (c. 1243–45), but Albert was more interested in acquiring the new learning than in lecturing on the Sentences. In 1245 he incepted as a master in theology under Guéric of St. Quentin, and continued to lecture as master in the Dominican chair "for foreigners" until the end of the academic year 1248. Albert was, in fact, the first German Dominican to become a master.

Most probably it was at Paris that he began his monumental presentation of the whole of human knowledge to the Latin West, paraphrasing and explaining all the known works of Aristotle and pseudo-Aristotle, adding contributions from the Arabs, and even entirely "new sciences" (Phys. 1.1.1). Apparently asked by his younger confreres to explain Aristotle's Physics in writing, he undertook to explain systematically all the branches of natural science, logic, rhetoric, mathematics, astronomy, ethics, economics, politics, and metaphysics. "Our intention," he said, "is to make all the aforesaid parts of knowledge intelligible to the Latins" (ibid.). This vast project took about 20 years to complete and is one of the marvels of medieval scholarship. While working on it, he probably had among his disciples the young Aquinas, who arrived in Paris in the autumn of 1245.

Years in Germany and Italy. In the summer of 1248 Albert was sent to Cologne to organize and preside over the first studium generale in Germany, which had been authorized by the Dominican general chapter in June. At Cologne he devoted his full energies to teaching, preaching, studying, and writing until 1254. Among his disciples at this time were Thomas Aquinas, who studied under Albert (1245–52), and ULRIC OF STRASSBURG. In 1253 Albert was elected provincial of the German Dominicans, a position he faithfully filled for three years. Despite the administrative burdens, the yearly visitation of each priory and nunnery, and lengthy journeys on foot, he continued his prolific writing and scientific research in libraries, fields, ore mines, and industrial localities.

In 1256 he was in the papal curia at Anagni with Aquinas and BONAVENTURE to defend the cause of mendicant orders against the attacks of WILLIAM OF SAINT-AMOUR and other secular masters. Here also he held a disputation against Averroist doctrine on the intellect (see INTELLECT, UNITY OF). He lectured to the curia on the whole of St. John's Gospel and on some of the Epistles; for this reason he is listed among the "Masters of the Sacred Palace." Resigning the office of provincial, he resumed teaching in Cologne (1257–60). In 1259 the general chapter requested him and four other masters in theology to draw up a plan of study to be followed throughout the order.

Late that same year irregularities in the Diocese of Regensburg led to the appointment of Albert to succeed the removed bishop. His own reluctance and the pleadings of Humbert of Romans, general of the order, were of no avail. On Jan. 5, 1260, Alexander IV ordered his installation as bishop of Regensburg. With the settling of conditions in this diocese and the election of a new pope, he was able to resign in 1262; he then chose the house of studies at Cologne for his residence. Albert voluntarily resumed teaching, but in the following year he was ordered by Urban IV to preach the crusade throughout Germany and Bohemia (1263–64). From 1264 to 1266 he lived in the Dominican house in Würzburg. In 1268 he was in Strassburg, and from 1269 until his death he resided in Cologne, writing new works and revising earlier ones.

Only two more times, as far as is known, did he undertake long journeys from Cologne. He took part in the Council of Lyons in 1274, and in 1277 he traveled to Paris, at the height of the Averroist controversy, to forestall the hasty condemnation of certain Aristotelian doctrines that both he and Thomas (d. 1274) held to be true (see AVERROISM, LATIN; FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF). This last journey was apparently a failure. Some time after he drew up his last will and testament in January 1279, his health and memory began to fail him. Weakened by manifold labors, austerities, and vigils, he died at the age of “eighty years or more,” to quote BARTHOLOMEW OF LUCCA and BERNARD GUI. His body was laid to rest in the Dominican church at Cologne where it remains today.

Cult and Canonization. Not only was Albert the only man of the High Middle Ages to be called “the Great,” but this title was used even before his death (Annal. Basil., Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 17:202). Long before the canonization of Thomas in 1323, Albert’s prestige was well established. SIGER OF BRABANT, a contemporary, considered Albert and Thomas “the principal men in philosophy” (De anim. intel. 3). In the words of Ulric of Strassburg, Albert was “a man so superior in every science, that he can fittingly be called the wonder and the miracle of our time” (Sum. de bono 4.3.9).

In Germany there has always existed a deep devotion to the venerable bishop. He was beatified by Gregory XV in 1622. By the decree In Thesauris Sapientiae (Dec. 16, 1931) Pius XI declared him a saint of the universal Church with the additional title of doctor. In the solemn decree Ad Deum (Dec. 16, 1941) Pius XII constituted him the heavenly patron of all who cultivate the natural sciences.

DOCTRINE

Aristotelianism. The Christian centuries preceding Albert were fundamentally Augustinian in philosophy and theology, transmitting the Christian Platonism of the Fathers through the monasteries and the schools (see PLATONISM). The 12th-century Latin translations of AVICENNA, Avicbron, COSTA BEN LUCA, ISAAC ISRAELI, and the LIBER DE CAUSIS, together with the paraphrases of DOMINIC GUNDISALVI, could easily be accommodated to Christian philosophy, since Platonic thought was a common element. When the new Aristotle reached the schools, the obscure Latin versions of the Stagirite from Arabic and Greek were studied and taught with every aid at hand, including JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA, Avicenna, Avicbron and AUGUSTINE. The earliest teachers of the Aristotelian books at Paris, AMALRIC OF BÈNE and DAVID OF DINANT, made a pantheist of Aristotle, and incurred a deserved censure until the new Aristotle could be examined more carefully. Later masters in the faculty of arts, such as ROBERT GROSSETESTE, JOHN BLUND, ADAM OF BUCKFIELD, Geoffrey of Aspall, ROBERT KILWARDBY and ROGER BACON, were more orthodox, although they interpreted Aristotle through the teaching of Avicenna and in Platonist fashion.

However, there is a fundamental divergence between Platonic and Aristotelian views, particularly concerning scientific thought and the nature of man. For PLATO, the study of nature is not strictly scientific, but only problematic, a “likely story”; for certainty one must go to mathematics, and thence to the contemplation of pure forms in metaphysics. Further, Plato conceived man as a soul imprisoned in a body, rather than a unique composite of body and soul. Aristotle, on the other hand, considered the study of nature to be autonomous in its own domain, independent of mathematics and metaphysics, worthy of pursuit in its own right, and truly “scientific” in the technical sense employed by the Greeks. Moreover, Aristotle was the first to elaborate fully the doctrine of potency and act, using this to explain how the body and soul of man constitute an absolute unity in nature. The arrival of Averroës’s commentaries in the schools after 1230 helped to bring out the difference between the two Greeks, for Averroës was the most Aristotelian of the Arabic commentators.

Among the Latin schoolmen, Albert was the first to make the Aristotelian approach to the physical world his own and to defend its autonomy against “the error of Plato” (Meta. 1.1.1, et passim) maintained by his contemporaries. Strictly speaking, Albert’s expositions of Aristotle are neither commentaries nor paraphrases; they are really original works in which “the true view of Peripatetic philosophers” is rewritten, erroneous views refuted, new solutions proposed, and personal observations (experimenta) incorporated. This, at least, was the opinion of Roger Bacon’s contemporaries at Paris, who thought that “now a complete philosophy has been given to the Latins, and composed in the Latin tongue” (Opus tertium 9). For this reason, as Bacon tells us, Albert’s views had as much authority in the schools as those of Aristotle, Avicenna, or Averroës, “and he is still alive and he has had in his own lifetime authority, which man has never had in doctrine” (ibid.).

Scientific Method. Yet Albert did not blindly follow the authority of Aristotle. In his philosophical as well as theological works, he does not hesitate to reject certain views, such as the eternity of the world and the animation of the spheres, and observational errors. “Whoever believes that Aristotle was a god, must also believe that he never erred; but if one believes that Aristotle was a man, then doubtless he was liable to error just as we are” (Phys. 8.1.14). In matters of experimental science, he frequently rejects a supposed observation of the Stagirite, saying that it is contrary to his own observations (Meteor. 3.4.11, Animal. 23.1.1. 104, etc.). In his treatise on plants he insists, “Experiment is the only safe guide in such investigations” (Veg. 6.2.1). In practice as well as in theory, he realized that “the aim of natural science is not simply to accept the statements of others, but to investigate the causes that are at work in nature” (Mineral. 2.2.1).

Albert was an indefatigable student of nature, and applied himself so sedulously that he was accused of neglecting the sacred sciences (HENRY OF GHENT, De script. eccles. 2.10). Even in his own lifetime incredible legends were circulated, attributing to him the power of a magician or sorcerer. In later generations such legends were multiplied and spurious treatises were circulated under his name. The real influence of Albert, felt throughout the Renaissance, comes from his establishing the study of nature as a legitimate science in the Christian tradition. See SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES).

Sacred Theology. In theology he was not as successful as his illustrious disciple in presenting a new synthesis. Aquinas’s famous Summa is a perfect application of Aristotle’s Posterior Analytics to the deposit of faith, employing from the very beginning the profound implications of Aristotelian metaphysical principles. This cannot be said of Albert’s theological works. Nonetheless these are outstanding in medieval literature for their sound scholarship, breadth of inquiry, and clarity of presentation. Considering the milieu in which he wrote, it is most significant that he strongly defended the distinction between the realm of revelation and that of human reason (see FAITH AND REASON).

Unlike many of his contemporaries, he defended the autonomy of philosophical investigation, insisting that no truth of reason could contradict revelation. At the same time, he maintained the superiority of revelation and the right of theologians to use all of human knowledge to search the divine mysteries. This view was continued by Aquinas and others so that today it is an integral part of Catholic theology.

Albertists. Among the immediate students of Albert, apart from Aquinas and Ulrich of Strassburg, should also be enumerated Hugh of Strassburg, JOHN OF FREIBURG, JOHN OF LICHTENBERG, and GILES OF LESSINES. Other German Dominicans favorably disposed toward Neoplatonic thought developed mystical elements in Albert’s teaching. These were transmitted through THEODORIC OF FREIBERG and Berthold of Mosburg to Meister ECKHART and other 14th-century mystics, namely, Johannes TAULER, HENRY SUSO, and Jan van RUYSBROECK. In the 15th century, small groups of thinkers at Paris and Cologne, identifying themselves as “Albertists,” set up a philosophical school in opposition to Thomism. Founded by Heymericus de Campo (Van de Velde), they opposed the traditional Thomistic teaching on the real distinction between essence and existence, as well as that on universals. In so doing they actually returned to the teaching of Avicenna, and made extensive use of Albert’s commentaries on the Liber de Causis and the works of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS.

That Albert’s teaching is not to be completely identified with that of his famous student is clear from his response to the 43 questions of JOHN OF VERCELLI (43 Problemata determinata), one of his last writings. Some have even held that an occasional quidam in the works of Albert is a disparaging reference to Thomas, but on the whole there is broad doctrinal agreement between master and student. This has led to a gradual assimilation of the Albertist tradition within the Dominican Order into the mainstream of Thomism, with the result that Albertism and Thomism have become practically indistinguishable.

WRITINGS

The reputation of Albert was so widespread that not only were his authentic works frequently copied in manuscript and abundantly reproduced in print, but an incredible number of spurious works, some even fantastic, have been attributed to him. On the other hand many works known to have been written by him have not yet been discovered. Two editions of “complete works” have been published: one at Lyons in 1651, in 21 folio volumes edited by Peter Jammy, OP; the other at Paris (Vivès), 1890–99, in 38 quarto volumes edited by the Abbé Auguste Borgnet, of the Diocese of Reims. The first volume of a new and critical edition that will comprise 40 volumes, under the direction of Bernhard Geyer, President of the Albertus Magnus Institute of Cologne, appeared in 1951. The following list gives the volume of the Borgnet edition (B), and the actual or projected volume of the Cologne edition (C). The dates in brackets are the certain or probable dates of composition.

Logic. Super Porphyrium de 5 universalibus, B.1, C.1; De praedicamentis, B.1, C.1; De sex principiis, B.1, C.1; De divisione, C.1; Peri hermeneias, B.1, C.1; Analytica priora, B.1, C.2; Analytica posteriora, B.2, C.2; Topica, B.2, C.3; De sophisticis elenchis, B.2, C.3 [all between 1248–1264].

Natural Science. Physica, B.3, C.4 [between 1245–48]; De caelo et mundo, B.4, C.5 [between 1248–60]; De natura locorum, B.9, C.5 [before 1259]; De causis proprietatum elementorum, B.9, C.5 [between 1248–59]; De generatione et corruptione, B.4, C.5 [before 1260]; Meteora, B.4, C.6 [before 1259]; Mineralia, B.5, C.6 [before 1263]; De anima, B.5, C.7 [c. 1256]; De nutrimento, B.9, C.7 [before 1263]; De intellectu et intelligibili, B.9, C.7 [before 1259]; De sensu et sensato, B.9, C.7 [before 1260]; De memoria, B.9, C.7 [before 1263]; De somno et vigilia, B.9, C.7 [before 1259]; De spiritu et respiratione, B.9, C.7 [before 1259]; De motibus animalium, B.9, C.7 [before 1259]; De aetate, B.9, C.7 [before 1259]; De morte et vita, B.9, C.7 [before 1259]; De vegetabilibus et plantis, B.10, C.8 [before 1259]; De animalibus, B.11–12, C.9–1 [1258–62]; De natura et origine animae, B.9, C.12 [c. 1263]; De principiis motus processivi, B.10, C.12 [c. 1261]; QQ. super de animalibus, C.12 [c. 1258]

Moral Sciences. Ethica, B.7, C.13 [before 1261]; Super Ethica commentum et quaestiones, C.14 [between 1248–52]; Politica, B.8, C.15 [between 1265–75].

Metaphysics. Metaphysica, B.6, C.16 [between 1261–66]; De causis, B.10, C.17 [between 1266–71]; De unitate intellectus, B.9, C.17 [c. 1270]; De 15 problematibus, C.17 [c. 1270]; 43 Problemata determinata, C.17 [April 1271].

Sacred Scripture. Super Iob, C.18 [1272 or 1274]; Super Isaiam, C.19; Super Ieremiam (frag.), C.20; Super Threnos, B.18, C.20; Super Baruch, B.18, C.20; Super Ezechielem (frag.), C.20; Super Danielelem, B.18, C.20; Super Prophetas minores, B.19, C.20; Super Mattheum, B.20–21, C.21 [definitive version after 1270]; Super Marcum, B.21, C.22 [definitive version between 1272–5]; Super Lucam, B.22–23, C.23 [1261–62; rev. 1270–75]; Super Ioannem, B.24, C.24 [1256; rev. 1272–75]. Albert's commentaries on St. Paul and on Apocalypse have not yet been found; the printed Apocalypse is spurious.

Systematic Theology. De natura boni, C.25 [before 1240]; Super 4 sententiarum, B.25–30, C.29–32 [rev. version completed in 1249]; QQ. theologicae, C.25 [1245–48]; De sacramentis, De incarnatione, De resur- rectione, C.26 [1245–50]; De 4 coaequaevis, B.34, C.26 [1245–50]; De homine, B.35, C.27 [1244–48]; De bono, C.28 [1244–48]; In corpus Dionysium, B.14, C.36–37 [1248–60]; Summa theologiae, B.31–33, C.34–35 [after 1270]; De mysterio missae, B.38, C.38 [after 1270]; De corpore domini, B.38, C.38 [after 1270].

Sermons and Letters. C.39 (see J. P. Schneyer).

Spurious and Dubious Works. C.40. It is certain that Albert wrote on mathematics, astronomy, and rhetoric, but these writings have not yet been found. Among the definitely spurious works, the best known are the Compendium theologiae veritatis, B.34, which is by Hugh of Strassburg; De laudibus B. Mariae Virginis, B.36; Mariale, B.37; Biblia Mariana, B.37; the De secretis naturae, De secretis mulierum, and other occult works. The authenticity of many other works is still disputed among scholars, principally that of the Speculum astronomiae.

Feast: Nov. 15.

See Also: THOMISM; SCHOLASTICISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography: M. ALBERT, Albert the Great (Oxford 1948). M. J. DORCY, Master Albert; the Story of Saint Albert the Great (New York 1955). T. M. SCHWERTNER, Saint Albert the Great (Milwaukee 1932). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–) 2:293–301. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 30. F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al. (Berlin 1923–28) 2:400–416. Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:121–127. W. KÜBEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 1:285–287; see 284 under “Albertismus.” P. MANDONNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:666–675. Institutum Alberti Magni Coloniense, B. GEYER, president, Opera omnia ad fidem codicum manuscriptorum edenda, apparatus critico . . ., ed. W. KÜBEL, 37 v. (Aschendorff, Germany 1951–1993). P. G. MEERSSEMAN, Introductio in opera omnia Beati Alberti Magni (Bruges 1931). “De vita et scriptis B. Alberti Magni,” ed. P. DE LOË, Analecta Bollandiana 19 (Brussels 1900) 257–284; 20 (1901) 273–316; 21 (1902) 361–371. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 1:162–183. Albert der Grosse in Köln: gehalten auf der Feierstunde zur 750sten Wiederkehr . . ., ed. J. A. AERTSEN (Cologne 1999). Albertus Magnus, Doctor universalis, ed. G. MEYER and A. ZIMMERMANN (Mainz 1980). T. M. BONIN, Creation as Emanation: The Origin of Diversity in Albert the Great's On the Causes and the Procession of the Universe (Notre Dame, Ind. 2000). G. EMERY, La Trinité créatrice: Trinité et création dans les commentaires aux Sentences de Thomas d'Aquin et de ses précurseurs Albert le Grand et Bonaventure (Paris 1995). K. ILLING, Alberts des Grossen "Super Missam" - Traktat in mittelhochdeutschen Übertragungen: Untersuchungen und Texte (Munich 1975). A. DE LIBERA, Albert le Grand et la philosophie (Paris 1990). F.-J. NOCKE, Sakrament und personaler Vollzug bei Albertus Magnus (Münster 1967). A. PIOLANTI, Il corpo mistico: e le sue relazioni con l'eucaristia in S. Alberto Magno (Rome 1969). H. C. SCHEEBEN, “Albertus der Grosse: Zur Chronologie seines Lebens,” Quellen und Forschungen zur Gesch- ichte des Dominikanerordens in Deutschland 27 (Vechta 1931). "Le Bienheureux Albert le Grand," Revue thomiste 36 (1931), esp. M. H. LAURENT and Y. CONGAR, "Essai de bibliographie albertinienne," 422–468. M. SCHOYANS, "Bibliographie philosophique de saint Albert le Grand (1931–60)," Revista da Universidade Católica de São Paulo 21 (1961) 36–88. J. P. SCHNEYER, "Predigten Alberts des Grossen in der Hs. Leipzig, Univ. Bibl. 683," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 34 (1964) 45–106. J. P. TILMANN, An Appraisal of the Geographical Works of Albertus Magnus and His Contributions to Geographical Thought (Ann Arbor 1971). P. ZAMBELLI, The Speculum Astronomiae and Its Enigma (Dordrecht 1992). Albert and Thomas: Selected Writings, tr. S. TUGWELL, The Classics of Western Spirituality (New York 1988).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ALBERTARIO, DAVIDE

Priest, editor; b. Filighera (Pavia), Italy, Feb. 16, 1846; d. Carenno (Bergamo), Italy, Sept. 21, 1902. Albertario became a journalist the year he was ordained (1868), after earning his doctorate in theology at Rome's Pontifical Gregorian University. In 1872, he became part owner and associate editor, then editor, of the daily Osservatore Cattolico, of Milan and of the weekly Il Popolo Cattolico. He defended zealously, if not always temperately, the principles of the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS and of VATICAN COUNCIL I, and opposed not only liberal intolerance and "irreligious tyranny" but also the "liberal Catholicism" of some priests and bishops. This position set him against men of outstanding reputation such as Bishop BONOMELLI of Cremona and Bishop SCALABRINI of Piacenza, and well-known priests such as the noted geologist, Antonio Stoppani.

In 1894, at a time when relations between Church and State had become less stormy, Albertario invited to the OSSERVATORE CATTOLICO Filippo Meda, who was to succeed him as editor and give a new impetus to public action by Catholics. During this period the paper continually advised its readers to prepare for the time when the Holy See might permit Italian Catholics to reenter political life (see MARGOTTI, GIACOMO).

In 1898, during a disproportionate reaction of the government to certain social movements which led to the temporary dissolution of Catholic organizations, Albertario, who had bravely defended the poorer classes, was arrested. Together with certain Syndicalist Socialists, he was tried and condemned to three years in prison, a sentence generally regarded as unjust. After one year he was released following the lively agitation that the sentence had aroused among Italian Catholics. He told the story of his imprisonment in two volumes titled Un anno di carcere (1900).

[E. LUCATELLO]

ALBERTI, LEANDRO

Italian Dominican, historian and inquisitor; b. Bologna, 1479; d. Bologna, 1552? As a young religious at Forlì and then at Bologna, he studied under the humanist G. Garzoni and the theologian S. Mazzolini of Priero. In 1514–15 and in 1525 as socius to two masters general, the celebrated Cajetan and the noted theologian Francesco Silvestri of Ferrara, called "Ferrariensis," he traveled through Italy, France, and Germany. After 1532, apart from a brief period as vicar of Santa Sabina in Rome, he was involved almost exclusively with duties of the office of the Inquisition at Bologna. Among Alberti's literary productions, several works have merited distinction: De viris illustribus Ordinis Praedicatorum (Bologna 1517), still profitably consulted; Descrittione di tutta Italia (Bologna 1550), his principal work, published in 12 editions; and the Historie di Bologna (Bologna and Vicenza 1541–91).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:137–139. G. M. MAZZUCHELLI, Gli scrittori d'Italia, v.1 (Brescia 1753) 306–310.

[A. L. REDIGONDA]

ALBERTINUS OF FONTE AVELLANA, ST.

Abbot; d. April 13, 1294. He became a BENEDICTINE monk c. 1250 and was an outstanding prior general of the congregation of Fonte Avellana in the Marches from 1275 until his death. He was buried in the monastery church at Fonte Avellana and was soon honored as a saint. His cult was approved by Pope Pius VI on Aug. 21, 1782. He is regarded as a holy protector against hernia.

Feast: Aug. 31.

Bibliography: G. B. MITTARELLI and A. COSTADONI, Annales Camaldulenses, v.5 (Venice 1760) 207–210. A. GIBELLI, Monografia dell'antico monastero di S. Croce di Fonte Avellana: I suoi priori ed abbatì (Faenza 1895). R. BIRON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1585–86. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:50–51. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 1:80. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:283.

[K. NOLAN]

ALBERTO CASTELLANI

Historian and editor; b. c. 1459; d. 1552. He entered the Dominican priory of Saints John and Paul in Venice, and although the details of his life are obscure, his name appears often in connection with writings that cover a wide field of interest, most of them concerned with the history of his order. These include the Catalogus sanctorum a Petro de Natalibus Veneto e regione Castellana episcopo Equilino concinnatus (Venice 1501), Catalogus illustrium Ordinis virorum (Venice 1501), and Chronica brevis ab initio Ordinis usque ad praesens tempus (Venice 1504). Besides these historical accounts of the prominent Dominicans from the foundation of the order to his own time, he edited the constitutions of the Order of Preachers; the formularies for the election of priors, visitation of convents, and conduct of chapters; and the valuable Tabula super privilegia papalia Ordini Praedicatorum concessa (1507). In 1519 he edited a Biblical concordance of the Old and New Testament, and he is famous for his revision of the Pontificale Romanum. Among the many ascetical, patristic, and apologetical works he published were some of the sermons of Caesarius of Arles and Zeno, Bishop of Verona (Venice 1508), and an interesting example of devotional iconography, the Rosario de la gloriosa Vergine Maria (Venice 1521), in which the mysteries of the rosary were incised in wood for popular use.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 2:48–49. U. MANNUCCI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti 2:192–93.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

ALBI, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Also known as Albiensis; Located in southwest France, 2,232 square miles in area, corresponding to Tarn department; Metropolitan see since 1678.

Albi was detached from the civitas Ruthenorum (Rodez) in the fourth century as the civitas Albigensium and included in Aquitania I. The see was created after the civitas, at the end of the fourth century; the first known bishop, Diogenianus, appeared in the fifth century. Albi was held by the Visigoths (who detained St. Eugene, bishop of Carthage, there in 475) until CLOVIS took it (507). Feudal lords seized the bishopric in the 10th century, but in the 11th-century Gregorian reform, the churches were freed. Rather unjustly, Albi's name has been given to the Manichaean heretics (ALBIGENSES) of the 12th and 13th centuries, rampant throughout south France. Bishops and mendicant orders (Dominicans and Franciscans) fought the heresy, and Simon de Montfort and LOUIS VIII led crusades against its protectors. In 1264 the bishops became temporal lords of the city under the suzerainty of the Holy See. The 16th-century Wars of Religion brought grave troubles, but a religious renaissance took place at the end of the 16th and in the 17th century (convents and episcopal activity). Albi's bishops include St. Salvius (574–584), the reformer Louis d'Amboise (1474–1503), the reformer Hyacinthe Serroni (1678–87) who founded the seminary, Cardinal François de BERNIS (1764–94), and Eudoxe MIGNOT (1900–18) who renewed ecclesiastical studies.

The red-brick, fortified Cathedral of Sainte-Cécile (1282–1514) symbolized the temporal power of the bishops. The late 13th-century episcopal palace (La Berbie) adjoins it. The sixth-century monastery of Saint-Salvy, with a 10th–13th century church, has a crypt and a cloister of note.

Albi, suffragan to Bourges, was divided in 1317 to form Castres, and in 1678 was made an archbishopric by Innocent XI. Suppressed by the CONCORDAT OF 1801 and united to Montpellier, it was restored as a see and a metropolitan with its present suffragans (1817–22). The diocese now comprises the old See of Albi and the former Sees of Castres and Lavaur (1317). Former monasteries outside the city include Vieux (a double monastery founded by St. Eugene), Troclar (the late seventh-century double monastery of St. Sigolène), Castres (seventh–ninth century, which became a see), Gaillac (tenth century), Sainte-Marie of Vielmur (tenth), Sainte-Marie of Ardorel (12th, Cistercian in 1138), and Sainte-Marie of Candeil (12th century). The council of 1254, attended by bishops of the provinces of Narbonne, Bourges, and Bordeaux, dealt with heresy ecclesiastical discipline, usury, and the rights and obligations of Jews. Albi has ten diocesan statutes (1230–1762).

Outside the city are the cathedrals of Castres (17th–18th century) and Lavaur (14th–16th, fortified), the former abbey church of Saint-Michel in Gaillac (16th-century Romanesque, fortified), and the fortified church of Rabastens (13th–14th). There are shrines to Our Lady near Albi and in Grazac, as well as Saint-Crucifix at Cordres.

Bibliography: C. DE VIC and J. VAISSETE, Histoire générale de Languedoc, ed. E. DULAURIER et al., 16 v. in 17 (new ed. Toulouse 1872–1904). L. DE LACGER, États administratifs des anciens diocèses d'Albi, de Castres, et de Lavaur (Paris 1921). E. JARRY, Catholicisme 1:273–275.

[E. JARRY]

ALBIGENSIANS

The name is taken from Albi, Department of Tarn, France. It refers to several small groups of heretics in the Languedoc region of France, Catharists and sometimes WALDENSIANS among them, who played an important role in the religion and politics of the region from the mid-twelfth to the late fourteenth century. The CATHARI were eastern heretics with roots in Gnosticism who had made inroads in Western Europe around the middle of the twelfth century. Another principal group were the BOGOMILS from Bulgaria, but there were probably multiple sources.

“Albigensian Heretics Disputing with Dominicans,” detail of a 14th-century fresco by Simone Martini in the church of Santa Maria Novella, Florence, Italy.

What characterized these groups was their dualistic belief, either absolute or limited, which maintained that God was responsible only for the spiritual world while Satan ruled the material world. In its absolute form, God created only the spiritual world, Jesus had no real human form, matter having been created by the devil. There were no positive values to marriage nor were there any material goods. These ideas were not new—they had been present in Manichaeism in the fourth century, when St. Augustine had at first joined them for nine years and later argued against them after his conversion. Westerners, therefore, identified Catharism with Manichaeism, though there was no direct connection. The indirect link was through Gnosticism, which had remained influential in the East, especially in monastic circles. The appeal of Gnosticism lay both in its strict separation of good and evil as well as in its rich myth-making tradition, which reworked and elaborated the Christian story to fit its view of the world and to broaden its appeal.

Catharism found fertile soil in many places in the West during periods of monastic reform in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. During this time there was increased contact between East and West and a greater receptivity to eastern forms of monasticism. During the twelfth century, the monastic revival began to impact the laity, finding a welcome among those belonging to confraternities. Recent research has also shown how this piety influenced members of the lesser nobility. Catharism did not, however, spread evenly throughout Europe. Its largest following was to be found in Mediterranean Europe.

One of the most difficult, but very important problems in measuring the Catharist influence lies in assessing their numbers. The popularly accepted statements based on contemporary sources regarding the extent of heresy have almost always proved wrong when examined closely. Even where they were numerous, as in parts of Languedoc, it is unlikely that the Catharists formed a majority save in some relatively small places. Where studies have examined this issue in detail, it seems clear that their influence was chiefly due to family members, who gave them shelter, or a measure of power they received from local authorities whom they supported against their enemies. This factor became more important as the intentions of the French monarchy in the Midi became clearer.

It is evident that neither the popes nor the bishops had a definite policy regarding heresy in the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. Their efforts to establish a policy was complicated by numerous groups of lower clergy and laity who sought to embrace the apostolic life (vita apostolica), and whose zeal led them to preach at times without permission from their bishops. The most noted group, though by no means the only, were the followers of Peter Valdes (Waldo), a pious merchant of Lyons, whose zeal brought him into conflict with the episcopacy and the papacy. Although sometimes lumped with the Catharists as noted above, the Waldensians were not dualists. They opposed clerical abuses, and, in some cases, rejected priestly authority, but they were generally orthodox. Many were reconciled to the church in the early thirteenth century. Although St. Francis of Assisi and his followers were strong opponents of the Cathari, they did appeal directly to Christians who might otherwise have followed the Waldensians through their emphasis on apostolic poverty and their profound religious enthusiasm.

The rise of heresy in this period had a profound impact on the church. In 1184, Pope Lucius III, then in Verona, condemned various heretical groups by name in Ad abolendam. Among those mentioned were the followers of ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, the HUMILIATI, and the Cathari. But Ad abolendam seems to have been directed chiefly to the concerns of Bishop Adelard of Verona. It had no effect on Humiliati outside that area, but it may have tinged their reputation, as evidenced by a letter of Innocent III which recognized them as Catholic religious. This letter did not shape papal policy in the late twelfth century, however. Of much greater importance were Innocent III's efforts to develop a policy that combined strict penalties for heresy with efforts to reconcile as many heretics as possible and to broaden the view of the church in regard to the laity who were pursuing the vita apostolica. Canon Law, which developed rapidly in importance in this period, however, reflected only part of this policy. It is represented in the decretal Vergentis in senium (1199), which was directed against the problem of persistent heretics in Viterbo, within the papal state, where Innocent exercised both spiritual and temporal authority. This decretal was in response to the murder of the podestà, Parenzo. Its provisions were, however, somewhat mitigated by the decree "Excommunicamus," at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215. By that time, moreover, Innocent had behind him the experience of the Albigensian Crusade (1208–), triggered by the assassination of the Cistercian PETER OF CASTELNAU, one of his legates in Languedoc, by an official of Count Raymond of Toulouse's court. This crusade, which was an obstacle to the successful preaching of the Cistercians and of Bishop Diego de Osma and his associate, Dominic de Guzman, also hindered Innocent's plans for a crusade to free the holy places in the East. Moreover, it led indirectly to the French monarchy's dominance over the region. Innocent's effort to resolve the issues of succession in the south of France at the Fourth Lateran Council ran afoul of the opposition of the French bishops. His efforts at compromise failed.

By the 1220s, the papacy had enlisted the support of the Dominicans and Franciscans. The work of popular preaching continued and was probably the most effective instrument in combating heresy. Ironically, as heresy seems to have declined, the church placed more reliance on judicial means to seek out heretics. The INQUISITION, which evolved gradually around the middle of the thirteenth century, resulted from the recognition that it was becoming more difficult to identify heretics. This technique of judicial inquiry enabled the inquisitors, usually members of the mendicant orders, to secure testimony about suspected heretics. Although Catharism had virtually ceased to exist in Languedoc by the end of the fourteenth century, the effects of the crusade had transformed the region politically, and the Inquisition had led many to view repression as almost the only effective means to combat heresy.

Bibliography: Sources. J. VON DÖLLINGER, Beiträge zur Sektengeschichte des Mittelalters, 2 v. in 1 (Munich 1890; repr. New York, 1960). C. DOUAIS, Documents pour servir . . . l'histoire de l'Inquisition dans le Languedoc, 2 v. (Paris 1900). W. WAKEFIELD and A. P. EVANS, Heresies of the High Middle Ages (New York 1969). E. M. PETERS, Heresy and Authority in Medieval Europe (London 1980). Literature. F. ANDREWS, The Early Humiliati (Cambridge 1999). A. BORST, Die Katharer (Stuttgart 1953). Cahiers de Fanjeaux, 1966–. J. DUVERNOY, Le Catharisme, 2 v. (Toulouse 1976–9). B. HAMILTON, The Medieval Inquisition (London 1981). G. ROTTENWÖHRER, Der Katharismus, 4 v. (Bad Honnef, 1982–1993); Unde Malum? Herkunft und Gestalt des Bösen nach heterodoxer Lehre von Markion bis zu den Katharern (Bad Honnef 1986). M. LAMBERT, The Cathars (Oxford 1998). E. M. PETERS, Inquisition (Berkeley 1988). K. RUDOLPH, Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism (San Francisco 1987). J. STRAYER, The Albigensian Crusades, 2nd ed. (Ann Arbor 1992). W. WAKEFIELD, Heresy, Crusade and Inquisition in Southern France (Berkeley 1974).

[J. M. POWELL]

ALBINUS (AUBIN) OF ANGERS, ST.

Abbot and bishop; b. Vannes, France, 469; d. March 1, 550. He entered the monastery of Tincillac at an early age and was elected abbot in 504 at age 35. Under his rule the community prospered, and in 529 he was made bishop of Angers. In that office he proved himself zealous and capable as well as devout. As bishop, Albinus gave particular attention to the poor, spending large sums for the ransoming of captives. He was energetic in putting into effect the decrees of the Synods of Orléans (538 and 541), in which he had participated. His remains are enshrined in the church dedicated to his memory in 556, and his intercession is credited with many miracles, as a result of which he has become the object of popular veneration, not only in France, but throughout Europe. His vita was composed by FORTUNATUS (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores Antiquissimi 4:27–33).

Feast: March 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:54–63. F. UZUREAU, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 5: 254–255. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 1:273. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:1012–13. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 1:83. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:452. G. ALLEMANG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:289.

[J. F. FAHEY]

ALBO, JOSEPH

Spanish-Jewish philosopher, theologian, and polemicist; b. c. 1380; d. c. 1440. Not much is known of his life. He lived for a while at Daroca (province of Saragossa) and later at Soria (province of Castile). One of his teachers was Hasdai CRESCAS. At the celebrated theological Disputation of Tortosa (1413–14), which had been convoked by the antipope BENEDICT XIII during his self-imposed exile in Spain, Albo was one of the leading spokesmen in defense of Judaism against the attacks on it by the convert from Judaism, Gerónimo de Santa Fe (called before his conversion Joshua ben Joseph ibn Vives de Lorca and commonly known as Lorki).

As a result of the debate, Albo, recognizing the need for a good theological work for the defense of Judaism, composed his best-known book, the Sefer ha-Ikkarim (Book of Principles), completed in 1425. It soon became one of the most popular works on Jewish theology. It was first printed at Soncino in 1485, and later editions with commentaries were published at Fribourg (1584) and at Venice (1618). In this work Albo attempted to determine precisely the essential beliefs of Judaism. Four tractates make up the work. The first, which serves as a general introduction, discusses the bases of all true religion, which are Albo's three "principles": the existence of God, divine revelation, and reward and punishment. In the three following tractates the author studies in detail each of these three basic principles and their consequences. In this way he sets forth a complete system of Jewish theology, sometimes following MAIMONIDES and sometimes Crescas and borrowing much from his contemporary Simeon ben Tzemah Duran. Like Crescas, he detached himself from the pure intellectualism of the earlier Jewish philosophers and placed the goal of human life not only in intellectual but also in religious and moral perfection. Jewish writers, e.g., Isaac ABRABANEL, have noted Albo's seeming indifference toward the Jewish belief in a coming Messiah.

See Also: JEWISH PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: J. ALBO, Sefer ha-Ikkarim, tr. I. HUSIK, 5 v. in 4 (Philadelphia 1929–30), a critical ed. of the Hebrew text with Eng. tr. I. HUSIK, A History of Medieval Jewish Philosophy (2d ed. New York 1930; pa. 1958); "Joseph Albo: The Last of the Jewish Mediaeval Philosophers," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research 1 (1928–30). G. VAJDA, Introduction à la pensée juive du moyen âge (Paris 1947) 186–89, 286. A. TÄNZER, Die Regionsphilosophie des Joseph Albo (Frankfurt 1896).

[A. BRUNOT]

ALBORNOZ, GIL ÁLVAREZ CARRILLO DE

Archbishop of Toledo, cardinal legate, restorer of the Papal States; b. Cuenca, Spain, c. 1295; d. near Viterbo, Italy, Aug. 23, 1367. He studied Canon Law in Toulouse and rose in the service of Alfonso XI to succeed his uncle as archbishop of Toledo in 1338. As royal chancellor and ecclesiastical primate, he pursued reforms in his diocese, crusaded against the Muslims, and played an important part in the unification of Castile. When Peter I (1350–69) reversed the policies of Alfonso, Albornoz in June 1350 left a vicar in his see and went to Avignon, where CLEMENT VI made him a cardinal in December 1350. In June 1353 INNOCENT VI gave him extensive powers as legate in Italy to prepare the Papal States for the return of the popes. By mid-1357 Albornoz had defeated the petty tyrants and modernized the government of the STATES OF THE CHURCH, centralizing authority territorially and favoring parliaments and communal rights against individual privileges. Innocent then yielded to the Visconti of Milan, to whom Albornoz would not cede Bologna, and replaced him. Albornoz, however, returned to Italy in October 1358 to regain the papal position. His second mission was made difficult as foreign powers became involved in the dispute over Bologna and the return of the popes to Rome. In November 1363 URBAN V replaced Albornoz a second time. The cardinal remained in the Papal States as legate to Naples; he died escorting Urban to Rome. The Constitutiones Aegidianae, which Albornoiz promulgated for the Marches of Ancona in 1357, were later extended to all the Papal States and lasted until 1816. He bequeathed his enormous wealth in four countries to a multitude of pious causes. In 1365 he founded a college for Spanish students in Bologna where many of his papers remain to be studied.

Bibliography: P. SELLA, Costituzioni Egidiane dell' anno 1357 (Rome 1912). G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 1:1717–25; 2:1770–73. F. FILIPPINI, Il cardinale Egidio Albornoiz (Bologna 1933). J. BENEYTO PEREZ, El cardenal Albornoiz (Madrid 1950). G. MOLLAT, Popes at Avignon 1305–1378 (Camden, N.J. 1963).

[E. P. COLBERT]

ALBRECHT OF BRANDENBURG

Cardinal archbishop of Mainz, elector of the Holy Roman Empire; b. Berlin, June 28, 1490; d. Mainz, Sept. 24, 1545. He was the younger son of Johann Cicero, Elector of Brandenburg, and Margareta, daughter of Duke Wilhelm III of Saxony; his brother, Joachim I, succeeded to the electorate upon the father's death. Through the influence of his father and brother, Albrecht became archbishop of Magdeburg (1513) and bishop of Halberstadt. When the archbishopric of Mainz, which carried with it the title of Elector, became vacant in 1514, Albrecht put forth his candidacy. In order to raise the necessary 24,000 ducats (14,000 to pay the installation tax for Mainz and 10,000 to receive the needed dispensation for the plural holding of sees), he made an arrangement with the FUGGER banking house. Genial Jacob Fugger advanced the money to Pope LEO X in return for one-half of the sum that would be collected from the preaching of an indulgence in Albrecht's dioceses. As the indulgence (for the building of St. Peter's in Rome) had not been allowed to be preached in these dioceses as yet, it was believed that large sums would be raised. In January of 1517 Albrecht authorized Johann TETZEL to preach the indulgence. Martin LUTHER posted his 95 theses in protest against the indulgence, Tetzel, and the archbishop.

Albrecht had been strongly influenced by the humanistic atmosphere of the University of Frankfurt-on-Oder, which his brother, Joachim I, founded with Albrecht's assistance in 1506. As an admirer of Erasmus he did not hesitate to criticize the Church and advocate reform. Thus he was not unsympathetic to the attacks upon the Church by Luther and his followers in their early stages. However, there was more of Erasmus than Luther in the young humanist and, rather than break with Rome, as did the latter, he supported reform within the Church. As the Protestant Revolt gained momentum, Albrecht aligned his religious and political policies closer to those of his brother in support of the papacy. He founded the University of Halle (papal permission granted in 1531) and introduced reforms in the University of Mainz. In 1541 he invited (Blessed) Peter Faber, SJ, to Mainz, where the Jesuit quickly became the heart of the Counter Reformation in western Germany. A lover of the arts and music, with good taste in architecture, Albrecht is one of the finest examples of a 16th century German Renaissance prince.

Bibliography: J. JANSSEN, History of the German People at the Close of the Middle Ages, tr. M. A. MITCHELL and A. M. CHRISTIE, 17 v. (London 1896–1925). J. HEIDEMANN, Die Reformation in der Mark Brandenburg (Berlin 1889). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London–St. Louis 1938–61). J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1940). H. HOLBORN, A History of Modern Germany: The Reformation (New York 1959). E. W. ZEEDEEN, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:291–292. J. PIETSCH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 1:1494–96. W. DELIUS, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:218.

[J. G. GALLAHER]

ALBRECHT OF BRANDENBURG–ANSBACH

First duke of Prussia, margrave of Ansbach, and last grand master of the Teutonic Knights; b. Ansbach, May 17, 1490; d. Tapiau, East Prussia (present-day Gvardiesk, Russia), March 20, 1568. A distinguished member of the Hohenzollern family, he was the nephew of King Sigismund of Poland through his mother. He was already Margrave of Ansbach when he was elected grand master of the TEUTONIC Knights of East Prussia in 1511, a position he held until April 9, 1525, when he announced his conversion to Lutheranism, suppressed the order, and secularized its property along with the adjacent lands of Samland and Ermland as his personal fief under the suzerainty of the king of Poland. His initial contact with Lutheranism came at the Diet of Nuremberg in 1522, when he met Andreas OSIANDER. Later, he married (1526) at LUTHER's suggestion. His first wife was Dorothy of Denmark, and by this union he linked LUTHERANISM with the Scandinavian countries. His second wife, whom he married in 1550, three years after the death of his Danish wife, was Marie of Braunschweig–Calenberg. Under Albrecht's active leadership Lutheranism spread into Kurland, Livonia, and Estonia. His brother William became archbishop of Riga and in 1539 emulated the actions of Albrecht. The University of Königsberg (Collegium Albertinum) was founded by Albrecht in 1544 as an academic institution to study and propagate the Lutheran faith. In 1549 he appointed Osiander as professor of theology, and immediately the university was plunged into theological controversy over Osiander's preaching. In the controversy Albrecht supported Osiander and thus helped to widen the split within the ranks of Lutheranism. He died in 1568 lamenting, "We have, alas, very few pastors of souls, but quite a swarm of hirelings and storks." His biographers agree that he saved Prussia from possible absorption by Poland and paved the way for the eventual union of Brandenburg and Prussia in 1618, thus contributing to the rise of Prussia.

Bibliography: ALBRECHT OF BRANDENBURG-ANSBACH, Vertrau Gott allein, ed. E. ROTH (Würzburg 1956). P.G. THIELEN, Die Kultur am Hofe Herzog Albrechts von Preussen (Göttingen 1953). W. HUBATSCH, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 1:218-219. Kardinal Stanislaus Hosius, Bischof von Ermland, und Herzog Albrecht von Preussen, ed. E. M. WERMTER. (Reformationsgeschichtliche Studien und Texte 83; Münster 1957). *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 1:292.

[C. L. HOHL, JR.]

ALBRECHTSBERGER, JOHANN GEORG

Influential composer, theorist, and virtuoso of the classical school; b. Klosterneuburg (near Vienna), Austria, Feb. 3, 1736; d. Vienna, March 7, 1809. After receiving music training as a chorister in St. Martin's Church in Klosterneuburg and at the Abbey of MELK, he was a fellow student with M. HAYDN at the Jesuit college in Vienna and later a student of F. J. HAYDN. He was organist successively in Raab (Hungary), Maria-Taferl (Lower Austria), and Melk (to 1766). His musicianship had been noted by Joseph II as crown prince, and he was named court organist in Vienna in 1772 and also choirmaster at St. Stephen's Cathedral from 1793 until his death. Among his students were Joseph von Eybler, J. N. HUMMEL, and notably Ludwig van BEETHOVEN, who profited immensely from his contrapuntal exercises. Although he turned out a considerable body of sacred vocal and organ music as well as concert compositions, he was more important for his theoretical writings, such as Gründliche Anweisung zur Composition and Clavierschule für Anfänger. As with J. J. FUX, in theory he preferred stile antico, yet often applied stile moderno in his instrumentally accompanied sacred music. Many of his settings of the Mass Proper and the Office make use of Gregorian cantus firmi; all of them exhibit his great contrapuntal skill. Yet in neither his creative nor his theoretic work was he successful in synthesizing the vocal polyphonic style of Palestrina with that of subsequent instrumental polyphony, and in his oratorios he dropped counterpoint in favor of the galant style that was then emerging into fashion.

Bibliography: Organ and instrumental compositions, ed. O. KAPP, Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich (1893-; repr. Graz 1959-) 33. Individual works also pub. in modern eds. Complete Works, ed. I. RITTER VON SEYFRIED (Vienna 1826-37), with biog. E. TITTEL, Österreichische Kirchenmusik (Vienna 1961). H. GOOS, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 1:303-307. F. GEHRING, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 1:97. R. N. FREEMAN, "Johann Georg Albrechtsberger's 26 canoni aperti dei varii autori: The Edition," Theoria: Historical Aspects of Music Theory, 8 (1994) 1-52; "Johann Georg Albrechtsberger," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 1, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 224-226. P. GRIFFITHS, The String Quartet: A History (New York 1983) 50-51. G. KROMBACH, "Modelle der ofertoriumskompositionen bei Antonio Caldara, Johann Georg Albrechtsberger, und Joseph Preindl," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 71 (1988) 127-136. D. SCHRODER, Die geistlichen Vokal-kompositionen Johann Georg Albrechtsbergers (Hamburg 1987). YO TOMITA, "Bach Reception in Pre-Classical Vienna: Baron van Swieten's Circle Edits the Well-Tempered Clavier II," Music and Letters, 81 (2000) 369-391.

[K. G. FELLERER]

ALBRIGHT, JACOB

Founder of the Evangelical Association; b. Pottstown, Pennsylvania, May 1, 1759; d. Pottstown, May 18, 1808. The son of German immigrants, he received little formal education, was apprenticed to a brick maker, and followed this trade throughout his life. Albright was originally a Lutheran, but was converted to Methodism in 1790 and began to preach in German among his neighbors. In 1796 he was licensed as an exhorter and preached among the German settlers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. He began forming classes on the Methodist pattern in 1800, and three years later he was ordained a minister by his congregation. When the language barrier separated his German congregations from the mainstream of American Methodism, Albright organized his followers as "The Newly Formed Methodist Conference" (1807) and was chosen by them as their first bishop. The Methodists made no effort to unite with them, and in 1813 the independent conference, subsequently known as the Evangelical Association and still later as the EVANGELICAL CHURCH, severed its nominal ties with Methodism.

Bibliography: R. YEAKEL, Albright and His CoLaborers (Cleveland 1883); History of the Evangelical Association (Cleveland 1909). R. W. ALBRIGHT, History of the Evangelical Church (Harrisburg 1942).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

ALBRIGHT, WILLIAM FOXWELL

American archeologist and Orientalist; b. Coquimbo, Chile, May 24, 1891; d. Baltimore, Maryland, Sept. 19, 1971. Son of a self-supporting Methodist minister, his early education took place in American schools in Chile. He became interested in archeology in his childhood and pursued these interests through a major in classics at Upper Iowa University where he received his A.B. in 1912. He was admitted to the Oriental Seminary of the Johns Hopkins University in 1913 as a candidate for the doctorate of philosophy under Professor Paul Haupt. He received his doctorate in 1916 and for several years he continued his studies through grants and fellowships. In 1921 he was appointed director of the American Schools of Oriental Research in Jerusalem. He remained in that capacity until 1929, when he became professor of Semitic languages at Johns Hopkins. From 1933 to 1936 he served both as a professor and as director of the Jerusalem School. During this period he also completed major excavations at Tell Beit Mirsim in southern Palestine. He served as president of the American Oriental Society (1935–36) and the Society of Biblical Literature (1938–39). He was the recipient of an unparalleled series of honorary degrees and other awards from institutions around the world.

His major contribution to Palestinian archeology was The Excavations of Tell Beit Mirsim, which was completed by 1943. Other major works include Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942), The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible (1949), and Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan (1968).

At roughly the midpoint of his scholarly career (1940), Albright wrote From the Stone Age to Christianity, in which he formulated his basic positions of a philosophical, historical, and philological nature. He believed there were two key developments in human culture in historic times: the religion of Israel and the philosophy of Greece. In Mosaic monotheism he saw a revolution that involved the repudiation of magic and myth and the multiplicity of competing gods in favor of the unity of God, and the description of the divine-human relationship in terms of an open covenant, morally conditioned and legally defined. Biblical religion has proved powerful enough to survive an age of mass superstition on the one hand and of equally pervasive skepticism on the other. Greek thought represented the second significant breakthrough in the history of human culture. The development of formal logic had the most profound effect on human thought and activity: it directly ushered in the scientific age and was a congener of an entirely new discipline, philosophy. Albright saw this powerful rational tool as the key to progress in the analysis and interpretation of data. Ultimately these two key developments would be indispensable ingredients in the reconstitution of a unified human culture. A universal society whose faith and practice were shaped by the biblical imperatives and whose letters, science, and arts were sustained by the standards and methods of Greek thought would be an appropriate goal for mankind and would lie at the end of the evolutionary trail.

Albright's place as a scholar in archeological history is assured. From 1920 to 1970 he produced a monumental amount of work in the field of ancient Near Eastern studies, reviewing current work, classifying and synthesizing available data, opening new areas of inquiry, refining applicable methods of the natural sciences, and shattering established configurations of an older scholarly consensus. During the half century after World War I, he steadily raised the standards of scholarly discussion in the field. He insisted on the highest possible accuracy in recording data and reasoning from them, his objective being to establish the multiple disciplines of Near Eastern studies on a solid scientific foundation, and then to assemble and organize all pertinent material into a large synthetic structure.

Bibliography: The Bible and the Ancient Near East, essays in honor of W. F. Albright, ed. G. E. WRIGHT (Garden City, 1961) bibliography of Albright, 1911–1955. Near Eastern Studies in Honor of William Foxwell Albright, ed. H. GOEDICKE (Baltimore, 1971). F. M. CROSS in The Biblical Archaeologist, 36 (1973) 1–3, with picture of Albright. D. N. FREEDMAN in Bulletin of The American Schools of Oriental Research, 205 (1972) 3–13 (picture).

[D. N. FREEDMAN/L. LEDERER]

ALBUIN OF SÄBEN-BRIXEN, ST.

Bishop; d. Feb. 3 or 5 c. 1005. Albuin (or Albwin), one of the aristocratic Aribonen family of Carinthia, received his education in the cathedral school at Brixen. He became bishop of Säben in the Tirol about 977, and transferred the episcopal residence to nearby, more accessible Brixen. In 978 Emperor OTTO II confirmed and enlarged the bishopric's immunity. Albuin was on excellent terms with Otto II and the Emperor HENRY II, and received extensive grants of land from them and other nobles. He played a considerable part in political life, since his see lay on the main route from Germany to Italy. Shortly after his death Albuin was venerated as a saint. In 1141 he was proclaimed one of the diocesan patron saints. His relics are in the cathedral.

Feast: Feb. 5, together with Bishop Saint Genuinus.

Bibliography: A. W. A. LEEPER, A History of Medieval Austria (New York 1941). A. SPARBER, Kirchengeschichte Tirols (Innsbruck 1957).

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

ALCALÁ, UNIVERSITY OF

An institution of higher learning founded in 1509 in the ancient Spanish city called Complutum by the Romans and renamed Alcalá de Henares (Alcalá Nahar, fortress or castle) by the Moors. In 1836 the University was transferred from Alcalá to the Spanish capital, where it was replaced by the Central University of Madrid, a state institution under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Education.

The original idea of a university dates back to 1293, when the Archbishop of Toledo, Gonzalo Gudiel, obtained from the king of Castile, Sancho IV, surnamed the Brave, permission to found a studium generale in Alcalá. In 1459, during the reign of John II, Abp. Alonso Carrilo y Acuña, with the approval of Pius II, established and endowed three chairs of grammar and the arts. The true founder of the university, however, was the renowned Franciscan archbishop of Toledo, Francisco XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS, prime minister of Spain, to whom the Spanish pope, Alexander VI, granted a bull on April 13, 1499, for the erection of the College of San Ildefonso.

At the outset, only clerical studies were planned: liberal arts and philosophy, theology, the elements of canon law, classical and biblical languages required for the direct study of Sacred Scripture and the Fathers of the Church. Civil law, considered less useful for clerics, was expressly forbidden by the founder, who for the same reason also omitted medicine, which was later added (1514) with the approval of Leo X. Civil law, however, was not included by royal commission until 1672.

The University of Alcalá was a Renaissance institution, a characteristic that differentiated it from all other then existing Spanish universities, and particularly from the famous University of Salamanca, which adhered to scholastic ideals (see SCHOLASTICISM). Alcalá's involvement in the renaissance movement is seen in its two most important accomplishments: the establishment of chairs of biblical languages that constituted the Trilingual College and the publication of the POLYGLOT BIBLE prepared by masters incorporated with the university.

In keeping with Cisneros' plans, a major college and 18 minor colleges made up the university city. The major college, San Ildefonso, occupied the same building as the university. The minor colleges were built on nearby streets. Since the plan was carried out in haste (the university was to open in 1508), inferior materials were used. However, in 1543 the original building was replaced by an imposing stone structure, the work of Rodrigo Gil de Ontañón. Besides classrooms and a dining hall for the major college, the university complex included a richly ornamented college hall, the Chapel of San Ildefonso, a library so large that "not even the majority of European [libraries] could vie with it," and a prison, neither dark nor often used, a kind of detention room for fatherly correction. In addition, among the minor colleges was St. Luke's, a student infirmary that later became a student hospital. One college was founded in 1590 by a Portuguese nobleman, Jorge Sylveira, a descendant, through his mother, of the MacDonnells of Ulster in Ireland. He bestowed on the college an endowment of £2000 and at the cost of £1000 built a chapel dedicated to his patron, St. George.

There is some question regarding the authentic statutes, and several dates of issue are cited. The statutes, however, generally accepted as those regulating the first ten years of the university, are those dated Oct. 17, 1517. The date of inauguration was certainly July 26, 1508, and the first scholastic year 1508–09. The course of studies, organized the following year, included the Faculties of Philosophy, Theology, Letters, and Medicine, modeled very closely after the University of Paris.

Administration was vested in the rector of the College of San Ildefonso and the vice rectors of the minor colleges, the councilors, and eventually the visitors sent by the king. The curriculum was controlled by the chairmen of the various departments, also called regents or masters. The rector of the major college (San Ildefonso) was elected each year by the students and received his authority from the pope rather than from the king, according to the constitutions. The students were exempt from all other authority. The rector acted as "ordinary and proper judge," a custom that gave rise to the "university forum" or "tribunal."

A rigid system of examinations, which was completely separate from teaching, was entrusted to a board of doctors not connected with instruction. This necessitated choosing the best-prepared students for the severe ordeal of examination. Those who passed were awarded successively the degree of bachelor, licentiate, and doctor, or in philosophy, master.

Among outstanding masters at the University of Alcalá were Antonio de Nebrija in humanities; THOMAS OF VILLANOVA and Gaspar Cardello in philosophy; and Francisco Valles in medicine—all of whom were deans of their faculties and had the satisfaction of teaching students who were also outstanding in sanctity, such as IGNA TIUS OF LOYOLA and JOHN OF AVILA; in diplomacy, Próspero Espínola Doria; in the pacification of Peru, Pedro Lagasca; in Sacred Sciences, Diego LAÍNEZ, theologian at Trent, and Luis de MOLINA, founder of Molinism; and in letters, Francisco de Quevedo, and perhaps Felix de Vega Carpio.

The reform, introduced by the centralized state in the 18th century, sapped the autonomous vitality of the university and finally, in the early 19th century, brought to an end this famous center of culture.

Bibliography: H. RASHDALL, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, ed. F. M. POWICKE and A. B. EMDEN, 3 v. (new ed. Oxford 1936). J. URRIZA, La preclara Facultad de Arte y Filosofía de la Universidad de Alcalá de Henares en el siglo de oro, 1509–1621 (Madrid 1941). F. C. SÁINZ DE ROBLES, Esquema de una historia de las universidades españolas (Colección Crisol 74; Madrid 1944). C. M. AJO G. Y SÁINZ DE ZÚÑIGA, Historia de las universidades hispánicas (Madrid 1957–). S. D'IRSAY, Histoire des universités françaises et étrangères des origines à nos jours, 2 v. (Paris 1933–35). L. A. MUNOYERRO, La Facultad de Medicina de Alcalá de Henares (Madrid 1945).

[J. URRIZA]

ALCHEMY

Alchemy is a pseudo-science based on the premise that base matter can be transmuted into gold by chemical means. Although scattered individuals may still be found who take the idea seriously, alchemy as an important cultural movement died out in the 18th century. The "Work" (as it came to be called) has always had both a practical and a mystical side. Realistic (or greedy) experimenters conceived their "gold" as identical with mined gold, while their more mystical brethren, adapting their design to the fact that genuine gold was never produced in the laboratory, vaguely envisioned the end product as a marvelous substance, either solid (hence, "philosopher's stone") or liquid (the "elixir" or the "tincture"), which could variously heal, ennoble, sanctify, or multiply wealth. Alchemy enjoyed no historical "development" as a science; one can, for instance, find that a typical treatise written in the 17th century is no more than a vague congeries of notions drawn from ancient and medieval authors, uncorrected by observation and experiment. The ensuing outline, therefore, consists of only a brief chronological sketch, emphasizing important names and places, followed by a summary of the basic principles of alchemy, a discussion of its theological and mystical pretensions, and, finally, a brief register of the attitudes taken toward alchemy by responsible thinkers from the 13th to the 17th centuries, when the science flourished most widely.

Historical Outline. The term "alchemy" comes from medieval Latin alchimia, a version of Arabic al-kimia, which is in turn connected with Khem (black earth), the old Egyptian term for their own land, through Greek χημία, although this was probably confused with Greek χυμεία, which refers to the pouring or casting of metals. This etymology epitomizes the history of the science, which may be said to have been born in Hellenistic Alexandria from the imposition of Greek philosophy (mainly the Aristotelian doctrines of ENTELECHY and of the four elements with their "quintessence,"—and later, Gnostic theology) on the arts of metalworking and glass-making as they had developed in Egypt. (See GNOSTICISM.) The original alchemists were probably members of a secret cult whose practices derived largely from the mystical lore of the Hebrews, Egyptians, and Chaldeans. To this period (c. A.D. 200–400) belong the writings of a pseudo-Democritus and of Zosimos the Panopolitan; these contain recipes for the superficial coloring of metals to resemble gold, but they also express a belief in the possibility of genuine transmutation. After the fall of the Alexandrian schools alchemists continued to work in Syria and Byzantium (e.g., Theophrastos and Stephanos of Alexandria), but their treatises simply transmit Alexandrian teaching. The rise of Islam saw the translation of Greek alchemical works into Arabic, and the further elaboration of the mystical element by Jâbir ibn Hayyân (9th century) and by his Sufite sect (see SUFISM). More practical aspects, especially the classification of mineral and animal substances and the development of pharmaceuticals, were extended by the physician RHAZES (865?–925). Arabic treatises, brought into Sicily and Moorish Spain in the 12th century, were turned into Latin by Robert of Chester and other translators of the Toledo school, while a number of original pseudonymous works were composed also, notably the Summa perfectionis of Geber, probably the most widely known alchemical treatise of the Middle Ages. Geber's work has a specious sort of scholastic logic to it, and on practical matters such as the preparation of reagents or the design of a sublimatory furnace he shows a commendable accuracy. But the Summa is filled with mystical cant and is finally vitiated by the misguided hope of producing the elixir. Except for PARACELSIUS, who turned alchemy to the service of medicine (iatrochemistry), practically nothing was added to the ideas found in Geber, and in the Enlightenment of the 18th century, interest in the science almost entirely died out. There was a parallel growth in China, although it was there related to DAOISM and the notion that Dao-infused substances were productive of long life. Chinese and Western alchemy have a number of secondary features in common, namely, the theory that metals grow in the earth, the doctrine that physical discipline is essential to the successful alchemist, the idea of planetary influence, and frequent allegorical and mystical designations for ingredients and processes.

Woodcut illustrating alchemical concept of the world.

Relationship to Orthodox Science. In a justly famous phrase, “the story of alchemy is the history of a mistake.” From the standpoint of the modern chemist its solid achievements are few. Some pieces of equipment—special furnaces, stills, water-baths, the mortar and pestle—owe their invention to alchemists; a few elementary processes, like sublimation, go back to the earliest days of experimentation; and there are scattered instances of unusually precise technique, as in the distillation of alcohol (aqua ardens) in 12th-century Salerno. But these were merely by-products of a quest that was destined to fail because it was founded on a faulty idea and bedeviled by the habit of analogical thinking. In theory, a substance had its individualizing properties removed by heating, so that it became a prima materia, a black, formless mass, which could then have qualities added to it in successive stages (represented by changing colors) until it took on the characteristics of gold. Experiment by inductive methods was precluded on principle, the pattern of the “Work” being altered only as chance or fashion caused one allegorical statement to succeed another. Even the most widely acknowledged principles of the science were clouded by the same sort of allegorical obscurantism. Such was the doctrine of “contraries,” which directed that the “Work” must be initiated with a union of contrary substances (e.g., mercury, principle of liquidity, and sulfur, principle of fire). This may go back ultimately to primitive superstitions concerning the origin of the universe from an original splitting of a primal chaos. The persistent belief that metals grow in the ground, slowly approaching the perfection of gold, led alchemists to think that they could accelerate nature's processes in the laboratory. The great stress on a color sequence (normally: nigredo, albedo, ruddo) probably stems from a primitive animistic belief patterned on the yearly cycle of nature. So, too, the idea of a sympathetic relationship between the macrocosm and the microcosm, perhaps best known for its influence on medieval medicine, was an ancient doctrine implicit in alchemical theory from the earliest times, as in the Emerald Table of Hermes (probably composed as early as the 2d century), a cryptic “revelation” expounding a vague declaration that “that which is above is like to that which is below . . . to accomplish the miracles of one thing.” The correspondence between the seven metals and the seven planets with their related deities (e.g., Sun = gold, Venus = copper) also tended to inhibit free experimentation. The few refinements in equipment and processes were small recompense for this expenditure of misdirected energy, and it was not until the appearance of Boyle's The Sceptical Chymist (A.D. 1661) that chemistry had a chance to flourish.

Mystical and Theological Aspects. Such analogies as the above, supported by a natural leaning toward mythopoeic expression and by an alleged desire to conceal the secrets of alchemy from the “unworthy,” produced an esoteric jargon and a flood of allegorical explanations of the “Work.” And there was an astonishing multiplication of alchemical books in the 13th and 14th centuries, as interest in alchemy kept pace with the burgeoning scientific spirit. There was, however, this important difference—the composition of an alchemical treatise was very much a rhetorical exercise in which the author “amplified” his matter by stock figures like the following: rules of conduct (e.g., the “philosopher” had to carry on the “Work” in isolation, or with absolutely trustworthy assistants); extended citations of ancient authorities such as Hermes, Moses, and Mary the Jewess; inordinately lengthy inventories of ingredients; formulas recommending ceaseless study or perseverance, and others stressing the unity of the “Work” (in one treatise it is said to consist of “one thing, one substance, one vessel, one essence, and one agent, which begins and ends the “Work”), the commonness of the stone, or the need of assiduous care of the fire. The tone of address varies from intemperate abuse of foolish “sophists” who do not understand what they read to opaque flights of mystical fancy. The quasi-theological element fell into a bizarre combination with the allegorical, at least as early as the 13th century, in works such as the Pretiosa margarita novella of Petrus Bonus and the Aurora consurgens attributed (certainly wrongly) to St. THOMAS AQUINAS, in both of which it is difficult to tell whether the author is speaking of Christian or alchemical mysteries. Two most curious manifestations of this strain can be seen in the alchemical “mass” of Nicholas Melchior (fl. A.D. 1500) and in the triptych, “The Millennium,” of Hieronymus BOSCH, whose interest in alchemy was inspired by the teachings of the heretical Adamites of the 15th century.

Attitudes toward Alchemy. In every age most serious thinkers tended to be critical of both the theory and the practice of alchemy, although occasional strong voices defended the basic idea. Both St. ALBERT the Great and St. Thomas Aquinas admitted the possibility of the transmutation of elements, yet they believed that it had not yet been accomplished. Dante placed the alchemists in the lowest circle of the Inferno because they “ape creative Nature by their Art”; and Petrarch, Jean de Meun, Langland, Chaucer, Sebastian Brant, Erasmus, and Ben Jonson are in the mainstream of a tradition of vitriolic satire against alchemy, based mainly on its antisocial effects but frequently stressing its theoretical absurdity. The decretal of Pope JOHN XXII, beginning “Spontent quas non exhibent,” is directed against the illegal practice of alchemy, yet the conclusion of Oldrado da Ponte, consistorial advocate in the papal Curia under John, namely, that alchemy is a true art and that alchemists do not sin as long as they attribute their power to God, was quoted with approval by a number of later canon lawyers. The 14th century saw a spate of trials against ecclesiastics for practicing alchemy and other “occult arts”; in 1323 a sentence of excommunication was passed against all Dominicans who did not renounce alchemy and burn their books within eight days; and the Inquisitor Nicholas Eymeric carried on a vigorous prosecution of alchemists for their heretical beliefs. The religious heretic later gave way to the charlatan, who flowered in the 16th and 17th centuries in such famous quacks as Edward Kelly and John Dee, succeeded in our own day by relatively obscure and harmless mystery-mongers who busy themselves in the attempt to prove that great medieval works of literature and art were in reality designed as alchemical hieroglyphs. Stimulating modern approaches to the problems of alchemy are those of Carl Gustav JUNG, who sees in the “Work” a version of the psychological process of individuation, and Mircea Eliade, who has examined alchemy as a “spiritual technique.” These investigators, while they make it clear that alchemy is no mere “prelude to chemistry,” both raise problems for the theologian.

A proper history of alchemy awaits the cataloguing and identification of alchemical treatises—a massive undertaking, which is far from complete. It now seems unlikely, however, that the greater part of the treatises attributed to St. Albert the Great, St. Thomas Aquinas, Raymond LULL, and Arnold of Villanova have been correctly ascribed, although Michael Scot and ROGER BACON did have unusual interests and may have composed works on alchemy. The difficulty of achieving scholarly objectivity in texts and studies is compounded by the fact that the freakish history of alchemy has a strong attraction for occultists as well as a legitimate interest for students of chemistry, theology, psychology, and literature. Finally, mention should be made of the frequent claim that modern transmutation of matter through nuclear transformation is a justification of the alchemists’ dream. This is certainly not transmutation in any sense comparable to that sanguine hope of elevating base substances to golden perfection comprised in the “philosophers’” command to “cook, cook, cook, and weary not of it.” Such comparisons merely obscure the essentially antiscientific character of alchemy.

Bibliography: E. O. VON LIPPMANN, Entstehung und Ausbreitung der Alchemie, 3 v. (v.1, 2, Berlin 1919, 1931; v.3, Weinheim 1954), a basic scholarly study. L. THORNDIKE, A History of Magic and Experimental Science, 8 v. (New York 1923–). H. M. LEICESTER, The Historical Background of Chemistry (New York 1956), a lucid account of chemical operations known to early alchemists. E. J. HOLMYARD, Alchemy (Baltimore, MD 1954), a readable short history from a chemist’s standpoint. C. G. JUNG, Psychology and Alchemy, tr. R. F. HULL (New York 1953), v.12 of Collected Works (Bollingen Series 20; New York 1953), contains a useful bibliography of collections and individual works in Latin of the medieval period. M. ELIADE, The Forge and the Crucible, tr. S. CORRIN (New York 1962). O. S. JOHNSON, A Study of Chinese Alchemy (Shanghai 1928). J. READ, Prelude to Chemistry (New York 1937), an interesting survey of the vagaries of the alchemical mind, though it relies to some extent on the writings of occultists such as A. E. Waite.

[J. E. GRENNEN]

ALCHER OF CLAIRVAUX

Cistercian monk at the Abbey of Clairvaux c. 1150 to 1175. Certain works that have been attributed to him fall within the framework of the monastic literature of the day; one that seems the most authentic is a treatise on the love of God (De diligendo Deo; Patrologia Latina, 40:847). He is known chiefly for the opusculum De spiritu et anima, written in the tradition of speculative mysticism as a treatise on the nature and functions of the soul and ordered to the practice of the virtues of a Christian and religious life (Patrologia Latina, 40:779–832). During the high scholastic era this work was attributed to St. AUGUSTINE, hence its importance in the history of psychology. In their commentaries on the Sentences, c. 1250, ALBERT the Great (In 1 sent. 8.25) and THOMAS AQUINAS

(In 4 Sent. 44.4.3) recognized that it could not be the work of Augustine, but it had already exerted strong influence.

The De spiritu et anima is “a compilation of the doctrines of Augustine” (Aquinas) with additions from Boethius, Macrobius, Hugh of Saint-Victor, Cassiodorus, and St. Isidore of Seville. Alcher limited himself to juxtaposing the borrowed elements; as a result the coherence of his work suffered. Yet from this confused mass some great ideas emerged. The soul is a unique substance, and its so-called powers are only the functions by which its activity is manifested without impinging upon its absolute simplicity. The soul governs everything that constitutes human life, even its most humble functions. The higher functions are affectivity and knowledge: the first operates through the concupiscible and irascible appetites, which act as the seat of the four passions of love, hate, hope, and fear and which give birth to vice or to virtue, according to the use that men make of them. Knowledge includes five hierarchical degrees, from sense, whose object is material things, to intelligence (intelligentia), which is direct contact with God. Alcher insisted also that the images of the Trinity are realized in the soul.

Bibliography: E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy, 168–169, 632, 658. P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN, “Une Division ‘augustinienne’ des puissances de l’âme au moyen-âge,” Revue des études augustiniennes, 3 (1957) 235–248. G. THÉRY, “L’Authenticité du De spiritu et anima dans S. Thomas et Albert le Grand,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, 11 (1921) 373–377. L. LEWICKI, Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum, 18 (1956) 161–164, summary of Polish theses.

[P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN]

ALCOBAÇA, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian abbey, once the greatest in Portugal, two miles from the Atlantic, near Leiria. It was founded in 1153 by King Alfonso Henriques after the reconquest of Estremadura and settled from CLAIRVAUX, but it had to be rebuilt after a Moorish raid in 1195. The church, consecrated in 1252, was modeled after that of Clairvaux. The abbey, which reached its peak in the 14th century with 300 monks, founded many daughter houses in Portugal; its possessions included 13 towns and three seaports. The abbot belonged to the Cortes, was Grand Chaplain of the court, and had spiritual jurisdiction over the ORDERS OF CHRIST and of AVIZ. Alcobaca was of major importance in the cultural and economic history of Portugal. Besides promoting the foundation of the University of Lisbon, it established the first public college (1269), the first pharmacy, and one of the first printing presses in Portugal; it maintained an agricultural school and model farms, opened mines, and pioneered in metal-lurgy, ceramics, glasswork, weapons manufacture, and other industries. From 1475 the abbatial title, with some of the revenue, was granted in COMMENDATION to Portuguese nobles, while monastic life was directed by triennial abbots. In 1567 Alcobaca became the head of the Portuguese Congregation of St. Bernard with its own abbot general and triennial chapters. It lost its moral leadership in the 17th and 18th centuries but prospered until the Napoleonic invasion. After a Liberal revolution the abbey was suppressed and sacked (1834). The buildings were unharmed, but the rich library and archives suffered irreparable damage. Most surviving MSS are in Lisbon’s National Library. Alcobaca is now a national monument; the medieval cloister is a tourist attraction, the vast baroque complex is a home for the aged, and the church serves a parish.

Bibliography: VIEIRA NATIVIDADE, O monasterio de Alcobaca (Porto 1937). A. GUSMÃO, A Real Abbadia de Alcobaca (Lisbon 1948). M. COCHERIL, “L’Ordre de Cîteaux au Portugal. Le problème historique,” Studia Monastica 1 (1959) 51–95. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques de moyen-âge. Topobibliographie (Paris 1894–1903) 44. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:50–51. R. TRILHE, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:25–29. M. HARTIG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:297–298.

[L. J. LEKAI]

ALCOBER FIGUERA, JUAN TOMAS, ST.

Dominican priest, martyr; b. Dec. 21, 1694, Girone (Granada), Andalucia, Spain; d. Oct. 28, 1748, Fukien (Fuzhou), Tunkien, China.

Juan Alcober joined the Dominicans in his hometown (1708) and was ordained priest (1718). He and St. Francis Serrano had planned to work together in the Chinese missions, but Fr. Alcober was delayed in Lorca, where he preached until he was able to set sail. Having gained a reputation as a popular preacher there, only a miracle reminded him of his original purpose. In 1726, he left for the Philippines to study Chinese and work in Binondo until beginning his mission in China in 1728.

Following the publication of a libel against the Christians of Fu-ngan, Fu-kien, Emperor K’ien Lung initiated a prosecution in 1746. Like Fr. Serrano, Alcober was adept at evading the pursuing authorities. He hid in the homes of native Christians, spent a night hiding in a tree, and wandered about the city in the disguise of a water seller. His luck ran out on June 26, 1746.

He baptized a woman, to whom the Blessed Virgin had appeared in an apparition, on her deathbed. The situation drew her neighbors, and soon Fr. Alcober was recognized, captured, and imprisoned at Fukien. He was sentenced to death by the viceroy on Nov. 1, 1746.

Alcober was strangled one night in his prison cell together with Joachim Royo Pérez, Francisco Diaz, and Francisco Serrano to prevent them from converting their jailors. Local Christians collected and preserved their relics.

He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII (May 14, 1893) and canonized (Oct. 1, 2000) by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: June 5.

See Also: CHINA, MARTYRS OF, SS.

Bibliography: M. J. SAVIGNOL, Les Martyrs dominicains de la Chine au XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1893). H. I. IWEINS, Le Bl. Pierre Sanz et ses quatre compagnons (Ostende 1893). J. M. GONZÁLEZ, Misiones dominicanas en China, 1700–1750 (Madrid 1952). M. J. DORCY, Saint Dominic's Family (Dubuque, Iowa 1963), 484–87.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ALCOCK, JOHN

Cambridge scholar, bishop; b. Beverley, Yorkshire, England, 1430; d. Wisbech Castle, Isle of Ely, Oct. 1, 1500. The son of William Alcock of Beverley, he studied at CAMBRIDGE, where he was a doctor of civil law by 1459. In 1461 he became rector of St. Margaret's, Fish Street, London, after which he rapidly accumulated benefices. In 1472 he became bishop of ROCHESTER by papal provision, keeper of the great seal (until June 1473), tutor of Edward, Prince of Wales, and president of his council. He was transferred to the bishopric of WORCESTER in 1476 and to ELY (1486), where he proved an able administrator. At Ely cathedral he began his own chantry chapel in 1488 and built the great hall in the episcopal palace; at Downham he rebuilt the episcopal residence. His greatest fame rests in his founding of Jesus College, Cambridge (1496), upon the site of the dissolved convent of St. Radegund. His original endowment was small, and the college was limited to six priest-fellows in residence; a boys' grammar school was attached to the college. Still in evidence, decorated with his device of a cock on a globe, are the college buildings, principally remodeled conventual structures. His educational interests are further revealed by his residing at Peterhouse, Cambridge, in the early 1490s and by his foundation of a chantry and grammar school at Hull, Yorkshire. His literary remains include: (1) Mons perfeccionis, the hyll of perfeccion, (2) In die innocencium sermo pro episcopo puerorum, (3) an English sermon on the text of Luke 8.8, (4) Desponsacio virginis Christo: Spousage of a virgin to Cryste (all printed by Wynkyn de Worde, 1496–97), (5) Gallicantus ad confratres suos curatos in sinodo apud Barnwell, Sept. 25, 1499, (6) The Abbay of the Holy Gost, an English commentary on the seven penitential Psalms, and (7) Castle of Labour translated from the French by P. Gringoire.

Alcoholics Anonymous key ring with two keys attached. Round medallion has praying hands above motto reading "A Day at a Time." (Field Mark Publications)

Bibliography: J. ALCOCK, Register as Bishop of Worcester in the Worcester Diocesan Record Office, St. Helen's Church, Worcester; Register as Bishop of Ely in the University Library, Cambridge, with a printed calendar by J. H. CROSBY in Ely Diocesan Remembrancer (1908–1910). J. B. MULLINGER, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 1:236–237. The Victoria History of the County of Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely, ed. L. F. SALZMAN et al. (London 1938–59) v. 2, 3, 4. A. GRAY and F. BRITAIN, A History of Jesus College, Cambridge (London 1960). A. B. EMDEN, Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Cambridge before 1500 (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 5–6, 669.

[H. S. REINMUTH, JR.]

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

A society, commonly referred to as AA, established to help victims of alcoholism. AA describes itself as a "fellowship of men and women who share their common wisdom, strength and hope." It assumes that alcoholism is an addiction having three dimensions—physical, emotion, and spiritual—all of which require attention. It accepts the premise that alcoholism is disease that, though basically incurable, can nevertheless be arrested, but only by total abstinence from alcohol.

AA was established in 1935 in consequence of a fortuitous conversation between two alcoholics in Akron, Ohio: Bill Wilson, a failed stock broker from New York, and Bob Smith, an Akron physician. The first AA group consisted of these two men, and they were shortly joined by a third, who gave up drinking as a result of meeting with them. A second small group quickly took shape in New York, and a third was begun in 1936 in Cleveland, Ohio. By late 1937, the number of members having a substantial record of sobriety was sufficient to convince the membership that their program offered new hope to the alcoholic.

To bring the message of the group to those who needed it, in 1939 pioneers in the movement published Alcoholics Anonymous known popularly as “The Big Book.” They borrowed principles from a number of sources. From the Oxford Group, an evangelical sect founded by Frank Buckman, a Lutheran minister, they learned the importance of taking responsibility for past ill behavior and invocation of a Higher Power. They borrowed from William James’s Variety of Religious Experience to describe the phenomenon of conversion, and they corresponded with Carl Jung to gain an understanding of the spiritual dimension of recovery. The Big Book codified the spiritual ideas in the Twelve Steps, and applied them to the alcoholic’s situation. The message of the society came to the attention of many through this book, which was given wide and continuous publicity by magazines and newspapers throughout the world. Clergymen and physicians alike rallied to the movement, giving it strong support and endorsement beyond the United States and North America.

The experience of the members of AA is that the Twelve Steps, if practiced as a way of life, expel the obsession to drink and enable the sufferer to become happily and usefully integrated. The Twelve Suggested Steps of Recovery are the following:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol—that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. We came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God, as we understood Him.
4. We made a searching and fearless inventory of ourselves.
5. We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being, the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. We were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. We humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. We made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. We made direct amends to such people whenever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. We continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. We sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His Will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

AA also has its Twelve Traditions. These succinctly explain the organizational operation of the society and its means of achieving unity and of relating itself to the world about it. Attendance at regular meetings is one of the most cherished traditions of the movement. Each major city has a central AA office that directs callers to appropriate meetings in the area.

When husbands and wives of AA members found themselves dealing with the effects of the behaviors of their addicted spouses, a group organized Al-Anon. Al-Anon is completely separate from AA, but it follows the Twelve Steps and other AA principles. Over time the principles have been adapted to other addictions. The Twelve Steps have been adapted to deal with problematic behaviors such as overeating, out-of-control sexual behaviors, and smoking.

Bibliography: B. WILSON, Alcoholics Anonymous (3d ed.; 1976). E. KURTZ, Not God: A History of Alcoholics Anonymous (exp. ed.; Center City, Minn. 1991). G. VALIANT, The Natural History of Alcoholism (Cambridge, Mass. 1983). F. HARTIGAN, Bill W.: A Biography of Alcoholics Anonymous Cofounder Bill Wilson (New York 2000). The Al-Anon Family Groups: A Guide for the Families of Problem Drinkers (New York 1955).

[E. M. ROGERS/P. KELLY]

ALCUIN, BL.

Educator and theologian, adviser and friend of CHARLEMAGNE; b. Northumbria, England, c. 735; d. Tours, France, May 19, 804. Alcuin (in Saxon Ealh-wine, Latinized as Alcuinus and Albinus) was educated in the tradition of Anglo-Saxon humanism at the cathedral school of York (the old Roman legionary fortress of Eboracum), of which he became librarian and magister in 778 as the successor of his teacher Aelbert. Charlemagne met Alcuin at Parma and secured his services for the Frankish state, where he lived and worked, with the exception of two journeys to his native England, from 782 until his death at his abbey of St. Martin at Tours, to which he had retired in 796. Though he extolled the monastic ideal, he never became a monk, and his career as a secular cleric never went beyond the diaconate.

Alcuin as Educator. Alcuin’s activities profoundly influenced the cultural development of a rude, if not barbarous age. His active contribution as a scholar in speeding up the intellectual, religious, and political regeneration and growth of a period commonly called the Carolingian Renaissance was not paralleled by any of his learned contemporaries and friends in the Frankish palace schools attended by members of the royal family and their entourage. His writings—except perhaps his voluminous correspondence of more than 250 letters and his occasional poetry—lay no claim to special artistic merit; they are for the most part the practical result of his educational and political endeavors in the service of Charlemagne. His originality as an educator found expression in his mastery of the traditional learning according to CASSIODORUS's formula of the seven liberal arts; emphasizing the trivium he compiled textbooks on grammar, rhetoric, dialectic, and orthography. Alcuin's edition of the pseudo-Augustinian Categoriae decem is the first contribution to the study of the Latin Aristotle since Boethius. Commentaries on Genesis, on certain Psalms, the Canticles, and Ecclesiastes, on John, the Apostolic letters, and the Apocalypse, may have been intended as reading texts designed to acquaint clerics with traditional patristic exegesis. Lives of SS. MARTIN OF TOURS, RICHARIUS, VEDAST, and WILLIBRORD are older vitae rewritten by Alcuin in a better Latin.

The real stature of Alcuin as Charlemagne's counselor in political matters is apparent in the activities undertaken by him either at the King's express request or with his obvious approval.

Theological and Liturgical Writings. The ADOPTIONISM of Felix of Urgel and ELIPANDUS of Toledo was refuted by Alcuin in three apologetic treatises. He publicly rebuked heretical doctrines at synodal meetings, and is now recognized as the author of the Frankish episcopate's Synodica and of Charlemagne's letter sent from the Council of Frankfurt to Spain in 794. Alcuin, not THEODULF OF ORLÉANS, was the author of the LIBRI CAROLINI in which Charlemagne rejected Byzantine veneration of images restored by the seventh ecumenical council (Nicaea II) in 787.

Alcuin's various reforms introduced into liturgical service books used in the Frankish empire culminated in his edition of a lectionary, and especially in his revision of the Gregorian Sacramentary with his appended supplement and the famous preface Hucusque. This revision preserved elements of the Gallican rites and inserted them into the Roman Missal. Irish-Northumbrian customs such as the chanting of the Creed at Mass and the celebration of the Feast of All Saints were introduced by him into the Frankish liturgy. Some of the liturgical texts and formulas used in his revision and supplements are drawn from the Mozarabic rite, whose textual traces he encountered in his fight against the writings and doctrines of the adoptionists. Recent research has shown for the first time Alcuin's share in the writing of some of Charlemagne's capitularies and letters. This constitutes important evidence for the leading role played by the foreigner from Northumbria in the political life of the Frankish empire. Alcuin's recension of Jerome's Vulgate undertaken upon Charlemagne's wish was presented by Alcuin's pupil Fredugise to the Frankish king at Rome on Christmas Day, 800—the same day on which he became emperor. The contributions of Alcuin to the editing of better Latin texts undoubtedly led to increased activities in Frankish scriptoria, and his name is therefore connected with the creation of the Carolingian minuscule, the new calligraphic book hand that became the prototype of the modern Roman script. But such a dependence is far from certain, and cannot be maintained conclusively. The leading position occupied by Alcuin in the events preceding the coronation of Charlemagne as emperor rests upon firmer grounds. There is much information concerning Alcuin's personal influence on the Frankish king, who had visited him at Tours toward the end of May 800 on his way to Italy. On the other hand, recent research has now made it possible to recognize rather clearly the influence exerted on the events of December 25, 800, by a group of Alcuin's friends who were then in attendance at Rome. The contention, first made by A. Kleinclausz in 1902, that Charlemagne's coronation was the work of imperialistic clerics led by Alcuin and his circle has been accepted in the meantime by both French and German historians. To be sure, Alcuin was neither a meek stay-at-home nor "a dedicated bookworm" (ein Stubengelehrter), but (as E. E. Stengel observes) a scholar who was thoroughly grounded in the management of political affairs.

Although Alcuin's cultus has never been formally recognized, he is named as a beatus in many martyrologies.

Feast: May 19.

Bibliography: Alcuin's works in Patrologia Latina v.100 and 101; modern critical editions of letters, saints' lives, poems, and treatises by E. DÜMMLER, B. KRUSCH, K. HALM, W. LEVISON, A. MARSILI, A. PONCELET are listed by L. WALLACH, Alcuin and Charlemagne: Studies in Carolingian History and Literature (Cornell Studies in Classical Philology 32; Ithaca 1959) 286–287; newly found letters and documents written by Alcuin: ibid. 273–274. Alcuin of York . . . his life and letters, tr. S. ALLOTT (York 1974). Two Alcuin letter-books, ed. C. CHASE from the British Museum ms. Cotton Vespasian A XIV (Toronto 1975). Son well-beloved: Six poems, tr. BENEDECTINES OF STANBROOK (Worcester, Eng. 1967). Libri Carolini, ed. H. BASTGEN, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 2, suppl. Pseudo-Augustine, Categoriae decem, ed. L. MINIOPALUELLO, Aristoteles latinus I 1–5: Categoriae vel praedicamenta (Bruges-Paris 1961) 129–192. H. LÖWE, Die karolingische Reichsgründung und der Südosten (Stuttgart 1938), ch. on Alcuin rejected by F. L. GANSHOF, Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 17 (1938) 977 and by P. GRIERSON, English Historical Review 54 (1939) 525–526. A. KLEINCLAUSZ, Alcuin (Paris 1948). E. S. DUCKETT, Alcuin, Friend of Charlemagne: His World and His Work (New York 1951). W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter 2:225–236, and the additio in the review by L. WALLACH, Speculum 29 (1954) 820–825. I. DEUG-SU, Cultura e ideologia nella prima età carolingia (Rome 1984); L'opera agiografica di Alcuino (Spoleto 1983). M. S. DRISCOLL, Alcuin et la pénitence à l'époque carolingienne (Münster 1999). G. ELLARD, Master Alcuin: Liturgist (Chicago 1956). C. J. B. GASKOIN, Alcuin; his life and his work (New York 1966). F. C. SCHEIBE, "Alcuin und die Admonitio generalis," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 14 (1958) 221–229; "Alcuin und die Briefe Karls des Grossen," ibid. 15 (1959) 181–193. B. FISCHER, Die Alcuin Bibel (Freiburg 1957). A. F. WEST, Alcuin and the Rise of the Christian Schools (New York 1971, reprint of 1892 ed.). E. BOURQUE, Études sur les sacramentaires romains, pt. 2, Les Textes remaniés, v.2, Le Sacramentaire d'Hadrien: Le Supplément d'Alcuin et les Grégoriens mixtes (Rome 1958). L. WALLACH, op. cit.; "Libri Carolini and Patristics, Latin and Greek: Prolegomena to a Critical Edition," in his The Classical Tradition: Literary and Historical Studies in Honor of Harry Caplan (Ithaca 1966). P. MUNZ, The Origin of the Carolingian Empire (Leicester 1960). E. E. STENGEL, "Imperator und Imperium bei den Angelsachsen," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 16 (1960) 45. F. L. GANSHOF, "Le Programme de gouvernement impérial de Charlemagne," Renovatio Imperii: Atti della Giornata internazionale di studio per il millenario: Ravenna, 4–5 novembre 1961 (Faenza 1963) 63–96. R. FOLZ, Le Couronnement impérial de Charlemagne: 25 Décembre 800 (Paris 1964).

[L. WALLACH]

ALDEBERT AND CLEMENT

Pseudosaints; fl. first half of the 8th century, in Neustria. Aldebert (or Adalbert) had himself and his Irish disciple Clement ordained by ignorant Gallic bishops in defiance of regular canonical forms. He claimed to have visions, to have special knowledge of the angels, to be able to read consciences, and to perform miracles. As proof he exhibited a letter from Christ, which he said had fallen from heaven at Jerusalem. Ignorant country people, especially women, proclaimed his virtues those of a saint and a prophet. At the urging of BONIFACE he was condemned (March 744) at the Synod of Soissons. The condemnation was repeated at general Frankish councils in 745 and 747 and at a Roman council in October of 745. After 747 Aldebert and Clement disappeared from history.

Bibliography: Die Briefe des heiligen Bonifatius und Lullus, ed. M. TANGL, Monumenta Germaniae Historica Epistolae selectae, 1:109–118, 160. Monumenta Germaniae Historica Concilia, 2.1:33–50. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 3:846, 874. C. DE CLERCQ, La Législation religieuse franque . . ., 2 v. (Paris-Antwerp 1936–58) 1:123–124. T. SCHIEFFER, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954). A. M.

LANDRAF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1: 298.

[C. P. LOUGHRAN]

ALDEGUNDIS, ST.

Abess; b. c. 630; d. Jan. 30, 695 or 700. She was the daughter of SS. Walbert, Count of Hainaut (d. c. 660), and Bertilda, and the sister of WALDETRUD. Aldegundis became the foundress and first abbess of the convent of Maubeuge, where her niece, ALDETRUDE, received spiritual formation and later succeeded her in office. The many biographies of Aldegundis, all rather legendary, report numerous visions with which she is said to have been favored. There is, however, no doubt about the continuous and widespread cult of this saint, whose intercession is sought for the cure of diseases of the eye and the illnesses common to childhood. She is invoked also as the patroness of cancer victims, probably because she is reported to have suffered greatly from this malady in the last years of her life. Her cult was already well established by the tenth century.

Feast: Jan. 30.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ (Paris 1878–90) 132:858–876. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 3:655–662. J. MABILON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 2:773–782. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 6:85–90. E. LEROY, Histoire de sainte Aldegonde (Valenciennes 1883). L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique et littéraire sur Les Vitae des Saints Mérovingiens (Louvain 1907) 219–231. H. DUBRULLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:46–47. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 1:144–146. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:141. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 1:619–621. J. DUBOIS, Analecra Bollandiana 79 (1961) 270, 287. M. COENS, ibid. 80 (1962) 149. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:285.

[H. DRESSLER]

ALDEIAMENTO SYSTEM IN BRAZIL

Aldeamento was the name given to a plan to domesticate and Christianize nomadic native Brazilians by gathering them into village mission-settlements (aldeias). In the early years of Portuguese settlement there was no concerted effort to congregate native peoples. Christianization of a few was attempted through visitation by missionaries in the wilderness. Soon after the arrival of the Jesuits in 1549 a more determined effort was made. Members of the Society, not knowing the native languages, at first trained young boys, both native and Portuguese, to act as interpreters. The youths were taught to read and write, to sing plainchant and other music, to read aloud in Portuguese, play musical instruments, and to serve Mass. With these boys, the Jesuits visited the existing native villages and attempted to introduce Christianity. This method was also unsatisfactory.

Finally the system of aldeias, or reductions, was tried. Through persuasion and, at times, a show of force by soldiers, native peoples were gathered into new strategically placed villages. There was catechetical instruction morning and evening for all. After 1583 afternoon instruction was kept for those already Christian or those who were preparing for Holy Communion. The morning instruction consisted mainly of learning essential prayers. The articles of faith and preparation for Confession and Communion were taught in the afternoon. The Jesuits believed that only in this way could the Europeans Christianize and civilize these Stone Age Indians. The natives were treated as minors and not as adults. It was particularly important to keep the neophytes from contact with the pagans. As Manuel NÓBREGA expressed it: "We want to congregate all those baptized and keep them separated from the rest." Through force of circumstances the missionaries were compelled to allow their charges to perform manual labor for the Portuguese, but they always strove to limit this concession and to shield their neophytes from whites and mestizos as far as possible. In the 17th and 18th centuries, the Jesuits and other religious established the aldeias far in the interior, at greater distances from white settlements, in order to protect their charges from more demoralization.

Aldeamento was used particularly in Maranhão, Pará, Amazonas, and, farther south, in the São Paulo area. The system, which was relatively successful after 1680 and included as many as 60,000 people in the Amazon area, came to an abrupt end between 1755 and 1759 with the secularization of all missions by Pombal.

See Also: MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA, I (SPANISH MISSIONS).

Bibliography: S. LEITE, História da Companhia de Jesus no Brasil, 10 v. (Lisbon 1938–50). C. R. BOXER, Race Relations in the Portuguese Colonial Empire, 1415–1825 (London 1963).

[M. C. KIEMEN]

ALDEMAR, ST.

Benedictine abbot; b. Capua, Italy, c. 950; d. in village of San Martino near Bucchianico, Italy. As a youth he became a monk at Monte Cassino and was ordained deacon. Aloara of Capua (d. 992), widow of Pandolf of Benevento (d. 981), put him in charge of the Capuan monastery of San Lorenzo, which she had founded in 982. Later he moved to Boiano, where he was ordained a priest. Persecutions drove him first to San Liberatore and then to Farafiorumpetri, where he built the monastery of Santa Eufemia and he founded other monasteries in the region of Chieti and in Piceno. After his death his body was translated to Bucchianico, where it rests today, and he is venerated locally as a patron saint.

Feast: March 24.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 251–252. Acta Sanctorum March 3:487–490. E. GATTOLA, Historia abbatiae Cassinensis, 2 v. (Venice 1733). L. TOSTI, Storia della badia di Montecassino, 3 v. (Rome 1888–90) 1:98. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 1:367–369. U. BERLIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:47. J. BAUR, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:298.

[A. LENTINI]

ALDETRUDE, ST.

Also called Adeltrudis; abbess; b. between 628 and 639; d. Feb. 25, c. 696. She was the daughter of VINCENT MADELGARIUS and WALDETRUD. At an early age she was placed in the convent of Maubeuge, where ALDEGUNDIS, her aunt, was abbess. The Vita Aldetrudis (Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:514–516), written by a tenth-century monk, contains so many legendary elements that it is practically impossible to gain an accurate account of the spiritual formation of the saint. It is generally agreed, however, that she succeeded her aunt in the office of abbess at Maubeuge and creditably fulfilled the duties of this position for more than a decade. If the early hagiographers are worthy of belief, Aldetrude came from an exceptional family in which father, mother, and four children are venerated as saints.

Feast: Feb. 25.

Bibliography: L. VAN DER ESSEN, Études critique et littéraire sur les Vitae des saints mérovingiens (Louvain 1907) 237–240. H. DUBRULLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:52. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 2:526–527. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme (Paris 1948) 1:286. G. ALLEMANG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:299. A. D'HAENENS, Bibliotheca sanctorum 1:750–751.

[H. DRESSLER]

ALDHELM, ST.

Abbot, bishop, first notable Anglo-Saxon writer; b. c. 640; d. Douling (Somerset), May 25, 709. Kinsman of INE, King of Wessex, he was educated by Maildubh, Irish founder of Malmesbury, and in Kent by the African Abbot HADRIAN, companion of St. THEODORE OF CANTERBURY. As abbot of Malmesbury (from c. 675) he rebuilt the church and monastery and made foundations at Frome and Bradford-on-Avon. When the Wessex Diocese was divided in 705, he ruled the western half (roughly Wiltshire, Dorset, and Somerset) while remaining abbot of Malmesbury. He built churches in his cathedral town of Sherborne and on his Dorset estates at Corfe and Wareham, near which a headland still bears his name. He was buried at Malmesbury, whose principal saint he remained for the Middle Ages, in spite of the short suspension of his cult by LANFRANC.

His principal works include: De virginitate, a study of saints of the Bible and the early Church in both prose and verse; De metris et enigmatibus ac pedum regulis, a treatise on grammar; Letters, including one to the Britons on the date of Easter and one to the clerics of St. Wilfrid on loyalty in persecution; and Carmina ecclesiastica, a collection of religious poems. All of these were widely read in England and on the Continent until the eleventh century. Their turgid Latin influenced St. BONIFACE and charter writers. King ALFRED highly praised his Anglo-Saxon poems, sung to harp accompaniment to attract hearers to church, but these have not survived. Highly esteemed by St. BEDE, Aldhelm's learning and piety inspired many followers, including William of Malmesbury.

Feast: May 23; May 28 (Dioceses of Clifton and Plymouth, and Southwark).

Bibliography: Aldhelmi opera, ed. R. EHWALD, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores Antiquissimi 15. Aldhelm, the poetic works, tr. M. LAPIDGE and J. L. ROSIER (Cambridge 1985). Aldhelm, the prose works, tr. M. LAPIDGE and M. HERREN (Cambridge 1979). BEDE, Historia ecclesiastica, ed. C. PLUMMER (Oxford 1896, reprint 1956) 5:18. WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, Gesta Pontificum Anglorum, ed. N. E. HAMILTON, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 52 (1870) 330–443. G. F. BROWNE, St. Aldhelm (London 1903). A. S. COOK, Sources of the Biography of Aldhelm (Transactions of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences 28; New Haven 1927). E. S. DUCKETT, Anglo-Saxon Saints and Scholars (New York 1947, reprinted Hamden, Conn. 1967). A. ORCHARD, The Poetic Art of Aldhelm (Cambridge, England 1994). N. P. STORK, Through a Gloss Darkly: Aldhelm's Riddles in the British Library MS Royal 12.C.xxiii (Toronto, Canada 1990). M. GRETSCH, The intellectual foundations of the English Benedictine reform (Cambridge 1999).

[H. FARMER]

ALDOBRANDINI

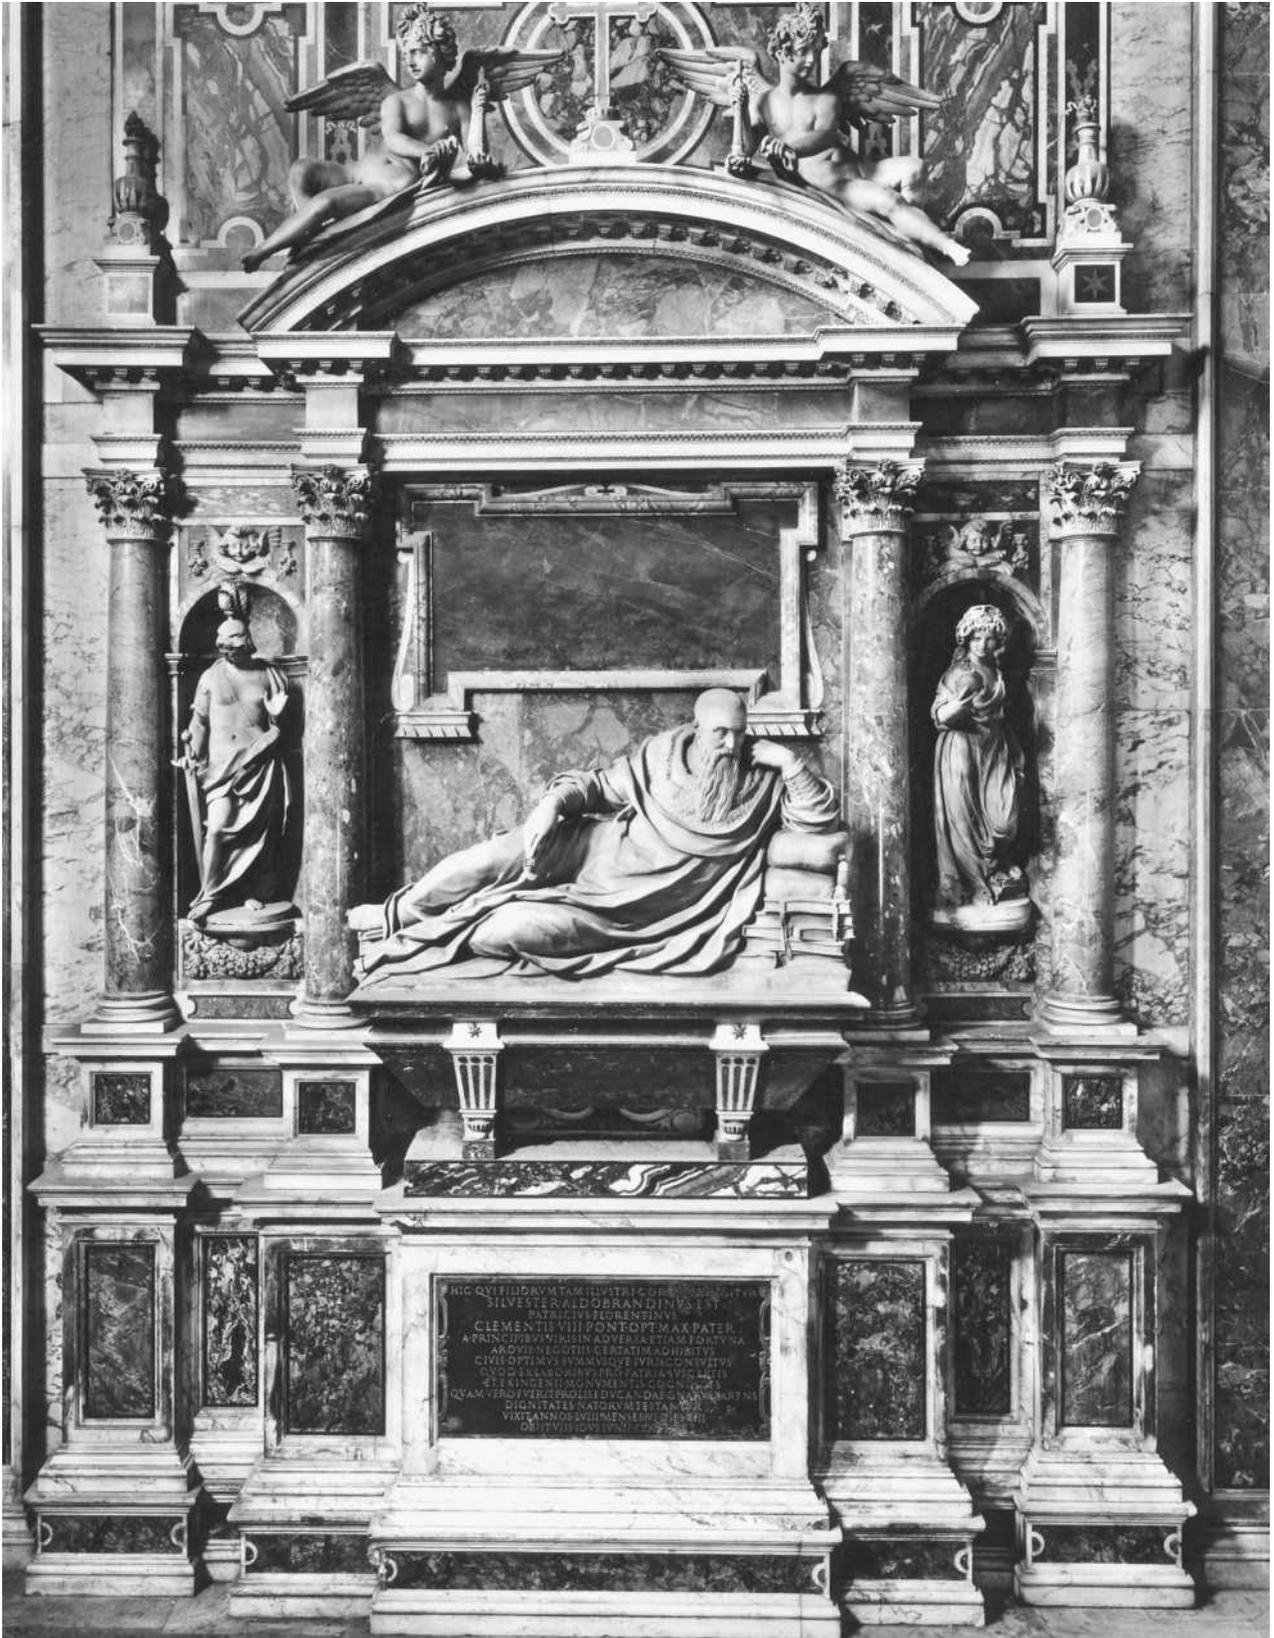

Distinguished Italian family prominent in Vatican affairs in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Silvestro, jurist; b. Florence, 1499; d. 1558. Of old Florentine nobility, he studied law at Pisa under Filippo Decio and received his doctorate in 1521. Active politically against the Medici, he was forced into exile in 1531. His distinguished career as a jurist led him to Venice, to Faenza, and to Rome (1534), where Paul III appointed him to various legal and administrative offices. He then served the dukes of Ferrara and Urbino before being appointed consistorial advocate in 1548. Under Paul IV he rose with the influence of the Pope's nephew Cardinal Carafa and enthusiastically supported anti-Spanish policy. However, in 1557 he was disgraced and lost his position. His writings include Addizioni ai commentarii di Filippo Decio sulle Decretali (Lyons 1551) and Trattato dell'usura (Venice 1604).

By Silvestro's marriage with Lisa Deto he had one daughter, Julia, and six sons, four of whom held high positions in the Vatican. Tommaso (d. 1572) was secretary of briefs under Paul IV. Giovanni (d. 1573) became bishop of Imola under Pius V and was made cardinal in 1570. Pietro (d. 1587) was a distinguished jurist and succeeded his father as fiscal advocate in 1556. Ippolito became CLEMENT VIII. During Clement's pontificate, three of his nephews were raised to prominence.

Two of the nephews, Cinzio Passeri (b. Sinigaglia, 1551; d. Rome, Jan. 1, 1610), Julia's son, and Pietro (b. Rome, 1571; d. there, Feb. 21, 1621), son of Clement's brother Pietro, were made cardinals on Sept. 17, 1593, and were appointed to administer jointly the office of secretary of state. Although Cinzio was the elder and the earlier favored by Clement, Pietro soon established himself as the real authority in the office and the most powerful man in the Vatican next to the pope. He had the natural skills of a diplomat combined with prudence, zeal, and strength of mind. He was a man of affable disposition, deftly handling intricate political affairs and always retaining the close confidence of Clement. As legate a latere he received the annexation of the Duchy of Ferrara to the Papal States in 1598. He cultivated harmony with Henry IV of France, personally blessing Henry's marriage to Marie de' Medici; in 1600 Pietro also secured peace between France and Savoy. Clement rewarded him by making him camerlengo and in 1604, archbishop of Ravenna. After the death of Clement, Pietro fell from papal favor and retired to Ravenna, where he effected important Church reforms.

A third nephew, Gian Francesco (1545–1601), also favored by Clement, was made general of the papal armies. He died while commanding troops against the Turks in Hungary. Of his many children, the eldest son, Silvestro (1587–1612), at the age of 16 years was made cardinal by Clement. Ippolito, the younger (1592–1638), became cardinal under Gregory XV. The male line died out in 1638, but the granddaughter of Gian Francesco, Olympia, married Paolo Borghese in 1638, and the Aldobrandini fortunes thereby passed to the Borghese family.

“Funeral Monument of Silvestro Aldobrandini,” sculptural group by Giacomo della Porta, located in S. Maria sopra Minerva, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Other distant relatives include Giacomo Aldobrandini (d. 1606), bishop of Troia and nuncio to Naples; Cardinal Baccio Aldobrandini (1613–1665), protégé of Ippolito, the younger; and Alessandro Aldobrandini (1667–1734), nephew of Baccio.

Bibliography: P. LITTA et al., Famiglie celebri italiane, 14 v. (Milan 1819–1923). P. E. VISCONTI, Città e famiglie nobili e celebri dello stato pontificio, 3 v. in 4 (Rome 1847). P. RICHARD, La Légation Aldobrandini et le traité de Lyon (Lyons 1903); et al., Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:55–60. L. PASSARINI, Memorie intorno alla vita di Silvestro Aldobrandini (Rome 1878): L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages: from 1st German ed. Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters (Freiburg 1885–1933; repr. 1955–) v.23 and 24, passim. F. BOCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:300–301.

[J. C. WILLKE]

ALDRIC OF LE MANS, ST.

Bishop; b. c. 800; d. March 24, 856. The son of half-Saxon, half-Bavarian parents, Aldric spent his youth at the court of CHARLEMAGNE at Aachen, where he became a friend of Louis the Pious. Bishop DROGO of Metz ordained him priest, named him precentor, and placed him in charge of the cathedral school. But when Louis the Pious became emperor, he recalled Aldric (Aldericus, Audry) to Aachen, making him his chaplain and confessor. Named bishop of Le Mans and consecrated Dec. 22, 832, by the metropolitan of Tours, Aldric received the emperor, who came to celebrate Christmas with him. As bishop Aldric distinguished himself by his charity, disciplined his clergy, and built the monastery of Saint-Martin in his city, as well as the Saint-Julian fountain. He fought with the monks of Saint-Calais, compelling them to recognize his authority over their abbey. On the death of Louis the Pious (840) they allied themselves with the enemies of Emperor Charles II the Bald and had Aldric exiled from Le Mans. In 846, however, a royal charter restored him to his see. However, when Rainald became abbot of Saint-Calais he succeeded, a few years before Aldric's death, in winning from Charles the Bald and the synod of Bonneuil recognition of his abbey's episcopal exemption (855). Aldric is buried in the abbey church of Saint-Vincent in Le Mans. In addition to three testaments (the first two confirm legacies to various churches and counsel on how to maintain peace between clerics and monks; the third is an ascetic piece) the bishop composed the Gesta Aldrici, in which he reports on his management of the diocese in the first 44 chapters, the rest of the work being a later addition.

Feast: Jan. 7.

Bibliography: A. E. MOLINIER, et al., Les Sources de L'histoire de France (Paris 1901–06) No. 8121–22. Gesta domni Aldrici, ed. R. CHARLES and L. FROGER (Mamers 1889). J. P. E. HAVET, Oeuvres, 2 v. (Paris 1896) 1:271–317, the Actus pontificum usually attributed now to the Chorbishop David. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule v.2. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:48. M. BESSON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:68–69.

[J. DAoust]

ALDRIC OF SENS, ST.

Monk, abbot, then archbishop of Sens; b. Gâtinais, 775; d. Ferrières, Oct.10, either 836, according to Duchesne and Levillain, or 841, according to Stein and others. Aldric (Aldericus or Audri) was of noble birth, and was educated at Saint-Martin of Tours, became monk at Ferrières (Gâtinais), was appointed to the clergy of Sens by its Archbishop Jeremiah, was called to the court of Aachen by King Louis the Pious, and was named director of the Palace School and member of the Council. In 821 he succeeded Abbot Adalbert at Ferrières; in 828 he was chosen archbishop of Sens, and was consecrated at the Council of Paris in 829. Concerned about clerical discipline, he effected a reform at the abbey of Saint-Amand in Flanders, and with Ebbo of Sens he reformed Saint-Denis. He sent his disciple Servatus LUPUS of Ferrières to complete his studies with Rabanus Maurus at Fulda. Preoccupied with the prosperity of his own abbey, he obtained during a visit of Louis the Pious to Ferrières the monastery of Saint-Josse in Ponthieu. He participated in the Council of Thionville rehabilitating Louis the Pious. He was buried at the abbey of Ferrières. His magnificent reliquary disappeared, and his remains were scattered when the Calvinists pillaged the abbey in 1569.

Feast: June 7.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedictii (Venice 1733–40) v.2. Gallia Christiana 12:19–21. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 105: 809–811. E. JAROSSAY, Histoire d'une abbaye à travers les siècles: Ferrières en Gâtinais (Orléans 1901). L. LEVILLAIN, "Étude sur les lettres de Loup de Ferrières," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartres 63 (1902) 85–86. G. HOCQUARD, Catholicisme 1:288.

[P. COUSIN]

ALEGAMBE, PHILIPPE

Historiographer and bibliographer; b. Brussels, Jan. 22, 1592; d. Rome, Sept. 6, 1652. At the completion of his literary studies, he traveled to Spain where he entered the service of the Duke of Osuna. In 1611 Alegambe accompanied the duke to Sicily. On Sept. 7, 1613, Alegambe was admitted into the Jesuit novitiate at Palermo. He studied theology at the Roman College and was sent to the University of Graz, Austria, to lecture in philosophy and theology. Then, as tutor of the young Prince of Eggenberg, he traveled for five years throughout Europe until he was called to Rome by the Jesuit General Mutius Vitelleschi to become secretary to the German assistant. After four years he was relieved of this post and worked on the continuation of the Bibliotheca scriptorum S.J. (Antwerp 1643), begun by P. Ribadeneira, SJ. He also published the Mortes illustres et gesta eorum de S.J. qui in odium fidei. . . confecti sunt (Rome 1657), Heroes et victimae charitatis S.J. (Rome 1658), and the Compendium vitarum Saints Justini, Felicis, Florentii et Justae. . . ex manuscript ecclesiae colleg. S. Justae Aquilae.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 1:151–153. E. M. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:80–81. B. SCHNEIDER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:302.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

ALEGRE, FRANCISCO JAVIER

Historian and Latinist of Mexico; b. Veracruz, Nov. 12, 1729; d. near Bologna, Aug. 16, 1788. He entered the Society of Jesus on March 19, 1747, and was ordained on Sept. 29, 1754. He taught classics and mathematics in Havana (1755–62) and Canon Law in Mérida, Yucatán (1762–64). Then he was summoned to Mexico City by his provincial superior to write a history of the Jesuit Mexican province. By 1766 he had finished the first draft into which he incorporated hundreds of original documents. Because of his great talent for writing, Alegre rarely had to correct any part of the text, some 1,500 folio pages. Titled Historia de la provincia de la Compañía de Jesús de Nueva España, it spans two centuries, for it prefixes to the history of the Mexican province proper (1572–1766) and the tragic Florida mission (1566–72). This thoroughly documented history in which he preserved a vast number of documents now lost or unavailable is Alegre's greatest contribution. Even in the unsatisfactory edition of Bustamante (Mexico City 1841–42) it furnished the principal source of information on northern colonial Mexico to historians from H. H. Bancroft to P. M. Dunne. After the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767, Alegre went into exile in Bologna, Italy. Here he devoted his last two decades to literary and scientific studies and publications.

Bibliography: F. J. ALEGRE, Historia de la provincia de la Compañía de Jesús de Nueva España, ed. E. J. BURRUS and F. ZUBILLAGA, 4 v. (Rome 1956–60). E. J. BURRUS, "Francisco Javier Alegre: Historian of the Jesuits in New Spain," Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu, 22 (1953) 439–509.

[F. ZUBILLAGA]

ALEMANY, JOSEPH SADOC

Dominican missionary, first archbishop of San Francisco, Calif.; b. Vich, Spain, July 13, 1814; d. Valencia, Spain, April 14, 1888. He joined the Order of Preachers in 1829. Six years later secularization laws closed the Spanish religious houses, and he completed his studies in Italy. Ordained at Viterbo, Italy, in March 1837, he engaged in further study and pastoral work in Rome.

In 1840 Alemany was sent to the United States to serve the Dominican foundations in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. He soon perfected his English and became an American citizen (1845) while gaining experience as curate and pastor in several frontier parishes and as rector of Nashville's diocesan seminary. In 1849 he was named American provincial and left for Rome the following spring to attend a general chapter of his order. While there he learned of his appointment by Pius IX as bishop of Monterey in Upper California. After remonstrating unsuccessfully with the pope, Alemany was consecrated in the Church of San Carlo al Corso, Rome, on June 30, 1850 (nine weeks before California became a state). En route to California, he stopped in France and Ireland to seek recruits and help for his distant see. He arrived in San Francisco in December 1850, and by the end of January 1851 was established at Monterey, where the chapel of the presidio served as cathedral. As bishop of Monterey, the 36-year-old Dominican had jurisdiction over both Upper and Lower California as well as much of the land now comprising Nevada and Utah. The Mexican government protested his control over Lower California (Mexican territory) and withheld the proceeds of the PIOUS FUND, an important source of income. Although he had few priests and fewer usable churches in the area, he was still able to report some progress at the First Plenary Council of Baltimore (1852).

On July 29, 1853, Alemany was named archbishop of the new provincial See of San Francisco, and Lower California was removed from his jurisdiction. As archbishop, he attended Vatican Council I (1869–70), where he was a member of the 24-man commission to explore the teaching on papal infallibility. At the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884), he was chairman of the commission of bishops reporting on the expediency of a uniform catechism. After directing his rapidly growing archdiocese for three decades Alemany requested a coadjutor, and on Sept. 16, 1883, Patrick William Riordan, of Chicago, was consecrated for this post. In November, Alemany traveled 1,000 miles to Ogden, Utah, to meet Riordan and welcome him to San Francisco, and from that meeting a close friendship developed. On Dec. 28, 1884, Alemany resigned his charge into the hands of his coadjutor and retired to Spain. He was appointed titular archbishop of Pelusium and devoted his efforts to restoring the Dominican Order in his native country. He served in the parish of Nuestra Señora de la Pilar, Valencia, until his death. At his request, his remains were entombed in the ancient church of Santo Domingo in Vich, where he had been received into the Dominican Order 60 years before. In 1965 Alemany's remains were returned to San Francisco for interment in nearby Holy Cross Cemetery.

Bibliography: A complete biographical study is J. B. MCGLOIN, California's Pioneer Archbishop: The Life of Joseph Alemany, O.P., 1814–1888 (New York 1965). An earlier monograph is F. J. WEBER, A Biographical Sketch of Right Reverend Joseph Sadoc Alemany, Bishop of Monterey 1850–1853 (Van Nuys, Calif. 1961).

[J. B. MCGLOIN]

ALEN, JOHN

Archbishop of Dublin, chancellor of Ireland; b. Cottenshall, Norfolk, 1476; d. Hollywood's of Artane, Ireland, July 28, 1534. Alen (Alan, Allen) was the son of Edward Alen and Catherine St. Leger. He took his master of arts degree at Cambridge and was ordained on Aug. 25, 1499. His doctorate of civil and canon law was acquired at Rome, where for 11 years he acted as proctor of the archbishop of Canterbury. He held a variety of benefices, among them the treasurership of St. Paul's and the living of Galby in Leicestershire into which he was inducted by Wolsey. He played his part as minister of the royal supremacy in reducing the clergy to subjection and in the dissolution of the monasteries. After he was consecrated archbishop of Dublin on March 13, 1529, his indefatigable interest in the rights of his see resulted in the Reportorium Viride, a full description of the diocese in 1532–33, and his register (Liber Niger Alani). His end came violently, as a result of a false rumor that Gerald Fitzgerald, ninth Earl of Kildare, had been put to death. He sought refuge at Hollywood's of Artane but two retainers of the Fitzgeralds murdered him there.

Bibliography: F. E. BALL, The Judges in Ireland 1221–1921, 2 v. (London 1926) 1:125–127, 155–156, 198–199, passim. C. MAC-

NEILL, ed., Calendar of Archbishop Alen's Register (Dublin 1950). Analecta Hibernica, 10 (1941) 173–222. J. GAIRDNER, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 1:305–307.

[J. J. MEAGHER]

ALENI, GIULIO

Italian missionary; b. Brescia, 1582; d. Fuchow, China, Aug. 3, 1649. He entered the Jesuits in 1600. In 1610, having been assigned to the Chinese mission, he arrived at Macao, where he spent three years before gaining entrance into the southeastern provinces of China. Meanwhile he taught mathematics and published his observation of a lunar eclipse, Resultat de l'observation sur l'éclipse de lune du 8 Novembre, 1612, faite à Macao. He was the first Christian missionary in Kiang-si and Fukien and labored in those provinces for 30 years. To promote good will toward Christianity, he adopted the dress and manners of the Chinese and became, after Matteo Ricci, the most famous Italian missionary to China; he was honored with the title of "Confucius of the West." He wrote a number of books, mainly theological in content, which were published in Chinese. His chief work, The Life of God, the Savior, from the Four Gospels (8 v. Peking 1635–37) was often reprinted and used even by Protestant missionaries. Also notable is a cosmography Tchi fang wai ki (The True Origin of 10,000 Things, 6 v. Hangchow 1623).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 1:157–160; 8:1603; 12:915. E. M. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:99–100. G. H. DUNNE, Generation of Giants (Notre Dame, Ind. 1962).

[J. V. MENTAG]

ALERDING, HERMAN JOSEPH

Bishop, historian; b. Ibbenbueren, Westphalia, Germany, April 13, 1845; d. Fort Wayne, Indiana, Dec. 6, 1924. He was the son of Bernard Herman and Theresa (Schrameier) Alerding, who settled in Newport, Kentucky, during his infancy. He entered St. Gabriel Seminary, Vincennes, Indiana, in 1858, and continued his studies at St. Thomas Seminary near Bardstown, Kentucky, and St. Meinrad Seminary, St. Meinrad, Indiana. After he was ordained for the Diocese of Vincennes on Sept. 22, 1868, he did pastoral work in Terre Haute, Indiana, and Cambridge City, Indiana, until 1874. That year he was transferred to Indianapolis, Indiana, where he served as procurator of St. Joseph Seminary during the one year of its existence, and as pastor of St. Joseph Church. On Nov. 30, 1900, Alerding was consecrated as bishop of Fort Wayne by archbishop William H. Elder of Cincinnati, Ohio. The new bishop promoted secondary schools and furthered consolidation of the parochial system. During his episcopacy the Catholic population in the diocese almost doubled, largely because of the influx of foreign-born Catholics to work in the steel mills of northern Indiana.

Alerding gained recognition among Church historians with the publication of The History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Vincennes (1883). It was the first general history of the Church in Indiana, and, although not scientifically written or well organized, it contained a wealth of material. He published a second work, The Diocese of Fort Wayne, in 1907.

Bibliography: History of the Catholic Church in Indiana, ed. C. BLANCHARD, 2 v. (Logansport, Ind. 1898). J. F. NOLL, The Diocese of Fort Wayne: Fragments of History (Fort Wayne 1941).

[M. C. SCHROEDER]

ALÈS, ADHÉMAR D'

Jesuit theologian and patrologist; b. Orléans, France, Dec. 2, 1861; d. Paris, Feb. 24, 1938. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1880 and was ordained in 1896. As a scholastic and young priest he taught philosophy and both Greek and Latin literature. He inaugurated the Bibliothèque de théologie historique in collaboration with P. Bainevel and published detailed theological studies on TERTULLIAN (1905), HIPPOLYTUS (1906), the Edict of Callistus (1914), CYPRIAN (1922), and NOVATIAN (1925). He became professor of theology at the Institute Catholique in Paris in 1907 and dean of the faculty in 1925. He served as principal director of the Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique (4 v. Paris 1911–28), to which he contributed many articles dealing with the development of theology in the early and medieval Church. He was an exact and careful scholar whose analyses of theological problems in their historical development have proved invaluable. As a result of a controversy over divine providence and free will he published Providence et libre arbitre (Paris 1927). He also contributed to the Bibliothèque des sciences religieuses with: Baptême et Confirmation (Paris 1928), Eucharistie (Paris 1930), Le Dogme de Nicée (1925), Le Dogme de Éphèse (1931), De Verbo Incarnato (1930), and De Deo Trino (1935) and wrote articles and reviews for scholarly periodicals.

Bibliography: R. METZ, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:304–305. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) Tables générales 1:70–71. J. LEBRETON, Catholicisme 1:294–295. "In Memoriam: Le. R. P. D'Alès," Recherches de science religieuse, 28 (1938) 129–133.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD

Presbyterian theologian; b. Lexington, Virginia, April 17, 1772; d. Princeton, New Jersey, Oct. 22, 1851. He was the son of William and Ann (Reid) Alexander. After studying at Liberty Hall College (later Washington College), Chestertown, Maryland, under Reverend William Graham, he was ordained in 1794. He served as president of Hampden–Sydney College, Virginia, from 1796 to 1807, when he accepted a call to Pine Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. As moderator of the general assembly (1807), he advocated the establishment of the Princeton Theological Seminary. Installed as its first professor in 1812, he taught didactic and polemic theology there until his death. With the works of Turretini and other Calvinist scholastics as the basis of his courses, Alexander was the chief theologian of the Old School party, opposing the New School in his Thoughts on Religious Experience (1841) and in the columns of the Biblical Repertory, which he founded in 1825. His Brief Outline of the Evidences of the Christian Religion (1825) was widely adopted as a college text. In The Canon of the Old and New Testaments (1826) he taught verbal inspiration and inerrancy. He was also influential in advocating foreign missions and in the American Colonization Society.

Bibliography: J. W. ALEXANDER, The Life of Archibald Alexander (New York 1854). Sons of the Prophets, ed. H. T. KERR (Princeton 1963).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

ALEXANDER, SAMUEL

English educator and neorealist philosopher; b. Sydney, Australia, Jan. 6, 1859; d. Manchester, England, Sept. 11, 1938. Alexander was educated at the University of Melbourne and at Balliol College, Oxford, and served as a teaching fellow of Lincoln College from 1882 to 1893. He was then professor of philosophy at Victoria University of Manchester until 1924, during which time he was president of the Aristotelian Society (1908–11), fellow of the British Academy (1913), and Gifford lecturer at the University of Glasgow (1916–18). In 1927, he was appointed the Herbert Spencer lecturer at Oxford. He published many philosophical and literary works, among which Space, Time, and Deity (2 v., London 1920) is the most important.

In revolt against traditional materialism, Alexander formulated his epistemology and metaphysics in the context of naturalism and realism. His principal synthesis may be summarized as follows: (1) space and time are infinite, continuous, and inseparable—the universal matrix of all reality; (2) all being originates by “emergent evolution,” an intrinsic urge (nisus) to develop into a more complex form of reality; (3) reality is creative; each emergent level is known by the “perspective” enjoyed by the mind; (4) just as mind emerges from life, and life from a lower physico-chemical level of existence, so the values of truth, beauty, freedom, and goodness emerge from mind; (5) deity is not a transcendent Creator, but the last emergent quality of mind.

While Alexander’s pantheistic evolutionism directly opposed the materialistic, agnostic evolutionism of Spencer and T. H. Huxley, it can be identified with other currents of contemporary thought. Alexander associated his space-time matrix with the four-dimensional continuum arrived at mathematically by Einstein. He allied his “emergent evolution,” a concept used independently by the British zoologist, C. Lloyd Morgan, with H. Bergson’s “creative evolution.” His empirical “perspectivism” was closely akin to the direct realism of G. E. Moore, B. RUSSELL, and the pragmatists, while leaving place for the a priori and nonempirical as found in Plato and Kant. His concept of value, human freedom, and deity has much in common with the pantheistic naturalism of B. SPINOZA, the French philosophy of the spirit, and the absolute idealism of F. H. BRADLEY and B. Bosanquet. Again, his psychic evolutionism is not unlike that proposed by A. N. WHITEHEAD.

The defects of Alexander’s evolutionism were two: his system remained basically eclectic and he never unified in principle, logically or ontologically, the world of spirit and of matter. In spite of his instinct against materialism and agnosticism, his thought never truly attained to spiritual substance and the transcendence of God.

See Also: EVOLUTIONISM; PANTHEISM.

Bibliography: Works. Moral Order and Progress (3d ed. London 1899); Locke (London 1908); The Basis of Realism (London 1914); Space, Time, and Deity, 2 v. (London 1920); Artistic Creation and Cosmic Creation (London 1928); Spinoza and Time (London 1921); Spinoza (Manchester 1933); Philosophical and Literary Pieces, ed. J. LAIRD (London 1939), bibliog. Literature. P. DEVAUX, Le Système d’Alexander (Paris 1929). M. R. KONVITZ, On the Nature of Value: The Philosophy of Samuel Alexander (New York 1946). A. F. LIDDELL Alexander’s Space, Time, and Deity (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1925). J. W. MCCARTHY, The Naturalism of Samuel Alexander (New York 1948), bibliog.

[R. J. NOGAR]

ALEXANDER I, EMPEROR OF RUSSIA

B. St. Petersburg, Dec. 12, 1777; d. Taganrog, Nov. 19, 1825. Alexander, the son of Czar Paul I (1754–1801) and Sophia Dorothea of Württemberg, was much influenced by his Swiss tutor Frédéric Laharpe, a rationalist. Until 1812 Alexander was inclined toward deism and was also affected by traditional Russian autocracy. After succeeding to the imperial throne upon his father’s assassination (1801), he relaxed some of the rigid state controls and initiated important government reforms. During the first half of his reign, Russia was involved in the Napoleonic wars. At the subsequent Congress of Vienna, Alexander I was the most powerful monarch. Influenced by Metternich, he became extremely conservative both in domestic and foreign policy after 1815.

Alexander I was deeply impressed by ROUSSEAU’s adulation of humanity and envisioned a syncretistic Christianity united under his political rule. He sought unsuccessfully to have Pope PIUS VII bless the HOLY ALLIANCE. Within his own realm, he maintained a policy of tolerance toward Latin Catholics but seriously interfered with the correspondence between Rome and the bishops. He supported the scheme, originated under CATHERINE II, to make the metropolitan of Mogilev a veritable Latin patriarch for Russia, with power to nominate and to dispose bishops, to inspect and even to suppress religious houses, and to be the ultimate court of appeal in ecclesiastical cases. By the decree of Nov. 9, 1801, the Czar established the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical College, which lacked the approval of the Holy See but regulated the affairs of the Latin Church, as the HOLY SYNOD did for the Orthodox Church. Alexander I pursued the policy of subjecting the Ruthenians to Latin jurisdiction. He expelled the JESUITS from St. Petersburg (1815) and from the empire (1820). During his reign, however, he never objected to the conversion of his courtiers to Catholicism, and he even maintained a correspondence with Madame Swetchine. At the time of Alexander’s death, General Michaud, his aide-de-camp, was in Rome requesting that Pope LEO XII send a trustworthy priest to St. Petersburg. It was thought that Alexander was contemplating reunion. But he died before a papal mission could be organized. The story that Alexander became a Catholic upon his deathbed lacks foundation.

See Also: RUSSIA

Bibliography: L. I. STRAKHOVSKY, Alexander I of Russia (New York 1947). P. PIERLING, La Russie et le Saint-Siège, 5 v. (Paris 1896–1912) v.5. A. BOUDOU, Le Saint-Siège et la Russie, 2 v. (Paris 1922–25). M. J. ROUËT DE JOURNEL, Nonciature d’Arezzo, 1802–1806, 5 v. (Rome 1922–57) v.3, 4. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 37–38, 1574–78. I. SMOLITSCH, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:311–312.

[R. F. BYRNES]

ALEXANDER I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 108 or 109 to 116 or 119. Another pope with a Greek name, Alexander, was the fifth successor to Peter. Ancient lists make him successor to Evaristus. Eusebius says that he became bishop in the eighth year of Trajan's reign (Chronicles) and died in the third year of Hadrian (Histoire ecclesiastique 4.1, 5.6). Jerome says that he became bishop in the twelfth year of Trajan. These dates do not agree with Eusebius's statement (Histoire ecclesiastique 4.4) that Alexander reigned ten years: the Liberian catalogue says seven; the Liber pontificalis, ten. It also says he was a Roman, the son of an Alexander, and ascribes to him the introduction of the Qui Pridie into the Canon of the Mass, an arbitrary attempt to assign an early origin to a liturgical practice. The custom of blessing houses with holy water and salt was inherited from pagan practices rather than introduced by Alexander. The Roman tradition that he was decapitated and buried near Rome apparently confuses him with the Roman martyr, Alexander, whose tomb was discovered in 1855. IRENAEUS knows of no martyrdoms among Roman bishops before Telesphorus.

Feast: May 3.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, Liber pontificalis l:xxxix–xcii, 54–55, 127. Acta Sanctorum, May 1:371–380. E. CASPER, Geschichte des Papsttums von den anfügen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft 1:8–16. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum 1:18–20. A. DUFOURCO, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 2:204–206. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:315. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes 8–9. T. VEGLIANI, ed., "Alessandro I papa (Epistolae)," Test I patristici sul sange di Cristo 4 (Rome 1996) 58–62.

[E. G. WELTIN]

ALEXANDER II, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 30 to April 21, 1073; b. Anselm, son of Arderico of Baggio, in Baggio, near Milan, date unknown. Educated and ordained a priest in Milan (1055), and onetime disciple of LANFRANC at BEC (1045), he cooperated with the reform aims of the PATARINES. He was made bishop of Lucca in 1057, retaining the see as pope, and served NICHOLAS II as legate to Milan, with Cardinals Hildebrand (GREGORY VII) in 1057 and PETER DAMIAN in 1060, in support of the reform and papal authority there. Disorders after the death of Nicholas II (July 27, 1061) delayed election of a successor. Upheld by Hildebrand and protected by Norman arms, Anselm was elected in Rome and enthroned without participation of the German king, whose role had been canonically recognized, if not clearly defined, in the PAPAL ELECTION DECREE OF 1059. Certain Roman civilians and dissident bishops, seconded by the German court, elected Cadalus of Parma (antipope Honorius II), who was proclaimed by the future emperor, HENRY IV, at a Basel synod, October 28, and was abandoned only after condemnation by the Council of Mantua in 1064. Despite this harassment, the reform objectives and vigorous exercise of papal authority were pressed throughout Latin Christendom, under the steadily increasing influence of Hildebrand, through a growing volume of papal correspondence and the unprecedented activity of legates: in Lombardy, France, Spain (HUGH OF REMIREMONT), England (where WILLIAM I's conquest was approved), Germany, Bohemia, Croatia-Dalmatia, and Scandinavia. Relations with the Church of CONSTANTINOPLE in 1061 and 1062 were the first since Patriarch MICHAEL CERULARIUS was excommunicated in 1054 (cf. V. Grumel, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople). PETER OF ANAGNI was sent to Emperor Michael VII Ducas after his accession in 1071, but unhappily, ecclesiastical concord was not achieved. The Latinization of Greek sees proceeded with the Norman conquest of Byzantine territories in south Italy, in some instances in the name of reform (cf. W. Holtzmann, Papsturkunden in England). The reconquest of Muslim dominions, begun at this time with full papal sanction, was an important prelude to the CRUSADES (see SPAIN). In 1063 the pope intervened in defense of the Jews in southern France and Spain, who suffered grievously in these campaigns, and renewed the prohibition of Pope GREGORY I against their maltreatment (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 4528, 4532, 4533). The claim that the territories conquered by French knights in Spain and by NORMANS in Sicily respectively were to be held of the pope in feudal tenure (ex parte s. Petri) rested in part on the spurious DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, in wider use from that time on. After a confident appeal to Henry IV for military aid in a conflict with the pope's Norman supporters (settled at the synod of Melfi, 1067), relations with the German court deteriorated. A dispute over the See of Milan (see ATTO OF MILAN) was among the causes of growing tension inherited by his successor, Gregory VII, that culminated in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD, et al. (Graz 1956) 1:566–592. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 146:1271–1430, letters. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 6:261–369. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) v.8. C. VIOLANTE, La pataria milanese e la riforma ecclesiastica (Rome 1955); Dizionario biografico degli Italiani, ed. A. M. GHISALBERTI (Rome 1960—) 2:176–183, both essential. v. GRUMMEL, "Le Premier contact de Rome avec l'Orient après le schisme de Michel Cérulaire," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 43 (1942) 21–29. W. HOLTZMANN, "Il Papato, i Normanni e la Chiesa greca," Almanacco calabrese 13 (Rome 1963) 53–66. F. BAIX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 11:53–99. H. HOUBEN, "Die Teilnehmer der Synoden Alexanders II (1061–1073). Mit Neuedition von JL 4651," Quellen und Forschungen aus Italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken (Tübingen 1997) 1–17. E. HOUTS, "The Norman Conquest Through European Eyes" The English Historical Review (London 1995) 832–53. J. LAUNDAGE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1 (1995). G. MICCOLOI, "Per la storia della pataria Milanese. Appendice: La legazione dei cardinali Mainardo e Giovanni Minuto e l'atteggiamento di Alessandro II nei confronti della pataria," Chiesa gregoriana. Ricerche sulla Riforma del secolo XI (Rome 1999). C. MORTON, "Pope Alexander II and the Norman Conquest," Latomus 34 (Bruxelles 1975) 362–82. M. POLOCK, "Zum Rechtsstreit zwischen den Bistümern Siena und Arezzo und zum sog. 'Registrum pape Alexandri' vom Monte Soratte. Ein Diskussionsbeitrag," Archiv für Diplomatik, Schriftgeschichte, Siegelkunde und Wappenkunde (Köln; Wein 1996). T. SCHMIDT, Alexander II. 1061–1073 und die römische Reformgruppe seiner Zeit (Stuttgart 1977). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 152–53.

[J. J. RYAN]

ALEXANDER III, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 7, 1159 (consecrated and crowned at Ninfa, Sept. 20, 1159) to Aug. 30, 1181; born Rolandus, son of Ranutius (Bandinelli is a late attribution), Siena c. 1100–05; died "of old age" at Civita Castellana; buried in St. John Lateran, in the right aisle before the pulpit. For more than a century, scholars erroneously confused the Sienese Rolandus with another Master Rolandus, probably from Modena and now identified as disciple of ABELARD, critic of St. BERNARD, teacher of canon law in Bologna and author of both the Stroma Rolandi, a commentary on the Decretum of GRATIAN, and the Sententiae Rolandi, a theological treatise. Little is known of the early career of the Rolandus who became pope: he studied theology and possibly canon law at Bologna but it was his subsequent high profile as a canon in Pisa that recommended him to Eugenius III for rapid promotion to curial office (?1148); cardinal deacon of SS. Cosma e Damiano (by Oct. 23, 1150); created cardinal priest of S. Marco (by March 30, 1151); legate and negotiator at the Treaty of Constance (March 23, 1153); Chancellor of the Roman Church (before May 1153). Retaining office as trusted advisor to Adrian IV, he helped to negotiate the Treaty of Benevento (June 1156) with William of Sicily and challenged Frederick Barbarossa at the Diet of Be-sançon (October 1157). As chancellor, together with Boso, the papal Chamberlain, he witnessed many charters (1155–59), establishing castra specialia throughout the patrimony and bringing the local feudal nobility under the special protection of the Holy See.

On Adrian IV's death, the cardinals' three-day deliberation at St. Peter's (Sept. 4–7, 1159) over his successor achieved a large majority for Rolandus, who took the name of Alexander III. Meanwhile, a small but vociferous minority, including cardinals Guy of S. Callisto and John of S. Martino, forcibly claimed the election for Octavian of Sta. Cecilia, named Victor IV. Boso chronicled the dramatic events of the schism in his Vita of Alexander, beginning with the papal conclave imprisoned for two weeks by the Roman mob in the Leonine City and Trastevere; the pope's escape, consecration and coronation at Ninfa (Sept. 20, 1159) by the cardinal bishop of Ostia; and Barbarossa's support for Victor, the anti-pope, whose consecration at Farfa (Oct. 4, 1159) was subsequently endorsed by the imperial councils of Pavia (February 1160) and Lodi (June 1161). Alexander risked danger by excommunicating Victor and his followers (March 24, 1160), but he was fortunate in being served by loyal and exceptionally able legates who won wide support for him throughout Christendom. The episcopal councils of London (June 1160) and Neufmarché (July 1160) jointly declared for Alexander at Beauvais (July 22, 1160), while Louis VII of France and Henry II of England pronounced formally in his favor at the Council of Toulouse (October 1160).

Alexander was forced to spend much of his pontificate outside Rome; his weak position requiring the exercise of consummate diplomacy, his penury forcing him to seek money gifts in order to survive. During this period, two further anti-popes were elected: Paschal III on Victor's death (April 20, 1164), and on Paschal's death (Sept. 20, 1168), Callixtus III, who was finally abandoned in 1176 by Barbarossa. Imperial hostility caused Alexander to flee the Italian peninsula to France (by April 12, 1162), where he summoned a council at Montpellier (May 15–17, 1162) to remind secular rulers of their duties towards the Church. He conducted the normal business of the Curia from Sens (1163–65) and presided over an important episcopal Council at Tours (May 19, 1163), also attended by legates of the Byzantine emperor. This council recognized Alexander as the legitimate pope, not only in France and England, but also in Iberia, Hungary, Scotland and Ireland; nine new decrees were promulgated, particularly in relation to the treatment of heretical groups in Languedoc, and a long debate was held on Peter Lombard's Christology.

In November 1165, the Romans invited Alexander to return to the city, receiving him with customary honor in an adventus ceremony, but within the year, just as the desperate financial situation of the Curia was beginning to improve through papal exploitation of Patrimonial revenues, Barbarossa mounted his fourth invasion of the Italian peninsula (November 1166). An imperial victory at Monteporzio (May 29, 1167) and the occupation of Monte Mario permitted the capture of St. Peter's, where Barbarossa and Beatrice, his wife, had themselves crowned by the anti-pope, Paschal III (July 30, 1167). Almost immediately, plague decimated the imperial troops and incidentally killed Rainald of Dassell, the emperor's chancellor. Alexander, who had bravely resisted the occupation of Rome, was eventually forced to escape to Benevento. At the same time, Manuel I Comnenus offered aid against Barbarossa in return for coronation as universal emperor. His offer was declined but the respective legates of both sides continued to discuss the possibility of reunion between Greek and Latin churches.

Pope Alexander III returns to Rome, 1177, detail of a fresco by the 15th-century artist Aretino Spinello, Palazzo della Signoria, Siena.

Alexander supported the anti-imperial Lombard League, whose strength lay in certain north Italian cities, and he was rewarded when the new town of Alessandria was named in his honor (1168). The League's victory at Legnano (May 29, 1176) made possible the Peace of Venice (July 24, 1177), by which Alexander's canonical election was at last recognized by Barbarossa after almost 18 years, and the emperor's excommunication withdrawn. On his return to Rome, the pope experienced a second and even more impressive adventus ceremony (March 12, 1178), led by clergy with banners and crosses, all chanting the papal laudes, and citizens bearing olive branches. Boso's Vita of Alexander reaches its triumphant conclusion at this point. The Peace, however, proved distasteful to a group of dissident nobles who elected Lando of Sezze as Innocent III (Sept. 29, 1179). Although this fourth anti-pope of the pontificate was rapidly dispatched to a papal fortress, Alexander left Rome, choosing to spend his last two years in the patrimony, and died in August 1181 at Civita Castellana.

The weakness of his position did not inhibit Alexander from attempting to assert papal authority. At the beginning of the crisis between Becket and Henry II (1164–70), the pope was at Sens in the kingdom of France, unable to respond vigorously either to royal threats or archiepiscopal pleas and constrained to tread a thin line between principle and compromise. Yet he conceded nothing of substance to the English king, for the Constitutions of Clarendon were not confirmed, nor was Becket deposed; instead the pope insisted on reconciliation and, through various legations, an accommodation was finally agreed after Becket's murder (Dec. 29, 1170). In 1178, Alexander had William I of Scotland (1165–1214) excommunicated and his kingdom placed under interdict for interfering in the election to the bishopric of St. Andrews and, in 1179, confirmed Count Alfonso Henriques (1139–79) as Alfonso I of Portugal (1179–85). In return, Alfonso conceded his kingdom as an apostolic fief and promised to pay an annual census.

The image of the pope exercising his legislative authority, however, was most clearly demonstrated at the Third Lateran Council (March 5–17, 1179). In the opening discourse by the famous canonist, Rufinus, bishop of Assisi, the importance of this view was stressed when he revealed that he envisaged the Council as an assembly in which the pope alone made laws for Christendom. Most important of the 27 decrees was the first, henceforth requiring a two-thirds' majority of cardinals at a papal election to avoid any future schism. Other decrees dealt with reform of the Church, action against heretics and the provision of a teacher in each cathedral school. One decree forbade anyone to demand money for the licentia docendi or licence to teach.

Alexander's pontificate was crucial in developing coherent rules in a number of important areas and his decisions passed into more than 700 decretals. Sixty of his marriage decretals appear in the Liber Extra, involving betrothal, mutual marital consent, consummation, consanguinity and legitimization. These made it possible to define as true marriage a wide variety of unions that might otherwise have remained outside the Christian community. He sought equitable solutions to situations as they arose and provided a framework for decisions that were both practical and theologically acceptable. In regard to canonization, the papacy's exclusive prerogative in this matter was becoming more generally accepted and Alexander considered no fewer than 12 cases brought before him. He made three canonizations: Edward the Confessor (Feb. 7, 1161), Thomas Becket (March 10, 1173) and Bernard of Clairvaux (Jan. 18, 1174), deliberating on the other nine candidates but giving no verdict. His decisions took the process further than ever before by requiring the presentation of detailed written evidence: the saint's Life, a catalogue of miracles and official letters attesting to the authenticity of both miracles and virtues.

Although his pontificate occurred at a time of considerable demoralization following the failure of the Second Crusade, Alexander was in agreement with St. Bernard that the requirement to crusade was explicable as God's test for his people and made his own considerable contribution to crusade ideology, particularly in relation to the indulgence. His encyclicals were issued to summon the faithful to crusade in the East in 1165, 1166, 1169, probably 1173 and 1181. The encyclical Inter omnia (July 29, 1169) was significant in referring to the crusade as the expression of God's love while Cor nostrum (Jan. 16, 1181) gave the crusade indulgence its mature form, its unequivocal definition being the remission of all or part of the punishment imposed by God in this world or the next. In 1171 or 1172, Alexander authorized crusading against the Finns and Estonians but offered only a limited indulgence, while his only authorization to a crusade in Iberia was made in 1175.

While unable to advance his crusade to the Holy Land, Alexander realized one project as being of equal value when he approved the mission of Henry de Marcy, abbot of Clairvaux, to the County of Toulouse in 1178, empowering him to preach there. The pope recognized the problem of rapidly spreading Catharism and the urgent need to establish a credible distinction between heresy and popular religion. Indeed, a decree of the Council of 1179 permitted bishops to levy troops and to issue indulgences as if for a crusade against the infidel. Alexander believed that the punishment of heretics should be carried out in a spirit of charity; various forms of persuasion being used to encourage their return to the Church, whether isolation, excommunication, compulsion or confiscation of goods and possessions. In 1162, in dealing with some Flemings who sought papal approval of their way of life, he warned the examining archbishop of Rheims to inquire into them and report to him, significantly preferring to risk absolving the guilty than to risk punishing the innocent. In 1179, he received Valdes, whose popular preaching and vernacular translations had brought a ban from the archbishop of Lyons. The pope approved his voluntary renunciation of property and lifestyle but refused to grant him the right to preach. Alexander, in his conciliar decrees, accepted that similar rigorous behavior by clerics was essential in order to command a fraction of the respect given to groups such as the Waldensians or the Humiliati of Lombardy, yet even he, in the last resort, was unable to keep Valdes and others within the Church.

Throughout a long and difficult pontificate, Alexander III demonstrated focused and inclusive leadership, whether as an innovator, particularly in marriage law, a determined advocate of persuasion and negotiation against excessive discipline, violence or threats, or in his 34 promotions to the cardinalate, most notably, Paolo Scolari, the future pope Clement III.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, 200: 1349–1644. J. M. WAT-TERICH, ed. Pontificum Romanorum vitae (Leipzig 1862) 2: 377–649. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, ed. P. JAFFÉ and G. WAT-TENBACH, et al., 2 (Leipzig 1888), 145–418, 761–66. L. DUCHESNE, Liber Pontificalis 2: 281, 397–446. Boso's Life of Alexander III, trans. G. M. ELLIS & intro. P. MUNZ (Oxford 1973). Codex constitutionum quas summi pontificum ediderunt in solenne canonizatione sanctorum a Johanne XV ad Benedictum XIII (993–1729), ed. G. FONTANINI, (Rome 1729) 15–23. J. M. BRIXIUS, Die Mitglieder des Kardinalskollegiums 1130–1181 (Berlin 1912), 56–57, 112. B. ZENKER, Die Mitglieder des Kardinalskollegiums 1130–1159 (Würzburg 1964), 85–88. V. ERMONI, “Alexandre III”, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:208–14. G. MORIN, “Le discours d’ouverture du Concile general de Latran (1179) et l’oeuvre littéraire de Maître Rufin, évêque d’Assisi”, Atti della pontificia Accademia romana di Archeologia, 3 series, Memorie, 2 (1928). S. KUTTNER, “La réserve papale du droit de canonisation”, Revue historique de droit français et étranger, 4th ser., 18 (1938), 172–228. E. KEMP, Canonization and Authority in the Western Church (London 1948). W. ULLMANN, “Cardinal Roland and Besançon”, Miscellanea Historiae Pontificiae 18 (1954) 107–125. M. PACAUT, Alexandre III (Paris 1956). R. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957), 200–203. P. BREZZI, “Alessandro III, papa”, Dizionario Biografico degli Italiani, 2 (Rome 1960) 183–189. M. BALDWIN, Alexander III and the Twelfth Century (Baltimore 1966). M. G. CHENEY, “The Recognition of Pope Alexander III: Some Neglected Evidence”, English Historical Review, 84 (1969), 474–497. B. BOLTON, “Tradition and Temerity: Papal Attitudes to Deviants, 1159–1216,” Studies in Church History, 9; Schism, Heresy and Religious Protest, (Cambridge 1972), 79–91. P. TOUBERT, Les structures du Latium médiéval. Le Latium méridional et la Sabine du ix siècle à la fin du xii siècle, 2 vols (Rome 1973). C. DONAHUE JR., “The Policy of Alexander the Third’s Consent Theory of Marriage”, Proceedings of the Fourth International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, ed. S. KUTTNER (Vatican City 1976), 251–281. J. T. NOONAN JR., “Who was Rolandus?” Law, Church and Society: Essays in Honor of Stephan Kuttner, eds. K. PENNINGTON and R. SOMERVILLE (Philadelphia 1977), 21–48. R. SOMERVILLE, Pope Alexander III and the Council of Tours (1163) (Berkeley 1977). W. MADERTONER, Die zweispältige Papstwahl des Jahres 1159 (Vienna 1978). R. WEIGAND, “Magister Rolandus und Papst Alexander III,” Archiv für Katholisches Kirchenrecht, 149 (1980), 3–44. Miscellanea Rolando Bandinelli: Papa Alessandro III, ed. F. LIOTTA (Siena 1986); R. FOREVILLE, “Alexandre III et la canonization des Saints,” ibid., 217–235. Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils. Volume I, Nicea to Lateran V, ed., N. J. TANNER, original text established by G. ALBERIGO et al. (London & Georgetown 1990), 205–225. J. LAUDAGE, “Alexander III,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, II (Freiburg 1994), cols. 367–368. P. BREZZI and A. PIAZZA, “Alessandro III”, Enciclopedia dei Papi (Rome 2000) 2: 291–298. A. DUGGAN, The Correspondence of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1162–1170, 2 v., Oxford Medieval Texts (Oxford 2000). S. TWYMAN, Papal Ceremonial at Rome in the Twelfth Century, Henry Bradshaw Society Subsidia (Woodbridge 2002).

[B. M. BOLTON]

ALEXANDER IV, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 12, 1254 to May 25, 1261; b. Rainaldo dei Conti di Segni. His illustrious family had produced two earlier popes, INNOCENT III and GREGORY IX. He was named cardinal deacon (1227) by his uncle, Gregory IX, and became cardinal bishop of Ostia in 1231. Although by nature devout and peaceful, Alexander IV nevertheless prosecuted the war begun by his predecessor, INNOCENT IV, against the heirs of Emperor FREDERICK II in Germany, Italy, and Sicily. He allocated Sicily to Alfonso of Castile, and Conradin’s heritage he assigned to Edmund, son of Henry III of England. Alexander spent much of his pontificate outside Rome, because of the GUELF–GHIBELLINE struggles in central Italy and Manfred’s war against the STATES OF THE CHURCH. During the interregnum in Germany, Alexander at first supported the claims of William of Holland to the imperial throne; after 1257 he switched his support to Richard of Cornwall. In negotiations with the Byzantine Emperor Theodore II Lascaris, Alexander attempted to reunite the Greek and Latin Churches. In Cyprus he successfully settled the rival claims of the two churches. In Syria he made the head of the recently reconciled Maronites patriarch of Antioch. A patron of the FRANCISCANS, Alexander restored to them many privileges that his predecessor had suppressed. He died at Viterbo and is buried in the cathedral.

Bibliography: ALEXANDER IV, Les Registres, ed. C. BOUREL DE LA RONCIÈRE et al., 3 v. (Paris 1902–53). A. POTTHAST, Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a. 1198 ad a. 1304 (Graz 1957) 2:1286–1473, 2124–29. F. TENCKHOFF, Papst Alexander IV (Paderborn 1907). J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 4:272–296. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:316–317. M. GROTTEN, “Konrad von Hochstaden und die Wahl Richards von Cornwall,” in Kön. Stadt und Bistum in Kirche und Reich des Mittelalters. Festschrift für Odilo Engels zum 65. Geburtstag (Böhlau 1993) 483–510. H.-E. HILPERT, “Richard of Cornwall’s Candidacy for the German Throne and the Christmas 1256 at Westminster,” Journal of Medieval History 6 (Amsterdam 1980) 185–98. F. A. C. MANTELLO, “Letter CXXX of Bishop Robert Grosseteste: A Problem of Attribution,” Medieval Studies 56 (Toronto 1974) 14–59. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 194.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

ALEXANDER V, ANTIPOPE (PETER OF CANDIA)

Pontificate (Pisan obedience): June 26, 1409–May 3, 1410. A Greek, he was born Peter Philarghus (Petros Phalargis) c. 1340 in the northern part of Crete (i.e., Candia, thus his more widely known name, Peter of Candia). Orphaned at an early age, Peter was raised by a Capuchin friar who gave him an elementary education; he died in Bologna on May 3, 1410. Peter joined the Franciscans c. 1357 and studied in Padua and Norwich. He received his bachelor of theology degree from Oxford, and taught in Franciscan houses in Russia, Bohemia, and Poland. In 1381, he received his doctorate of theology from Paris, and by the middle 1380s he was in Italy at the court of Gian Galeazzo Visconti. Over the next three decades, with the patronage of Visconti, Peter held a chair of theology at Pavia, and became bishop of Piacenza (1386), Vicenza (1388), and Novara (1389); he was eventually named archbishop of Milan in 1402. In the midst of this ecclesiastical activity, in 1395 he obtained for Visconti the title duke of Milan from the German king Wenceslas (1378–1400).

From his days in Paris, Peter allied himself with the Roman obedience in the Great Schism (1378–1417), and in 1405 Pope Innocent VII (1404–06) named him cardinal priest of SS. Apostoli and papal legate to Lombardy. Innocent died the following year and was succeeded by Pope Gregory XII, who showed little interest in ending the 26-year-old schism. As a result, Peter approved of those cardinals who were slowly distancing themselves from Gregory's curia; he also encouraged England to take a neutral position regarding the schism, in effect a withdrawal of obedience to Gregory. Because of this Gregory removed Peter as archbishop of Milan and rescinded his cardinalate. In May 1408, after the antipope Benedict XIII lost his French support and Gregory had created four new cardinals (considered a sign that he did not intend to end the schism), all but seven of Gregory's cardinals left for Pisa. At this point Peter (along with Baldassare Cossa, later antipope John XXIII) became one of the leading voices for the via concilis (i.e., that a council of the entire church should decide the legitimate pope). He was among the primary organizers of the Council of Pisa (1409); delivered its opening address; secured English, Bohemian, and much German support for the council; and presided at the sessions that declared Benedict XIII and Gregory XII heretics. Peter was then unanimously elected pope (June 26, 1409) after a pledge to keep the council in session until church reform was complete. He took the name Alexander V.

Alexander's authority as pope was problematic from the start. Although he had wide support (France, England, Bohemia, the eastern Empire, and northern and central Italy), each of the supposedly deposed popes still had a limited degree of recognition. Furthermore, Alexander was not in Rome; the city was occupied by King Ladislaus of Durazzo-Naples (1386–1414), who recognized Gregory XII. Finally, in the eyes of some, Alexander did not encourage the church reform he had promised at Pisa. In the first weeks of his papacy, several of the bishoprics and benefices he named went to Franciscans who received the offices to the detriment of local parish clergy, canons, and various university faculties. On July 1, 1490 Alexander ratified and published the decrees of the council, and on August 7 he dissolved it, announcing that a new council would meet in three years. While some saw these policies as legitimate attempts to solidify his power base in order to then end the Great Schism, Alexander's moves appeared to many as directly opposed to church reform. Either way he had broken the letter of his oath to keep the council in session.

In an effort to regain Rome (and thus weaken Gregory), Alexander excommunicated Ladislaus and invested Louis II of Anjou as king of Naples. Louis captured Rome in the name of the Pisan obedience in January 1410. For some reason, probably due to pressure from Baldassare Cossa (whom many contemporaries and modern scholars consider an opportunist), Alexander stayed in Bologna, even after a delegation from Rome pleaded with him to come to the city (Feb. 2, 1410). Alexander died suddenly in Bologna three months later (May 3). Rumors that Cossa, who would become Alexander's successor, had poisoned the antipope circulated immediately and the charge (now largely considered false) was even brought before the Council of Constance. Alexander was buried in the church of St. Francis in Bologna. His tomb was restored in 1889 at the direction of Leo XIII.

Peter of Candia/Alexander V remains a controversial figure. He appears to have been a serious Franciscan and was considered a fine theologian and teacher. His works include a Principia, treatises on the immaculate conception, and a well-regarded commentary on Peter Lombard's Sentences (which he taught in Paris). His theology was nominalist in approach and has received renewed interest for its place in the development of late medieval thought and the schools. Peter's successful career with Visconti indicates real diplomatic and administrative ability, but he clearly had more mixed results within the ecclesiastical world as Alexander V. Contemporaries like Jean Gerson, and near-contemporaries like Platina and Giles of Viterbo viewed him with some respect. Alexander's greatest liability may have been his early death. He was pope long enough to make many enemies (e.g., on Oct. 12, 1409 he promulgated a bull that broadly extended the right to preach and hear confession to the mendicant orders; this turned many secular clergy against him), but not so long as to end the schism or accomplish any church reform he might have envisioned.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.536. B. PLATINA, De vita Christi ac omnium pontificum 212 (207) ed. G. GAIDA, in Rerum italicarum scriptores 3.1, ed. L. A. MURATORI (Città di Castello and Bologna 1913–32). L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (Lyons 1625–54; Rome 1731–1886; Quaracchi-Florence 1931) 9.221–245, 406–412, 623–27. F. EHRLE, Der Sentenzenkommentar Peters von Candia, des Pisaner Papstes Alexanders V (Münster 1925). PETER OF CANDIA, Petri de Candia (Alexandri V Papa) Tractatus de immaculata Deiparae conceptione, A. EMMEN, ed. (Florence 1955). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to AD 1500 (Oxford 1957) 1.345–46. M. CREIGHTON, A History of the Papacy from the Great Schism to the Sack of Rome (London 1897;

New York 1969) v. 1. E. WILSON, The Life and Obligations of Petrus de Candia (New York, diss. St. Bonaventure Univ. 1956). A. BUSIO, Ricerche su Pietro Filargo, Alessandro V (thesis, Università Cattolica del Sacro Cuore 1959). A. PETRUCCI, Dizionario biografico degli Italiani (Rome 1960) 2.193–6. J. SMITH, The Great Schism, 1378: The Disintegration of the Papacy (New York 1970). S. F. BROWN, "Peter of Candia's Sermons in Praise of Peter Lombard," in Studies Honoring Ignatius Charles Brady (St. Bonaventure 1976) 141–76. J.N.D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 236–37. W. J. COURTENAY, Schools and Scholars in Fourteenth-Century England (Princeton 1987). S. F. BROWN, "Peter of Candia's Hundred-Year History of the Theologian's Role," Medieval Philosophy and Theology 1 (1991) 156–90. T. E. MORRISSEY, "The Humanist and the Franciscan: A Letter of Giovanni Conversino da Ravenna to Peter Philargus," Franciscan Studies 52 (1992) 183–89. C. SCHABEL, "Peter of Candia and the Prelude to the Quarrel at Louvain," in Annual Review of the Cyprus Research Centre (Nicosia 1998) 87–124.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

ALEXANDER VI, POPE

Pontificate: night of Aug. 10–11, 1492, to Aug. 18, 1503; b. Rodrigo de Borja y Doms (Borgia) in Játiva (Xàtiva), Valencia, Spain, c. 1431; d. Rome. His uncle, Pope CALLISTUS III, showered him with ecclesiastical benefices, sent him to study law in Bologna (1455), and, along with his cousin Lluís-Joan del Milà, made him a cardinal (Feb. 22, 1456). He was bishop of Valencia (June 30, 1458) and vice chancellor of the Church under popes Callistus III, PIUS II, PAUL II, SIXTUS IV, and INNOCENT VIII, even though his private life brought stern rebukes from Pius II. [See BORGIA (BORJA).] A man of great political talent, he was elected pope in the conclave of Aug. 6–11, 1492, employing a form of simony. Ruling in an era of turbulence for Italy and the papacy, before 1498, he pursued a papal, Italian, and family policy that differed from his course of action during the last five years of his pontificate.

Italian Policy before 1498. Until 1498 he strove to consolidate the Italian league, dear to Callistus. This league with Venice and Milan, joined eventually by Siena, Ferrara, and Mantua, was made public April 25, 1493. Then, threatened with an invasion of Italy by King Charles VIII of France, Alexander sealed a treaty of friendship with Alfonso II of Naples through marriage of Alfonso's daughter, Sancha of Aragon, with Jofré Borja; the couple received the principality of Squillace from Alfonso. Alexander gained the support of King Ferdinand V (II of Aragon) and Queen ISABELLA I OF CASTILE by the marriage of Joan (Juan) Borja, Duke of Gandia, to María Enríquez, first cousin of Ferdinand, and by granting the famous bulls that regulated Castilian and Portuguese conquests in America and granted the PATRONATO REAL over all new churches in the Americas.

When Charles VIII invaded Italy with the support of Ludovico el Moro of Milan and the approval of Florence, Alexander was forced to give him free passage for the expedition, in which Charles conquered the Kingdom of Naples (February 1495). Charles entered Rome on Dec. 31, 1494. But eventually papal troops and the condottiere Virginio ORSINI drove the French and their allies out of Italy. After the battle of Fornovo (July 6, 1495) and the retreat of Charles to France, Alexander continued his policy of alliance with Spain (he granted the sovereigns the title "Catholic" in 1496), and with Naples. He sent his son, Cesare Borja, who he had made a cardinal in 1493, as cardinal-legate for the coronation of Frederick III of Naples in 1497 and arranged the marriage of his daughter, Lucrezia (whose first marriage with Giovanni SFORZA, Lord of Pesaro, he had annulled as unconsummated) with Alfonso of Aragon, Duke of Bisceglie and brother of the above-mentioned Sancha. It was during these years (1495–98) that Alexander was engaged in his struggle with Girolamo SAVONAROLA, who, after his excommunication, was tried and condemned by the government of Florence, then in the hands of his enemies, the arrabbiati.

French-Papal Alliance. In 1497 Alexander planned serious plans for the reform of the Church, but his irregular life and the ambitions of Cesare, who resigned the cardinalate in 1498 and took up politics in a practical way, frustrated his good intentions. In preferring Cesare's marriage to Charlotte d'Albret rather than Naples' Carlotta of Aragon, Alexander initiated his new policy in which he relied more on Louis XII of France. It was further characterized by the abandonment of the Kingdom of Naples to its fate, and by the plan to unify the Romagna, Emilia, Umbria, and the Marches, the four feudatories (at least nominally) of the Holy See. Cesare, then Duke of Valentinois, accompanied Louis XII in the occupation of Milan (1499), and later undertook the conquest of central Italy, a campaign comparable to that waged by Alexander in Rome against the feudal nobility (Orsini and COLONNA). The Renaissance plan for greater cohesion in the STATES OF THE CHURCH shows Alexander's political ability, but its execution is open to serious criticism, e.g., the excesses of Cesare and his troops, the danger of a greater separation of central Italy from Rome under Cesare, and the open support of a French king who, after conquering Milan, aspired to Naples as well. Although Cesare's rule of the Romagna vanished with the pope's death, and feudal anarchy returned, the later conquests of Pope JULIUS II and his reorganization of the States of the Church were made possible by the internal collapse of those provinces in the wake of Cesare's conquests. Amid such fighting, however, the HOLY YEAR OF 1500 could still be celebrated with splendor.

“Pope Alexander VI,” detail of the “Resurrection” fresco by Pinturicchio, 1492–1494, in the Borgia rooms of the Vatican Palace.

After fruitless talks in Rome with ambassadors of various European states, Alexander—as had his uncle Callistus III—published a bull proclaiming a crusade against the OTTOMAN TURKS (June 10, 1500). But only Venice and Spain took part, conquering the islands of Cephalonia and Leukas. On the excuse that Frederick III of Naples was intriguing with the Turks, Louis XII and Ferdinand of Aragon and Castile divided his Neapolitan kingdom by the Treaty of Granada (Nov. 11, 1500). When the two kings disputed over the border, Alexander sided with Louis, for whom Cesare campaigned in Naples. During Cesare's domination of central Italy, Lucrezia married (1501) Alfonso d'ESTE, firstborn of Ercole I, Duke of Ferrara, as a guarantee of the independence of the duchies.

Evaluation. In August 1503 Alexander and Cesare both fell ill during an epidemic in Rome. The pope died after confessing and receiving Viaticum and Extreme Unction. Despite his dissipated life, both as cardinal and pope, Alexander can be credited with several achievements during his pontificate. Better educated and more refined than Callistus III, he entrusted the decoration of the main floor of the VATICAN palace to Pinturiccio, restored the Castel Sant' Angelo, and provided a new building for the University of Rome. Michelangelo created his Pietà for Alexander, and drafted plans for rebuilding St. Peter's Basilica. The Monumental Apostolic chancery palace was built during his pontificate.

In the evangelization of the New World, his actions conformed to the best papal traditions: he promoted the re-Christianization of GREENLAND, supported Portuguese missionary work, and with his ALEXANDRINE bulls, ensured peace between Portugal and Castile in both the Far East and the Americas, as well as the spread of the Gospel. (See PAPAL LINE OF DEMARCATION.) Criticism of the bulls has, perhaps, not always taken into account the political rights claimed by popes from the Middle Ages or the interplay of ecclesiastical, papal, and family policies involved in their concession. Alexander's piety seems to have been more sincere than his life would indicate. Still, any overall judgment of him and his pontificate from an ecclesiastical and religious point of view remains negative, even though his enemies have often calumniated him through exaggeration. Recent uncritical excesses of those seeking naively to vindicate him have provoked a reaction, frequently as unrestrained as that of the revisionists.

Bibliography: Sources. O. RAYNALDUS, Annales ecclesiastici, ed. J. D. MANSI, 15 v. (Lucca 1747–56) 11:208–416. Bullarium Romanum (Magnum), ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES (Rome 1733–62), v. 5. A. DE LA TORRE, ed., Documentos sobre relaciones internacionales de los Reyes Católicos, 4 v. (Barcelona 1949–62). J. FERNÁNDEZ ALONSO, Legaciones y nunciaturas en España de 1466 a 1521, 2 v. (Rome 1963–66). For further source material, see BORGIA. Literature. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v. 5, 6. M. GIMÉNEZ FERNÁNDEZ, “Las bulas alejandrinas de 1493 referentes alas Indias,” Anuario de estudios americanos 1 (1944) 171–387. G. SORANZO, Studi intorno a papa Alessandro VI (Borgia) (Milan 1950); Il tempo di Alessandro VI papa e di Fra Girolamo Savonarola (Milan 1960). G. B. PICOTTI, in Rivista de storia della Chiesa in Italia (Rome 1951) 5:169–262; 8 (1954) 313–355. A. M. ALBAREDA, “Il vescovo di Barcellona Pietro Garsias bibliotecario della Vaticana sotto Alessandro VI,” La bibliofilia 60 (1958) 1–18. A. GARCÍA GALLO, “Las bulas de Alejandro VI y el ordenamiento jurídico de la expansión portuguesa y castellana en Africa e Indias,” Anuario de historia del derecho español 27–28 (1957–58) 461–829. C. M. DE WITTE, “Les Bulles pontificales et l'expansion portugaise au XV^e siècle,” Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique (Louvain 1958) 53: 443–471. P. DE LETURIA, Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica, 3 v. (Analecta Gregoriana [Rome 1930–] 101–103; 1959–60), v.1. M. BATLLORI, Alejandro VI y la casa real de Aragón, 1492–1498 (Madrid 1958); Estudis d'història i de cultura catalanes, v.2 L'humanisme i els Borja (Rome). At the Court of the Borgia, Being an Account of the Reign of Pope Alexander VI Written by . . . Johann Burchard, ed. and tr. G. PARKER (Folio Society; London 1963). M. MALLET, The Borgias (London 1981). H. MARC-BONNET, Le Papes de la Renaissance, 1447–1527 (Paris 1969).

[M. BATLLORI]

ALEXANDER VII, POPE

Pontificate: April 7, 1655, to May 22, 1667; b. Fabio Chigi, Siena, Feb. 13, 1599. The Sienese Chigi family had been prominent since the Middle Ages. Fabio was a brilliant boy, given to writing verses; for nine years he studied philosophy, law, and theology at the University of Siena, receiving his doctorate in theology in 1626. After two years more of private study at Rome, where he became acquainted with a number of intellectual leaders, Chigi entered the papal service. He rose steadily from a referendary in 1629 to vice-legate of Ferrara, bishop of Nardo in 1635, and apostolic visitor to Malta. When appointed a bishop he became a priest. His diplomatic ability was to receive a sterner test when Urban VIII sent him to troubled Germany. He spent thirteen years as nuncio to Cologne (1639–51), and also served as the pope's representative at the Peace Conference of Münster. This was a most difficult task and if Chigi did not bring about the success of the papal policy, he did win the esteem of the pope and Curia. Innocent X made him secretary of state in 1651 and a year later he received the red hat. The Conclave of 1655 that followed the death of Innocent X was a long one—January 17 to April 7. Upon election Chigi took the name Alexander VII in memory of the great twelfth-century pope, ALEXANDER III. Alexander suffered from poor health, but he was a hard worker. He was charitable to the poor and was a great help to his people in the plague of 1656. He encouraged scholarship and aided the work of historians by setting up sensible regulations for the use of archival materials. A splendid patron of the arts, Alexander is remembered for commissioning the construction of the great colonnade of Bernini.

Alexander and Louis XIV maintained poor relations, and the king went to some pains to humiliate the pope over a clash between Alexander's Corsican guards and the French embassy. But this was not all the trouble Louis caused Alexander. The pope tried hard to help beleaguered Christians beat back the Turks, but Louis XIV, more interested in weakening the Hapsburgs, did not cooperate; thus, papal plans foundered on Bourbon ambitions. Alexander's relations with Venice were better, and he persuaded the Republic to have the Jesuits, who were earlier expelled, return.

Like his predecessors, Alexander was forced to take action against the Jansenists. Innocent X had condemned the Five Propositions, but then Antoine ARNAULD, the great Jansenist leader, decided that while the Five Propositions were indeed wrong, and one could accept the pope's condemnation of them, they were not to be found in Cornelius JANSEN'S AUGUSTINUS. Alexander countered by a bull in which he said that the Five Propositions were contained in Jansen's Augustinus and condemned Jansen's presentation of them.

Alexander welcomed the illustrious convert, Christina, Queen of Sweden, and gently corrected some of her odd ideas. He encouraged foreign missions allowing the Jesuits in China to utilize Chinese rites, and gave increased power to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61):1–313. A. L. ARTAUD DE MONTOR, The Lives and Times of the Popes, 10 v. (New York 1910–11) 6:71–106. N. J. ABERCROMBIE, The Origins of Jansenism, (Oxford 1936). Bullarium Romanum (Magnum), ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES, 18 folio v. (Rome 1733–62), v.16–17. J. ORCIBAL, Les Origines du jansénisme, 5 v. (Louvain 1947–62). K. REPGEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:318. H. HEMMER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:727–747. R. KRAUTHEIMER, The Rome of Alexander VII (Princeton 1985). E. CROPPER, Florence and Rome from Grand Duke Ferdinand I to Pope Alexander VII (Bologna 1992).

[J. S. BRUSHER]

ALEXANDER VIII, POPE

Oct. 6, 1689, to Feb. 1, 1691; b. Pietro Vito Ottoboni, Venice, April 22, 1610. Descendant of a noble Venetian family; his father Marco was chancellor of Venice. Pietro showed brilliance in his studies and at 17 won a doctorate in civil and Canon Law at the University of Padua. In 1630 he went to Rome and was made governor of Terni, Rieti, and Spoleto and auditor of the Rota (1643–42). Innocent X named him cardinal in 1652 and bishop of Brescia in 1654. He returned to Rome in 1664 and, under Innocent XI, he became grand inquisitor of Rome and secretary of the Holy Office. When elected pope in 1689, Alexander was an octogenarian. He used the 18 months of his pontificate to diminish the tensions with France, and in a mood of conciliation brought LOUIS XIV to restore Avignon, seized during the reign of INNOCENT XI, and to renounce the privilege of diplomatic residence. He did not give way, however, on the four articles of the ASSEMBLY OF THE FRENCH CLERGY of 1682 (Gallican Articles). In the bull Inter multiplices, signed Aug. 4, 1690, but promulgated just two days before his death, he declared them null and invalid. His improved relations with France decreased his friendship with Emperor Leopold I, who recalled his ambassador from the Vatican court and refused to receive the papal chargé d'affaires in Vienna. He was interested also in a possible Stuart restoration in England and established a group to study English affairs. His reign was conspicuous for generous aid to Venice in the Turkish wars, for excessive nepotism, and for his patronage of the Vatican Library. He is also remembered for his condemnation of 31 Jansenist propositions (Denzinger 2301–32), certain errors about the so-called philosophical sin (Denzinger 2290–93), and errors about the love of God (Denzinger 2311–13, 15).

Bibliography: H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, A. SCHÖMETZER (32d. ed. Freiburg 1963). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 32:530–560. P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:243–251. X. M. LE BACHELET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1:747–763. G. A. HANOTAUX, Recueil des instructions données aux ambassadeurs et ministres de France, 3 v. (Paris 1888–1913). Bullarium Romanum (Magnum), ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES, 18 folio v. (Rome 1733–62) 20:1–167. L. COGNET, Le Jansenisme (Paris 1961). J. DULUMEAU, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire (London 1977).

[S. V. RAMGE]

ALEXANDER NECKHAM

Augustinian theologian, scientist, and poet (also spelled Neckam; nicknamed Nequam, meaning worthless); b. Sept. 13, 1157, St. Alban's, Herefordshire, England; d. March 31, 1217, Kempsey, Worcestershire. He studied arts at Paris, probably between 1175 and 1182, and taught at Dunstable (c. 1182) and St. Alban's (c. 1183–90). Having studied theology at Oxford between 1190 and 1197, he entered the Order of the Augustinian

Canons about 1200. He acted as papal judge delegate (1203 and 1205), and became abbot of Cirencester in 1213. His works include De nominibus utensilium; Novus Aesopus and Novus Avianus; Super Marcianum de nuptiliis Mercurii et Philosophiae; Repertorium vocabulorum Bibliae; De naturis rerum libri duo (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 34:1–354); Commentarius in Ecclesiastem (cf. Stegmüller 2:1172); Commentarius in Canticum; Corrogationes novi Promethei, or Summa super Bibliam; De laudibus divinae sapientiae (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 34:357–503); Glossae in Psalterium; Commentarius in Parabolas Salomonis; Speculum speculationum; Quaestiones de rebus theologicis; Sacerdos ad altare; as well as some sermons. Alexander, as a typical exponent of encyclopedic learning in medieval England, influenced later English thought, particularly that of the poet, Edmund SPENSER [cf. Studies in Philology 22 (1925) 222–225]. His works display considerable erudition, including knowledge of the natural sciences. His prestige may be judged from the fact that his change of opinion in favor of the celebration of the Virgin Mary's conception [English Historical Review 47 (1932) 260–268] was influential in spreading that feast in England [cf. Franziskanische Studien 39 (1957) 115, 179].

Bibliography: F. M. POWICKE, "Alexander of S. Albans," Essays in History Presented to Reginald Lane Poole (London 1927) 246–260. H. KANTOROWICZ, "A Medieval Grammarian on the Sources of Law," Tijdschrift voor rechtsgeschiedenis 15 (1937) 25–47. P. W. DAMON, "A Note on the Neckham Canon," Speculum 32 (1957) 99–102. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi 2:1158–72. Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 1:308. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 2:1342–43.

[A. EMMEN]

ALEXANDER NEVILLE

Archbishop of York, bishop of Saint Andrews; b. c. 1332; d. May 16, 1392. Having studied at Oxford by 1348–49, he was a master of arts by 1357 and a scholar of civil law by 1361. He became master of the hospital of St. Thomas the Martyr at Bolter-in-Allendale, Northumbria, that year, and he was made archbishop of YORK in 1374. A clerk of King Edward III by 1361, he was a royal curialist from 1386 when he became a member of Parliament's continual council under King Richard II. As such he was involved in the crisis of 1387–88 that issued in the Merciless Parliament of 1388. Neville supported the king; hence the chronicler Knighton described him as one of the nephandi seductores regis. A bitter opponent of the chief Lord Appellant, Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, he was four times appealed of high treason: at a preliminary meeting of the Appellants at Waltham Cross on Nov. 14, 1387; before Richard at Westminster on Nov. 17, 1387; before Richard in the Tower of London on Dec. 28 or 29, 1387; in Parliament on Feb. 3, 1388. He was found guilty of treason and his property and temporalities were declared forfeit. Neville's life was spared, but Pope Urban VI translated him from the archbishopric of York to the Diocese of Saint Andrews, Scotland, at the Appellants' request (bull of translation, April 30, 1388). But since Scotland did not recognize Pope Urban (see WESTERN SCHISM), Neville sought refuge in Louvain. He is buried in the church of the Carmelites, Louvain, Belgium.

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 14:243–244. T. F. TOUT, Chapters in the Administrative History of Mediaeval England, 6 v. (New York 1920–33). A. B. STEEL, Richard II (Cambridge, Eng. 1941; repr. 1963). M. MCKISACK, The Fourteenth Century (Oxford 1959).

[V. MUDROCH]

ALEXANDER NEVSKI

Grand Duke of Vladimir and Kiev, 1252 to Nov. 19, 1263; b. May 30, 1220. The son of Grand Duke Yaroslav II, Alexander proved to be the most outstanding of the Russian princes at the beginning of the Mongol domination of Russia. His father made him Prince of Novgorod in 1228, and from there Alexander witnessed the conquest of Russia by the Mongol armies of Batu Khan (1237–42). The mongol invasion completely destroyed the southern part of Russia (Kiev and Chernigov) and a great part of east Russia (Riazan); but northern Russia, centered around Novgorod, was protected by swamps and woodland and fared better, becoming the pivot of consolidation for whatever survived the Mongol disaster. On the western borders of Novgorod Alexander was eminently successful in repulsing the attacks of Swedes, Lithuanians, and the Livonian Knights—it was his victory over the Swedes on the Neva River that gained him the surname Nevski (of the Neva). Recognizing, however, the hopelessness of any open resistance to the overwhelming power of the MONGOLS, Alexander remained a loyal vassal of the Mongol Empire, and discouraged all insubordination and rebellion; he was thus able to reduce further Mongol ravages and to protect his people. He journeyed to the court of the Great Khan in Mongolia and to the Golden Horde, settling disputes and pleading the cause of his country. In 1252 the Great Khan appointed him Grand Duke of Vladimir and Kiev and thus the senior Russian Prince. He is venerated as a saint in the Russian Church.

Feast: Nov. 23 and Aug. 30.

Bibliography: V. O. KLÛCHEVSKIÏ, A History of Russia, tr. C. J. HOGARTH, 5 v. (New York 1911–31) v.1. A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:261–262. N. DE BAUMGARTEN, “Généalogies des branches régnantes des Rurikides du XIII^e au XVI^e siècle,” Orientalia Christiana 35 (1934) 5–150.

[O. P. SHERBOWITZ–WETZOR]

ALEXANDER OF ABONOTEICHOS

Founder and prophet of a pagan oracle and mystery cult in Paphlagonia, Asia Minor, c. A.D. 105–175. Except for a few coins of Lucius Verus and Marcus Aurelius, and inscriptions attesting the fact of his existence, our knowledge of him comes from a bitterly antagonistic biography by Lucian of Samosata called Alexander the False Prophet. The Alexander ambiguously mentioned by Athenagoras in his Embassy for the Christians (Ancient Christian Writers, ed. J. H. Crehan, 23:65–66, 157) may be the same man, although the identity is disputed. As a youth he consorted with a healer who was a disciple of the philosopher Apollonius of Tyana. Later he conspired with a charlatan named Cocconas to found an oracle and begin a cult.

At Chalcedon Alexander invented several prophecies to the effect that the god Asclepius or Aesculapius, the son of Apollo, would become incarnate at Abonoteichos and that Alexander would be his prophet. He then arranged a spectacular “birth” of the god, whom he called Glycon, in the form of a snake emerging from a goose egg. Using a tame serpent, a network of spies and helpers, and an ingenious method of opening sealed scrolls with heated needles, he began to issue oracles in return for payment (a drachma and two obols).

The renown of Glycon and Alexander spread through Asia Minor and reached Rome, where the influential Rutilianus became an ardent follower and was inveigled into marriage with Alexander’s daughter “by the goddess Selene.” With the oracle firmly established, Alexander introduced an annual three day celebration of some of the classical mystery themes and some invented by the prophet himself. His chief opponents apparently were the Epicureans, whom he fought through oracles and through the influence of his followers. By his own orders, Epicureans, Christians, and atheists were rigidly banned from attending the mysteries or consulting Glycon. The cult of Glycon was not confined to healing, but was more properly a form of worship and an imitation of the great oracles of the ancient world.

After amassing wealth, Alexander died of an infection when he was nearly 70. The cult outlasted him by at least a century, as 3rd century coins of the region show.

Bibliography: LUCIAN, Alexander the False Prophet, ed. and tr. A. M. HARMON [Loeb Classical Library, (London–New York–Cambridge, Mass. 1912—) 4] 173–253. S. DILL, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 1:306. K. PRÜMM, Religionsgeschichtliches Handbuch für den Raum der altchristlichen Umwelt (2d ed. Rome 1954) 460–62. J. LEIPOLDT, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)—] 1:260–261.

[G. W. MAC RAE]

ALEXANDER OF COMANA, ST.

Also called Alexander Carbonarius (“the charcoal burner”); first bishop of Comana in Pontus; martyred c. 275. According to GREGORY OF NYSSA (Patrologia Graeca 46:933–940), St. GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, when invited to organize a Christian community and preside over the election of a bishop in Comana, rejected all the proposed candidates, pointing out that the apostles had been poor and ordinary men. Someone proposed Alexander, and Gregory questioned him to discover that beneath the grime of his trade he was an educated man of good birth, who had given up his possessions to follow Christ. Alexander was consecrated. Later, he was burned to death, probably under Aurelian (270–275). As the patron of charcoal burners, he was first inserted into the Roman martyrology by BARONIUS.

Feast: Aug. 11.

Bibliography: G. EL DAROV, Bibliotheca sanctorum 1:776–777.

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

ALEXANDER OF FIESOLE, ST.

Bishop and martyr; b. Fiesole?, Tuscany, Italy; d. near Bologna, c. 833–841. Having been consecrated in Rome, he succeeded to the episcopacy of his native city. In that office he was remarkable for all the pastoral virtues. He persuaded the Emperor LOTHAIR I to restore certain properties of which the Church had been despoiled. As Alexander was returning from this successful mission, he was attacked by those who had been forced to surrender their ill-gotten possessions. In the encounter he was drowned in the River Reno. His relics were brought to Fiesole where he quickly became one of the principal patrons.

Feast: June 6.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:738–740. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:278. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 6:105. G. RASPINI, Bibliotheca sanctorum 1:781–782.

[J. E. LYNCH]

ALEXANDER OF HALES

English Franciscan theologian known by the scholastic titles of Doctor irrefragabilis and Doctor doctorum; b. Hales Owen, Shropshire, c. 1185; d. Paris, Aug. 21, 1245.

Life. Born of a wealthy agrarian family, he studied arts at the University of Paris, where he became a master before 1210. About 1210 he began to study theology and became regent master c. 1220–22. He retained his professorship until 1241, when he relinquished it to JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE. As a theologian he acquired a considerable reputation. Early in his teaching career as regent master in theology he replaced the custom of lecturing on the Bible with lectures on the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD. Because of this unprecedented procedure, ROGER BACON, who originally had the highest admiration for him, mentioned Alexander's innovation as one of the causes for the decline of theology. In fact, however, Alexander's emphasis on speculative theology, use of philosophy, and study of the Fathers initiated the golden age of medieval scholasticism (see SCHOLASTICISM). Later this custom was reserved for bachelors in theology. Between 1226 and 1229 he became a canon of St. Paul's in London with the prebend of Holborn, even though he remained in Paris. He played an important part in the struggle between university and crown; the reorganization of the university effected by the bull Parens scientiarum of GREGORY IX, April 13, 1231, was partly the work of Alexander. Toward the end of 1231 and the beginning of 1232 he was in England, where contemporary documents record him as canon of Lichfield and archdeacon of Coventry. From August 1235 until February 1236 he helped to negotiate peace between France and England. At the beginning of the academic year 1236–37, Alexander, already more than 50 years of age, disposed of his wealth and entered the Franciscan Order, thereby securing a chair in the university for the order. Among his outstanding Franciscan disciples were John of La Rochelle, Odo Rigaldus, and St. BONAVENTURE. As a Franciscan master he participated in the general chapter at Rome, collaborated on the first exposition of the Rule (1241–42), and was probably dean of regent masters. He took an active part in censuring doctrines of the Dominican Étienne de Venizy (1241) and of the secular John Pagus (1244). Attending the Council of Lyons in 1244, he and ROBERT GROSSETESTE were part of a commission charged with examining documents preparatory to canonizing St. ED-MUND OF ABINGDON. His sudden death was mourned throughout Paris. The solemn funeral rites, held on Aug. 25, 1245, were presided over by ODO OF CHÂTEAUXROUX, papal legate to France. The poet John of Garland sang his praises (Histoire littéraire de la France 21:372).

Works. Five major writings can be ascribed to him with certainty. (1) Exoticon, a youthful work about difficult words, is attributed to him in Cambridge, Glanville, and Caius College MS 136. (2) Glossa in 4 libros sententiarum, apparently a reportatio that was discovered in 1946, is a lectio cursoria, midway between a literal commentary and a fully developed series of questions on the text of Peter Lombard. (3) Quaestiones disputatae 'antequam esset frater,' including 68 questions of various length, were written between 1220 and 1236. They touch almost the whole domain of theology and demonstrate convincingly the author's propensity for speculative theology. (4) Quaestiones quodlibetales, of which four are known to be extant. (5) The Summa theologica, sometimes known as the Summa pseudo-Alexandri, must be discussed in terms of the Summa left incomplete by Alexander in 1245 and the expanded version issued in 1260 and published at Quaracchi. Of the present version only the following seem to have been in the original Summa fratris Alexandri: bk. 1, all except perhaps q. 74, De missione visibili; bk. 2, all except the tracts De corpore humano and De coniuncto; bk. 3, fragments. The work is called Summa fratris Alexandri in the manuscript tradition and in the bull De fontibus paradisi of Alexander IV, Oct. 7, 1255. The bull ordered that the Summa be completed by the Franciscans. WILLIAM OF MELITONA (Middleton) and his collaborators worked until 1260 without completing it. They utilized Alexander's Glossa and Quaestiones disputatae and incorporated many parts of their own writings, as well as those of Prevostino, or Praepostinus (c. 1145–1210); WILLIAM OF AUXERRE; and PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR. The final version of the Summa was imposed on the Franciscan school by two ministers general, Guiral Ot in 1331 and Leonard of Gaffoni in 1373. Alexander collaborated with John of La Rochelle, Robert of La Bassée and Odo Rigaldus in the Expositio super regulam of 1241–42. Although numerous biblical commentaries have been attributed to him (F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi 1117–57), only a Postillae super quatuor Evangelia and a Commentarius super Psalmos are generally accepted as his; but this question needs to be further investigated. Three Sermones can also be attributed to him with some certainty.

Thought. Although Alexander quoted freely from almost all the works of ARISTOTLE, including the pseudo-Aristotelian De causis, and had access to the full text of these works, he had no clear idea of the true meaning of Aristotelian philosophy. In his writings he adapted fragmentary texts of Aristotle to the teaching of St. AUGUSTINE. His work belongs to a period when no collective theological effort had been made to assimilate the newly discovered Aristotelian world. His main theological authorities were Augustine, PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, BOETHIUS, and many 11th- and 12th-century theologians, notably St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, and the pseudo-hermetic Liber 24 philosophorum.

His psychological notions, introduced when he was discussing the image of God in man, are strictly Augustinian or are inspired by the pseudo-Augustinian De spiritu et anima. Against William of Auxerre, Alexander maintains that the powers of the soul are not distinct from the substance, but only from the essence. Since essence is that by which the soul is what it is, its powers are not what makes the soul to be what it is; on the other hand, since substance is what makes a thing subsist in its indivisible unity, the soul cannot be complete without its powers or faculties (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). This position was characteristic of the Franciscan school until the time of DUNS SCOTUS. Alexander followed Augustine in his discussion of the problem of evil and in his notion of wisdom. The Summa theologica of 1260 remarkably illustrates what may be called the spirit of the 13th-century Franciscan school of theology at the University of Paris.

Bibliography: "Alexander of Hales," The History of Franciscan Theology, ed. K. OSBORNE (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1994), 1–38. V. DOUCET, "A New Source of the Summa fratris Alexandri: The Commentary on the Sentences of Alexander of Hales," Franciscan Studies 6 (1946) 403–417; ALEXANDER OF HALES, "Prolegomena," Summa Theologica, v.4. (Quaracchi-Florence 1948).

[A. EMMEN]

ALEXANDER OF JERUSALEM, ST.

Bishop and martyr; d. Caesarea, Palestine, 250–251. One of the great bishops of the early Church, he was trained in Alexandria, where he was a pupil of Pantaenus (d. c. 200) and CLEMENT of Alexandria and where he became the friend of ORIGEN. After becoming bishop of an unknown see in Cappadocia c. 200, he was imprisoned c. 204 during the persecution of Septimius Severus (d. 211) and not released until 211. In the following year he was made coadjutor and later successor of the aged Narcissus (d. 222), Bishop of Jerusalem, both unusual proceedings at that early date. At Jerusalem he founded the library later used by EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA in preparing his great history of the early Church. When Origen was condemned by the bishop of Alexandria, Alexander invited him to Jerusalem, ordained him, and put him in charge of the teaching of Scripture and theology in the diocese. Alexander died in prison at Caesarea during the persecution of Decius (d. 251).

Feast: March 18 and Jan. 30.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Historia ecclesiastica 6.8, 11, 14, 19, 39, 46. G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:763–764.

[J. L. GRASSI]

ALEXANDER, PATRIARCH OF ALEXANDRIA, ST.

Patriarchate, 312 to April 328, during which the controversy over ARIANISM erupted; b. c. 250; d. Alexandria, April 18, 328. He served prominently under bishops Peter and Achillas and was probably rector of the famous school of Alexandria. In 312 he was elected to succeed Achillas: PHILOSTORGIUS affirmed that ARIUS supported the candidacy of Alexander; Epiphanius of Constantia blamed Arius's frustrated ambition for the subsequent enmity. Alexander gave Arius charge of the important parish of Baucalis. He first encountered opposition from Meletius of Lycopolis, whose rigoristic attitude toward the lapsed had led him into schism against the former bishop, Peter. Alexander had difficulty also with the priest Kolluthus, who had usurped the power to ordain priests and deacons.

In about 318 he received complaints concerning the teachings of Arius, who denied the true divinity of Christ. Alexander first called a conference of the local clergy, and Arius was asked to explain his views. When discussion and persuasion failed to convince him of his errors, Alexander convened a synod of all Egyptian bishops, which condemned and excommunicated Arius. There followed a period of feverish activity on both sides. Arius went to Palestine and Bithynia, where he received support from both Bishop EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA and Bishop EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA, who wrote to many fellow bishops in Arius's favor. To counteract this propaganda, Alexander circulated numerous letters to expose the erroneous doctrine of Arius and to defend his own course of action. In these he showed himself an adherent of moderate Origenism and insisted especially on the natural, eternal generation of the Son and on His perfect likeness to the Father.

After conquering the East in 324, Constantine I intervened in the conflict and sent HOSIUS OF CORDOBA, his ecclesiastical adviser, to Egypt with a letter for Alexander and Arius, exhorting them to make peace. On Hosius's arrival, Alexander informed him of the true issue at stake and gained a powerful ally. Another Egyptian synod was called; when it failed to bring Arius to submission both prelates suggested holding a general council. At Nicaea I (325), Alexander was among the leaders of the orthodox party and may have had a hand in the inclusion of the term homoousios in the NICENE CREED.

After the Council, Alexander met with continued opposition from the Meletians, although they had been treated leniently by the decisions of Nicaea. He designated ATHANASIUS as his successor. Alexander is venerated as a saint in the Coptic Church. Epiphanius mentions a collection of 70 letters of Alexander, but only two, dealing with the Arian crisis, have survived. A sermon on the soul and body, and one on the Passion of Christ, and fragments of others are also preserved in Coptic and Syriac translations.

Feast: Feb. 26.

Bibliography: H. G. OPITZ, ed., Athanasius' Werke, v. 3.1 (Berlin 1934) 6–11; 19–29, works. X. LE BACHELET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:764–766. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:182–183. J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960) 224–225. J. QUASTEN, Patrologie (Westminster, MD 1950) 3:13–19. V. C. DE CLERCQ, Ossius of Cordova (Washington 1954) 189–206. J. R. PALANQUE et al., The Church in the Christian Roman Empire, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 2 v. in 1 (New York 1953) 1:73–109.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

ALEXANDRE, NOËL

Theologian, historian, (also known erroneously as Alexander Natalis); b. Rouen, Jan. 19, 1639; d. Paris, Aug. 21, 1724. In 1654 Alexandre entered the Dominican Order at Saint-Jacques in Rouen. He undertook his ecclesiastical studies in 1656 at Paris, received the baccalaureate in 1668 and the licentiate in 1674, (he was also awarded a Dominican master of theology in 1674), and was received doctor of theology of the faculty of Theology of Paris (Feb. 21, 1675).

After taking his academic degrees, he taught philosophy and theology for the Paris province of his Order, was regent of studies for his own and other provinces (1673–?), and was provincial of his province (1706–10). He tutored J. N. Colbert, son of the minister of Louis XIV.

In 1675, when Jean de Launoy, also of the Parisian faculty of theology equated the payment of ANNATES with SIMONY and questioned the Aquinian authorship of the Summa Theologiae, Alexander defended the payment of annates and vindicated the authorship of Aquinas in the work, Summa S. Thomae vindicata. He also wrote his Dissertatio polemica de confessione (1678) and the Dissertationum ecclesiasticarum trias, which included his thoughts on episcopal supremacy over priests, clerical celibacy, and the Vulgate (1678).

Alexandre's success as a lecturer in history prompted him to compose his great historical work Selecta historiae capita et in loca ejusdem insignia dissertationes historicae, chronologicae, criticae, dogmaticae (1676–86). Volumes covering the Church's first ten centuries were highly praised, but those dealing with the 11th and 12th centuries aroused indignation in Rome because of their Gallican tinge. In 1684 Innocent XI condemned the entire work as well as the Summa . . . vindicata, the Trias, and Alexander's polemical dissertation on confession. The penalty of excommunication was threatened for reading, retaining, or printing these works. A second prohibition came in 1685 with the condemnation of the volumes of the Selecta historiae capita devoted to the 13th and 14th centuries. The Dominican Master General Monroy deprived Alexander of all his privileges, but the French government interceded for him in Rome. Nevertheless, in 1687 a third prohibition censured the volumes of the history dealing with the 15th and 16th centuries. Benedict XIII withdrew the prohibition of Alexander's works (1724) and Benedict XIV removed the excommunication on the use of all editions (1754); yet the books remained on the Index, except the edition of the Selecta . . . capita of July 8, 1754, with notes and animadversions by Roncaglia (Hänggi, 161).

In 1686, Alexander turned to theology, writing his Theologia dogmatica et moralis secundum ordinem Catechismi Tridentini (1693), his last major work. It was intended not only for the theologians, but also for parish priests, confessors, and preachers. In its preface, he indicated a desire for reconciliation with Rome. He published many short treatises (mostly in French), engaged in polemics with the Jesuits, especially Gabriel Daniel, on PROBABILISM, LAXISM, and MOLINISM. The controversy was eventually stopped by the king. Alexander also entered the CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY: his Apologie des Dominicains missionnaires de la Chine (1699) was followed by Conformité des cérémonies chinoises avec l'idolatrie grecque et romaine (1700).

In 1701, he dedicated himself to providing guideposts for preachers, writing a literal and moral commentary on the New Testament (1703–10). In 1701 he became suspected of Jansenism by signing the Cas de Conscience, maintaining that absolution could be given to a cleric who declared that he held on certain points the sentiments of "those called Jansenists," especially that of respectful silence on the question of fact (see JANSEN-ISM). He later wrote letters of explanation and made a retraction.

His third conflict with Rome arose over the bull Unigenitus (1714), not because he was a Jansenist, but because, with Archbishop Noailles, he thought some of Quesnel's condemned propositions were representative of Thomistic thought; he considered the bull not the work of the pope, but of the Molinists. Alexander's name was included in the list of "Appellants" to the next general council.

In his last years, blind and worn out, he lived at Saint-Jacques, Paris. On the feast day of St. Dominic in 1724, he renounced his appellancy, less than a month before he died at peace with the Church.

Bibliography: A. HÄNGGI, Der Kirchenhistoriker Natalis Alexander (1639–1724) (Fribourg 1955). J. M. GRES-GAYER, Théologie et pouvoir en Sorbonne (Paris 1991). D. A. MORTIER, Histoire des Maîtres Généraux de l'Ordre des Frères Prêcheurs, 8 v. (Paris 1903–20). J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 2.2:810–813.

[J. A. DOSHNER/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

ALEXANDRIA

Greek, Ἀλεξάνδρεια; Latin, Alexandria. "The Paris of the ancient Mediterranean world," it was founded by Alexander the Great in 331 B.C. and became an important commercial, industrial, and cultural center and the chief city of Egypt.

Greek Learning. The museum and library founded by Ptolemy I c. 280 B.C., providing for 100 research scholars in the humanities and sciences, made the city one of the most influential centers of Greek learning. A flourishing Jewish colony produced the important scholar PHILO JUDAEUS and made Jewish doctrine available to Gentiles and to Jews ignorant of Hebrew through the translation of the Old Testament into Greek, known as the Septuagint, which was completed in the 2d century B.C. Thus Alexandria was to some extent prepared for the arrival of Christian teaching, which, according to tradition, was brought there by Saint Mark, who was buried in the city. Apollos, one of Saint Paul's collaborators, was a Jew of Alexandria (Acts of the Apostles 18.24), and Paul on the voyage to Rome could talk with the sailors on two Alexandrian ships (Acts of the Apostles 27.6; 28.11). The Gnostic teachers BASILIDES, Isidorus, and CARPOCRATES found followers at Alexandria.

A landmark in the local Christian history was the founding of a Christian school of philosophy by PANTAENUS (late 2d century). Under its famous directors CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (d. c. 215) and ORIGEN

(185–254), the school became an influential center of Christian scholarship. Alexandria was still a center of Greek learning, and Ammonius Saccas (c. 175–242), the founder of Neoplatonism, lectured there. In this setting one of Clement's important achievements was to show that Greek learning could be put to the service of Christianity. Origen after a distinguished career was obliged to leave for Palestine over the question of his qualifications to be a teacher and a priest, and an Alexandrian council of 231 supported his bishop's disapproval of his activities.

Alexandrian Christians suffered persecution under Septimius Severus (202 and after), attacks from the pagans of the city under Philip (249), and persecution again under Decius (250), Valerian (257–62), Diocletian (304–05), and Maximinus Daia (310–12). The MELETIAN schism arose when Meletius, Bishop of Lycopolis, performed ordinations in Alexandria although it was not his diocese. He was condemned at a council at Alexandria in 306.

Heresies. Much of the ecclesiastical history of Alexandria was concerned with the conflicts caused by the heresies of ARIANISM, NESTORIANISM, EUTYCHIANISM, and MONOPHYSITISM. Arius, a parish priest of the city, began his heretical teaching about 319, and after disputes with ALEXANDER, PATRIARCH OF ALEXANDRIA, he was excommunicated by a local synod (321) and left the city. The opposition to Arianism was vigorously led by (Saint) ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, who, succeeding Alexander, served as bishop from 328 to 373, with several intervals when he was driven into exile or had to flee for safety. A council was called in 362 to deliberate on the divinity of the Holy Spirit, and two councils in 363 and 364 formulated definitions of the faith addressed to the Emperor Jovian. An anti-Arian council met in 370. Bishop THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA (385–412) led a campaign against paganism that included the destruction (389) of the temple of Serapis, one of the most venerated pagan shrines. In 415 Hypatia, a noted pagan teacher of classical philosophy, was killed by a Christian mob. SYNESIUS OF CYRENE, later bishop of Ptolemais (c. 410–c. 414), was one of her pupils before his conversion to Christianity.

The next important chapter in Alexandrian Church history was the patriarchate of Saint Cyril (412–444), who led the fight against Nestorianism. Nestorius's teaching was rejected by a council at Alexandria in 430, and Cyril presided at the Council of Ephesus (431), where Nestorianism was condemned. This condemnation caused a breach between Antioch and Alexandria, which was healed on the basis of a council at Antioch (432).

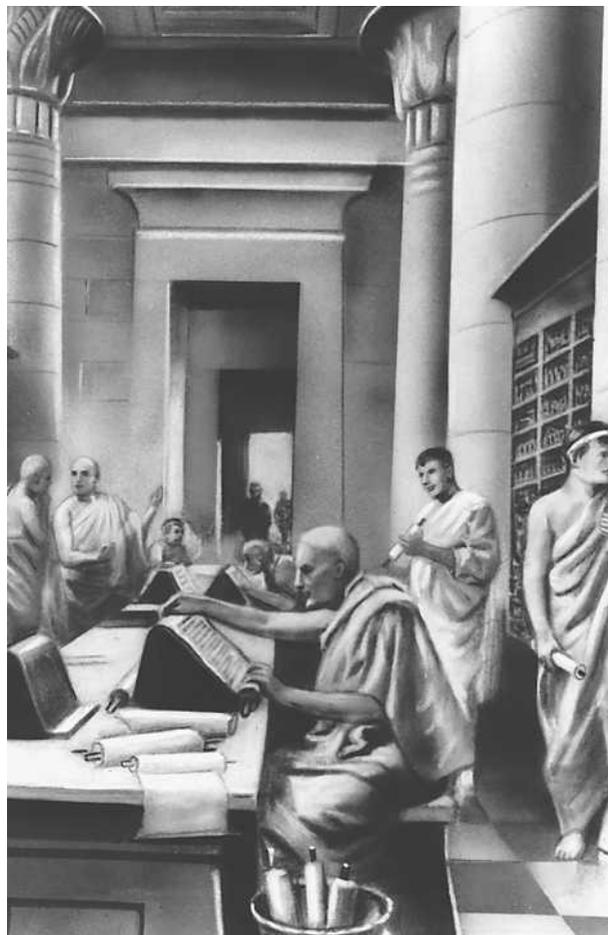

Out of the controversy over Nestorianism grew the heretical doctrine of Eutyches concerning the nature of Christ (448), which was the real beginning of the Monophysite heresy. At the Council of Chalcedon (451) DIOSCORUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, was deposed for his support of Eutyches, and his condemnation was followed by rioting and bloodshed in Alexandria. The Monophysite teaching found strong support in Alexandria and the rest of Egypt, as it did in Syria. To the ancient ecclesiastical rivalry between the sees of Alexandria and Constantinople was added the theological antagonism of the Egyptians to the orthodox leaders who represented the Byzantine imperial government and were dispatched from Constantinople to impose official orthodoxy on the Alexandrian Church. Further friction arose out of the racial aversion of Upper Egypt to the Greek culture of Alexandria and out of the ancient nationalistic sentiment of the Egyptian people, who had long been subjected to foreign domination. There were protracted disorders in Alexandria, and the anti-Byzantine kept control of the local Church by violent means, especially under the Coptic Patriarchs Timothy “the Cat” (457–77) and Peter “the Stammerer” (477–90). The Orthodox Emperor Justinian (527–565), intent on restoring peace in the empire, supported the Orthodox patriarch in Alexandria by force, and the orthodox patriarchs had to be protected by imperial troops. The result of this prolonged experience was that Egypt, like Jacobite Syria, developed well-recognized separatist tendencies; and when the Arabs invaded Egypt (648), they were welcomed as prospectively less oppressive than the hated Byzantine emperor.

A celebrated figure in the Church at Alexandria at this time was the Patriarch (Saint) JOHN THE ALMSGIVER, noted for the simplicity of his personal life and for his extensive charities, which he supported from the profits of the patriarchate’s properties and commercial activities, notably, the cargo fleet owned by the Church.

The final years of the local Church before the Arab conquest were troubled by the heresy of MONOTHELITISM, which recognized the existence of only one will in Christ. A Monothelite council was held in the city in 633. In 828 some Venetian merchants, visiting Alexandria, secretly carried off the body of St. Mark to Venice.

Theological School. The museum and library had attracted leading classical scholars, and the Christian theologians of Alexandria were naturally influenced by the local pagan scholarly tradition. Philo Judaeus (d. c. A.D. 50) conceived an effort to harmonize Greek philosophy and the Old Testament with a philosophical mysticism that strongly influenced Alexandrian theology. His method of allegorical exegesis of the Bible spread to Christian theological schools elsewhere. Christian thought in Alexandria was strongly influenced also by the Platonic tradition. Clement, Origen, and their colleagues adapted the Library at Alexandria, Egypt. (©The Bettmann Archive)

Platonic tradition and the allegorical method to Christian thought. The contribution of Alexandria to the development of systematic theology was also important; Origen’s De principiis was the first systematic exposition of Christian doctrine. Alexandrian thought differed from Antiochene theology, which was Aristotelian, pragmatic, and critical. Similarly, Biblical exegesis at Alexandria was allegorical and mystical, while that at Antioch was historical and literal. Platonic dualism was reflected in the emphasis upon the transcendence of God and the divinity of Christ in Alexandrian teaching. This was the basis of Alexandrian controversies with ANTIOCH, where the humanity of Christ was stressed. Thus Athanasius was the Alexandrian champion of orthodoxy against the Arian teaching, favored at Antioch, that the Son of God was a creature. The same perspective was the basis of the opposition of Cyril to the doctrine of Nestorius of Antioch that there were separate divine and human persons in Christ. The extreme form of the Alexandrian tendency resulted in Monophysitism, which maintained that there was only one, divine, nature in Christ. One of the distinguished Alalexandrian scholars of the early 5th century was JOHN PHILOPONUS, typical of his time in working simultaneously as theologian, commentator on Aristotle, and grammarian.

Art and Archeology. Hellenistic Alexandria, with its wealthy and cultivated atmosphere, developed a distinctive artistic style of its own that reflected the sophisticated and cosmopolitan character of the city. The artistic tradition of classical Greece served as the basis for the new Alexandrian manner, but the Alexandrian artists, with a realism unknown in classical Greece, sought to emphasize the individuality of their subjects.

When Christian art appeared in Alexandria, the Christian artists naturally worked in the local style. The earliest preserved Christian monuments in the city are the frescoes in the catacomb of Karmuz, painted in a characteristic style that was carried to Rome and used in the catacombs there. In Egypt and Italy in the early centuries Christ was portrayed as a youthful Hermes, with short curly hair; the bearded oriental type emerged later in Syria and Palestine. The illustrated Christian Topography of Cosmas Indicopleustes is a typical example of Alexandrian theology and art of the 6th century. The Christian artists of Alexandria, like their pagan predecessors, produced elegant textiles, glass, gold and silver work, and ivory carving, which they exported throughout the ancient world. There was always opposition between the Hellenic artistic tradition of Alexandria itself and the indigenous COPTIC ART of the rest of Egypt, which represented a totally different artistic tradition.

Bibliography: H. A. MUSURILLO, ed., The Acts of the Pagan Martyrs: Acta Alexandrinorum (London 1954). C. BIGG, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria (2d ed. London 1913). R. B. TOLLINGTON, Alexandrine Teaching on the Universe (New York 1932). E. MOLLAND, The Conception of the Gospel in the Alexandrian Theology (Oslo 1938). R. V. SELLERS, Two Ancient Christologies (London 1940). E. R. HARDY, Christian Egypt: Church and People (London 1952). J. MASPERO, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie (Paris 1923). C. R. MOREY, Early Christian Art (2d ed. Princeton 1953). E. A. PARSONS, The Alexandrian Library (New York 1952). G. DOWNEY, "Coptic Culture in the Byzantine World," Greek and Byzantine Studies 1.2 (1958) 119–35. H. I. BELL, Cults and Creeds in Graeco-Roman Egypt (Liverpool 1953).

[G. DOWNEY/EDS.]

ALEXANDRIA, DIOCESE OF

(Alexandrinensis) suffragan of the metropolitan See of New Orleans, was originally established as the Diocese of Natchitoches by Pius IX on July 29, 1853, and at the time covered the parishes (counties) in the northern tier of Louisiana. The see city was transferred to Alexandria, Aug. 6, 1910, and in 1977 it was redesignated as the diocese of Alexandria-Shreveport. When Shreveport became a diocese in 1986, it was again designated as the Diocese of Alexandria.

Missionary Activity. Catholic missionary work in the territory dates from 1682, when the Franciscan Zenobius Membre, chaplain to R. LA SALLE's expedition down the Mississippi River, stopped at the village of the Tensas native tribe, near present-day Newellton, La. The next missionaries in Northern Louisiana were priests from the Seminary of Quebec, Canada, who arrived in the Lower Mississippi Valley in 1699. Francis de Montigny, their superior, took up residence among the Tensas, and in the vicinity of Newellton built what was probably the first chapel within the future Diocese of Alexandria. The oldest town in the diocese and in the entire state originated in 1716 when J. B. le Moyne de Bienville sent a military force to establish Fort St. John the Baptist on an island in the Red River. The settlement became known as "Le Poste de Natchitoches."

In 1853 when Louisiana's second diocese was created from the Archdiocese of NEW ORLEANS with Natchitoches as its see city, Auguste Marie Martin was named first bishop. At that time the diocese, covering three-fifths of the state, had five priests, six parish churches, about three mission chapels, one school, and 22,000 Catholics. Martin died Sept. 29, 1875, and was succeeded by Francis Xavier Leray, who was consecrated April 22, 1877. Two years later he was named coadjutor of New Orleans, but he remained administrator of Natchitoches until 1883 when he became ordinary of New Orleans. His successor was the Bishop Antoine Durier (1885–1904) who in turn was succeeded by Bishop Cornelius Van de Ven (1904–32). In the spring of 1910, Bishop Van de Ven petitioned the Holy See to transfer the see city of the diocese to Alexandria, citing the latter's advantages of better road and railroad communications to all parts of northern Louisiana, and its closer proximity to the large percentage of French Catholics living in the southern part of the diocese.

Bishop Van de Ven's immediate successor was Bishop Daniel F. Desmond (1933–45). Alexandria's next two bishops, Charles P. Greco (1946–73) and Lawrence P. Graves (1973–82) both retired because of age. (Bishop Greco died on Jan. 20, 1987; Bishop Graves, Jan. 15, 1994). It was during Bishop Graves' tenure that the diocese was redesignated in 1977 as Alexandria-Shreveport. His successor, the Most Reverend William B. Friend, was bishop of Alexandria-Shreveport until the diocese was divided and he became the first bishop of the new diocese of Shreveport, while the Most Reverend John C. Falvora became the bishop of Alexandria. After the separation, the diocese of Alexandria encompassed 11,116 sq. miles, comprising the civil parishes of Rapides, Avoyelles, Concordia, Catahoula, LaSalle, Grant, Natchitoches, Vernon, Tensas, Caldwell, Winn, Franklin, and Madison. Approximately 12 percent of the population were Catholics, distributed among 48 parishes and 24 missions. When Bishop Favolora was transferred to the diocese of St. Petersburg, Florida in 1989, he was succeeded by Bishop Sam G. Jacobs.

Bibliography: R. BAUDIER, The Catholic Church in Louisiana (New Orleans 1939).

[C. M. CLAYTON/M. G. GUIDRY/EDS.]

ALEXANDRIA, PATRIARCHATE OF

One of the oldest patriarchates to be formed in the early Church. In the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I (381) the patriarch of Alexandria was granted second place of honor after the pope of Rome, and his jurisdiction spread over Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, which at that time possessed more than 100 bishoprics. ALEXANDRIA was a city of capital importance as a civil center and for its extraordinary library and renowned schools of philosophy and theology. Ecclesiastically, it possessed a tightly organized hierarchy that radiated its jurisdiction over thousands of monks in the Egyptian desert who were renowned all over the then Christian world.

Aftermath of the Council of Chalcedon. Its unity split asunder after the Council of Chalcedon (451) condemned the MONOPHYSITISM of Dioscorus. From 457 there existed two parallel churches. The majority of the Christians living in Alexandria followed their patriarch, Dioscorus, thus forming what today is called the indigenous COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH (Oriental Orthodox). Those in the minority who remained faithful to the teachings of Chalcedon formed the Byzantine (MELKITE) Church.

The patriarchal see was disputed between the pro-Chalcedonian and anti-Chalcedonian factions, and from 482 to 538 the latter prevailed. After 538 there was a double patriarchal hierarchy, Byzantine Orthodox (Chalcedonian) and the Coptic Oriental Orthodox (Non-Chalcedonian). The Coptic patriarchs were frequently forced into exile under JUSTINIAN I (527–565), who supported the Byzantine Orthodox. HERACLIUS (610–641) strove to establish MONOTHELITISM as a compromise between strict Monophysitism and Byzantine Orthodoxy to create at least the outer appearance of religious unity.

During the Arab conquest of Egypt, the Coptic patriarch was allowed to exercise his jurisdiction, and through financial and social pressure the number of Byzantine Orthodox was greatly reduced, principally because the Arabs distrusted their loyalty to the Byzantine emperors. The Byzantine patriarchate of Alexandria remained vacant from 652 to 737; and candidates for the episcopacy had to be sent to Tyre for consecration.

At one time, the two churches preserved the same liturgy of Alexandria (see ALEXANDRIAN LITURGY), but gradually the Byzantine liturgical rite was accepted by the Melkites. From 639 to 1811 the Copts were oppressed as much as the Byzantine Orthodox under the domination of the Mussulman caliphs. The year 1811 marks the beginning of contemporary history of Egypt under the Sultan Muḥammad Ali and his successors, who granted religious liberty to all Christians.

Great schism. The close relationship between the orthodox patriarch of Alexandria and the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople caused the Alexandrian patriarchate to rally behind the ecumenical patriarch at the time of the Great Schism of 1054. In 1219 the Latin Crusaders established a Latin patriarch for Alexandria in expectation of their capturing the city, but he was never able to reside there. During the Latin occupation, the orthodox patriarch of Alexandria took up residence in Constantinople, thus increasing his dependence on the Byzantine Church. The Alexandrian patriarch, together with those of Antioch and Jerusalem, sent a representative to the Council of FLORENCE (1439) and through him agreed to enter into communion with the See of Rome. It is difficult to know whether the patriarch of Alexandria repudiated this union with Rome along with the antiochene patriarch in the Synod of Constantinople in 1484. But the Alexandrian Melkites finally severed relations with Rome after the Turkish conquest of Alexandria in 1517. It is probable that a faction favoring communion with Rome always existed and that from time to time one of them held the patriarchal see. But by decision of the Turkish caliph, the patriarch of Constantinople became head of all orthodox subjects in the Ottoman Empire. From this point, the Alexandrian orthodox patriarchate was completely Hellenic.

With the reunion of 1724, a Melkite Greek Catholic patriarchate was established in Antioch. In 1833 Patriarch MAXIMOS III Mazlūm obtained from Pope Gregory XVI the personal privilege (which has been handed down uninterruptedly) of adding the title of patriarch of Alexandria and Jerusalem along with jurisdiction over the Melkite Catholic churches in these areas. From 1895, when a Coptic Catholic patriarchate was established for the Alexandrian patriarchate, until the present there have been four separate patriarchal sees of Alexandria: the Coptic Oriental Orthodox, the Coptic Catholic, the Orthodox, and the Melkite Greek Catholic.

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 v. (rev. ed. Milwaukee, Wis. 1961–62). C. DE CLERCQ, Les Églises unies d'Orient (Paris 1934). R. JANIN, Les Églises Orientales et les Rites Orientaux (Paris 1955). C. KARALEVSKII, Histoire des Patriarcats Melkites, 3 v. in 2 (Rome 1909–10). A. A. KING, The Rites of Eastern Christendom, 2 v. (London 1950). E. R. HARDY, Christian Egypt (New York 1952). W. DE VRIES et al., eds., Rom und die Patriarchate des Ostens (Freiburg 1963). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

ALEXANDRIA, SCHOOL OF

The name for both the catechetical institution and the theological tradition characteristic of Alexandria during the patristic age. Alexandria was one of the most important cultural centers of the ancient world and the focal point for the mutual influence exercised in the conjunction of CHRISTIANITY and Hellenism. Before the introduction of Christianity, Alexandria possessed great libraries in its museum, the Serapeum, and the Sebasteon. It was also the center of Hellenistic Judaism; the Books of Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom were probably produced there before the Christian Era. PHILO JUDAEUS, the great doctor of Hellenistic Judaism, worked there. Hence, it is not astonishing that Alexandria early became a Christian intellectual center.

Catechetical School. The origin of the Christian School of Alexandria is obscure. It is obvious that from the start the bishops of Alexandria used collaborators in preparing the catechumens for Baptism, although none of these is known. In the late second century PANTAENUS, a convert philosopher, is cited as the head of a Christian school in Alexandria (c. 150); and CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA has been considered his successor. These scholars conducted philosophical schools in which they taught the Christian faith as a philosophy (gnosis) or way of life. They do not appear to have had anything to do with the catechetical school as such. This was conducted by the bishop; and the first certain information is supplied in relation to ORIGEN, whom Bishop Demetrius charged with the instruction of catechumens (c. 203). Origen enlisted the aid of Heraclas, who evidently gave basic instruction in the CHRISTIAN WAY OF LIFE while his master concentrated his attention on the formation of a superior school of sacred science (didascaleion) that is generally designated as the School of Alexandria. GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, Origen's student in Caesarea, described the courses taught in the didascaleion—logic, dialectic, and physics (including mathematics and astronomy)—as a propaedeutic to Christian theology. This included the analysis of current philosophies, but principally the exegesis of the Scriptures.

Philip Sidetes, a fifth-century historian, records the names of the so-called heads of the school. He does not mention Pantaenus or Clement, but cites Athenagoras; Origen; Heraclas, who was bishop of Alexandria in 232; Dionysius, bishop in 248; Theognostus (247–282); Pierius; and Peter, bishop from 300. Although it is known that many fourth-century Fathers of the Church, such as JEROME, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, and BASIL OF CAESAREA, studied for a time at Alexandria, the only fourth-century teacher of whom there is positive knowledge is Didymus the Blind.

Theological School. The current of Christian thought represented by a group of scholars and propagandists with similar intellectual interests and a more or less uniform procedure in exegesis of the Scriptures, formed what is generally referred to as the theological School of Alexandria. Its members did not necessarily belong to the catechetical school. The relationship between Athanasius and Cyril of Alexandria and this school, for example, is not known; both Apollinaris and Eutyches represent Alexandrian Christological thought, although Apollinaris originated in Laodicea, near Antioch, and Eutyches was from Constantinople. The School of Alexandria is represented by two distinct phases: Clement and Origen were intent on presenting the Christian religion to the cultivated people of their epoch, Christians and non-Christians alike, and wanted to show them that Christ was the summit of all human knowledge; on the other hand, the authors of the fourth and fifth centuries, such as Athanasius and Cyril, had to defend the Christian truths concerning the Trinity and the divinity of Christ against heretical Christian theologians.

From the start, Alexandrian exegesis distinguished itself from that of Antioch. The latter was generally attached to the literal sense of the Bible. The Alexandrians recognized this sense, but their primary interest was concentrated on the mystery of divine revelation as revealed in the historical and literary details of the Old Testament. It was therefore a question of discovering Christ in the older revelation. With joyful sagacity, the Alexandrian authors sought out in the Old Testament SYMBOLS of the New. Their preference lay in the more profound, mystical, spiritual sense that is still termed typological or allegorical. Philo placed them on the path of this exegesis, which was, however, immediately inspired by a distinctly Christian principle, that of the unity of the two Testaments, such as Christ Himself expressed when He said that it was of Him that Moses and the Prophets had spoken.

In their Trinitarian doctrine, Clement and Origen were influenced by the Platonism of their epoch. They insisted on the divine transcendence. This at times forced them into expressing themselves as if the Son and the Holy Spirit were inferior to the Father. Origen emphasized the distinction of the divine Persons and spoke of three hypostases. Denis the Great did the same, and in so doing was accused of destroying the unity of the divine nature; but the Alexandrian tradition as presented by Athanasius went directly the other way: against Arius, who likewise lived in the Egyptian capital, Athanasius defended the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son, and although he recognized the possible orthodoxy of the formula of the three hypostases, he personally held to the Nicene terminology of the single ousia, or substance, and of the single hypostasis.

In Christology, the Alexandrians were guided by the Fourth Gospel. For them, as for St. John, Christ was, above all, the Word. Their soteriology controlled this conception. For them, Redemption consists essentially in the divinization that Christians are to obtain in Christ. This insistence on the divinity of Christ left the aspect of His humanity somewhat obscure. The Alexandrians generally did not see, for example, the importance of attributing a human soul to Christ. However, this aspect was appreciated by Didymus the Blind who stressed the perfect human consubstantiality of Christ. Cyril defined Christ as one nature of the Word Incarnate. This formula was repeated literally by Eutyches and the MONOPHYTES, and tended to be interpreted by their adversaries as the negation of the human nature in Christ.

Bibliography: R. NELZ, Die theologischen Schulen der morgenländischen Kirchen (Bonn 1916). G. BARDY, Recherches de science religieuse (Paris 1910–) 27 (1937) 65–90; Catholicisme 1:310–314; Vivre et penser 2 (1942) 80–109. A. KNAUBER, Trier theologische Zeitschrift 60 (1951) 243–266. F. PERICOLI RIDOLFINI, Revista degli studi orientali 37 (1962) 211–230. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 2:5–10. J. QUASTEN, Patrology. (Westminster, Maryland 1950–) 2:2–4. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:323–325. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 35. J. DAN-ÉLOU, Origène (Paris 1948). H. DE LUBAC, Origène: Homélie sur l'Exode (Sources Chrétiennes 16; 1947); "'Typologie' et 'allégorisme,'" Recherches de science religieuse 34 (1947) 180–226; 47 (1959) 5–43. J. GUILLET, ibid. 34 (1947) 257–302. W. J. BURG-HARDT, Theological Studies 11 (1950) 78–116. W. GRUBER, Die pneumatische Exegese bei den Alexandrinern (Graz 1957). E. MOLLAND, The Conception of the Gospel in the Alexandrian Theology (Oslo 1938). R. V. SELLERS, Two Ancient Christologies (London 1940).

[A. VAN ROEY]

ALEXANDRIAN LITURGY

The Alexandrian liturgical family, parent of all other Egyptian liturgies, is said to have come from St. Mark the Evangelist. Before the Council of Chalcedon (541), the liturgical rite of Alexandria, Greek-speaking capital of the Egyptian church and cultural center of the Eastern Roman Empire, was the liturgy of St. Mark in Greek. In the aftermath of Chalcedon, the Chalcedonian Christians (Melkites) opted gradually for the Byzantine liturgical rite, while the Non-Chalcedonians (Copts and Ethiopians) modified forms of the Alexandrian liturgy in their own languages, Coptic and Ge'ez. Constantinople's subsequent importance among the Orthodox Christians of the East caused the Byzantine liturgy to intrude upon and finally displace the Alexandrian liturgy among the Melkites. Since the 12th century, the original liturgy of St. Mark in Greek, commonly identified with the original Alexandrian rite, has fallen into disuse. By distilling the layers of Coptic and Byzantine accretions, one can reconstruct an approximation of the original Alexandrian liturgical rite. Earliest known documents include the so-called Strasbourg Papyrus (Gr. 254), a 4th century papyrus containing fragments of what many scholars believe to be the earliest recession of the Anaphora of St. Mark, the Dêr-Balyzeh Papyrus (6th–7th century), and an 11th-century manuscript of the Euchologion of Serapion of Thmuis (d. 362).

Bibliography: A. HÄNGGI and I. PAHL, Præx Eucharistica (Freiburg 1968). R. C. D. JASPER and G. J. CUMING, Prayers of the Eucharist: Early and Reformed, 3rd edition (New York 1987). G. J. CUMING, "Thmuis Revisited: Another Look at the Prayers of Bishop Sarapion," Theological Studies, 41 (1980) 568–575. G. J. CUMING, "The Anaphora of St. Mark: A Study in Development," Le Muséon, 95 (1982) 115–129. B. D. SPINKS, "A Complete Anaphora? A Note on Strasbourg Gr. 254," Heythrop Journal, 25 (1984) 51–55.

[E. E. FINN/EDS.]

ALEXANDRINE BULLS

The name usually given to the papal bulls of Pope Alexander VI (1492–1503) that divided the Americas between the Spanish and Portuguese Crowns, on the condition that they assume the obligation of converting the indigenous people within their territories to Christianity. Portugal began exploring the west coast of Africa in 1418. Spain recognized Portuguese control of the Cape Verde Islands in the Treaty of Alcaçovas (1479), and Portugal acknowledged Spanish ownership of the Canaries. Pope Sixtus IV extended the blessings given Portugal in five earlier bulls and confirmed the treaty (1481). Forced into Lisbon by bad weather while returning from his first voyage, Columbus explained his discoveries to King John II (March 9, 1493). John asserted exclusive rights south of the Canaries and west of Africa in the Atlantic. Before Columbus reached the court at Barcelona, the Spanish sovereigns reported to the new pope, Alexander VI, and a bull of May 3, 1493 confirmed Spanish title to lands newly discovered or to be discovered, provided they had never been in the possession of any Christian prince. Rights previously granted to Portugal were reserved, and the two governments were treated as equals.

First page of the bull "Dudum siquidem" of Pope Alexander VI, in an early 16th-century manuscript awarding Christopher Columbus charter and privileges by King Ferdinand II and Queen Isabella I.

But King Ferdinand V demanded more. A second bull, predated May 3, was more emphatic than the first. A third bull, predated May 4, contained the Line of Demarcation between the spheres of influence of Spain and Portugal. Columbus suggested a line 100 leagues west of the Azores, believing he found there "a great change in the sky, the stars, the air temperature, and in the ocean. . . ." A fourth bull (Sept. 26, 1493) unfairly revoked earlier papal grants that seem to have given Portugal title to lands not in her possession on Christmas Day 1492. Serious diplomatic discussions opened (Aug. 18, 1493) after John began obvious preparations for war. Ferdinand and Isabella wrote to Columbus (Sept. 5) concerning modification of the Demarcation Line. Spain and Portugal agreed on a line 370 leagues west of the Cape Verde Islands, longitude 46° 30' west, in the Treaty of Tordesillas (June 7, 1494).

Earlier bulls, as well as that of 1481, recognized Portugal's exploring efforts, gave papal blessings to the declared intention of Christianizing the indigenous people, and attempted to preserve peace by asking observance of Portugal's commercial laws. The first two bulls of Alexander VI followed these precedents. The idea of the Line of Demarcation was a logical definition of spheres of influence, and not an attempt to divide the world between two nations. The great colonial expansion of Portugal and Spain was carried on with remarkably little friction. It is clear, however, that Ferdinand of Aragon applied pressures to obtain the unreasonable fourth bull. He "used the pope" as other statesmen have done before and since.

At the time the Alexandrine Bulls were issued, it was thought that the islands discovered by Columbus were located along the eastern coast of Asia. Therefore, those documents must be regarded as "pseudo-Asiatic," more than American, and could not really have provided any basis for an exclusive right of sovereignty over the Western Hemisphere on the part of Spain and Portugal. The remote antecedent of the bulls is found in the Donation of Constantine, a famous eighth century forgery, in which that Roman emperor is said to have given the popes, among other privileges, dominion over "the various islands." On this basis, the papal chancery elaborated what is now called by medievalists an "omni-insular doctrine," applied for the first time in 1091 when Urban II gave the Archipelago of Lipari to a local abbot and the island of Corsica to the bishop of Pisa. Afterward, Adrian IV and other popes granted dominion over various islands in European seas to several princes, demanding in exchange the payment of feudal tribute. In some of the final stages of its evolution during the Middle Ages, the collection of Peter's pence was linked to papal sovereignty over islands. Among the areas feudatory to the Holy See were England, Sicily, Sardinia, Cyprus, Castelrosso, the archipelagos of the Tyrrhenian and North African seas, Scandinavia (considered an island by the imperfect geography of the time), and finally, in the fourteenth century, the Canary Islands. The "omni-insular doctrine" was still a part of the public law of Europe when America was discovered.

Bibliography: F. G. DAVENPORT, ed., European Treaties Bearing on the History of the U.S. and Its Dependencies, 4 v. (Washington 1917-37) 1:33-100, texts and Eng. trs. of the treaties and bulls. H. VANDER LINDEN, "Alexander VI and the Demarcation of the Maritime and Colonial Domains of Spain and Portugal," American Historical Review (New York 1896-) 22 (1916-17) 1-20. D. J. HILL, A History of Diplomacy in the International Development of Europe, 3 v. (New York 1905-14). G. ZELLER, Les Temps modernes, 2 v. (Paris 1953-55) v. I. L. WECKMANN, Las bulas alexandrinas de 1493 y la teoría política del Papado medieval (Mexico City 1949).

[L. WECKMANN/J. B. HEFFERNAN/EDS.]

ALEXIAN BROTHERS

The Congregation of Cellites, or Alexian Brothers (CFA), evolved from the needs of the victims of the Black Death of 14th-century Europe. The work of caring for the sick and burying the dead fell to the lot of men and women whose heroic charity overcame a natural fear of infection and death. One such group, founded in Brabant, Belgium, became known as the Poor Brothers, Bread Brothers, or Cellite Brothers. Those living in St. Alexius House at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aachen, Germany) bound themselves by the vows of religion, according to the Rule of St. Augustine. In 1469 the Holy See raised the society to a religious order. They chose St. Alexius, who worked among the poor, as their chief patron and have since been known as the Alexian Brothers.

Despite European wars and political upheavals, the congregation at its peak had several thousand brothers working in Germany, Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, and northern France in establishments that were closely affiliated, but locally independent. At a low point, following the French Revolution, the Alexians were revitalized chiefly through the efforts of the superior of the Aachen house, Brother Dominic Brock, known as the "Pater." In 1854 he and four others renewed their vows, which had become almost meaningless because of government interference. Vocations increased and new institutions for the physically and mentally ill were established. In 1870 Clement Wallrath (Pater Dominic's successor) obtained full papal approval from Pius IX, becoming the first superior general responsible directly to the Holy See. Leo XIII urged the independent Alexian houses to unite under Pater Clement, but few actually did so.

Meanwhile, Brother Bonaventure Thelen, who in 1865 was sent to establish the congregation in the U. S., opened Alexian Brothers Hospital in Chicago, Ill., the following year. During the next few years, the brothers pioneered many medical advances and erected hospitals in St. Louis, Mo., Oshkosh, Wis., and Elizabeth, N.J. Under Brother Aloysius Schyns, they incorporated their school of nursing in Chicago in 1898, the only Catholic school of nursing for male students in the nation. In 1938 a home for retired men and women was opened in Signal Mountain, near Chattanooga, Tenn.; in 1955 the brothers took over the operation of the clinic for Father Edward Flanagan's Boys Home at Boys Town, Nebr.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the Brothers operate medical and healthcare facilities in Germany, Belgium, England, Ireland, and the United States, with missions in the Philippines and India.

Bibliography: Official Catholic Directory #0120; C. J. KAUFFMAN, Tamers of Death: The History of the Alexian Brothers from 1300 to 1789 (New York 1976). C. J. KAUFFMAN, The Ministry of Healing: The History of the Alexian Brothers from 1789 to the Present (New York 1978). W. B. FAHERTY, To Rest In Charity: A History of the Alexian Brothers in Saint Louis (1869–1984) (St. Louis 1984). L. DAVIDSON, The Alexian Brothers in Chicago: An Evolutionary Look at the Monastery and Modern Health Care (New York 1990).

[A. SANFORD/EDS.]

ALEXIUS I COMNENUS, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned: 1081 to 1118; b. 1048, nephew of Emperor Isaac I Comnenus, he inherited the traditions of a military family. Early in his career, he led small Byzantine forces against bands of Turkish marauders who swarmed over Anatolia after Byzantium's defeat at Mantzikert (1071). In April 1081, he usurped the throne, with support from the army, his family (especially his mother, Anna Dalassena), and his wife's relatives, the Doukas family. Subsequently, he alienated state land to his and his wife's relatives, along with titles and incomes; by marriages, he allied other powerful families to the dominant clan. By restoring the currency (1092), he improved the empire's economic situation, but his heavy taxation oppressed the peasantry.

In 1081, he faced Seljuk Turks in Anatolia, Pechenegs from Central Asia on the Danube, and the Norman conqueror of Southern Italy, Robert Guiscard. Since only Robert threatened Constantinople, Alexius made agreements with the Turks and Pechenegs, and enlisted the Venetians against the Norman invasion (1081) of the western Balkans. Only Robert's death (1085) freed the empire from the Norman menace. The Pechenegs were crushed in 1091 with the aid of the Cumans, a rival Asiatic people. The coming of the First Crusade (1096–97) enabled Alexius to regain Nicaea and repel the Turks from the Anatolian coastlands.

The crusaders, who came in part because of Alexius's appeal to the pope, posed severe problems for the empire. The hordes of commoners who followed Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless (1096) were transferred to Anatolia, where the Turks soon decimated them. Most of the nobles, including Bohemund (Guiscard's son) and Godfrey of Bouillon, were induced to pledge fealty to Alexius, who in return promised military support to them. Because Alexius's assistance proved insufficient, rumor claimed that the Byzantines had covertly aided the Turks. After Bohemund seized Antioch, Alexius struggled to regain it. In 1107–8, Bohemund secured Pope Paschal II's support for a crusade against the Byzantine Empire; Alexius defeated the Norman forces in the western Balkans.

With regard to the papacy, Alexius endeavored to heal the schism of 1054. Pope Urban II was interested, and dispatched the First Crusade partially to rescue the Eastern Church. But Paschal II repelled the Byzantines when he insisted that they acknowledge papal primacy before discussing other issues. Internally, Alexius strove to repress such heretics as John Italus and Basil the Bogomil. To reinforce Orthodoxy, he instituted a staff of preachers and teachers at Sancta Sophia and other churches in Constantinople.

After 1112, Alexius was repeatedly ill, and his wife, daughter Anna Comnena, and her husband assumed a dominant role. But at his death in 1118, Alexius left his son John II a larger, more secure, and reinvigorated empire. Anna Comnena wrote a laudatory history of the reign, while John Oxites (ca. 1091) and John Zonaras (who wrote ca. 1140–60) criticized Alexius's appropriation of church treasures and his enrichment of his own family at the empire's expense.

Bibliography: A. COMENA, The Alexiad, tr. E. R. A. SEWTER (Harmondsworth 1969). M. ANGOLD, The Byzantine Empire 1025–1204: A Political History, 2nd ed. (London 1997). M. MULLETT and D. SMYTHE, eds., Alexios I Komnenos, vol. I, Papers (Belfast 1996). R.-J. LILIE, Byzantium and the Crusader States 1096–1204, tr. J. C. MORRIS and J. E. RIDINGS (Oxford 1993). M. ANGOLD, Church and Society in Byzantium under the Comneni, 1081–1261 (Cambridge, 1995). T. GOUMA-PETERSON, ed., Anna Komnene and Her Times (New York 2000).

[C. M. BRAND]

ALEXIUS THE STUDITE, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Abbot at the monastery Studion from 1025 to 1043, (hence "the Studite"); birth and death dates unknown. Alexius was appointed patriarch by Emperor Basil II on the latter's death bed without the sanction or knowledge of the metropolitan; he was immediately enthroned on Dec. 15, 1025. As his appointment was not in accordance with Canon Law, his entire reign was marred by arguments and altercations. In 1037 Alexius withstood the attempts of John, brother of the reigning Emperor Michael IV, to remove him from the patriarchal throne by asserting that his removal would automatically bring about the removal of the bishops he had consecrated and the priests he had ordained. When John, eager to secure the patriarchy for himself, persisted in efforts to unseat him, Alexius threatened to declare his coronation of Michael IV null and void, and thus he successfully maintained his throne.

The importance of his patriarchate lies in his administrative policies, which were marked in numerous edicts, synods, and disciplinary laws. He concerned himself extensively with the doctrines of the Monophysites and the Messalians and with Byzantine marriage laws; but he showed weakness by not opposing the second and third marriages of Empress Zoë, daughter of Constantine VIII; these marriages were against Canon Law and the tradition of his monastery. In 1034, Alexius founded a monastery patterned after those of the Studite Order and devoted to the Blessed Virgin; it was later named after him.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 119:744–748, 827–850. T. BALSAMON, ibidem 137:1245. S. PÉTRIDÈS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:398. K. BAUS, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:328. É. AMANN, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935—) 7:136–138. G. FICKER, Erlasse des Patriarchen von Konstantinopel Alexios Studites (Kiel 1911).

[G. LUZNYCKY]

ALFARABI (FĀRĀBĪ, AL-)

Arab philosopher and theologian, fuller name Abū Naṣr Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad Al-Fārābī; b. Wasig, Transoxania, in the district of Fārāb, c. 870; d. Damascus, 950. Of Turkish descent, he spent most of his life in Iraq and Syria. At Baghdad, where he came in contact with Christian scholars, he acquired a knowledge of Greek philosophy. His works on philosophy, particularly his commentaries on Aristotle, gained him wide notice; he was considered the "second Teacher" after Aristotle himself. He wrote on other subjects, however, including mathematics, music, medicine, and astronomy. He passed several years at the court of Saif ad-Dawlah, ruler of Aleppo, engaged mostly in study. Otherwise his life was uneventful.

Emanation. NEOPLATONISM and the Islamic religious tradition offered Alfarabi the notion of a first being, the One, who is absolute unity, perfect transcendence, and pure existence, and thus a necessary being who is present to himself in an act of knowledge where intellect, object of intellect, and act of intellect are absolutely one. From this being, according to the Neoplatonic principle accepted by Alfarabi, only one creature could derive immediately, and this by a process of "emanation" (Faid). Emanation, however, proceeds by degrees. Thus a first intellect, supremely perfect and yet essentially inferior to the One, is the first creature. He is also the first form of multiplicity, for his essence is necessary when viewed in relation to God (the One) and contingent when viewed in itself. This duality of aspect, distant ancestor of the real distinction between essence and existence, leads to a duality in the act of knowledge. The first intellect knows God and itself by two acts, which themselves are creative: the act by which he knows God is the cause of a second intellect, and that by which he knows himself gives rise to a heavenly sphere with its own soul and body. The process continues, according to common Neoplatonic doctrine, until the spheres of the planets and the fixed stars are produced. The lowest of these pure intellects, the active intellect, tenth in rank after the first cause, is the author of the matter and form in the sublunar world. Finally, under the influence of the heavenly bodies, common matter is prepared to bring forth the forms given it by the active intellect (dator formarum). A gradual growth in perfection takes place, culminating in the emergence of the human soul, the highest form associated with matter.

Man and Society. At this point, Alfarabi describes the growth of human consciousness. The activity of the senses furnishes the materials for universal ideas, and illumination by the active intellect puts the human intellect in act. Man's grasp of universals grows as he frees himself from matter and comes more under the influence of the active intellect. The final step in the process is reached when man has an "acquired intellect," which for Alfarabi is almost on a level with the active intellect.

In all this Alfarabi depends heavily on his Greek predecessors, above all on Alexander of Aphrodisias. But there is present in most of his writing a mystical element that reminds one of PLOTINUS. The difference, of course, lies in the fact that Alfarabi considers union with the active intellect as the highest form of existence for man, and not union with the One, as Plotinus held. Alfarabi defines man's happiness as a permanent state of being wherein he is freed from matter and enjoys the society of pure spirits. He insists on the collaboration of intellect and will in the tendency toward this goal.

Moreover, for Alfarabi man is a social being who needs the society of other men to grow toward happiness. In his notion of society Alfarabi is greatly indebted to Plato, particularly to the Republic. The "virtuous state" he sees as analogous to the human body, with the ruler as the heart. The ideal ruler is both philosopher and prophet—philosopher to have attained the perfection of the theoretical intellect, prophet to be able to receive inspiration that will lead men to happiness. Since this ideal is almost impossible to realize, Alfarabi was satisfied if the ruler were to possess only the essential qualities. Again, like Plato, he contrasted the ideal state with its imperfect imitations, for example, democracy, timocracy, and tyranny.

Appreciation. In general, Alfarabi relied heavily on the Greek tradition as he knew it. Although he made frequent references to Plato and Aristotle, the extent of his knowledge of their works is not easy to assess. He did write a commentary on Aristotle's De interpretatione, gave a summary of the Metaphysics, and claimed to have read nine books of Plato's Laws. But in most cases his knowledge came from the commentators Alexander and Themistius and from the many manuals of philosophy then available.

Alfarabi's influence in Islam was considerable, for he determined the principal lines of its philosophical speculation. He was generally appreciated by his successors, despite the attacks of ALGAZEL. His works were frequently translated into Latin and Hebrew in the Middle Ages. He seems to have influenced the political theories of MAIMONIDES, but for the most part ranks far behind Avicenna and Averroës in importance for medieval philosophy.

Bibliography: Works. Philosophische Abhandlungen, ed. and tr. F. H. DIETERICI (Leiden, Arab. text 1890; Ger. tr. 1892). Abhandlung: Der Musterstaat, ed. and tr. F. H. DIETERICI (Leiden, Arab. text 1895; Ger. tr. 1900). De intellectu et intellecto, critical edition of Arab. text M. BOUYGES (Beirut 1938). Commentary on Aristotle's "De interpretatione," ed. W. KUTSCH and S. MARROW (Beirut 1960). Catálogo de las ciencias, ed. and tr. A. GONZÁLEZ PALENCIA (2d ed. Madrid 1953), Span., Arab. and 2 Lat. Versions. De Platonis philosophia, ed. F. ROSENTHAL and K. WALZER (Plato arabus 2; London 1943), Lat. and Arab. Compendium legum Platonis, ed. and tr. F. GABRIELI, (ibidem 3; 1952), Lat. and Arab. Alfarabi's Philosophy of Plato and Aristotle, tr. with introd. M. MAHDI (New York 1962). English selections in R. LERNER and M. MAHDI, Medieval Political Philosophy: A Sourcebook (Glencoe, Ill. 1963). Literature. M. STEINSCHNEIDER, Al-Farabi des arabischen Philosophen Leben und Schriften (Mémoires de l'Académie Impériale des Sciences de St. Petersburg 13.4; 1859). I. MADKOUR, La Place d'Al-Fârâbi dans l'école philosophique musulmane (Paris 1935). E. I. J. ROSENTHAL, Political Thought in Medieval Islam (Cambridge, Eng. 1958). N. RESCHER, Al-Fârâbî: An Annotated Bibliography (Pittsburgh 1962). R. WALZER, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:269-270.

[J. FINNEGAN]

ALFERIUS, ST.

Cluniac abbot; b. Salerno; d. La Cava, April 12, 1050. Alferius (Adalfericus, Alpherius) was a member of the Pappacarbone family and received an excellent education. Introduced to the court of Prince Waimar III of Salerno, he was sent on diplomatic missions to France and Germany, c. 1002-03. While traveling, he fell ill and stopped at the monastery of S. Michele della Chiusa (Piedmont), where he met ODILO OF CLUNY. To fulfill a vow, Alferius became a monk at Cluny in 1003. He was recalled to Salerno by Waimar III and charged with the reform of the monasteries in this area. His hermitage became the Abbey of La Cava (SS. Trinità) when he was joined by a number of disciples. His cult was approved by Leo XIII in 1893, and confirmed again in 1928.

Feast: April 12.

Bibliography: HUGH OF VENOSA, Vitae quatuor priorum abbatum Cavensium, ed. L. MATTEI CERASOLI in Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500 (Città di Castello 1900) 6.5:3–12. Acta Sanctorum April 2:96–101. P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificum. (Berlin 1906–35) 8:311. F. M. MEZZA, L'ambasciatore che fondò un monastero (Cava, Italy 1952), popularization. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:80.

[R. GRÉGOIRE]

ALFIELD, THOMAS, BL.

Priest martyr; name also given as Aufield, Alphilde, Hawfield, Offeldus; alias Badger; b. Gloucestershire, England; hanged at Tyburn (London), July 6, 1585. Thomas and his brother Robert, who was St. Edmund CAMPION's servant and betrayer, were born into a Protestant family. Thomas was educated at Eton and Cambridge. Following his conversion to Catholicism, he studied at Douai and Rheims, where he was ordained (1581). While working in the north of England, he was arrested and sent to the Tower of London, May 2, 1582. Although he remained resolute even under torture, he was released. Captured a second time, he apostatized in prison. Repenting of his lapse, he lived for a time in Rheims before returning to the English mission to circulate Dr. Allen's booklet, True and modest Defence (August 1584), in response to Burghley's Execution of Justice. For this he was arrested with Ven. Thomas Webley, a dyer's apprentice, and a man named Crabbe. They were imprisoned in the Tower of London, then at Newgate. Crabbe was released after renouncing allegiance to the pope; Alfield and Webley were executed together. Both were beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ALFONSO DE CASTRO

Theologian; b. Zamora, Spain, 1495; d. Brussels, Feb. 3, 1558. De Castro entered the Franciscan Order at Salamanca in 1511; he studied theology there and later at the University of Alcalá. He occupied a chair of theology at Salamanca for 30 years, meanwhile doing occasional preaching in Germany, England, and at the court of Charles V. In 1530 he took part in a debate on the validity of the marriage of Henry VIII and wrote a treatise on the subject that was posthumously published at Lyons in 1568. As theologian to Cardinal Pacheco at the first session of the Council of Trent, he was active in the discussions of original sin and the canon of Sacred Scripture. He became so skilled in the knowledge of penal law that he came to be known as "princeps poenalarum." In 1557 he was named archbishop of Compostela, but died before being consecrated. Among his works are: Adversus omnes haereses lib. XIV (Paris 1534), which catalogues and refutes the heresies from the time of the Apostles to the 16th century; Homiliae 25 in Ps. 50 (Salamanca 1537); Homiliae 24 in Ps. 31 (Salamanca 1540); De justa haereticorum punitone (Salamanca 1547); and De potestate legis poenalis (Salamanca 1550).

Bibliography: L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (Quaracci-Florence 1931–) 18:132–134.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

ALFONSUS, BONIHOMINIS

Also known as de Buenhombre. Spanish Dominican Hebraist and Arabist; b. Cuenca or Toledo; d. before Aug. 12, 1353. He is known chiefly for his Latin translation of two Arabic works of a Jewish Rabbi converted to Christianity: Tractatus Rabbi Samuelis ad Rabbi Isaac per quem probatur adventus Christi, translated while he was in Paris in 1339 (many eds.; Bibl. vet. Patrum 18:518); and Disputatio Abutalib Saraceni et Samuelis Judaei quae fides praecellat (uned. MS Madrid Nac. 4402 f. 103–110), translated while he was bishop of Marrakech in Morocco (1344 to death). Both are Christian apologies in dialogue form. His other translations from Arabic into Latin are Historia Joseph (uned.), done probably in Egypt (1336) and the Legenda S. Antonii abbatis Thebaidis (ed. Bibl. vet. Patrum 18).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 1:594–595. S. RUIZ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 9: 1135–36. M. H. LAURENT, ibid. 10:1061. F. STEGMÜLLER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 1:334.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

ALFORD, MICHAEL

Jesuit historian; b. London, 1587; d. Saint-Omer, Flanders, Aug. 11, 1652. After a novitiate begun at Louvain (1607), and after the usual course of philosophy in the English College, Seville, and theology at Louvain, during which he was ordained, Alford (originally Grif-fith), spent two years among the English at Naples. For five years (1615–20) he was English penitentiary at St. Peter's, Rome. He was socius to the master of novices at Liège (1620) and later rector of the tertians at Ghent before going to England in the winter of 1628–29. Upon landing, he was mistaken for Richard Smith, Bishop of Chalcedon, and arrested, but he was released at the intervention of Queen Henrietta Maria. Alford worked in Leicestershire and Herefordshire, becoming superior of the residence of St. Anne in 1636. He spent his leisure mainly in historical studies and writing, and retired to Saint-Omer in 1652 to finish his three-volume Fides Regia Britannica sive Annales Ecclesiae Britannicae (Liège 1663). He wrote also a life of St. Winefride (1635) and Britannia Illustrata (1641).

Bibliography: H. MORE, Historia Provinciae anglicanae Societatis Jesu (Saint-Omer 1660) 394–395. G. OLIVER, Collections toward Illustrating the Biography of the Scotch, English, and Irish Members of the Society of Jesus (London 1845). A. DE BACKER, Bibliothèque des écrivains de la compagnie de Jésus, 3 v. (Paris 1869–76) 1:71. T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 1:284. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 1:175–176.

[F. EDWARDS]

ALFRED THE GREAT

Reigned 871–899. Alfred the Great, King of Wessex, was the first king in England to identify himself with the “English”; during his reign, he laid the foundations for the eventual political unification of England. The Viking invasions, which began again shortly before Alfred's reign, provided an opportunity for Alfred to unify the Englishmen against a common enemy; he then organized and implemented England's first plan of national defense. His conception of kingship led to the foundation of the English monarchy. Alfred respected education and worked to recover that which had been lost through the Viking depredations.

Alfred was born in 849 in Berkshire. He was the youngest of six children and spent his early years traveling around the kingdom with his parents, King Æthelwulf and Queen Osburh. They were very pious and passed on their religious devotion to their children. Alfred visited Rome twice; the first time he was only four years old and was received by Pope Leo IV, who designated him as a spiritual son. Alfred's second journey to Rome was even more fruitful. At the time, Pope Leo was fortifying the area around St. Peter's against the Saracens, and it is possible that Alfred learned some valuable military strategies from the Pope, i.e., the best defense against invaders was to meet them at sea and defeat them there. He also became devoted to the papal see and remained so for the rest of his life. Both on the way to and from Rome, Alfred and his father, who was newly widowed, spent time at the court of Charles the Bald, king of the Franks. On the return journey, Æthelwulf married Charles' daughter, Judith, and brought her back to England. Alfred was very impressed by the scholars he found at the Frankish court, which became a model for his own kingdom many years later.

Alfred the Great, King.

According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Æthelwulf died in 858, two years after returning from Rome, and was succeeded by his son Æthelberht. Five years later, Æthelberht too, was dead, and England was facing the threat of Norse invasions. Alfred's only surviving brother, Æthelred, became king, and during his reign the Vikings moved further and further into England each year, “making peace” with the weaker English kingdoms around Wessex. Alfred, meanwhile, had married Ealswith, a Mercian noblewoman, thus strengthening the alliance between the kingdoms. In 867, the Vikings took up winter quarters in Mercia. The Chronicle records that the Mercian king, Burgred “begged Æthelred, king of Wessex, and his brother Alfred to help them fight against the host''. However, despite receiving their aid, Burgred was eventually forced to make peace with the Vikings.

The Vikings soon conquered East Anglia and by 870 they were attacking Wessex from their base at Reading. Æthelred and Alfred fought against them but to little avail; despite winning several important battles, the brothers were unable to gain a definitive advantage over their enemies. For Alfred, this situation became desperate when another Norse army arrived at Reading, and his brother Æthelred died shortly thereafter from wounds received during battle.

Alfred became king during one of the darkest times in England's history. Of the major English kingdoms, only Wessex survived, and the Danes had established armies in over one-third of England. His biographer, Asser, wrote that Alfred "did not think that he alone could ever withstand such great ferocity of the Vikings, unless strengthened by divine help, since he had already sustained great losses of many men while his brothers were alive" and after much fighting, Alfred made peace with the enemy. Several years later, in 873, the Vikings drove King Burgred out of Mercia; he went to Rome and the Saxon leadership in that kingdom passed to an ealdorman, Ethelred, who later became one of Alfred's strongest allies.

During the next five years the Vikings continued to move into England, creating what was known as the Danelaw and forcing the English to make peace with their armies. In 878, the third invasion of Wessex began simultaneously with an attack on Devon, and Alfred was forced into hiding in the Somerset levels. He fortified Athelney and in May of 878, rallied the men of Somerset, Wiltshire and parts of Hampshire. Two days later, there was a great battle at Edington in Wiltshire, from which Alfred emerged victorious. As part of the resulting peace treaty the Viking leader Guthrum and many of his comrades converted to Christianity. Alfred stood as his sponsor and later honored Guthrum and his soldiers with feasting and gifts. The Vikings promised to leave Wessex at once, and they returned to East Anglia.

Alfred had nearly 14 years of relative peace, and he used that time to create a plan of national defense for England. He began a thorough military reorganization consisting of three major innovations. The first was the division of the fyrð (standing army) into two halves, each serving six months. This was designed to give some continuity to the English military actions; mounted warriors fought in the field while the fyrðmen at home guarded the land from sudden raids. The second, and possibly most important of Alfred's measures, was the building of large fortifications (burhs) at strategic locations to defend against the Vikings and later to serve as bases in the reconquest of the Danelaw. Alfred's defensive measures were very similar to those taken by Charles the Bald, and he adopted the Carolingian tactic of controlling movement along a river by building along both banks and connecting them with bridges. The third innovation was establishing a fleet of large, fast ships to challenge the Vikings on the seas.

After ensuring the survival and protection of the English, Alfred set about restoring the monastic life of the Church in England and actively pursued the revival of literature and learning. For two generations England had seen little but warfare and was a ruined landscape of burnt monasteries and churches, squalid farms, and poor, ignorant people. Alfred began to remedy that through a vigorous program of religious revival and scholarship. Nearly half of his revenue was devoted to educational ends. He brought foreign scholars and craftsmen to his court from every country in Christendom and established a great school for teaching the sons of thanes and free men to read and write. Alfred also made himself a master of Latin. He translated what he considered the most useful works of Christian and classical knowledge into the vernacular, including Pope Gregory I's Pastoral Care, Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy, and St. Augustine's Soliloquies. As part of his religious program Alfred founded two religious houses. One was at Athelney, where he had sheltered during the Viking invasions, and the other at Shaftesbury, where his daughter Æthelgifu was made Abbess. He supported those religious houses that had survived the Viking depredations, and created an environment within the Church as a whole where the visual and literary arts could flourish.

Alfred also enacted a uniform law code for the good of his subjects, with great emphasis on oath keeping and settling of feuds, and horrible punishment for treason. But Alfred's law codes were more than just a means for keeping social order; according to Simon Keynes, "The act of law-making was a public display of the king's royal power, and provided an opportunity for him to express his political and ideological aspirations in legal form."

In 886, Alfred recovered London from the Danes and entrusted it to his ally and soon to be son-in-law, Ethelred of Mercia. The Chronicle records that "all the English people submitted to him except those who were under the Danish yoke." Alfred was now not only king of Wessex but of all free Englishmen, and their acceptance of him as such expressed a feeling that he represented interests common to the entire race. This event can be seen as the beginning of English unity; in charters of the late 880s and early 890s, Alfred is referred to as "king of the Anglo-Saxons."

The Vikings returned to England in 892 but made little headway against Alfred's fortified kingdom, and many of them settled instead in the Danelaw. Alfred continued to improve the burghal defenses of England, working closely with his son Edward, his daughter Æthelflaed, and her husband, Ethelred of Mercia. Together, they laid the foundations for the eventual conquest of the Danelaw and unification of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms.

Alfred died on Oct. 26, 899, and was buried at Winchester. In his 28-year reign, he had preserved Wessex from the Viking invasions and thus saved England. He also took innovative military measures to protect England from further invasions, emerging as perhaps the first “English” king. He rescued many religious houses and began the restoration of learning and literature. In the words of Arthur Bryant, Alfred not only saved a Christian state by his exertions, but made it worth saving.

Bibliography: R. ABELS, Lordship and Military Obligation in Anglo-Saxon England (Berkeley 1988). R. ABELS, Alfred the Great: War, Kingship and Culture in Anglo-Saxon England (New York 1998). C. BROOKE, From Alfred to Henry III 871–1272 (New York 1969). J. CAMPBELL, ed. The Anglo-Saxons (Ithaca 1982). D. DUMVILLE, Wessex and England from Alfred to Edgar: Six Essays on Political, Cultural, and Ecclesiastical Revival (Woodbridge 1992). D. DUMVILLE and S. KEYNES, gen. eds. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: A Collaborative Edition (Cambridge 1996). D. FISHER, The Anglo-Saxon Age (London 1973). S. KEYNES and M. LAPIDGE, Alfred the Great: Asser’s ‘Life of King Alfred’ and Other Contemporary Sources (Hammondsworth 1983). A. P. SMYTH, Alfred the Great (Oxford 1995). F. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (Oxford 1989). M. SWANTON, ed. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (Routledge 1996).

[L. A. LEHTOLA]

ALGAZEL (GHAZZĀLĪ, AL-)

Arab philosopher and theologian; b. Ṭūs, province of Khorāsān, Persia, 1058; d. Ṭūs, 1111.

Life. Algazel received his early education in his native city and at Jurjan, where the teaching of the mystics, or Sufis, was emphasized (see SUFISM). The decisive period of his formation began, however, when he attended the lectures of a famous theologian, al-Juwaynī, at Nisāpour. There he acquired a deep knowledge of Islamic theology and law and was initiated into the philosophical speculations of ALFARABI and AVICENNA. From the beginning, Algazel shared with his teacher a distrust for authority in matters of religion. This distrust accompanied him all his life, explaining in great part the distinctive features of his intellectual and spiritual evolution.

When al-Juwaynī died in 1085, Algazel joined the scholars whom the vizier, Nizām al-Mulk, had gathered around him. After six years in this group, he was named professor of Muslim law at the famous Nizāmiya College in Baghdad. In 1095 he resigned his post, left Baghdad, and on the pretext of making the pilgrimage to Mecca retired to Damascus. In his Al-Munqidh min ad-dalāl (Deliverance from Error), he explains this decision on religious grounds as a need to deepen his spiritual life and to free himself from worldly preoccupations; scholars suggest, however, that political considerations had something to do with his retirement. Following this, he spent two years in Syria, made the pilgrimage to Mecca, visited Jerusalem, and lived the life of an ascetic, studying and practicing mysticism. He then returned to Ṭūs, probably before 1098 or 1099. He abandoned his life of private teaching and ascetical practices in 1106 when, on demand of the vizier, Fakhr al-Mulk, he returned to Nisāpour as professor at the Nizāmiya College there. This second period of teaching lasted until 1109, when he retired to Ṭūs, to remain until his death.

Thought. Algazel is among the profound religious teachers of Islam. A polemist of first rank, he is mainly responsible for the intellectual orientation taken by orthodox Islam since his day. He assured the triumph of the theology of al-ASH’ARĪ; at the same time, he contributed to the decadence of philosophical speculation by his attacks on certain classical Neoplatonic doctrines held by Alfarabi and Avicenna. He also endorsed mysticism, thitherto the object of suspicion and condemnation by the orthodox followers of Islam.

Algazel’s writings, especially Al-Munqidh min ad-dalāl, show that his conversion expressed itself in the form of universal doubt, somewhat similar to that of R. DESCARTES but arising in a different context. Algazel was convinced that there is in man an innate ground of religious experience that is generally oriented by parental authority. Thus children born of Christians become Christians; those born of Jews become Jews. Such influence cannot be justified, particularly since it would put all religions, Islam included, on the same footing. To found his own religious life and to work for the revival of the true religion, for him Islam, it was necessary for Algazel to uncover the fundamental experience that would justify all the rest. In describing his search for this, he follows a logical rather than a chronological pattern. He begins by doubting sense knowledge, which, as the intellect shows, contains contradictory elements. But he holds that even clear intellectual concepts cannot be accepted at face value, for they too might be found wanting if they could be examined by a higher faculty.

Algazel finally escapes from these harassing doubts not by argument and demonstration, but by the light that God has given him. Once received, this light from God allows him to evaluate the four principal positions that have been defended by the theologians, the philosophers, the Batinites, and the mystics. In weighing each position, Algazel is not purely negative, but seems conscious that the shortcomings of any one explanation do not render it valueless. It is this attitude that caused Algazel to be accused of insincerity, for his adversaries were not slow to point out that, after attacking them, he incorporated much of their doctrine in his own synthesis.

Algazel criticizes the theologians for adopting principles admitted by their adversaries and for using arguments based merely on universal consent. His criticism of the philosophers is that they have some excellent logical principles but fail to live up to them in proving their own positions, being content merely to echo a long tradition taken over from the Greeks. The third group whose doctrine Algazel rejects is the Batinite Sect, which claimed that all religious truth must be received for no other reason except the infallible authority of a teacher (their infallible Imām, at that time the Fatimite Caliph of Cairo); their position is a radical denial of his own, which claims that authority can never replace experience. The fourth group, the mystics, receives Algazel's full adherence. In his view, purity of heart obtained by recollection is the first condition of progress in the mystic way, which leads to complete absorption in God (fanā). At this point there is a period of visions and revelations, later reaching its perfection in a nearness to God. The prophets are those who reach the highest degree of experience and are thus constituted physicians of the heart. It is through their influence and the following of their precepts that a man can eventually hope to attain light.

Works. A great number of works have been attributed to Algazel (see Bouyges). During his first teaching period, up to 1095, he wrote some treatises on logic and composed the Maqāṣid al-Falāciḥa, a summary of philosophical doctrines, which he then refuted in the Tahāfut al-Falāciḥa (Incoherence of the Philosophers). He wrote also some works on Moslem canon law and a treatise on theology, the Iqtisād. During his retreat (1095–1105) he composed his principal work, Iḥyā' 'Ulūm ad-Dīn (Revival of the Religious Sciences), together with numerous minor works dealing with the spiritual life. In 1105–06, while teaching at Nisāpour, he wrote his intellectual autobiography and later Mishkāt al-Anwār (Niche of Lights), a highly esoteric account of his religious thought. In the years preceding his retirement from teaching in 1095 and immediately following it, he wrote several works against the Batinite Sect, among others, Al-Qistās al-Mostiqīm (The Just Balance).

See Also: ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY; ISLAM.

Bibliography: Works in translation. The Faith and Practice of al-Gazālī, tr. W. MONTGOMERY WATT (London 1953); Streitschrift des Gazali gegen die Bātinijja-Sekte, ed. I. GOLDHIZER (Leiden 1916; repr. 1956); The Alchemy of Happiness, tr. C. FIELD

(London 1910); Mishkāt al-Anwār (The Niche for Lights), tr. W. H. T. GAIRDNER (London 1924; Lahore 1952); O Disciple (Beirut 1951); Al-Qistās al-Mostiqīm (Damascus 1955–57); Worship in Islam, tr. and commentary E. E. CALVERLY of Book of the Iḥyā' on the Worship (Madras 1925; 2d ed. London 1957); Iḥyā' ouloūm ed-dīn ou Vivification des sciences de la foi, analyzed by H. BOUSQUET (Paris 1955). AVERROËS, Tahāfut al-Tahāfut, tr. S. VAN DEN BERGH, 2 v. (London 1954), contains text of Algazel's Tahāfut quoted by Averroës. Studies. A. BOUYGES, Essai de chronologie des oeuvres de al-Ghazali (Algazel) (Beirut 1960). A. J. WENSINCK, La Pensée de Ghazzālī (Paris 1940). D. B. MACDONALD, "The Life of al-Ghazzālā with Especial Reference to His Religious Experiences and Opinions," The Journal of the American Oriental Society (New Haven 1843–) 20 (1899) 71–132. S. M. ZWEMER, A Moslem Seeker after God (New York 1920). M. ASINPALACIOS, "Algazel" dogmatica, moral, ascetica (Zaragoza 1901); La Mystique d'al-Gazzali (Beirut 1914); La espiritualidad de Algazel y su sentido Cristiano, 4 v. (Madrid 1934–41). J. OBERMANN, Der philosophische und religiöse Subjektivismus Ghazalis (Vienna 1921). M. SMITH, Al-Ghazālī: The Mystic (London 1944). F. JABRE, La Notion de la ma'rifa chez Ghazali (Beirut 1958).

[J. FINNEGAN]

ALGER OF LIÈGE (ALGER OF CLUNY, ALGERUS MAGISTER)

Theologian, whose writings influenced the development of Canon Law; b. Liège, Belgium, in the mid-11th century; d. Cluny, France, about 1131 or 1132. According to his biographer, Nicholas of Liège, Alger received his education in his native city and was first appointed deacon and teacher at St. Bartholomew's, Liège. About 1101 he was transferred to St. Lambert's Cathedral, became a canon, and served as secretary to Bishop Otbert (1092–1117) and his successor, Frederick (1119–21). After Frederick's death on May 27, 1121, Alger entered Cluny and, though already advanced in years, was ordained.

Writings. Presumably while he was at St. Lambert's (1101–21), Alger wrote the Tractate Concerning the Legal Rights of the Cathedral. Before 1094 he had written a more important work, On Mercy and Justice (Liber de misericordia et justitia), in which he criticized certain sacramental doctrines of St. PETER DAMIAN (d. 1072) as too lax, and advocated a more thorough study of St. Augustine's sacramental teaching. Some 124 quotations from the works of St. Augustine serve to underline his own effort in this regard.

In later life, Alger wrote On The Sacraments of the Lord's Body and Blood (De Sacramentis corporis et sanguinis dominici), generally dated 1110 to 1121. Much of its source material is derived from Ivo's Decretum. In addition to these works, his short treatise, On Free Will (Libellus de libero arbitrio), of unknown date, and a number of Alger's letters are still extant. But it is more than doubtful that the little tract On the Sacrifice of the Mass, attributed to him, and the so-called Sentences of Master A., also often assigned to him, are actually his works.

Although Alger's work on the Eucharist was considered by PETER THE VENERABLE to be far superior to the writings of LANFRANC (d. 1089) and GUITMAND OF AVERSA (d. 1095) on the same subject, its influence on later authors was not strong. His work On Mercy and Justice, however, lived on through Gratian's Decretum (see GRATIAN, DECRETUM OF). It has been estimated that Gratian borrowed about 100 texts from it. More important, the Dicta Gratiani contain numerous explanations often copied verbatim from Alger. When Peter Lombard used Gratian's Decretum in the compilation of his Sentences, Alger's influence on theology was further intensified.

Doctrinal Teachings. In his search for a solution to the doctrinal problems conjured up by the contradictory claims of the GREGORIAN REFORM, Alger points to the "invocation of the divine name" in Baptism as a constructive sacramental principle. Accordingly, he formulates the general rule: "All sacraments, no matter who administers them in the name of the Trinity, are in themselves true and holy" (De Sacramentis 2.10). He considers it "a crime to believe that the invocation of the divine name in His sacraments may be frustrated" (De Sacramentis 3.2). If administered by heretics, sacraments are valid but without divine grace. An exception to this rule is Baptism administered even by a pagan in case of necessity, for "necessity knows no law" (De Misericordia 1.55). In Alger's time the word "sacrament" was neither clearly defined nor restricted to only seven liturgical rites; it must also be noted that in formulating his rule Alger had Baptism, Holy Orders, and the celebration of the Mass in mind.

Alger heavily underlines the importance of faith and intention. By faith, he holds, all sacraments of the Church are brought to completion. The perfection and sum total of the Christian faith are found in the use of the Trinitarian name. Although Alger insists that God examines our intention and faith rather than our external actions, he stresses that to be valid the liturgical rite of the Church must be observed. Any ritual changes made outside the Church must be rejected as heretical. However, regional differences in the liturgical customs of the Church do not affect sacramental validity, for the unifying element is the unity of faith and changes should be judged according to the intention of those responsible for them. Similar clarifications account for an unusual amount of casuistry in Alger's work on the Eucharist. Unfortunately Hugh of Saint-Victor, Gratian, and Peter Lombard did not make Capital: Algiers.

Size: 952,444 sq. miles, 838,315 sq. miles of which are Sahara.
Population: 31,193,917 in 2000.
Languages: Arabic; French and Berber dialects are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 20,000 Catholics (.01%), 31,168,817 Sunni Muslims (99.9%), 1,100 other.

use of this work, but a number of manuscripts still extant in the libraries of Europe attest to its widespread popularity in the 12th century. The Sentences of Master A., which provided source material for the compilation of Gratian's Decretum, dates back to the School of ANSELM OF LAON rather than to Alger of Liège.

Bibliography: Alger's works are collected in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 180:739–972. His letters are collected in P. JAFFÉ, Bibliotheca rerum germanicarum, 6 v. (Berlin 1864–73) 5:262–267, 373–379. The Eulogy by Nicholas of Liège is found in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 180:737–738. G. LE BRAS, "Le liber de misericordia et justitia d'Alger de Liège," Nouvelle revue historique de droit français et étranger, 45 (1921) 80–118. "Alger de Liège et Gratien," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, 20 (1931) 5–26. S. KUTTNER, "Zur Frage der theologischen Vorlagen Gratians," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 23 (1934) 243–268. L. BRIGUE, Alger de Liège (Paris 1936). N. M. HARING, "The Sententiae Magistri A. and the School of Laon," Mediaeval Studies, 17 (1955) 1–45; "A Study in the Sacramentology of Alger of Liège," Mediaeval Studies 20 (1958) 41–78.

[N. M. HARING]

ALGERIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A republic in northwest Africa, Algeria is bordered on the east by Tunisia and Libya, on the south by Niger and Mali, on the west by Mauritania, Western Sahara, and Morocco, and on the north by the Mediterranean Sea. A semi-arid climate and predominately desert conditions limit Algeria's agricultural output to wheat, barley, and olives. Fortunately, large oil and natural gas reserves began to provide the country with a stable economy during the second half of the 20th century. Nevertheless, despite the healthy revenues generated by such exports, Algeria remained burdened by high unemployment and widespread poverty into the 21st century.

Ecclesiastically, a metropolitan archdiocese is located in Algiers, with suffragans at Constantine and Oran. The diocese of Laghouat, which encompasses most of inland Algeria, was created in 1955 and is immediately subject to the Holy See. Established in 1901 as the Prefecture of Ghardaïa, two decades later it was detached from the Prefecture of the Sahara and the Sudan; it served the region as a vicariate from 1948 to 1955.

A land of Berber tribes, Algeria had early Phoenician settlements on its northern coast and came under the sway of CARTHAGE before it flourished under Roman rule as Numidia and Mauretania Caesarea. It suffered from DONATISTS and was conquered by invading Vandals, who were besieging Hippo when St. Augustine died there (430). Byzantine rule after 533 restored order to the area, but the tribes would not accept the Christianity of the eastern Roman Empire. The Arab conquest of 709 brought with it Islam, which the tribes accepted.

The few Christian communities in Algeria having ties with Rome sustained themselves until c. 1150; Gregory VII appointed a bishop of Bône in 1076. Missionaries, especially those from Spain, cared for Christian captives, soldiers, and merchants along the Algerian coast, but by 1512 there were so few Christians in the region that a bishop of Constantine appointed by Julius II did not venture to occupy his see. Beginning in the late

A catholic church in Algeria, c. 1870–1890. (©Michael Maslan Historic Photographs/CORBIS)

16th century, French and Spanish Trinitarians and French Vincentians cared for Christian slaves in Algeria and functioned as French consuls. However, the state of things had little changed; the Vincentian Vicariate Apostolic of Algeria (1650–1827) made little effort to convert Muslims or Christian renegades.

Spain attempted to hold the Algerian coast (1505–29), XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS restoring the See of Bougie and planning to restore that of Oran until the Mediterranean was abandoned as a field of expansion in favor of the New World. The coastal city of Oran, a refuge of Moors forced out of Spain, remained under Spain's control (1509–1708, 1732–91), but the rest of the Algerian coast became overrun by Barbary pirates under the loose hand of the Ottoman Empire. In 1830 French troops marched on Algiers, the main port from which the pirates had menaced European coasts and shipping, and from there took control of the country.

The bishopric of Algiers (Roman Icosium), one of many small early Christian dioceses in North Africa, was restored by the French in 1838 and became a metropolitan archdiocese in 1866. Another early Christian see, Constantine (Roman Julia Cirta), which united to its title that of HIPPO, became, together with Oran, the suffragan sees in 1866. Algiers cared mostly for immigrant French settlers and was deterred by the government from extending its activity to the Moslem population until Cardinal LAVIGERIE, founder of the MISSIONARIES OF AFRICA and MISSIONARY SISTERS OF OUR LADY OF AFRICA (1868), became archbishop (1867–92). The first bishop of Algiers and the first bishop of Constantine resigned because of financial difficulties. Jesuits began missionary work in Kabylia (1839), which had been conquered in 1857. Vincentians returned in 1842 to direct seminaries in Algiers, Constantine, and Oran.

Remaining under French control despite several uprisings, Algeria fell into the hands of the Vichy government during World War II. In November 1942 it was occupied by Allied forces; the following two decades found Algerians in bloody revolt against waning French colonial influence. Algeria finally won independence on July 5, 1962, and was renamed the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria. A coup d'état followed in 1965, foreshadowing the political instability that would haunt the new nation.

Independence prompted a mass exodus of the European population; between 1962 and 1964 more than 800,000 Catholics left the country. Under a constitution first made effective in November 1976, Islam was declared the state religion, although discrimination on the basis of religion was prohibited and Catholic practices were tolerated. All students, even those of non-Islamic faiths, attending primary and secondary schools were required to study Islam; private schools were not permitted to operate within Algeria. While public assembly to worship a faith other than Islam was prohibited by law, the government continued to tolerate Catholic services at the cathedral in Algiers and elsewhere.

During the 1990s Algeria underwent drastic political changes that dramatically altered the country's religious landscape. On the eve of a national election in 1991, the electoral successes of the radical fundamentalist Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) prompted the government to postpone the election process in an attempt to halt further FIS inroads. While censored elections were eventually resumed, FIS candidates were forced underground; in response sympathizers turned to violence, directing their wrath at those they considered impediments to their control of the government, primarily moderate Muslims and Christians. Terrorists took the lives of more than 100,000 people between 1992 and 2000, targeting religious, political, and random civilians for death. Many Catholics were among their victims. By 2000 the Catholic population had been reduced to approximately 20,000 (one source put it at 3,000), only a fifth of their number 40 years earlier. Catholics formed communities around larger churches in the cities of Oran, Constantine, and Algiers for reasons of safety, abandoning some of the 37 parishes that remained in the country.

The situation deteriorated further when, in April 1996, seven Trappists monks were kidnaped by Algerian Islamic guerillas. Despite pleas by Pope John Paul II for their safe release, on May 21 they were murdered in retaliation for the French government's failure to release a political terrorist. Shortly after reports of their deaths were made, Bp. Pierre Claverie of Oran was killed, along with his driver, in a terrorist bombing. Dozens more priests, monks, and nuns were killed in the violence, according to Amnesty International. In 1997 the pope made a public plea for people to "avoid provocations and attitudes which wound human dignity, and the legitimate rights and aspirations of all people," ending his statement by calling the acts of the terrorists "ferocious barbarity." Amid proposals for international peace talks to resolve the situation in Algeria, in late 1999 the pope met with Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika to discuss the situation. Fortunately, no more Catholic clergy lost their life through terrorism following Bp. Claverie's murder in 1996.

In January 2000 the FIS's armed contingent disbanded and many surrendered their weapons under an amnesty sponsored by Bouteflika's government. As the Church looked to the new millennium, it saw its membership drastically decreased: more than half the country's 177 nuns had left, while over 40 missionary centers had been abandoned. However, those remaining perceived a new openness to their faith, perhaps in reaction to the violence they had suffered earlier.

Bibliography: A. PONS, La Nouvelle Église d'Afrique (Tunis 1930). Annuaire du diocèse d'Alger (1930—). L. E. DUVAL, Messages de Paix 1955–1962 (Algiers 1961). E. JARRY, Catholicisme 1:317–319; 3:100–102. Bilan du Monde 2:41–49.

[J. CUOQ/EDS.]

ALHAMBRA, INTERNATIONAL ORDER OF

The International Order of Alhambra is a Catholic fraternal and social organization established for the marking and preservation of Catholic historical sites. Founded in Brooklyn, New York, on Feb. 29, 1904, by William Harper Bennett (1861–1931), it derived its name from the Moorish stronghold in Granada, Spain, which surrendered to the Christian forces of Spain on Jan. 22, 1492. This turning point, which ended the Moorish occupation of Christian Europe that had begun in 711, was a significant event which was not lost on Alhambra's founder who saw the advantage of having an organization devoted to marking significant events, places, and sites associated with the history of Christianity in North America.

Originally envisioned as a higher level of the Knights of Columbus, Alhambrans had to be members of that organization, a requirement that was terminated in 1961. Unlike the Knights, the Alhambrans wear white fezzes and, understandably, are mistaken for Masons by those who do not know of them. That much of the terminology (caravans, divan, and viziers) of the order's governing structure is reflective of the time when Spain was under the Moors lends to Alhambra's attraction.

While the Order of Alhambra is an organization that is concerned about historical landmarks, it is unique in that since 1959 it has been primarily interested in helping the developmentally disabled. The Order of Alhambra provides scholarships to individuals interested in teaching the developmentally disabled, small grants to institutions willing to help them, support for medical research into the causes of Down's syndrome, and setting up housing to care for these persons.

At the same time, while concentrating on its goals relative to the developmentally disabled and to historical memorials, the Order of Alhambra promotes social and fraternal activities among its members who include cardinals, bishops, priests, and deacons as well as lay persons. From a peak membership of more than 11,000 members before the Great Depression, at the beginning of the 21st century it continues its charitable and social works with about half that number. The supreme office of the Order is located in Baltimore, Md., and it has more than 100 caravans or subsidiary units in at least 30 states in the United States and in two provinces (Ontario and Quebec) of Canada.

Bibliography: W. H. BENNETT, "The Order of Alhambra," Historical Records and Studies, 16 (May 1924), 94–105. J. L. BORDAS, "History of the Order of Alhambra," The Alhambra (July/August 1979: 6–11). V. A. LAPOMARDA, The Order of Alhambra (Baltimore 1994).

[V. A. LAPOMARDA]

ALI ('ALĪ IBN ABĪ TĀLIB)

Son-in-law of Muḥammad; b. Mecca, c. A.D. 600; d. Kūfa, Jan. 24, 661. 'Alī was taken into his cousin Muḥammad's household at 10, and became one of the first converts to Islam from paganism. He joined the HĒGIRA to Medina A.D. 622, was married to the Prophet's daughter Fāṭima, and fathered the Prophet's only surviving grandsons, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn. Muḥammad's unexpected death in 632 was the first great crisis of Islam. Political, judicial, and religious head of the new Islamic state, Muḥammad left no sons and apparently had appointed no successor. While 'Alī and his kin prepared the body for burial, a group of the Prophet's companions elected Abū Bakr, father of Muḥammad's favorite wife, 'Ā'isha, as successor to the Prophet. 'Alī kept aloof, but the choice was ratified by the people of Medina. Abū Bakr (d. 634) appointed 'Umar, once an enemy, later Father-in-law to Muḥammad, as his own successor; and under their leadership Egypt, the Fertile Crescent, and Persia were taken by Arab armies. 'Umar was assassinated in 644 and the electoral conclave of the six most prominent companions of the Prophet passed over 'Alī in favor of 'Uthmān ibn 'Affān, an early convert of the aristocratic Banū Umayya family, who had led the Meccan opposition to the Prophet. In 656 'Uthmān, in the face of general discontent with his caliphate, was blockaded in Medina and murdered when he refused to abdicate.

'Alī, then acclaimed caliph, defeated his opponents who accused him of illegal election and collusion with the murderers, and made his capital in Kūfa. Mu'āwiya, Governor of Syria, claiming vengeance for his cousin 'Uthmān, maneuvered 'Alī into a position in which he felt constrained to negotiate. At this, some of 'Alī's party withdrew allegiance, accusing him of forsaking Islam by negotiating on what should be religious principle. 'Alī was forced to take up arms against these "Seceders," (Khārijites) and in revenge was assassinated by one of them in 661. A mosque called Meshed 'Alī was afterward erected to his memory near the spot.

From 'Alī's reign came a major sectarian rift in Islamic theology. The "Partisans" (Shī'a) of 'Alī formed the chief division of Islam opposed to the "Traditionalist" (Sunnī) majority (see SHĪ'ITES; SUNNITES). After his death, his followers did not accept Mu'āwiya's claim to the caliphate. They insisted that 'Alī and his heirs were divinely appointed IMĀMS, leaders of the Muslim community.

While first an Arab political faction, the Shī'a came to differ markedly from the Sunnīs in metaphysics and doctrine; they have seen the imāms as infallible and impeccable, and at times even as emanations of the Godhead. The Shī'a have subdivided repeatedly over the claims of descendants of 'Alī, and have formed new sects and versions of the doctrine, ranging from the Zaydīs of Yemen, who simply hold that some descendant of 'Alī should rule, to the Nuṣayrīs of North Syria, for whom 'Alī is a member of a Gnostic divine trinity. The Sunnīs hold that he was one of the pious first caliphs, who came legally to power in a troubled time and died a tragic death. The polemic has led to much forged documentation.

Bibliography: L. VECCIA VAGLIERI, Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. B. LEWIS et al. (2d ed. Leiden 1954—) 1:381–386. Annali dell'Islam, comp. L. CAETANI, 10 v. (Milan 1905–26) v.9 and 10.

[J. A. WILLIAMS]

ALINSKY, SAUL DAVID

Community organizer and sociologist; b. Chicago, Ill., Jan. 30 1909; d. Carmel, Calif., June 12, 1972. The son of Benjamin and Sarah (Tannenbaum) Alinsky, immigrant Orthodox Jews from Russia, Saul enrolled in the famous Chicago School of Pragmatic Sociology (1915–1950) at the University of Chicago in 1926. Upon graduation in 1930, Alinsky received a fellowship for graduate studies in criminology that led him to the Capone gang and Clifford Shaw's Institute for Juvenile Research (IJR). In 1931, he became a staff sociologist and parole classification officer for the Illinois State Penitentiary. He returned to IJR in 1936 and was assigned by Shaw to the Chicago neighborhood known as "Back of the Yards" in 1938 to organize the community on delinquency issues (the classic description of Chicago's stockyard and immigrant life in the Back of the Yards is Upton Sinclair's The Jungle). In 1939, along with Joseph Meegan, Alinsky organized the "Back of the Yards Council," a unique community organization built by the use of democratic power with the support of organized labor and the Catholic Church, the two chief power blocs in the Back of the Yards.

Alinsky authored three books and numerous articles. His most popular work, Reveille for Radicals (1946), became a bestseller. (One reviewer called it the filthiest piece of writing since Tom Paine.) His other published writings include, "A Sociological Technique in Clinical Criminology," in Proceedings of the Sixty-fourth Annual Congress of the American Prison Association 17-21 September 1934, 176–187, (Chicago); "Community Analysis and Organization," American Journal of Sociology 46, 6 (1941):797–800; John L. Lewis: An Unauthorized Biography (New York 1949); "The Urban Immigrant," in Roman Catholicism and the American Way of Life, ed. Thomas T. McAvoy, C.S.C., 142–155 (Notre Dame 1960); and Rules for Radicals (New York 1971).

Alinsky is regarded as the founder of modern community organizing and his work continues through the Industrial Areas Foundation, a national organizing network, he founded in 1940. Alinsky's enduring contribution is the melding of John Lewis' labor organizing principles with those of the Chicago School of Pragmatic Sociology. The result was and is a distinctive experimental organizing model focused on the attainment of institutional power.

It is clear that Alinsky, a self-professed agnostic, had a profound impact upon American Catholicism. His influence has been noted in the development of such organizations as the Catholic Campaign for Human Development and Catholic Charities, U.S.A., and in parish ministry and leadership-development programs. Criticized from both the left and the right, Alinsky has been variously identified as a dupe of the Catholic Church, a mastermind of a Catholic conspiracy, a Machiavelli in modern dress, and an authentic revolutionary. Prominent Catholic friends included Chicago Auxiliary Bishop Bernard Sheil, Neo-Thomist philosopher Jacques Maritain, Urban Affairs Director Monsignor Jack Egan, and Catholic Charities Director Monsignor John O'Grady.

Bibliography: Alinsky Papers. Special Collections, University of Illinois at Chicago; Saul David Alinsky Collection, Watkinson Library, Trinity College; unarchived papers located at the Chicago office of the Industrial Areas Foundation. C. E. CURRAN, "Saul D. Alinsky, Catholic Social Practice, and Catholic Theory," in Directions in Catholic Social Ethics (Notre Dame 1985) 147–176. B. E. DOERING, "Jacques Maritain and His Two Authentic Revolutionaries," in Thomistic Papers III, ed. L. A. KENNEDY, C.S.B. (Notre Dame 1987) 91–116. B. E. DOERING, ed., The Philosopher and the Provocateur: The Correspondence of Jacques Maritain and Saul Alinsky (New York 1989). L. J. ENGEL, "The Influence of Saul Alinsky on the Campaign for Human Development" Theological Studies 59 (1998): 631–661.

[L. J. ENGEL]

ALIPUS, ST.

Bishop, b. Tagaste, North Africa, c. 360; d. after 429. Alipius (or Alypius) was a student and close friend of ST. AUGUSTINE and a fellow Manichean, who pursued a law career at his parents' wish. He joined Augustine at Rome in 383 and journeyed with him in 384 to Milan, where they were baptized by AMBROSE of Milan in 387. Returning to Africa (388) Alipius spent three years at Tagaste in prayer and penance before going to Hippo to be ordained a priest. On a pilgrimage to Palestine he met Jerome and was instrumental in fostering a relationship between Jerome and Augustine. Upon his return to Africa, Alipius became bishop of Tagaste (c. 394) and struggled against the Pelagians and the Donatists. He visited Italy again in 419 and 428, on business for the Church and the government. During much of his life, he served as Augustine's assistant in his public activities. Augustine, writing in 429, called him old; and Alipius seems not to have survived long after that.

Feast: Aug. 15 or 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 3:201–208. AUGUSTINE, Conf. 6, 8, 9. S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (Paris 1693–1712) 12:565–580. A. P. FRUTAZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:410. F. MOURRET, A History of the Catholic Church, tr. N. THOMPSON, v. 2 (St. Louis 1935) 416.

[R. K. POETZEL]

ALL SAINTS, SOLEMNITY OF

A feast in honor of all the saints, celebrated on November 1 in the West. The origins of this feast are uncertain. First mention comes from the East, in a hymn composed by St. Ephraem in c. 359, where a commemoration of all the martyrs at Edessa on May 13 is mentioned (Carmen 6; Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium [Paris-Louvain 1903] 219:27). By 411, however, the East Syrians kept this commemoration on the Friday after Easter [Breviarium Syriacum, ed. Mariani (Rome 1956) 34]. A sermon of St. John Chrysostom marks the observance of a feast of all the martyrs on the first Sunday after Pentecost (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 50:705). When Chrysostom preached this sermon is not known, and therefore whether the feast occurred in Antioch or Constantinople is uncertain. If he preached it at Constantinople after he became patriarch (398), this would be the earliest reference to the feast there, still observed by the Byzantine Rite on the Sunday after Pentecost.

An observance of all the martyrs on the Sunday after Pentecost also appears in the West. St. Maximus of Turin (5th century) preached in honor of all the martyrs on the same Sunday (Hom. 81; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878–90) 57:427). The commemoration soon included nonmartyrs as well, for the Comes of Würzburg, the earliest epistle list for Rome (an 8th-century manuscript witnessing to readings used in the late 6th or early 7th century), lists this Sunday as dominica in natale sanctorum or Sunday of the Nativity of the Saints (Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabol, H. Leclercq, and H. I. Marrou (Paris 1907–53) 8.2:2292). It seems to serve as an octave day for Pentecost. The feast is encountered again in the Comes of Murbach, which lists readings accompanying the 8th-century family of mixed sacramentaries that preceded the Charlemagne's reform.

Rome also knew of another feast of all the martyrs before adopting November 1. In 609 or 610, Boniface IV received the Roman Pantheon from the Emperor Phocas (d. 610) and dedicated it under the title S. Maria ad Martyres [Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne (Paris 1955) 1:317]. The dedication occurred on May 13, and the anniversary was later observed with great festivity. Many see in this the origin of All Saints' Day. It may be, however, that the feast of May 13 was simply the anniversary of the dedication, or that Boniface chose this date because it was already associated with all the martyrs in the East. Some scholars have suggested that the date was chosen to offset the pagan Lemuria (placating of the gods), observed on May 9, 11, and 13 (P. Radó). The liturgical books that witness to this period make no mention of a feast of all the martyrs that would be in continuity with the Syriac feast mentioned by Ephraem.

How a feast of all the saints came to be celebrated on November 1 has not yet been demonstrated. Gregory III (731–41) dedicated an oratory in St. Peter's Basilica to "all the apostles, martyrs, confessors, and all the just and perfect who are at rest throughout the whole world."

(Liber Pontificalis 1:417). The precise date of the dedication in early 732 is not known. In England, Bede mentioned a feast of all the saints in his two martyrologies (e.g., Patrologia Latina 94:1087). Egbert of York had been ordained deacon in Rome in 732 and had received the pallium from Gregory himself. If Egbert is the founder of the English feast, he may have accepted November 1 as the dedication of Gregory's oratory. Arno of Salzburg called for a festival of all saints on November 1 for Southeast Germany in 798. In 799, Alcuin, who was educated at Egbert's cathedral of York, commended Arno, Archbishop of Salzburg, for observing the feast of November 1 (Epist. 91; Patrologia Latina 100:296). The feast, however, does not appear in Alcuin's supplement to the Gregorian Sacramentary.

According to John Beleth (d. ca. 1165), Gregory IV (827–44) transferred the feast of May 13 to November 1 because provisions were inadequate for the numerous pilgrims coming to Rome for the feast in May (Rationale divinatorum officiorum, 127; Patrologia Latina 202:133–134). There is no scholarly consensus on the matter. H. Schmid denied any connection between the two dates, positing that the November feast originated in Gaul and was immediately adopted in Rome.

According to Ado of Vienne (800–75), this same pontiff asked Louis the Pious (778–840) to extend the feast of November 1 throughout the empire (Martyrologium, Patrologia Latina 123:387). Sigebert (d. 1112) in his chronicle, for some unknown reason, assigns the year 835 to this event (Patrologia Latina 160:159). In fact, in the 9th and 10th centuries, November 1 is listed as Natale omnium sanctorum, e.g., in the Sacramentary of Corbie (Patrologia Latina 78:146). According to Sicard of Cremona (d. 1215), it was Gregory VII (1073–85) who definitively suppressed the feast of May 13 in favor of November 1 (Mitrare, Patrologia Latina 213:414). Indeed, in the 12th century, May 13 disappears from the liturgical books.

Other scholars, however, with good reason oppose such attempts to connect May 13 and November 1. J. Hennig believes May 13 was simply the anniversary of a dedication and not a feast of all the martyrs. He places the origin of November 1 in Ireland, whence the feast passed to Northumberland and then to the Continent. There is an allusion to a feast of all the saints on November 1 in the oldest Irish martyrology, the Féilire of Oengus. This book also gives a feast of all the saints of Europe on April 20 and of all the saints of Africa on December 23. Ireland and Britain were considered apart from Europe and so would want a feast of their own saints. The Irish often assigned the first of the month to important feasts, and since November 1 was also the begining of the Celtic winter, it would have been a likely date for a feast of all the saints. The feast may also have been Christian response to the Druid festival of the dead, Samhain.

The feast had a vigil from early times, and an octave was introduced by Sixtus IV (1471–84), who established the feast for the whole Latin Rite. Both vigil and octave were suppressed in 1955. All Saints is ranked as a solemnity and classified as a holy day of obligation (CIC c. 1246). The euchology of the Mass speaks of the holiness of the people of God through the images of joy, forgiveness, beatitude, and mutual love. Not only does the Church praise God for all the dead who have obtained heavenly glory, but commits itself to the journey to the heavenly Jerusalem, the place where all God's people are in communion (Rv 7.9 [Second reading]).

Bibliography: J. H. MILLER, Fundamentals of the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 418–19. P. RADÓ, Enchiridion liturgicum, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:1391–95. M. RIGHETTI, Manuale di storia liturgica, 4 v. (Milan): v.2 (2d ed. 1955) 2:207–09. H. A. P. SCHMIDT, Introductio in liturgiam occidentalem (Rome 1959). J. HENNIG, "The Meaning of All The Saints," Mediaeval Studies 10 (1948) 147–61. P. JOUNEL, "Le Sanctoral romain du 8^e au 12^e siècles," Maison-Dieu 52 (1957) 59–88. OENGUS THE CULDEE, Martyrology (Félire), ed. W. STOKES (Henry Bradshaw Society 29; London 1905). T. J. TALLEY, "The Evolution of a Feast," Liturgy 5, no. 2 (1985) 43–48.

[C. SMITH/EDS.]

ALL SOULS' DAY

A liturgical day of the Roman rite commemorating all the faithful departed. It is observed on November 2, and since 1970 takes precedence if it falls on a Sunday. The Byzantine Churches observe a similar feast before Lent and Pentecost, the Armenian Church on Easter Monday.

Christians retained customs and patterns of memorial for the dead from pagan antiquity. They celebrated the memory of the deceased on the third day after death and the yearly anniversary; later, observance was made on the seventh and thirtieth day and in some places the fortieth day after a person's death. Attempts of local churches to observe a feast commemorating all the departed can be traced back to the early Middle Ages, possibly arising in imitation of the commemorations of deceased members customary in monastic communities. In Spain, for example, the Monday after Pentecost was dedicated to the commemoration of the deceased in the time of St. Isidore of Seville (d. 636). Abbot Eigil of Fulda prescribed December 17, the anniversary of the monastery's founder, as commemoration of all the deceased at the beginning of the ninth century.

The choice of November 2 is traditionally attributed to St. ODILO, the fifth abbot of Cluny (d. 1048). Odilo decreed in 998 that all Cluniac monasteries should follow the example of Cluny in offering special prayers and singing the Office for the Dead on the day following the feast of ALL SAINTS. Due to the influence of Cluny, the custom spread quickly through France, Germany, and England and was finally adopted in Italy and Rome in the thirteenth century.

The custom of having each priest celebrate three Masses seems to have originated among the Spanish Dominicans during the fifteenth century. After this privilege was approved by BENEDICT XIV in 1748, it was rapidly adopted throughout Spain, Portugal, and Latin America. During World War I, BENEDICT XV, moved by the number of war casualties, granted to all priests the privilege of celebrating three Masses: Of these one could be said for a particular intention; another celebrated for all the faithful departed, particularly for all the Mass foundations that had been unfulfilled or forgotten over time; and the third for the intentions of the pope.

Throughout the Middle Ages it was popular belief that the souls in purgatory could appear on this day as will-o'-the-wisps, witches, toads, etc., to persons who had wronged them during their life. Genuine Christian concern for the deceased along with folkloric culture were the reasons for the great number of pious foundations for Masses and prayers on their behalf. Many different popular customs and practices, especially various forms of food offerings, were associated with All Souls' Day. Among religious traditions, the parish procession to the cemetery, visiting the graves of relatives and friends, and leaving flowers and lights on the graves have remained almost universal.

The liturgy of All Souls' Day was revised to express more clearly the paschal character of Christian death and proclaim the paschal mystery of Christ as the foundation of hope and consolation (cf. Sacrosanctum Concilium, no. 81). The Sacramentary contains three Mass formularies, but the rubrics that each priest may offer three Masses and that the first formulary should be used for the principal Mass are omitted. The readings are taken from the Lectionary for the Masses for the Dead, and the prefaces of Christian Death are prescribed. The prayers speak of the reality and sadness of death, always in the context of the hope given in Christ Jesus, the resurrection and the life, that all who die in faith share the promise of immortality. The Book of Blessings (1989) provides an order for visiting the cemetery recommended for All Soul's Day (nos. 1734–1754), and the Ceremonial of Bishops recommends a rite of sprinkling and incensation of burial sites (nos. 395–403) using texts from the Order of Christian Funerals.

Bibliography: A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year, trans. M. O'CONNELL (New York 1981). K. A. H. KELLNER, Heortology (St. Louis 1908) 326–328. T. MAERTENS and L. HEUSCHEN, Doctrinae pastorale de la liturgie de la mort (Bruges 1957). C. A. KNELLER, “Geschichtliches über die drei Messen am Allerseelentag,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 42 (1918) 74–113. D. K. TRIPP, “The Spirituality of the Little Office of the BVM and the Office for the Dead,” Worship 63 (1989) 218–221.

[A. CORNIDES/EDS.]

ALLAMANO, GIUSEPPE, BL.

Priest; founder, Consolata Society for Foreign Missions and the Missionary Sisters of the Consolata; b. Castelnuovo d’Asti, Piedmont, Italy, Feb. 21, 1851; d. Turin, Piedmont, Italy, Feb. 16, 1926; beatified, Oct. 7, 1990.

Giuseppe Allamano was the fourth of five children born to Joseph Allamano and Marianna Cafasso. His mother, Marianna, was the sister of St. Joseph CAFASSO. While a secondary school student at Valdocco, John BOSCO served as his spiritual mentor. Allamano later entered the diocesan seminary and was ordained a priest in Turin in 1873. At the age of 24 he was appointed spiritual director in the diocesan seminary. In 1880 Allamano became rector of the “Santuario della Consolata,” a Marian shrine in Turin, which houses what is believed to be one of the earliest known icons of the Blessed Mother (4th century). Under his direction, the Consolata Shrine became an important center of Marian piety. He remodeled the building, and renewed the devotion to Our Lady, providing a group of priests for confessions and spiritual direction. He won wide popularity as a confessor and spiritual director, and he promoted many charitable works such as the Catholic Action, labor unions, and the Catholic press.

From his youth Allamano was inspired by the missionary life and activities of the Capuchin missionary Cardinal Massaia in Ethiopia. His poor health, however, prevented him from following his dream of being a missionary. After a long period of prayer and planning in 1901, with the encouragement of his Archbishop A. Richelmy and the approval of the bishops of Piedmont he founded the Institute of the Consolata Foreign Missions. In 1902 the first CONSOLATA MISSIONARIES, two priests and two religious brothers, left Turin for Kenya, in East Africa.

As the first Consolata Missionaries were making progress in Kenya, there was an urgent need for more personnel. Allamano started a formation program to train his missionaries and, in 1910, he also founded the Consolata Missionary Sisters, an indispensable presence together with the priests and the brothers, in the evangelization of Kenya. Both in his rectorship of the shrine and in his leadership of the Consolata Missionaries, Allamano was supported by his close co-worker James Camisassa, the vice-rector of the shrine and the co-founder of the Consolata Missionaries. Their continuous cooperation of 43 years is a moving example of priestly friendship.

Though superior general of the Consolata Missionaries, Allamano remained a diocesan priest of Turin all his life, involving himself in every aspect of the diocesan life. He viewed his missionary involvement as a direct consequence of his priesthood. Allamano’s spirituality is best characterized as one trusting in God’s guidance and provision, and is marked by a deep devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Mary, Mother of Consolation, who experienced God’s tender love and responded in total commitment, became a model and companion for his life and mission. Allamano died in Turin where his relics are enshrined in a chapel dedicated to him at the motherhouse of the Consolata Missionaries.

Feast: Feb. 16.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 82 (1990): 1020. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, nos. 41, 42 (1990); L. SALES, Il servo di Dio Giuseppe Allamano, 3rd ed. (Turin 1944); The Spiritual Life From the Spiritual Conferences of Joseph Allamano (Rome 1982); I. TUBALDO, Giuseppe Allamano, 4 v. (Turin 1982–87); D. AGASSO, Joseph Allamano (Middlegreen 1991).

[M. BARBERO]

ALLEGORY

Derived from the Greek words allos (other) and agoreuein (to speak), allegory refers to a literary and rhetorical style that uses fictitious persons, things and events symbolically as indirect references to real people and situations, or to abstract ideas such as “the Christian life” or “virtue.” The first level, but less important, is the actual story told by the narrative (e.g., Gulliver’s adventures in a kingdom of tiny people); the second, which carries the author’s intended message, lies behind and runs parallel to the literal sense of the narrative. Because this second level of meaning is not spelled out, the text of an allegory is open to multiple interpretations. In a religious context, allegory refers to the meaning given to a narrative or work of art when its elements are interpreted as being symbols for moral and theological values.

The idea that the written word can carry several levels of meaning has had great influence on the Western literary tradition, especially during the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance. From antiquity, works have been written expressly as allegories. Dante’s Divine Comedy, Roman de la Rose, by Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de

“Allegory of Poverty” from “Three Virtues of Saint Francis,” detail of fresco, attributed to Maestro delle Vele and Stefano Fiorentino. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

Meunand, Piers Plowman, attributed to William Langland, and John Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress are often cited examples that illustrate allegory’s use in both secular and religious contexts. Allegory has not played so large a role in the modern Western literary tradition, although George Orwell’s Animal Farm, James Joyce’s Ulysses, and the works of Franz Kafka and C. S. Lewis do continue the tradition.

Allegorical Interpretation. The fact that some literary works carry two levels of meaning gives rise to a method of interpretation that looks for a second, hidden meaning behind a given text even when there is no indication that the author intended such a meaning. As early as the 5th century B.C., Greek philosophers such as Metrodorus of Lampsacus were searching for hidden meaning in the works of Homer and Hesiod. They were convinced that the ancient poets were great sages who had hidden moral and spiritual truths from the ignorant in their stories. The early Stoics (4th to 1st centuries B.C.) were especially instrumental in developing allegorical interpretations for the mythical legends recorded by Homer and Hesiod. At the beginning of our era, the Neoplatonists revived the allegorical method of interpretation, producing interpretations of Greek mythology that included such things as saying that Helen personifies the beauty of the world that lures souls from their true spiritual home into the world of matter.

Philo Judeus of Alexandria (c. 30 B.C. to c. 40 A.D.) applied this “allegoresis” to the Old Testament in an effort to harmonize its anthropomorphic descriptions of God with Greek philosophical ideas about the true nature of divinity. The early Christian fathers also took up this method of interpreting the Old Testament “[a]s a way of eliminating the scandal which particular passages of the Bible might provide for certain Christians, not to mention pagan adversaries of Christianity” (The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, The Pontifical Biblical Commission, 1994; III.B.2). However, the patristic exegetes did not abandon the literal, historical meaning of biblical texts as the Greek philosophers had done with their own mythology. They held that, since it is the word of God, Scripture is an inexhaustible font of revelation for every time and place. The truth it contains cannot be confined to its literal meaning, but must also be sought behind and under the text. Origen (c. 185 to c. 254) is one of the most influential of the early Christian exegetes, famous for his use of allegory when interpreting the Old Testament. Such interpretation, especially the use of typology (e.g. finding in Abraham’s sacrifice of Isaac a “type,” or prefiguring, of Christ’s sacrifice on the cross), allowed the church fathers to counter the Marcionite heresy, which called for abandoning everything Jewish, including the Old Testament, by pointing out how the Old Testament prefigures and points to Christ. St. Augustine (354 to 430) wrote that Scripture contains both a hidden meaning that exercises the intellect and teaches us to value the truth found with effort, and a literal meaning that provides everything necessary for salvation, so that even the unlearned may be saved (On Christian Doctrine, Bk 1). This attitude toward the richness of meaning that can be found in Scripture led to the idea that there are four “senses” of Scripture; the historical or literal, the allegorical or spiritual, and the tropological or moral, and the anagogic or mystical.

Even though the emphasis in biblical study in recent years has been on its literal meaning, especially on trying to discover as nearly as possible the original language and context of the texts, allegorical interpretation continues to be an important way of understanding Scripture. The modern reader may find the patristic use of allegory as an interpretive tool somewhat incredible, but “[t]he fathers of the church teach [us] to read the Bible theologically, within the heart of a living tradition, with an authentic Christian spirit” (Pontifical Biblical Commission, III.B.2). Because it is the word of God, the richness of Scripture’s message is inexhaustible; both the text of Scripture and the realities and events it describes can be signs of God’s plan of salvation. The allegorical sense of Scripture allows us to “acquire a more profound understanding of [those] events by recognizing their significance in Christ” (Catechism of the Catholic Church 117).

Bibliography: M. W. BLOOMFIELD, ed., Allegory, Myth and Symbol (Cambridge, Mass. 1981). H. DE LUBAC, Exégèse médiévale, 2 v. (Paris 1959–64). A. J. S. FLETCHER, Allegory: The Theory of a Symbolic Mode (Ithaca, NY 1964). J. C. JOOSEN and J. H. WASZINK, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1950—) 1:283–293, with bibliog. C. S. LEWIS, The Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition (New York 1936). J. PÉPIN, Mythe et allégorie (Paris 1957). The Pontifical Biblical Commission, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church (1994). J. TATE, The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. M. CARY et al. (Oxford 1934—) 38–39. J. WHITMAN, Allegory: The Dynamics of an Ancient and Medieval Technique (Cambridge, Mass. 1987). H. A. WOLFSON, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, v.1 (Cambridge, Mass. 1956) 24–72.

[L. HARRINGTON]

ALLEGRANZA, JOSEPH

Theologian, archeologist; b. Milan, 1713; d. there, 1785. He belonged to the Milanese Dominican monastery of San Eustorgio and took the habit at Brescia in 1731. After teaching theology at Novara and Vercelli, he took his doctorate in theology at Rome in 1746. He then directed his efforts particularly to archeological researches. His extensive travels in Italy, southern France, and on the Island of Malta provided him with many archeological finds as well as useful friendships. After 1755 he lived almost entirely at Milan, where in 1765 he had the responsibility for cataloging the Pertusati library. For this he was awarded a gold medal from the Empress Maria Theresa. Among his numerous writings of a historical–archeological and antiquarian nature are: Spiegazione, e riflessioni sopra alcuni sacri monumenti antichi di Milano (Milan 1757); De sepulcris christianis in aedibus sacris (Milan 1773); and Opusculi eruditi latini ed italiani (Cremona 1781).

Bibliography: R. COULON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:489–493. G. FERRETTO, Note storico-bibliografiche di archeologia cristiana (Vatican City 1942) 280–282, 339.

[A. L. REDIGONDA]

ALLEGRI, GREGORIO

Priest, composer of the Roman baroque; b. Rome, 1582; d. Rome, Feb. 17, 1652. As a boy he sang under G. B. Nanino at S. Luigi dei Francesi church in Rome from 1591 until his voice changed; he also sang and studied under G. M. Nanino. In 1629, after he had established his reputation as a composer, he was appointed to the papal choir by Urban VIII. As a composer of the late Roman school, Allegri favored the stile antico, with a view to preserving the PALESTRINA tradition, already regarded as the model for liturgical purposes. His most notable work is the nine-voice, two-choir Miserere, which was written down from memory by both MOZART and MENDELSSOHN and is still performed in the Sistine Chapel during Holy Week. Many other sacred works exist in manuscript, and concertini for various voice groupings, motets for two to six voices, and a forerunner of the string quartet were published during his lifetime.

Bibliography: G. ALLEGRI, Miserere, ed. F. HABERL (Augsburg 1936). A. CAMETTI, Rivista musicale Italiana 22 (1915) 596–608. K. G. FELLNER, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart 1:329–330. B. BYRAM-WIGFIELD, “An Unknown Quantity,” The Musical Times 12 (1997) 12–21. DON MICHAEL RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music, 14–15. (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1996). J. ROCHE, “Gregorio Allegri” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v.1, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 266–67. NICOLAS SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition 27 (New York 1992).

[F. J. GUENTNER]

ALLELUIA

A Hebrew word derived from hallelû (imperative of hillel, to praise) and Jah (abbreviated form of Jahvè: God) and frequently used as a means to praise God in Jewish and Christian liturgies. It is found in the following forms: (i) as a responsory, (ii) as an acclamation added to or inserted in a liturgical text, and (iii) as an antiphon. In the Roman Catholic Eucharist, it is sung before the Gospel at all times, except in the season of Lent, when its joyful character excludes its use. During the Easter season, the Alleluia is often added to the antiphons, acclamations and responses in the Eucharist and other liturgical celebrations.

History before Musical Notation. From the beginning of the Christian liturgy there seemed no need to translate this Hebrew word of joy. The present spelling is taken from the Septuagint form Ἀλληλούια. Many patristic texts show that the primitive Church preserved the melismatic character of the Alleluia as found among the Jews. “Nam sicut in melodia hoc compositum nomen [Alleluia] diversos tonos recipit, ita et multiplies causas ad vim suae praedicationis assumit” (Cassiodorus, Pal-Lat 70.811). Jubilatio, melodiae tropi, and even toni are terms used to express the musical vocalizations characteristic of the execution of the Alleluia. Other texts indicate the early use of the word as an acclamation. (See Rv 19.1–7.) “Diligentiones in orando subjungere in orationibus Alleluia solent” (Tertullian, PalLat 1.1304). Later, Cassian and St. Benedict indicate the frequent addition of the word to Psalm verses in the recitation of the Office. Amalarius, writing about 840, is the first to describe the substitution of the word Alleluia for the texts of standard antiphons. “Antiphonae aliquae sunt post responsorios collectae, quarum sonus redactus est in sola Alleluia sibi invicem conjuncta” (Studi e testi 140: 108).

Two problems have been much discussed by scholars: the role of St. Gregory in specifying the times when the Alleluia could be used and the origin of the verse of the Mass Alleluia. The theory generally accepted is that the Alleluia became a part of the Mass by order of Pope Damasus (368–84) at the request of St. Jerome and in imitation of the Church of Jerusalem. Later it was restricted to Easter, but in the 5th century extended to the whole Easter season. St. Gregory, in turn, extended its use to the entire year with the exception of the penitential season. (For the controversy, see Froger and Wellesz in the bibliography.) The oldest references to the Alleluia do not mention the verses, but they are always present in the MS tradition. From the evidence available it is impossible to establish the exact date when the Alleluia as a responsory assumed the form it now has.

History of the Alleluia in Gregorian Chant. In the earliest chant MSS only the Alleluias for Masses on principal feasts were written in the body of the MS; the others were placed in a special fascicle at the end. The selection of the Alleluia for the Sundays and most of the feasts was left to the cantor. For this reason, the first attempts to assign a specific Alleluia for each Mass were not uniform and resulted in various medieval traditions, important for determining the scriptorium from which a MS comes.

The responsorial Alleluia of the classical Roman Rite of the Mass was sung as follows: Alleluia (intoned by soloist), alleluia with jubilus (sung by choir), verse (sung by soloist with the choir joining in at the end), alleluia with jubilus (sung by the choir). In the Middle Ages the Alleluia was not repeated after the verse on ferial days, and on special feasts two verses were sometimes sung as in the Byzantine tradition. The musical structure of the Alleluia and its verses showed great variety. The Alleluia melody may be simple or contain several melodic repetitions, especially in the melisma or jubilus, while the melody of the verse may be new or derived from the Alleluia melody. Frequently the end of the verse repeated the jubilus only, sometimes it repeated the entire melody of the Alleluia plus jubilus, while other verses showed no melodic relationship to the Alleluia and jubilus but had a different melody (such as Venite exultemus, Te decet, and Paratum cor). The frequent statement that the form of the Alleluia was a simple A-B-A is textually correct but musically erroneous. The protus and tetrardus modes were most frequent; the tritus—as in Byzantine chant—was rare. The responsory Alleluia was used only at Mass in the Roman rite, although Amalarius mentioned (op. cit. 105) three Alleluia responses he had found but had not copied into his own antiphony.

The addition of two or three Alleluias to the texts of the Mass and Office was common in Gregorian chant. Musically they were distinct from the responsory Alleluia in that they were more simple; if they had a melisma it was generally found on the syllable “le” and not the last syllable. Some of these are thought to be of Gallican origin. The substitution of the word Alleluia for the texts of antiphons was most common in the Roman rite as the example shows.

In the Old Roman repertory the number of Alleluias in the Mass was indeed much smaller, only 13 melodies being found for the Alleluia that precedes the verse. When the Alleluia was repeated after the verse, a new and longer jubilus was found on larger feasts, but one that was generally related musically to the first jubilus in that it was enlarged by melodic repetitions and ornaments. The jubilus melisma was not found at the end of the verse except for the Alleluia Beatus vir. The interesting Alleluias for Vespers of Paschal week had two or three verses and highly developed melismas.

History of the Alleluia in Mozarabic Chant. The Alleluia of the Mozarabic Mass was sung after the Gospel, not before. More than one verse was not found, and frequently the jubilus was also found at the end of the verse. The Alleluia jubilus when repeated after the verse may be new (as in Vincenti dabo and In die resurrectionis) or a development of the first. The Mozarabic repertory of Mass Alleluias was richer than the Old Roman and Ambrosian. The addition of Alleluias to the Sono (verse sung at beginning of Vespers) and Sacrificium (Offertory) showed long and varied melismas on the syllable “le.” The substitution of the text Alleluia for standard antiphons, however, was not found.

History of the Alleluia in Ambrosian Chant. The Ambrosian Mass Alleluias ignored the tritus modes and, like the Old Roman, were few in number. Each one, however, had three different melismas or jubiluses. The first had no name, but the second was called melodiae primae and the third melodiae secundae, the latter being quite developed. A special melisma called the francigena was sometimes added to make a fourth. The ritual for singing all of this was complicated and cannot be totally unraveled. The same type of responsorial Alleluia was found also in the Ambrosian Office, especially at Vespers. The other phenomena, i.e., additional Alleluias and substitution for standard texts, were also found in the Ambrosian chant.

The “Longissimae Melodiae.” As early as the 9th century there developed in the Gregorian chant a body of elaborate Alleluia melodies, not confused with the liturgical Alleluias but written as a separate collection; they were given strange and suggestive names—Frigdola, Graeca, Hypodiaconissa, Organa, Nostra tuba, Romana, etc. They were called “longissimae melodiae” by Notker and certainly were related to the phenomenon of the longer melismas of the Old Roman, Mozarabic, and Ambrosian liturgical Alleluias. These “longissimae melodiae” are important for the history of the SEQUENCE into which they evolved into.

Bibliography: J. GLIBOTIC, “De cantu Alleluia in patribus saeculo VII antiquioribus,” Ephemerides liturgicae (Rome 1887–) 50 (1936) 101–23. J. FROGER, “L’Alleluia dans l’usage romain et la réforme de St. Grégoire,” ibid. 62 (1948) 6–48. E. WELLESZ, “Gregory the Great’s Letter on the Alleluia,” Annales musicologiques 2 (1954) 1–26. B. STÄBLEIN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 1:331–50. L. BROU, “L’Alleluia dans la liturgie mozarabe,” Annuaire musical 6 (1951) 3–90. F. GENNRICH, Grundriss einer Formenlehre des mittelalterlichen Liedes (Halle 1932) 107–18. D. HILEY, Western Plainchant (Oxford 1993) 130–39, 500–05.

[R. G. WEAKLAND/EDS.]

ALLEN, EDWARD PATRICK

Bishop; b. Lowell, Massachusetts, March 17, 1853; d. Mobile, Alabama, Oct. 21, 1926. The son of John and Mary (Egan) Allen, he attended the public schools of Lowell and Lowell Commercial College before entering Mt. St. Mary’s College, Emmitsburg, Maryland, where he received the Master of Arts (1878). After completing his studies for the priesthood, he was ordained at Emmitsburg on Dec. 17, 1881, by Bishop Thomas A. Becker. Allen first taught at Mt. St. Mary’s, then worked for two years in the Archdiocese of Boston, Massachusetts, returning to Emmitsburg in 1884. After serving briefly as vice president and treasurer of the college, he was elected president in June 1885. On Jan. 26, 1897, he was appointed fifth bishop of Mobile (redesignated MOBILE–BIRMINGHAM in 1954); he was consecrated by Cardinal James Gibbons in Baltimore, Maryland, on May 16 and installed in his diocese on May 30. During the next 30 years the Catholic population in the diocese increased from 17,000 to 48,000; Allen’s administrative ability and sound fiscal policy enabled the diocese to keep pace with this growth by an adequate expansion of clergy, churches, and social services. Particular effort was made in the Negro apostolate through the introduction of the JOSEPHITE fathers, and significant progress was achieved in the hitherto undeveloped rural areas of the diocese.

Bibliography: Archives, Diocese of Mobile–Birmingham.

[O. H. LIPSCOMB]

ALLEN, FRANCES MARGARET, SISTER

Nurse; b. Sunderland, Vermont, Nov. 13, 1784; d. Montreal, Canada, Dec. 10, 1819. She was the first daughter of Revolutionary War hero Ethan Allen and his second wife, Frances Montresor Buchanan. Three years after her birth, the family moved to Burlington, Vermont, and two years later her father died. She grew up in a period of religious revival prompted in part by reaction against her father’s deistic work, Reason: The Only Oracle of Man (1784). Although the revival affected her mother and her stepfather, Jabez Penniman, she remained skeptical. In 1807 she entered the school of the Sisters of Notre Dame in Montreal, where she experienced a spiritual crisis that led her to embrace Catholicism. When she announced her desire to become a nun, Dr. and Mrs. Penniman brought her home. Nevertheless, she returned to Montreal, accompanied by her mother, and on Sept. 20, 1809, entered the nursing order of the Sisters of the Hôtel–Dieu of St. Joseph. She pronounced her vows on March 18, 1811, and devoted herself to pharmacy. During the War of 1812, when the Hôtel–Dieu became a military hospital, she was instrumental in bringing converts into the Catholic Church. Long after her death, a hospital was erected (1894) on a plot that once formed a part of her father’s farm, and the Sister Hospitallers of the Hôtel–Dieu were requested to operate it.

Bibliography: Archives, Hôtel–Dieu, Montreal. L. GIBSON, Some Anglo–American Converts to Catholicism Prior to 1829 (Washington 1943) 171–190. H. MORRISSEY, Ethan Allen’s Daughter (Quebec 1941).

[L. GIBSON]

ALLEN, WILLIAM

Cardinal, founder of the college at Douai; b. Rossall, Lancashire, 1532; d. Rome, Oct. 16, 1594. He was admitted to Oriel College, Oxford (1547) and took his Master of Arts in 1554. He became principal of St. Mary’s Hall, Oxford, in 1556 but resigned soon after the accession of Elizabeth I. He remained in Oxford until 1561 and then went to Louvain to join the distinguished group of English scholars in exile. He returned to England for health reasons in 1562 and spent three years in Lancashire, Oxfordshire, and Norfolk attempting to stiffen Catholic resistance to the religious changes, taking what was then an unusual line among English Catholics, that it was not permissible to be present at Anglican services. He went into exile for the second time and was ordained in 1565. In 1568, with the help of John Vendeville, one of the professors in the new University of DOUAI (DOUAY), he established, by his own initiative and in the face of considerable criticism and opposition, a college at Douai for the training of priests for England. Douai became the major educational center for English Catholics, and its long-term significance is summed up by Philip Hughes's comment: "Here, under God, was the principal means of preserving the Catholic Church in England for the next two hundred years."

Leader of the Exiles. William Allen was regarded as the leader of English Catholics and was called to Rome as adviser on English affairs in 1575, 1579, and 1585, after which he remained in Rome until his death. In 1587, at the request of Philip II, King of Spain, and because of the role he was intended to play as archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellor if the Armada succeeded, Sixtus V made him a cardinal.

Probably from about the mid-1570s Allen was deeply involved in various enterprises to overthrow the Elizabethan government and to support a rival claimant to the throne when Elizabeth I was removed from the scene. With Robert PERSONS and others he was a leader of the "Spanish party" among English Catholics abroad. Allen maintained that the seminary priests sent to England came purely for religious reasons and had no political intentions. In his Defence of the English Catholics (1584), he argued that the priests were not traitors and were not working for the overthrow of the regime. With few exceptions this is undoubtedly true, but Allen and his associates were certainly using political means to try to secure their end—the preservation of the Catholic religion in England. They believed that unless action were taken by Catholic rulers in Europe, English Catholicism would be destroyed. Allen's own actions from the mid-1570s and his own statements in his Defence of Sir William Stanley's Surrender of Deventer (1587) and in his Admonition to the Nobility and People of England and Ireland (1588), which was intended for distribution if the Armada secured a bridgehead, show clearly that he considered that Elizabeth had forfeited any claim to the loyalty of Catholics. This attitude is logical and understandable, but it placed the seminary priests and the Jesuits in an awkward position in relation to the government and lent weight to the charge that the priests were softening up English Catholics so that they would become traitors as soon as the invaders landed.

Allen's Achievements. Allen's varied activities included important contributions to contemporary controversial writing. His profound interest in the Scriptures led, among other work, to the production of the Rheims-Douay New Testament. His remarkable personality and his deep charity helped to ensure the success of Douai and the holding together of the English Catholic body. After his death the college ran into many difficulties, partly because of the absence of any formal regulations, which he had considered unnecessary. The divisions among English Catholics at home and abroad, which were already considerable in his lifetime, became even more deep-seated after his death and did lasting harm to the Catholic cause in England.

Bibliography: Works. Letters and Memorials, ed. T. F. KNOX (London 1882). The First and Second Diaries of the English College, Douay, ed. T. F. KNOX (London 1878). "Some Correspondence of Cardinal Allen, 1579–85," ed. P. RYAN in Publications of the Catholic Record Society (Aberdeen 1911) 7:12–105, additional letters. Literature. P. K. GUILDAY, The English Catholic Refugees on the Continent 1558–1795 (New York 1914). A. C. SOUTHERN, Elizabethan Recusant Prose, 1559–1582 (London 1950). B. CAMM, Cardinal William Allen (New York 1909). M. HAILE, An Elizabethan Cardinal (New York 1914). G. MATTINGLY, The Armada (Boston 1959). "William Allen and Catholic Propaganda in England," Travaux d'Humanisme et Renaissance, 28 (1957) 325–339. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 1:314–322. F. STEGMÜLLER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:346–347.

[P. MCGRATH]

ALLOUEZ, CLAUDE JEAN

Jesuit missionary; b. Saint Didier-en-Forez, France, June 6, 1622; d. near Niles, Mich., Aug. 27–28, 1689. He joined the Jesuits at Toulouse (1639), studied there and at Billom and Rodez, and was ordained in 1655. He was 36 when he arrived in Canada, where he spent the next seven years ministering to the settlers in the Saint Lawrence area. In 1665 he was named vicar-general to Bishop François de Montmorency Laval of Quebec. Allouez's assignment to the Great Lakes region marked the first step toward the organization of the hierarchy in the central part of what later became the United States. From 1665 to 1689 he traveled the Great Lakes region in all directions—Huron, Superior, Erie, Michigan—covering 3,000 miles, preaching to more than 20 native tribes, and, it is said, baptizing about 10,000 persons. In 1667 he went to Lake Nipigon and celebrated the first Mass to be offered within the boundaries of the present Diocese of Fort-William, Ontario. He worked among the Illinois, prepared a prayer book in Illinois and French, laid the foundations for St. Francis Xavier Mission (1673), and wrote Récit d'un 3(e) voyage fait aux Illinois (c. 1679). The Relations of 1667 to 1676 have preserved numerous extracts from his journals; the edition of 1671 contains a portion of the address he delivered the preceding year at Sault Sainte Marie, Michigan, when M. S. F. de Saint-Lusson took possession of the territories of the West in the name of the King of France. Allouez is honored in the U.S., especially in Wisconsin, where in 1899 the Wisconsin Historical Society raised a monument to him at De Pere, the center of his missionary activities.

Bibliography: "Narrative of a 3rd Voyage to the Illinois made by Father Claude Allouez," Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents, ed. R. G. THWAITES, 73 v. (Cleveland 1896–1901; New York 1959–) 60:148–167, and general intro. G. J. GARRAGHAN, Jesuits of the Middle U.S. (New York 1938) 1:3–4. T. J. CAMPBELL, Pioneer Priests of North America, 3 v. (New York 1908–19) 3:147–164. F. J. NELLIGAN, "The Visit of Father Allouez to Lake Nipigon in 1667," Canadian Catholic Historical Association Report (1956) 41–52.

[L. POULIOT]

ALMA

The Hebrew word 'almâ used to describe the mother of EMMANUEL in the divine oracle delivered to King Ahaz of Juda (735–715 B.C.) by the prophet ISAIAH (Is 7.14). The Hebrew substantive is the feminine counterpart of the rare 'elem, "young lad," and ordinarily designates a young girl of marriageable age until the birth of her first child, prescinding entirely from her actual marital or virginal status. (The Hebrew word for expressing "virgin" as such is b' tûlâ.) A Ugaritic cognate, ġlmt, is attested in approximately the same meaning as alma; but the Ugaritic literary parallel adduced for the prophecy in the poem of Nikkal is based on a highly questionable textual restoration. In the OT itself, this prophecy exhibits the literary characteristics of the genre known as "birth ORACLE" (Geburtsorakel), foretelling a child's birth, name, food, and future circumstances of life (cf. Jgs 13.3–5; Lk 1.13–17).

The Septuagint translation in choosing to render alma in this passage by παρθένος (rather than νεᾶνις) furnishes a pre-Christian interpretation and greater specification of the somewhat neutral Hebrew expression by making explicit the notion of "virginity" connected with the mother of Emmanuel. In Mt 1.23 the angel appearing to Joseph in a dream is portrayed as citing the Septuagint version of the prophecy of Emmanuel and his virgin mother and applying it to Mary and her expected child. Subsequent Christian translations and interpretations of the passage in antiquity generally followed the lead of the Septuagint.

Because of its use in Matthew, this prophecy has usually been held to refer to Mary and her Son in at least a typical sense (implicitly demanded by Pius VI in his brief Divina, Sept. 20, 1779, Enchiridion biblicum 74). But the literal sense of the passage has often been disputed, and no single theory has been able to win general acceptance. The following points describe briefly the four opinions most commonly held at present. (1) The prophecy may be taken as literally messianic (see MESSIANISM). Isaiah was promising as a sign for the king a future savior of Israel, even though the prophet may not have fully understood the import of his words. (2) The literal sense of the prophecy may involve no specific woman and child, but may simply be a figurative way of expressing passage of time in a broader context. Isaiah 7.14–16 should be interpreted as a whole: "Before the unborn child of any woman now pregnant has had time to reach the age of discretion, the two kings whom [Ahaz] fears will be destroyed." (3) The prophecy may be viewed as referring to Isaiah's own wife (cf. Is 8.3) and his own unborn child. The child's birth and naming are wholly within the prophet's power because Emmanuel is in fact to be his own son. This opinion sees ch. 6–8 of Isaiah as the proper context for interpreting the oracle and tends to regard 7.18–25 (and perhaps also 7.15, 17) as later literary additions. (4) The oracle may refer literally to Ahaz's queen Abi(a) and the unborn prince who will reign as Hezekiah (715–686 B.C.). The birth of the heir to David's throne would be a mighty portent for the king and provide a fitting type for the Messiah to be born of the same Davidic royal line. The prophecies of the "Prince of Peace" and the "Root of Jesse" in ch. 9 and 11 of Isaiah would thus be fulfilled in varying degrees in both the literal, present heir and in his messianic antitype.

See Also: VIRGIN BIRTH.

Bibliography: J. LINDBLOM, A Study of the Immanuel Section in Isaiah (Lund 1957). N. K. GOTTWALD, "Immanuel as the Prophet's Son," Vetus Testamentus 8 (1958) 36–47. J. J. STAMM, "Neuere Arbeiten zum Immanuel-Problem," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 68 (1956) 46–53. M. MCNAMARA, "The Emmanuel Prophecy and Its Context," Scripture 14 (1962) 118–125; 15 (1963) 19–23, 80–88.

[J. A. BRINKMAN]

ALMA REDEMPTORIS MATER

One of the four Marian antiphons, this chant was traditionally sung at the end of Compline from the Vespers of Saturday before the first Sunday of Advent to the second Vespers of the Feast of the Lord's Presentation (Feb. 2). HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS, a monk of Reichenau (1013–54), is believed to have composed both the words and the music. Although now sung as an independent piece, this chant was originally performed in the manner characteristic of antiphons, i.e., it preceded and followed the chanting of a psalm or canticle on a simple formula. The 13th century MS Worcester Cathedral F. 160 (Paléographie musicale 12:303), assigns it to Terce of the Feast of the Assumption and provides it with a differ- entia, an ending formula for the psalm tone to be used with it. The more elaborate of the two chant melodies for this antiphon is apparently the original one; it served as the basis for numerous medieval and Renaissance compositions. It is found as the tenor of 13th century motets in the Montpellier, Bamberg, and Las Huelgas MSS; in these works the upper voices have different texts. The chant is composed in the major scale rather than in one of the medieval modes, and has often been said to be of particular beauty.

Bibliography: G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940); Music in the Renaissance (New York 1959). W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958). P. WAGNER, Einführung in die gregorianischen Melodien (Leipzig 1911–21). B. STÄBLEIN, "Antiphon," Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949) 1:523–545.

[R. STEINER]

ALMAIN, JACQUES

Theologian whose works influenced Gallican theories; b. Sens, c. 1480; d. Paris, 1515. At first he taught dialectics and natural philosophy at the University of Paris, but then entered the College of Navarre in 1508 to pursue theology, and three years later received his doctorate. In 1512 he was commissioned to teach theology at the college, a task he continued until his death, expounding, as was the custom of the day, the Books of Sentences. Almain's rise to prominence was occasioned by Cajetan's treatise De comparatione auctoritatis papae et concilii, in which the eminent Thomist personally defended the authority of the pope at the Pseudo-Council of Pisa against the advocates of the conciliar theory. (See CONCILIARISM.) Almain was assigned the task of censuring Cajetan's position. His work, De auctoritate ecclesiae et conciliorum generalium adversus Thomam de Vio, appeared in 1512. Among other doctrinal points, he maintained that the authority of a general council is superior to that of the pope. Invoking Matthew 18.17, he argued that the bishops gathered in a general council have divine power to judge all the faithful including the pope, because the latter is a member of the Church; that they have the right to impose their will upon him and even to depose him if need be; that the pope is superior to bishops taken individually, but inferior to them gathered in a council. Besides several purely philosophical works, seven of Almain's theological treatises, of unequal value and interest, are extant.

Bibliography: V. OBLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1:895–897.

[G. M. GRABKA]

ALMERÍA, MARTYRS OF, SS.

D. Aug. 29–Sept. 12, 1936, Almería, Andalucía, Spain. At the outbreak of the three-year Spanish Civil War, 19 Lasallian Brothers of the Christian Schools (Christian Brothers) ran a free school and St. Joseph's College in Almería in the southeastern-most corner of the Iberian Peninsula. On July 22, 1936, members of the Popular Front arrested and confined in makeshift prisons the local religious as enemies of the revolution. Although some survived the privation and mistreatment, two bishops and seven Christian Brothers did not. Each of these martyrs was shot to death without a trial for the crime of professing and teaching the faith.

Herrero, Valerio Bernardo, Bl., baptized Marciano Herrero Martínez, brother; b. July 11, 1909, Porquera de los Infantes, Spain; entered the novitiate Feb. 1, 1926; d. Aug. 30, 1936 near Tabernas. Together with Brother Edmigio and Amalio, he was transferred on Aug. 3, 1936 to the crowded Astoy Mendi prison where their names were added to a list of religious. At the end of August the trio was loaded on a truck, presumably bound for Cartagena, but they were executed en route, and their bodies thrown in a well or mine shaft.

Medina Olmos, Emmanuel (Manuel), St., bishop of Guadix (Spain), the diocese just west of Almería; d. Aug. 29, 1936. Bishops Medina and Ventaja were the first of this group to suffer. They were taken to an isolated spot with fifteen other prisoners and executed.

Mendoza, Amalio, St., baptized Justo Zariquiegui Mendoza, brother; b. Aug. 6, 1886, Salinas de Oro, Spain; entered the novitiate Sept. 13, 1902; d. Aug. 30, 1936 near Tabernas.

Rodríguez, Edmigio, St., baptized Isidoro Primo Rodríguez González, brother; b. April 4, 1881, Adalia, Spain; entered the novitiate Oct. 8, 1898; d. Aug. 30, 1936 with Brs. Amalio and Valerio near Tabernas.

Rodríguez, José Cecilio, St., baptized Bonifacio Rodríguez González, brother; b. May 14, 1885, La Molina de Ubierna, Spain; entered the novitiate Nov. 21, 1901; d. Sept. 12, 1936, Almería. Brothers José Cecilio and Aurelio María were the last to die. They were briefly detained in a convent, then transferred to Capitan Segarra prison. They were among 28 prisoners executed by a firing squad. Their bodies were thrown into a mine shaft.

Säiz, Teodomiro Joaquín, St., baptized Adrián Säiz Säiz, brother; b. Sept. 8, 1907, Puentedey, Spain; entered the novitiate Aug. 15, 1923; d. Sept. 8, 1936, Almería. Like three others of this group, Brothers Teodomiro Joaquín and Evencio Ricardo were transferred to Astoy Mendi prison. They were shot on the roadside. Their discarded bodies were never found.

Uyarra, Evencio Ricardo, St., baptized Eusebio Alonso Uyarra, brother; b. March 5, 1907, Viloria de Rioja, Spain; entered the novitiate Feb. 2, 1923; d. Sept. 8, 1936, Almería.

Ventaja Milan, Diego (James) St., bishop of Almería; d. Aug. 29, 1936. Bishop Ventaja was given several opportunities to flee the war zone, but insisted upon remaining with his flock. He died with Bishop Medina and 15 other prisoners. A monument to his courage stands in Almería.

Villalón, Aurelio María, St., baptized Bienvenido Villalón Acebrón, brother; b. March 22, 1890, Zafra de Zánacara, Spain; entered the novitiate Aug. 22, 1906; d. Sept. 12, 1936, Almería. Brother Aurelio María was director of St. Joseph's College. When he was shot, his prayer of several years was heard: "What happiness for us if we could shed our blood for the lofty ideal of Christian education. Let us double our fervor and thus become worthy of such an honor." See José Cecilio Rodríguez above.

This group was both beatified (Oct. 10, 1993) and canonized (Nov. 21, 1999) by John Paul II.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ALMICI, CAMILLO

Oratorian scholar; b. Brescia, Italy, June 2, 1714; d. there, 1779. Camillo, inclined from boyhood to learning and piety, joined the Brescia Oratory at the age of 19. After his ordination he spent his life in this community, becoming a distinguished theologian, apologist, and critical scholar, expert particularly in Hebrew, Greek, and Scripture. He was also well acquainted with church history and patristic writings, in fact with the whole field of secular history and archeology. As a scholar, he made himself accessible to other scholars and students, and was much consulted. As an Oratorian priest, he was a popular preacher and confessor. His writings include Riflessioni su di un libro di Giustino Febronio (Lucca 1766); Critica contro le opere del pericoloso Voltaire (Brescia 1771); Dissertazione sopra i martiri della Chiesa cattolica (Brescia 1765); Meditazione sopra la vita e gli scritti di Paolo Sarpi (Brescia 1765), in which he points out the tendentiousness and unreliability of Sarpi's history of the Council of Trent; and a dissertation on the art of writing biography and autobiography. Almicci published some small works under the anagrammatic pseudonyms Callimaco Limi, and Callimaco Mili.

Bibliography: C. TOUSSAINT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:898. P. GUERRINI, Le Congregazione dei Padri della Pace (Brescia 1933). Hurter Nomencl 5.1:224–225. A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:658.

[J. CHALLENGOR]

ALMOND, JOHN, ST.

English martyr; b. Allerton, near Liverpool, c. 1577; d. Tyburn, Dec. 5, 1612. At the age of eight, having already attended Much Wootton Grammar School, he went to Ireland, where he remained until 1597. He then entered the English College at Rome and in April 1601 he was ordained. To gain his Doctor of Divinity degree he gave a public disputation that won great applause, since he was exceptionally clever and quick at debate. Almond left Rome for England in September of 1602 and became a successful missionary—discreet, forceful, and holy. In 1607 he was tracked down by pursuivants in Holborn, taken to Newgate, and then transferred to the Gatehouse Prison. He either escaped or was released, for he was heard of in Staffordshire in 1609. In 1612 he was again arrested and brought before Dr. John King, Bishop of London. Part of the extant record of the examination reads:

BISHOP: In what place were you born?

JOHN ALMOND: About Allerton.

BISHOP: About Allerton! Mark the equivocation; then not in Allerton?

JOHN ALMOND: No equivocation. I was not born in Allerton but on the edge or side of Allerton.

BISHOP: You were born under a hedge then were you?

JOHN ALMOND: Many a better man, than I or you either, has been born under a hedge.

BISHOP: You cannot remember that you were born in a house?

JOHN ALMOND: Can you?

BISHOP: My mother told me so.

JOHN ALMOND: Then you remember not that you were born in a house but only that your mother told you so. So much I remember too.

He was committed to Newgate, where the prisoners were in danger of suffocation from the stench of the dungeon. Because of his reputation for cleverness and sanctity, Protestant ministers, including the archbishop of Canterbury, carried on disputes with Almond in the hope of winning a recantation; but they always retired, beaten in argument. On Dec. 3, 1612, he was brought for trial under his own name and two aliases, Mollinax and Laddome. Although no proof was brought, he was found guilty of being a priest and on December 5 he was drawn to Tyburn. His last words on the scaffold were, “In manus tuas Domine . . .”; he was canonized on Oct. 25, 1970. (See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.)

Feast: Dec. 5; Oct. 25; May 4.

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:502–503. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891) 170–193. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time, 5 v. (London–New York 1885–1902) 1:26–27. W. J. STEELE, Blessed John Almond (Postulation pamphlet; London 1961).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

ALMS AND ALMSGIVING (IN THE BIBLE)

A religious act, inspired by compassion and a desire for justice, whereby an individual who possesses the economic means helps in a material way his less fortunate neighbor. In the earlier history of Israel when society was predominantly seminomadic and all members were more or less economically equal, there was no need of almsgiving. But with the possession of landed property, the growth of aristocracy, and the centralization of government, a large mass of debt-ridden farmers arose in contrast to a small urban nobility. Such a society offended the ideal of social justice that the covenant of Yahweh demanded. Hence, the Prophets, beginning with Amos, denounced oppression of the poor (Am 5.11–12, 24; 8.4; Is 10.2; Mi 2.2) and vigorously demanded social justice (Am 5.24).

Throughout the Old Testament the notion of alms (concrete aid given the poor) is understood primarily in the context of justice; just as Yahweh acts with justice, so, too, must his worshipers. The Hebrew word for alms, šēdāqâ, means justice or righteousness; giving to the poor helps reestablish the right order; it produces justice. To return to the poor man his pledged cloak at nightfall that he may sleep in comfort is justice (šēdāqâ) before Yahweh (Dt 24.13). Mindful of the poor, the Law prescribed that the land should lie fallow every 7th year (Ex 23.11) and that the gleanings from the harvest should be left for the poor in the field and vineyard (Lv 19.9–10; 23.22; see also Ru 2.2–8). After the Exile there was a growing emphasis on the religious nature of personal almsgiving.

Job, in his plea of a clean conscience, asserts that his reverence for God prompted him to give food, clothing, and shelter to the needy (Jb 31.16–23). Alms purge away sin, deliver from death (Tb 12.9; see also Dn 4.24), and bring God’s favor on the giver (Tb 4.7); on the other hand, refusing alms to the poor brings a just retribution (Prv 21.13) because God, who created the poor man, too, will hear the latter’s cry (Sir 4.1–6).

In the New Testament almsgiving is considered primarily as an act of religion springing from love and compassion; its note of social justice also is alluded to, especially in the writings of St. Luke and in the Epistle of James. Jesus enjoins unostentatious almsgiving, together with prayer and fasting, as one of the pillars of the religious life (Mt 6.1–2, 5, 16, 19). It merits a heavenly reward (Mt 6.4, 20; 19.27–29; 25.40; Lk 12.33; 16.1–9) and makes the donor a true son of the Most High (Lk 6.35). Luke’s writings, in particular, commend almsgiving; he alone relates the stories of Zachaeus, a chief tax collector, who gave half his possessions to the poor (Lk 19.1–10), of the Baptist’s advice to share food and clothing with the needy (Lk 3.11), and of Christ’s advice to lend money without thought of return (Lk 6.35). Luke also takes the opportunity of relating that Paul worked with his hands to provide for the needs of others as well as his own (Acts 18.3; 20.34–35). St. Paul organized collections for the poor (Rom 15.25–28; 1 Cor 16.1; 2 Cor 8–9), in order not only to alleviate want, but to break down prejudices between Jew and Gentile and to knit the members of Christ into a community of good will. According to St. James, true religion demands that those in the Christian community who possess the means should help their needy brethren (Jas 1.27; 2.14–17; see also 1 Jn 3.17; 1 Pt 4.8–10).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 55–56. G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters’ Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 1:87–88. O. CONE, Rich and Poor in the New Testament (New York 1902). R. BULTMANN, “ἐλεημοσύνη,” G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:482–83. H. J. CADBURY, The Making of Luke—Acts (2d ed. London 1958) 260–63.

[M. RODRÍGUEZ]

ALMS AND ALMSGIVING (IN THE CHURCH)

The word alms can be traced back to the Greek word ἐλεημοσύνη (pity). This word is found in the Septuagint, a fact of importance since it is especially in Holy Scripture that the divine perspective on alms can be seen. From this point of view, the Christian is led to reflect on his duties in regard to those less favored than himself, and especially on the responsibilities of his Christian stewardship over material goods. St. Thomas Aquinas considered almsgiving the general and principal work of mercy (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 32).

The Value of Alms. Alms assume so large a place in the design of eternal love that Holy Scripture considers a heart attentive to the poor a genuine blessing. “Happy is he who has regard for the lowly and the poor; in the day of misfortune the Lord will deliver him. The Lord will keep and preserve him, He will make him happy upon the earth, and not give him over to the will of his enemies. The Lord will help him on his sick bed, He will take away all his ailment when he is ill” [Ps 40(41). 1–4]. Such blessings are hardly surprising since an alms given to a fellow man is received by God Himself. As the Old Testament puts it, “He who has compassion on the poor lends to the Lord, and He will repay him for his good deed” (Prv 19.17), but the New Testament incomparably enhances this value of alms since there it is Jesus Christ Himself who is the recipient of alms. This truth is repeatedly illustrated in the legends of the saints. For example, Christ, disguised as a poor man who was clothed by St. Martin of Tours, was to make Martin a great missionary to the pagans and the founder of the Church of Gaul. The first miracle after Pentecost, which had an enormous effect in Jerusalem, was performed by Peter, who, when asked for an alms, gave not silver and gold, but what he had (see Acts 3.6).

Since God sees as His own the needs of the poor, alms have an eternal value, meriting a treasure in heaven. “Sell what you have and give alms. Make for yourselves . . . a treasure in heaven” (Lk 12.33). Alms also have the redemptive value of blotting out sins. “Water quenches a flaming fire and alms atone for sin” (Sir 3.29). In this spirit Daniel gives advice to a king who is in agony over his own weakness: “Atone for your sins by good deeds and for your misdeeds by kindness to the poor, then your posterity will be long” (Dn 4.24). The Archangel Raphael affirms this value of alms to the family of Tobit; in fact, this is one of the most important lessons given by this Biblical work. “Prayer is good with fasting and alms more than to lay up treasures of gold, for alms delivereth from death, and the same is that which purgeth away sin, and maketh to find mercy and life everlasting” (Tb 12.8–9). Another aspect of the value of alms is that of sacrifice, as taught by Sirach. “In works of charity one offers fine flour, and when he gives alms he presents his sacrifice of prayer” (Sir 35.2).

Alms Purify the Heart. The portions of personal possessions so shared are detached from what is kept, and this tends to create an interior detachment. This may be the meaning of the somewhat obscure text of St. Luke: “Nevertheless, give that which remains as an alms; and behold, all things are clean to you” (Lk 11. 41).

Alms have still other values, for they enrich not only the giver, but the Church, since its charity is in this way enlarged. Alms increase brotherly love in the recipient, who in his turn prays for his benefactor. More particularly, in the exchange of mutual aid between the churches, the entire Mystical Body is blessed. This idea was the foundation of St. Paul’s totally apostolic concern for Jerusalem’s poor. He considered alms to be a means of eliminating the causes of disunity among Christians. “Now, however, I will set out for Jerusalem to minister to the saints. For Macedonia and Achaia have thought it well to make a contribution for the poor among the saints at Jerusalem” (Rom 15.25–26). Such an idea might have splendid applications to the bonds between parishes and dioceses with the help of papal direction. It would be a witnessing before the world to the mutual aid existing among Christ’s disciples so that at least among them there would be no distinction based either on race or on country.

The final words of Paul lead to an even higher sphere: human alms become a divine revelation since God both inspires the good action and is glorified by it. “He . . . will increase the growth of the fruits of your justice that, being enriched in all things, you may contribute with simplicity of heart, and thus through us evoke thanksgiving to God; for the administration of this service not only supplies the wants of the saints, but overflows also in much gratitude to the Lord. The evidence furnished by this service makes them glorify God for your obedient profession of Christ’s gospel and for the sincere generosity of your contributions to them and to all; while they themselves, in their prayers for you, yearn for you, because of the excellent grace God has given you” (2 Cor 9.11–14).

Qualities of Alms. In order to have such value and to merit these promises, alms should correspond to the divine pattern. First, the primacy of intention must be emphasized, for intention is the soul of human action and gives it its real value. Christ Himself emphatically taught that alms should be given “in secret and thy Father, who sees in secret, will reward thee” (Mt 6.2–4). Christian alms then, should be a communion in merciful love. From this point of view, almsgiving has a delicacy that excludes ostentation and avoids the display of any superiority. St. Jerome once said that alms should be given as if the giver were the real recipient (Letter to Hedibian.) More emphatically yet, the Lord taught, “When thou givest alms, do not let thy left hand know what thy right hand is doing” (Mt 6.3).

Almsgiving must also be totally disinterested, “not hoping for anything in return” (Lk 6.35; cf. Lk 14.4). The Old Testament had already mentioned the importance of promptness in the reception of a needy friend: “Refuse no one the good on which he has a claim when it is in your power to do it for him. Say not to your neighbor, ‘Go and come again tomorrow, tomorrow I will give,’ when you can give at once” (Prv 3.27–28).

Almsgiving was commanded by the Lord, but not simply in the sense of material assistance; it includes rather, the realization of the compassionate intention of love. St. Paul expressly adds joy to the eagerness of generosity: “He who shows mercy [should do so] with cheerfulness” (Rom 12.8). In a word, alms should reflect the realism of a love that is attentive in its search for the opportunity of fraternal service, since the brother with whom we share what we have is a child of the same Father from whom we have all received. The example of Christ Himself speaks volumes. Living on alms, He nonetheless gave alms to those poorer than Himself (Jn 13.29). Even more, Christ is God’s gift for the enrichment of the world: “For you know the graciousness of our Lord Jesus Christ—how being rich he became poor for your sakes, that by his poverty you might become rich” (2 Cor 8.9).

Obligation to Give Alms. St. John has formulated the principle: “He who has the goods of this world and sees his brother in need and closes his heart to him, how does the love of God abide in him?” (1 Jn 3.17). True love demands a sharing when there is an abundance on one hand and a need on the other. To refuse to meet this demand is incompatible with charity. In the parable, the priest and the levite saw the unfortunate Samaritan; they could have helped him, but they passed by. It is seldom that a man’s life depends so entirely on help from his neighbor, but when it does, the obligation is quite clear. This obligation would be so great that to refuse or deny it would be to destroy charity.

Conditions for the Obligation. “Abundance” exists when one has more than is necessary and strictly useful for his own life, for that of his family, or for the maintenance of his social position. Provision for one’s social position is not necessarily a matter of snobbery or ostentation. Social life can impose real obligations. What these may be in any particular case may be determined by reasonable custom and special circumstances as these are evaluated by the Christian conscience of the individual. The logic of his faith and the operation of the gifts of the Holy Spirit will enable him to reach decisions about what is necessary to himself and what should be shared with his neighbor.

Extreme necessity means the absence or insufficiency of goods required for human life. The standard of living varies in different situations. Three stages and forms of theological thought upon this subject can be distinguished. The Fathers were preoccupied with preaching the necessity of almsgiving; the scholastics, with the analysis of its theological foundations; the casuists, with the practical application of the theological conclusions.

The Fathers, as in fact Christian preachers of every age have done, sought to inspire love of the poor and horror of greed and selfishness. They insisted upon the responsibility of the rich, who, as stewards of God, owed their superabundance to the poor. St. Thomas and the scholastics in general worked out the connection between mercy and alms and analyzed the essential reasons why almsgiving is obligatory. From the 14th to the end of the 18th century the major concern of moralists was the problem of conscience in the determination to the extent of the obligation in concrete situations. An effort was made to achieve precision. When exactly is there real abundance? When are alms a matter of strict precept, and when are they more a matter of counsel? St. Alphonsus Liguori studied, edited, and criticized the thought of his predecessors; and his conclusions on the subjects of extreme need and abundance have become classic. With a view to the circumstances of his own time and society, St. Alphonsus taught that the rich should give in charity a 50th part, that is, 2 per cent, of what they could save. In defense of this and other similar theological conclusions in this matter—some propositions were in fact condemned by the Church as too lax—it should be noted that although the sum demanded for charity appears small, these authors did not lose sight of the wider horizons of the Gospel; and they were striving to determine what charity required as a matter of course and independently of extreme need. Confronted by a neighbor in extreme need, no Christian is really faithful to the Gospel when he is not prepared to sacrifice his abundance.

Alms are a matter of counsel when fraternal charity can be genuine without them, for instance, when the necessity of one’s neighbor is not at the moment so pressing that a refusal to help him would be equivalent to a denial of love. On the other hand, there would be a serious obligation when the withholding of help would keep another from a good absolutely necessary to him. In this case, the lack of love would constitute a mortal sin against fraternal charity.

Generally speaking, then, the obligation of almsgiving is measured both by the extent of one’s abundance, and by the kind of necessity the abundance would alleviate. If this necessity is extreme and one’s assistance is the only possible way to relieve it, the duty is strict, but if the condition of need is known to others or if it is not really extreme, determination of the extent and force of the obligation calls for the exercise of prudence. The obligation itself is clear because of its connection with fraternal charity; the assessment of the obligation in concrete situations is often not easy to make.

Difficulty in Assessing. This may be due not only to variable circumstances but also, perhaps, to the very nature of things. An adequate Christian judgment in this matter can proceed only from a genuinely spiritual estimate of one's own resources. Certainly God's plan involves the provision of room in human life for creativeness and the generous use of freedom. However, this should not be used as a pretext to evade imperative duty where it clearly exists. Any uncertainty about the extent of a man's obligation should move him to develop the habit of seeing Christ in those poorer than himself. One's final welcome into the kingdom—or his rejection—will depend upon the criterion of his effective love for his brethren (Mt 25.34–46). The complexity of life's circumstances shows only that Christ wants His disciples to be free and to use their real liberty in a life of charity, with their conscience enlightened by the divine mercy.

Application to Contemporary Life. The two roots of the obligation of almsgiving indicated by St. John are having the goods of this world and seeing the need of a brother (1 Jn 3.17). In the contemporary world the "having" and "wanting" are viewed in relation to an expanding economy that is not only national but international in scope. In the scale of needs there is almost infinite variation, and while the duties of love have not lost their ancient urgency, their application must undergo modification.

The State's Assumption of the Burden of Providing for Many Needs. Modern civilization has become conscious of at least some of the human rights consonant with human dignity, and in genuine democracies these rights are clearly seen. The state either directly or indirectly takes over more and more of the responsibility for meeting such needs as arise from unemployment, illness, old age, and so on. In consequence of this, many people do not require the help of private charity. To pay taxes or to take out insurance is to participate in the assistance the state and other institutions offer. When these factors are taken into consideration, it can be seen that there has been reduction in the frequency of instances of clearly assessable obligation to give alms.

Nevertheless, there will always be cases in which a Christian cannot rely on the community to assume his personal duty to give alms any more than he can expect the community to assume his personal obligation to love his brother. Laws cannot cover every situation (unforeseen accidents, immediate urgencies, and the like). In addition to obligations arising in such circumstances, a sense of charitable responsibility for his brethren should penetrate and illumine the Christian's performance of his civic duties and particularly the exercise of his right to vote.

Personal Knowledge of the Universality of Human Misery. The newspapers, radio, and television present the public with a spectacle of worldwide need, and this the Christian will see as a call upon his charity. No national or political limits exist for Christian charity. In most situations, only well-organized community effort can make an adequate response to the enormous needs. In the multitude of appeals and of possibilities offered, a 20th-century Christian may need to make a choice; bearing in mind the order of charity, he may have to consider which neighbors are closest to him spiritually. One such spiritual consideration might be "his brethren in the faith." "Therefore, while we have time, let us do good to all men, but especially to those who are of the household of the faith" (Gal 6.10). Those of the household will recognize the help more clearly as an expression of faith. But in general, discernment and an interior spirit become increasingly necessary for the Christian as he finds himself assailed with more multiple and varied appeals.

Need for Collective Organizations. In the mid-20th century it was said that almost any aid project involves so many costly measures that only an organization could undertake it. This is true, especially in cases in which aid must be sent to distant places. This kind of situation should broaden the scope of a Christian's compassionate intentions. He should be conscious of the complexities of the problem and take these into account in his thinking about economics, politics, and international relations. He may feel himself (and be) obligated to personal participation in collective effort and in interesting others by information and appeal. Yet in all this the Christian must take constant care that his participation remains an expression of fraternal love, without which no alms are pleasing to God. The qualities stated above that should mark Christian almsgiving should also characterize participation in the different forms of collective effort to bring aid to others. Otherwise these efforts will degenerate into mere philanthropic enterprises.

While he busies himself by having a share in large and collective undertakings, the Christian will try to keep alert in order not to miss the occasional opportunity that may occur to exercise charity in a direct, immediate, and personal way. He will remember that alms can be in forms other than money. His time, influence, friendliness, sympathy, and encouragement can also be a kind of alms and will give him much opportunity to prove his love for Christ and His Gospel.

See Also: MERCY; MERCY, WORKS OF; CHARITY.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 30–33. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (new ed. Rome 1905–12) 1.2:3.2. A. BEUGNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 1.2:2561–71. R. BROUILLARD, Catholicisme 1:1050–56; “La Doctrine Catholique de l’aumône,” Nouvevth 54 (1927) 5–36. L. BOUVIER, Le Précepte de l’aumône chez saint Thomas d’Aquin (Montreal 1935). G. J. BUDDE, “Christian Charity, Now and Always: The Fathers of the Church and Almsgiving,” American Ecclesiastical Review, 85 (1931) 561–579. J. D. O’NEILL, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al. (New York 1904–14; suppl. 1922) 1.1:328–331.

[J. M. PERRIN]

ALOGOI

The name given to heretics who denied the divinity of Christ as the Logos, as in St. John’s Gospel, Epistles, and the Apocalypse. They were first named by EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA (Panarion 51; Ancor. 13.5). They were mentioned by IRENAEUS (Adv. haer. 3.11. 9–17) as Montanists misusing the Johannine teaching on the Paraclete. Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 3.28.1) and Hippolytus (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 1.2:241–247) described the Roman priest Gaius in the reign of Pope ZEPHYRINUS (199–217) as attributing the Johannine writings to the Gnostic Cerinthus. A type of enthusiastic spirituality, the Alogoi doctrine was current in the West in the 2nd and 3rd centuries; the necessity of defending the Johannine writings then is evident in Hippolytus and the MURATORIAN CANON (lines 16–26). The name Alogoi has a double meaning: men denying the Logos, and lacking reason.

Bibliography: A. GRILLMEIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:363–364. C. SCHMIDT and J. WAYNBERG, eds. and trs., Gespräche Jesu (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der alchristlichen Literatur 3d ser. 13; 1919) 420–452. A. BLUDAU, Die ersten Gegner der Johannesschriften (Biblische Studien 22; Fribourg 1925). G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 1.1:898–901. A. WIKENHAUSER, Einleitung in das Neue Testament (3d ed. Freiburg 1959).

[F. X. MURPHY]

ALONSO DE ESPINA

Franciscan friar and author; b. c. 1412, Palencia, Spain; d. early 1460s. Alonso was most likely a student at the University of Salamanca, where he eventually became regent of studies at the Studium Generale of the Franciscan Order. He is associated with the Franciscan (Observant or Villacretian) reform movement in Spain which stressed the vow of poverty and strict asceticism. He is said to have been present at the death of Alvaro de Luna (1453), the condemned Constable of Juan II, and to have been the confessor of King Enrique IV of Castile (1454–74). He is best known as a proponent of the Spanish Inquisition. The plan that he set forth in the Fortalitium Fidei, his most important work, for the eradication of heresy, especially heresies associated with Jews and conversos (or “New Christians”), became the basic program for the Spanish National Inquisition. Fortalitium Fidei was written between 1459 and 1461, and was translated into French, German, and Italian in the first half of the 16th century. It is divided into five books: the first addresses general spiritual-theological principles, while the other four address what Alonso considered to be the four principal “enemies” of the Church: heretics, Jews, Muslims, and demons. Each one of these books is encyclopedic in form. For example, Book Three is entitled “de bello Judeorum,” (“concerning the war of the Jews”) and is made up of 12 chapters or considerations which, viewed in their entirety, constitute an “encyclopedia” of the different types of polemics against the Jews. The first three considerations cover the spiritual blindness, the demonic heritage and the confused state—reflected in the great diversity of beliefs—of the Jewish people. Considerations four through six address many exegetical, theological and philosophical arguments against the Jews. Considerations seven through 11 treat material that is more historical in nature, such as the laws imposed on the Jews, the expulsions of the Jewish people from various lands, miracles that happened to convince them of the truth of Christianity, etc. The 12th and final consideration discusses the eschatological role of the Jews at the end of time.

Bibliography: A. GINIO, La forteresse de la foi: La vision du monde d’Alonso de Espina, moine espagnol (?–1466) (Paris 1998); De bello iudaeorum: Fray Alonso de Espina y su Fortalitium fidei, Fontes Iudaeorum Regni Castellae, VIII (Salamanca 1998). A. ECHEVARRIA, The Fortress of Faith: The Attitude toward Muslims in Fifteenth Century Spain (Leiden 1999). S. J. MCMICHAEL, Was Jesus of Nazareth the Messiah? Alphonso de Espina’s Argument Against the Jews in the “Fortalitium Fidei” (c.1464) (Atlanta 1994).

[S. J. MCMICHAEL]

ALOYSIUS GONZAGA, ST.

Patron of youth; b. Castiglione, near Mantua, Italy, March 9, 1568; d. Rome, June 21, 1591. The firstborn of Ferrante Gonzaga, Marquis of Castiglione and Prince of the Empire, and Marta Tana Santena, Aloysius grew up amid the brutality and license of Renaissance society, which witnessed the murder of two of his brothers. Between Aloysius and his devout mother a tender affection developed, while his father began early to prepare him for the military life envisioned for him. In Pierfrancesco del Turco he had a wise and competent tutor. In 1577 Aloysius was sent to attend the court of Francesco de' Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany. In 1581, he accompanied his parents, who joined Empress Maria of Austria on a visit to Spain. At the court of Philip II he acted as page to the heir apparent, Don Diego, and pursued the study of philosophy. At Alcalá he was invited to participate in a public debate. While in Spain Aloysius decided to enter the Society of Jesus. His father firmly resisted his decision and began a struggle of wills that lasted for several years and still continued after their return to Castiglione in 1584. Aloysius prevailed, renounced the rights to his inheritance, and entered the novitiate in Rome on Nov. 25, 1585. As a novice he studied philosophy at the Roman College and gave a public defense in that subject. He pronounced his first vows on Nov. 25, 1587. For four years he studied theology, having as one of his masters the brilliant Gabriel Vázquez. In 1589 he returned to Castiglione for a brief stay in order to settle some intricate family affairs. While attending the sick during an epidemic in Rome in March 1591, he contracted the plague, and died three months later.

The steps in the spiritual growth of Aloysius are clear. At seven he manifested a strong sense of responsibility and love for vocal prayer. A book by Gaspar Loarte, SJ, and his later reading of Louis of Granada, opened up for him the area of mental prayer to which he gave several hours a day. With intensity, calmness of judgment, and power to face facts he firmly decided on a life of holiness. His calm purpose to conquer himself was expressed in severe penance. At Florence, before the Madonna in the Church of Annunziata, he made a vow of virginity. A distaste for court life at Mantua led him to read the lives of the saints. In 1580 he received First Holy Communion from St. Charles Borromeo, and this inspired him to a lasting devotion to the Holy Eucharist. He showed his basic humility and obedience in the novitiate by surrendering his own ideas about prayer and penance. His charity, which was practical, was revealed in the catechetical lessons he gave and in his care for the sick. While he was at the Roman College his spiritual director was St. Robert Bellarmine. His letters, uneffusive and unpretentious, reveal a direct and calm soul.

He never signed himself Aloisio or Aloysius, but Luigi or Luigi. Francesco Sacchini, competent historian of the early Society of Jesus, objected to the form Aloysius in 1612, arguing for Ludovicus or Louis. However, Francesco Gonzaga, head of the family at the time, insisted on Aloysius. Benedict XIII canonized Aloysius in 1726, and three years later declared him patron of youth, an honor confirmed by Pius XI in 1926.

Feast: June 21.

Bibliography: A. GONZAGA, Lettere ed altriscritti, ed. E. ROSA (Florence 1926). Aloysius, ed. C. STEVENS and W. H. MCNICHOLS (Huntington, Ind. 1993). C. C. MARTINDALE, The Vocation of Aloysius Gonzaga (New York 1927). P. BLANC, Saint Louis de Gonzague: un saint de 23 ans (Paris 1977). V. CEPARI, Life of Saint Aloysius Gonzaga, tr. F. SCHROEDER (Einsiedeln 1891). E. DELPIERRE and A. NOCHÉ, St. Louis de Gonzague et la Renaissance italienne (Le Puy 1945). E. FERRI, Luigi Gonzaga (Milan 1991). A. LAMBRETTE, St. Louis de Gonzague (Museum Lessianum, Section Ascétique et Mystique 22; Louvain 1926). M. MESCHLER, Leben des hl. Aloysius von Gonzaga (Freiburg 1891). M. PAGANELLA, San Luigi Gonzaga: un ritratto in piedi (Milan 1991). M. SCADUTO, Il mondo di Luigi Gonzaga (Rome 1968). R. SIMONI, Luoghi aloisiani: IV centenario della morte di San Luigi Gonzaga (Castiglione delle Stiviere, Italy 1990). G. VIGNA, Il santo dei Gonzaga: San Luigi e il suo tempo (Milan 1991).

[W. V. BANGERT]

ALOYSIUS RABATÁ, BL.

Carmelite prior; b. Monte San Giuliano, Sicily, c. 1430; d. Randazzo, Sicily, 1490. He entered the CARMELITE ORDER at Trapani and became prior of the Randazzo monastery. Even as superior he continued to engage in manual labor and begging. He was noted especially for his love of neighbor and for the forgiveness of his enemies, as was exemplified in his refusal to reveal the identity of the assailant from whose wounds he died. The process of beatification was begun in 1533, the cult approved in 1841 by Gregory XVI, and an Office and Mass assigned in 1842. His relics were translated to the collegiate church of St. Mary, Randazzo, in 1912.

Feast: May 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctae Sedis May 2:707–721. P. SIMONELLI, Il beato Luigi Rabatà carmelitano (Rome 1968). L. M. SAGGI, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:365. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:275–276.

[E. R. CARROLL]

ALPHABETIC PSALMS

Poems of an acrostic formation in which the first letter of the word that begins a line or a couplet or even a strophe follows the succession of the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet: 'ālep, bêt, gîmel, dālet, etc. This artificial form is found in Ps 9 (9–10); 24 (25); 33 (34); 36 (37); 110 (111); 111 (112); 118 (119); and also in Prv 31.10–31; Lam 1–4, and partially (because of the poorly preserved text) in Na 1.2–8 and Sir 51.13–30. Occasionally the poet adds, at the end of the alphabetic series, another verse beginning with the letter pē', as in Ps 24(25); 33(34). With regard to the choice of this letter, P. W. Skehan has pointed out [Catholic Biblical Quarterly 23 (1961) 127] the quasi-alphabetic form also of the poems in the Book of Job. The most plausible reason for the device is that it might serve as an aid to memory or some other didactic purpose.

See Also: PSALMS, BOOK OF.

Bibliography: S. HOLM-NIELSEN, "The Importance of Late Jewish Psalmody for the Understanding of Old Testament Psalmic Tradition," Studia Theologica 14 (1960) 1-51.

[R. E. MURPHY]

ALPHANUS OF SALERNO, ST.

Scholar and archbishop; b. Salerno, Italy, c. 1015-1020; d. there, Oct. 9, 1085. He was a teacher at the University of Salerno (c. 1050), and together with Desiderius, later Pope Victor III, he entered the BENEDICTINE Order at the monastery of Monte Cassino in 1056. This foundation was, under the abbacy of Desiderius (1058-1087), the most advanced center of culture in Italy. In 1057 Alphanus (or Alfano) was an abbot in Salerno, and in 1058 he became archbishop. Salerno's fame rested essentially in the field of medicine, the study of which Alphanus strongly encouraged; he also established for himself a considerable reputation as a theologian, hagiographer, and hymnist. He showed unusual skill in the meter of his Latin verse, which covers a wide variety of subjects and indicates considerable acquaintance with the Roman poets (Analecta hymnica 22.24, 50). An ode addressed to Hildebrand, while the future GREGORY VII was still an archdeacon, calls on the papacy to crush with spiritual weapons the forces of barbarism that opposed the Church, and it compares Hildebrand himself to the Roman heroes of the past. It was in Salerno that the pope found refuge when the army of Emperor Henry IV forced him to flee Rome (1085). Alphanus was an important figure both in politics and in the development of Christian humanism in the eleventh century.

Bibliography: N. ACOCELLA, Salerno medioevale ed altri saggi, ed. A. SPARANO (Naples 1971); La decorazione pittorica di Montecassino dalle didascalie di Alfano I (Salerno 1966). F. UGHELLI, Italia sacra, ed. N. COLETTI, 10 v. in 9 (2d ed. Venice 1717-22). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953); A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1957). C. DAWSON, Religion and the Rise of Western Culture (New York 1950). J. M. VIDAL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:401-403. A. LENTINI, "Rassegna delle poesie di Alfano da Salerno," Bulletino dell'Istituto storico italiano 69 (1957) 213-241. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964-65) 1:398-402.

[B. D. HILL]

ALPHEGE OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Benedictine, archbishop, honored as a martyr; b. 954; d. Greenwich, England, April 19, 1012. Alphege, who is known also as Aelfheah, Elphege, or Godwine, entered the monastery of Deerhurst in Gloucestershire against his parents' wishes. He left to become an anchorite near Bath; later he was abbot until DUNSTAN called him to succeed ETHELWOLD as bishop of WINCHESTER in 984. In 1006 he was translated to the archbishopric of Canterbury and visited Rome for his PALLIUM. Five years later the Danes sacked Canterbury and held Alphege for ransom, which he agreed to pay until he remembered the poor who must raise the sum. Apparently he sometimes preached to his captors, who in 1012 during a drunken orgy pelted him to death with the bone remains of their feast. In 1023 King CANUTE ceremoniously carried the body of Alphege to Canterbury. Years later Alphege was one of the saints LANFRANC wished to remove from the English calendar, but ANSELM OF CANTERBURY felt that to die for justice and charity was tantamount to martyrdom. The best sources include Osbern of Canterbury's Life (ed. H. Wharton, Anglia Sacra, 2:122-147), the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and FLORENCE OF WORCESTER, for the year 1012, and THIETMAR OF MERSEBURG (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 3:849).

Feast: April 19 (Dioceses of Westminster, Clifton, Portsmouth, and Southwark).

Bibliography: W. HUNT, Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885-1900) 1:150-152. C. COTTON, The Saxon Cathedral at Canterbury and the Saxon Saints Buried Therein (Manchester, England 1929). W. A. PANTIN in For Hilaire Belloc, ed. D. WOODRUFF (London 1942). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:129-131. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943-1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, England 1962), passim.

[E. J. KEALEY]

ALPHEGE OF WINCHESTER, ST.

Called Aelfheah, "the Bald"; d. March 12, 951. A priest and monk, perhaps at Glastonbury although the date and circumstances of his monastic profession are unknown, he was chaplain and secretary to his kinsman King Athelstan. Alphege, who succeeded Byrnstan as bishop of Winchester (934), is important primarily for his influence on the English monastic revival, encouraging and eventually investing his relative DUNSTAN as monk. He ordained Dunstan and ETHELWOLD, the latter commended to Alphege by Athelstan, on the same day, prophesying their future episcopates (c. 939). Dunstan may have been offered Alphege's see on the latter's death, but Aelfsige succeeded to it. The chief sources are: The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; the Vita Dunstani auctore B; Aelfric, Vita sancti Aethelwoldi; Adelard, Vita sancti Dunstani; WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY; and SIMEON OF DURHAM.

Feast: March 12.

Bibliography: W. BIRCH, ed., Cartularium Saxonicum, 4 v. (1885–99). E. S. DUCKETT, Saint Dunstan of Canterbury (New York 1955). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:577.

[W. A. CHANEY]

ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, ST.

Theologian, founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, bishop, Doctor of the Church; b. Marianella, near Naples, Sept. 27, 1696; d. Pagani, near Salerno, Aug. 1, 1787.

Life. He was the eldest son of Giuseppe de Liguori, of a noble and ancient Neapolitan family and an officer of the royal navy, and Anna Cavalieri. After receiving his early education at home under the care of tutors, Alphonsus was enrolled in 1708 at the University of Naples, where he studied until Jan. 21, 1713, when at the age of 16 he received his doctorate in utroque jure. He practiced at the bar for some years, leading the while an exemplary Christian life under the direction of the Oratorians. When charged in 1723 with the defense of the interests of the Duke of Gravina against the Grand Duke of Tuscany, he lost confidence in the justice of his client's cause, perhaps in consequence of intrigues. Shocked by this experience he renounced the world and put on clerical dress, Oct. 23, 1723. He began his theological studies at home under the direction of Don Julio Tornì and joined a group of secular priests (Congregation of the Apostolic Missions), in whose missionary activities he took part from 1724. Ordained Dec. 21, 1726, he devoted himself in a special way to the work of hearing confessions and preaching. In 1727 he organized the Evening Chapels (Cappelle Serotine), an association of workers and artisans formed for the purpose of mutual assistance, religious instruction, and works of apostolic zeal. In 1729 he left his home and took up residence in the College of the Holy Family, known also as the Chinese College, founded in Naples by Matteo RIPA. There he devoted himself to the pastoral ministry by giving missions and working in the church connected with the college. After a sojourn at Scala and providential meetings with Thomas Falcoia of the society of Pii Operarii, who was made bishop of Castellamare di Stabia in 1730, and Sister Maria Celeste Crostarosa (1696–1755), he took an effective part in the foundation at Scala of the Institute of the Most Holy Savior, an order of contemplative nuns dedicated to the imitation of Jesus Christ, which was approved by Benedict XIV in 1750. On Nov. 9, 1732, he founded at Scala, under the direction of Bishop Falcoia, a congregation of priests under the title of the Most Holy Savior (known, after 1749, as the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer). It was intended as an association of priests and brothers living a common life and sharing in the desire to imitate Jesus Christ, particularly in the work of preaching the divine word. This congregation was formed with a special view to the needs of country people, who so often lacked the opportunities of missions, catechetical instruction, and spiritual exercises. Alphonsus gave himself to the work of the missions, to the organization of his congregation, and to the composition of his rule. His first companions deserted him, but he stood firm and before long vocations increased in number and new foundations multiplied; among the earliest were Villa Liberi (1734), Ciorani (1735), Pagani (1742), Deliceto (1745), and Mater Domini (1746).

St. Alphonsus Liguori, portrait by an unknown Italian artist, painted in 1768.

On Feb. 25, 1749, Benedict XIV by his brief Ad pastoralis dignitatis fastigium approved the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. Alphonsus was elected superior general for life at the general chapter held that same year. In consequence of the hostility of Marquis Tanucci and of the government, which was opposed to religious orders, Alphonsus could not obtain the royal exequatur in Naples to the brief of Benedict XIV. A royal decree of Dec. 9, 1752, gave limited assurance to the future of the institute, which at the time was extending its activity in the Papal States and in Sicily. Alphonsus governed his congregation, preached missions, and busied himself in writing and other apostolic work. He was appointed bishop of Sant' Agata dei Goti and was consecrated in Rome, June 20, 1762. As a bishop he soon distinguished himself for his work of reform. He put a stop to abuses, restored churches, fought for the liturgy, reformed his seminary, visited his diocese, promoted missions and often took a personal part in them, and exercised charity toward all, especially during the great famine of 1763–64. He kept an eye on the government of his congregation, which at the general chapter of 1764 adopted the completed constitutions, and continued with his writing. He was stricken in 1768 with a painful illness that made the pastoral ministry difficult; he offered his resignation from his see, and it was accepted by Pius VI in 1775. He then retired to Pagani, where he devoted himself to the governing of his congregation. Troubles concerning the rule caused by authorities of the Kingdom of Naples saddened his last years. The future of the congregation seemed precarious after the suppression of the Jesuits. He negotiated through an intermediary with the government to obtain its approbation, but the rule approved by the king and imposed on the congregation—the regolamento—differed notably from the rule approved by Benedict XIV. The Holy See, in its struggle with the Kingdom of Naples, took their canonical status away from the houses in the kingdom and gave to the houses in the Papal States their own superior. Alphonsus died before the reunion of the two branches of his congregation, which subsequently expanded to the whole world. Beatified Sept. 15, 1816, by Pius VII, canonized May 26, 1839, by Gregory XVI, declared Doctor of the Church by Pius IX in 1871, Alphonsus was finally made patron of confessors and moralists by Pius XII, April 26, 1950.

The Man. Ardent and richly endowed by nature, of delicate sensibility, tenacious of will, and profoundly intelligent, Alphonsus was given more to practical thinking than to pure speculation. He had to a rare degree an awareness of the concrete, a sense of the practical. In his relationship with others he combined nobility of manner with affability and benevolence toward all, especially the poor, and smiling good humor: “a model of moderation and of gentleness” [B. Croce, Uomini e cose della vecchia Italia, v.21 (Bari 1927) 123].

The will of God, obeyed even in its most crucifying demands, was the only rule of his life. His prayer attained the summit of union with God, but it also expressed itself in apostolic action. He could in fact be described as a mystic of action. All his activity is explained by his determination to consecrate himself to the work of the Redemption and to the salvation of men. In this cause he employed all his artistic gifts. He was a talented musician and composed, in the style of the great Neapolitan school of the 18th century, a duetto of merit called Duetto tra l'anima e Gesù Cristo. He composed Tu scende dalle stelle, the lovely Christmas hymn that is still the most popular of Italian carols. In his Canzoncine spirituali he expressed in authentic poetry the sentiments of his mystical soul. An excellent picture of his psychology and intimate life can be gathered from the three volumes of his letters (Rome 1887–90).

Missions. Popular missions were for Alphonsus the means par excellence of procuring the salvation of souls. As a member of the Congregation of Apostolic Missions he took part in missionary work before he was a priest. His apostolate intensified with his ordination, and still more with the foundation of his congregation, which was dedicated in a special way to that work. It is estimated that he gave no fewer than 150 missions, and he himself once acknowledged that he had had 34 years of missionary experience. As a bishop he promoted missions in his diocese, and until his death he remained interested in the work. Alphonsus borrowed many of the elements of existing systems of conducting missions, but two features marked his own: (1) its concern that in the general structure of the mission and in the plan of the sermons there should be a continual adaptation to the concrete situation of the faithful; and (2) its effort to assure the perseverance of the participants by putting a major stress upon the love of God as the principal motive for conversion, and by calling for “renewals of the mission” to be preached some months after a mission, this last point being an original contribution to mission planning that won much acclaim.

Writing. No complete listing of the literary productions of St. Alphonsus is possible. Between 1728 and 1778 there appeared 111 works, and in addition to these there were posthumous publications. As to editions and translations, P. De Meulemeester in 1933 counted 4,110 editions of the original text (402 appeared before the death of Alphonsus) and 12,925 editions of translations into 61 languages. Since that time the number has continued to grow.

Works on Preaching. His principal work in this field was his Selva di materie predicabili . . . (1760), a complete treatise on sacerdotal perfection, the pastoral work of the missions, and the substance and form of preaching. In addition to this he published Lettera ad un religioso amico ove si tratta del modo di predicare (1761) in which he insisted on the necessity of preaching the gospel in a simple manner, without superfluous ornamentation, so that all, even the simplest of men, could understand the preacher. Mention should also be made of his sermons, and especially the Sermoni compendiatì per tutte le domeniche del anno (1771), which were much admired by Newman.

Spiritual Works. These were markedly ascetical in character, but were solidly founded upon theology. They were the fruit of his interior life and of his preaching. The point of departure for his spirituality was the revelation of the love of God for man. Contrary to the teaching of the Jansenists, God offers to every man the possibility of salvation and of sanctification. This consists essentially in the loving response that man makes to the gift of God's love. To man turning toward God and detaching himself from creatures and the disordered impulses of concupiscence, Alphonsus presented the themes proposed by St. Ignatius in the First Week of the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES: death, judgment, heaven, and hell. Such was the subject of his Apparecchio alla morte (1758) and of the Via della salute (1766). But the supreme motive of the Christian's love for God is Christ, the perfect revelation of God's love for man. The spirituality of St. Alphonsus was resolutely Christocentric. In his works devoted to the mysteries of Christ—Santo Natale (1758), Riflessioni ed affetti sopra la passione di Gesù Cristo (1761), Riflessioni sulla passione di Gesù Cristo (1773), and Novena del Cuore di Gesù (1758)—it is always the love of Christ that is emphasized, a love that man must requite by loving Christ in return. The most perfect synthesis of this spirituality is to be found in the Pratica di amar Gesù Cristo (1768), written in the manner of a commentary on the hymn of charity of St. Paul (1 Corinthians ch. 13). The love of God is not authentic if it does not express itself—here one can recognize the characteristically Alphonsian propensity for concreteness—in doing the will of God in the state and condition to which one is called. Hence the importance of the choice of state. Alphonsus developed this doctrine for all the states of life in his little work Uniformità alla volontà di Dio (1755). A fortiori, this principle is applicable to particular vocations: sacerdotal, as in the above mentioned Selva; religious, as in Avvisi spettanti alla vocazione (1749), and La vera sposa di Gesù Cristo (1760–61), a complete treatise on religious perfection.

What means did God give to Christians to attain holiness? The Sacraments, first of all. Alphonsus insisted particularly upon Penance and the Eucharist. In his volume Del sacrificio di Gesù Cristo (1775) he studied the essence of the Mass and the means of participating in it fully. Against the Jansenists he recommended frequent Communion. Devotion to the Blessed Sacrament occuried a place of prime importance in his spirituality. His book Visita al SS. Sacramento (1745) became a best seller and went through 40 editions during his lifetime. It gave to the practice of the visit a form that thenceforth became classic and definitive, and by means of it generations of Christians have come to find the nourishment of their daily prayer in the Eucharistic presence.

Prayer has a place of central importance in the economy of salvation and sanctification. Alphonsus gave magisterial treatment to the topic in what was, from the theological point of view, his most important work, Del gran mezzo della preghiera (1759). The first, and ascetical, part shows the absolute necessity of prayer for salvation. The second, and theological, part is directed against the Jansenist teaching on salvation and predestination. God wills the salvation of all men; Christ died for all; God gives to all the grace necessary for salvation, and one will certainly be saved if he corresponds with it. Faced with Jansenism and the teaching of the different theological schools on the subject of grace, Alphonsus expounded his own understanding of it. On the one hand there is an efficacious grace necessary for salvation; normally this acts by a kind of moral movement, determining infallibly by its own intrinsic power the consent of man's will, but leaving his liberty intact. But there is also a sufficient grace, which is truly active and gives man the power to perform psychologically easy acts in the order of salvation, such as that of imperfect prayer. One who corresponds with this sufficient grace will necessarily obtain efficacious grace. But sufficient grace is fallibly active. Man can fail to correspond with it and so in effect deprive himself of it. How is this grace fallibly active? St. Alphonsus never pretended to resolve this question explicitly; it is a point upon which one is simply referred to the conclusions of the commentators. F. MARIN-SOLA, OP, and J. Maritain have proposed possible metaphysical extensions of the Alphonsian doctrine. As in other matters, St. Alphonsus was inspired by a number of authors and incorporated their teaching into his own view of the problem. But if, in fact, he often cited H. NORIS and Claude-Louis de Montaigne, the continuator of H. TOURNELLY, he went back beyond these and other immediate sources to the scholasticism of the 12th and 13th centuries and to St. Augustine. "Never did anyone bring together so compactly and so accurately the thought of St. Augustine on prayer and its necessity. The bishop of Sant' Agata was only an echo of the bishop of Hippo on this subject. . . . He had the genius to read with surprising clarity what the intellectual Jansenists had neglected in the writings of St. Augustine" [F. Cayré, Patrologie et histoire de la théologie v.3 (Paris 1944) 294].

The object of Christian prayer was first the love of God—i.e., the fulfillment of His will—then perseverance in that love, and finally the grace to pray always. Among the forms of prayer recommended by the saint was liturgical prayer (for which in 1774 he edited an Italian translation of the psalter Traduzione de' Salmi e Cantici) and mental prayer. For him mental prayer was morally necessary to assure the effective practice of prayer and consequently for perseverance in the grace of God, progress in charity, and union with God. The extremely flexible and easy method of mental prayer described in a number of his works led to the little masterpiece Modo di conversare continuamente ed alla familiare con Dio (1753). He would not hesitate to lead a disciple who corresponded with the grace of God to the height of mystical union with God by means of infused prayer [see Pratica del confessore (1755)].

The Virgin Mary appears in all the spiritual works of Alphonsus. To her he devoted the most elaborate of his books, Le glorie di Maria (1750), which is one of the great works of Catholic Mariology. Replying to L. A. MURATORI's criticism of the deviation of Marian devotion, Alphonsus firmly established the role of Mary in the history of salvation and solidly based devotion to her on theology. By the grace of the Redeemer immaculate in her conception (by his argumentation Alphonsus helped prepare the way for the definition of this dogma by Pius IX), Mary directly cooperated in the redemption of the world effected by Jesus on Calvary; she is the Co-Redemptress and consequently the universal, but not exclusive, mediatrix of grace. Through her one obtains especially the grace of prayer, and thus prayer to Mary leads to Jesus. St. Alphonsus considered authentic devotion to Mary an assurance and sign of salvation. Le glorie di Maria had an enormous influence on the 19th century and contributed to the great development of Marian devotion at that time.

In the development of his spiritual teaching Alphonsus was inspired by the spiritual writers of the 16th to the 18th centuries and freely incorporated things gathered from them into his own writings. In the Biblioteche predicabili and the Prontuarii he drew abundantly from these writers, the authors most frequently cited being the Jesuits Alfonso RODRIGUEZ, G. B. SCARAMELLI, and J. B. SAINT-JURÉ, who transmitted to him the spirituality of the Exercises of St. Ignatius, and the spiritual doctrine of SS. Teresa of Avila, Francis de Sales, and, in lesser measure, that of John of the Cross.

Dogmatic Works. These, for the most part, were composed during his episcopate, and they are principally works of controversy. With a pastoral end in view, Alphonsus refuted the principal errors of his time and addressed himself to unbelievers for the purpose of showing them the truth of the Catholic religion. He resorted to psychological and moral as well as to intellectual arguments, wishing to reach the whole man. His Verità della fede (1767) is divided according to a threefold purpose, a structure not common in apologetical works of the time. For materialists he sought to prove, against the arguments of Hobbes, Locke, and Spinoza, the existence of a personal God and the spirituality of the soul; for theists, he showed both the necessity of a revealed religion and the truth of the Christian religion; for Christians separated from the Church, he argued that the Catholic Church was the only Church of Christ authenticated by the signs of truth. He stressed the necessity of a supreme authority in the Church provided with the privilege of infallibility. This theme was developed in the Vindiciae pro suprema pontificis potestate contra Febronium, printed in 1768 under the pseudonym of Honorius de Honoris. He brought decisive support to the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope, which Vatican Council I was to recognize. His Opera dommatica contro gli eretici pretesi riformati (1769) took the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent and expounded their theological import as opposed to Protestant doctrine. These studies show that Alphonsus was an excellent dogmatic theologian. In his Trionfo della Chiesa ossia istoria delle eresie colle loro confutazioni (1772) he traced the history of heresies and their refutation through the centuries from antiquity to Jansenius and Molinos. In his Condotta ammirabile della divina Provvidenza (1775) he expounded his views on the history of salvation and on the unity and perpetuity of the Church in the manner of the Discours sur l'histoire universelle of Bossuet, but in a manner that made his thought much more accessible to the generality of Christians.

Moral Works. A third of the writing of Alphonsus was devoted to moral theology, and this fitted smoothly into place in the ensemble of his pastoral and spiritual thought. Writing with an eye upon the daily pastoral necessities of the ministry, he elaborated his moral theology for the use of his religious and of priests engaged in pastoral work, especially that of the confessional. It complemented his spiritual doctrine inasmuch as it searched out the will of God in all the circumstances of life. His great work in the moral field was his Theologia moralis, which began as simple annotations on the Medulla theologiae moralis of H. BUSENBAUM (1st ed., 1748); in the second edition (1753–55) it became more properly the work of Alphonsus himself, although it adhered to the plan of the Medulla and the Institutiones morales. With the appearance of the third edition (1757) the Theologia moralis in three volumes took on its definitive aspect. Alphonsus, however, labored unceasingly to perfect the successive editions (4th ed., 1760; 5th, 1763; 6th, 1767; 7th, 1772; 8th—which Alphonsus considered definitive—1779; 9th, 1785). From 1791 to 1905, the date of the critical edition by P. Gaude, there were 60 complete editions. In 1755 there appeared his Pratica del confessore per ben esercitare il suo ministero, which constituted the soul, so to speak, of his great work on moral theology. The Istruzione e pratica per un confessore (1757), translated into Latin under the title Homo apostolicus, was an original work, the most perfect, perhaps, of all the writings of the saint for its unity of tone and the firmness of its thought; it was intended as an example of what a manual of moral theology ought to be. Il confessore diretto per le confessioni della gente di compagna (1764) was written by the bishop of Sant' Agata for the priests of his diocese. A series of notes and "dissertations," 18 in all, devoted to probabilism and the exposition of his own system of MORALITY, was published between 1749 and 1777. The most important of these was entitled Dell' uso moderato dell' opinione probabile (1765). Certain of these papers were written against the theories of Giovanni Vincenzo Patuzzi, OP, with whom Alphonsus engaged in vigorous controversy. The work of St. Alphonsus contained numerous citations, as did all the works of moral theology of the time. In the Theologia moralis more than 800 authors were cited, and the number of citations amounted to 70,000. All could not have been made at firsthand. No moralist after 1550 escaped Alphonsus' attention. His work, therefore, provides a complete panorama of the literature of moral theology of that time. His most immediate sources were St. Thomas Aquinas, Lessius, Sanchez, Castropalao, Lugo, Laymann, Bonacina, Croix, Roncaglia, Suarez, Soto, Collet, Concina, and most especially the Cursus moralis of the Salmanticenses.

Equiprobabilism. Alphonsus gave much time to the elaboration of his system, known as EQUIPROBABILISM, which sought to steer a middle course between PROBABILISM and PROBABILIORISM. Having used F. Genet (1640–1703), a probabiliorist, as his guide at the beginning of his missionary experience, Alphonsus was won over to ordinary probabilism in practice. But he was not satisfied with it. Beginning in 1749 he wrote a series of dissertations on the subject. His thought became definitively fixed between 1759 and 1765, during his controversy with Patuzzi, which proved to be a fruitful experience for Alphonsus and provided him with an occasion for the consolidation of his thought. From 1767 to 1778, when his literary activity came to an end, he was constrained to veil his thought somewhat because of the anti-Jesuit persecutions, but he did not modify it substantially. Equiprobabilism, opposed to either a lax or a rigorous moral position, was not a compromise between the two, but a higher equilibrium. In recognizing the obligation of the more probable opinion in favor of the law, Alphonsus recognized also the law as a moral value. Rejecting probabilism as a universally valid and mechanically applicable solution of cases of conscience, Alphonsus proclaimed the necessity of a personal decision of conscience. In the case in which two equiprobable opinions, one favoring the law and the other liberty, are presented, Alphonsus, in leaving a man free to make his own decision, affirmed at the same time the moral value of human liberty. Man, who is created to the image of God, imitates his Creator in doing good freely. In support of his system, St. Alphonsus appealed to E. AMORT and St. Thomas. A. G. Sertillanges has said of it: "Equiprobabilism, properly understood, can rightly pass for a Thomist solution" [La Morale de saint Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1942) 401].

In Alphonsian moral theory the study of the concrete circumstances of action rules out the mechanical application of a system, however sound it may be. Always disposed to prefer reason to the authority of moralists, he resolved most of his cases in terms of intrinsic evidence and in the light of Christian charity and prudence. As a result of his labor the Christian world was presented with a compilation of truly sound moral opinion, equally removed from the extremities either of laxism or rigorism, scrupulously weighed by the conscience of a saint. This has been a brilliant service to the Church [M. Labourdette, Revue thomiste 50 (1950) 230].

Influence. The influence of St. Alphonsus on moral theology has proved durable, and the practical direction traced by him has been substantially adopted by the Church (Lanza-Palazzini). Among the major events in the history of the Church in the 19th century was the progressive rallying of moralists and of the clergy to the moral thinking of St. Alphonsus. In eliminating rigorism, in facilitating access to the Sacraments, he infused a new youth into Christianity. In France the penetration of Alphonsian thought was perhaps more rapid than elsewhere. Among its propagators in that country were Jean Marie de Lamennais; Bruno Lanteri, the apostle of Turin; and Cardinal Gousset, Archbishop of Reims, who evoked in 1831 the response of the Sacred Penitentiary favorable to Alphonsian moral theology. The Curé d'Ars mitigated his rigor after coming to know Liguorian principles. At the same time the Swiss, Belgians, Germans, and Spaniards welcomed this moral doctrine, the proclamation of St. Alphonsus as a Doctor of the Church lending encouragement to the movement. To the criticism of the system by A. Ballerini, SJ, the Redemptorists responded with a voluminous dossier, Vindiciae alfonsianae (1873). Among the manuals of moral theology written by Redemptorists were those of J. AERTNYS, C. Marc, and, in the U.S., A. KONINGS. Many of the manuals used in the seminaries of Europe and America either adopt the Alphonsian system or are marked by its influence in their solutions of cases.

It can be said that the influence of St. Alphonsus on Catholicism in the 19th century was very generally and very deeply felt. What he had written contributed to the definition of the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception and of the infallibility of the pope. He did much to shape the form that popular devotion took, especially the devotion toward the Eucharist and the Virgin Mary. His teaching on prayer reached even beyond the Church to thinkers such as Kierkegaard. He defended the Church against rationalism and enlightened despotism. Above all, he gave Jansenism in its practical form a blow from which it could not recover. His spirituality recalled the great message of the love of God for all men; his moral doctrine, inspired by the gospel, made it possible for Christians everywhere to deal with perplexities that had to be faced if they were to adjust successfully to the world in which they found themselves. "St. Alphonsus was more than a great personage of history. He is a symbol, and a very significant one" [H. X. Arquillière, Histoire illustrée de l'Eglise, v.2 (Geneva-Paris 1948) 196].

Feast: Aug. 2

Bibliography: Complete Works, ed. E. GRIMM, 22 v. (New York 1886–97; 2d ed. of v.1–5, 12, Brooklyn 1926–28); Opere ascetiche, ed. F. DELERUE et al. (Rome 1933–); Opera dogmatica, Lat. tr. A. WALTER, 2 v. (Rome 1903); Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (Rome 1905–12; repr. 1953); Lettere, 3 v. (Rome 1887–90); Canzoniere Alfonsiano, ed. O. GREGORIO (Angri 1933); The Way of Saint Alphonsus Liguori, ed. B. ULANOV (London 1961), selected writings. Bibliographies. M. DE MEULEMEESTER et al., Bibliographie générale des écrivains Rédemptoristes, 3 v. (Louvain 1933–39) v.1, 3. A. SAMPERS, "Bibliographia Alphonsiana 1938–53," Spicilegium historicum C.S.S.R. 1 (1953) 248–271; "Bibliographia scriptorum de systemate morali S. Alphonsi et de probabilismo in genere, ann. 1787–1922 vulgatorum," ibid. 8 (1960) 138–172. Biographies. A. TANNOIA, Della vita ed istituto del ven. servo di Dio, Alfonso M. de Liguori, 3 v. (Naples 1798–1802; new ed. Turin 1857). R. TELLERÍA, S. Alfonso Maria de Liguori, 2 v. (Madrid 1950–51). N. FEARON, Never Stop Walking: The Life and Spirit of Saint Alphonsus Liguori (Liguori, Mo. 1996). O. GREGORIO et al., S. Alfonso de Liguori: Contribuiti biobibliografici (Brescia 1940). F. M. JONES, Alphonsus de Liguori (Liguori, Mo. 1999). A. BERTHE, St. Alphonsus de Liguori, tr. H. CASTLE, 2 v. (Dublin 1905). D. F. MILLER and L. X. AUBIN, Saint Alphonsus (Brooklyn 1940). H. F. G. SWANSTON, Saint Alphonsus and His Brothers (Liguori, Mo. 2000); Celebrating Eternity Now: A Study of the Theology of Saint Alphonsus Liguori (Liguori, Mo. 1995). G. VELOCCI, Sant'Alfonso de Liguori (Cinisello Balsamo 1994). M. DE MEULEMEESTER, Origines de la Congrégation du Très Saint Rédempteur, 2 v. (Louvain 1953–57). H. CASTLE, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 1:334–341. B. HÜRING and E. ZETTL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:330–332. G. LIÉVIN, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:357–389. S. O'RIORDAN, H. F. DAVIS et al., A Catholic Dictionary of Theology (London 1962–) 1:60–62. Literature. J. AERTNYS, Theologia moralis secundum doctrinam S. Alfonsi De Liguori doctoris Ecclesiae, 4 b. (n.s. 1967–69). K. C. M. VAN WELY, Gestalte en structuur van de Missie bij S. Alfonsus (Amsterdam 1964). G. CACCIATORE, S. Alfonso de' Liguori e il giansenismo (Florence 1944). J. F. HIDALGO, Doctrina alfonsiana acerca de la acción de la gracia actual eficaz y suficiente (Rome 1951). K. KEUSCH, Die Aszetik des hl. Alfons von Liguori (2d ed. Paderborn 1926). H. MANDERS, De liefde in de spiritualiteit van Sint Alphonsus (Brussels 1947). T. REY-MERMET, Moral Choices: The Moral Theology of Saint Alphonsus Liguori, tr. P. LAVERDURE (Liguori, Mo. 1998). D. CAPONE, "Dissertazioni e note di S. Alfonso sulla probabilità e la coscienza," Studia moralia 1 (Rome 1963) 265–343; 2 (Rome 1964) 89–155; 3 (Rome 1965) 82–149; Suor Celeste Crostarosa e Sant'Alfonso (s.n. 1992). C. DILLENCHNEIDER, La Mariologie de Saint Alphonse de Liguori, 2 v. (Fribourg 1931–34). R. S. CULHANE, "Alphonsus and the Immaculate Conception," The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 82 (1954) 391–401. J. A. CLEARY, "The Return to St. Alphonsus," The Irish Theological Quarterly 18 (1951) 161–176.

[L. VEREECKE]

ALPIRSBACH, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE abbey in Württemberg, Germany, former Diocese of Constance, present-day Diocese of Rottenburg. Its name came either from the demesne of Count Adalbert I of Uffgau (1041–45) or, according to another interpretation, from the phrase "old deer-hunting." Its founders were Ruotmann of Hausen, Adalbert of Zollern, and Alwig of Sulz. The first monks and the first abbot, Kuno, were of the FRUTTUARIA/SANKT BLASIEN tradition; the third abbot came from HIRSAU. Lands were granted the abbey by Bp. GEBHARD III of Constance when the temporary wooden church was dedicated in 1095; the dedication of the extant Romanesque church followed on Aug. 28, 1099. In 1101 Adalbert of Zollern entered the abbey and donated more land. The foundation was confirmed in 1101 by Pope Paschal II as an abbey with free election of abbot and bailiff (Vogt); it received confirmation and protection from Emperor Henry V in Strasbourg on Jan. 23, 1123. The abbey bailiffs included the counts of Zollern, the dukes of Teck, and the counts of Württemberg. It was noted for its liturgy and pastoral work; it assarted the forests of the Kinzigtal area. Alpirsbach reached the high point of its development in the 12th century. It had a worthy and able abbot in Bruno (1338–80). In 1482 it was incorporated into the BURSFELD congregation; the dormitory, abbot's quarters, and cloister were remodeled; the south aisle of the church was widened; the bell tower was completed; and the high altar was commissioned. The abbey was much damaged by fires in 1508 and 1513 and by the PEASANTS' WAR. In 1534 the REFORMATION came to Alpirsbach in the person of Ambrose Blarer, a former Alpirsbach monk become Württemberg reformer. From 1556 to 1595 the abbey was a Protestant convent-school. From 1629 to 1648 it was inhabited by Catholic monks from Ochsenhausen, then it again became Protestant. In 1807 all church property was secularized, including Alpirsbach's holdings in 297 localities. The abbey church is now Lutheran; the refectory, a Catholic chapel.

Bibliography: G. ALLMANG, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:765–768. W. HOFFMANN, Die ehemalige Benediktinerabtei Alpirsbach (Munich 1955). Weingarten, 1056–1956, ed. G. SPAHR (Weingarten 1956). K. HOFMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:367.

[G. SPAHR]

ALT, ALBRECHT

OT scholar and Biblical historian; b. Stübach, Bavaria, Sept. 20, 1883; d. Leipzig, April 24, 1956. From 1922 until his death he was a member of the OT faculty at the University of Leipzig. But he often sojourned in Palestine. For some time he edited the Palästina-jahrbuch. He knew Palestine well, and this familiarity pervaded his geographical and topographical studies; in such historical studies as Die Landnahme der Israeliten in Palästina (1925) Alt made much of regional or territorial history and its continuity. In his celebrated collection of historical essays, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel (1953–59), Alt's competence extended to the histories of the neighboring peoples also, especially to the histories of Egypt and Syria. A master epigraphist and philologist, he interpreted not only Semitic and cuneiform material but also late Greek, Roman, and Byzantine sources. He was a coeditor of the fourth edition of R. Kittel's Biblia Hebraica. In 1929 he published Der Gott der Väter on the early religion of the Hebrews.

Alt made major contributions to the understanding of Israelite legal and political institutions. In Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts (1934) he distinguished clearly between the types of apodictic law and casuistic law in the Pentateuchal legislation. Die Staatenbildung der Israeliten in Palästina (1930) and related studies advanced understanding of Israel's political institutions.

Bibliography: K. H. MANN, "Bibliographie Albrecht Alt," Beiträge zur historischen Theologie 16 (1953) 211–223. "Festschrift A. Alt zum 70. Geburtstag." Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift 3 (1953–54) 173–178. M. NOTH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:247–248. M. KÖCKERT, Vätergott und Väterverheissungen: Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Albrecht Alt und seinen Erben (Göttingen, 1988). J. DUS, Israelitische Vorfahren: Vasallen palästinischer Stadtstaaten?: Revisionsbedürftigkeit der Landnahmehypothese von Albrecht Alt (Frankfurt am Main and New York, 1991).

[T. W. BUCKLEY]

ALTAMIRANO, DIEGO FRANCISCO DE

Jesuit missionary; b. Madrid, Oct. 26, 1625 (or possibly Oct. 18 or 26, 1626); d. Lima, Dec. 22, 1715. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1642. For some ten years he lived as a member of the province of the Philippines, and he made his solemn profession on Sept. 11, 1661. He was professor of theology at the University of Córdoba del Tucumán, Argentina, and rector of the major seminary. As a missionary to the Chaco, he founded the reduction of St. Francis Xavier, and he was provincial of Paraguay from 1677 to 1681. He served as procurator for Madrid and Rome in 1683, visitor of the Nuevo Reino (Colombia and Ecuador), visitor and provincial of Peru, and rector of the College of Lima. An outstanding religious superior, he was a staunch advocate of Jesuit rights in their internal government and in their relationship with the crown and the bishops. He was a historian of the society in the regions with which he was personally acquainted. His contribution to missionary activity ranged from writing a catechism in the Mocoquí tongue to supervising the strategic location of missions as far south as the Strait of Magellan. He supported military protection for missions and protected the missions against the incursions of the Paulistas and of other tribes. He tried to stop the king from compelling the natives to grow maté and to export it from their own territory.

Bibliography: E. TORRES SALDAMANDO, Los antiguos Jesuitas del Perú (Lima 1882). C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 1:208–209.

[A. DE EGAÑA]

ALTANER, BERTHOLD

Catholic historian and patristic scholar, educator, author; b. St. Annaberg (Silesia), Sept. 10, 1885; d. Bad Kissingen (Bavaria), Jan. 30, 1964. After being ordained in 1910, he took his doctorate in theology at the University of Breslau, where he began to teach church history in 1919; in 1929 he was appointed ordinary professor of patrology, ancient church history, and Christian archeology. He was the first theologian to be deprived of his university position by the Nazi government for political reasons (1933). Cardinal Bertram thereupon provided him with a position at the cathedral of Breslau in order to enable him to continue his research. But he lost his very valuable library when the Gestapo expelled him from Breslau in 1945. He found refuge in Bavaria and after the war was appointed to the chair of patrology and the history of the liturgy at the University of Würzburg, which he occupied until his retirement in 1950. His early works deal with the history of the Dominican Order: Venturino von Bergamo O.P. (Breslau 1911), Der hl. Dominikus (Breslau 1922), Die Dominikanermission des 15. Jahrhunderts (Habelschwerdt 1924), and Die Briefe Jordans von Sachsen (Leipzig 1925). He became best known because of his one-volume textbook Patrologie, which he published in 17 editions and six languages (Eng. ed. by H. Graef, New York 1960). The volume Kleine patristische Schriften [Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, 83 (Berlin 1965)] collects 48 articles dealing with the influence of Eastern theology on Western writers, especially St. Augustine, published previously in various periodicals.

Bibliography: B. ALTANER, Verzeichnis meiner Veröffentlichungen 1907–53 (Würzburg 1953). “Bibliographie B. Altaner,” Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft, 77 (1958) 76–600. J. QUASTEN, Theologische Revue, 51 (1955) 213–214; American Catholic Historical Review, 50 (1964) 92–93.

[J. QUASTEN]

ALTAR IN CHRISTIAN LITURGY

1. In The Liturgy

The early Church spoke of the Lord's table (τράπεζα κυρίου; 1 Cor 10.21), which stressed the meal aspect of the Eucharist. A less common term, θυσιαστήριον (Heb 13.10), emphasized the sacrificial aspect of the Eucharist. With the gradual separation of the Eucharist from its meal context the second century, the idea of sacrifice gradually received more emphasis. Latin Christians then spoke of an altare (sing.), distinct from the pagan form, altaria (pl.). Ara remained a pre-dominantly pagan term for altar.

Historical Developments. The altars in the first three centuries were wooden, and only rarely stone, tables. A third-century representation of a wooden altar exists in the cemetery of St. Callistus. Deacons moved the table to and from the place of the liturgy; however, fixed altars did exist.

Transition to Fixed Stone and Metal Altars. Fixed altars became customary in the fourth century when stone and metal altars began to replace the wooden altars. In 517, the Council of Epaon in Bourgogne forbade wooden altars (can. 26), yet some were still used in the 12th century. Various reasons exist for the transition from wood. The danger of persecution no longer necessitated movable altars, basilicas called for more fitting altars, and the rock or stone theme in Scripture, as well as increased reverence for altars, possibly exerted some influence. Down to the Carolingian era the altar remained small with space enough for the chalice, bread, and book. The mensa (top part) was usually square, but sometimes rounded. Frequently, until the 13th century, it was slightly concave.

Association with Relics. The cult of martyrs provoked the next important development in the history of the altar. It was an ancient custom to honor deceased heroes; with all the more reason did Christians honor their martyrs (Martyrium Polycarpi 17.1; 18.2). Cyprian tells of the Eucharist being celebrated at grave sites (Epistles 39.3; 12.3). The tombs themselves, however, were not used as altars; instead, portable altars were used. Later, churches and altars were built over the tombs (e.g., St. Peter's and St. Paul's at Rome). Among the reasons for associating relics with the altar were reverence and a desire to retain communion with the martyrs, to obtain their intercessory protection, and to highlight the relation of their sacrifice to the altar's (see, Rv 6.9–11).

This association took place when many new churches were being built. Since not all the new churches could be built over martyr tombs, relics were brought to altars. In Rome and parts of Gaul, however, there often was recourse to second-class relics, such as pieces of cloth touched to reliquaries (brandea, palliola), because Roman law strictly forbade the disturbance of the dead. Although it is said that the threat of barbarian invasions (fifth to sixth centuries) led to the translation of some relics to safety within cities, we know that popes Hormisdas (514–523) and Gregory I (590–604) forbade any such translation; yet Boniface IV (608–615) brought a large number of relics to Rome for the dedication of St. Mary of the Martyrs. In any event, the spread of relics from Rome was slow. In the East and in northern Italy, relics were divided and translated with little hesitation. Although Theodosius I (375–395) outlawed it (Cod. Theod. 9.7.7), his law was ineffective; the practice continued and eventually prevailed in the West. From the ninth century on, even the Eucharist and corporals were sometimes misused as altar relics till this practice was forbidden in the 14th century.

Types of Altars Resulting from the Association with Relics. This association caused some changes in the structure of altars. Three forms of altars became common. (1) The table altar continued in use with the relics placed either in the base of its main support or in a hollowed out part of the mensa. This type of altar became less common in the Carolingian era because it was impractical for the entombment of relics. (2) There appeared a hollowed box-shaped altar with a window opening on its front or back, permitting access to the reliquary within it. (3) A solid box-shaped altar was built over tombs. Access to the tomb below could be had through a confession in front of the altar. If there was no tomb below the altar, the relics might have been housed in a sepulcher carved out of the mensa or in a niche carved into the front. It was not until the late Middle Ages that the present practice prevailed of placing the sepulcher in the mensa. In 1596 Church law required a sepulcher for every altar.

“The Adoration of the Shepherds,” central panel of “The Portinari Altarpiece” by Hugo van der Goes, c. 1476, oil on wood panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, Italy.

Altars made out of, or in the form of, sarcophagi did not exist before the 16th century, and were in vogue only during the baroque and rococo period. Wooden portable altars used by missionaries are mentioned as early as the sixth century. The earliest example of one comes from the tomb of St. Cuthbert in Durham (d.687). In the 14th century the portable altarstone became common.

From One Altar to Many Altars. One altar to a church was the rule in the early Church (Ignatius Ad Phil. 4.1; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 10.4.68); and this remains the practice in the Christian East. The one altar gave symbolic expression to the unity of the Church—one people assembled around one altar table in common worship. In the fifth and sixth centuries altars began to multiply in Western churches. Although the orations super oblata (Secret prayers) in the LEONINE SACRAMENTARY speak of altaria (pl.), this plural reference was to the altar used to receive the offerings. Altars were first multiplied to provide a place for the numerous relics. This change occurred in the time of Pope Symmachus (498–514), and possibly even before. In the seventh century an increase in the number of low Masses for votive intentions and the practice of ordaining monks were factors in the multiplication of altars, especially since it was often the custom to celebrate only one Mass a day at an altar. Gregory had no objection to a church with 13 altars (Epistle 6.49). A Carolingian prescription did try to control this multiplication, but at the end of the Middle Ages the Cathedral of Magdeburg and the Marian Church of Danzig each had 48 altars. Nevertheless, the principle of one altar has been preserved to the extent that there still is only one main altar to a church.

Priests and altar boys at Mass, Guangzhou, China. (©Owen Franken/Corbis)

Position of Altar. In the pre-Carolingian period, the altar was situated away from the apse wall: at the edge of the apse, between the apse and the nave, or in the middle of the nave. Moreover, it might have been built on the floor of the elevated apse or on the floor of the nave, in either case with or without a few steps elevating it. At all events, it was most visible. Two developments played a large part in shifting the altar to the rear or apse wall: orientation and the development of retables. Perhaps an exaggerated reverence for the Eucharistic mystery also played a part in moving the altar away from the people.

As regards orientation, the basilicas in Rome were usually portal-oriented, i.e., the church entrance faced the east (vs. apse-oriented churches). When the bishop went to the altar from his throne in the apse, he would be facing the people. However, the Eastern custom of apse-oriented churches spread to the West, especially from the early fifth century on. The apse-oriented churches in Gaul and the emphasis on orientation in prayer there caused changes in the ceremony books that originally came from Rome. The celebrant then stood facing the apse, leading the people behind him. The use of this position was brought to Rome with the Roman-Germanic ceremony books of the tenth century. It was eventually accepted by Roman churches, unless other conditions prevented celebrating Mass on the people's side of the altar (e.g., the confession at St. Peter's). This change brought the bishop's throne from behind the altar to the front gospel side of the altar. The clergy moved to the front or people's side of the altar. Thus, orientation contributed to moving the altar to the rear.

However, a second factor contributed to this movement of the altar, namely, the placing of martyr's relics on it in reliquaries that often were quite large. Churches without first-class relics began to substitute retables, vertical structures of varying height, built onto the rear of the altar (or later, from the floor up). At first they were of modest dimensions and painted with religious scenes, especially scenes from the life of a saint. They appeared gradually in the 10th and 11th centuries and flourished in the Gothic period (12th–15th centuries). The oldest extant retables are from the 12th century. Retables grew in size as paneling became common (triptychs and polyptychs). Carved figures were also added to them. Some retables allowed for changes in keeping with the liturgical season. By the end of the Middle Ages, hardly an altar was without a retable. Some cathedral churches built in the 12th and 13th centuries continued to place the bishop's throne behind the altar. In these churches the retable was a subsequent development that blocked out the bishop's throne and made its location useless for the liturgy. The retable in these instances was an additional factor in moving the throne from behind the altar, and thus permitting the location of the altar against the apse wall, farther from the congregation.

The distance between the laity and the altar was further accented by the chancel or rood screen. Even in the early churches a division of some sort separated laity and clergy (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 10.4). In both East and West this dividing piece grew. In the East it developed into the iconostasis that blocked out the view of the altar except when its center door was opened. In the West the altar could still be seen, but the chancel grew large enough to provide an elevated platform for Scripture readings, preaching, cantors, and even the organ. Since in the late Middle Ages the bishop's throne and choir of canons or monks separated the laity from the altar, an altar for the laity (rood altar) was placed in front of the chancel in many churches. The baroque period was largely responsible for clearing the churches of chancels and replacing them with the altar railing.

Tabernacles and Gradines. Until the 16th century the Eucharist was reserved in various parts of the church. In the 16th century the TABERNACLE became a permanent fixture of the altar. Its presence on the main altar was mandated by law during that time, although provision is made for reserving the Sacred Species elsewhere if there is another place more convenient and fitting for veneration and worship. The presence of the tabernacle has distracted attention from the altar and to some extent made of it a support for the tabernacle and a place for exposition of the Blessed Sacrament.

In the 16th century one or more gradines (steps) were added to the rear of the mensa. These gradines have served as pedestals for candles, flowers, relics, statues, etc. Again, they tend to obscure the nature of the altar.

In the Renaissance and baroque periods, large paintings flanked with pillars and statuary served as retables. Another favorite motif, especially in the baroque period, was the exposition throne for the Blessed Sacrament. The retables often became monumental in their proportions so that the altar seemed a mere appendage. This development, with various modifications, persisted until the early 20th century when the altar has again begun to receive the emphasis it deserves.

Altar and sanctuary within a brick apse, mid-5th century Chapel of SS. Teuteria e Fosca, Verona, Italy.

Altar Accessories. Retables, chancels, and tabernacles have been discussed in treating the historical development of the Altar. But there are many other altar accessories that deserve special mention.

Civory and Baldachino. The civory is a canopy structure over the altar supported by four columns. Various reasons have been given for its use, but most likely it was adopted from profane use to express the sovereign dignity and liturgical importance of the altar. This seems especially true for the small altar in the large fourth-century basilicas. The popularity of the civory, however, lessened in proportion to the growth of retables. In the late 15th century the BALDACHINO developed from the civory as a canopy supported from above or from behind the altar.

Curtains are sometimes related to the civory. St. John Chrysostom (344?–407) speaks of curtains in conjunction with the liturgy (Homil. in 1 Cor. 36.5). In the East, they were frequently attached to the chancel rather than to the civory. They served to hide the altar from catechumens and, later, to hide the mysteries themselves from the laity, as the iconostasis does today. In the West, curtains attached to the civory are mentioned in the time of Sergius I (687–701), but they served a decorative, not liturgical, purpose.

Spanish Romanesque altarpiece depicting Saint Bernard, 13th century, Museo de Mallorca, Palma de Mallorca, Spain. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Altar Cloths. A cloth completely covering the altar dates back to at least the fourth century. Sometimes a separate white linen cloth, the ancestor of the corporal, was placed on this covering cloth. The back-part of the upper cloth was raised and folded back over the chalice to serve as a pall, but soon the pall became a separate piece. By the eighth century, two or four linen cloths were used to cover the altar in case of spillage. At this time the uppermost cloth came to be called “corporal” since it held the Body (Corpus) of Christ. Meanwhile, when the altar received a retable and was moved against the back wall, the original cloth that covered the altar completely became the frontal (or ANTEPENDIUM), for only the front could then be covered.

Candles and Cross. CANDLES (see LIGHT, LITURGICAL USE OF) provided light for the altar from earliest times, but did not appear on the altar until the 11th century. The CROSS appeared on the altar around the 11th century; the CRUCIFIX became increasingly common from the 14th century on.

Vatican II Reforms. The Instruction for the Proper Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Sept. 26, 1964, prescribed that the main altar be free-standing in such a way that Mass might be celebrated with the priest facing the congregation. The actual decision of whether or not Mass would be celebrated facing the people was left as a local option. Mass facing the people became the common practice following the rationale that facing the people better promotes active participation, the primary goal of the liturgical renewal, and better symbolizes that the Eucharistic Sacrifice occurs under the sacramental sign of a meal.

Postconciliar instructions and documents favor the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament in a special Eucharistic chapel, or, if that is not possible, on a separate “altar of reposition”, rather than on the principal altar where the Eucharist is celebrated. Restoration of the practice of concelebration has obviated the need for secondary altars.

According to the reformed Roman Rite of the Mass, only the liturgy of the Eucharist takes place at the altar, while the introductory and concluding rites are led from the presidential chair, and the liturgy of the Word from the ambo. Thus the altar, which has always been regarded as a sign of Christ, becomes more clearly a sign of his special presence in the Eucharistic Sacrifice.

The revised order for the dedication of churches and altars according to the Roman rite (May 29, 1977) sums up the postconciliar doctrine concerning the altar. The altar is a symbol of Christ the Lord, who is the living altar of the heavenly temple (Heb 4.14; 13.10). Its function is as “the table of the sacrifice and of the paschal banquet.” It is defined as the “center of the thanksgiving which is achieved through the Eucharist, to which all the other rites of the Church are in some way directed.” An older tradition is restored: new churches should have only one altar, to signify the one Savior Jesus and the one Eucharist of the Church—although there may be a second altar in a separate chapel for weekday celebrations.

The Roman document, which is part of the Roman PONTIFICAL, repeats the 1969 norm that the altar, rather than the ambo or the tabernacle, should occupy a position in the church building that is truly central and to which the attention of the entire assembly is spontaneously directed. Thus, in newer churches the altar is brought forward, ideally located at the crossing, close to the congregation; it is the place where the bishop or priest (facing the congregation) and other ministers meet the assembled body of the faithful. In the restoration of older churches, if it is not desirable to completely remove the altar near the east wall of the sanctuary area, it has often been possible to retain its reredos or other altar piece while changing its appearance so that the altar near the congregation is the central focus of the church.

Bibliography: E. BISHOP, Liturgica historica (Oxford 1918; repr. 1962) 20–38. J. B. O’CONNELL, Church Building and Furnish- ing (Notre Dame, Ind. 1955) 133–218. Congregation of Rites, Instruction for the Proper Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sept. 26, 1964). L. BOUYER, Liturgy and Architecture (Notre Dame 1967). J. D. CRICHTON, Changes in the Liturgy (New York 1965) 87–98. G. DIEKMANN, “The Place of Liturgical Worship,” Concilium 2 (New York 1965) 67–107. J. JUNGSMANN, “The New Altar,” Liturgical Arts 37 (1969) 36–40. C. NAPIER, “The Altar in the Contemporary Church,” Clergy Review 57 (1972) 624–632.

[R. X. REDMOND/F. KRAUSE/F. R. MCMANUS/EDS.]

2. In The Bible

The article will be developed in four parts: terminology, pagan altars in the Bible, altars of Israel, and altars in the N T.

Terminology. The most common Hebrew word for altar in the OT is mizbēah from the root zbh, meaning “to slaughter.” Though mizbēah probably meant at first that upon which the victim was slaughtered (Gn 22.9), later the victim was slaughtered at a distance from the altar and then placed upon it (Lv 9.13). The altar came to be even more dissociated from slaughter when grain offerings were made upon it, and when the term mizbēah was applied to the altar of incense and even to the altar of the Transjordanian tribes, a mere memorial not used for sacrifice (Jos 22.26–27). Less common is šulhān, the “table” of the Lord (Mal 1.12). The Greek equivalent of mizbēah is θυσιαστήριον likewise linked with the root “to sacrifice,” θύω. In the Books of Maccabees θυσιαστήριον is the characteristic word for the altar of the true God, carefully distinguished from βωμός, a pagan altar (1 Mc 1.54, 59, in Septuagint). In the NT altars of sacrifice are called both θυσιαστήριον (Mt 5.23) and τράπεζα “table” (1 Cor 10.21), the first term being applied also to the altar of incense (Lk 1.11).

Pagan Altars in the Bible. Solomon offered sacrifice at the “great high place” in Gibeon (1 Kgs 3.4), most likely an ancient Canaanite sanctuary. Danger of harmful pagan influence, however, led to laws calling for the destruction of pagan altars (Ex 24.13; Dt 7.5), an attack renewed in the postexilic hostility to the small pagan incense altars known as hammānīm (2 Chr 34.4). In time, the contamination of pagan worship became so abhorrent that the altar of holocausts defiled by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc 1.57) was entirely dismantled and a new altar constructed in its place (1 Mc 4.44–47).

The Altars of Israel. A large stone in its natural condition could serve as an altar (1 Sm 6.14); most often, however, altars were constructed either of mud brick or unhewn stones. The ancient legislation of Ex 20.24–26 permitted either material, but there is no clear indication as to which was more generally used. Just as a heifer not yet yoked to the plow was suitable for sacrifice (Nm 19.2), so unhewn stones not yet removed from the divine sphere by human industry were proper altars. This desire to separate the divine from the human is probably the origin of the law against steps leading up to the altar (Ex 20.26): such steps would have been hewn out by human labor and would also have been trodden by the priest. The danger of indecent exposure as the priest mounted the steps clad in just a loincloth seems to be a secondary explanation. In time the ancient prescriptions lost their force, and the most sacred parts of the altar became the carved horns at its four corners (Ex 29.12), while the priest, now fully clad, used steps to ascend to the altar (Ex 28.42–43).

Despite changing custom, the symbolism of the altar remained constant. Above all, it was a symbol of God’s presence. Thus Abraham and Jacob built altars to commemorate a theophany (Gn 13.18; 35.7), as did Gideon, even giving a theophoric name to his altar: “Yahweh-Peace” (Jgs 6.24). At the altar, communion was achieved with God, as the offerings were removed from the human sphere to the divine, and blessings were received from God in return (Ex 20.24). The sprinkling of blood (see BLOOD, RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF) on the worshipers and the altar brought the people into communion with God Himself (Ex 24.6).

The horns of the altar were a special sign of God’s protective presence, and thus afforded sanctuary to the fugitive who grasped them (1 Kgs 2.28). Their origin is not clear. Perhaps they are vestiges of the ancient memorial pillars (Gn 28.18). They may have been used originally for holding the animal in place, or may merely be considered the altar’s extremities prolonged to express a religious respect parallel to that shown for the extremities of the priest’s body (Ex 29.20). In any case, they were characteristic of the two altars in the Temple of Jerusalem, the altar of holocausts and the altar of incense. [See TEMPLES (IN THE BIBLE).]

The Altar of Holocausts. Although traditions about sacrifice date from the desert period (Ex 10.25; 18.12; 32.6, 8), there is no proof that such sacrifices were performed on a fixed altars. The desert altar of holocausts described in Ex 27.1–8 and 38.1–7 is more accurately understood as a movable likeness of the Temple’s altar, which the author assumes to have been in use in the desert period. Since it was wooden and hollow, high but without steps, it is not clear how such an altar could have been used for holocausts. It also contained a bronze grating that gave it the name “the bronze altar.” It is not clear what the position or function of this grating was.

The Books of 1 and 2 Kings contain several allusions to the altar of holocausts in Solomon’s Temple, though it is noticeably absent from the lengthy description of the temple furnishings in 1 Kgs 6–7. It was made of bronze (1 Kgs 8.64) and was movable (2 Kgs 16.14); similar altars are familiar from Phoenician inscriptions. The sacred writer may have omitted his description of the altar because of its Phoenician origin. Data on the altar measurements are supplied by 2 Chr 4.1; however, these may be taken from the altar built later by Ahaz (2 Kgs 16.10–11) or from the postexilic altar of the author's own time. The precise relationship between this altar in 2 Chronicles, ch. 4, Ahaz's altar, the altar in Ezekiel's vision (Ez 43.13–17), and the postexilic altar of holocausts remains obscure. Ahaz moved Solomon's altar somewhat to the north and installed a much larger one, built on different levels and modeled on one he had seen in Damascus, and therefore probably Syrian in origin. Whether it should be related to Ezekiel's altar, also constructed on various levels but Babylonian in its inspiration, is doubtful. The names Ezekiel gives his altar's different levels ("bosom of the earth," "the divine mountain") came from the various levels of Babylonian temples and were employed by Ezekiel to make the altar a temple in miniature. The altar in 2 Chr 4.1 has almost the same dimensions as Ezekiel's but its description may have been taken from the postexilic altar, about which further information is lacking.

The Altar of Incense. The incense altar of the TENT OF MEETING is described in Ex 30.1–5 and 37.25–28, but is probably a projection of the temple altar into the desert period. The arrangement of the tent's furnishings is found in Ex 25–27, but, here, there is no mention of the incense altar, described later and out of context in Ex 30.1–5. Nor is it mentioned in texts describing the offering of INCENSE in the desert (Nm 16.6–7, 17–18; 17.11–12), where individual CENSERS are used. Like the desert altar of holocausts, it is a portable altar, built of wood and carried with poles. It is, however, also plated with gold, and so is known as "the golden altar."

The existence of this altar just outside the Holy of Holies in Solomon's Temple is well documented in 1 Kgs 7.48 and Is 6.6. Excavations in Mageddo and Shechem have also yielded small stone incense altars that can be said to date back as early as the 10th century B.C.

No mention is made of the incense altar among the precious appurtenances restored by Cyrus to the returning exiles (Ezr 1.6–11), but Antiochus Epiphanes later removed the golden altar when he plundered the second Temple (1 Mc 1.23). Under the Maccabees, an incense altar was reinstalled (1 Mc 4.49), undoubtedly the same one at which Zachary offered incense (Lk 1.8–10).

In the New Testament. The ancient symbolism of the altar as the sign of God's presence is reflected in the words of Jesus: the altar sanctifies the gift (Mt 23.18). The symbolism now lessened the altar's importance, for the NT sacrifice was already sanctified without the altar. The new sacrifice is Jesus who sanctifies Himself (Jn 17.19). Thus, in 1 Cor 10.16–17, St. Paul affirms that Christians partake of the Lord's Body and Blood without reference to the altar. In Hebrews also the author shows no concern for an altar for the Eucharistic sacrifice. When he asserts, "We have an altar, from which they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle" (Heb 13.10), he means the cross, or more likely he means the person of Jesus Himself.

The imagery of the Revelation recalls the Temple's altars, although it is not always clear which is meant, the one for holocausts or for incense. In Rv 11.1, the author is told to measure the Temple and the altar. In its context the image refers to the small group of men who remain faithful to Christ. Other references to altars found in the Revelation (Rv 6.9; 8.3, 5; 9.13; 14.18; 16.7) seem to envisage the altar of holocausts from which the prayers of the martyred saints arise. In any case, even in the Revelation, the altar's value is ultimately eclipsed, for in the vision of the new Jerusalem there is no temple or altar, "for the Lord God almighty and the Lamb are the temple thereof" (Rv 21.22).

Bibliography: R DE VAUX Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions (New York 1961) 406–414. K. GALLING, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible ed. G. A. BUTTRICK 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 1:96–100; 2:699–700. "Le Mystère de l'Autel," Maison-Dieu 29 (1952) 9–31.

[P. J. KEARNEY]

ALTDORF, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey in Alsace, Diocese of STRASBOURG, France; it was important for pastoral care and as a pilgrimage center. Founded by Count Hugo III as a cloister and burial place for his family, it was built under Count Eberhard V and rebuilt several times—c. 1192; after it had been pillaged by Strasbourgers, 1262; after the Peasants' War; c. 1600; and in 1700. The wooden cloister church, consecrated by Bp. Erchenbald of Strasbourg in the presence of Abbot Maiulus of Cluny, was dedicated to St. Bartholomew (974); a member of the family had taken part in Rome at the translation of relics of St. Bartholomew, who became the family patron saint. Before 1049, it seems, Bishop Werner reconsecrated the church in honor of St. Cyriacus (d. 303), a favorite with Benedictines, and the FOURTEEN HOLY HELPERS. Pope Leo IX, a member of the family, consecrated the altar. In the 12th century Altdorf was a double monastery (see MONASTERIES, DOUBLE). The Romanesque church was built c. 1200; choir and transept were rebuilt by the Vorarlberg Peter Thumb (1720–33). The Cluniac cloister joined the congregations of Mainz-Bamberg (1417), BURSFELD (1607), and Strasbourg (1608). In the 15th century Altdorf was individually united with SANKT GALLEN. Frescoes of the 12th century, whitewashed when the abbey was suppressed (1790), have been uncovered recently.

A second Abbey of Altdorf in south Württemberg, west Germany, originally housed Benedictine nuns or canonesses (sanctimoniales); it seems to have been founded after 934. The cloister was the burial place of the founder's family. The present cemetery of the Abbey of WEINGARTEN occupies the site. Altdorf seems to have died out c. 1000; but clerics, perhaps canons, continued divine services. It was revived as a convent of women (1036), which moved to Weingarten after a fire (1053) and then to Altomünster (1056).

Bibliography: A. SIEFFERT, Altdorf: Geschichte von Abtei und Dorf (Strasbourg 1946). G. SPAHR, "Die Reform im Kloster St. Gallen," in Schriften des Vereins für Geschichte des Bodensees 76 (1958) 1–62. C. BUHL, "Weingarten-Altdorf," in Weingarten, 1056–1956, ed. G. SPAHR (Weingarten 1956) 22.

[G. SPAHR]

ALTENBURG, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey in the Diocese of St. Pölten, Austria; its patron is St. Lambert. It was founded (1144) by Countess Hildburg of Rebgau-Poigen and settled with 12 monks from SANKT LAMBRECHT in Styria, and has always been the pastoral and cultural center of the former "Horn County." Six incorporated parishes include the pilgrimage parish Maria Dreieichen and the city parish of Horn. In 1964 the abbey had a boys' choir school and a boarding school, and 20 monks devoted themselves to pastoral care and scholarship. The cloister, one of the most splendid baroque monuments in Austria, was built (1650–1742) after its total destruction (1645) in the Thirty Years' War. Its present form is the work of the architect Joseph Mungenast (1729–41). There are many frescoes by Paul Trogers (church, library, prelates' hall, and emperors' stairway) and valuable stucco work of the WESSOBRUNN school (Franz Josef Holzinger and Michael Flor). Excavations in 1932 revealed part of the early Romanesque cloister.

Bibliography: Urkunden der Benedictiner-Abtei zum heiligen Lambert in Altenburg, ed. H. BURGER (Fontes rerum Austriacarum 21; Vienna 1865). H. BURGER, Geschichtliche Darstellung der Gründung und Schicksale des Benedictinerstiftes St. Lambert zu Altenburg in Nieder-Österreich (Vienna 1862). F. ENDL, Stift Altenburg (Augsburg 1929). G. SCHWEIGHOFER, Stift Altenburg (Vienna 1963). O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-

Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962) 2:184–185. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:68–69.

[G. SCHWEIGHOFER]

ALTERNATIVA

An institution found in Spain, later transplanted to Spanish America. In Spain, it demanded that an office or offices be alternated between members of different regions or nations. In Spanish America, it usually meant the alternation in office between a native of Spain, called chapelón (tenderfoot), and a native of America, called Creole. In Spanish America, the alternativa is found both in civil and in Church life; however, it was employed most widely in Spanish America in the religious orders. There it meant that the most important offices in a province had to be filled alternately by Spanish and Spanish-American religious respectively: the head of the province, at least half the members of his council, the heads of the more important houses as well as the occupants of the key posts in the province, such as regent of studies and master of novices. In other words, 10 to 12 posts alternated in each chapter by force of law. In the state of present research, it is not known when the alternativa was first established in Spanish America. The earliest known date is 1601, when it was imposed on the Dominicans of Quito. Soon thereafter, it was found officially in Mexico, Central America, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, Bolivia, and in the Philippines. In 1627 the Franciscans in Mexico even received the alternativa, the alternation of office between three parties: the friars who had received the habit in Spain, Spanish boys who entered the order in Mexico, and the Mexicans. The alternativa was not found among either the Mercedarians or the Jesuits; the first were governed usually by Spanish superiors, and the second by direct appointees of their general. Most frequently, the alternativa was requested by the Spanish friars because they were the minority party. In Guatemala, however, both the native Dominicans and Franciscans asked for it because they were the minority. Theoretically, the alternativa could have been advantageous since it could have ensured broadening intellectual contacts. Actually, it was a source of endless friction and dissension and is one of the factors which helped to weaken and corrupt the religious orders in Spanish America wherever it was found. Essentially, it predicated that election to office was less dependent on merit than on race.

Bibliography: A. S. TIBESAR, "The Alternativa: A Study in Spanish-Creole Relations in Seventeenth Century Peru," Americas 11 (1954–55) 229–283. J. GONZÁLES ECHENIQUE, "Notas sobre la Alternativa en las provincias religiosas de Chile indiano," Historia 2 (1962–63) 178–196.

[A. S. TIBESAR]

ALTMANN OF PASSAU, ST.

Bishop; b. Westphalia, Germany, c. 1015; d. Zeiselmauer, near Vienna, Austria, Aug. 8, 1091. He became canon and teacher at Paderborn, provost of the canons of Aachen c. 1051, and then chaplain to Empress Agnes (d. 1114). After a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, he was named bishop of Passau in 1065. His concern for the purity and pastoral zeal of his clergy made him a champion of the vita communis according to the Rule of St. Augustine, and he introduced this rule when founding Sankt Nikola outside Passau (c. 1070) and Göttweig (1083) and when reforming Sankt Florian (1071) and Sankt Pölten (1081). He was also instrumental in the foundation of the Augustinian houses of Rottenbuch (1073) and Reichersberg (1084). Altmann courageously published the papal decrees against married priests in 1074 and was the first to announce Emperor Henry IV's excommunication in Germany in 1076. As papal legate, he attended the princes' meeting at Tribur in October 1076. Driven from his diocese in 1077 or 1078 by the imperial party, Altmann fled to Rome. In 1080 he returned to the eastern part of his diocese, where he continued his political and pastoral efforts under the protection of Margrave Leopold II (d. 1095) until his death. He was buried in the Abbey of Göttweig, and a monk of this monastery wrote his vita (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 12:226–243). Since the late nineteenth century, his cult has been permitted in the dioceses of Passau, Linz, and Sankt Pölten.

Feast: Aug. 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:356–389. ALTMANN OF PASSAU, Streitschriften, ed. M. SDRALEK (Paderborn 1890). A. LINSSENMAYER, Zur Erinnerung an den seligen Bischof Altmann v. Passau, 1065–1091 (Munich 1891). E. TOMEK, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs (Innsbruck 1935–59) 1:138–143. J. HALLER, “Der Weg nach Canossa,” Historische Zeitschrift 160 (1939) 229–285, esp. 280–283. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, ed. R. HOLTZMANN (Tübingen 1948) 1:385–389, 541–545. R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns, v.2 (St. Ottilien 1951) 98–103, 233–236. J. OSWALD, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:402–403, bibliog. G. ALLMANG, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2: 826–827.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

ALTO, ST.

Hermit and monastic founder; d. c. 770. According to tradition, he came to the region near modern Dachau shortly after the middle of the eighth century and lived for a time as a hermit on some forest land given him by Pepin III. He was not, it would appear, one of the early missionaries who labored with VIRGILIUS OF SALZBURG in southern Bavaria. After a few years he built the monastery of Altomünster, which was destroyed in the tenth century during the Hungarian invasion. St. BONIFACE is said to have consecrated the monastic church erected during the lifetime of Alto. The authenticity of the saint's relics preserved today at Altomünster is not fully established. Sometime in the eleventh century OTHLOH of Sankt-Emmeram wrote his Vita s. Altonis (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15:843–846), which preserved the local traditions concerning the life of the saint.

Feast: Feb. 9.

Bibliography: A. BAYOL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:830–831. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 2:101. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 1:190, 192. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 2:216. R. BAUERREISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:403.

[H. DRESSLER]

ALTÖTTING, MONASTERY OF

Famous place of pilgrimage in honor of Our Lady, located in Upper Bavaria near the Austrian frontier, in the present Diocese of Passau, former Diocese of Salzburg. The name “Oetting” is said to derive etymologically from Otto, name of a Bavarian leader baptized by St. RUPERT OF SALZBURG (c. 700); the prefix Alt- (Old) was added in 1231 to distinguish the original structure from the new church built at that time. It is estimated that more than 600,000 pilgrims a year now visit the Holy Chapel (Gnadenkapelle) at Altötting, which contains the 13th-century statue of Our Lady of Grace (about 26 inches high, of linden wood, vested in jewel-studded robes).

The chapel, octagonal in shape and possibly modeled on the cathedral at AACHEN, was enlarged (1499–1511) by a small nave and arcade. Among its art treasures, special mention should be made of the “Golden Horse,” a work of French Gothic workmanship dating from c. 1400. Attached to the Bavarian ducal palace in the Carolingian period, the Holy Chapel was endowed in 876 by King Carloman of Bavaria (d. 880), who erected a Benedictine monastery and church adjacent to it. In 907 the chapel survived the attack of the Hungarians that destroyed the Benedictine foundation. Nothing further is known of it until 1231, when Duke Louis the “Kelheimer” founded a new collegiate church there; the provost and the chapter of CANONS were in charge of pilgrimages until 1803, when they were suppressed.

Present-day religious houses in Altötting include St. Mary Magdalene, which has been served successively by Jesuits (1591–1773), secular priests (1773–1841), Redemptorists (1841–1873), and now the Capuchins. St. Anne was a Franciscan friary from 1653 to 1803, when it became a provincial house of Capuchins, who were put in charge of the pilgrimages. St. CONRAD OF PARZHAM (d. 1894) was lay-brother and porter at this Capuchin friary. St. Anne's new church, built in 1911, was made a minor basilica in 1913. The Mary Ward Sisters (Englische Fräulein) and the Missionary Sisters of the Holy Cross both have their mother houses there; the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul have been in Altötting since 1862.

Bibliography: L. BOITEUX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:834–841. H. GEISELBERGER, Der Gnadenort Altötting (6th ed. Altötting 1950). H. M. GILLET, Famous Shrines of Our Lady, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1952) v.2. M. A. KÖNIG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:404–405.

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

ALUMBRADOS (ILLUMINATI)

Name given to the adherents of a Spanish pseudo-mysticism of the 16th century and deriving from their claim to act always under the immediate illumination of the Holy Spirit. The name was first so used in a letter from a Franciscan friar to Cardinal XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS in 1494. The movement itself was but a recurrence of the bizarre parody of true mysticism that is never long absent from the Church in the world. Proximately, its sources would most probably be found in the voluntarism of medieval Teutonic theology and in the Averroistic strains of Arabian mysticism, as well as in a Reformation anticlericalism. The movement was confined mostly to the Dioceses of Cadiz and Seville. Its doctrines, which are known in later times chiefly in the form of opinions condemned by the Inquisition in 1623, seem to have infected all classes of people.

The basic flaw in the teaching of the Alumbrados lay in the exaggerated importance they attached to mental prayer. They held that mental prayer is commanded by divine law and that in it all other precepts are fulfilled. Thus not even attendance at Mass, obligations arising from charity, or obedience to lawful authority must be allowed to impede the existence of mental prayer. This devotion was described simply as the recollection of God's presence, in which there is no discursive movement of the mind, no meditation properly so called, and no reflection on mental images such as the Sacred Passion or humanity. It is by the practice of this quietistic prayer of nothingness that the soul arrives at a state of perfection in which its faculties are so submerged that the soul can no longer act. To one constituted in this highest degree of spirituality, there comes the ravishment of the Spirit, so that in ecstasy the soul sees the divine essence, beholds the Blessed Trinity even as the elect in heaven. When this beatifying vision has been achieved, all the properties of beatitude logically follow. The soul is freed from the weakness of wounded nature; it is rendered impeccable; it is, in short, consciously confirmed in grace. Thus elevated, a man does not act as of himself; willingly or unwillingly he is moved by the illumination of the Spirit.

In the moral order, such principles could lead only to catastrophe. The investigations of the Inquisition provide a sordid account of the grossest carnal sins indulged in by the "perfect" under the guise of "communications of the Holy Spirit and divine love between souls." As a result of these shocking disclosures, it is not surprising that the Inquisition's judgment of the type of mysticism practiced by the Alumbrados was extremely unfavorable. Certainly the hypercritical attitude of some of the theologians of the next century toward even true spirituality was a result in no small degree of the aberrations of the Alumbrados.

Bibliography: P. POURRAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 13.2:1552–54. F. CAYRÉ, Manual of Patrology and History of Theology, tr. H. HOWITT, 2 v. (Paris 1936–40) 2:790. R. A. KNOX, Enthusiasm (New York 1950; repr. 1961) 241–242. V. BELTRÁN DE HEREDIA, "La Beata de Piedrahita no fué alumbrada," Ciencia tomista 63 (1942) 294–311.

[T. K. CONNOLLY]

ALVA Y ASTORGA, PEDRO DE

Lecturer on theology, procurator general of the Franciscans in Rome, one of the most outstanding figures of the 17th century in the debates on Immaculate Conception; b. 1602; d. 1667. He was of Spanish origin, and belonged to the Franciscan Province of the Twelve Apostles of Peru. With the aid of his own press in the Low Countries he was able to publish his copious theological writings. All these centered about the tradition of the Immaculate Conception; he was critic, debater, and editor of collected writings on this subject. Some of these compilations are still of basic interest [compare X. Le Bachelet, "Immaculée Conception," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7:1094]. With his contribution the controversy entered upon a decisive period. Another phase of his work, less studied, is his contribution to the history of his order, with his great Bullarium in ten volumes and 16,000 documents. The Indiculus and a draft of it are well known, but the major work remained unedited, and its present whereabouts are unknown.

Bibliography: A. EGUILUZ, "Fr. Pedro de Alva y Astorga, O.F.M., en las controversias inmaculistas," Verdad y Vida, 12 (1954) 247–272. "El P. Alva y Astorga y sus escritos inmaculistas," Archivo Ibero Americano, 15 (1955) 497–594. L. CEYSSENS, "Pedro de Alva y Astorga, O.F.M., y su imprenta de la Inmaculada Concepción de Lovaina (1663–66)," ibid., 11 (1951) 5–35.

[A. EGUILUZ]

ALVARADO CARDOZO, LAURA EVANGELISTA, BL.

Baptized on Oct. 3, 1875, as Laura Evangelista, called in religion María of San José; is also known as María of Venezuela; co-founder of the AUGUSTINIAN RECOLLECTS of the Heart of Jesus; b. April 25, 1875, at Choroní, Girardot District, Aragua (then called Estado Guzmán Blanco), Venezuela; d. April 2, 1967, at Maracay, Venezuela.

Laura Evangelista was the eldest of the four children of Clemente Alvarado and his then common-law wife Margarita Alvarado Cardozo. When Laura was three, the family moved to Maracay, where she received her early Christian education at home. From ages five to 16, she attended a private school, where she earned the esteem of her teachers and classmates. At her first communion she promised to serve God. Four years later on that feast she made a private vow of her virginity to Christ.

Shortly thereafter, she began instructing poor children at home, supporting the project financially with her own labor. Together with her spiritual director Fr. Vicente López Aveledo she worked to found the first hospital in Maracay, Saint Joseph's. She devoted herself to the care of the sick in spite of the difficulty of the work, the opposition of her parents, and the demoralizing poverty that surrounded her. In 1896, she was named director of the hospital.

Together with Fr. López she founded the Congregation of the Sisters of the Poor of Saint Augustine (1901), better known as the Augustinian Recollects of the Heart of Jesus. They assumed the Rule of Saint Augustine and the habit of Santa Rita. Laura was named superior general and confirmed her vow of virginity in 1902. The following year she made her perpetual vows and took the name María of San José. Until 1960 when she was succeeded by Sister Lourdes Sanchez, Mother María guided the congregation's work of caring for the sick, the elderly and orphans in thirteen hospitals and thirty-seven houses throughout Venezuela. After a long illness patiently borne, Mother María died at age ninety-two. She was buried with her wooden cross in her hands in the chapel of the Immaculate Conception Home in Maracay. At her beatification by John Paul II on May 7, 1995, María de San José became the first Venezuelan blessed.

Feast: April 25.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 564. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 19 (1995): 1, 2, 4; no. 20 (1995): 2–3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ÁLVARES, FRANCISCO

Priest and missionary; d. c. 1540. As chaplain of the first official Portuguese royal embassy to Ethiopia (1520–26), he wrote a monumental description of the Eastern Christian nation, Verdadera [sic] informaçam das terras do Preste Joam, published in reduced form in Portuguese in 1540. Translated into several European languages, it provided 16th-century Europe with frank, honest, accurate information that supplemented what Damião de GÓIS had made available at second hand. It is highly esteemed in Ethiopia today.

Ethiopia's ambassador to Portugal reached Lisbon early in 1514. The following year King Manuel I sent his mission in reply, and the Ethiopian ambassador was in the company as the group proceeded to Goa. In 1517 they tried to land in the Massaua area on the west side of the Red Sea, but bad weather and worse leadership nearly wrecked the whole expedition, and the Portuguese ambassador, Duarte Galvão, died. The survivors returned to India, and only in April 1520 did the embassy, now headed by Dom Rodrigo de Lima, finally land at Massaua.

Álvares's narrative, published in Lisbon long after his return, begins at this point. Its lengthy first book, the major part of the entire volume, concerns the six years the embassy spent in Ethiopia. It ends in April 1526, when the Portuguese, returning home, were picked up by a Portuguese fleet from India. The second book describes the subsequent journey to Goa and the passage to Lisbon, where the travelers arrived in July of 1527.

The Ethiopian emperor, Lebna Dengel (David II), had sent Zagazabo on this same journey as his ambassador to King João III, who had succeeded Manuel in 1521. Perhaps more important, he named Álvares his ambassador to the pope and instructed him to render Ethiopian obedience to the Holy See. For reasons of his own João III forced Álvares to wait in Portugal for five years before permitting him to proceed to Rome in the company of João's ambassador to the pope, Dom Martinho de Portugal.

Finally on Jan. 29, 1533, at a consistory in Bologna, in the presence of Emperor Charles V, Álvares rendered David II's obedience to Pope Clement VII. News of this event electrified Europe, where it circulated in a little Latin book published in Bologna within a month and reprinted many times in several languages. The Latin volume, at least partly written by Paolo Giovio, contains information on Ethiopia unquestionably taken from Álvares's larger treatise.

Nothing came of the Ethiopian submission, for the pope (Giulio de' Medici) had other matters on his mind, as did the Portuguese. Álvares remained in Italy, apparently in Rome, where he is said to have died. His great treatise remained unpublished and is lost. The version printed in 1540, probably without his authorization, is only a portion of the larger study. Published at the king's order, it reveals the workings of a great mind, tolerant and critical, Portuguese and ecumenical.

Bibliography: F. ÁLVARES, The Prester John of the Indies, tr. H. E. J. STANLEY, ed. C. F. BECKINGHAM and G. W. B. HUNTINGFORD, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1961). F. M. ROGERS, The Quest For Eastern Christians: Travels and Rumor in the Age of Discovery (Minneapolis 1962).

[F. M. ROGERS]

ÁLVAREZ, BALTASAR

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Cervera del Rio Alhama (Logroño), 1533; d. Belmonte, July 25, 1580. Álvarez entered the Society of Jesus at Alcalá, on May 3, 1555. After a period in the apostolic ministry in Avila (1558–66), he was made rector in Salamanca (1573–76) and from 1576 to 1580 held the posts of both rector and novice master at Medina del Campo and Villagarcía. He was also visitor for the province of Aragón, designated provincial of Peru, and finally, for a few months, provincial of Toledo. St. Teresa of Avila called upon him for counsel in certain critical moments of her life, and for six years he was her confessor.

Álvarez's prayer of silence was considered incompatible with the spirit of the society and was condemned by the Superior General E. Mercurian at the instigation of the provincial Juan Suarez and the visitor Diego Avelaneda. The opposition stemmed in part from caution begotten by the then recent condemnation of the illuministic ideas of the Alumbrados, and in part from the disfavor with which superiors in the society at the time viewed the tendency of some Jesuits to encourage involvement in contemplation at the expense of the apostolic ministry, which was the principal end of the society.

The influence of the spiritual doctrine of Álvarez was due not only to his own accomplishment but also to the popularity of his biography, which was written by Luis de LA PUENTE, SJ. His frequent assignments to administrative office in the society prevented him from dedicated and extensive writing. His works include commentaries on the rule for novices; retreat sermons; two "reports" about his prayer, short but valuable treatises on the prayer of silence. He excelled in the expression of true fervor and the intensity of his personal spiritual experience.

Title page, "Verdadera informaçam das terras do Preste Joam" (True Information about the Lands of the Prester John), 1540, Portuguese edition, by Francisco Álvares.

Bibliography: B. ÁLVAREZ, Escritos espirituales: Introducción biográfica, ed. C. M. ABAD and F. BOADO (Barcelona 1961), complete ed. of his works. L. DE LA PUENTE, Vida del v. p. B. Álvarez (new ed. Madrid 1882). I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Répertoire de spiritualité ignatienne (Rome 1961) 177–178. E. HERNÁNDEZ, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 1:405–406. H. BREMOND, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France depuis la fin des guerres de religion jusqu'à nos jours, 12 v. (Paris 1911–36) 8:228–269. J. TARRAGO, "La oración de silencio . . . del Padre Baltasar Álvarez y los ejercicios . . .," Manresa, 4 (1928) 165–174, 258–270.

[I. IPARRAGUIRRE]

ÁLVAREZ, DIEGO

Theologian; b. Medina del Rio Secco (Diocese of Palencia), date unknown; d. Trani, 1631 (and not in 1635). He entered the Dominican Order at Medina, and taught theology at Burgos, Palencia, Toto, and Valladolid. On Nov. 7, 1596, he arrived at Rome where his superiors had sent him to defend the Thomist school in the controversies on grace and free will. While serving as regent of theological studies at the Minerva, he participated in the work of the CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS with Tomás de LEMOS. He was named bishop of Trani (Southern Italy) in 1606, where he remained until his death. His main works deal with the controversies on grace: Commentarii in Isaiam (Rome 1599), De auxiliis divinae gratiae et humani arbitrii viribus et libertate (Rome 1610), Responsiones ad objectiones adversus concordiam liberi arbitrii cum divina praesentia (Trani 1622), De origine pelagianae haeresis et eius progressu (Trani 1629). All these works were edited several times in the 17th century. Álvarez also published his courses on theology, on the third part of the Summa theologica of St. Thomas, De incarnatione divini verbi (Lyons 1614), and on the second part, Disputationes theologicae in primam secundae S. Thomae (Trani 1617). His Manuale concionatorum (Rome 1622) deals more directly with his episcopal activity. There are many texts and documents at the archives of the order in Rome that remain unedited.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 2.1:481–482. P. MANDONNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:926–927. R. COULON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:872–873.

[A. DUVAL]

ÁLVAREZ DE PAZ, DIEGO

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Toledo, 1560; d. Potosí, Jan. 17, 1620. Álvarez de Paz entered the Society of Jesus in Alcalá, Feb. 24, 1578, and in 1589 went to Peru as a student of theology and remained there for the rest of his life. He began his active career as professor of philosophy, theology, and Sacred Scripture, and then served as rector in different colleges, vice provincial in Tucumán (1605–07), and provincial in Peru from 1616 until his death. His work as a spiritual writer is contained in three extensive volumes that treat, respectively: perfection; the overcoming of sin, vices, passions, and the practice of virtues, especially humility; and the search for peace through prayer. This trilogy is like a vast spiritual encyclopedia, noteworthy for the depth of insight, theological precision, clearness, and richness in dogmatic content, although from a literary viewpoint it is somewhat too profuse. His doctrine on affective prayer was based on the influence of A. Cordeses, SJ. Álvarez de Paz was the first Jesuit to make a detailed study of infused contemplation.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 1:252–258. J. E. DE URIARTE and M. LECINA, Biblioteca de escritores de la Compañía de Jesús a la antigua asistencia de España desde sus orígenes hasta el año de 1773, v.1 (Madrid 1925) 155–162. I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Répertoire de spiritualité ignatienne de la mort de S. Ignace à celle du P. Aquaviva, 1556–1615 (Rome 1961). J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice tr. W. T. YOUNG (Chicago 1964). A. ASTRÁIN in Gregoriana 1 (1920) 394–424. E. UGARTE DE ERCILLA in Razón y Fe 58 (1920) 465–473; 59 (1921) 186–187. E. HERNÁNDEZ, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 1:407–409.

[I. IPARRAGUIRRE]

ÁLVAREZ MENDOZA, JULIO, ST.

Martyr, pastor; b. Dec. 20, 1866, Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico; d. Mar. 30, 1927, San Julián, Jalisco. He studied in the seminary of Guadalajara with the financial help of benefactors and was ordained in 1894. Thereafter he was assigned to Mechoacanejo, Jalisco (Diocese of Aguascalientes), where he served with kindness and simplicity the rest of his life. He had an opportunity to leave his parishioners at the beginning of the clerical persecution but chose to stay with his flock. En route to celebrate Mass at a farm, he was identified as a priest and apprehended (Mar. 26, 1927). The following morning he was taken to San Julián, where he was shot after pardoning his executioners. His cadaver was left on the trash heap near the church, where a monument has been erected in his honor. Fr. Alvarez was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979). Y. PADILLA RANGEL, El Catolicismo social y el movimiento Cristero en Aguascalientes (Aguascalientes 1992).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ÁLVAREZ OF CÓRDOBA, BL.

Dominican preacher and reformer; b. Córdoba (Lisbon) 1360; d. Córdoba, Feb. 19, 1430. He preached extensively in Andalusia and in Italy. Once the Spanish kingdoms broke with the antipope BENEDICT XIII, Álvarez preached tirelessly against him. Having been counselor for a brief period to King Henry III of Castile, he was instrumental at Henry's death, 1406, in securing the election of King John II in preference to Ferdinand, the king's brother. Álvarez acted as confessor and counselor to Queen Catherine and King John until his retirement to Córdoba in 1423, when he founded the observant priory of Scala Coeli. His devotion to the Passion of Christ, which had been engendered during a pilgrimage to Palestine in 1405, moved him to erect in the priory gardens tableaux of the Passion that were forerunners of the STATIONS OF THE CROSS. In 1427, Martin V appointed him vicar of the Spanish Dominican Observants. He was beatified in 1741.

Feast: Feb. 19.

Bibliography: D. A. MORTIER, Histoire des maîtres généraux de l'ordre des Frères Prêcheurs, 8 v. (Paris 1903–20) 4:210–214. P. ÁLVAREZ, Santos, bienaventurados, venerables de la orden de los Predicadores, 4 v. (Vergara, Spain 1920–23) 1:495–508. G. GERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:408.

[A. H. CAMACHO]

ALVARO PELAYO

Franciscan (1304), doctor of Canon and civil law in Bologna; b. Galicia, c. 1275; d. Seville, c. 1349. As papal penitentiary in AVIGNON (1330–32) and as bishop of Silves in Portugal (1332), he knew firsthand the evils plaguing Christendom that are described in his writings. He sought to open the eyes of his readers with exhaustive examinations of conscience (potentially political constitutions) so that reason under canonical guidance might achieve a state of universal order in society. His thought, for the most part theocratic, accords certain basic rights to the state. The first part of De statu et planctu ecclesiae (Avignon 1330–32; revised, 1335–40) is a defense of JOHN XXII and the papacy against Louis IV of Bavaria and MARSILIUS OF PADUA. The second part deals with the condition of the Church as it was and as it should be. The Speculum regum (c. 1341), citing classical authors more frequently than Christian, was meant for the Spain of Alfonso XI, and perhaps his chancellor, Archbishop ALBORNOZ. Alvaro urges Alfonso to continue the Reconquista into Morocco, de iure Christian. The Collirium fidei adversus hereses (1344) is an annotated catalogue of heresies, ancient and medieval. Although widespread in manuscripts and in print, Alvaro's writings lack definitive editions and studies. A Quinquagesilogium dealing with the Franciscan rule and a commentary on St. Matthew exist in manuscripts. A sermon on the beatific vision and a commentary on the Four Books of Sentences are lost.

Bibliography: Bibliographia Franciscana 9–11 (1954–63). G. DELORME, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:857–861. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de sociologie 1:488–491. A. VACANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:926. J. LAHACHE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:1312. L. AMORÓS, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:409. M. A. SCHMIDT, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:301.

[E. P. COLBERT]

ALVA STRA, ABBEY OF

A former CISTERCIAN monastery dedicated to Our Lady, situated near Lake Vättern in the Province of Östergötland, Sweden, in the old Diocese of Linköping. The oldest and most important Cistercian monastery of medieval Sweden, it was founded in 1143 on the advice of Archbishop ESKIL OF LUND by King Sverker the Elder (d. 1156), who granted property for its erection on the estate of his late wife Ulfhild. At her request St. BERNARD had already sent monks from CLAIRVAUX. Alvastra was the 40th abbey to be affiliated with Clairvaux. From Alvastra the monasteries of Varnhem, Julita (Saba), and Husby (Gudsberga) were founded. A monk from Alvastra, Stephen (d. 1185), was appointed the first archbishop of Uppsala in 1164. Both the Sverker family and the succeeding Folkung dynasty were favorably disposed toward the monastery, and the royal tomb of the Sverker family was later built in front of the high altar of the abbey church. St. BRIDGET received visions during her stay at Alvastra, and her husband and one of her sons are buried in its chapel. One of her most devoted friends and her confessor was the prior, Peter Olavi (d. 1390), who recorded most of her revelations from her own dictation. The abbey was abandoned in 1527 when Gustavus I Vasa (d. 1560), who was moving toward imposing the Protestant REFORMATION in Sweden, took control of its estates. Only a few volumes remain from the old monastic library, but parts of the buildings and of the church are still preserved. Layers from fires in 1312 and 1415 have been of importance for the dating of the many articles found during excavation projects carried on at the site since the end of the 19th century.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:75–76. U. BERLIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:892. E. ORTVED, Cisterciordenen og dens klostre i Norden, 2 v. in 1 (Copenhagen 1927–33) 2:53–141. K. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:409. I. SWARTLING, Alvastra kloster (Stockholm 1962). H. JOHANSSON, Ritus cisterciensis (Lund 1964).

[O. ODENIUS]

ALZOG, JOHANN BAPTIST

Historian, and patrologist; b. Ohlau, Silesia, June 29, 1808; d. Freiburg, Germany, March 1, 1878. Alzog studied at Breslau and at Bonn. He was ordained in Cologne on July 4, 1834, and received the doctor's degree at Münster in 1835. He then taught at Posen (1836–44) and Hildesheim until called to the University of Freiburg im Breisgau (1853), where he remained until his death.

Alzog was a voluminous writer of sure theological sense and scientific method in research. In 1841 he published his Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte, which went through nine editions and was translated into seven languages. In 1866 he published his Handbuch der Patrologie, a model of exactness in biographical detail, conciseness of doctrinal exposition and bibliographical citation. He edited the Oratio apologetica de fuga sua of St. Gregory of Nazianzus, and also contributed to various periodicals and lexica. He vigorously supported the archbishop, Martin de Dunin, in the controversy over mixed marriages. In 1869 he was called to Rome by Pius IX to take part in the preparation for Vatican Council I. Alzog's work was noted for impartiality and equanimity. After Johann A. MÖHLER, he was a principal influence in the revival of studies concerned with positive theology in Germany. He also helped to found the GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT.

Bibliography: H. HEMMER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1:931–932. P. SÄGER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:410–411.

[F. X. MURPHY]

AMABILIS, ST.

Priest of Auvergne; b. probably Riom (Auvergne), France c. 397; d. Nov. 1. c. 475. In the sixth century, GREGORY OF TOURS (In gloria confess. 33) described the popular belief in this saint's power over serpents as well as the veneration at his tomb. Gregory reports that he himself witnessed two miracles there. Amabilis served as precentor at Clermont and later as parish priest at Riom where, in 1120, a church was dedicated to him. In the seventh century his relics were transferred to Riom; in the eighteenth century a dispute occurred over these relics between neighboring Clermont and Riom, where Amabilis is patron. Public processions in his honor have been traditional in Riom, where he is invoked against fire and snakes.

Feast: June 11; Oct. 19 (Clermont).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 2:460–467. L. BERNET-ROLLANDE, Saint Amable: Sa vie, son église, son culte (Clermont-Ferrand 1891). M. PREVOST, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:913. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:387–388.

[L. M. COFFEY]

AMADEUS IX OF SAVOY, BL.

Duke of Savoy; b. Thonon, France, Feb. 1, 1435; d. Vercelli, Italy, March 30, 1472. He was the first of 18 children born to Louis I of Savoy and Anne of Cyprus. In 1451 he married the daughter of Charles VII of France, Yolanda, to whom he had been betrothed as an infant. He succeeded to the throne in 1456, but later (1469) relinquished control to his wife because he was subject to epilepsy. He was a wise and able ruler, a friend of the poor, and a peacemaker. He meditated and attended Mass daily and received the Sacraments more frequently than was the common practice in his time. He showed great forbearance and forgiveness toward his adversaries, the SFORZAS, and some of his own brothers. He was beatified in 1677.

Feast: March 30.

Bibliography: E. FEDELINI, Les Bienheureux de la Maison de Savoie (Chambéry 1925). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 1:706–707. J. GRISAR, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 1:413.

[N. G. WOLF]

AMADEUS OF LAUSANNE, ST.

Cistercian abbot of Hautecombe (1139–44), bishop of Lausanne (1144 or 1145–59); b. chateau of Chatte in the Dauphiné, Jan. 21, 1110; d. Lausanne, Aug. 27, 1159. Schooled at the imperial court, Amadeus followed the example of his father, Amadeus the Elder of Clermont-Hauterive, in quitting noble rank for cloistered anonymity (1125), but he did not find the obscurity he sought, for his abbot, St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, urged him into posts of leadership. He was often imperial counselor, papal legate, and local arbiter. As bishop he put into practice the monastic ideals of personal piety, devotion to communal peace, and attention to practical detail. He was the author of eight homilies in honor of the Blessed Virgin, the seventh of which was cited twice in the 1950 papal definition of the Assumption. After his death he was acclaimed blessed by his people and his order, and his cult was confirmed by St. Pius X. In 1911 his tomb was discovered in the old Lausanne cathedral, and his relics were taken to Fribourg.

Feast: Jan. 28.

Bibliography: Huit homélies mariales, ed. G. BAVAUD et al. (Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. DE LUBAC et al., 72; Paris 1960). A. DI-

MIER, Amédée de Lausanne, disciple de saint Bernard (S. Wandrille 1949). Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum (Rome-Westmalle 1934–) 21:1–65, commemorative issue, 8th centenary of St. Amadeus's death.

[P. EDWARDS]

AMALARIUS

Bishop; b. in the area of Metz, c. 775; d. Metz, c. 850. He was educated by Alcuin, and later taught at the palace school at Aachen. From 809 to 813 he was the archbishop of Trier; he also served as a Carolingian ambassador to Constantinople (c. 813) and Rome (831). After the exile of Agobard, he administered the diocese of Lyon from 835 to 838. In 838 the Synod of Quierzy, following the leadership of Florus of Lyons, removed him for teaching theology that was “contrary to tradition.” Amalarius's most significant work is the Liber officialis (823), the most influential liturgical book of the early Middle Ages in the West. Amalarius was the first to apply a fully developed vocabulary of symbolic interpretation to Latin expositiones missae, or commentaries on the Mass. Such exegetical methods had long been used as a tool for understanding the Scriptures, and were first extended to the understanding of Christian worship in the mystagogical catecheses of the fourth century. Amalarius was not the first Westerner to utilize such an interpretive language in liturgical explanations, but his use of a figurative hermeneutic captured the imagination of nearly all Western thinkers of the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: J. M. HANSENS, Amalarii episcopi opera liturgica omnia, 3 v. in Studi e Testi 138–140 (1948–50). J. A. CABANISS, Amalarius of Metz (Amsterdam 1954). J. A. CABANISS, “Agobard and Amalarius: A Comparison,” 3 (1952) 125–131. A. KOLPING, “Amalar von Metz und Florus von Lyon,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 73 (1951) 424–464.

[P. JACOBSON]

AMALBERGA, SS.

Two saints with this name are venerated on the same day, July 10. Because the events of both their lives have been embellished with legendary details, it is quite difficult to distinguish between them, much less to separate fact from fiction in their biographies. It seems quite clear, however, that one St. Amalberga (seventh century, variants: Amalburga, Amelberga, Amalia, Amelia) was the wife of Count Witger and mother of Gudula, Reinelde, and Bishop Emebert of Cambrai (d. c. 715). When her husband became a BENEDICTINE monk at the Abbey of Lobbes, she entered the convent at Maubeuge. She died at Maubeuge, and her body was later transferred to Lobbes.

The second Amalberga (eighth century) was a nun of the community of Münsterbilzen in Belgium. Because of her beauty she was approached by King PEPIN III who wished her to marry his son Charles (CHARLEMAGNE). Reportedly she once suffered a broken arm in resisting Charles's attentions, and perhaps for that reason her name has been invoked for the cure of bruises. She died at the convent of Tamise in Flanders, but her relics were solemnly translated to the church of St. Pierre in Ghent in 1073.

A third Amalberga lived in the tenth century. She was the abbess of Susteren, where she educated two of the daughters of the king of Lorraine. Her feast is celebrated on November 21.

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:64–65. A. PONCELET, “Les Biographes de Ste. Amelberge,” Analecta Bollandiana 31 (1912) 401–409. Acta Sanctorum July 3:61–68, 70–107. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 1:108, 109. U. BERLIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:924–925. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Études critique et littéraire sur les vitae des saints mérovingiens de l'ancienne Belgique (Louvain 1907) 177–182, 301–302. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 2:427–431.

[J. F. FAHEY]

AMALRIC AUGERIUS

Fourteenth century historian and theologian; b. Béziers, France, date unknown; d. after 1362. He was a doctor of theology from the University of MONTPELLIER, prior of Santa Maria de Aspirano in the Diocese of Perpignan, and chaplain to URBAN V. Although he is commonly identified as an AUGUSTINIAN, A. Zumkeller claims that this is uncertain. His only known work, Actus romanorum pontificum a primo usque ad Johannem papam XXII sive annum 1321, is an alphabetical chronicle of the popes, written at Avignon in 1362 (see AVIGNON PAPACY) and dedicated to Urban V. It has been edited by J. G. Eccard, Corpus historicum medii aevi (Leipzig 1723) 2:1641–1824, and by L. A. Muratori, Rerum italicarum scriptores (Milan 1734) 3.2.

Bibliography: A. ZUMKELLER, “Manuskripte von Werken der Autoren des Augustiner-Eremitenordens in mitteleuropäischen Bibliotheken,” Augustiniana, 11 (1961) 90. L. BOEHM, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:415. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologie catholicae,¹³ 2:644. A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 5:387.

[A. J. ENNIS]

AMALRIC OF BÈNE

Theologian, with pantheistic and materialistic inclinations; b. Bène, near Chartres, mid-12th century; d. Paris, c. 1206. He was also known as Amaury, and was a student and later teacher of theology at Paris. He showed the influence of the school of CHARTRES and derived his idea partially from misinterpreted writings of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA, but especially from ARISTOTLE. Amalric was called to Rome by INNOCENT III who censured his theories. Amalric retracted them upon his return to Paris. Although he left no writings, he attracted a number of disciples called AMALRICIANS, whose writings indicate that basically Amalric identified God with the universe. In 1210 his body was exhumed and, by order of a council of Paris, was reburied in unconsecrated ground.

Bibliography: F. G. HAHN, Über Amalrich von Bena und David von Dinant (Villach, Austria 1882). G. C. CAPELLE, Amaury de Bène (Paris 1932). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 1:422–425.

[B. CHUDOBA]

AMALRICIANS

An early 13th-century sect centered in Paris, disciples of AMALRIC OF BÈNE. The disciples were more extreme than their master. Their pantheistic concept of a God who is identical with the universe made them reject TRANSUBSTANTIATION, as they held that God was already present in the bread and wine. Their abstract pantheism ultimately led them to a denial of the essential difference between good and evil, and to the substitution of knowledge of the natural processes for faith. According to their Trinitarian concept of history, the Father ruled over ancient times and the Son over the first 12 centuries of Christianity, while the reign of the Holy Ghost began with Amalric. Having been condemned by a council in Paris (1210) as heretical, and five years later by the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL, the sect quickly disappeared (See JOACHIM OF FIORE).

Bibliography: See references under AMALRIC OF BÈNE. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux 5.2:1303–05. M. T. D'ALVERNY, "Un Fragment du procès des Amauriciens," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 25 (1950–51) 325–336. E. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:415–416.

[B. CHUDOBA]

AMANA SOCIETY

The Amana Society, also known as the Community of True Inspiration, is one of the oldest communal sects in America. Deeply influenced by German PIETISM of the early 18th century, Johann Rock and Eberhard Grüber protested against what they considered the rigid dogmatism and ritualism of the Lutheran Church. Claiming that divine inspiration had been given to them, they organized a community of True Inspirationists in 1714. Its principal tenets maintained that God deals directly with the human race through inspiration and revelation and that true Christian living is characterized by simplicity. At first Rock and Grüber gained many adherents, but after their deaths the community steadily declined because no one claimed the charism of inspiration. In 1817, however, the sect experienced a revival, when Christian Metz and Barbara Heineman, both claiming inspiration, became its leaders. Metz, an excellent organizer, set about establishing communities, but the Inspirationists soon ran into difficulties with the German government because of their pacifist beliefs. In 1842 they immigrated to America, establishing themselves in Erie County, N.Y., as a cooperative type community, called Ebenezer. In 1850 they adopted a pure communistic form of living that was closer to their ideal of Christian simplicity.

When more land was needed to support its 1,200 members and to maintain its "isolation from worldliness," the sect migrated west (1854), purchasing 25,000 acres near Iowa City, Iowa. Five years later the settlement, Amana, or "Believe Faithfully," was incorporated under Iowa state laws. For the next 70 years the communal economy proved successful, but in 1932 the community voted in favor of conversion to a joint stock corporation. Legally known as the Amana Society, it holds all real property; ecclesiastical matters are handled by the Amana Church Society, which is governed by elected elders. Members of the Amana community are Christians in the Evangelical tradition, but distinguished by the following: "We believe . . . in the Holy Ghost . . . who has spoken and operated through the prophets of old and who even now operates audibly through the instruments of true inspiration. . . ." Their worship is simple; the Lord's Supper, with the washing of feet, is celebrated only rarely. They do not baptize with water, since they hold that baptism is a spiritual practice. Celibacy is highly recommended, marriage is permitted, and divorce is prohibited. Older rules against participation in warfare have been modified.

Bibliography: B. M. SHAMBAUGH, "The Amana that was and the A. that is," Palimpsest 31 (1950) 215–248. B. S. YAMBURA and E. W. BODINE, A Change and a Parting (Ames, Iowa 1960). J. G. ANDELSON, "The Community of True Inspiration from Germany to the Amana Colonies," in America's Communal Utopias (Chapel Hill, NC 1997) 181–203.

[T. HORGAN/EDS.]

AMANDUS, ST.

Apostle of Belgium; b. Aquitaine, France, late 6th century; d. Feb. 6, after 676. His life is known principally from the Vita prima [Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–), 5:428–449], which Krusch assigns to the latter half of the 8th century, but which Stracke attributes to Amandus' contemporary Baudemund (d. c. 700), and de Moreau [Analecta Bollandiana 67 (1949) 449] places in the late 7th or early 8th century. Here the saint is depicted as a native of Aquitaine, son of Serenus and Amantia, who became a monk at Yeu, was tonsured at Tours, and lived as an ascetic at Bourges under Bishop Austregisil (d. c. 624). A visit to Rome c. 620 launched him on a missionary career in the northern Frankish domains where, probably before 630, he was consecrated a bishop without fixed see. There followed a second journey to Rome and an apostolate along the River Schelde and at Ghent, wherein he was sustained by King Dagobert I (d. 638). It is not certain that his censure of this monarch's morals brought about his exile or that he preached in the Danube region, in the Pyrenees, and in the country about Narbonne. During the years from 639 to 642, operating out of his monastery at Elnone (later to be known as SAINT-AMAND-LES-EAUX), he had the aid of JONAS OF BOBBIO in evangelizing along the Scarpe and Schelde Rivers as far as the North Sea [Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–), 4:62]. That Amandus was constrained to accept the bishopric of Tongeres-Maastricht seems to find support in a 649 letter of Pope MARTIN I dissuading him from resigning his see [P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christianum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al., 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956): Jaffé E, ed. P. EWALD, 590–882; 2059]. De Moreau sees evidence that Amandus founded monasteries at Elnone, Ghent, Nivelles, and Barisis-au-Bois [Monumenta Germaniae Diplomata (Berlin 1826–), 1:25], and probably also at Marchiennes, Leuze, Renaix, and Moustier-sur-Sambre. At Elnone, on April 17, 674 or 675, he drew up his Testament [Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–), 5:483–485], but the year of his death is unknown. Medieval calendars [see Analecta Bollandiana 79 (1961) 80] keep his feast on Feb. 6, the traditional date of his death, or on Oct. 26, the date of his episcopal consecration.

Feast: Feb. 6 and Oct. 26.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Poetae (Berlin 1826–), 3:561–610. É. DE MOREAU, S. Amand, le principal évangelisateur de la Belgique (Brussels 1942); Histoire de l'église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945) 1:78–92; "La Vita Amandi prima," Analecta Bollandiana 67 (1949) 447–464. D. A. STRACKE, "Over de Vita sancti Amandi," Handelingen van den Kon. geschieden oudheidkundigen Kring van Kortrijk NS 26 (1953) 99–179. E. LESNE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:942–945. W. LAMPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:416–417. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUOMET (Paris 1947–) 1:398–400.

[H. G. J. BECK]

AMANDUS OF WORMS, ST.

Bishop; fl. 7th century. A royal charter of doubtful authenticity by Dagobert I (d. 639) in 627 supposedly granted certain lands and revenues to the church of Worms, of which Amandus, an apostolic man, was said to be bishop (Monumenta Germaniae Diplomata [Berlin 1826–] 1:139). According to later reports, RUPERT OF SALZBURG brought the relics of the saint to the monastic church of SANKT PETER in Salzburg during the 8th century. Subsequently doubts arose whether these relics were those of the holy bishop of Worms or of another AMANDUS, the apostle of Belgium, and only in a 17th-century notice in the Catalogus abbatum S. Petri are the relics clearly identified as those of St. Amandus, the Bishop of Worms. The first reference to a church at Worms in honor of the saint dates from the early 11th century, and the original cult of the bishop kept his feast day October 26.

Feast: Oct. 2.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 11:910–922. G. ALLMANG, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:937–938. H. SCHMITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:417. I. POLC, Biblioteca sanctorum (Rome 1961–) 1:924–925. E. ZÖLLNER, Geschichte Österreichs (Munich 1961) 49–50.

[H. DRESSLER]

AMANTIUS OF RODEZ, ST.

Bishop of Rodez, France; fl. 5th century. Nothing is known of his life and episcopate beyond the fame of his miracles. His name seems to be first known for the See of Rodez where he was bishop before 471, when Euric (d. 484), king of the VISIGOTHS, took the city. His biography, attributed falsely to FORTUNATUS, is from at least the 7th, probably the 9th century, and is not trustworthy. A near successor in Rodez, QUINCTIAN OF CLERMONT, who attended the synod of Agde in 506, paid great honor to his relics, building a church over his tomb.

Feast: Nov. 1 and 13 (Martyrology of St. Jerome), Nov. 4 (Roman Martyrology).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1:270–287. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 1:400–401. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:351–352. A. P. FRUTAZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 1:418. GREGORY OF TOURS, Vitae patrum 4.1 in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1:674. U. ROUZIÈS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 2:949–950.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

AMAT, THADDEUS

Missioner, educator, second bishop of Monterey (California) diocese, now the Archdiocese of LOS ANGELES; b. Barcelona, Dec. 31, 1811; d. Los Angeles, May 12, 1878. Son of Pedro and Maria (Brusi) Amat, he entered the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentians) in Barcelona on Dec. 30, 1831 where he pronounced his vows on Jan. 16, 1834, and after further training in Barcelona and at Saint Lazare in Paris, was ordained on Dec. 23, 1837. Upon arriving in the United States in 1838, he did missionary work in Louisiana for three years. From 1841 to 1847 he was superior at St. Mary's Seminary in Perryville, Missouri, and St. Vincent's College, Cape Girardeau, Missouri, also serving briefly (1842–43) as pastor of Holy Trinity Church and administrator of the diocesan seminary in St. Louis. In 1848 he became superior of St. Charles Seminary, Philadelphia.

When on July 29, 1853, Bishop Joseph Alemany was transferred to the new See of San Francisco, Amat was named bishop of Monterey, where his familiarity with Spanish and American cultures was useful. He was consecrated in Rome on March 12, 1854. After stopping in Spain to enlist clergy and religious and in San Francisco (November 1855) to deliver the pallium to Archbishop Alemany, he hastened to his own diocese with the personnel he had recruited. Amat had headquarters at Santa Barbara, but soon perceived that rapidly growing Los Angeles would become the population nucleus of his area. In 1856 he sent Blasius Raho, CM, there as his vicar-general. While in Rome in 1859, he obtained authorization to entitle his diocese Monterey–Los Angeles and to reside in Los Angeles. He secured legal recognition of diocesan claims to mission properties in 1856, and later, to the PIOUS FUND of the Californias. In 1862, 1869, and 1876 he held synods to cope with the problems of the growing diocese. He attended the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) and Vatican Council I (1869–70).

There he participated actively in discussions on the constitutions “On Catholic Faith” and “On Primacy.” When a spinal injury restricted his activity, he asked for a coadjutor, and his vicar-general, Francis Mora, was appointed and consecrated on Aug. 3, 1873. Amat was buried in St. Vibiana Cathedral, whose cornerstone he had laid and whose dedication he had witnessed on April 30, 1876.

Bibliography: R. BAUDIER, The Catholic Church in Louisiana (New Orleans 1939). G. E. O'DONNELL, Saint Charles Seminary, Overbrook, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1943–53). R. BAYARD, Lone-Star Vanguard: The Catholic Reoccupation of Texas, 1838–1848 (St. Louis 1945).

[N. C. EBERHARDT]

AMATOR, SS.

Amator of Auxerre, also known as Amatre and Amador, bishop; d. May 1, 418. The details of the sixth-century biography written by an African priest named Stephen, are quite fabulous. There is, however, ample evidence of Amator's historical existence as an early bishop at Auxerre. He is said to have been married to a woman locally venerated as St. Martha prior to his ordination.

Feast: May 1.

Amator, priest and martyr; d. April 30, 855. He had gone to study at Córdoba, and with SS. Peter and Louis he was killed there by the Mohammedans, according to the Memoriale Sanctorum (Patrologia Latina 115:814) of EULOGIUS OF CÓRDOBA.

Feast: April 30.

Amator of Lucca, hermit. He is considered a saint in San Michele in Borgo San Lorenzo. Another (the same?) St. Amator is honored the same day in Quercy and in the Limousin. Probably the two are identical, but the historical existence of either is most improbable.

Feast: Aug. 20.

Bibliography: Amator of Auxerre. Acta Sanctorum May 1:51–61. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 2:430. M. BESSON, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:981–982. Amator, Martyr. Acta Sanctorum April 3:815. P. SICART, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:982. E. P. COLBERT, The Martyrs of Córdoba, 850–859 (Washington 1962). Amator of Lucca. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 4:16–25. E. ALBE, “La Vie et les miracles de s. Amator,” Analecta Bollandiana 28 (1909) 57–90; Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:920–922, 990.

[W. A. JURGENS]

AMATUS OF NUSCO, ST.

Bishop and abbot; b. Nusco, Italy, c. 1104; d. Aug. 6, 1193. The chronology of his life and many of its details are uncertain because there are two quite different versions, the earliest of which was written after 1460. The later version appears the more reliable and was favored by the BOLLANDISTS. According to this account (Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:901–928) Amatus was born at Nusco in southern Italy of noble parents. He entered the religious life and after a short period as archpriest of Nusco became a BENEDICTINE. In 1142 he founded the Abbey of Fontignano near Orvieto, and in 1154 he was made bishop of Nusco. He was a zealous and popular bishop and a generous benefactor of religious houses. He is said to have worked many miracles both before and after his death. The other version of the saint's life (Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:844–847) states that he was born in the early eleventh century, was consecrated bishop in 1048 or 1071, when the Diocese of Nusco was created, and died in 1093.

Feast: Sept. 30 (Nusco); Aug. 31 (Benedictines).

Bibliography: A. PALMIERI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:993–994. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 2 1:420. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum, (Metten 1933–38) 2:642, 644. G. TAGLIALATELA, Orazione panegirica di s. Amato, primo vescovo e patrono di Nusco (Naples 1890). G. PASSARO, Un testamento e una compravendita: analisi paleografica comparata (Naples 1973). Enciclopedia ecclesiastica, ed. A. BERNAREGGI (Milan 1942–) 1:130.

[J. L. GRASSI]

AMATUS OF REMIREMONT, ST.

Abbot; b. Diocese of Grenoble, France, c. 565–570; d. Abbey of Remiremont, France, c. 628. About 581, while still very young, Amatus (variants: Amat, Aimé, Amé, Amado) entered the monastery at Agaunum, now known as the Abbey of Saint-Maurice, and he eventually became a hermit there. In 614 he went to the monastery of Luxeuil with its abbot, EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL, but he left c. 620 with his friend and convert Romaric (d. 653) to found a monastery at Castrum Habendi that soon became known as the Abbey of Romarici Mons, or Remiremont. This foundation became one of the most fruitful of the foundations from Luxeuil, and Romaric succeeded Amatus as abbot. In the dispute between the monk Agrestius and the followers of St. COLUMBAN and Abbot Eustace of Luxeuil, the two founders sided with Agrestius, but after a series of misfortunes and the downfall of Agrestius, they made peace with their former superior.

Amatus died shortly afterward in semi-retirement at Remiremont. He is sometimes mistakenly identified with another Amatus, Bishop of Sion, who died near the close of the century.

Feast: Sept. 13.

Bibliography: Vita Sancti Amati, J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 2:120–127. E. EWIG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:420–421. A. M. BURG, ibid. 9:25–26. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 1:111. J. MABILLON, Lettre . . . touchant le premier institut de l'abbaye de Remiremont (Paris 1687). M. A. GUINOT, Étude historique sur l'abbaye de Remiremont (Paris 1859) 377–388. M. BESSON, Monasterium Acaunense (Fribourg 1913) 173–184. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:49–50. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:358. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:549–550.

[G. E. CONWAY]

AMBARACH, PETER (MUBARACH, BENEDICTUS)

Seventeenth century Maronite Jesuit, Oriental scholar; b. Gusta, Lebanon, June 1663; d. Rome, Aug. 25, 1742. Ambarach, known in Italy as Pietro Benedetti, studied at the Maronite College in Rome (1672–85), and was ordained in Lebanon by the Maronite Patriarch Stephen al-Duwaihi (Aldoensis) who sent him back to Rome in 1691 to defend the validity of Syriac ordinations against the charges of Jean MORIN. Cosimo III, Grand Duke of Tuscany, named him director of the Oriental Press at Florence, and he accepted the chair of Sacred Scripture at Pisa. He entered the Jesuit novitiate in Rome on Oct. 30, 1707, and became a member of Pope Clement XI's commission for the critical edition of the Greek Bible. At the request of Cardinal Querini he started a Latin translation of the work of St. EPHREM, which he left unfinished. Among his publications are a Latin translation of Stephen al-Duwaihi's Defense of Syriac Ordinations and the Maronite Liturgy; a Vita Arabica S. Alexii [Acta Sanctorum, July 4 (1725) 266–270]; a partial edition of the Menologium of the Emperor BASIL II in Greek and Latin (completed by Clement XI and published, Urbino 1727); a history of the persecutions under the Persian King Sapor and his successors, written with the aid of C. Maiella; a revision of the Works of St. Ephraem in Greek and Syriac (3 v. 1737–43; see ASSEMANI, JOSEPH SIMON); and some verse and letters, including an exchange with Apollonio Bassetti.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 1:1295–98. E. M. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclési- tiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:1014–15. A. FABRONI, Vitae Italorum doctrina excellentium, 18 v. (Pisa 1778–99) 11:174–185.

[P. JOANNOU]

AMBIGUITY

An obscurity of meaning that leaves a statement open to contrary interpretations, often as a result of faulty grammar or insufficient context (see FALLACY). The phrase “systematic ambiguity” has been used by Bertrand RUSSELL to characterize the function of certain key words in formal logic. According to Russell, the word “true,” for example, applies to statements belonging to a number of logically distinct types. If we apply it to a sentence that combines statements of different types, contradiction may result. By avoiding such combinations the logician can guard against this (see ANTINOMY). Some scholastic philosophers speak of the systematic ambiguity of terms used in metaphysics. Such everyday words as “being” and “good” can be applied to the divine order, but at the risk of hidden equivocation. To eliminate this risk, the metaphysician takes note of whatever in the term’s original signification carries over into its other uses (see ANALOGY).

[H. A. NIELSEN]

AMBITION

Ambition has two extreme senses, one good, the other bad, with interesting mixtures of legitimate thrustfulness and self-regarding pride falling between the two. The term comes from Latin ambitio (ambire, ambitus), a going about seeking votes for an office; and as representing a desire for success according to the order of right reason, it is laudable and indeed obligatory, for such a desire is inseparable from a brave tackling of difficulties. Thus a man should resolutely prosecute the causes that will give him a full and rounded life, promote the standing of his family, enlarge and dignify the work on which he has set his heart, redound to the credit and glory of his country, and show forth the beauty of the Church. Above all, in a Christian sense, he will not be half-hearted in his response to the call to holiness and the apostolate: “Let your light shine before men” (Mt 5.16).

So considered, ambition is characteristic of the great-hearted man of the Nichomachean Ethics, of the MAGNANIMITY that is the first potential part of the cardinal virtue of FORTITUDE as described in the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas Aquinas (ST 2a2ae, 129), or the large-mindedness and grandeur praised by Massillon and the court preachers in the high century of Louis Quatorze. Found in people of spirit who seek nothing but the best, its character, according to Aristotle, the Stoics, and the medieval theologians, appears both from its positive notes and the contrary vices it disdains. It is the love of honor as this implies the resplendence of virtue rather than its fame. Indeed on occasion magnanimity will fight with the enterprise and doggedness of fortitude, and the authors note its special connection with fiducia in the sense of the keeping of one’s word whatever befalls, and with securitas, the steady confidence that is never downhearted. Yet always it keeps a sense of proportion and acts between the vices of excess and defect. On the one hand it avoids the pushfulness (praesumptio) of acting for what is out of the question or not deserved, and the vain-gloriousness (inanis gloria) that sets too great a store on human approbation. On the other hand it masters the faint-heartedness (pusillanimitas) that causes one to fail to attempt to do what he can. “The kingdom of heaven suffers violence” (Mt 11.12). Yet as bound up with men’s contending emotions, the passions of the irascible appetite, magnanimity is turned into sin. So the poet sees ambition as the last infirmity of a noble mind, and St. Thomas treats ambitio as a disorder and vice.

Charity is not ambitious; it does not seek its own (I Cor 13.5). This indeed is the keynote of the sin, a self-seeking that takes honor out of its context and isolates it as a good for oneself, wanting praise for an excellence that is not possessed, or hugging the praise to oneself as if one’s efforts deserved it without the help of God, or as if it could be hoarded and not turned to the benefit of others. It is this inordinateness that makes it a moral failure or sin, and it is this extravagance in honor-seeking that makes it a sin against magnanimity.

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 131. R. A. GAUTHIER, Magnanimité: L’Idéal de la grandeur dans la philosophie païenne et la théologie chrétienne (Paris 1951); “Fortitude,” The Virtues and States of Life, ed. A. M. HENRY, tr. R. J. OLSEN and G. T. LENNON (Theology Library 4; Chicago 1957) 487–531. A. BEUGNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 1:940–942. R. BROUILLARD, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 1:407–409.

[T. GILBY]

AMBO

The raised platform for reading and preaching, also referred to as a pulpit. The term ambo (ἄμβων) is derived probably from ἀναβαίνειν (to mount). The elevated reading platform was designated by other terms as well: βῆμα, πύργος, pulpitum, suggestus, auditorium, tribunal, exedra, dicterium and in late Latin usage, lectricium,

Outdoor ambo carved by Donatello, 15th century, on the cathedral at Prato, Italy. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Ambo on the Gospel side, 9th century, basilica of S. Clemente, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

legitorium, analogium. Since the scriptural service had its origin in the synagogue the ambo had possible precedent in synagogue service where a platform was sometimes provided for the reading of Sacred Scriptures. Its early use in the Christian Church in Africa is attested by both Augustine and Cyprian.

Positions and Development. In the Syrian Church the ambo was usually combined with the clergy's bench in the nave of the church. In the Greek Church it often assumed a prominent position in the nave, outside the sanctuary, and had stairways for ascent and descent. In Rome, the ambo appeared rather late. None of the Fathers make reference to ambo at Rome prior to the 7th century. At this time numerous Byzantine foundations in Rome may have brought the ambo into use. Even then there was as a rule but a single ambo, which served for all lessons. It was used for reading, chanting the intervening Psalms, and preaching. The Service of the Word took place at the same ambo. An example of such an ambo (6th century) is the carved marble one at Castel Sant'Elia, near Nepi. There are eight steps for ascent to the upper tier of a two-tiered balustrade. The use of separate ambos for Epistle and Gospel is medieval in origin and based on an allegorical interpretation introduced by Amalarius of Metz (d. c. 850). During the time when the division of the readings were rendered on the right and on the left, and two ambos were constructed, an ornamental one on the Gospel side, a more modest structure on the Epistle side.

The separation of places for proclaiming the readings from the places for preaching was a consequence of the medieval introduction of chancel screens and the relegation of the liturgical celebration to the clergy alone. When only priests do the reading the place for reading Scripture is reduced to a simple lectern or, in private Masses, to a mere bookstand on the altar, while the place for the preaching becomes more ornate. In the 11th century the ambo was made a part of the rood screen separating the choir from the nave. Figures of the Savior and His Apostles, representing the Last Judgment and the Passion, frequently ornamented the screen on the side toward the nave. Such ambos were built in Italy as early as the 13th century. The ambo at Pisa, completed by Nicola Pisano in 1260 is an unattached structure resting on seven columns. It opened the way to a new development in Italian sculpture. The first examples of Renaissance ambos are those of Donatello in the 15th century. For funeral orations in the churchyard, for preaching to pilgrimage groups, or for the exhibition of relics, ambos were often built outside of the churches, as at the cathedral of Prato. Ambos of the baroque period were well toward the center of the nave; the base, stairway, and sounding board were covered with luxurious and ornate carving.

The Ambo Today. The renewed liturgy welcomes the reunion of the place of preaching and the place of reading since these elements clearly constitute the Service of the Word. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican Council II instructs: "It is fitting that there be an ambo for the proclamation of the sacred readings, so arranged that the ministers can be easily seen and heard by the faithful." The General Instruction to the Roman Missal has directed that the Liturgy of the Word is normally proclaimed from the ambo, while at the same time preserving the ancient practice of proclaiming the Gospel and homily from the presider's chair. The ambo must be dignified, functional, and properly related to altar, chair, and assembly.

Bibliography: A. DAMBLON, Zwischen Kathedra und Ambo: Zum Predigtverständnis des II Vatikanums—aufgezeigt an den liturgischen Predigtorten (Dusseldorf 1988). T. MANNOORAMPARAMPIL, "Bema in the East Syrian Church," Christian Orient 19 (1998) 84–99. E. RENHART, Das syrische Bema: Liturgisch-archäologische Untersuchungen (Graz, 1995). R. TAFT, "On the Use of the bema in the East—Syrian Liturgy," Eastern Churches Review 3 (Spring 1970) 30–39. T. MATHEWS, "Early Christian Chancel Arrangement in Rome," Revista de archeologia cristiana 38 (1962) 73–95. Vatican Council II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, and Instruction of Oct. 16, 1964. J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 1:391–461.

[W. M. MARSHALL/EDS.]

AMBROSE, ST.

Bishop of Milan, Father, and Doctor of the Church; b. Trèves (Trier, Germany), c. A.D. 339; d. Milan, Italy, April 4, 397. His family, perhaps in part ultimately of Greek origin, belonged to the high Roman aristocracy. At the time of his birth his father was praetorian prefect of the Gauls, one of the chief civil offices in the Roman Empire. Following Ambrose's father's death, his brother St. Satyrus, his sister St. Marcellina, and he were brought to Rome, where the brothers received an excellent education in the liberal arts and in law. Their education both in the family household and at school included a thorough training in Greek, which was to stand Ambrose in good stead later. He must have received a solid training in Christian doctrine also in a household in which Christian conduct and piety were emphasized. His sister Marcellina took the veil from Pope Liberius in 353. About 365 Ambrose and Satyrus entered the civil service as advocates, and c. 370 both were promoted to provincial governorships, Ambrose being made consularis, or governor, of Liguria and Aemilia with his residence at Milan, the imperial capital of the Roman Empire. He soon acquired a reputation for uprightedness in administration and for blameless character. On the death of the Arian Bishop Auxentius, he had to quell the violence that arose regarding the choice of a successor among Catholics and Arians, and then, much against his will, he was unanimously chosen as bishop by both sides. Although brought up in a Christian family, he was still a catechumen. Within a few days after his Baptism he was ordained to the priesthood and consecrated as bishop of Milan (Dec. 7, 374).

Episcopate. He immediately distributed his share of the family wealth to the poor and set an example of strict asceticism in the episcopal household, which was organized on a kind of semimonastic basis. In the administration of his charities he received the enthusiastic and self-sacrificing support of his brother Satyrus (d. 378). Under the tutelage of the learned priest St. Simplicianus, who later succeeded him in the See of Milan, he applied himself to the systematic study of theology. In exegesis he was profoundly influenced by the allegorical method of interpretation as developed by Philo and Origen. His chief guides in theology were St. Athanasius, Didymus the Blind, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Basil, and Hippolytus. The investigations of P. Courcelle have shown, too, that he was well acquainted with Plotinus and made fruitful use of Neoplatonic ideas in his development of Christian thought.

However, Ambrose remained typically Roman in thought and language. In his exegesis and in his theological expositions, as well as in the homilies that underlie most of his works, and even in his letters, he exhibits a marked predilection for moral teaching and exhortation. All his writings were composed at short notice, as the occasion demanded, in the course of an extraordinarily busy and difficult episcopate. From the days of his election, he was repeatedly involved in problems of the gravest import for the Church and for the State, and he soon came to be recognized throughout the Western Empire as the great champion of orthodoxy and of the rights of the Church.

St. Ambrose barring Theodosius from the cathedral at Milan, painting on panel by Ambrogio Borgognone (c. 1450 or 1460 to 1523).

Altar of Victory. On his accession, the young Emperor GRATIAN (375–383) refused to accept the pagan title pontifex maximus; and some years later (381), in his second edict against paganism, he ordered the removal of the altar and statue of Victory from the Senate house in Rome. The powerful pagan party sent a delegation headed by SYMMACHUS to Milan to protest; but, under the influence of Ambrose, it was refused an audience at court. In the summer of 384, after the murder of Gratian (383), a new delegation under the leadership of Symmachus, then Praetorian Prefect, presented an eloquently written Relatio, or Memorial, to the imperial consistory and the boy-emperor VALENTINIAN (383–392), again pleading for the restoration of the altar and statue. Ambrose hastily prepared a strong refutation of the petition, and the request for restoration was denied. Both the Memorial of Symmachus and the reply of Ambrose (Epist. 18) are extant—at least in the revised form that was eventually given them.

Conflict with the Arian Empress Justina. Despite the aid rendered to the position of Valentinian by Ambrose's mission to the usurper Maximus at Treves in 383, Valentinian's mother, the Empress Justina, fearing the growing ascendancy of the bishop over her son, and as a staunch Arian, organized a coalition against Ambrose. She raised an issue by demanding that one basilica in Milan, namely, the Basilica Portiana outside the walls, be given to the Arians. Ambrose was summoned to the imperial palace near the beginning of Lent in 385, but refused to give up the basilica. The incident created a riot in the city, and Ambrose himself had to be asked to calm his people. A few weeks later, just before Easter, Justina boldly demanded that the new basilica within the walls, Ambrose's own cathedral church, be turned over to the Arians, but he refused with the curt statement that "a bishop cannot give up the temple of God" (Epist. 20.1). Beginning on Palm Sunday there was a series of clashes between the imperial troops and Ambrose's congregations at the new and old basilicas, and at the Portiana, accompanied by destruction of property. The bishop, however, stood his ground, and on Holy Thursday news was brought to him at the Portiana that the court had abandoned its attempt to seize any of his churches at that time.

The struggle was not over. With the help of the Arian Bishop Mercurinus Auxentius, Justina had an imperial edict passed against the Catholics in January 386, and Ambrose was summoned to appear before the emperor and his council to dispute the points at issue with Auxentius. He refused, explaining his position at length, and finally, to avoid arrest, remained within the precincts of the new basilica. For several days and nights the church was surrounded by imperial troops, but they did not force an entrance. To relieve tension and to encourage his flock, Ambrose introduced the antiphonal singing of Psalms and of hymns of his own composition. It was on this occasion also that he delivered his Sermon against Auxentius, in which, in terse juridical style, he enunciated the epoch-making principle in the relations of Church and State: imperator enim intra ecclesiam, non supra ecclesiam est (par. 3). The court was forced to capitulate; the anti-Catholic edict was rescinded, and no further action was taken against Ambrose. After the deaths of Maximus

(388) and Justina, the young Emperor Valentinian again turned to Ambrose for counsel, and Ambrose treated him with fatherly affection until Valentinian's murder in 392.

Ambrose and the Emperor Theodosius (379–395).

Only two incidents marred temporarily the cordial relations of Ambrose and Theodosius, the greatest personalities of their age in Church and State, namely, the Callinicum affair and the massacre of Thessalonica. At Callinicum on the Euphrates the Christian congregation with the connivance of their bishop had burned a Jewish synagogue (late in 388), and Theodosius ordered that the bishop restore the synagogue at his own expense. Ambrose opposed this order in vehement terms on the ground that Christians, in rebuilding a synagogue, would be committing an act of apostasy, and the emperor reluctantly withdrew his order. In this case, however, excessive zeal led Ambrose to neglect the demands of strict justice, for he suggested no possible alternatives for redressing the wrong done.

In 390 several imperial officers were killed in a riot at Thessalonica, and Theodosius, influenced primarily by his Master of the Offices, Rufinus, ordered a savage reprisal that led to the massacre of 7,000 defenseless persons in the circus of the Macedonian city. Ambrose left Milan at the news, but in a letter to the emperor he reproached him for his crime and told him that, under threat of excommunication, he must do public penance. Theodosius complied some months later, even if some of the dramatic details furnished by the historian THEODORET are to be discounted. A few years later (in 392 and 395) Ambrose delivered his great funeral orations on Valentinian II and Theodosius, which contain so much precious information on his part in the political affairs of his time.

Ambrose as Pastor. Despite his heavy involvement in political affairs of concern to the Church, Ambrose was a zealous defender of orthodoxy and, above all, a zealous pastor of souls. In his homilies he attacked severely all the social abuses of his age. With the courage and eloquence of a Hebrew Prophet, he denounced especially evil conduct in the upper classes and its deplorable results. But he also expounded theological doctrine very effectively in his homilies. Augustine came to listen to his eloquence, but was led to a new understanding of the Scriptures and of Christian faith by the bishop's explanations (Confessions 6.1.1–6.4.6). Augustine was baptized by Ambrose at Easter 386. Ambrose had distributed his own wealth to help the poor and urged others to do the same. Following the battle of Hadrianople in 378, and the subsequent Gothic invasion, he did not scruple to sell the sacred Church vessels to redeem captives. In his advocacy of Christian ideals, he was one of the most zealous and influential promoters of virginity in his age. He gave a new impetus to the cult of the martyrs with the discovery of two skeletons, which were thought to be those of Gervase and Protase, in the course of the excavations for his own great basilica in 386.

Writings. The volume of his extant works is noteworthy when one considers that they were all written in the midst of an extraordinarily demanding episcopate. They often reveal, on the dogmatic and scriptural side, especially, a heavy dependence on Greek works, but the borrowing is freely acknowledged. Ambrose was primarily concerned not with originality but with meeting the practical needs of dogmatic and moral instruction and exhortation. For the most part his treatises were assembled from homilies, and the revision was hastily done. However, he was splendidly trained in Latin literature, and many passages in his works exhibit Christian Latin literary style at its best. Like Leo the Great, he had a happy facility for coining clear and pithy phrases and definitions.

Exegetical Works. All his Old Testament exegesis is based essentially on Philo and Origen. Even the most literal of scriptural texts is given an allegorical or typological meaning. In view of the homiletic origin of his exegetical works, moral application is invariably a primary concern. His major contributions are: Exameron (six bks.), based on the corresponding work of St. Basil; Expositio evangelii secundum Lucam (ten bks., of which one and two are taken over directly from Origen); and Expositio in Psalmum 118. His shorter works include De Cain et Abel, De Noe, De Abraham (two bks.), De Isaac et anima, De bono mortis, De Iacob et vita beata (two bks.), De Ioseph, De patriarchis, De fuga saeculi, De Helia et ieiunio, De Nabuthae, De Tobia, De interpellatione Iob et David, Apologia prophetae David, and Explanatio super Psalmos 12.

Moral-Ascetical Works. The De officiis (three bks.), written for the clergy of Milan, is the most important. As its title indicates, it is modeled on the corresponding predominantly Stoic treatise of Cicero. However, resemblance is more external than real. The work is thoroughly Christian and, as is usual in Ambrose, relies heavily on Scripture for examples and authority. The other writings in this category are: De virginibus ad Marcellinam sororem (three bks.), De viduis, De virginitate, De institutione virginis, and Exhortatio virginitatis. In these treatises Ambrose reveals greater independence in developing his arguments in favor of the life of virginity. Through his emphasis on the Blessed Virgin as the ideal and patron of virginity, he is one of the chief founders of devotion to Mary in this respect. The De lapsu virginis consecratae is definitely recognized as pseudo-Ambrosian.

Dogmatic Works. Three of these are against Arianism: De fide ad Gratianum (five bks.), on the divinity of the Son; De Spiritu Sancto (three bks.), based essentially on Didymus the Blind, St. Athanasius, and St. Basil; and De incarnationis dominicae sacramento. Three others deal primarily with the exposition of the Sacraments and of the faith to catechumens and are of great importance for the history of the liturgy: De sacramentis (six bks.), De mysteriis, and Explanatio symboli. The last two are now definitely assigned to Ambrose. Finally, he composed the De paenitentia to refute Novatianism.

Orations and Letters. The two orations De excessu fratris (Satyri), the De obitu Valentiniani, and De obitu Theodosii are masterpieces of their genre. The invective Sermo contra Auxentium de basilicis tradendis is to be regarded also as a formal oration. Only 91 of Ambrose's Epistulae are extant. Apart from a few, private letters, they are official or semiofficial in character, or are little exegetical or moral treatises in epistolary form.

Hymns and Other Works. Of the numerous hymns ascribed to Ambrose, the Deus Creator omnium, Aeterne rerum conditor, Iam surgit hora tertia, and Intende, qui regis Israel are certainly genuine. By these compositions he has justly earned the title "father of liturgical hymnody" in the West. He seems also to have given definitive form to the Exsultet. Several inscriptions and 21 Tituli in verse also have good claims to Ambrosian authorship. The Hegesippus sive de bello Iudaico (five bks.), a free translation and adaptation of the De bello Iudaico of Flavius Josephus, may be regarded with some probability as being a work from the early life of Ambrose.

Appreciation. Ambrose exhibited little originality in the field of dogma or exegesis, but he was a courageous and effective defender of orthodoxy, a great moral teacher, and an exemplary pastor of souls. Above all, he was the first of the Fathers and Doctors of the Church to deal formally with the relations of Church and State. He enunciated the principle that the Church is supreme in its own domain and is the guardian of morality. Even the emperors, despite their lofty dignity and absolutism, are subject to the moral laws as defined and put into practice by the Church. The penance of Theodosius and the principle underlying and demanding it were phenomena found in the sacred history of Israel. However, they were entirely new in the Greco-Roman world, and they were to be of the greatest significance for the future.

Feast: Dec. 7.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Strasbourg 1961) Nos. 122–183. Hymnes, tr. and ed. J. FONTAINE and J.-L. CHARLET (Paris 1992). J. HUHN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:427–430, with bibliog. A. LARGENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:943–951, and A. MICHEL, ibid. Tables générales 1:111–115, with bibliog. H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 1:307–308. A. GASTOUÉ and P. DE LABRIOLLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:1091–1108. W. WILBRAND, Reallexicon für Antike und Christentum 1:365–373. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 443–457, with an excellent summary of Ambrose's teachings and copious bibliog. F. CAYRÉ, Manual of Patrology and History of Theology, tr. H. HOWITT, v.1 (Paris 1936) 520–547. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der alt Kirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913–32) 3:498–547. J. R. PALANQUE, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire romain (Paris 1933), with bibliog. F. H. DUDDEN, The Life and Times of St. Ambrose, 2 v. (Oxford 1935). Y.-M. DUVAL, L'extirpation de l'Arianisme en Italie du Nord et en Occident (Brookfield 1998). G. GOTTLIEB, Ambrosius von Mailand und Kaiser Gratian (Göttingen 1973). A. PAREDI, St. Ambrose, tr. J. COSTELLO (Notre Dame, Ind. 1963). C. MARINO, Chiesa e stato nella dottrina di S. Ambrogio (Rome 1963). D. MATA-COTTA, Simmaco: l'antagonista di Sant'Ambrogio (Florence 1992). N. B. MCLYNN, Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital (Berkeley 1994). J. MOORHEAD, Ambrose: Church and Society in the Late Roman World (New York 1999). C. PASINI, Ambrogio di Milano: azione e pensiero di un vescovo (Milan 1996). B. RAMSEY, Ambrose (London 1997). H. M. RILEY, Christian Initiation: A Comparative Study of the Interpretation of the Baptismal Liturgy (Washington 1974). J. HUHN, Das Geheimnis der Jungfrau-Mutter Maria nach Ambrosius (Würzburg 1954). V. R. VASEY, The Social Ideas in the Works of St. Ambrose (Rome 1982). P. COURCELLE, Recherches sur les "Confessions" de Saint Augustin (Paris 1950), esp. 91–174 and 211–221. On the language and style of St. Ambrose, see esp. Patristic Studies (Catholic University of America) v. 10, 12, 15, 19, 20, 27, 29, 30, 35, 40, 43, 49, 56, and 58, and E. LUCCHESI, L'usage de Philon dans l'oeuvre exégétique de Saint Ambroise (Leiden 1977). A. FRANZ, Tageslauf und Heilsgeschichte: Untersuchungen zum literarischen Text und liturgischen Kontext der Tagzeitenhymnen des Ambrosius von Mailand (St. Ottilien, Germany 1994). C. MARKSCHIES, Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie: kirchen- und theologiegeschichtliche Studien zu Antiarrianismus und Neunizänismus bei Ambrosius und im lateinischen Westen (Tübingen 1995). C. MOHRMANN, "Langue et style de la poésie chrétienne," Études sur le latin des chrétiens v.1 (Rome 1961) 151–168, esp. 165–168. For new Eng. tr. see The Fathers of the Church, ed. R. J. DEFERRARI et al. (Washington 1961) v.22, 26, 42, and 44. On the Vita S. Ambrosii, written at the suggestion of St. Augustine by Ambrose's former secretary, Paulinus of Milan, in 422, see A. STUIBER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:208, with bibliog. H. AUF DER MAUR, Die Psalmenverständnis des Ambrosius von Mailand (Leiden 1977).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

AMBROSE OF CAHORS, ST.

Bishop?; d. near Bourges, France, c. 770. In the account of his life that has come down to us it is impossible to sort out any certain historical information. According to a doubtful tradition he held his episcopal office at Cahors under PEPIN III the Short. Slandered and persecuted despite his works of charity, he gave up his see and lived for three years in a cave near the Lot River. While returning from a pilgrimage to Rome, he died at Ernotrum (now Saint-Ambroise-sur-Arnon). His cultus, dating from the tenth century, is perhaps the best evidence for his saintly career.

Feast: Oct. 16.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 7.2:1031–50. Bibliotheca hagiografica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:369–374. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 2:13. E. ALBE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:1110–11. C. LEFEBVRE, Bibliotheca sanctorum 1:943. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:484–485.

[J. E. LYNCH]

AMBROSE TRAVERSARI, BL.

CAMALDOLESE monk and early Christian humanist; b. Portico, southwest of Ravenna, Sept. 16, 1386; d. Fontebuono, Nov. 17, 1439. He entered the Camaldolese cenobitic monastery, St. Mary of the Angels, at Florence, Oct. 8, 1400, and was professed Nov. 6, 1401. Soon Florentine humanists such as Niccoli, Strozzi, and Cosimo de Medici visited his cell to discuss classical and patristic literature, philosophy, and theology. Ambrose gathered and emended ancient texts and translated many works of the Greek Fathers. He became subprior in January 1431, and prior general of his order on Oct. 26, 1431, because of his interest in reform. The Hodoeporicon is a diary of the resulting visitations from December 1431 to 1433. He represented Pope EUGENE IV at the Council of BASEL, and before Emperor SIGISMUND. At Ferrara and Florence in 1438 he effectively employed his knowledge of Greek in negotiating with Byzantine representatives leading to reunion of the Roman and Orthodox Churches.

Feast: Nov. 20.

Bibliography: Hodoeporicon, ed. V. TAMBURINI (Florence 1985). Ambrogio Traversari: un monaco e un monastero nell'umanesimo fiorentino, ed. S. FRIGERIO (Camaldoli 1988). A. DINI-TRAVERSARI, Ambrogio Traversari e i suoi tempi (Florence 1912). G. MERCATI, Ultimi contributi alla storia degli umanisti, 2 v. (Studi e Testi 90, 91; 1939) v.1. C. L. STINGER, Humanism and the Church Fathers: Ambrogio Traversari (1386–1439) and Christian Antiquity in the Italian Renaissance (Albany, N.Y. 1977). J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:431.

[N. G. WOLF]

AMBROSIAN CHANT

In addition to textual and structural differences from the Roman rite, the Milanese Church also developed a special repertory of chants, commonly called Ambrosian chant.

Except for some fragments in chironomic notation, the first written examples of this chant came from the 12th century, the chief witnesses being British Museum Add. 34209, for the winter season (published in facsimile and transcription Paléographie musicale v. 5, 6) and Bedero Val Travaglia, S. Vittore, for the summer season. Numerous later MSS exist and attest to a highly stable musical tradition. Some literary testimony and the existence of numerous manuals prior to the notated sources show that much of the 12th-century repertory must go back to the Carolingian period, if not earlier.

Many scholars of the 19th century too easily assumed that Gregorian chant and Ambrosian chant came from a common stem, since lost, while others, such as Dom Germain Morin, postulated the priority of the Ambrosian chant, from which the Gregorian evolved. More recent trends among scholars tend to differentiate between borrowed chants inserted much later into the Ambrosian chant from the Gregorian and a primitive Ambrosian nucleus that must be pre-Carolingian. This latter shows a kind of music-making similar to Gregorian chant but less rigid, less polished, and less systematic. That this nucleus goes back to the time of St. Ambrose cannot possibly be proved. It is clear, however, that by the Carolingian period the Ambrosian musical practice differed from the Gregorian and that further developments of it were made mostly by borrowings from the Gregorian and adaptations of older chants. The 12th-century MSS thus show a complete but heterogeneous repertory. The fact that the Milanese never developed a musical theory to explain their chants also helps to account for its diversified nature.

Among the chants of the Mass the Ingressa (i.e., Introit) and Offertorium show the most borrowings from Gregorian chant and were thus the last to be stabilized. No verses were found with the Ingressa, showing that it did not function as a processional chant. Several borrowings from post-Carolingian Byzantine chants are also found. The Psalmellus (i.e., Gradual) is distinctly Ambrosian, highly ornate and soloistic in nature. The same can be said of the Ambrosian ALLELUIA. The chants sung after the Gospel, during the breaking of the bread (Confractorium), and after Communion (Transitorium) are related to Office chants and are simpler. They too, however, lack any traces of psalmody. Only the Gloria (with the addition of three Kyries), the Creed, and the Sanctus form the Ambrosian ordinary and a simple and solemn version of each of these was sufficient.

Antiphons, responsories, and hymns form the largest categories of musical compositions in the Office. Because of the late date of the Ambrosian MSS with musical notation, it is difficult to establish the age of the melodies of the Ambrosian hymns. That the melodies of the hymns composed by St. Ambrose also came from the 4th century is possible but cannot be proved. The melodies of the hymns for the feasts of saints have similar features that seem more primitive. Later hymns are certainly adaptations of these earlier melodies. The 40 liturgical hymns are thus adapted to about 28 different melodies. Another feature pointing to the antiquity of these melodies is their avoidance of the tritus modes.

The antiphons of the Office are divided into the following categories: Psalter antiphons used for the recitation of the Psalms, processional antiphons (psallenda and psallentium), antiphonae ad crucem, and antiphonae in choro. The Psalter antiphons are the most numerous, about 775 in all, and are generally simple. Many of them can be classified according to melodic types or formulas, even more rigorous in their structure than the Gregorian types. The psalmody that accompanies these antiphons is also of an unornate kind and shows little consistency in the MS tradition. Since no modal theory was worked out by the Ambrosian cantors, no set system of psalmody was developed, the only criterion being that a smooth connection between the end of the Psalm and the repetition of the antiphon was desired. No mediant cadence is found in the psalmody.

The processional antiphons are more varied in style but frequently use psalter antiphons to augment their number. Their use is more frequent in the Ambrosian rite than in the Roman. The famous procession with the cross gave birth to the elaborate antiphonae ad crucem with their more elaborate psalmody. They seem more closely connected with Eastern than Western practice. The antiphonae in choro show some remnants of psalmody but are peculiarly Ambrosian in style and origin.

The responsories are frequent in the Ambrosian rite, not only at Matins but at the other hours as well. On larger feasts they tend to be extremely ornate in character. A series of long melismas with names to identify them is sung with the responsories on the greater feasts. They tend to be soloistic in nature and contrast with the simplicity of the antiphons.

In sum, Ambrosian chant is less rigid in its modal implications and more heterogeneous than Gregorian chant. On the other hand, its primitive core may thus be preserved in a manner that represents an earlier period than the Gregorian. The late date of its musical MSS is unfortunate, but the uniformity of the tradition and the tenacious attempts to maintain it attest to an older practice.

Bibliography: P. BORELLA, "Influssi carolingi e monastici sul messale ambrosiano," Miscellanea liturgica in honorem L. Cunibert, 2 v. (Rome 1948–49) 1:73–115. P. CAGIN, "Antiphonaire ambrosien," Paléographie musicale 5 (1896). A. GATARD, “Ambrosien (chant),” Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 1:1353–73. B. STÄBLEIN, “Ambrosianisch-Gregorianisch,” Compte rendu de l’International Musicological Society, 4th, 1949 (Basel 1951) 185–89. G. SUÑOL, “La restaurazione ambrosiana,” Ambrosius 14 (1938) 145–50, 174–77, 196–200, 296–304; 15 (1939) 113–16. Antiphonale missarum juxta ritum sanctae ecclesiae mediolanensis, ed. G. N. SUÑOL (Rome 1935); Liber vespertialis juxta ritum sanctae ecclesiae mediolanensis (Rome 1939). M. HUGLO, Fonti e paleografia del canto ambrosiano (Milan 1956). R. JESSON, W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958) 465–83. E. CATTANEO, Note storiche sul canto ambrosiano (Milan 1950). T. BAILEY and P. MERKLEY, The Antiphons of the Ambrosian Office (Ottawa 1989). A. PAREDI, Storia del rito ambrosiano (Milan 1990). T. BAILEY, Antiphon and Psalm in the Ambrosian Office (Ottawa 1994). T. BAILEY, “Ambrosian Double Antiphons,” Laborare fratres in unum: Festschrift Láászló Dobosz zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. J. SZENDREI and D. HILEY (Hildesheim 1995) 11–24. T. BAILEY, “Antiphon Classification and the Development of the Ambrosian Sanctoale,” The Divine Office in the Latin Middle Ages: Methodology and Source Studies, Regional Developments, Hagiography, ed. M. FASSLER and R. A. BALTZER (New York 2000). V. A. LENTI, “The Revised Ambrosian Divine Office,” Studia Liturgica 29 (1999) 116–26. V. A. LENTI, “Liturgical Reform and the Ambrosian and Mozarabic Rites,” Worship 68 (1994) 417–26. N. A. MÁRQUEZ, “Music at the Crossroads of Empire: Ambrose and Milanese Chant,” Pastoral Music 25:4 (April-May 2001) 34–37.

[R. G. WEAKLAND]

AMBROSIAN RITE

The Ambrosian Rite is one of three surviving distinct liturgical rites in regular use in the Latin Church, the other two being the Mozarabic Rite and the Roman Rite. Today, it is the principal liturgical rite of the Archdiocese of Milan, as well as the neighboring Italian dioceses of Bergamo and Novara, and the Swiss diocese of Lugano.

HISTORY

The beginnings of the Ambrosian Rite have been much discussed. Many questions that have arisen have not always received conclusive answers. What was St. Ambrose’s role in the history of the rite? Is the rite of Greek inspiration, or is it fundamentally of Western character?

Witness of St. Ambrose. The Ambrosian Rite has been called Ambrosian not because St. Ambrose originated it, but because he was the most illustrious of the bishops of Milan and thus personifies the traditions of his see. The attribution to him of the rite’s beginnings is found for the first time in an eighth-century Cursus Scottorum (contained in Ordo Rom. 19; M. Andrieu, Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge, 5 v. [Louvain 1931–61] 3:225) and even more clearly in WALAFRID Strabo (d. 849) “Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, arranged the order of Mass and other services for his church and for other churches in Liguria; the Milanese church maintains it to this day” (De rebus eccl. 22; Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 114:944).

In about 396, Ambrose wrote that Dionysius, his predecessor who was sent into exile in 355, had asked God to let him die far from Milan so that he would not have to see the Christian traditions of his clergy and people overturned and trampled upon by the infidels (Epist. 63.70; Patrologia Latina, 16:1260). Ambrose is here referring to the government of the Church of Milan by the Arian Auxentius (d. 374), who had come from the East.

Elsewhere Ambrose affirmed that his Church followed the leadership of Rome in all things: “cuius (id est ecclesiae Romanae) typum in omnibus sequimur et formam” (De sacramentis 3.1.5). By means of such conformity to the liturgy of Rome, he attempted to defend the legitimacy of certain special customs in Milan, for example, the washing of the feet of the newly baptized.

From these two passages of St. Ambrose one must conclude that (1) the liturgy of Milan in the fourth century was substantially the same as that of Rome, and therefore that Milan received it from Rome; (2) the Arian Bishop Auxentius introduced many changes into Milan’s worship, and that he was perhaps the source of certain affinities of the Ambrosian Rite with that of the Greeks; and (3) in certain instances the practice of Milan differed from that of Rome (e.g., the feet of the newly baptized are washed; there has never been fasting on Saturday in Milan although there was in Rome: Augustine, Epist. 36.32; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 34:62).

Innovations Ambrose made in the liturgy of Milan were the use of the antiphon, the singing of hymns, and perhaps a new arrangement of the vigils [A. Paredi, La liturgia di S. Ambrogio (Milan 1940) 152–155]. The use of both antiphons and hymns spread from Milan to other Churches of the West (Augustine, Conf. 9.7) and finally to Rome itself. The few peculiarities in Baptism and the Eucharist referred to in the De sacramentis of the fourth century concord substantially with the Milanese service books coming from the ninth to the eleventh centuries [L. Mitchell, “Ambrosian Baptismal Rites,” Studia Liturgica 1 (1962) 241–253]. As for the Canon of the Mass, it must be remembered that the De sacramentis offers only a fragment quoted from memory in a discourse, and therefore one should not make too much of differences between it and the text of the canon found in Milanese liturgical books of the Carolingian era.

Origins. The thesis proposed by L. Duchesne in 1889 [Christian Worship, Its Origin and Evolution (5th

ed. London 1949) 93–94], that the Ambrosian Rite was of Greek origin imported to Milan by Auxentius, is untenable if one admits, as everyone now does, Ambrose's authorship of De sacramentis. Nor is there any probability in the recent thesis that Rome adopted the primitive Mass Canon from Milan. Just as all the churches of the West received the faith and Scriptures from Rome, so also from the same sources must they have accepted the first simple and essential liturgical formulas and rites. The fourth and fifth centuries, however, witnessed a phenomenal development in the liturgy everywhere. In the same way as other shepherds, the bishops of Milan—Eustorgius (until c. 350), Dionysius (until 355), Ambrose (d. 397), Simplicianus (d. 401), and Eusebius (d. 460)—made adaptations, composed new prayers, introduced new rites to meet the pastoral needs of their flocks. Very probably the first Milanese service book was systematized and edited shortly after the death of Simplicianus, for he is the last bishop of the diocese to be given a proper Mass in the oldest extant Milanese Missals (9th–11th centuries). In that first service book many prayers could have been the traditional, common Latin compositions, not newly composed ones.

So great was the prestige of St. Ambrose that not only his writings but also the prayers and chants of his church were known in other areas. The developments of the fourth and fifth centuries, particularly Ambrose's innovations, made these variations from Roman practice more obvious. Ambrose alluded to Roman criticism of Milanese peculiarities (De sacramentis 3.1.5–6), and this criticism mounted. Innocent I (d. 417) wrote to the bishop of Gubbio, censuring those who followed liturgical usages of churches other than Rome (Epist. 25 ad Decentium; Patrologia Latina, 20: 551–561). The very customs criticized were to be found in the Milanese service books, which shows that at that time Milan's liturgy was already being imitated by other churches, even those near Rome. Furthermore, seventh-century Gallican service books such as the Bobbio Missal and the Missale Gothicum contain prayers clearly of Milanese derivation. On the other hand, it has not been proved that Milan borrowed any prayers from the Gallican books.

Hence Duchesne's thesis can be accepted in the sense that Milan was the center from which a Gallican type liturgy took its origin. By Gallican is meant a Latin (not Eastern) liturgy different from that of Rome in certain particulars [see J. A. Jungmann, The Early Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1959) 227–237].

Development. Aside from the addition of the Communicantes and Nobis quoque peccatoribus, which were probably adopted from Rome about 570 [V. L. Kennedy, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass (Vatican City 1938)

197], the rite tended to be stable partly owing to the exile of Milan's bishops and officials at Genoa from 569 to 649. Its stability was also due partly to the isolation Milan brought upon itself during the schism involved in its (and Aquileia's) refusal to accept the decision of Vigilius (d. 555) and Pelagius (d. 561) confirming the Second Council of Constantinople's condemnation of the THREE CHAPTERS.

Toward the end of the eighth century, however, the Ambrosian Rite probably underwent a revision. All the oldest extant codices (of Milan, Bergamo, Vercelli, and Biasca) enjoy an amazing uniformity in both prayer texts and the arrangement of the sanctoral cycle. Such uniformity cannot be explained without admitting a revision of Milan's Sacramentary, a revision that introduced many new formularies for new feasts, taking them chiefly from the eighth-century Gelasian Sacramentary, basically a Roman book.

A few decades after the revision of the Sacramentary, possibly in the last half of the ninth century, the Milanese Office also received a definitive arrangement. While the chant texts of the Mass use the Vetus Latina version of the Psalms, the Office follows the Old Roman Psalter, that is, St. Jerome's correction of the Vetus Latina [A. Nohe, Der Mailänder Psalter (Freiburg 1936)]. Between the fourth and ninth centuries there must have been two successive reforms of the Office, one due to Greek influence, another to the Benedictines [H. Schneider, Die altlateinischen biblischen Cantica (Texte und Arbeiten 29–30; Beuron 1938) 99–126].

These revisions coincide with the limitation of the geographical ambit of the rite during the Carolingian reforms. A tradition going back at least to the eleventh century claims that Charlemagne intervened in the fortunes of the Ambrosian Rite. According to Landulf the Elder (Hist. Mediolanensis 11.10; Patrologia Latina, 147:583), the emperor tried to abolish the rite by imposing the Roman books and chant. On the other hand, a Cassinese poem (manuscript 318 in the archives of Monte Cassino) says that Charlemagne merely restricted the use of the rite and its chant to the Diocese of Milan. It is not true, however, that Nicholas II (d. 1061) or Gregory VII (d. 1085) attempted to suppress the rite. Also legendary is the alleged attempt of Cardinal Branda da Castiglione (d. 1443) to do the same [A. Paredi, La biblioteca del Pizolpasso (Milan 1961) 60].

From the tenth to the fourteenth centuries one finds at work in the Ambrosian Rite the same forces that brought about the accumulation of private prayers and special devotions as in the Roman liturgical books. The chief difficulty was that during this period no typical edition of Milanese service books was made obligatory by episcopal authority, especially for Office and calendar. Consequently the traditions followed varied according to locality. It was only with Archbishop Francesco Pizzolpasso in 1440 that the first decree regulating the calendar appeared [E. Cattaneo, Il breviario ambrosiano (Milan 1943) appendix].

When Pius V in 1568 and 1570 declared the Roman Breviary and Missal obligatory, he made an exception for those rites that had been in existence for 200 years or more. Hence the Ambrosian Rite was allowed to continue, but the archbishop of Milan had to carry out a reform of the liturgical books and eliminate abuses. To this end a commission was appointed by (St.) Charles Borromeo, who had defended the legitimacy of the rite and ensured its juridical existence. Borromeo thus removed the editing of service books from private initiative and had published the first official Calendarium (1567) and Breviary (1582); after his death the Ritual (1589) and Missal (1594) appeared. His chief aim in this reform was to restore the rite to its original state. His commission did not execute his wishes, however, but introduced serious changes contrary to ancient tradition, for example, owing to dogmatic scruples, the Ambrosian form for Anointing of the Sick was replaced by the Roman.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, there was begun a new reform seeking the primitive purity of the rite. By 1964 there had appeared new editions of the Missale Ambrosianum by A. Ceriani in 1901, the Antiphonale Missarum (1935) and Liber Vespertialis (1939) by G. M. Suñol. In 1930 studies were begun by the Benedictines of Maria Laach for a new edition of the Breviary. In 1976, the revised Ambrosian missal (Messale Ambrosiano) and the lectionary (Lezionario Ambrosiano) were published together in Italian. This was followed by the promulgation of the Latin text (Missale Ambrosianum iuxta ritum Sanctae Ecclesiae Mediolanensis) in 1981, and a second Italian edition of the Ambrosian Missal in 1986.

Sources. The oldest extant manuscripts of Milanese service books date to the ninth to eleventh centuries. Besides early references to the rite in the writings and homilies of Ambrose, Gaudentius of Brescia (d. 427), Peter Chrysologus (d. 450), and Maximus II of Turin (d. 465), there is available an eleventh-century commentary on the Milanese Mass, the Expositio Missae Canonicae [ed. A. Wilmart, Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 2 (1922) 47–67]. Also edited are the ninth-century Sacramentarium Bergomense (ed. A. Paredi, Bergamo 1962) and the eleventh-century Sacramentary of Aribert [ed. A. Paredi, Miscellanea Bernareggi (Bergamo 1958) 329–488]. M. Magistretti edited a ninth-century Ordinal describing the Church year, Beroldus sive ecclesiae Ambrosianae Me- diolanensis kalendarium et ordines (Milan 1894), and a combined Breviary and Ritual, Manuale Ambrosianum (2 v. Milan 1905).

DESCRIPTION OF RITUAL

This section gives a description of the chief characteristics of the celebration of the Eucharist, Sacraments, liturgical year, and vestments in the classical Ambrosian Rite. The 1976 reforms of the Ambrosian Rite has retained many of the principal elements of the classical structure, while simplifying and pruning accretions that were added over the centuries.

Mass. Traditionally, the festive celebration of the Mass was preceded by a procession during which antiphons are sung. The procession ended with a short litany. The prayers of the Confiteor began to appear from the thirteenth century on. The Psalm Iudica me Deus, wanted by Charles Borromeo and introduced into the Missale Ambrosianum of 1594 but omitted in the 1618 edition, is no longer said. The 1976 revisions removed these preparatory ceremonies that were incorporated during the medieval period, and the Ambrosian Rite of the Mass begins with the Ingressa or Entrance Antiphon, as was the case in the earliest form of the Ambrosian Rite of the Mass.

The chant for the Ingressa corresponds to the Roman Introit, but has neither verse nor Gloria Patri. After the Gloria in excelsis there is threefold Kyrie eleison. Traditionally, on the Sundays of Lent, instead of the Gloria in excelsis, there are special litanies sung by the deacon; all the people answer “precamur te” or “Kyrie eleison” as a response. Since the altar, as a rule, is kept turned toward the people, the celebrant never turns around for the Dominus vobiscum, even when the altar is not actually turned toward the people. The first oration is called “super populum.”

The readings follow. In festive and Sunday Masses there are three readings, the first of which is usually taken from the Old Testament and the second from the New Testament Epistles. The Psalmellus follows the singing of the Old Testament, while the Alleluia Verse follows the Epistle. The Sequence has never been accepted in the Ambrosian Rite, as is the case with the Roman Rite. After the Gospel the homily or Tractatus always follows.

The Preparation of Gifts begins with a triple Kyrie eleison and an antiphon “post evangelium,” remnants probably of the ancient litany prayer. An invitation by the deacon follows: “Pacem habete,” probably a remnant of the ancient practice of giving the kiss of peace before the Offertory. There follows the Oratio super sindonem, sung after the table-cloth (sindon) has been set on the altar. (This corresponds in the Gelasian Sacramentary to the second oration, which was later abolished in the Gregorian Sacramentary.) The ceremony of the laity's offering the bread and wine was always maintained throughout the centuries, although it fell into disuse in the medieval Roman Rite. During this ceremony there takes place the singing of the Offertorium, or offertory chant. The private prayers of the celebrant during the Offertory are found already in the Missals of the eleventh century. While the Credo is not spoken of in the eleventh-century Expositio missae canonicae, it is found in all the ancient Missals of the rite. In Milan it is sung after and not before the Offertory prayers, a practice that is still maintained in the 1976 revision. The prayer Super oblata, ends the Offertory; it is recited or sung aloud.

While the Ambrosian Rite still enjoys the ancient variety of Prefaces, each Mass having its proper Preface, the Ambrosian Canon as cited by St. Ambrose (De sacramentis 4.5.21–23, 6.26–27) is in substantial agreement with the most ancient Roman Canon found in the Gelasian Sacramentary. Milan, however, never accepted modifications introduced later into the Roman Canon.

Prior to the 1976 revision, the Ambrosian Rite of the Mass had three Eucharistic prayers, the first being a variant of the Roman Canon, and the other two were specific Eucharistic prayers for Holy Thursday and the Easter Vigil. All three ancient Eucharistic prayers have been retained in the 1976 revision, with the addition of Eucharistic Prayers II, III and IV from the Roman Missal (1969).

One unique peculiarity of the Ambrosian Rite is the practice of the celebrant washing his hands (lavabo) before the words of consecration without saying anything. It is not known how old this practice is, but in the books of the thirteenth century the lavabo comes after the celebrant has received the offerings. The 1976 revision maintains the lavabo at this unique position, rather than the more ancient practice after the celebrant receives the offering, a practice that has always been part of the Roman Rite and attested to in the Ordo Romanus Primus. The Elevations date from the thirteenth century. Immediately after the second Elevation, the celebrant extends his arms straight out while he says the first words of the Unde et memores. The Fraction of the Host has been kept before the Lord's Prayer, as it probably was in the Roman Mass before the time of Gregory the Great (d. 604). During it the Confractorium is sung by the choir.

Communion under both species seems to have been preserved for a long time, far longer than the Roman Rite of the Mass. In fact, in eleventh-century manuals the formula for giving Communion to a person baptized in case of sickness is “Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi sanguine tinctum. . .” The Communion chant is called the Transitorium. After the Postcommunion Prayer we find another triple Kyrie, probably the remnant of an early Byzantine-style postcommunion litany. Unlike the Roman Rite, the ancient dismissal of the Ambrosian Rite of the Mass is “Procedamus cum pace” (Let us go [proceed] in peace), to which the assembly responds “In nomine Christi” (“In the name of Christ”).

Sacraments. The ceremonies of Baptism differ from those of the Roman rite only in their order and the practice of immersion. The ancient Milanese ritual for Anointing of the Sick was replaced at the time of Charles Borromeo by the Roman ritual. The differences in administration of the other Sacraments are very slight.

Liturgical year. The Ambrosian Rite has never observed a fast on Saturdays, not even during Lent. The arrangement of the Gospel pericopes seems to be a pre-Gregorian type and is common to Milan, Benevento, and Spain. Advent has six Sundays beginning with the First Sunday after the feast of St. Martin (November 11); the Sixth Sunday is the great feast of Mary, which antedates the determination of March 25 as the feast of the Annunciation. The Milanese custom of blessing homes at Christmas rather than at Easter was already practiced in the eleventh century.

Traditionally, no saints' feasts are permitted during Lent. Ancient Ambrosian liturgical usage dictated that the Fridays of Lent were always aliturgical: neither Mass nor reception of Communion was allowed. On Holy Saturday a text of the Exsultet is used, which if not actually written by St. Ambrose, is certainly older than the Roman text. At the very beginning of the Holy Saturday Mass the celebrant announces the Resurrection by singing three times: “Christus Dominus resurrexit”; the people respond thrice with “Deo gratias.”

Liturgical vestments. The deacon's stole is always worn outside the dalmatic as in Spain and Gaul before the Carolingian reform. Red is the color used for vestments during Holy Week and for Eucharistic functions.

Bibliography: A. PAREDI, “Messali antichi ambrosiani,” Ambrosius 35 (1959) 1–25. P. BORELLA, Il rito Ambrosiano (Brescia 1964). P. BORELLA, “L'evoluzione dei riti sacramentali nell' antica liturgica ambrosiana,” Liturgia (München 1963) 48–59. O. HEIMING, “Kleinere Beiträge zur Geschichte der ambrosianischen Liturgie,” Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 12 (1970) 130–147 (Pt. I); 13 (1971) 133–140 (Pt. II). E. CATTANEO, “Tradizione e il rito ambrosiani nell'ambiente lombardo-medioevale,” Ambrosius Episcopus, 2 (Milan 1976) 5–47. A. M. TRIACCA, “Liturgie ambrosienne: amalgame hétérogène ou ‘specificum’ influent,” in Liturgie de l'église particulière et liturgie de l'église universelle (Rome 1976) 289–327. A. M. TRIACCA, “Mater omnium viventium: contributo metodologico ad una ecclesiologia liturgica dal nuovo Messale Ambrosiano,” in In ecclesia (Rome 1977) 353–383. A. M. TRIACCA, “La ‘méthexis’ dans l'ancienne liturgie ambrosienne: contribution des sources eucologiques ambrosiennes,” in L'assemblée liturgique et les différents rôles dans l'assemblée (Rome 1977) 269–305. A. M. TRIACCA, “L'eucologie ambrosienne dans la structure du nouveau Missel de la 'Sancta Ecclesia Mediolanensis,'" in Gestes et paroles dans les diverses familles liturgiques (Rome 1978) 301–328; "'Ecclesia Mater omnium vivetium': liturgie ambrosienne et ecclésiologie universelle," in L'église dans la liturgie (Rome 1980) 295–323; "La structure trinitaire des 'Preces Eucharisticae' dans la liturgie ambrosienne (hier et aujourd'hui)," in Trinité et liturgie (Rome 1984) 301–384; "Le 'sanctoral' de la liturgie ambrosienne: des données à théologie liturgique," in Saints et sainteté dans la liturgie (Rome 1987) 325–356; "Teologia dell'anno liturgico nelle liturgie occidentali antiche non romane," in L'anno liturgico (Genoa 1988) 307–363. V. A. LENTI, "Liturgical Reform and the Ambrosian and Mozarabic Rites," Worship 68 (1994) 417–426; "The Revised Ambrosian Divine Office," Studia Liturgica 29 (1999) 116–126. A. WARD, "Holy Week in the Ambrosian Liturgy," in Hebdomadae sanctae celebratio (Rome 1997) 187–235.

[A. PAREDI/EDS.]

AMBROSIANS

A term applied to various religious congregations under the protection of St. AMBROSE, Bishop of Milan (374–397), especially to two groups of women and three groups of men, although neither Augustine nor Ambrose's biographer, Paulinus, says that Ambrose himself founded a religious order. His Treatises on Virginité are exhortations to purity of life and personal sanctity, but not a rule for a religious community.

1. The first known "Ambrosians," the Oblationaries of St. Ambrose, appeared in the 9th century in Milan as a group of ten poor men and ten poor women at the Scuola dei Vecchioni in Milan who were entrusted, on feast days, with bringing the people's oblation of bread and wine to the altar at the offertory of an AMBROSIAN RITE Eucharist.

2. In the 14th century, three Milanese noblemen, Alexander Crivelli, Anthony Pietrasancta, and Alber Besozzi, sought retreat and solitude in a wooded glen outside the city walls. Clothed in a chestnut-colored habit of tunic, scapular, and cowl, they practiced works of charity and preached to the people. They were joined by others, and in 1375 Gregory XI, before his return from Avignon, gave the growing community of priests and solitaries the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, the Ambrosian Rite, and a special constitution under the title of Fratres Sancti Ambrosii ad Nemas. Similar groups began to dot the countryside but the only bond of unity was community custom. In 1441, Eugene IV merged all members into the Congregatio Sancti Ambrosii ad nemus Mediolanensis, designating the original monastery as the motherhouse. Laxity of discipline led to a reform by St. Charles BORROMEO in 1579. Sixtus V in 1589 added to the congregation the monasteries of the Brothers of St. Barnabas, which had been founded by John Scarpa, and included the name of St.

Barnabas in the title. The congregation was dissolved by Innocent X in 1646.

3. In 1408, the Annunciatae of Lombardy, or Nuns of St. Ambrose, were founded by Dorothea Morosini, Eleanore Contarini, and Veronica Duodi at Pavia. Daughterhouses spread throughout Lombardy and Venetia. Guided by the Rule of St. Augustine, the nuns lived a cloistered life of prayer and poverty under the jurisdiction of the local bishop. Nicholas V and Pius V approved their constitutions. They were suppressed by Napoleon.

4. Another congregation of Ambrosian sisters was founded by Catherine Morigia in 1474 at Mt. Varese in Lombardy, as a branch of the Ambrosian Fratres. These sisters, dedicated to a life of prayer and penance, wore a chestnut-colored habit, followed the strict rule of St. Augustine, lived in cloister, and used the Ambrosian liturgy. In 1474 they were given canonical status by Sixtus IV under the title Nuns of St. Ambrose. A rapid decline in the 17th century led Innocent X to abolish them, also in 1646.

5. In implementing the decrees of the Council of Trent in his Diocese of Milan, Charles Borromeo, the "second Ambrose," organized a society of priests under the patronage of Our Lady and St. Ambrose, called Oblates of St. Ambrose, in 1578. He consulted Philip NERI and FELIX OF CANTALICE on the rule for his community, which was approved by Gregory XIII. Living in community and owing obedience to the bishop, they became the bishop's associates in the work of the ministry. In 1810, Napoleon dispersed the congregation but Archbishop Romilli restored it in 1854. The oblate ideal spread to Poitiers in France, to Paderborn in Germany, and, in 1857, to England, under Cardinal Nicholas WISEMAN, where the community became known as the Oblates of St. Charles.

[M. A. MULHOLLAND]

AMBROSIASTER

The name coined by ERASMUS to designate the author of a commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul that had traditionally been ascribed to St. Ambrose, but that Erasmus was convinced could not be by him. Most scholars agreed that the commentaries were quite unlike the work of Ambrose, and in 1905 A. Souter proved to general satisfaction that a collection of 127 Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti, commonly attributed to Augustine, was in fact by the same author as the Pauline commentaries. In 1908 Souter produced a critical text of this work (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum v. 50). It was planned that a similar edition of the Pauline commentaries should be produced by H. Brewer, but Brewer died before the work was far advanced. The Maurists' edition (reproduced in Patrologia Latina v. 17) was made from 13 MSS, all of French provenance. In recent years a survey of H. J. Vogels has shown that some 72 MSS exist and that they show that there were three versions of the commentary on Romans produced by the author himself: two versions of what he had to say on 1 and 2 Corinthians and a single version of the commentary on the other Epistles, except Hebrews, for which the commentary has been supplied by Alcuin. In the Quaestiones Souter indicated that the same procedure was followed. There was a first edition of 150 quaestiones by the author himself; then a definitive 127 quaestiones; and finally, though much later, a version in which only 115 are found. Souter considered that the author worked on Romans and on 1 and 2 Corinthians and finally made the first edition of his Quaestiones. He then turned to the rest of Paul and brought out the second edition of the Quaestiones, and all this between 370 and 384. The silence of St. JEROME about such an important work on the Epistles is hard to explain and has been put down to jealousy. Augustine did cite the work (contra duas epp. Pelagii 4.4.7; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 60:528) but ascribed it to HILARY OF POITIERS. The Irish knew it as Hilary's, for the Codex Ardmachanus has Incipit prologus Hilari in Apostolum as a heading, and the library at Bobbio had a copy of Hilarii in ep. ad Romanos. Guesses have been made as to the identity of the author, but without achieving any firm result. He was versed in Roman law, betrayed an interest in things Jewish (but was not of Jewish origin), had lived in Rome, disliked allegorical interpretations of Scripture, wrote astringently in Latin, and had read Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Victorinus of Pettau, and Eusebius of Vercelli.

Bibliography: A. SOUTER, A Study of Ambrosiaster (Texts and Studies 7.4; Cambridge, Eng. 1905); The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (Oxford 1927). G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed., L. PIROT et. al., (Paris 1928) 1:225–241. H. J. VOGELS, "Die Überlieferung des Ambrosiasterkommentars zu den Paulinischen Briefen," Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen. Philologisch-historische Klasse 1.7 (1959) 107–142; "Ambrosiaster und Hieronymus," Revue Bénédictine 66 (1956) 13–19; ed., Das Corpus Paulinum des Ambrosiaster (Bonn 1957). D. G. HUNTER, "The Paradise of Patriarchy: Ambrosiaster on Woman as (not) God's Image [Response to Egalitarian Asceticism in Rome]," Journal of Theological Studies ns 43 (October 1992): 447–469; "On the Sin of Adam and Eve: A Little-Known Defense of Marriage and Childbearing by Ambrosiaster," Harvard Theological Review 82 (July 1989): 283–299. L. A. SPELLER, "New Light on the Photinians: The Evidence of Ambrosiaster," Journal of Theological Studies ns 34 (April 1983): 99–113.

[J. H. CREHAN]

AMBROSIUS CATHARINUS (LANCELOT POLITI)

Dominican theologian and bishop; b. Siena, c. 1484; d. Naples, Nov. 8, 1553. A doctor of civil and canon law and consistorial lawyer under Leo X, he became a Dominican in 1517 because of Savanarola's preaching. Recognizing the dangers of nascent Lutheranism, he was one of the first (1520, 1521) to write against it. While prior of Siena, he waged a controversy with his superiors in favor of the feast of the Immaculate Conception. This resulted in his removal from office.

In 1532 he went to France where, prior to the Council of Trent, he published several works on problems raised by Protestantism—predestination, justification, purgatory, veneration of the saints, and episcopal residency. Pallavicino declared that Catharinus "was second to none among his contemporaries in contest with heretics." He attended the council from 1545 to 1547 as papal theologian, manifesting his intellectual independence, especially in controversies with his confreres Carranza, D. SOTO and B. Spina. At the petition of the conciliar fathers, Catharinus was appointed bishop of Minori in 1546; he was made archbishop of Conza in 1552.

During the Tridentine period he produced many works concerning the problems that arose during the sessions. His original and extensive writings (50 edited and unedited works), often concerned uncharted areas of theology. Concerning the intention of the minister in conferring the sacraments, he defended the thesis of external intention; on the value of the words Hoc est corpus meum, he held that the consecration is effected by the preceding epiclesis, "Quam oblationem . . ." of the Roman Mass. His juridico-moral theory concerning the transmission of original sin found adherents among such theologians as BANEZ, BILLUART, SUAREZ, and the SALMANTICENSES. His works are characterized by an emphasis upon the teaching authority of the Church and a thematic return to the Scriptures and the Fathers.

Bibliography: J. SCHWEIZER, Ambrosius Catharinus Politus (Münster 1909).

[J. R. COONEY]

AMBRY (ARMARIUM)

A niche, usually in the wall, with or without a door, for storing or showing books, clothes, food, jewelry, money, precious objects, small statues, vessels, etc. This function was known from antiquity. In Christian usage, the ambry served for the reservation of altar bread and wine, sacred vessels, liturgical books, HOLY OILS, RELICS, and the Eucharist. From the 4th century, sacred objects were kept in church (preferably in the sanctuary or high up in a nearby pillar) or SACRISTY. At least from the early 6th century, ambries were made in the stems of ALTARS. After the decree Sane of INNOCENT III, the doors of Eucharistic ambries had locks and keys. As devotion to the Holy Eucharist grew, ambries were placed in more prominent places in church and often had barred windows. The TABERNACLE for reservation upon the altar (9th century) superseded the ambry from the 16th century onward. Documentary and archeological evidence of many varieties of ambry abounds all over the West from the 12th century.

Bibliography: C. DU CANGE, Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae latinitatis, ed. L. FAVRE, 10 v. (Niort 1883–88) 1:701–702; 3:372. L. KÖSTER, De custodia sanctissimae Eucharistiae (Rome 1940). E. MAFFEL, La Réservation eucharistique jusqu'à la Renaissance (Brussels 1942). G. DIX, A Detection of Aumbries (4th ed. London 1955). S. J. P. VAN DIJK and J. H. WALKER, The Myth of the Aumbry: Notes on Medieval Reservation Practice and Eucharistic Devotion (London 1957) 15–66.

[S. J. P. VAN DIJK]

AMELRY, FRANCIS

Carmelite spiritual writer and mystic; b. c. 1498; d. c. 1552. Not much is known of his life except that he held a bachelor's degree in theology and was prior at the Carmel at Ieper. The Index of 1558 mentions a mystery play of his, and he is known to have written about ten spiritual works in which love and its mystical experience is the dominant theme. Two of his tracts, Wat de Liefde Gods can bedrgven (What the Love of God Can Do) and Een Dialogus of Tsame sprekinghe der ziele or De minnende ziel (The Loving Soul), have been transposed from Old Dutch into modern Dutch and are published in the series "Bloemen von One Geestelijk Erf." The first tract is a handbook of the spiritual life. The second work, his masterpiece, has been translated into Latin by Antonius von Hemert (1552) and into other languages. It is a systematic and logical presentation of the stages of love, in seven steps, which describe love's progressively enveloping nature. Although based on sound theology, his mystical doctrine was much influenced by personal experience and is expressed in a mystical, ardent, forceful, analogous style.

Bibliography: A. AMPE, Franciscus Amelry, de edele zanger der liefde (Antwerp 1951). C. JANSSEN, Carmelklius en Carmelwereld (Bussum 1955) 111–112. De katholieke encyclopaedie, ed. P. VAN DER MEER et al., 25 v. (Amsterdam 1949–55) 2:187.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

AMEN

A Hebrew word from a root ('mn) meaning "to be trustworthy," used to signify "surely," "so it is," "so may it be," "I ratify." (See FAITH.) In the Old Testament, the term has several significations. In Nm 5.22 it is used to signify assent to an administered oath, the one using the term thereby agreeing to accept the consequences of a curse or punishment in the event the crime be committed. In Dt 27.15–26 the word is used to indicate ratification of each of 12 curses for 12 specified possible crimes. It is similarly used in Neh 5.13 and Jer 11.5. In 2 Kgs 1.36, Tb 9.12, and Jer 28.6, it is used to signify agreement with a blessing. In synagogue practice, Amen was used by the people to ratify a prayer or doxology pronounced by the rabbi or leader [Neh 8.6; Ps 105(106).48]; often in such usage it was doubled [Ps 40(41).14; 71(72).19; 88(89).53].

In the New Testament, Christ's statements are often introduced with Amen, thereby guaranteeing their absolute certitude and divine authority. Such meaning was unknown in previous usage of the word. In the Gospel of St. John, such statements are introduced by a double Amen (Jn 1.51; 13.16, etc.), the other evangelists retaining single use of the term. The word was pronounced in apostolic liturgical assemblies to ratify the priestly eucharistic prayer (1 Cor 14.16), even by Greek-speaking Christians. Frequent passages in the Epistles indicate the use of the word to conclude private petitions and doxologies, as well as liturgical ones (Rom 1.25; 9.5; 1 Tm 1.17; Heb 13.21; 1 Pt 4.11; 5.11; 5.14; Jdt 1.25; Phil 1.25; 2 Pt 3.18; 1 Thes 5.28; 2 Thes 3.18; etc.). According to St. Paul, through Christ "also rises the 'Amen' to God unto our glory" (2 Cor 1.20), since all the divine promises find their fulfillment and ratification in the Word Incarnate. The Book of the Revelation states that those in glory, when hearing the heavenly doxologies before the throne of God, will respond with Amen (Rv 5.14).

Liturgical usage. The use of "Amen" as an acclamation of assent to prayers and doxologies in liturgical worship dates back to the apostolic period. In 2 Cor 1:20, Paul asserted that "we utter Amen through Christ to the glory of God." It appeared that early Christians adopted the Jewish practice of assenting to prayer by the invocation "Amen." In his description of the eucharistic prayer in First Apology, Justin Martyr noted that the presider prayed the eucharistic prayer to the best of his ability, and the assembly assented to his prayer with a resounding Amen. Over time, this practice developed into the Great Amen which concludes the eucharistic prayer in the East and West.

Bibliography: L. GILLET, Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 56 (Bruges 1944–45) 134–136. K. BERGER, "Zur Geschichte der Einleitungsformel 'Amen, ich sage euch'" Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Älteren Kirche 63:1–2 (1972) 45–75. J. M. ROSS, "Amen," Expository Times 102 (1991) 166–171. K. SEYBOLD, "Zur Vorgeschichte der liturgischen Formel 'Amen'" Theologische Zeitschrift 48 (1992) 109–117.

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN/EDS.]

AMERBACH, VEIT

Humanist and Lutheran convert to Catholicism; b. Wemding, 1503; d. Ingolstadt, Sept. 13, 1557. Amerbach (known also as Trolman) studied at Ingolstadt, Freiburg, and Wittenberg, taught in the Latin school at Eisleben, and was made professor on the arts faculty in Wittenberg in 1530. He became disaffected with his colleagues, concluded that the patristic writings did not support Luther's doctrine of justification by faith, and was moved by Johann Eck's arguments for the primacy of the pope. In November of 1543 he left Wittenberg and embraced Catholicism. He taught briefly in the Latin school in Eichstätt, and then became a professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Ingolstadt. He published commentaries on Cicero, Ovid, Chrysostom, and other writers of classical and Christian antiquity.

Bibliography: L. FISCHER, Veit Trolmann von Wemding, genannt Vitus Amerpachius, als Professor in Wittenberg (Freiburg 1926). T. FREUDENBERGER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:433–434. M. SIMON, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:310.

[L. W. SPITZ]

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF RELIGION

The American Academy of Religion (AAR) is the major learned society and professional association of research scholars and teachers in the field of religious studies. The Academy serves over 7,500 members, the great majority of whom teach in some 1,500 college and university departments and schools in North America. Its mission is to promote excellence in scholarship and teaching in the field by fostering reflection upon and understanding of religious traditions, issues, questions, and values. Within a context of free inquiry and critical examination, the Academy welcomes all disciplined reflection on religion—from both within and outside of communities of belief and practice—and seeks to enhance its broad public understanding. It is inclusive of the whole range of methodologies and theories used to study religion. The Academy does not endorse or reject any religious tradition or set of religious beliefs or practices. Its commitment is, rather, to the highest standards of scholarship.

The AAR's history is one of development from a small group of biblical scholars to its current status as the largest, most comprehensive association dedicated to promoting the academic study of religion. In 1909 four professors of biblical studies formed the Association of Biblical Instructors in American Colleges and Secondary Schools. Intended as a sister organization to the already-established Society of Biblical Literature, its purpose was to promote excellence in teaching. The group continued to meet under the original name until 1922, when members voted to change the name to the National Association of Biblical Instructors (NABI or "prophet" in Hebrew). Dramatic expansion of the study of religion in the post-World War II period led to NABI's transformation into the American Academy of Religion in 1964 and to the AAR's rapid growth during the succeeding decades.

Activities. The AAR fosters knowledge of religion and religious institutions in all their forms and manifestations through a wide variety of programs and membership services. Among these are an annual scholarly conference, a major publishing program, research grants and book awards, professional services, teaching workshops, and annual regional meetings. The annual conference, held jointly with the Society of Biblical Literature (SBL), attracts scholars from all over the world. The Journal of the American Academy of Religion publishes current scholarships across the spectrum of the field. Through the Spotlight on Teaching periodical and an ongoing series of teaching workshops, the AAR provides its members with opportunities to learn more about recent pedagogical innovations and to improve their teaching craft. To inform members about current issues of interest to religionists, AAR and SBL jointly publish Religious Studies News quarterly. The two societies also offer a comprehensive Employment Information Services program that helps coordinate the efforts of position-seekers and employers. The Association of Department Chairs offers a range of services at the departmental and institutional levels.

A member of both the American Council of Learned Societies and the National Humanities Alliance, the Academy works to improve support for all the humanities and to foster the role of religious studies as an integral part of the humanities. The Academy's executive offices are located in Atlanta.

[B. DECONCINI/EDS.]

AMERICAN BOARD OF CATHOLIC MISSIONS

The ABCM traces its origins back to 1919, when 17 directors of Catholic home and foreign missionary societies met at the University of Notre Dame, Ind., to discuss feasible ways of cooperating in the solicitation of contributions. They recommended a plan of organization to the bishops of the U.S., who at their annual meeting the same year appointed a committee to coordinate and stimulate the missionary endeavors of the whole country. This committee, under the chairmanship of Henry Moeller, archbishop of Cincinnati, Ohio, assumed the title of American Board of Catholic Missions.

Although the board, with the assistance of an advisory council of priests representing various missionary bodies, intended to aid and promote Catholic missions in every part of the world, it had to alter its program and to confine its support to the home missions after the Holy See (1922) reorganized the Pontifical Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, which was thenceforth in the U.S. and elsewhere to operate independently under its own director for the benefit of the foreign missions.

After negotiations with the Holy See, a new plan of organization, drawn up under the leadership of Francis C. Kelley, Bishop of Oklahoma, was adopted by the American hierarchy at their annual meeting of 1924 and was approved by Pius XI on November 7 of the same year. At their next annual meeting the bishops elected a new board of six members; the first meeting was held in Washington, D.C., on Sept. 15, 1925, and Cardinal George Mundelein, archbishop of Chicago, Ill., was chosen as president, Bishop Kelley as secretary, and John Francis Noll, bishop of Fort Wayne, Ind., as treasurer; headquarters were located permanently in Chicago.

In 1946 it was resolved that the archbishop of Chicago should be ipso facto the president of the ABCM; at the same time William D. O'Brien, auxiliary bishop of Chicago and president of the Catholic Church Extension Society, was appointed permanent secretary, and Bishop Noll was appointed permanent treasurer; they both held these offices until their deaths in 1962 and 1956 respectively. In 1965 there were nine nonpermanent members, elected for five-year terms by the bishops of the U.S. at their annual meetings. The board meets regularly once a year, usually in November; it issues a printed financial report to the bishops of the United States.

The ABCM serves principally as a center for the collection and distribution of funds for the "missions in the territory and for the inhabitants of the United States and of its possessions which do not receive aid from the Society for the Propagation of the Faith." As its main source of income it receives 40 percent of the dues paid for membership in the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and of the collection taken up in all the parishes once a year on Mission Sunday. In distributing the money the board correlates its allotments with those of the Extension Society and other Catholic national institutes and agencies.

The board gives two sorts of grants, namely, ordinary grants to bishops who have requested subventions for the missions in their dioceses and extraordinary grants for work among the Spanish-speaking Catholics in the Southwest and among the African American Catholics in the South. Moreover, even after the Philippines became independent, the board continued to send subsidies to the Church in that country until 1964. In that same year it was also decided that bishops who have priests or laymen working in Latin America may be given some financial aid upon application.

In 1972, the ABCM was reconstituted as a standing committee of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB). Subsequently, it was renamed the Bishops' Committee on the Home Missions.

[R. TRISCO/EDS.]

AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

The American Catholic Historical Association was founded by a small group of historians assembled under the leadership of Peter Guilday in Cleveland, Ohio, in December 1919. At that time there were diocesan historical societies in New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and St. Paul and a state society in Illinois, all interested mainly in local history and composed mostly of amateurs, but a national society of professional historians devoted to the history of the universal Church and qualified to interact with their peers in secular and Protestant history had been lacking. The founders were advised and encouraged by J. Franklin Jameson, a former president of the American Historical Association, with which the new organization became affiliated. The association, incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia and recognized by the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, has its headquarters at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C.

From its inception the association has pursued two main objectives. One is to promote a deeper and more widespread knowledge of the history of the Catholic Church broadly considered, that is, its internal reality and its relations with civil governments, the influence of its members, individually and collectively, on the intellectual, cultural, political, and social progress of the human race. The other aim is the advancement of historical scholarship in all fields among its members. Membership is open to professional church historians, Catholics and non-Catholics in the United States and in other countries, especially Canada, as well as nonprofessional supporters and students.

The association adopted as its official organ the Catholic Historical Review, published quarterly since April 1915 by the Catholic University of America Press. The annual presidential address, the reports of the secretary and treasurer and of the several committees, and current information about the association are published in the Review. The association launched the editing of the papers of Archbishop John Carroll, which were published in three volumes for the Bicentennial of American Independence in 1976.

The association holds an annual meeting jointly with the American Historical Association and other affiliated societies, notably the American Society of Church History. Since 1972 the association has held a two-day meeting each spring.

The association annually awards two book prizes, namely, (1) the John Gilmary Shea Prize, established in 1944 to commemorate the association's 25th anniversary and first conferred in 1946, which recognizes the author, American or Canadian, whose book, published within the preceding 12-month period, is judged by a committee of scholars to be the most distinguished contribution to the history of the Catholic Church among the books entered in the competition, and (2) the Howard R. Marraro Prize, funded by a bequest of Professor Marraro of Columbia University, who died in 1972; it is given to an author whose book is considered by a separate committee to be the best of the works published during the preceding year in the field of Italian history or Italo-American history or relations. In years when it is merited, the Peter Guilday Prize is awarded to the writer of an article that has been accepted for publication in the Review and is deemed by the editors to be the most outstanding of the articles submitted in any given year by writers who have not previously published any scholarly work. In 1995 the association initiated the John Tracy Ellis Memorial Fund, which each year grants to a doctoral student an award for dissertation research.

The association is the recognized Catholic voice in the historical profession in the United States. It is one of the three constitutive societies of the American National Commission of the International Commission of Comparative Church History.

[R. TRISCO]

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES

Founded by the Rev. Carl McIntire, Sept. 17, 1941, the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC) is an organization of Bible fundamentalist Christian churches, associations and individuals, organized on the basis of a commonly accepted statement of inerrant Biblical truths and on the need to unite against what they consider the errors of other churches and groups of churches. Its constituent members include the Bible Presbyterian Churches (BPC), Evangelical Methodist Churches (EMC), Fellowship of Fundamental Bible Churches (FFBC), Fellowship of Independent Methodists, Fundamental Methodists, General Association of Regular Baptist Churches (GARBC), Independent Churches Affiliated, Independent Fundamental Bible Churches, Tioga River Christian Conference, Ukrainian Evangelical Baptist Conference, and the World Baptist Fellowship.

Noted for its strong anti-ecumenical and anti-charismatic stance, a major preoccupation of the ACCC is opposition to the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A., the WORLD COUNCILS OF CHURCHES, the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS, the World Evangelical Fellowship, and all charismatic and ecumenical movements. The ACCC accuses these organizations of compromising the ideals of biblical fundamentalism and of propagating theological falsehoods and errors. Although similar to the NAE on theological and doctrinal principles, the ACCC takes a hard line stance against any collaboration or cooperation with organizations which disagree with its views, including the NAE itself.

[R. MATZERATH/EDS.]

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF CATHOLIC SOCIETIES

Catholic societies existed in the U.S. as early as the 1830s, but the notion of a federation of these societies developed only after Pius IX commended the work of the Belgian Catholic Union in 1871. Influenced by the pope's recommendation that unions be formed throughout the world, Richard Clarke, a New York lawyer, drafted a constitution for local unions, hoping to federate them into a national union. Although this hope was not realized, attempts to unite Catholics continued. In 1889 and 1893 Catholics met at LAY CONGRESSES where the delegates were urged to join Catholic societies. Before the first congress, Martin GRIFFIN, editor of the Irish Catholic Benevolent Union Journal, suggested a federation of Catholic societies, and a diocesan federation began in Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1890. For the next 11 years agitation continued for a national federation to muster forces against the “violation of Catholic rights” in education, native missions, employment, and other areas. Finally in 1900 and 1901, organizational meetings were held for this purpose in Philadelphia, Pa.; New York, N.Y.; and at Trenton and Long Branch, N.J.

The result of these efforts was the American Federation of Catholic Societies, a loose union of organizations wherein the members retained their autonomy and identity. It existed until 1920, although the last public meeting took place in 1917. Except for 1905, annual conventions were held; between conventions Anthony Matre, national secretary, handled routine matters, aided by the executive and advisory boards composed of officers and members of the hierarchy. In 1911 the federation formed a social service commission with Bp. Peter MULDOON, of Rockford, Ill., and Rev. Peter DIETZ, of Milwaukee, Wis., as chairman and secretary, respectively. During its 18 active years, the federation tried to mold Catholic public opinion; it informed its members on pertinent topics, both Catholic and secular, and worked to block harmful and aid helpful legislation both locally and nationally. Outstanding Catholic laymen such as James Edward Hagerly, sociologist at Ohio State University; Frederick Kenkel of the Catholic Central Union; and David GOLDSTEIN, converted socialist, were featured by the federation in its Bulletin, in its Weekly Newsletter, and on its lecture platforms. The federation also conducted a campaign of decency in entertainment and inaugurated an early system of evaluating the morality of motion pictures. To some extent it contributed to the Americanization of immigrant Catholics and provided some early precedents for cooperation between the clergy and laity.

When Catholic action was needed at the beginning of World War I, the federation failed to take the initiative because it was busy reorganizing. However, it did pledge its wholehearted support to the Knights of Columbus and the newly formed National Catholic War Council. When the latter was continued after the war as the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE CONFERENCE (NCWC), the federation was absorbed into it and eventually disappeared with the formation of the National Councils of Catholic Men and Women, NCCMW.

Bibliography: A. F. GORMAN, Federation of Catholic Societies, 1870–1920 (Doctoral diss. unpub. U. of Notre Dame 1962).

[A. F. GORMAN]

AMERICAN PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION

A secret anti-Catholic organization, the American Protective Association (A.P.A.) was active especially in the Midwest between 1893 and 1896. Like the earlier Know-Nothing movement, the A.P.A. relied primarily on political activities to combat the alleged menace of Catholicism in America (see KNOW-NOTHINGISM).

The A.P.A. was founded in 1887 in Clinton, Iowa, by Henry F. Bowers. About 70,000 members had been recruited in the upper Mississippi Valley by 1892. The following year a number of factors inspired a great surge in A.P.A. activity and strength. These included the appointment of Abp. Francis Satolli as first permanent papal delegate to the U.S.; the replacement of Bowers by William J. Traynor, a more practical and politically astute leader; and, most important, the Panic of 1893, which A.P.A. propagandists ascribed to papal plots.

These developments occurred at a time when Irish political power was increasing in such cities as Boston and New York and when the prolonged school controversy was aggravating anti-Catholic sentiment. The rapid expansion of parochial schools after the Third Plenary Council in 1884 had induced several states to attempt public regulation of private schools. Compromise solutions, such as the POUGHKEEPSIE PLAN and the FARIBAULT PLAN, only provoked further controversy.

Encouraged by these circumstances the A.P.A. launched a membership drive and by 1896 claimed a total of 2.5 million members. To aid its campaign the society established the A.P.A. Magazine and about 70 weekly newspapers, including Traynor's Patriotic American, which published a bogus encyclical in which the date was set for American Catholics to slay their fellow citizens in a holy massacre. Propaganda efforts were reinforced by economic pressure against Catholic businessmen and workers.

Political action, however, was the principal A.P.A. concern. Usually endorsing Republican candidates, the A.P.A. influenced elections in 1894 in Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana, Missouri, and Colorado. In Michigan the society elected a congressman, William S. Linton. Yet, in a year of Republican victories, the strength of the A.P.A. was deceptive. Many of the candidates endorsed by its state and municipal advisory boards ignored the organization after the election. Most of its triumphs were confined to purely municipal offices. Nationally the A.P.A. was denounced by numerous responsible leaders, notably Washington Gladden, a Congregational clergyman. Its appeal was further limited by a legislative program that included little more than opposition to federal grants secured by the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions and by its objection to Congressional acceptance of the Marquette statue presented by Wisconsin.

The A.P.A. was weakened also by internal strife. A growing nativist faction clashed with the Scotch-Irish and Scandinavian membership. The A.P.A. was then hopelessly wrecked by disagreement over the election of 1896. Traynor refused to endorse William McKinley and attempted, unsuccessfully, to create a third party. McKinley's victory virtually ended the career of the A.P.A., although, again under Bowers's leadership, it remained in existence until 1911.

Bibliography: J. HIGHAM, Strangers in the Land (New Brunswick 1955) 62–63, 80–87. C. WITTKE, We Who Built America (New York 1940) 498–505. H. J. DESMOND, The A.P.A. Movement (Washington 1912). D. L. KINZER, The American Protective Association: A Study of Anti-Catholicism (University Microfilms 8097; Ann Arbor 1954; Seattle 1964).

[J. L. MORRISON]

AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH

A consortium of Catholic, Protestant, Jewish and non-sectarian institutions and individuals, founded 1900 to promote the study and to extend the knowledge of Biblical literature, and of the history, geography, archaeology, and ancient and modern languages and literatures of Palestine, Mesopotamia, and other Near Eastern regions. It fulfills its purpose by undertaking original research, explorations, and excavations in the Near East. These projects may be carried out by the ASOR alone, in cooperation with other institutions, or jointly. The organization also provides opportunities for qualified students to pursue research at its three overseas research centers in Jerusalem (Israel), Amman (Jordan) and Nicosia (Cyprus).

Since its inception in 1900, membership in ASOR has grown to number 140 universities, colleges, seminaries and museums in North American, and some 1,500 individuals by the end of 2000. It disseminates important findings in its journals and publications—the Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, the Journal of Cuneiform Studies, Near Eastern Archaeology, the Annual and several monograph series. Research by the Jerusalem School has yielded much new knowledge concerning the early history of the alphabet and of Jewish, Islamic and early Christian archaeology. Representatives of the Jerusalem School have been outstanding in the research and exploration connected with the DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

Bibliography: P. J. KING, "American Archaeological Heritage in the Near East," American Schools of Oriental Research

Bulletin 217 (1975) 55–65. P. J. KING, "Diamond Jubilee, American Schools of Oriental Research," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 37 (1975) 370–372. K. J. O'CONNELL, "ASOR Prepares for the Third Millennium," American Schools of Oriental Research Newsletter 45 (spr. 1995) 2–5.

[R. G. VINCENT/EDS.]

AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY

Founded in 1973, the American Society of Missiology (ASM) is dedicated to providing academic and professional support to scholars in the field of mission studies with membership open to professors, leaders of missionary orders and agencies, and missionaries. Founding members included Roman Catholics, conciliar Protestants, and independent Protestants from Canada and the United States. Parity among the traditions is maintained by electing office holders on a rotating basis from each.

In North America, except for Roman Catholics, the term missiology was rarely used before 1960. European Protestants and Roman Catholics understood missiology to be the scientific study of Christian missions while Anglo-American Protestants emphasized the history and practice of missions. The 1960s were a period of crisis for both Protestants and Roman Catholics. Missionary vocations declined among conciliar Protestants and Roman Catholics. Mission training schools were closed and seminaries discontinued chairs of mission studies. Many mission studies programs were consolidated, e.g., the merger of various Catholic mission studies programs at the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago.

A new thrust emerged among evangelical Protestants symbolized by the founding of Fuller Seminary's School of World Mission (1965) and the School of World Mission and Evangelism of Trinity Evangelical Divinity School (1965). These new schools described their programs as applied missiology, but they also recognized the need to develop academically recognized programs.

The ASM was organized to promote the scholarly study of theological, historical, social and practical questions relating to the missionary dimension of the Christian church in terms of: (1) the relationship of missiology to other scholarly disciplines; (2) promoting fellowship and cooperation among individuals and institutions engaged in activities and studies related to missiology; (3) facilitating mutual assistance and exchange of information among those thus engaged; and (4) encouraging research and publication. The work of the society is conducted through an annual meeting held the third week of June. The Association of Professors of Mission (founded 1952) meets annually in conjunction with ASM. Besides conducting the society's official business, the annual meeting provides opportunity for members to meet for study and fellowship. Since 1988 these sessions have been held at the Society of the Divine Word Techny Towers, Techny, Illinois.

ASM has published Missiology: An International Review since 1973, a leading scholarly quarterly in the field of mission studies. Through Norman Thomas, book review editor of Missiology, 1985 to 1999, ASM has participated in several bibliography projects, including the international Documentation, Archives and Bibliography (DAB) and a comprehensive annotated bibliography of the 12,500 most important books published in the field of missiology between 1960 and 1990. The latter was published in cooperation with the American Theological Library Association (ATLA) Series. In addition, since 1980, 30 titles have been published in the ASM/Orbis Books series. Several of these works have become standard works in the field of mission studies, including David J. Bosch, Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in the Theology of Mission (1991) and Louis Luzbetak, SVD, The Church and Cultures: New Perspectives in Missiological Anthropology (1988). In 1997 a dissertation series was started.

Bibliography: W. R. SHENK and G. R. HUNSBERGER, The American Society of Missiology: The First Quarter Century (Decatur, Georgia 1998).

[W.R. SHENK]

AMERICANISM

The name given to certain doctrines reprobated by Leo XIII in his apostolic letter Testem benevolentiae of Jan. 22, 1899. The pope carefully excluded from condemnation the legitimate use of the word to signify "the characteristic qualities which reflect honor on the people of America." As indicated in the papal letter, the censured doctrines had been discussed in France as a result of the French translation and adaptation of The Life of Isaac Thomas Hecker by Walter ELLIOTT, CSP. The basic principle of the censurable Americanism was that the Church should modify her doctrines to suit modern civilization, to attract those not of the faith to the Church, passing over some less attractive doctrines and adapting the Church's teachings to popular theories and methods. Leo summarized five specific errors: the rejection of external spiritual direction as no longer necessary; the extolling of natural over supernatural virtues; the preference of active over passive virtues; the rejection of religious vows as not compatible with Christian liberty; and the adoption of a new method of apologetics and approach to non-Catholics.

U.S. Elements. While the immediate controversy that brought about the papal letter existed chiefly in France it also had roots in the U.S. Bishops and priests there were divided between those who advocated greater Catholic participation in American public life, particularly the public movements for social and economic reform, and the more conservative group who thought American life was Protestant and tainted with the liberalism condemned in the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS of Pius IX. In November of 1886 certain German priests led by Father P. M. ABBELEN, of Milwaukee, Wis., presented a petition to the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith in Rome, protesting the treatment of foreign language groups and members of national parishes in the U.S. Bishops (later Archbishops) John IRELAND, of St. Paul, Minn., and John J. KEANE, then of Richmond, Va., in Rome at the time to prepare for the foundation of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., published a refutation of the Abbelen petition and sent a warning to Cardinal James GIBBONS, of Baltimore, Md. Gibbons called a meeting of the eastern archbishops in Philadelphia, Pa., on December 19, to protest the petition, which was rejected by the Congregation of Propaganda June 8, 1887.

In 1890 and 1891 certain European societies interested in immigrants to the U.S. met in Lucerne, Switzerland, under the chairmanship of Peter Paul CAHENSLEY, and petitioned Rome for better representation of foreign nationalities in the American hierarchy. Archbishop Ireland protested publicly. At a meeting of the National Educational Association in St. Paul in 1890, he praised the public schools and expressed regret that there had to be separate Catholic schools. When he inaugurated the FARBULT and Stillwater school plans to get state aid, he was accused of being opposed to Catholic parochial schools. After defending himself at the meeting of the archbishops in 1891 at St. Louis, Mo., he went to Rome to clarify his position on the school question.

In these controversies Ireland's chief associates were John J. Keane, since 1889 rector of Catholic University, and Denis O'Connell, rector of the North American College in Rome. The leaders of the conservatives were Abp. Michael A. CORRIGAN, of New York, and Bps. Bernard MCQUAID, of Rochester, Winand WIGGER of Newark, and the German bishops of Wisconsin, especially Abp. Frederick KATZER and Bp. Sebastian MESSMER. Moreover, among the faculty of Catholic University, the chief conservatives were Msgr. Joseph SCHROEDER, Joseph POHLE, and Abbé Georges Périès. Professors supporting Keane were chiefly Thomas BOUQUILLON, Charles P. Grannan, and Edward PACE. Others who supported the conservatives were Thomas PRESTON, vicar-general of New York, and René HOLAIND, SJ. Gibbons, despite his friendship for Ireland, endeavored to keep peace between the two groups. The N.Y. Freeman's Journal, the Northwestern Chronicle of St. Paul, and the Western Watchman of St. Louis supported Ireland. The Review of Chicago and later of St. Louis, edited by Arthur PREUSS; Church Progress, edited by Condé PALLEN of St. Louis; and most of the German Catholic papers opposed Ireland's policies.

European Influence. In France, Ireland and Gibbons were admired by the more progressive Catholics, especially those who had accepted the urging of Leo XIII for a reconciliation between the Church and the French Republic, called the RALLIEMENT. When they invited him to speak in Paris in the spring of 1892, Ireland praised the democracy and civic activities of the American priests and gave them credit for the remarkable progress of the Church in the U.S. After he left France a young lecturer in the Institut Catholique, Abbé Félix KLEIN, gathered a selection of Ireland's speeches and translated them into a small volume published in 1894.

Back in the U.S., Ireland welcomed Abp. Francesco Satolli as the papal legate to the World's Fair in Chicago, and heard Satolli support his program for Catholic schools at the archbishops' meeting in New York in November of 1892. Suddenly, on Jan. 14, 1893, Satolli announced the erection of the Apostolic Delegation to the U.S. in Washington, with himself as the delegate. In September of 1893 the delegate appeared in Ireland's company at the Catholic Columbian Congress in Chicago, but refused to take part in the World's Congress of Religions in which Ireland, Keane, Gibbons, and other Catholics participated against the wishes of the conservatives. Two years later, the delegate announced that Rome had forbidden Catholic participation in further congresses of religions. The occasion of this prohibition was the effort of certain French clergymen to promote such a congress at the Paris World's Fair in 1900. In 1895 O'Connell was forced to resign as rector of the North American College, followed in September of 1896 by Keane's enforced resignation from the rectorship of Catholic University. Keane's supporters in the university in turn brought about the resignation of Schroeder, whom they accused of being the chief factor in the rector's removal.

The Catholic Press. During the next two years, the Catholic press carried frequent exchanges between the two groups, with the conservatives making vague charges that their opponents were guilty of the condemned liberalism of the Syllabus, and the progressives insisting that the conservatives were refractaires, opposing the policies of Leo XIII. In 1890–91, Father Elliott published in the Catholic World, and later in book form, a biography of the founder of the Paulists, Father Isaac HECKER, with an introduction by Archbishop Ireland. Elliott also arranged for a French translation. In 1897 the more progressive Catholics in Paris decided to publish the French translation and asked Klein to shorten it and make it more attractive. He complied, adding an enthusiastic preface in which he praised Hecker as the priest of the future and lauded the American Catholic way of life. The book went quickly into six printings and received wide notice in the religious press.

In addressing the International Scientific Congress in Fribourg, Switzerland, in August of 1897 O'Connell, now rector of Cardinal Gibbon's titular church, Santa Maria in Trastevere, Rome, took as his theme the Americanism in the life of Father Hecker, stressing Hecker's acceptance of American democracy and relations between Church and State. Bp. Charles Turinaz of Nancy, France, demanded permission to answer him. The next fall, beginning November 6, a series of sermons were given in Paris churches by Jesuits who attacked certain dangers to the Church from within, especially "Father Hecker's Americanism." In La Vérité, the conservative Catholic newspaper of Paris, under the pen name "Martel," an article appeared March 3, 1897, entitled "L'Americanism Mystique" and was followed by other articles on "Americanism." "Martel" was Abbé Charles Maignen, a priest of the Society of the Brothers of St. Vincent De Paul, a writer who opposed the ralliement. Abbé Georges Périès, the former professor of Canon Law at The Catholic University of America, under the name "Saint Clement" occasionally contributed an article to the series, but for the most part the articles were composed by Maignen.

The articles ridiculed the claim of Ireland and Klein that Hecker exemplified the priest of the future, and quoted in derision passages from the biography on Hecker's illnesses and his dismissal from the Redemptorists. Maignen also attacked O'Connell's speech at Fribourg, an article by Keane in the Catholic World, some of the articles written to sell the Hecker biography, and the writings of clergymen who had left the Church, such as Abbé Victor Charbonnel. In April other articles in La Vérité described "Les Champaignes de L'Américanisme," and how the Americanists were undermining the defense of the Church. The campaigns included the Congress of Religions; the efforts of Charbonnel to hold a second Congress of Religions at the Paris Fair; the activities of Keane in Rome; an article of M. Brunetière praising American Catholicism in Revue des Deux Mondes; a newspaper story predicting that Cardinal Gibbons would be the next pope; and an article in the Contemporary Review by "Romanus," who Maignen implied was an Americanist.

Maignen found other evidence of the Americanists' doctrines in Keane's addresses at the Congress of Religions and his defense of that congress at the Brussels International Catholic Congress of 1894. Maignen collected these articles, to which he added a few other essays, for a book entitled Études sur l'Américanisme, Le Père Hecker, est-il un Saint? When Cardinal Richard of Paris refused his imprimatur to the book, Maignen took it to Rome, where he obtained the imprimatur of the Master of the Sacred Palace, Père Albert Lepidi, OP, which some interpreted as a papal approval of the book. The controversy over the biography and the movement vaguely described as Americanism raged through the French Catholic press and was mentioned in the secular press. The discussion reached into Belgium. Some discussions appeared also in Germany, and then the controversy moved into Italy, where it became confused with the local quarrel over the temporal power of the papacy.

Testem Benevolentiae. Leo XIII opposed the move to put the Hecker biography on the Index and appointed a committee of cardinals to study the question. The committee reported adversely on the doctrines called "Americanism." The pope changed the report in its opening and closing passages so that no one was accused of holding the condemned doctrines, and the ordinary political and social Americanism were exempted from the disapproval. Although Gibbons sent a cable to stop the condemnation and Ireland rushed to Rome, both arrived too late to head off the papal letter, Testem benevolentiae, which was dated Jan. 22, 1899. Ireland, Keane, and Klein immediately submitted but denied that they held the condemned doctrines. The Hecker biography was withdrawn from sale. The conservative bishops in the U.S. thanked the pope for saving the American Church from the dangerous doctrines. Gibbons, to whom the pope's letter was addressed, denied in his reply that any educated American Catholic held the condemned doctrines.

Bibliography: T. T. MCAVOY, The Great Crisis in American Catholic History 1895-1900 (Chicago 1957) with annotated bibliography in "Essay on Sources."

[T. T. MCAVOY]

AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

Americans United is an advocacy group working through education, research, litigation, and lobbying to encourage the maintenance of a strict, Jeffersonian interpretation of church-state separation. Originally named Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Americans United was founded in 1947 in the aftermath of the Supreme Court's Everson decision. That decision, permitting the use of public funds to provide transportation for parochial school students, and the presidential nomination of General Mark Clark as ambassador to the Vatican in 1951 served as symbols of the decline of Protestant hegemony in the United States and galvanized opposition to the growing influence of Catholicism among those who assumed that a stronger Catholic Church would threaten church-state separation.

Americans United was launched with the publication of a manifesto signed by many prominent Protestant churchmen setting forth its objectives: enlightenment of public opinion on religious liberty, prevention of further breaches in the wall of separation between Church and State, opposition to diplomatic relations with the Vatican, repeal of laws granting public funds to parochial schools, invoking the aid of the courts in maintaining the separation of Church and State, opposition to federal aid to parochial schools, and protection of the public schools from sectarian domination. Though its original name suggests a close tie to Protestant churches, Americans United is an independent association that draws its support from a variety of individuals and groups sharing its interest in the church-state issue. Its activities are informed by commitment to a strict interpretation of the establishment and free exercise clauses of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and its support derives from those who fear the encroachment of government in the affairs of the churches as well as those troubled by the involvement of churches in the affairs of state.

Americans United initially focused on what it perceived to be the Catholic threat to church-state separation. It judged the Catholic Church to be hostile to the concept of church-state separation as enunciated in the First Amendment and was particularly troubled by efforts to secure public funding for parochial schools either directly or through funding for transportation, textbooks, special education, etc. As recently as the 1960 presidential election, Americans United posed "Questions for a Catholic Candidate," compelling John Kennedy to explicate his commitment to church-state separation and the common schools and his opposition "to the federal government's extending support to sustain any church or its schools." At least three events of the 1960s combined to alter the national discourse on church-state issues. First was the election of the nation's first Catholic president and his maintenance of a church-state posture that many Protestants regarded as their own. Another was the Second Vatican Council and its decisive "Declaration on Religious Freedom," which served to assure critics that Catholicism could support a liberal society in which

Church and State were separate. Finally, the Great Society programs of the Lyndon Johnson administration greatly enlarged the sphere of church-state interrelationships in broad areas of social services and higher education and compelled Protestant churches to face problems that had hitherto appeared to be uniquely Catholic.

In the 1990s, the picture was complicated by the emergence on the conservative wing of Protestantism of churches and organizations advocating governmental support for religiously based moral values and sometimes for religious schools. As a result of these fundamental changes, Americans United cannot now, if it ever could, be regarded as the voice of Protestantism. Nor is it now likely to be regarded as simply anti-Catholic, in the light of its strident rhetoric against faith-based initiatives by the State. In continuing its traditional advocacy of strict separation, Americans United has turned its focus to perceived threats to church-state separation from Protestant and governmental sources.

The organization's monthly magazine, Church and State, includes articles, reviews, editorials, accounts of state and federal governmental activities, and news of interesting activities and statements relative to the church-state issue. Its head office is in Washington, D.C.

Bibliography: G. L. ARCHER and A. J. MENENDEZ, The Dream Lives On: The Story of Glenn L. Archer and Americans United (Washington 1982); Church and State (Silver Spring, Md. 1948–). L. P. CREEDON and W. D. FALCON, United for Separation: An Analysis of POAU Assaults on Catholicism (Milwaukee, Wis. 1959). R. F. DRINAN, Religion, the Courts, and Public Policy (New York 1963). C. S. LOWELL, The Great Church-State Fraud (Washington 1973). E. A. SMITH, Religious Liberty in the United States (Philadelphia, Pa. 1972). M. S. STEDMAN, JR., Religion and Politics in America (New York 1964). R. BOSTON, "Watchdog on the Wall: The Americans United Story," Church and State 50 (Nov. 1997) 223–226.

[S. C. PEARSON/EDS.]

AMESHA SPENTA

"The Beneficent Immortals," as they are called in the Avesta. According to the teaching of Zoroaster they are the "archangels" of Ahura Mazda. From the Indo-Iranian period, the classes and functions of society were threefold, and each had divine patrons. The most important function, sovereignty, had as patrons two principal gods, Varuna, guardian of the True Order, and Mitra (the Contract, the Friend). In Zoroaster's system, Ahura Mazda combines the two aspects of sovereignty. However, this function, like the other functions, continues to be under a hierarchy of archangels in which the True Order, Arta, holds the highest place, above Vohu Manah (Good Mind), which holds the position previously held by Mitra. The second function, physical force and fighting, had Indra as patron. In Zoroaster's system, Khshathra (Dominion) corresponds to it, while Indra himself persists as a daēva. The third function, fecundity, had as patron a variable and multivalent goddess, to whom the archangel Ārmaiti (Devotion) corresponds. The counterparts of the twin patrons, Nāsatya (Healers), are the archangels Haurvatāt and Ameretāt (Health and non-Death). One of the twins survived as a daēva named Nāonhaithya. Also there is the god Vāyu (Cosmic Wind), a kind of Janus, ruling over ambiguous beginnings, which in Zoroaster became the initial Choice between Good and Evil, represented by the two Mainyus or Spirits, Spenta Mainyu (the Beneficent or Holy Spirit) and Anra Mainyu (the Destructive Spirit).

See Also: DAEVAS; PERSIAN RELIGION, ANCIENT; ZOROASTER (ZARATHUSTRA).

Bibliography: G. DUMÉZIL, Les Dieux des Indo-Européens (Brussels 1952); L'Idéologie tripartite des Indo-Européens (Brussels 1958). J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN, La Religion de l'Iran ancien (Paris 1962).

[J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN]

AMETTE, LÉON ADOLPHE

Cardinal, archbishop of Paris; b. Douville (Eure), Sept. 6, 1850; d. Antony (Seine), Aug. 29, 1920. Born in very modest circumstances, he studied at the seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Paris, was ordained (1873), and became a private secretary to Bishop Grolleau of Evreux (1873) and then vicar-general under a succession of bishops (1889–98). He became bishop of Bayeux (1898); coadjutor to Cardinal RICHARD DE LA VERGNE of Paris (Feb. 21, 1906), whom he succeeded (Jan. 28, 1908); and cardinal (Nov. 27, 1911). In both sees he had to confront the results of the law separating Church and State (1905) but he adopted a peaceful attitude toward the civil power in order to prepare a reconciliation. During World War I he was a promoter of the Union sacrée and frequently served as intermediary between the French government and the Holy See. In his archdiocese he erected 16 new parish churches and 29 chapels and gave a great impetus to diocesan works. Amette was very pious, a Dominican tertiary, and a talented orator. He published a number of his pastoral letters and sermons as well as several short tracts on varied religious topics and current problems.

Bibliography: C. CORDONNIER, Le Cardinal Amette, archevêque de Paris, 2 v. (Paris 1949). J. RUPP, Histoire de l'Église de Paris (Paris 1948) 303–311. H. CHOMON, Dictionnaire de biographie française (Paris 1929—) 2:637–640.

[R. LIMOUZIN-LAMOTHE]

AMIAS, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Wakefield, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, March 15, 1589. After the death of his wife (sometimes given as Anne), John Amias, a textile merchant, divided his property among his children and left for the Catholic College at Rheims. There he was ordained in 1581. Thereafter he labored in the English Mission until his arrest in the home of a Mr. Murton in Lancashire. Taken to York, he was tried in company with two other martyrs, Bb. Robert Dalby and Robert DIBDALE. Anthony (Dean) Champney, who was present at their execution, has left an account in his history. Other accounts note that he went to death “as joyfully as if to a feast.” He was declared venerable in 1886, and beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891) 331.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

AMICE

A rectangular piece of linen used to wrap around the neck and shoulders of the wearer to protect the outer liturgical garments from being soiled by the face and neck. In medieval days, the alb was the first vestment to be put on. The amice was added as a scarf, part of which covered the head, keeping the hair in place until the stole and chasuble were put on and arranged properly. There was no common usage as to when the amice thus worn should be brought back off the head. Some removed it after putting on the chasuble; others kept it on the head until the beginning of the Canon of the Mass. When resting on the shoulders the amice was thought to look untidy. This problem was taken care of by the ornamentation of the upper edge with a band of stiff, rich material, or a narrow strip of embroidery that formed a collar called Aurifrisium or apparel. In the wake of the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, the use of the amice is no longer required.

Bibliography: E. A. ROULIN, Vestments and Vesture, tr. J. MCCANN (Westminster, Md. 1950). J. BRAUN, Die liturgischen Parameter in Gegenwart und Vergangenheit (2d ed. Freiburg 1924); Die liturgische Gewandung im Occident und Orient (Freiburg 1907).

[M. MCCANCE]

AMICO, FRANCESCO

Jesuit theologian; b. Naples, April 5, 1578; d. Graz, Austria, Jan. 31, 1651. He entered the Society of Jesus on Oct. 27, 1596, and after teaching the humanities, philosophy, and theology, he became chancellor of the University of Graz. Adapting his theological treatises to a four years' course of seminary teaching, he wrote his famous Cursus theologici juxta scholasticam hujus temporis methodum. The fifth volume of this work (De iure et iustitia) contained three propositions censured by the Congregation of the Index, June 18, 1651, and later condemned by Alexander VII and Innocent XI [H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 2037, 2132–33]. A decree of July 6, 1655, permitted the reading of a corrected edition of the work, such as the Antwerp edition of 1650.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 1:280–282. E. M. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:1234. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:933–934.

[F. C. LEHNER]

AMIDISM

A form of Mahāyāna Buddhism popular among the laity and especially important in Japan. It was founded by the Pure Land (Ch'ing T'u) or Lotus School in China in the 4th century A.D., if not earlier. Its three basic tenets are contained in three Sanskrit sūtras that were translated into Chinese, whence they passed into Japanese. Amida is the Japanese adaptation of the Sanskrit epithets of Buddha: Amitābha, “immeasurable light,” and Amitāyus, “immeasurable life.” The idea of the Pure Land is central in the Chinese Lotus School and in the Jōdo (Pure Land) doctrine developed in Japan in the 12th and 13th centuries. Salvation is offered to all men who have faith in Amida and invoke his name as “the Lord of immeasurable light and immeasurable life.” Through this faith and repeated invocation the humblest layman is assured a rebirth in the Pure Land, the Western paradise. Amidism is the largest Buddhist sect in Japan.

See Also: BUDDHISM.

Bibliography: R. MASUNAGA, “Amida,” F. KÖNIG, ed., Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch 47–48. J. A. HARDON, Religions of the World (Westminster, MD 1963) 124–126. A. LLOYD, The Creed of Half Japan (New York 1912). H. DE LUBAC, Amida (Paris 1955). F. KIICHI, “Die Jōdo-Lehre,” Christus und die Religionen der Erde, ed. F. KÖNIG (Vienna 1961) 3:428–432. A. HAUCHECORNE, “Les Religions du Japon” in Histoire des religions, ed. M. BRILLANT and R. AIGRAIN, v.2 (Paris 1954) 212–215.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

AMIENS

City on both banks of the Somme River in north France; capital of Somme department, which comprises the present diocese, and of Picardy, which comprised the medieval diocese.

The Celtic Samarobriva was the capital of the Gallic Ambiani, in the Roman province of Belgica II c. 400. Its commercial, military, and industrial importance meant an early Christian evangelization, but neither dates nor data can be assigned to the two SS. FIRMIN, traditionally the first apostles of Amiens. The first St. Firmin seems to have been a traveling missionary from Navarre who left traces in Pamplona, Agen, Clermont, ANGERS, BEAUVAIS, and Amiens, where he is supposed to have been martyred c. 303; his relics may have been translated to Pamplona (1186) after Philip II Augustus added Amiens to the French realm in 1185. Amiens considers him the founder and first bishop of its church. There is also a tradition of the evangelization of Amiens from Rome, marked by the martyrdoms of SS. Fuscian, Victorinus, and Quentin.

St. MARTIN OF TOURS cut his cape to give half of it to a poor man; the site was marked by a chapel that became the Abbey of Saint-Martin-aux-Jumeaux (1073). No bishops are known between Eulogius (346) and Edibius (511). Until the 11th century Amiens, a prize for Normans (859, 881, 883, 891) and a strong-point in the war between Flanders and Normandy, kept within its Roman walls. Bishop Jesse (799–830, 833–834) was one of Charlemagne's missi. The bishop c. 1000 shared seigniorial rights with the count, who in the 12th century was his vassal. Episcopal holdings, shared with the chapter, were few outside the city, where the Abbeys of CORBIE (622) and SAINT-RICQUIER (625) held most of the land; in 1301 the bishop disposed of far fewer benefices than did the abbeys. St. Simon, count of Amiens (1072–77), became a monk at St. Claude in the Jura mountains and died in Rome (1082). PETER THE HERMIT, preacher of the First Crusade, was from Amiens. Bishop St. Godefroy (1104–15) supported church reform. When the cathedral was built (1220–69), Amiens was a town rich from the cloth trade.

Picardy was a center of Calvinism, combated by Bp. Geoffroy de la Marthonie (1577–1601). A seminary was founded in 1655. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685), many of the Huguenots fled to London and Edinburgh. Jansenism was opposed by Bps. François Faure (1653–87), Pierre Sabatier (1706–34), and François Gabriel d'Orléans de la Motte (1734–74). Only two clerics were executed during the French Revolution, when Amiens was a Constitutional see under ROUEN. The CONCORDAT OF 1801 made Amiens, united with Beauvais and Noyon, suffragan to PARIS. In 1822 it became suffragan to Reims again. The major seminary was reorganized in 1805, the minor in 1828. Most of the 12 bishops of the 19th century were in transit to other sees. Pastoral problems differ in the many agricultural villages and in industrial centers.

The beautiful Gothic cathedral ranks with Reims and Chartres; built by the architect Robert de Luzarches, it has five monumental portals (three on the west façade and two at ends of the transept) and two towers 215 feet high. Its treasure includes a replica of a relic of the head of St. John the Baptist brought from Constantinople (1206). Former abbeys include the Benedictine Saint-Valery (613), Saint-Sauve in Montreuil (7th century), Saint-Josse-sur-Mer (793), Forestmontier (10th century), Saint-Fuscien (1105), and Saint-Vast in Moreuil (1109) for men; and Sainte-Austreberte in Montreuil (7th century), Bertaucourt (1095), and Saint-Michel in Doullens (12th century) for women; the Cistercian Le Gard, Cercamp, Valloire (all 1137), and Lieu-Dieu (1191) for men; and Villancourt (12th century), Épagne (1178), and the Paraclet (1219) for women; the Augustinian Saint-Acheul (1085) and Clerfay (1136) for men; and the Premonstratensian Saint-Jean (1115), Dommartin (1120), Séry (1127), Selincourt (1131), and Saint-André-au-Bois (12th century).

Bibliography: H. MACQUERON, Bibliographie du département de la Somme, 2 v. (Amiens 1904–07). A. DE CALONNE, Histoire de la ville d'Amiens, 3 v. (Amiens 1899–1906). H. PELLETIER, Histoire religieuse de la Picardie (Abbeville 1961). F. I. DARSY, Bénéfices de l'église d'Amiens, 2 v. (Amiens 1869–71). G. DURAND, Monographie de l'église Notre-Dame, cathédral d'Amiens, 3 v. (Amiens 1901–03). Cartulaire du chapitre de la cathédral d'Amiens, 2 v. (Amiens 1905–12). F. VERCAUTEREN, Étude sur les civitates de la Belgique seconde (Brussels 1934). H. P. EYDOUX, Réalités et énigmes de l'archéologie (2d ed. Paris 1964). M. GODET, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:1254–72. E. JARRY, Catholicisme 1:466–469. G. BARDY, ibid. 4:1318–19. Annuario Pontificio (1965) 29.

[J. ESTIENNE]

AMIOT, JEAN JOSEPH MARIE

Missionary to China; b. Toulon, Feb. 8, 1718; d. Peking, Oct. 8, 1793. He entered the Jesuits in 1737 and spent 42 years as a priest in China. He was a prolific writer on Chinese and Tartar art and history. As an astronomer and mathematician he served at the court of the Emperor Ch'ien Lung. His Paris correspondent, Bertin, published many of his writings in Memoires concernant l'histoire des Chinois, par les missionnaires de Pekin (16 v. 1776–1814), of which volume 12 is his study of Confucius, based on the best Chinese accounts of the philosopher. Amiot translated a history of Chinese music and compiled a Manchu–French dictionary. The Manchu grammar attributed to him is a translation and abridgement of a Latin work, probably by F. Verbiest.

Amish farmers, 1986, Lancaster County Pennsylvania. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Bibliography: H. CORDIER, La Grande encyclopédie, 2:758–759. E. M. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:1275–77. H. CHOMON, Dictionnaire de biographie française (Paris 1929—) 2:674–677. Enciclopedia de la Religión Católica, 7 v. (Barcelona 1951–56) 1:567. J. A. OTTO, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:439.

[B. LAHIFF]

AMISH CHURCHES

Amish churches are a reform group founded under the leadership of a Swiss Mennonite bishop, Jacob Amman, who withdrew from the Mennonite fellowship in 1693, accusing his fellow MENNONITES of laxity in doctrine and practice. In particular he advocated the strict enforcement of “shunning” excommunicated persons. Following this practice, the Amish avoid all social interaction with such persons, even if they are members of their own family.

Amish immigrants began arriving in America in 1720. They settled in Pennsylvania and later in Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Nebraska, and Canada. They were popularly known as the “hooks and eyes” Mennonites because they oppose the use of buttons. The Old Order Amish refuse to use such inventions as electricity, telephones, radio and television, and automobiles. They wear plain black clothing, drive horse-drawn buggies, insist on marriage within the sect, oppose participation in war, and try to educate their children in their own schools up to the eighth grade. The men cut their hair in a bob and let their beards grow; the women wear capes and bonnets. Amish farmers attempt to preserve their Swiss-German culture and continue to speak their own “Pennsylvania Dutch” dialect.

The Old Order Amish Mennonite Church was organized in 1865. Church government is of the congregational type, and there are three grades of clergy: Voll Diener (bishop), Diener zum Buch (preacher), and Armen Diener (deacon), all of whom are chosen by lot. Biweekly morning services of worship are held, including hymns, sermons, scriptural reading, testimonies, liturgical prayers, and benediction. During the benediction, everyone genuflects when the name of Jesus Christ is mentioned. Afternoon meetings are scheduled only on the days when the Lord's Supper is celebrated; then the service is in two parts—before and after dinner. The Old Order Amish worship in private homes, subscribe to the Confession of Dortrecht (1632), prescribe strict shunning of backsliders, and try to remain free from the secular community.

Over a period of years some Amish separated from the Old Order Amish and formed the Conservative Mennonite Conference. They held their first conference at Pigeon, Mich., in 1910. These Amish introduced meetinghouses, Sunday schools, and the use of English in worship. They use modern conveniences and cooperate with the larger Mennonite Church.

A smaller group of Amish who also left the parent body formed the Beachy Amish Mennonite Churches. This schism originated in Somerset County, Pa., in 1927 and was led by Bp. Moses M. Beachy. The Beachy Amish have abandoned restrictions against modern inventions and offer a mitigated discipline.

Bibliography: J. A. HOSTETLER, Amish Society (Baltimore, Md. 1963). C. G. BACHMAN, The Old Order Amish of Lancaster County (Lancaster, Pa. 1961). The Mennonite Encyclopedia, ed. H. S. BENDER and C. H. SMITH, 4 v. (Scottsdale, Pa. 1955–60). D. B. KRAYBILL and M. A. OLSHAN, eds., The Amish Struggle with Modernity (Hanover, N.H. 1994).

[W. J. WHALEN]

AMMANATI DE' PICCOLOMINI, JACOPO

Cardinal, patron of the arts, papal official; b. Villa Basilica near Lucca, Italy, March 8, 1422; d. San Lorenzo, Sept. 10, 1479. Jacopo Ammanati, who came from a poor family, owed his advancement to his classical studies in Florence. Cardinal Domenico Capranica made him his private secretary in 1450. Subsequently, he became secretary of briefs under CALLISTUS III and PIUS II. Pius valued him highly, adopting him into the Piccolomini family, and investing him with the rights of a citizen of Siena. In turn he had great admiration for Pius and wrote a continuation of his Commentarii, which gives much information about the intrigues in the papal court. He was named bishop of Pavia in 1460 and cardinal in 1461. He soon disagreed with PAUL II and was even imprisoned on a charge of conspiracy. In 1470 he was transferred to Lucca and named papal delegate to Umbria. Pope SIXTUS IV sent him as legate to Perugia in 1471. He was a conscientious ecclesiastic and a Christian humanist.

Bibliography: S. PAULI, Disquisizione storica della patria, e compendio della vita di Giacomo Ammanati Piccolomini (Lucca 1712). G. CALAMARI, Il confidente di Pio II, 2 v. (Rome 1932). J. WODKA, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:439–440.

[N. G. WOLF]

AMMIANUS, MARCELLINUS

Roman historian; b. Antioch, between A.D. 325 and 335; d. probably in Rome, c. 400. A Greek of a prominent upper-middle-class family, he served as a military officer under Ursicinus in Italy, on the Rhine, and in the East (353–360); took part in the Persian campaign of JULIAN THE APOSTATE (363); spent time in Antioch; and settled in Rome after 378. Intense Roman patriotism led him to write in Latin and fill the void after Tacitus. His Res gestae in 31 books runs from Nerva to the death of Valens (96–378); extant are books 14 (353) to 31, published between 392 and 397.

Ammianus's sources were his memory, notes, interrogations of eyewitnesses (often mentioned by name), and a complex variety of written material. His general accuracy is great as checked against the independent history of Faustus of Byzantium. His knowledge of ancient history and literature is impressive. The History reveals a general "faithfulness to facts, based on clear proofs." He is usually objective and fair-minded. Closeness to Ursicinus sometimes clouded his judgment, and he did not do complete justice to Gallus, but his eulogistic tone toward Julian did not blind him to that emperor's faults. The oppression of the pagans by THEODOSIUS I (392) made Ammianus cautious in treating him and his family. His many, though frequently uncritical, excursions reflect in part his wide travel. His tone is critical of the luxury of the times, but he was blind to the real decline of Rome and the seriousness of the barbarian threat. In style, he shows best in his excellent characterizations and the vitality of his dramatic narratives, but he is often excessively rhetorical. His language is diffuse and poetical, anticipating the style of the literature of the century to follow.

A pagan, Ammianus is respectful of martyrs and generally fair to Christianity insofar as it is a "plain and simple religion." Although critical of Julian for an edict against Christian teachers of rhetoric, he is just as critical of ecclesiastical politics, the "deadly hatred" of Christians for one another, the bloody rivalry of specific bishops, and the widespread luxury of the urban hierarchy. De Labriolle classes him with those cultured pagans, so numerous at the time, who from contempt or indifference looked at the contemporary Christian revolution without understanding it or being impressed by it. For all his limitations, Ammianus is one of the greatest of the Roman historians.

Bibliography: Rerum gestarum libri, ed. C. U. CLARK, 2 v. (Berlin 1910–15); Latin–English edition, ed. and tr. J. C. ROLFE, 3 v. (Loeb Classical Library, rev. ed. 1950–1956). E. A. THOMPSON, The Historical Work of Ammianus Marcellinus (Cambridge, Eng. 1947). M. L. W. LAISTNER, The Greater Roman Historians (Berkeley 1947) 141–161, 180–183. P. C. DE LABRIOLLE, La Réaction païenne (6th ed. Paris 1942) 433–436. G. B. PIGHI, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)—] 1:386–394.

[W. R. F. TONGUE]

AMON

National god of Egypt. His name is spelled also as Amun. Amon was originally one of the local gods of THEBES (Noh), but when that city became prominent in the Twelfth Dynasty (1991–1786 B.C.), he became the chief god of Thebes, which then became known as No-Amon (City of Amon), as it is called in Nehemiah 3.8; see also Jeremiah 46.25. ST. JEROME translated nō' 'āmôn in Nehemiah 3.8 erroneously as Alexandria populorum (Alexandria of the nations); therefore Amon's name does not appear in the Vulgate. In the Eighteenth Dynasty (1570–c. 1304) Amon emerged as the supreme god of the whole nation, having been identified with RA (Re) the sun-god and called Amon-Ra, “the King of the gods.” The main sanctuary of Amon was the enormous temple in the section of Thebes now known as Karnak, but he was worshiped throughout Egypt and even in Libya and Nubia (Biblical Ethiopia). His wife Mu (the mother) and his son Chonsu (the wanderer, i.e., the moon) formed a triad of gods. Amon's name (Egyptian i'mn, “hidden”) stresses his mysterious and inscrutable nature; he was difficult to find and was often associated with the invisible wind that could only be heard and that, as breath, was the mysterious source of life in man and beast. Amon was also worshiped under several names with different attributes. As Khen or Kin he was the god of reproduction, and as Khnum he was “the maker of gods and men.” He was sometimes represented by a human body with the head of a ram, the animal sacred to him, or simply by a pair of ram's horns. More often, however, he was featured in wholly human form with two long feathers on his head. The Greeks and Romans identified Amon with Zeus or Jupiter and called the Egyptian city of Thebes Διόσπολις (city of Zeus).

See Also: EGYPT, ANCIENT, 1

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN, (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 70–71. H. JACOBSON, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 1:327. H. STOCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Friburg 1957–65) 1:464. K. SETHE, Amun und die acht Urgötter von Hermopolis [Abhandlungen der Deutschen (Preussischen, to 1944) Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin 4; 1929]. J. A. WILSON, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago 1951) 130–131, 169–172. H. FRANKFORT, Ancient Egyptian Religion (New York 1961).

[H. MUELLER]

AMORRITES

This name suggests that the Amorrites (Amorites) of the OT were the same as the Amorrites who invaded Mesopotamia and Syria c. 2000 B.C. At the time of the invasion they were a nomadic people; Egyptian paintings represent them with short beards and dressed in sandals and varicolored tunics. They became urbanized in ancient MESOPOTAMIA, and the OT does not represent them as nomadic. The name is connected with Sumerian MAR.TU and Akkadian Amurru, “west”; Amurru appears in Assyrian records only as a geographical designation. Hence the name must have entered the Israelite vocabulary from Mesopotamia, since the Amorrites did not enter Palestine from the west. The term in Syria and Palestine has its own meaning, which is not derived from Mesopotamian usage. In the AMARNA LETTERS, Amurru signifies both a geographical district in Syria (north of modern Beirut) and a state ruled by Abdi-Ashirta that does not clearly lie in the same geographical district. The Hittite King Mursilis made a treaty with Duppi-Tešub, King of Amurru; the name of this ruler is not Amorrite. The district of Amurru was the objective of a campaign of Seti I of Egypt (1318–1301 B.C.).

Data on Amorrites in Syria and Palestine do not indicate such a wide diffusion as is suggested by Biblical occurrences of the name. The Amorrites are classified with certain Canaanite tribes as sons of Canaan and descendants of Ham (Gn 10.16). The classification is geographical, however, not ethnic; the Amorrites lived in the territory of Canaan but were not of the same ethnic origin as the Canaanites. They are mentioned as living near the Dead Sea at Hasason-Thamar (Gn 14.7), and Mamre is called an Amorrite (Gn 14.13). Mamre, however, is not a personal name but a place name. There are signs that Genesis ch. 14 does not preserve historical memories in their purity. SHECHEM is called an Amorrite city, but only once (Gn 48.22). Other data are not entirely consistent. The Amorrites dwelt in the mountains (the central highlands of Palestine) while the Canaanites dwelt in the Jordan Valley and on the coastal plain (Nm 13.29). The Amorrite kings of western Palestine mentioned in the narratives of the conquests of Joshua resided in the highlands (Jos 5.1; 10.5–7). According to Jgs 1.34–35, on the other hand, the Amorrites of the coastal plain prevented the tribe of Dan from expanding westward and retained cities which they held in the foothills of the central highlands. In Nm 21.21–23 there is an Amorrite kingdom of eastern Palestine east of the Dead Sea and north of the Arnon. It is to be noted, however, that the tradition placed the fall of this kingdom before the Israelite settlement in Palestine. A later writer connects Jerusalem with the Amorrites (Ez 16.3, 45). Hence the Amorrites appear to be distributed over much of the territory of Palestine.

The identity of these Amorrites with the Amorrites of Mesopotamia would be more assured if a representative number of their personal names were mentioned in the Bible. The type of small kingdoms that they established in Palestine corresponds to the type of state that the Amorrites established in northwest Mesopotamia and north Syria. Archeology so far has not disclosed any specifically Amorrite traces; however, the nomadic incursions into Transjordan and the Jordan Valley, particularly at Jericho, that are evidenced for the 21st to 19th centuries B.C. conform very well to what is known of Amorrites from elsewhere. But the allusions to the diffusion of the Amorrites in other sources suit their presence and diffusion in Palestine, where they seem to have survived longer as a distinct group than elsewhere. It is probable that the OT use of the name is somewhat loose, particularly in documents considerably removed in time from the living traditions of the settlements, and that the Amorrites were mistakenly said to have been in some places where they never actually were.

Bibliography: W. F. ALBRIGHT, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2d ed. New York 1957). J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959). J. FINEGAN, Light from the Ancient Past (2d ed. Princeton 1959). K. KENYON, Archaeology in the Holy Land (New York 1960) 135–161.

[J. L. MC KENZIE]

AMORT, EUSEBIUS

Philosopher, theologian; b. Biberhöhe, Bavaria, Nov. 15, 1692; d. Polling, Feb. 5, 1775. He received his early education from the Jesuits at Munich and entered the canons regular at Polling, where in 1717 he was assigned to teach philosophy and, later, theology and Canon Law. In 1722 he founded an influential scientific and literary review, Parnassus boicus, which he continued for some years. Amort spent the years from 1733 to 1735 as theologian to Cardinal Lercari in Rome, where he became acquainted with many distinguished scholars and theologians. Among his correspondents were numbered such men as Benedict XIII and Benedict XIV, cardinals Lercari, Orsi, and Galli, St. Alphonsus Liguori, and Daniel Concina. After his return from Rome, Amort devoted the last 40 years of his life to writing. Seventy volumes came from his pen, embracing an almost encyclopedic range of subjects: philosophy, apologetics, dogmatic, moral, and mystical theology, history, Canon Law, prayer books, catechisms, and hagiography. Engaging in the controversy on PROBABILISM, he sought to maintain a middle course between rigorism and laxism, and he is credited with being a cofounder of EQUIPROBABILISM, inasmuch as St. Alphonsus appealed to his authority in support of that system. He took a very critical view of the Mystical City of God of Mary of AGREDA, against which he devoted the best known of his works, De revelationibus, visionibus et apparitionibus regulae tute. . . (Augsburg 1744), a book that brought him into conflict with the supporters of Mary. Amort also entered into the controversy that was being waged at the time with regard to the authorship of the IMITATION OF CHRIST. He vigorously defended the claims of Thomas à Kempis against the Benedictine champions of Jean Gerson, and filled seven books with his views upon the matter. His more important moral treatises were: Theologia eclectica, moralis et scholastica (4 v. Augsburg 1752), an edition of which, revised by Benedict XIV, was published in Bologna in 1753; Theologia moralis inter regorem et laxitatem media (Augsburg 1739); and Ethica christiana (Augsburg 1758). His Vetus disciplina canonicorum regularium et saecularium (Venice 1748) is still considered a valuable contribution to the history of religious orders.

Bibliography: No thorough biographical study of Amort has been written. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.1:228–232. C. TOUSSAINT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:1115–17. L. HERTLING, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 1:530–531. T. J. SHAHAN, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 1:434–435.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

AMOS, BOOK OF

The third in the series of the 12 MINOR PROPHETS, though actually the earliest one. Although the institution of prophecy was already ancient in the days of Amos, the book bearing his name represents the first written collection of a prophet's oracles, thus ushering in a new epoch in the literature of Israel [see PROPHECY (IN THE BIBLE)]. The book is composed almost wholly of oracles pronounced by Amos in the middle of the 8th century B.C. primarily predicting doom for the Northern Kingdom because of social injustice and perversion of cult, emphasizing as it does Yahweh's ethical demands. It also holds some promise of hope, although this is not elaborated on by the prophet. This article will treat of the book in Israel's history, its division, composition, content, and doctrine.

Historical Setting. About midway in the reign of Jeroboam II (783–743), when Israel had reached the zenith of its recovered prosperity, the spirit of the Lord summoned the shepherd Amos from Thecua, an obscure village on the margin of the desert of Judah, to pronounce impending doom upon the Northern Kingdom (Am 1.1; 7.14). Like the roaring of a lion, as described in 3.8, the message of the prophet resounded through the sanctuary at Bethel and in the gates of the capital. The response was an angry rejection of Amos by officialdom in the person of Amasia, priest of the sanctuary (7.13), as had happened on previous occasions (2.12). Yet the call of Amos to the office of prophet was the providential work of Yahweh; it was neither by reason of personal choice nor inheritance that Amos prophesied at the sanctuary of Bethel. He emphatically denied that he was a prophet by profession, i.e., a member of the prophetic guilds that ministered at the sanctuaries (7.14; see H. H. Rowley, 114–115). Rather, his call was immediately from Yahweh, who had taken him from following the flock and from dressing sycamore trees to prophesy to Israel (7.15). The oracles of Amos were soon written down, probably by a disciple, and, for the first time in Israel, the force of the written word was effectively carrying the prophetic message. The prophetic faith had found a new instrument to convey its message, and succeeding prophets built upon the solid foundation set by Amos.

Division. In an introduction (1.1–2), the editor identifies the prophet and the general period of his ministry, and with a single verse characterizes the tenor of the entire prophecy.

In the first part (1.3–2.16) is presented a series of oracles, all of the same literary construction and directed against the hostile neighbors of Israel. This reaches a dramatic climax in the judgment of the Lord against the Northern Kingdom itself (2.6–16).

The second part (3.1–6.14) contains a collection of oracles that elaborate upon the sinfulness of Israel and the determination of Yahweh to chastise these transgressions. A third group of minatory oracles (8.4–14) logically pertains to this section, but they apparently have been misplaced, since they interrupt the continuity of the passage in which they now stand.

The last part (7–9) is taken up with a succession of visions, each of which depicts a dire punishment about to overtake the people. Inserted after the third vision is a brief biographical account of Amos (7.10–17). A messianic epilogue concludes the book (9.8–15).

Composition. Modern scholarship attributes the bulk of the prophecy to Amos (see W. S. McCullough, 247–248). There is evidence of certain later additions, e.g., the references to Judah (1.2; 2.4–5) and several lyrical passages that may be fragments of a hymn glorifying Yahweh as Lord of the physical universe (4.13; 5.8; 8.9; 9.5–6). The messianic promise of restoration of the “fallen hut of David” at the end of the prophecy (9.8c–15) breathes an optimism difficult to harmonize with what precedes it, which seems to presuppose the destruction of both kingdoms. This messianic part was perhaps added during the Exile. Thus the work as we now possess it comes from the hands of a redactor, probably a disciple of the prophet, who collected the oracles and arranged them in an order that is not necessarily chronological. This work was very likely done in the Southern Kingdom after the fall of Samaria. The text of Amos has been preserved in good condition with a few minor exceptions.

Content and Doctrine. Amos exposes with rustic candor the sins of the wealthy of Samaria, particularly their avarice and greed (2.6; 8.5–6), the perversion of judgment (5.7, 12), oppression of the weak (2.7; 3.10; 5.11), and sensuality (2.7; 6.4–6). These excesses outrage Amos's sense of justice because they are enjoyed at the expense of the defenseless poor of the land.

The sanctuaries of BETHEL, Galgal, and the city of Dan are objects of God's displeasure (4.4–5; 5.5, 21–23; 7.9; 8.10, 14). Here cult is offered to foreign deities (5.26; 8.14) in a kind of syncretism with the religion of Moses. The priests are guilty of fostering formalism in worship rather than a true religion of the heart (5.21–24). Indeed, they have become so self-complacent in their privilege as the chosen people that they have forgotten the obligations that election carries with it (3.2).

Jeroboam II shares this guilt (6.13) and his dynasty will fall (7.9); so too, will the lives of his officials be forfeited (6.1, 7). The whole nation must suffer for the sins of its leaders at the hands of an unnamed oppressor (6.14), which is clearly Assyria (7.17).

A sincere repentance and return to Yahweh could save them (4.6–11). “Seek me, that you may live” is the plaintive refrain of God's last desperate plea (5.4, 6, 14–15). But amidst a people enamoured of luxury, these overtures fall upon deaf ears. Amos, abandoning hope of any true conversion, proclaims a punishment approaching with inexorable certainty (4.12; 5.26–27; 8.3; 9.1–4). In this context, the “DAY OF THE LORD,” longed for by the Israelites as a glorious event, is given a new and terrifying meaning by Amos (5.18, 20). It is henceforth to be a day of wrath when Yahweh will visit just retribution upon all sinners (8.9–14). Intimately allied with this is the inchoate theme of the Remnant of Israel to be spared (3.12; 5.15; 9.8).

The leitmotif of Amos's prophecy is "righteousness," the necessary condition for worship that is acceptable to God (5.24). Amos in insisting upon justice contrasts with his contemporary, Hosea, who extols God's steadfast love (Heb. hesed), a term that never occurs in Amos [See N. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the OT (Philadelphia 1946) 65–69].

Amos professes strict monotheism. Yahweh is the sole ruler of the universe (4.13; 5.8; 8.9, 11). He requites evil among the pagans (1–2), directs the course of the history of Israel as well as the nations (9.7), and uses the Assyrians as His instrument (6.14). His wonderful deeds in behalf of His people, especially in the Exodus (2.10; 3.1; 4.10; 5.25; 9.7), increase the responsibility of the Israelites to observe the moral precepts of the covenant.

Bibliography: G. A. BUTTRICK, ed. The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 1:116–121. W. R. HARPER, Amos and Hosea in International Critical Commentary (New York 1905). R. S. CRIPPS, The Book of Amos in ibid. T. H. SUTCLIFFE, The Book of Amos (London 1955). J. MORGENSTERN, Amos Studies, 3 v. (Cincinnati 1941—). H. H. ROWLEY, "The Nature of Old Testament Prophecy in the Light of Recent Study," The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the O. T. (London 1952). A. NEHER, Amos: Contribution à l'étude du prophétisme (Paris 1950). W. S. MCCULLOUGH, "Some Suggestions about Amos," Journal of Biblical Literature 72 (1953) 247–254. J. D. W. WATTS, "The Origin of the Book of Amos," Expository Times 66 (1954–55) 109–112. A. S. KAPELRUD, Central Ideas in Amos (Oslo 1961). B. VAWTER, The Conscience of Israel (New York 1961) 61–97.

[J. K. SOLARI]

AMPHILOCHIUS OF ICONIUM, ST.

Fourth-century bishop of Iconium, Pisidia; b. Caesarea, c. 340; d. after 394. Amphilochius studied rhetoric under Libanius at Antioch, practiced as a lawyer in Constantinople for six years, and decided to become a hermit. His decision was frustrated by Basil of Caesarea, who forced on him the Diocese of Iconium. As bishop, Amphilochius campaigned against Arianism and the crypto-Manichean ascetical sects of the Apotactites, Encratites, and Messalians.

Basil dedicated his De Spiritu Sancto to Amphilochius, who used it to combat the propaganda of the Macedonians, against whose teachings he summoned a council at Iconium in 376. Amphilochius himself wrote a similar treatise on the Holy Spirit, but it has not been preserved. Basil's letters 190, 218, 188, 199, and 217 were addressed to Amphilochius; but virtually all of Amphilochius's letters and almost his entire literary output have been lost. A notable exception is his synodal letter to the bishops of another province, following the Council of Iconium (376), in which he explicitly defended the divinity of the Holy Spirit (Patrologia Graeca 39:93–98). In 381 Amphilochius attended the Council of Constantinople I; he revisited the capital in 383 and 395, the last time probably shortly before his death and just after presiding at the anti-Messalian Council of Sidon in 394.

His 333 iambic verses to Seleucus are a treatise on the combination of the devout life with contemplative study that was preserved among the works of Gregory of Nazianzus. It has special importance for the history of the canon of the Bible. Eight of his sermons also have been preserved, dealing primarily with liturgical feasts. His authority as a theologian grew during the early fifth century, and all the major councils after Ephesus (431) appeal to him as a source of patristic doctrine.

Feast: Nov. 23.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 39:9–130. K. HOLL, Amphilochius von Ikonium in seinem Verhältnis zu den grossen Kappadoziern (Tübingen 1904; reprinted Darmstadt 1969). G. FICKER, ed., Amphilochiana (Leipzig 1906). Altaner 357–358. J. QUASTEN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:448–449. H. M. WERHAHN, Byzantinische Zeitschrift 47 (1954) 414–418. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:544.

[A. G. GIBSON]

AMPLEFORTH, ABBEY OF

St Laurence's Abbey, Ampleforth, near York, Diocese of Middlesbrough, part of the English Benedictine congregation. The community of St. Laurence traces its descent from the medieval monastic community of Westminster, restored by Queen Mary and finally suppressed in 1559. It was the last monk of the restored Westminster Abbey, Sigebert Buckley, who in 1607 aggregated a group of monks to Westminster, thereby establishing a certain continuity with pre-Reformation English monasticism. Some of these monks helped in the foundation of the monastery of St. Laurence at Dieulouard in Lorraine (1608). This monastery was primarily missionary in character, and most of the monks served as priests to the recusant communities of England. One of them, St. Alban ROE, was canonized among the martyrs of England and Wales. This form of apostolic monasticism has remained at the core of the community's mission, though the seventeenth century also saw the flourishing of a tradition of spirituality inspired by Fr. Augustine Baker. When Dieulouard was forcibly closed in 1793, the monks returned to England, settling at Ampleforth in 1802. The community has continued its missionary work through the care of a number of parishes, and also has developed a school, which in the twentieth century became one of the leading Roman Catholic public schools. It now numbers over 500 pupils, and includes a Junior School at Gilling Castle. The community also has a guest apostolate and offers an annual retreat program. Ampleforth was elevated to an abbey in 1900, and is today a community of over 90 monks. Its foundations include St. Benet's Hall, Oxford (1897), St. Louis Abbey, Missouri (1955), the monastery of Our Lady of Mount Grace, Osmotherley (1994), the monastery of Christ the Word, Zimbabwe (1996), and St Benedict's monastery, Bamber Bridge (1999). From 1963 to 1976 the community was led by Abbot Basil HUME, who thereafter became cardinal archbishop of Westminster. From 1976 to 1984, the abbot was Ambrose Griffiths, who was appointed bishop of Hexham and Newcastle in 1992.

Bibliography: J. MCCANN and C. CARY-ELWES, eds., Ampleforth and Its Origins (London 1952).

[A. MARETT-CROSBY]

AMPULLAE

The diminutive of amphora [properly, amp(h)orula, from amphi, or both, and phero or porto, bear], a small globular flask with two handles for carrying, another name for cruets. The term is used of those clay or glass vessels found at tombs in the catacombs. It is probable that these vessels were used to preserve portions of the oil or perfume used to anoint the bodies of the dead. Another class of this type of vessel was used to preserve oil for the lamps burning at the shrines of martyrs, a custom generally observed in the Middle Ages. Some image or symbol usually identified the saint from whose tomb the ampullae were taken. Several of those containing oil from the tombs of famous Roman martyrs are still preserved at the Cathedral of Monza. These were the gift of Pope Gregory the Great to Queen Theodolinda. A greater number of ampullae of this type were brought to Europe by pilgrims from the tomb of St. Mennas in Egypt. A third class of ampullae made of clay, metal, or glass was used to preserve the oils consecrated by the bishop (Optatus of Milevis, Contra Parmenianum Donatistam 2.19, "Ampulla Chrismatis").

Of the ampullae found in the catacombs, many contained a dark-red sediment that was thought to be blood, thus marking the tomb of a martyr. Negative results obtained by chemical analysis have rendered this theory untenable. The sediment found in a test group of so-called blood vases revealed the presence of elements vastly disproportionate to those that might be found in blood. While it is not improbable that a few of the "ampullae sanguinis" did contain blood, they cannot be considered one of the marks of a martyr's tomb, since a number of such ampullae were found at the tombs of children under seven, and many date from the latter half of the fourth century, long after the era of persecution. Moreover, ampullae have been found in Jewish catacombs, e.g., on the Via Labicana, fastened to the tombs in the same way as in the Christian cemeteries.

Bibliography: F. OPPENHEIMER, The Legend of the Ste. Ampoule (London 1953). C. BAKIRTZIS, "Byzantine Ampullae from Thessaloniki," in The Blessings of Pilgrimage, ed. R. OUSTERHOUT (Urbana, IL 1990) 140–149. M. DUCAN-FLOWERS, "A Pilgrim's Ampulla from the Shrine of St. John the Evangelist at Ephesus," in The Blessings of Pilgrimage, ed. R. OUSTERHOUT (Urbana, IL 1990) 125–139.

[M. A. BECKMANN/EDS.]

AMSDORF, NIKOLAUS VON

Lutheran theologian and bishop, important for the early organization of Protestantism; b. probably Torgau, Dec. 3, 1483; d. Eisenach, May 14, 1565. Amsdorf received his M.A. at the University of Wittenberg and lectured there on philosophy and theology. When Luther arrived at Wittenberg, the two became close friends and coworkers, Amsdorf assisting in the translation of the Bible. Amsdorf became an evangelical preacher in Magdeburg, Goslar, Einbeck, Meissen, and elsewhere. In 1542 Elector John Frederick appointed him first bishop of the Lutheran diocese of Naumburg-Weitz (1542–47), a post that he lost at the outset of the SCHMALKALDIC War. After a period in Weimar, he lived in Eisenach from 1552 until his death, the unofficial leader of the Lutherans there. He was unwavering in holding to a conservative Lutheran position in theology and was instrumental in founding the University of Jena, a Lutheran stronghold.

See Also: GNESIOLUTHERANISM; INTERIMS; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography: Ausgewählte Schriften, ed. O. LERCHE (Gütersloh 1938). O. LERCHE, Amsdorf und Melancthon: Eine kirchengeschichtliche Studie (Berlin 1937). P. BRUNNER, Nikolaus von Amsdorf als Bischof von Naumburg (Gütersloh 1961). F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 1:333–334.

[L. W. SPITZ]

AMYOT, JACQUES

Bishop of Auxerre, one of the four great French prose stylists of the 16th century; b. Melun, France, Oct. 30, 1513; d. Auxerre, Feb. 6, 1593. His parents, it seems, were of some means, and he studied at the Collège de France, graduating at age 19 more as the result of hard work than brilliance. He was at Bourges from 1534 to 1547, teaching Greek and Latin. Francis I, to whom he dedicated his first works, conferred on him the abbey of Bellozane-en-Bray on March 18, 1547 (N.S.; 1546 O.S.). It is not known when or where he was ordained. He was in Rome (1550–51) and performed a diplomatic mission of a few days to the Council of Trent before he became tutor to the sons of Henry II. Charles IX made him grand chaplain of France on Dec. 6, 1560, an office he held until Henry IV deposed him in 1590. He received other royal favors from Charles, including the See of Auxerre in 1570. In 1578 Henry III made him grand chaplain of the Order of the Holy Spirit. Charges that he held Protestant beliefs have not been established. His literary work consists mostly of translations: Histoire aethiopique d'Heliodorus (1547), Sept livres des histoires de Diodore Sicilien (1554), Amours pastorales de Daphnis et Chloé (1559), and Plutarch's Lives and Morals (1559, 1565, 1579), the translation of which by Sir Thomas North in 1579 was used by Shakespeare. Amyot's translations are quite free and contain errors, but it seems that he used the Greek rather than Latin or Italian translations available. The works became very popular and exerted an influence on French moral thought and literary style for some time. Amyot wrote several original works, including prayers before and after Holy Communion, published after his death.

Bibliography: R. STUREL, Jacques Amyot: Traducteur des Vies parallèles de Plutarque (Paris 1908). C. URBAIN and M. CITOLEUX, Dictionnaire de biographie française (Paris 1929) 2:751–761.

[D. R. PENN]

AMYRAUT, MOÏSE

Calvinist theologian; b. Bourgeuil, Touraine, September 1596; d. Saumur, Jan. 8, 1664. He was intended for a legal career and became at 21 a licentiate of law at Poitiers; but, having been introduced to Calvin's Institutes, he studied theology at Saumur under John CAMERON, whose doctrine of divine election he was to develop and defend. After pastorates at Saint-Agnan and Saumur, he was from 1633 a professor in the Saumur academy. For the Synod of Charenton, 1631, he presented King Louis XIII with a memorandum on infractions of the Edict of NANTES. A man of courtly manners, he moved with ease among eminent persons and was on occasion consulted by Richelieu and Mazarin. He was twice acquitted of heresy before national synods of his church. He was a prolific and in his time an influential writer, firm in his principles and courteous to his opponents. His "hypothetic universalism" on divine election is set forth in his Echantillon de la doctrine de Calvin sur la prédestination (c. 1634), and other treatises. His ecumenical proposals appear best in his Εἰρηυκόν (1662), but his whole work is irenic in tone.

Jacques Amyot, engraving. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: E. and É. HAAG, La France protestante, 10 v. (Paris 1846–59) 1:72–80, lists and describes his works. R. STAUFFER, Moïse Amyraut: Un Précurseur français de l'œcuménisme (Paris 1962). O. E. STRASSER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3 1:347–348. J. DEDIEU, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 2:1380–81.

[J. T. MCNEILL]

AN-XING, ANNA, AND COMPANIONS, SS.

Female lay martyrs; b. Anping County, Hebei (Hopeh) Province; d. Hebei Province, China, July 11, 1900. This subgrouping of the Martyrs of China incorporates three generations of the An family: The matriarch Anna An-Xing (also called An Hsin-shih, An Hsin-shih, Nan-Sinn-Cheu, or Nan-Sinn-Cheu; b. 1828); her daughter-in-law Mary An-Guo (also called An-Keo or Nan-Kouo-Cheu; b. 1836); her granddaughter Mary An Linghua (also called Nan Ling-Hoa, b. 1871); and her grandson's wife Anna An-Jiao (also called Nan-Tsiao-Cheu, b. 1874). They were arrested by the Boxers as they sought refuge from the persecutions, and were killed outside the village for refusing to apostatize. They were among the 2,072, killed between June and August 1900, whose causes were submitted to the Vatican, of which 56 were beatified by Pope Pius XII (April 17, 1955) and canonized (Oct. 1, 2000) by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 20.

Bibliography: L. MINER, China's Book of Martyrs: A Record of Heroic Martyrdoms and Marvelous Deliverances of Chinese Christians during the Summer of 1900 (Ann Arbor 1994). J. SIMON, Sous le sabre des Boxers (Lille 1955). C. TESTORE, Sangue e palme sul fiume giallo. I beati martiri cinesi nella persecuzione della Boxe Celi Sud-Est, 1900 (Rome 1955). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ANABAPTISTS

The term Anabaptist, meaning literally “rebaptizer,” occurs from the fourth century onward and was first used to designate those who insisted on the rebaptism of persons baptized by heretics or by clergy who had fallen away from the faith under persecution.

In the sixteenth-century it was applied to those elements in the Reformation movement who denied the validity of infant baptism. It became a pejorative term, used by their Catholic and Protestant opponents to associate them with a heresy condemned for centuries by both ecclesiastical and civil law and incurring the death penalty according to the Justinian Code, and was applied indiscriminately to a heterogeneous group of the “left wing” of the Reformation. The association with DONATISM was inaccurate, since the sixteenth-century Anabaptists were not concerned with the validity of the administration of the Sacrament of Baptism but rather denied its sacramental character. Their attitude toward baptism with water ranged from seeing it as an important act of public confession (e.g., Swiss Brethren) to the denial of the necessity of any physical baptism (e.g., Schwenckfeld). Thus the Schleithem Confession of the Swiss Brethren (1527) states: “Baptism shall be given to all those who have learned repentance and amendment of life, and who believe truly that their sins are taken away by Christ and to all those who walk in the resurrection of Jesus Christ.” By contrast, Caspar Schwenckfeld asserts summarily: “God does not tie his grace to water.” Since the differences among those who rejected infant baptism are vast, it is advisable to divide the so-called Anabaptists into four separate but related groups: (1) New Testament-oriented pacifists, (2) Old Testament-oriented revolutionaries, (3) spiritualists, and (4) rationalists. It should be noted, however, that in the 16th century the lines between these groups were somewhat fluid and that they exerted considerable influence upon each other.

New Testament-oriented Pacifists. This segment had its origin in lay Bible study groups in Zürich, Switzerland (1523–25). The movement was led by men close to ZWINGLI (Conrad GREBEL, Felix Manz, Georg Blaurock, and later Balthasar HUBMAIER), impatient with Zwingli’s hesitation and vacillation in his interpretation and administration of the sacraments, his attitude toward political authority, and the nature of the church. On Jan. 21, 1525, Grebel baptized Blaurock, and “believer’s baptism” became the outward mark of the movement. When those rebaptized were soon expelled from Zürich, they spread their new teaching all over central Europe. Later some, following the example of the early Christian community in Jerusalem (Acts 4.32–35), organized Christian communist communities that have survived to the present (see HUTTERITES). In northern Europe the New Testament-oriented pacifist Anabaptists eventually found an eloquent leader in Menno Simons (1496–1561) (see MENNONITES).

The theology of the group was expressed in the Schleithem Confession. Besides condemning infant baptism and favoring adult baptism as confession of faith, it advocated the “ban” (the strict discipline of the community of the baptized), a memorial view of Holy Communion, complete separation from all who did not share their views, and the refusal to bear arms and participate in political life.

Old Testament-oriented Revolutionaries. This group originated in Zwickau in Saxony (c. 1520) among the impoverished weavers of that town. Led by Nicholas Storch, they were soon joined by Thomas MÜNZER, who became one of their most voluble spokesmen, and participated actively in the Peasant War. While they also opposed infant baptism, they distinguished themselves from the pacifist Anabaptists by their emphasis upon the Old Testament call to war against the “Canaanites,” their stress upon direct revelations from God independent of the Bible, and their elaborate millennial speculations based on an allegorical interpretation of the Book of Daniel and the Apocalypse. Although Münzer perished (1525) in the fiasco of the Peasant War, views similar to his own were later expressed by the Münster Anabaptists, who, influenced by the millennial hopes of Melchior HOFFMANN and under the leadership of Anabaptist refugees from the Netherlands, the “prophet” John Mathijs and his successor “king” John Beukels (John of Leiden), attempted to establish a communist and polygamous “kingdom of God” in this Westphalian city by force of arms (1533–35). After the utter collapse of this “kingdom” the surviving Anabaptist elements were absorbed in the New Testament-oriented pacifist Anabaptists under the leadership of Menno Simons.

Spiritualist Anabaptists. This group, whose rejection of infant baptism was not accompanied by an equally clear endorsement of baptism for adults, saw in the organizational structures of the church, as well as the sacraments and even the Bible, regulations applicable only to the infancy of God’s people. Thus Sebastian Franck (1499–1542) suggested that in its childhood the church could not dispense with such crutches, but when it discarded them in its maturity, the Father would be pleased rather than angered. Similarly Caspar Schwenckfeld (1489–1561) advocated the suspension of infant baptism, since he considered it so utterly immersed in superstition and abuses as to be worthless (see SCHWENCKFELDERS).

Central in the thought of Spiritualist Anabaptists such as Franck and Schwenckfeld was the denial of the absolute claims of all the contending religious movements of the time, from the Roman Catholics and Lutherans to the pacifist and revolutionary Anabaptists. They believed in an invisible church, which might well include not only sincere Christians but also good Muslims and pagans obedient to the “inner Word” wherever they might be. Such emphasis upon the inner Word of the Spirit distinguished the Spiritualist Anabaptists from the other groups and their Biblical literalism.

Rationalist Anabaptists. This last body had its roots primarily in the Romance lands. The Spaniard Michael SERVETUS (1511–53) as well as the Italians Laelius (1525–62) and his nephew Faustus Socinius (1539–1604) were not only opposed to infant baptism but rejected the Trinitarian theology of the ancient Church as well (see SO-CINIANISM). In this they were influenced by the Arianizing tendencies of Renaissance humanism (e.g., Florentine Academy under Marsilio FICINO), by the Biblical literalism and the rejection of non-Biblical language typical of Anabaptists, which brought the complex Christological formulations of Nicaea and Chalcedon into disrepute, and by the confidence in the God-given ability of human reason to comprehend and follow the council of God. The rationalist Anabaptists tended to identify “spirit” with “reason” and saw Biblical truth as that which contributed to the moral improvement of humanity. Thus they tended to depreciate the confession of Christ as God and Savior, considering Him the great ethical teacher and example.

Anabaptists have survived in some contemporary denominations. Mennonites, Amish, and Hutterites carry on the tradition of the New Testament-oriented pacifists. The Schwenckfelder Church originated in the spiritualist tradition, and the Society of Friends (Quaker) has incorporated many of its teachings. Unitarians are loosely related to the rationalists. Only the Old Testament-oriented revolutionaries have found no permanent institutional expression although some of their millennial claims can be found in groups at the fringe of Protestantism. In the scholarly investigation of the Anabaptist movement, the following questions have been debated: (1) the influence of medieval sects on Anabaptists (e.g., L. Keller); (2) the place of origin in Switzerland (e.g., E. Troeltsch) or Saxony (e.g., K. Holl); (3) the definition of Anabaptism restricting it to the New Testament-oriented pacifists (e.g., H. Bender); (4) Anabaptist contributions to the doctrine of the church (e.g., F. Littell); (5) Anabaptist contributions to concept of separation of Church and State (e.g., G. H. Williams).

While the influence of medieval sectarianism is vague, the origin of the 16th-century movement can be considered settled if the distinction between the various groups of Anabaptists is maintained. Switzerland applies to the New Testament-oriented pacifists, and Saxony, to the Old Testament-oriented revolutionaries. The attempt to restrict the term Anabaptist to the pacifists is not accurate. Some groups of Anabaptists like the Münster prophets did stage armed rebellions. Others refused to take up the sword. The Anabaptists did make a major contribution to the voluntaristic view of the church and their impact on the development of notions of the separation of Church and state was important, too. During the sixteenth and seventeenth century the numbers of all those involved in these groups was extremely small. It was in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century North America that groups like the Hutterites, Mennonites, and Amish were able to flourish. And as a result, the religious beliefs of these groups came to exert an influence on Christian thinking in general out of proportion to their numbers.

Bibliography: H. E. FOSDICK, ed., Great Voices of the Reformation (New York 1952). H. J. HILLERBRAND, A Bibliography of Anabaptism 1520–1630, (Elkhart, IN 1962). MENNO SIMONS, Complete Writings, tr. L. VERDUIN, ed. J. C. WENGER (Scottsdale, PA 1956). G. H. WILLIAMS, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962); ed., Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (Philadelphia 1957). The Mennonite Encyclopedia, 4 v. (Scottsdale, PA 1955–60). K. HOLL, “Luther und die Schwärmer,” Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (Tübingen 1927–28) 1:420–467. F. H. LITTELL, The Origins of Sectarian Protestantism (New York 1964). J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1949). E. TROELTSCH, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, tr. O. WYON, 2 v. (New York 1931; repr. 1956). A. L. E. VERHEYDEN, Anabaptism in Flanders, 1530–1650, tr. M. KUITSE et al. (Scottsdale, PA 1961). H. FAST, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 6:601–604, bibliog. A. BAUDRILLART, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:1128–34. Y. CONGAR, Catholicisme 1:500–501. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–)

2:1383–1405, bibliog. P. J. KLASSEN, The Economics of Anabaptism, 1525–1560 (The Hague 1964). E. GRITSCH, Thomas Müntzer (Minneapolis 1989). L. GROSS, The Golden Years of the Hutterites (Scottsdale Penn. 1980). H. J. GOERTZ, Die Täufer (Munich 1980). W. E. KEENEY, The Development of Dutch Anabaptist Thought and Practice from 1539 to 1564 (Nieuwkoop 1968). M. LIENHARD, ed., The Origins and Characteristics of Anabaptism (The Hague 1977). P. MATHESON, ed. The Collected Works of Thomas Muentzer (Edinburgh 1988). T. SCOTT, Thomas Müntzer (London 1989). J. M. STAYER, Anabaptists and the Sword (Lawrence KS 1972).

[G. W. FORELL]

ANACLETUS (CLETUS), ST. POPE

Pontificate, c. 80 to 92. Anacletus appears in the Liber pontificalis and the Roman martyrology as two popes, both martyrs, with feasts on April 26 and July 13. St. Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 3.3) and the liturgy of the Mass make him the second successor of Peter. The Greek form of his name, Anencletus, was common for slaves and may point to his social status. The third form of his name Cletus, was simply a shortened form of the other two but is the one found in the ancient canon of the mass. (see POPES, LIST OF). Eusebius (Hist. 3.13, 15, 21; 5.6) says that he died in the 12th year of Domitian's reign after a 12-year episcopate. The Liber pontificalis probably mistakes Anacletus for ANICETUS as the builder of a burial monument for Peter. Modern excavations show that Anacletus was not buried near Peter in the Vatican.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:xix–xx, 52–53. J. P. KIRSCH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 2:1407–08. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 1:8–16. L. KOEP, Reallexikon für Antike Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)] 2: 410–415. E. KIRSCHBAUM, Tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1959). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 1:524. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes, p.7

[E. G. WELTIN]

ANACLETUS II, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: Feb. 14, 1130–Jan. 25, 1138. Born around 1090 into one of the richest and most powerful Roman families, Peter Pierleoni was a student in Paris and a monk of Cluny. In 1111 or 1112 he was made cardinal deacon of SS. Cosmas and Damian by Paschal II (1099–1118). Peter was a leader among the cardinals who elected Callistus II (1119–24) at Cluny, and was promoted to cardinal priest of St. Maria in Trastevere in 1120. In 1121 he was papal legate to England and in 1122 and 1123 to France. A strong opponent of imperial involvement in questions of investiture, nothing else is heard of him until the disputed election that would make him anti-pope.

Pope Honorius (1124–30) was gravely ill and had been moved by the papal chancellor, Aimeric, from the Lateran to the monastery of St. Gregory on the Caelian hill. This part of the city was controlled by the Frangipani family. During the night of February 13, Honorius died and was quickly buried so an election could be held immediately. By morning a minority of 16 cardinals, led by Aimeric, had elected and consecrated Gregorio Papareschi as Pope Innocent II (1130–43). In response to what they perceived as treachery, the majority of cardinals met later that day in St. Mark's (February 14) and elected Peter Pierleoni, who took the name Anacletus II, a reference to a martyr-pope of the early church. These two irregular elections began an eight-year schism. In addition to the old rivalry between the Frangipani and the Pierleoni, most of Innocent's supporters were younger cardinals from northern Italy and France, while most of Anacletus' cardinals represented an older generation within the Curia and came from Rome and southern Italy. There was also the memory of Aimeric's support of Leo Frangipani and his troops, who compelled the previous papal conclave to elect Honorius by force of arms.

Initially, it appeared that Anacletus would prevail. He sent letters appealing for support to the German and French kings. Anacletus was in a strong position since he had the support of the majority of the cardinals and the Roman people. It even appears that the Frangipani temporarily joined his side. Soon Rome became too dangerous for Innocent. He left with Aimeric for France, where the two appealed to major European figures with letters of their own. Innocent was recognized by most western kings and the emperor Lothair (1125–37) largely because of the support of Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), who had exchanged letters with Aimeric for many years. Also both Aimeric and Innocent were early supporters of the Cistercians and Premonstratensians, new but influential orders. Soon only Scotland, Aquitaine, Milan, and southern Italy recognized Anacletus. He secured the obedience of southern Italy when he recognized Duke Roger II of Sicily (1095–1154) as king of Sicily, Calabria, and Apulia overlord of Capua, Naples, and Benevento; in effect making Roger the first King of the Two Sicilies (September 27).

After 1133 Anacletus lost even this support. In that year Lothair came to Italy with Innocent, but they lacked the troops to oust Anacletus, who remained secure in the Castel Sant' Angelo. Soon Lothair left the city and Innocent was forced to flee to Pisa. Anacletus held out in Rome for the next five years. However, he lost Milan in 1136 through the influence of Bernard of Clairvaux, and many of his leading supporters (including Peter of Pisa, an important canonist) abandoned his defense in a series of debates sponsored by Roger in Salerno during November and December 1137. This again was largely due to Bernard's influence. Anacletus died not long afterward in Rome, Jan. 25, 1138. His followers elected Victor IV (1138) to a brief reign as successor. While Peter Pierleoni continues to be seen as having been quite willing to use his family's considerable wealth to secure position, there is an increasing consensus that he has been unfairly branded a reprobate by his enemies. Recognizing the bitter divisions within the college of cardinals at the time and the irregular nature of both elections in 1130, recent scholarship has in some respects restored his reputation.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.313, 317, 322–28, 379–83, 410, 449, 543. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.911–19. J. P. MIGNE, ed. Patrologia Latina (Paris 1844–64) 179.687–732. PETER THE DEACON, Chronica monasterii Cassinensis 4.103–29 in Monumenta Germaniae historica, Scriptores 34.564–607 passim (also in older MGH SS edition, 7.816–44 passim). L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes (London 1908). E. VACANDARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1914) 2.1408–19. H. W. KLEWITZ, "Das Ende des Reformpapstums," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 3 (1939) 371–412. P. F. PALUMBO, "La cancelleria d'Anacleto II," Scritti di paleografia e diplomatica in onore di Vincenzo Federici (Florence 1945). F. J. SCHMALE, Studien zum Schisma des Jahres 1130 (Cologne 1961). M. DA BERGAMO, "La duplice elezione papale del 1130," Contributi dell'istituto di storia medievale 1 (1968) 265–302. S. CHODOROW, Christian Political Theory and Church Politics in the Mid-Twelfth Century (Berkeley 1972). W. ULLMANN, The Papacy and Political Ideas in the Middle Ages (London 1976). R. HÜLS, Kardinäle, Klerus und Kirchen Roms, 1049–1130 (Tübingen 1977) 189–91, 225. H. DITTMANN, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1977) 1.568–69 for additional bibliography. H. FUHRMANN, Germany in the High Middle Ages, c. 1050–1200 (Cambridge 1986) 105, 117–22. J.N.D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 169–170. M. STROLL, The Jewish Pope: Ideology and Politics in the Papal Schism of 1139 (Leiden 1987). I. S. ROBINSON, The Papacy 1073–1198: Continuity and Innovation (Cambridge 1990). P. KERBRAT, Encyclopedia of the Middle Ages, ed. A. VAUCHEZ (Chicago and London 2000) 1.53.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

ANALOGY

Analogy, a technical, philosophical and theological term, commonly designates a kind of predication midway between univocation and equivocation. Thus it denotes a perfection (the "analogon") that, though found similar in two or more subjects called "analogates," is neither simply the same nor simply different. As a technical notion, analogy must be distinguished from "argument by analogy." The latter has the following structure: if a given perfection a is possessed by two individuals, B and

C, and if a is accompanied by another perfection d in B, then d will also be found in C. This argument is heuristic, or suggestive; of itself it is not and cannot be certain.

History of the Concept of Analogy

The term analogy was first used by Greek mathematicians in the sense of proportion. PLATO is generally conceded to have been the first to use it philosophically to designate proportions between the elements of the world and between kinds of knowledge and types of reality. Plato also applies it to similarities of function in different things, and occasionally to a likeness between two things that is not an identity.

These uses were expanded and developed by ARISTOTLE. In biology, the "analogy" between different organs that perform similar functions became an important concept. In his ethical writings, Aristotle uses the term analogy in a similar way. Thus, there is no single "idea of the good"; "the good" designates something found in unequal degrees in different subjects. In the Metaphysics the principles, elements and causes of things are said to be common "analogously," that is, proportionately common. In his logical writings, analogy is sometimes used in the sense of similar proportions. However, when Aristotle says that the most common classes of terms are analogous, he refers rather to a general similarity which cannot be further analyzed into common genera and specific differences. In his psychological works he notes that actual knowledge is analogous to the object known. This is a type of proportion in the sense of suitability, "adaptation to" rather than similarity. Although these uses of analogy are clearly not identical, Aristotle does not explain how they are related, probably because he has no explicit theory of analogy.

One other discussion is important in Aristotle for the doctrine of analogy (though here he himself does not use the term): being is a word with many meanings, but all the meanings are somehow reduced to a primary one. Aristotle explains this by saying that all the things that are called being are so called by reference to one subject that is being in the primary sense; this is the so-called $\pi\rho\delta\varsigma\ \acute{\epsilon}\nu$ equivocity.

The Greek and Arabian commentators on Aristotle gathered these comments together, but did not develop a full theory of analogy. In the same way the later Platonists, especially Pseudo-Dionysius, extended Plato's use of analogy and adopted some of the Aristotelian terminology.

MEDIEVAL DEVELOPMENT

In the Augustinian tradition, no formal, explicit doctrine of analogy is to be found; since intellectual knowledge does not arise from the sensible world, such a doctrine is not necessary. But prominent among St. Augustine's themes are the inability of our language to express the perfection of God, and the similarity-indissimilarity of creatures in relation to God.

The doctrine of St. THOMAS AQUINAS will be considered in great detail below. He used analogy more than any of his predecessors and made a number of formal analyses of it. There is, however, no single, adequate summary. Some of his uses reflect the original meaning of proportion; one usage (analogy of Scripture) is derived from the grammatical meaning of agreement. Such usage is irrelevant to analogy as a philosophical doctrine.

St. Thomas's immediate predecessors, like his teacher St. Albert the Great and his contemporaries, used analogy only incidentally. In St. Bonaventure we find instead a highly developed doctrine of creatures as vestiges and images of God. Even such authors as Henry of Ghent do not elaborate a doctrine of analogy; he, for example, is content to say that there are two types of being.

John DUNS SCOTUS is aware of Aquinas's doctrine of analogy as well as of equivalents like that of Henry of Ghent's double notion of being. His arguments for the univocity of being rest on his view of metaphysics (univocal being is its object), the possibility of a proof for the existence of God (only from being as being can the existence of a transcendent God be proved), and the principle of contradiction and the laws of logic (if being is not univocal, formal contradictions are impossible; arguments employing "being" would have four terms). However, along with the univocity of being, Scotus holds an analogy of beings in themselves insofar as they are related and ordered.

In the hands of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, the univocity of being becomes the logical univocity of a name or a sign. A word is "common" to many things; if it is not univocal, it must be equivocal. In addition to words, there are also signs, and signs are very like the words which conventionally express them. But there can be no question of any analogy of beings in themselves, since things are radically singular and unrelated to each other.

THOMISTIC COMMENTATORS

Against this background, the great commentators on St. Thomas Aquinas, such as John Capreolus excepted, systematized and developed the doctrine of their master. In the 15th century, Cardinal Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN wrote his famous On the Analogy of Names. Cajetan holds that there are three basic types of analogy, according to the division of analogy given by St. Thomas in In I sent. 19.5.2 ad 1. These are analogy (1) according to being alone and not according to intention, (2) according to intention alone and not according to being, (3) according to both being and intention. Analogy according to being alone and not according to intention is also called analogy of inequality and analogy of genus. In St. Thomas, the example is the term "body," predicated of terrestrial and celestial bodies. A logician always defines this term in the same way, but the philosopher of nature and the metaphysician define the two kinds of bodies differently. Cajetan considers that a similar difference can be found in all generic predicates; he therefore concludes that such predication is not really analogy at all. The second analogy, according to intention and not according to being, is called analogy of attribution. In it, the perfection exists only in one analogate, the primary analogate, but is attributed to other things, the secondary analogates, which have some relation to the primary one (cause, effect, sign, exemplar and so on).

The third kind of analogy, according to both being and intention, is the most important for metaphysics. According to Cajetan, this analogy is the analogy of proportionality, discussed by St. Thomas in De ver. 2.11. In this analogy there is no direct relation between the two analogates; instead, there is a relation within each of the analogates, and it is these relations that are similar and are the bases for analogical predication. In the two analogates which are unlike, there are four relata which are also unlike, but the two relations, or proportions, are similar (schematically: $A:B: C:D$). The analogon thus seems at first sight to be a similar function, or relation, but it is sometimes also called a common perfection. This analogy can be of two types: proper (intrinsic) and improper (extrinsic, metaphorical). Cajetan also asks whether there is one concept (una ratio) corresponding to the single analogous term. He answers with a distinction: first, there is a clear concept that perfectly represents the relation in one of the analogates and imperfectly represents the others; this concept is simply many concepts and only proportionately one concept. Secondly, there is a "confused" concept which only imperfectly represents the relation in the analogates and so is simply one concept, though it is proportionately many. The clear multiple concepts become the common concept by a special abstraction in which the particular modes are run together (con-fused); the single, common but confused concept becomes one of the clear concepts by way of fuller expression.

Cajetan considers two objections against analogy from the viewpoint of his own systematization. One is that analogy leads to agnosticism. He answers that only in the analogy of proper proportionality is the perfection intrinsic to both analogates and yet not in such a way as to destroy the inequality of the analogates. His other objection is that the use of an analogous term in reasoning makes that reasoning formally invalid. He answers that the term, when confusedly conceived, does have a true unity and so is not used equivocally.

JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, the third of the great commentators, is principally concerned with defending the doctrine of Cajetan. He does, however, differ on one point: it seems to him that individuals in the same species are univocal, for example, that many men are univocally beings.

Sylvester of Ferrara (FERRARIENSIS), the fourth great commentator, takes exception to one of Cajetan's statements about the analogy of proper proportionality. Because many texts of St. Thomas assert that there is a primary analogate in every analogy, he holds that even in the analogy of proper proportionality there is a first analogate, though Cajetan had denied this.

LATER SCHOLASTICS

The next major writer on analogy is Francisco SUÁREZ. He is not usually considered among the commentators of St. Thomas, though he does regard his theory of analogy as that of the Angelic Doctor. Suárez disagrees on many counts with Cajetan. He holds, first, that attribution is not necessarily extrinsic; in an intrinsic analogy the perfection exists perfectly and independently in one analogate, and imperfectly and dependently on the first in the secondary analogates. Secondly, he holds that proportionality is always extrinsic. He therefore holds that the relation between God and creatures cannot properly be expressed by the analogy of proportionality except in metaphorical language. Suárez considers the same objections which Cajetan had considered; these objections seem to him to require a strict unity of the objective concept which abstracts from the differences of the modes.

Later scholastic writers on analogy fall into three categories. There are followers of both Cajetan and Suárez; in addition, many Thomists and some Suarezians have adopted elements of both theories. In particular, these Thomists make use of an idea already mentioned by Cajetan: that a single pair of real beings may be related by several analogies; thus, God and a creature are analogously beings by both analogy of attribution and of proportionality. God is prior to the creature inasmuch as the analogy of attribution is made use of; both are intrinsically beings because of the analogy of proper proportionality.

Apart from Suárez and the Suarezians, most scholastics could be considered followers of Cajetan. Not until the 1920s were there signs that any Thomist began to question Cajetan's interpretation. Since then, a number of writers have tried to work out anew the actual texts of St. Thomas. Here several views have been stressed. Some authors have emphasized the so-called Platonic strains in St. Thomas, and in the light of this new point of view the doctrine of PARTICIPATION has been stressed. Participation is a real, intrinsic analogy, which is not proportionality because it does not involve four terms. Similarly, the analogy of proportion has reappeared in many authors and this too, is a direct, intrinsic analogy. Finally, several authors depart from Cajetan in another direction; they assert that analogy is an affair of language, not of conceptions nor of being, and therefore pertains to logic, not to metaphysics.

RECENT THOUGHT

The historical movement has been considered as staying within the scope of scholastic thought. Analogy for many years was of no interest to nonscholastic thinkers; rationalists, idealists, and their followers restricted scientific language to univocal terms. Kierkegaard here represents a break; he considered univocal language, as belonging to science whose proper field is that of objects. But persons, and especially God, cannot be known objectively; the only valid knowledge here is "subjective." In the Danish thinker himself there is no theory of predication or of knowledge which systematically considers this difference. Karl Barth and after him, Paul Tillich, consider the possibilities of analogy in solving this problem. It seems to both that any real analogy reduces God to the category of finite things. We can speak about God only through symbols.

The notions of symbol and of myth have been exploited by many writers who feel, on the one hand, that abstractive organized knowledge is not the only kind of knowledge man has, and on the other, that any direct, purely intellectual knowledge is necessarily abstractive. Knowledge through symbol and myth is direct, profound, and vitally moving, but it is not a grasp of the intrinsic reality of the thing known. Thomistic criticism of this theory generally centers on the issue of intrinsic vs. extrinsic knowledge. A being that is known only through symbol, myth, or metaphor is not known in itself; hence we can never make any statement about that being in itself, but only statements about ourselves and objects of direct experience. While this is not sufficient for religious language, it must be recognized as playing some partial role.

Something similar to analogy has been reached by an altogether different road. The movement called POSITIVISM considered that only scientific language was worthy of analysis, and so all non-univocal terms that deserved consideration had to be reducible to univocal ones. Moreover, univocal terms were restricted to things of immediate experience or to logical and mathematical terms. In the last decade or so, linguistic analysis began to consider common language rather than scientific language. In common language, there are of course many univocal terms; but a great number of terms are found to have many meanings, and in some of their usages no single meaning can be pinned down. This usage has been called systematic ambiguity. Several Thomistic writers have seen in the theory of systematic ambiguity a contemporary approach to the same problem that St. Thomas and his followers handled through the notion of analogy. A few think that the modern approach is better than the traditional one. For they point out, traditional discussions of analogy, at least since Cajetan, have been metaphysical. They think, however, that this is a mistake; analogy is and remains a matter of terms. Properly, therefore, analogy is to be treated by logic. There has been as yet no general and sharply focused Thomistic critique of this theory, but it would seem to raise serious difficulties with the traditional notion of logic as a science of second intentions, as well as to question the possibility of sciences other than logic, such as theology, to attain valid knowledge of the real. In the last analysis, ambiguous terms may serve to confuse or to persuade, perhaps even to suggest; but they would seem to have no place in anything like a science whose object is to know. Only if analogy reaches into our knowledge and even into the objects of our knowledge can analogical predication be admitted as scientific.

Doctrine of St. Thomas on Analogy

For St. Thomas analogy is a kind of predication midway between univocation and equivocation. Since analogy is the use of a term to designate a perfection found in a similar way in two or more subjects in which it is found partly the same and partly different, the first step is to clarify what is meant by the words “partly the same, partly different.” (Summa theologiae 1a, 13.5; In 4 meta. 1.534–539; In 1 eth. 7.95–96.) In univocal predication, predicates have an absolute meaning and can be accurately and distinctly defined in themselves. But strictly analogous predicates cannot be so defined; their meaning is proportional to the subjects of which they are predicated. The reason for this difference is that univocal terms arise by abstraction from the particular subjects in which the perfection is present, so that the difference in the subjects does not enter into their meaning. Analogous terms do not arise by abstraction but rather by “separation,” or negation (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.3–4), and so retain a relation to a concrete subject. A consequence of this is that there is no single clear meaning for an analogous predicate (ST 1a, 13.5 ad 1). Nevertheless, analogous terms can be validly used in argumentation on condition that they are not mistaken for univocal concepts of essences. Even if we cannot judge the conclusion of a univocal argumentation without considering the premises from which it was derived, we can use that conclusion without keeping the original premises in mind as a premise for further argumentation. But in an argument using an analogous term, the conclusion cannot be abstracted from its premises, because the secondary analogate arrived at by the argument must include the primary in its definition (ST 1a, 13.6). That is why our statements concerning the existence and nature of God are limited in scope (ST 1a, 2.2 ad 3; 3.4 ad 2) and why St. Thomas made no concessions to rationalism, whether heterodox or Christian in intent, Averroistic or Anselmian.

The kind of abstraction called separation arrives at terms which in all their major uses are analogous and which can therefore be considered primarily analogous terms. In addition, some terms are first univocal but become analogous in other applications; these are secondarily analogous terms. Thus, some qualities of sensible things can be simply abstracted and are therefore univocal; but they can also be used to signify something that is primarily analogous. “Life,” for instance, is a primarily univocal term. But in a second use, it can signify the kind of being that lives, and thus we use the term analogously when we speak of intellectual life.

KINDS OF ANALOGY

Analogical predication therefore involves a relation to, and between, the analogates themselves. The most fundamental division of analogy is into intrinsic, or proper, and extrinsic, or improper (De prin. nat. 6; In 1 sent. 19.5.2 ad 1; De ver. 21.4 ad 2). An analogy is intrinsic when the perfection which is predicated is really found in both of the analogates; it is extrinsic when it is really found in only one but imposed by the mind on others. Thus the term “living” is analogously applied to angels and animals by an intrinsic analogy, for both live but in an irreducibly different way. But when it is applied to the language of Shakespeare, it is applied by an extrinsic analogy; for life is only attributed, it is not found there in reality (cf. ST 1a, 18.1).

Various relationships. The second way of dividing analogy is based on the relation between the analogates themselves (De pot. 7.7; ST 1a, 13.5; De ver. 2.11; In 5 eth. 5.939–945). This relation can be directly between the two analogates, a “one-to-one,” two-term analogy, as substance and accident are related to each other. Again, it can be a relation, not between the analogates themselves but between the analogates and some third object, as two accidents of a thing may be unrelated to each other but both be related to the same substance; this is a “many-to-one,” three-term analogy. Finally, there may be no direct relationships of the analogates at all, but each of them may contain a relation that is similar to the relation in the other, a “many-to-many,” four-term analogy, also called “proportionality.” For example, when one understands something immediately, he says that he sees it. What he means is that as vision is to the power of sight, so direct understanding is to the intellect, not that the intellect is similar to the eye or vision to understanding.

Two-, Three- and Four-Term Analogies. In two- and three-term analogies there is necessarily an inequality between the terms, so that the terms can always be compared to each other as greater and lesser (De prin. nat. 6; De subs. sep. 8). Consequently one of the analogates will be “prior” to the other or others in time, in understanding, in perfection, in causality (In 3 meta. 8.4374–38; In 4 meta. 1.534–539; In 5 meta. 1.749). Moreover, when there is a direct order between the terms, one of them will be defined by the other; that is, all the posterior analogates will be defined through the first. But since definition is relative to knowledge (In 5 meta. 5.824), the first analogate will be the one which is first in our knowledge, not necessarily the first in reality. Thus we define accidents through their dependence on substance, for we know substance as prior; but we “define” God through the creatures’ dependence on Him, for creatures are first in our knowledge and we know God only through them (ST 1a, 13.6).

In four-term analogies, on the other hand, there is no direct relationship between the analogates; hence, priority of one over the other is not necessary and one is not defined through the other (De ver. 2.11).

Mutual determination and eminence. Two- and three-term analogies can be further divided according to the kind of relation that is in question. Two-term analogies are sometimes definite proportions which are mutually determining (In 1 sent. prol., 1.2 ad 2; In Boeth. de Trin. 1.2 ad 3; De ver. 2.11). For example, knowledge can be possessed habitually or actually exercised. In the former case, “knowing” is predicated as in potency (and potency is always proportioned to the act of which it is the potency); in the latter, as in act (in creatures, an act is always the act of some potency). So, too, analogous causes are often strictly proportioned to their effects (In 4 meta. 1.534–538).

A direct relationship, however, need not be understood as a definite, interdetermining proportion. Indeed, the term “proportion” itself is often used by St. Thomas to indicate an indefinitely greater perfection in the prior analogate (In 3 sent. 1.1.1 ad 3; ST 1a, 12.1 ad 4). In such cases, the prior analogate possesses a perfection eminently, in a higher degree, more perfectly; whereas the others possess it deficiently, in a lesser degree, less perfectly (C. gent. 2.98; De pot. 7.5; De ver. 4.6; In 1 sent. 8.1.2; ST 1a, 13.2, 104.1; Comp. theol. 2.8). This language must not be allowed to mislead us. The expression “degree of difference” may refer to a difference that is directly quantitative or at least based on a directly quantitative one; and then there is no analogy, but univocation, for the perfection in question is reducible to a single one (ST 1a, 42.1 ad 1). But at other times we speak of degrees of difference when the differences are greater than merely specific ones and cannot be reduced to univocal genera and differences (De pot. 7.7 ad 3). Similarly, we sometimes use the terms “perfect” and “imperfect” to refer to stages of one and the same perfection, as when we say that a baby has only an imperfect control of his limbs, whereas the grown man has perfect control; this also is univocation. On the other hand, we might say that animals have an imperfect spontaneity because they are not merely passive to outside influences; whereas the spontaneity of a man is perfect, in the sense that his spontaneity is truly a freedom, not only from external violence, but also from other predeterminations (cf. ST 1a, 4.1, 2; Comp. theol. 1.101; De ver. 8.1).

Participation. One kind of analogy of eminence has additional characteristics. For the prior analogate can be more eminent because it is the analogous perfection by its essence, whereas the imperfect analogates are such because they possess that perfection as distinct from themselves, as received, and so as limited by their own proper nature. The primary analogate, then, is identically its perfection and so is unlimited in its order; if we are talking about being and the properties of being, the being by essence is simply infinite. The secondary analogates, which have the perfections as received and limited, are being good and so on, by participation (De pot. 3.5, 7.7 ad 2; C. gent. 2.15, 53; 3.66, 97; ST 1a, 3.8, 44.1, 47.1, 75.5 ad 1 and 4; 79.4; In Ioann. prol.; Quodl. 2.2.1). In other perfections, too, a similar relation can be found. Thus, the acts of reason itself are reasonable by their essence, whereas the desires of a virtuous man are reasonable—truly enough and intrinsically—only by participation, inasmuch as through obedience to reason they possess some order, structure, and so forth, that is derived from reason (De virt. in comm. 12 ad 16).

Three-term analogies are sometimes a set of two-term analogies with a common primary analogate which is numerically one and the same, as medicine, health, food and complexion are each called “healthy” by their various relations to the health of the animal (C. gent. 1.34). Such a form of analogy is not really distinctive, since it can be simply reduced to the two-term analogies which make it up. At other times, however, the common term is not itself one of the analogates that are immediately understood but is entirely outside the predication or is a whole made up of all the analogates (In 1 sent. prol. 1.2 ad 2, 35.1.4; De nat. gen. 1). In the latter case, evidently, the parts cannot be equal or quantitative parts; otherwise there would simply be univocation.

CHIEF APPLICATIONS OF ANALOGY

For St. Thomas, analogy is not simply a formal structure of predication to be treated in logic. When analogy is “applied” to a particular case, the content or matter of what is said must be taken into account. For this reason, analogy is properly treated in metaphysics.

Being. The analogon most often and most fully discussed by St. Thomas is BEING. But there is no single analogy of being; rather, the various beings have different relations to each other. Following the lead of Aristotle, St. Thomas finds in each being a set of internal components. Of these, the most thoroughly discussed principles are substance and accident. Substance is being in the primary sense, and the act of being (esse, existence) properly pertains to it. Accident is proportioned to substance, and its being consists in its actual inherence in substance (In 4 meta. 1.534–539; In 7 meta. 4.1334–38; De ver. 2.11; In 1 eth. 7.95–96). Thus, substance and accident stand in a one-to-one, two-term analogy, the analogy of proportion. However, we can also consider that accidents are not beings by themselves but rather by their relation or reference to substance, and that the being attributed to them is the being of substance; we would then call this an analogy of reference or attribution (De prin. nat. 6; In 4 meta. 1.543; In 11 meta. 3.2197). The various internal principles of being and substance are similar pairs of proportioned analogates and so can all be understood as act and potency; the act-potency correlation is itself the proportional relationship (In 5 meta. 9.897; In 9 meta. 7–10.1844–94). The act-potency correlation itself is first discovered in motion; it is again found in substance (potency) and accident (act), in matter (potency) and form (act), faculty (potency) and operation (act) and essence (potency) and the act of being, esse (act).

Causality. Beings are also related to each other as cause and effect. Though many causes are univocal, having the same perfection as their effects, these are only the proximate causes of beings. More ultimate causes are not specifically the same as their effects; nevertheless, they can be denominated extrinsically from these effects by causal reference (ST 1a, 6.4, 16.6). In addition, these equivocal causes must be in some sense “more perfect” than their effects (ST 1a, 4.2). This is the analogy of eminence—but merely by knowing this we are unable to determine whether the perfection of the effect is intrinsically in the equivocal cause or whether the equivocal cause is more perfect inasmuch as its perfection is simply different. After the existence of God is known and His nature as pure act is apprehended, then His causal eminence in regard to His creatures is seen to consist in this, that He is being, goodness and other similar perfections by His essence and therefore infinitely; whereas creatures both are and are what they are by participation (ST 1a, 14.6, 25.2 ad 2, 45.5, 57.2, 79.4, 93.2 ad 1 and 4; In Dion. de div. nom. 1.3, 2.4). Inasmuch as the being-by-essence is simple and self-identical, the analogy of participation in being is necessarily an intrinsic analogy. Hence, whatever is predicated of God according to this analogy is truly a knowledge of God, even though it remains a knowledge of Him through His creatures. Because God is the cause of the world through intellect and will (ST 1a, 44.3), He is the exemplar of all things; and created things are related to Him as images (ST 1a, 3.3 ad 2, 35.1 ad 1, 93.1; In 1 Cor. 11.1), as representations (ST 1a, 45.7), and as similar to Him (De pot. 7.7 ad 4 in contrarium; ST 1a, 4.3 ad 4). At the same time, created beings as individuals are seen to be related to each other as diverse participants in the One Being that is being by essence.

Good. The good that is convertible with being is predicated according to the analogy of participation, as is being (ST 1a, 6.1, 2); this transcendental good is, however, only a qualified good and as such, a secondary analogate (in an analogy of proportion) to the unqualified good, which is the “proper” good (ST 1a, 5.1 ad 1). The proper good is itself divided into the moral good, the pleasurable and the useful (ST 1a, 5.6 ad 3). Whereas the good is in things, truth is primarily in the intellect and only secondarily in things (ST 1a, 16.1). As it is in things, it is analogous according to their intrinsic perfection (ST 1a, 16.3); as it is in the mind, it is dependently and imperfectly in created minds, absolutely and perfectly in the divine mind (ST 1a, 16.5). Perfections such as life and wisdom (ST 1a, 18.3, 14.1, 9.1 ad 2, 13.9 ad 3, 41.3 ad 4) are also predicated by essence and by participation.

God. The transcendentals and those perfections which are called pure perfections (which do not necessarily include a mode of participation, ST 1a, 13.3 ad 1), are the concern of both natural theology and revealed theology. Negative statements about God are no problem. But affirmative statements can also be made about God (ST 1a, 13.12), both on the basis of the perfections of creatures and on the basis of revelation. A theory of analogy is the only way in which we can be sure of the meaning (not the truth) of these statements. St. Thomas’s fullest explanation is given in regard to the predicate “living” (ST 1a, 18.3). Living can mean (1) a kind of substance capable of certain activities, (2) the activities themselves, (3) the way of existing proportioned to such a nature and such activities. The first two senses are univocal; only the third is analogous. In the richest sense the phrase “God is living” means: being the cause of life as we know it and having the perfection of life intrinsically, not as a limiting essence, but as identical with an unlimited existence and as expressing what we conceive as a mode of being. Surely we can form no simple concept of this or any other perfection that is drawn into the analogy of being (ST 1a, 13.1), yet we can understand what we mean by saying “God is living,” and “God is life”; we can also show why we make such a statement.

On the other hand, what we can say significantly about God is often metaphorical. St. Thomas shows us how we can determine the abstract philosophically analyzed meaning of metaphorical statements (ST 1a, 4.2), and his commentaries on Sacred Scripture provide many instances of such analysis. But he does not engage in an investigation of the psychological, or subjective, meaning of these metaphors. For such analysis, fruitful recourse can be had to phenomenological and existentialist as well as to psychological, and literary studies of metaphor and symbol. Many modern writers on Sacred Scripture are successfully doing this.

See Also: ANALOGY, THEOLOGICAL USE OF; BEING; ACT; SUBSTANCE; ACCIDENT; GOOD; PARTICIPATION; CAUSALITY; TRANSCENDENTALS; GOD

Bibliography: History. J. F. ANDERSON, The Bond of Being (St. Louis 1949). H. LYTTKENS, The Analogy between God and the World (Uppsala 1952). J. OWENS, The Doctrine of Being in the Aristotelian Metaphysics (Toronto 1951) 58–60. Doctrine. CAJETAN, The Analogy of Names and the Concept of Being, tr. E. BUSHINSKI and H. KOREN (Pittsburgh 1953). T. M. FLANAGAN, “The Use of Analogy in the Summa Contra Gentiles,” The Modern Schoolman, 35 (1957) 21–37. JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, The Material Logic, tr. Y. R. SIMON et al. (Chicago 1955) 152–208. G. P. KLUBERTANZ, St. Thomas Aquinas on Analogy (Chicago 1960). E. L. MASCALL, Existence and Analogy (New York 1949). R. MASIELLO, “The Analogy of Proportion in the Metaphysics of St. Thomas,” The Modern Schoolman, 35 (1958) 91–105. A. MAURER, “St. Thomas and the Analogy of Genus,” The New Scholasticism, 29 (1955) 127–144. R. MCINERNEY, The Logic of Analogy (The Hague 1961). M. T.-L. PENIDO, Le Rôle de l’analogie en théologie dogmatique (Bibliothèque Thomiste 15; Paris 1931). G. PHELAN, St. Thomas and Analogy (Milwaukee 1941). J. M. RAMIREZ, “De analogia secundum doctrinam aristotelico-thomisticam,” La Ciencia Tomista, 24 (1921) 20–40, 195–214, 337–357; 25 (1922) 17–38.

[G. P. KLUBERTANZ]

ANALOGY, THEOLOGICAL USE OF

Analogy is a word that stands for many different meanings. The most important are: (1) a form of reasoning, i.e., reasoning by analogy, also called argument from CONVENIENCE; (2) a mode of explanation (the parable); and (3) a mode of predication, i.e., analogous predication. The present article is concerned with analogy as a form of predication and with the use of analogy in THEOLOGY.

Aristotle. Called by some scholars the father of analogy [see A. Goergen, Kardinal Cajetans Lehre von der Analogie (Speyer 1938) 86], ARISTOTLE was the first to deal systematically with analogy as a form of predication. In the Organon (106a-108b) he divides the predicates, according to their modes of signification, into three classes. To the first class belong the terms that are predicated of many subjects according to the same meaning, to the second the terms that are predicated of many subjects according to meanings that are entirely different, and to the third the terms that are predicated of many subjects according to a meaning that is partly the same and partly different. Aristotle calls the terms of the first class univocal and the terms of the second class equivocal. Then one would expect him to call analogous the terms of the third class. But this use of the term analogy does not go back to Aristotle, who defines this class of words as terms that do not differ by way of equivocality. It is only later, in the Middle Ages, that the word analogy is used for this form of predication.

Aristotle did not content himself with elaborating a perfect logical theory of analogy: in his metaphysical and ethical works he applies this theory to metaphysical and ethical language, and says that terms such as being, substance, cause, good, etc., are predicated neither univocally, nor equivocally, but according to a certain analogy (κατ’ ἀναλογίαν). However, he did not go so far as to elaborate a systematic theory of theological language. But from what he said about metaphysical language (of which theological language is the most conspicuous part) and about God’s transcendence it is necessary to draw the conclusion that the words used when one talks about God have, according to Aristotle, an analogous meaning.

Aquinas. ST. THOMAS AQUINAS distinguishes three kinds of predicative analogy. There is (1) attributive analogy, e.g., when “healthy” is predicated of Peter, medicine, food, climate, color, etc. In attributive analogy a quality is predicated properly and intrinsically of the first analogate, and it is predicated of the other analogates because of the relation that they have to the first analogate. There is also (2) metaphorical analogy, e.g., when “to smile” is predicated of Peter and of the meadow. In metaphorical analogy a quality is predicated properly only of the first analogate; of the others it is predicated only because of some similarity between their situations and the situation of the first analogate. There is, finally, (3) proportional analogy, e.g., when “substance,” “nature,” “being,” “cause” are predicated of man, animals, trees, stones, etc. In proportional analogy a perfection is predicated properly and intrinsically of each analogate.

According to Aquinas all three kinds of analogy may be used in theology. Attributive and metaphorical analogies help one to talk about God’s dynamic perfections. Proportional (and also attributive) analogy enables one to talk about God's entitative perfections, i.e., about God's nature as it is in itself (see C. gent. 1.30–34; ST 1a, 13).

Bonaventure and Scotus. The other great scholastics, also, especially BONAVENTURE and John DUNS SCOTUS, have made careful studies of analogy, the former more from an ontological, the latter more from a logical standpoint.

According to Bonaventure every creature bears some analogy to God because every creature is an imitation of God inasmuch as it is caused by God and is conformed to Him through the divine idea. Bonaventure distinguishes between two main levels of likeness: the vestige and the image. The vestige is the likeness that irrational creatures bear to God. The image is the likeness of rational creatures to God.

Duns Scotus, in his study of theological language, recognized that it is essentially analogical, but he insisted that analogy presupposes univocity since one could not compare creatures with God unless he had a common concept of both. God is knowable by man in this life only by means of concepts drawn from creatures, and unless these concepts were common to God and creatures one would never be able to compare the imperfect creatures to the perfect God: there would be no bridge between creatures and God.

After the Middle Ages analogy tends to disappear from philosophy but continues to be used by both Catholics and Protestants in theology. The main effort of Catholic theologians is to interpret and systematize Aquinas's teaching, whereas the aim of Protestant theologians is to elaborate a theory of theological language consistent with their views of the relationship between God and man, nature and grace.

Cajetan, Suárez, and the Modern Thomists. The official interpretation of Aquinas's teaching has been for centuries that of Thomas de Vio, better known as Cardinal CAJETAN (d. 1534), who in his famous little book De nominum analogia "solved the more metaphysical difficulties concerning analogy so thoroughly and subtly that no room is left to find out anything further" [John of St. Thomas, Cursus philosophicus thomisticus (Marietti ed. 1:481)]. Cajetan's interpretation (an interpretation based on an isolated text of St. Thomas—In 1 sent. 19.5.2 ad 1) starts out with a threefold division of analogy: attributive, metaphorical, and proportional. He then goes on to show that attributive and metaphorical analogies can be of little use in metaphysics (and in theology): the first because it is always extrinsic, the second because it is always improper. Therefore the only analogy capable of saving metaphysics (and theology) is analogy of proportionality, since it is the only analogy apt to express the true being of something.

Although this interpretation of Aquinas's doctrine of analogy became for centuries the official interpretation, there was from the very beginning a powerful dissenting voice, the voice of SUÁREZ, who was not willing to grant to Cajetan either that attribution is only extrinsic or that proportionality is the safeguard of metaphysics and theology. In his Disputationes metaphysicae (Vivès ed. 26:13–21) Suárez attempts to prove that Cajetan misinterprets Aquinas's doctrine of analogy on two main points. The first misinterpretation, according to Suárez, is of his doctrine on analogy of proportionality, since this analogy includes an element of metaphor and of impropriety, just as "smiling" is said of a meadow through metaphorical reference. Therefore Cajetan would be wrong in giving such prominence to the analogy of proportionality. And he is wrong, claims Suárez, also on another point: his identification of Aquinas's analogy of attribution with analogy of extrinsic attribution. Now, shows Suárez, analogy of attribution can be intrinsic and extrinsic, and Aquinas teaches both of them. Besides analogy of extrinsic attribution (i.e., the analogy where the denominating form exists only in the primary analogate), Aquinas teaches also analogy of intrinsic attribution, i.e., the analogy where the denominating form exists in all the terms, in one absolutely and in the others relatively, through a relation of efficient and exemplary causality of the latter to the former. The analogy between God and creatures is of this type. Therefore, to leave it out, as Cajetan did, is a fatal blow for theology.

For centuries Suárez's view was an isolated one. But in recent years many students of St. Thomas have joined him in his criticism of Cajetan's version of analogy. The reaction was led by É. Gilson's important essay, "Cajetan et l'existence" [Tijdschrift voor Phil. 15 (1953) 267–286], in which he attacked Cajetan's Aristotelian and essentialist interpretation of Aquinas, as well as the "minor" problem of Cajetan's version of analogy. This interpretation of the philosophy of St. Thomas, says Gilson, has been "the main obstacle to the diffusion of Thomism." By explaining Aquinas in the light of, and according to, Aristotle, Cajetan misses the great novelty of his philosophy, the discovery of being (esse). To Cajetan the supreme perfection continues to be essence, not existence. He is an essentialist, not an existentialist.

Encouraged by GILSON's authority, more and more Thomists have denounced Cajetan's version of analogy and have propounded some new interpretation of Aquinas's teaching. The interpretation that is now receiving almost universal consent (it is supported by É. Gilson, C. Fabro, J. Nicolas, B. Montagnes, A. Hayen, and many other scholars, as well as the present writer) can be summarized as follows: Aquinas teaches both analogy of intrinsic attribution and proper proportionality. At the beginning of his theological career he seems to emphasize proportionality more than attribution, but toward the end of his life his preference is for attribution, although he never rejects proportionality. He prefers attribution, because proportionality is inadequate to express at the same time God's transcendence and immanence. Proportionality is certainly able to express God's transcendence, but fails to express His immanence adequately, since it cannot express the dependence of the finite on divine causality. In analogy of proper proportionality there are no primary and secondary analogates. All analogates are primary. For this reason Aquinas came to the conclusion that analogy of proper proportionality cannot give an adequate interpretation of the God-creature relationship, and dropped it in theology but kept it in metaphysics.

Aquinas believes that an adequate interpretation of the God-creature relationship can be provided by analogy of intrinsic attribution. Analogy of intrinsic attribution is able to signify both that there is a likeness between primary and secondary analogates, and that the secondary analogates are imperfect imitations of the primary. Intrinsic attribution is able to stress the likeness between analogates as much as their difference. It says that the analogous perfection is predicated of the primary analogate essentially and of the secondary analogate by participation.

Analogy in Protestant Theology. Up to 1965 no systematic historical study of the doctrine of analogy in Protestant theology has been made [although there is an outline drawn up by the author of the present article in The Principle of Analogy in Protestant and Catholic Theology (The Hague 1963)]. However, it is probable that a good history of analogy in Protestant theology could be written by distinguishing three periods: (1) the period of the reformers and orthodoxy, during which Protestant theologians were still attached to Catholic tradition and considered analogy as the only proper way of talking about God; (2) the period of Hegelian and Kierkegaardian theology, during which analogy was replaced by dialectic; and (3) the period of the great modern theologians, K. BARTH, P. TILlich, and R. BULTMANN, during which a remarkable revival of analogy has taken place. These theologians recognize that analogy is the only proper way of talking about God, but do not agree about its nature: Tillich conceives it as symbolic, Barth as an analogy of faith (analogia fidei), and Bultmann as an existential analogy.

Both classical and modern Protestant theologians have tried to elaborate a theory of analogy coherent with their doctrine of the relationship between nature and grace, which are conceived as opposites that can never be reconciled. Sin has caused in human nature a corruption that cannot be healed; it has raised between God and man an infinite qualitative difference that will last forever. This principle of the infinite qualitative difference is reflected in the Protestant theories of theological language: in the theory of analogy of extrinsic attribution of classical theology, in the Hegelian theory of dialectic, in Tillich's theory of symbolic analogy, in Barth's theory of analogy of faith, and in Bultmann's theory of existential analogy. While in the Catholic theory of analogy it is legitimate to use human concepts and human language when one talks about God because of a permanent analogy existing between God's being and man's being, according to the Protestant theories of analogy any such use is condemned, because after the Fall there is no longer an analogy of being between God and man. Therefore men's words are such that they can never, of themselves, be properly predicated of God. They can express divine reality either by a purely extrinsic attribution, or dialectically, or symbolically, or mythically, or by a divine choice.

What should one say of these Protestant theories of theological language? Are they satisfactory? Are they such as to give one some knowledge of God? Catholic and Protestant theologians generally agree that the very possibility of any knowledge of God, both natural and revealed, rests on analogy: in the natural knowledge it is man who takes some concepts from nature and applies them to God; whereas in the supernatural knowledge it is God Himself who chooses some of the concepts used by man in order to tell him something about Himself. The first kind of analogy is called analogia entis, the second, analogia fidei. According to the Catholic doctrine on the relationship between GRACE AND NATURE, there is no conflict, but harmony, between the two analogies: grace does not destroy analogy, but, by raising it into analogy of faith, fulfills it. On the contrary, according to the Protestant doctrine on the relationships between nature and grace, there can be no harmony between the two analogies but only conflict: analogy of being cannot be redeemed and therefore it cannot be raised into analogy of faith. Between analogy of being and analogy of faith there is a permanent "ontological" conflict.

From the Catholic point of view such a conflict is inadmissible: "to separate the supernatural from the natural knowledge of God in this radical way is to render the former unintelligible and impossible, since revelation, and this is clear, does not change our natural mode of knowing, but utilizes the natural instruments of our knowledge, our acquired concepts, and our mental constructions" [J. H. Nicolas, "Affirmation de Dieu et connaissance," Revue thomiste 64 (1964) 201].

See Also: ANALOGY; ANALOGY OF FAITH;
ANTHROPOMORPHISM (IN THEOLOGY);

METHODOLOGY (THEOLOGY); REASONING, THEOLOGICAL; THEOLOGICAL CONCLUSION; THEOLOGICAL TERMINOLOGY; THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF; THEOLOGY, INFLUENCE OF GREEK PHILOSOPHY ON.

Bibliography: The use of analogy in theology. G. P. KLUBERTANZ, St. Thomas Aquinas on Analogy (Chicago 1960), full bibliog. A. CHOLLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 1.1:1142–54. Y. M. J. CONGAR, ibid. 15.1:382–386, 389–390, 452–453. E. CORETH and E. PRZYWARA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 1:468–473. E. PRZYWARA, ibid. 473–476. K. BARTH, Anselm: Fides quaerens intellectum, tr. I. W. ROBERTSON (London 1960); Nein! Antwort an Emil Brunner (Munich 1934); Church Dogmatics (New York 1955–). J. BITTREMIEUX, De analogia nostra Dei cognitione (Louvain 1913). Y. M. J. CONGAR, La Foi et la théologie (Tournai 1962). M. T. L. PENIDO, Le rôle de l'analogie en théologie dogmatique (Bibliothèque Thomiste 15; Paris 1931). I. T. RAMSEY, Religious Language (New York 1963). G. SÖHNGEN, Analogie und Metapher: Kleine Philosophie und Theologie der Sprache (Freiburg 1962). V. BRUSOTTI, "L'analogia di attribuzione e la conoscenza della natura di Dio," Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica 27 (1935) 31–66. K. FECKES, "Die Analogie in unserem Gotteskennen," in Probleme der Gotteserkenntnis, ed. A. DYROFF et al. (Münster 1928). L. LE ROHELLEC, "Cognitio nostra analogica de Deo," Divus Thomas 30 (1927) 298–319. G. M. MANSER, "Die analoge Erkenntnis Gottes," Divus Thomas 6 (1928) 385–403. J. F. ROSS, "Analogy as a Rule of Meaning for Religious Language," International Philosophical Quarterly 1 (1961) 468–502. A. D. SERTILLANGES, "Agnosticisme ou anthropomorphisme," Revue de philosophie 8 (1906) 129–165. Aquinas's theory of analogy. J. F. ANDERSON, The Bond of Being (St. Louis 1949). B. M. BELLERATE, L'analogia Tomista nei grandi commentatori di S. Tommaso (Rome 1960). C. FABRO, Partecipazione e causalità secondo S. Tommaso d'Aquino (Turin 1960). J. FEHR, Das Offenbarungsproblem in dialektischer und thomistischer Theologie (Fribourg 1939). J. HABBEL, Die Analogie zwischen Gott und Welt nach Thomas von Aquin (Berlin 1928). H. LYTTKENS, The Analogy between God and the World (Uppsala 1952). R. M. MCINERNEY, The Logic of Analogy (The Hague 1961). B. MONTAGNES, La Doctrine de l'analogie de l'être d'après saint Thomas d'Aquin (Louvain 1963). G. PHELAN, St. Thomas and Analogy (Milwaukee 1941). O. A. VARANGOT, Analogia de atribución intrínseca y analogia del ente según Santo Tomás (Buenos Aires 1957). F. A. BLANCHE, "La Notion d'analogie dans la philosophie de S. Thomas d'Aquin," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 10 (1921) 170–193. B. LANDRY, "L'analogie de proportion chez S. Thomas d'Aquin," Revue néo-scholastique de philosophie (1922) 257–280. A. MARC, "L'Idée thomiste de l'être et les analogies d'attribution et de proportionnalité," ibid. 35 (1933) 157–189. E. WINANCE, "L'Essence divine et la connaissance humaine dans le Commentaire sur les Sentences de S. Thomas," Revue philosophique de Louvain 55 (1957) 171–215. H. A. WOLFSON, "St. Thomas on Divine Attributes," in Mélanges offerts à Étienne Gilson de l'Académie française (Toronto 1959) 673–700.

[B. MONDIN]

ANALOGY OF FAITH

Originally a mathematical term, the Greek word for ANALOGY means "proportion" and was borrowed by philosophers to refer to the relationship between concepts of things that are partly the same and partly different. It took on special importance in the concept of analogy of being (analogia entis). The analogy of faith (analogia fidei) must not be confused with this more philosophic concept. The phrase analogy of faith is Biblical: Rom 12.6 speaks of the charism of prophecy, along with such similar gifts as ministering, teaching, exhorting. Prophets exercised one of several "offices" within the primitive church (Acts 11.27; 13.1); guided by the Spirit, they gained insight into the faith or recognized tasks to be undertaken. The Pauline injunction is given that this gift of prophecy must be exercised "according to the proportion [ἀναλογίαν] of faith." No prophet is to be accepted who proclaims anything opposed to the "one faith" proper to the "one body in Christ." Such preaching would be out of proportion to, or beyond, the objective truth entrusted to the Christian community.

The analogy of faith, therefore, has always been associated with the one unchanging faith of the Church; it is closely related to the notion of TRADITION and soon became a norm for the early Christian writers. They saw a "proportion" in the manner in which the New Testament complements the Old Testament, and in which each particular truth contributes to the inner unity of the entire Christian revelation. Thus the phrase came to indicate a rule or guide for the exegesis of Scripture (see HERMENEUTICS, BIBLICAL). In difficult texts, the teachings of tradition and the analogy of faith must lead the way. The Catholic exegete, conscious of his faith, recognizes the intimate relationship between Scripture and tradition; he strives to explain Scriptural passages in such a way that the sacred writers will not be set in opposition to one another or to the faith and teaching of the Church (cf. Leo XIII, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3283; Pius X, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3546; Pius XII, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3887).

Karl Barth's violent rejection of the analogia entis "as the invention of Antichrist" and his insistence that in questions of revelation only the analogia fidei is acceptable occasioned further study of this problem. In its reaction against the extremes of liberal Protestantism, DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY (or crisis theology) built upon KIERKEGAARD's notion of God as "completely other" than man, and as totally transcendent. Analogia fidei means for Barth that we possess a "theological language" in which God and not man gives meaning to the words. His great fear is that philosophy (represented by analogia entis) will sit in judgment on the Word of God.

Söhngen points out that Barth misunderstands the Catholic notion of analogia entis, and that it does not make philosophy master over faith [Catholica, three (1934) 113–136, 176–208; four (1935) 38–42]. Though not convinced, Barth admits the pertinence of Söhngen's remarks. Barth's fear of rationalistic "proofs" for the mysteries of faith may indicate here an identification of the Catholic doctrine with the admittedly too rationalistic theories of faith of the post-Cartesian era; a clearer grasp of the Thomist-Suarezian approaches might remove this fear. Barth seems to be more concerned here with certitude, so that he looks upon the analogia entis as something on the level of knowledge rather than being—noetic rather than ontic. The Catholic will not hesitate to admit that it is God who gives His meaning to the human words used to express the divine; an analogia fidei in this sense is essential. The Christian vocabulary has only gradually been formed throughout the life of the divinely guided Church. To reject the analogia entis entirely, however, cuts man off so radically from God that, as Emil Brunner points out, the end result can be nothing but the most advanced form of Nominalism, in which human words take on divine meanings that are purely arbitrary and are in no way reflected in a reality already existing in the midst of creatures.

Bibliography: K. BARTH, Church Dogmatics, tr. G. T. THOMSON (New York 1955–). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, Karl Barth: Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie (2d ed. Cologne 1962). H. BOUILLARD, Karl Barth, 3 v. (Paris 1957) 2:190–217. J. L. MURPHY, With the Eyes of Faith (Milwaukee 1965). B. NEUNHEUSER, "La teologia protestante in Germania," in Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica, 2 v. (Milan 1957) v.1. E. PRZYWARA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:473–476.

[J. L. MURPHY]

ANALYSIS AND SYNTHESIS

Transcriptions of the Greek ἀνάλυσις, from ἀνὰ and λύω, meaning resolution, and σύνθεσις, from σύν and τίθημι, meaning composition. Analysis and synthesis are methods of inquiry and processes of things. Logical statements of analysis and synthesis, therefore, reflect basic metaphysical and epistemological theories.

Greek Thought. EPICURUS, building on the atomic philosophy of DEMOCRITUS, rejected dialectic for a canonic of sensations, preconceptions, and passions. All man's notions are derived from sensations by contact, analogy, likeness, and synthesis (Diogenes Laertius, 10.31–32). PLATO distinguished two methods in dialectic: division (διάρεσις) and bringing together (συναγωγή); and later commentators, such as Ammonius, PROCLUS, and Diogenes Laertius, enumerate three or four dialectical methods that include "analysis" but not "synthesis."

Aristotle, who frequently contrasted the methods of Democritus and Plato, made use of both analysis (but not in the sense of dichotomous division) and of synthesis (but not in the sense of combination of atomic parts). Aristotle distinguishes between a mixture, or composition (σύνθεσις), and a compound, or combination (μίξις; Gen. et cor. 328a 5–17); but he also uses "synthesis" more broadly to include three kinds: compositions of elements in simple substances, compositions of simple substances in homoeomerous substances (bones, flesh, etc.), and compositions of these in more complex organic and inorganic bodies (Part. animal. 646a 12–24; Topica 151a 20–31). Thinking is true or false by a synthesis (or division) of objects of thought (Anim. 430a 26–b 4); synthesis and division are essential to truth and falsity, and nouns and verbs are related by synthesis and division in propositions (Interp. 16a 9–18). In general, a synthesis is a combination of parts in a whole, and its opposite is division rather than analysis. Analysis is resolution in two senses for Aristotle. In the Prior Analytics it is the resolution of all syllogisms to the perfect, or universal, syllogisms of the first figure (47a 2–5). In the Posterior Analytics it is the resolution of demonstrative syllogisms to true premises (78a 6–8). In the latter sense practical deliberation, like mathematical inquiry, is an analysis: what is sought is assumed and the means of achieving it are sought. What is last in the order of analysis is first in the order of genesis (Eth. Nic. 1112b 11–24).

Commentators. Mathematical analysis is presented by Euclid, Pappus, and Proclus as Aristotle formulated it. Analysis is the method of assuming what is sought and tracing its consequences to something admitted to be true. These thinkers added, however, that synthesis is the contrary method of assuming that which is admitted to be true and tracing its consequences. Alexander of Aphrodisias attributes this geometrical conception of analysis and synthesis to Aristotle in his commentary on the Prior Analytics. Synthesis is the way from principles to that which is derived from the principles, and analysis is the return from the ends to the principles. Greek commentators tended to accept this interpretation, and it was reinforced by Galen's inclusion of analysis and synthesis among the methods of medicine. Cicero, on the other hand, distinguished two methods, "invention" and "judgment" and since the method of invention is developed in the Topics, the method of judgment was sought in the Analytics. After the translation of the Analytics and the Topics in the 12th century, the terms resolutio (analysis) and compositio (synthesis) took their places beside inventio and iudicium in the interpretation of Aristotle's logic. THOMAS AQUINAS distinguishes three applications of these terms: (1) nouns and verbs are related in propositions by composition and division; (2) inferences involving certainty depend on judgment and are treated in the Analytiks, those short of certainty depend on invention, and inventions concerned with probabilities are treated in the Topics; and (3) inference from experienced composites to simple principles is resolution, and inference from principles or simples to conclusions or composites is composition.

Renaissance and Modern Thought. During the Renaissance, problems of method assumed a central place in the arts and sciences and in logic. All the varieties of classifications of methods in logic and rhetoric, mathematics and medicine, science, practice, and the arts were brought into complex opposition. Two pairs of distinctions—analysis and synthesis, and judgment and invention (or discovery)—emerged as dominant, sometimes in opposition, sometimes merging. Peter RAMUS held that there is a single method and that invention and judgment are phases of its employment. His opponents, e.g., J. Schegk (1511–87) and J. ZABARELLA, differentiated analysis and synthesis, resolution and composition. Basic issues of philosophy and scientific method were involved in the oppositions. Analysis and synthesis may be conceived in terms of parts and wholes or in terms of principles and conclusions. By the first approach analysis proceeds from wholes to parts, and synthesis arranges parts in wholes; by the second approach analysis proceeds from effects to causes, and synthesis from principles to conclusions. The first constitutes a single method in which discovery is a synthesis of elements analyzed, and knowledge is conceived as empirical and a posteriori; the second distinguishes two processes, the analytic discovery of causes and principles and the synthetic derivation of conclusions; knowledge is conceived as universal and a priori. These differences emerged in formulations of scientific method when F. BACON sought a method of discovery in topics or tables of observations and a synthesis in the increase and organization of the sciences, while R. DESCARTES sought a method of discovery in the methods of mathematical analysis and a synthesis in mathematical deduction.

Differences of method underlie the treatment of simple, clear, and distinct ideas by the philosophers of the 17th and 18th centuries. I. Kant abandoned dogmatic philosophy for the methods of critical philosophy and emphasized the need to distinguish (as many philosophers beginning with Aristotle had) between analytic and synthetic as applied to propositions or judgments and analytic and synthetic methods. He argued against D. HUME that significant, and therefore true, judgments must be synthetic and that mathematical truths are synthetic, not analytic; he also sought to establish synthetic judgments a priori in mathematics, physics, and ethics by deriving them from principles synthetically.

Contemporary Usage. The oppositions of analytic and synthetic in contemporary philosophy apply the same distinctions to experience, nature, phenomena, and language; and the prominence of “analysis” in many 20th-century philosophies is conditioned by the same contradictory oppositions of definition. The truths of mathematics are analytic in an “analysis” related to the language of the Principia Mathematica, and they are derived, as the truths of any formalized science can be, from logical primitives. The analysis of language may be of formal languages or of actual languages, and it may proceed by constructing operational rules of use and of interpretation or by uncovering meanings of basic terms and of their coherences and incoherences. Phenomenological and existential analysis, on the other hand, seeks to avoid deduction and returns at each point to direct experience of phenomena without abstract separation of language, thought, and thing. Mathematics, psychology, and all the special sciences are subject to the same phenomenological analysis, but for that reason analysis does not depend on the conclusions of any of the sciences. The analysis of the phenomenologically given may adumbrate a transcendent ontological reality, or it may proceed creatively and operationally to the discovery of ontological essences emergent from existences. In both forms of analysis there is a tendency to refute or destroy the errors of past philosophers. Error is a mistaken synthesis, but there are many forms of analysis and, therefore, many errors of analysis owing to the fact that by one analysis other analyses are frequently seen to be undetected syntheses.

See Also: DEDUCTION; INDUCTION.

Bibliography: S. CARAMELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:185–90. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:45–46, 3:201–04. S. E. DOLAN, “Resolution and Composition in Speculative and Practical Discourse,” Laval Théologique et Philosophique 6 (1950) 9–62. L. M. RÉGIS, “Analyse et synthèse dans l’oeuvre de saint Thomas,” Studia Mediaevalia in honorem A. R. P. Martin (Bruges 1948) 303–30.

[R. MCKEON]

ANAMNESIS

From the Greek ἀνάμνησις, meaning remembrance, commemoration, memorial, re-presentation in the sense of “making present” once again in the here and now. It takes up Christ’s injunction, “Do this in remembrance of me” (1 Cor 11.24), and recalls the purpose of the Eucharistic rites as a commemoration of Christ and His salvific work.

History of the Term. It is not easy to render the word accurately in English, since it implies both a subjective and an objective element. Greek versions of the Bible use the word to translate various forms of the Hebrew root zkr. Such passages as Prv 10.7, Jb 18.17, and Ps 134 (135).13 show that memory and memorial are closely connected with the Hebrew conception of the “name,” which connotes the personality and power of God. From Nm 15.40 and Ps 103.18 it is clear that remembering is inseparably linked with action of some kind. A memorial sacrifice is suggested by ’azkārâ in Lv 24.7 and zikkārôn in Nm 10.10. Anamnesis and its cognate verb have the sense not merely of remembering something absent but of recalling or representing before God an event of the past so that it becomes present and operative in the here and now. Thus the sacrifice of a wife accused of adultery (Nm 5.15) is an ordeal that recalls her fault to God’s remembrance, and the widow in 1 Kgs 17.18 complains that Elijah had come only to recall to God’s remembrance the record of her sin. Finally, remembering is further related to the covenant (1 Chr 16.17–18; Ex 6.5–6) and to the theme of the Passover feast (Ex 12.14; Dt 16.1–3); but we cannot deduce much from this association.

St. Paul may have been influenced by the use of zikkārôn in Ex 13.9, when in 1 Cor 5.7–8 he declares: “Christ our passover has been sacrificed. Let us celebrate . . . with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.”

Function in the Eucharist. The anamnesis interprets the mystery of the Mass, tying it to the events of salvation history; it serves to bring out a basic aspect of the Mass, that it is a memorial of Christ and His salvific acts. Because it is a relative sacrifice, the Eucharist not only recalls by reflection the personal relationship God established by Christ’s death and Resurrection, but also represents these acts sacramentally, so that the worshiping community enters effectively into the everlasting sacrifice of the risen Lord, which is thus made present on earth. St. John Chrysostom is typical of early writers and subsequent tradition alike in his emphasis on the relation of Christ’s sacrificial death and Resurrection: “We offer even now what was done then, for we perform the anamnesis of His death” (In Hebr. Hom. 17.3; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 63:131). The anamnesis in the Roman Canon makes clear, too, the role of the Church: “We thy servants and thy holy people” join in offering Christ’s sacrifice.

In the light of OT and early Christian usage, it is evident that the celebration of the Eucharist is certainly more than a mere recollection or subjective memory (μνεᾶτα or μνήμη; cf. Rom 1.9–10); the Lord’s Supper was not continued as a sort of funeral banquet, implying a mere mental commemoration. Nor is it some pale and powerless imitation of the dromena of the pagan mysteries, for it is the memorial that proclaims the Lord’s sacrificial death (1 Cor 11.26). It is rather an anamnesis, an objective memorial directed Godward, releasing Christ’s personality and power afresh; it is the experience of a fellowship with Christ in His eternal sacrifice. Since Christianity is a historical religion, based on the Incarnation of the Son of God and His redemptive death and Resurrection, it is these paschal mysteries that are sacramentally perpetuated in the Mass, the sign of Christ’s new covenant with the whole of humanity.

Liturgical Use. The anamnesis follows the Consecration and is found in almost all liturgies (Serapion’s is a marked exception). The oldest extant text is in the 3d-century Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus: “Memores igitur mortis et resurrectionis eius offerimus tibi panem et calicem” (4; B. Botte, ed., La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution, 16). In Gallican and Mozarabic liturgies this prayer is called post pridie, post mysteria, or post secreta. The Gallican liturgies generally limit themselves to an anamnesis of Christ’s death; the Resurrection is already mentioned in Hippolytus; and the Ascension is cited in the 4th-century De Sacramentis. Eastern liturgical rites often add other mysteries.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Eucharistic Prayer: A Study of the Canon Missae, tr. R. L. BATLEY (Notre Dame, Ind. 1956) 1–14. P. L. MALLOY, “Christian Anamnesis and Popular Religion,” Liturgical Ministry 7 (1998) 121–28. P. SCHÄFER, “Eucharist: Memorial of the Death and Resurrection of Jesus,” in The Meaning of the Liturgy, ed. A. A. HÄUSSLING (Collegeville, Minn. 1994) 56–78. R. L. BRAWLEY, “Anamnesis and Absence in the Lord’s Supper,” Biblical Theology Bulletin 20 (1990) 139–46. D. N. POWER, “The Anamnesis: Remembering, We Offer,” in New Eucharistic prayers, ed. F. SENN (Mahwah, N.J. 1987) 146–168.

[F. A. BRUNNER/EDS.]

ANARCHISM

A doctrine that teaches the necessity to eliminate political authority in order to realize social justice and individual freedom. It is usually accompanied by opposition to private property and organized religion. Anarchism is rooted in these assumptions: (1) that man is good and essentially altruistic by nature; (2) that he is free only when he follows his powers and prescribes a rule to himself; (3) that he has been corrupted by the STATE and by LAW, which are always instruments of class or personal exploitation and oppression; and (4) that a natural, interpersonal harmony of interests exists in the economic and the moral order in the absence of the state. These assumptions lead to the following conclusions: (1) that social injustice and moral evil can neither be cured nor diminished by state action; (2) that the division of labor should always be on a voluntary basis; (3) that the state should be replaced by voluntary cooperation arising from below, that is, proceeding from individuals to groups, and, on the federal principle, to higher forms of human association; and (4) that voluntary association implies the right of secession.

History. Anarchist ideas extend back at least as far as Zeno (c. 320–c. 250 B.C.), the founder of STOICISM. Building on the principle of self-sufficiency, Zeno prescribed an ideal society wherein men would live without family, property, or courts of law. In medieval Europe the pantheistic BROTHERS AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT rejected all authority and advocated communism of goods and women. During the Hussite wars, Petr Chelčický (c. 1390–c. 1460) taught that since all compulsion is from the devil, the state is evil and must disappear along with class distinctions. ANABAPTISTS of the 16th century believed themselves freed from all law by Christ's grace, refused to pay taxes or tithes, and held wives and property in common. The French writers Rabelais (c. 1495–1553) and FÉNELON (1651–1715) expressed anarchist ideas that were later shared by some 18th-century philosophes. A couplet of Diderot is typical: "La nature n'a fait ni serviteurs ni maîtres/Je ne veux ni donner ni recevoir des lois."

Systematic Anarchism. Modern anarchist thought draws on the classical liberal belief in a natural economic order and on the philosophy of Ludwig FEUERBACH (1804–72), which emphasizes the need to eliminate man's alienation from his true self by a reduction of all barriers and a reclamation of the material world. William Godwin (1756–1836), in his Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Political Justice (1793), considered government and property acquired by exploitation as basic evils, and he advocated a stateless society of self-governing communities with goods in common. He conceded that if the most natural and just associations were established, the conduct of some men would need to be restrained for a lengthy period until their corrupted instincts were corrected. The left-wing Hegelian Max Stirner (1806–56), in his Der Einziger und sein Eigentum (1844), argued that only the individual is real and that restraints such as the state, property, religion, and philosophical abstractions are detrimental to his self-realization. He advocated replacing the state with a voluntary association of egoists. The term anarchism was used for the first time by a systematic anarchist thinker, Pierre Joseph Proudhon (1809–65), in his Qu'est-ce que la propriété? (1840). He defined property, in the sense of goods obtained by usurpation and monopoly, as theft. He urged its elimination not by expropriation but by the establishment of banks of exchange that would operate on a basis of mutuality of individual services calculated in units of labor. He thought that such banks would lead to further free associations of persons having the same interests, which would ultimately eliminate the exploitative economic order and the state. Proudhon recognized that a complete removal of the state could not be readily realized, and he argued that the practical aim should be a minimization of coercion and decentralization, and the encouragement of voluntary groups.

Collectivist Form. With Michael Bakunin (1814–76), anarchism assumed a decidedly collectivist form. He argued that political authority, private property, and religion are natural institutions in the lower stages of human evolution, and proclaimed: "L'Eglise et l'Etat sont mes deux bête noires." The state is harmful because it supports an exploitative economic order and acts by coercion. Bakunin held that society should be built on voluntary association and cooperation, with common ownership in land and the means of production—"there will be a free union of individuals into communes, of communes into provinces, of provinces into nations, and finally of nations into the United States of Europe, and later of the whole world." Bakunin introduced into the anarchist movement an emphasis on terroristic violence that was brought to Russia and merged with NIHILISM by his pupil Sergei Netschayev. Prince Peter Kropotkin (1842–1921) wedded anarchism to a communism based on the commune, an autonomous unit owning all means of production and consumption. He believed coercive authority unnecessary because the new society would accord with the natural cooperative impulse in man and because free agreements need not be enforced. That modern anarchist thought is not uniformly antithetical to religion is evidenced in the thought of Count Leo TOLSTOI (1828–1910). Although he rejected the divinity of Christ and personal immortality, Tolstoi taught that the Gospels indicate that religion means altruistic love of neighbor and that this is negated by political authority, which proceeds from egoism and violence.

Contemporary Significance. Proponents of anarchism have differed over means of implementation. Godwin rejected violence and advocated education; Proudhon did not preach violence but believed outbreaks to be inevitable; the collectivists Bakunin and Kropotkin preached its necessity while Tolstoi repudiated it, emphasizing noncooperation with the state. With the spread of the ideas of Bakunin and Kropotkin, propaganda by the deed of terroristic violence was accepted by many and rationalized as a proper means to capture the imagination of the masses. Unquestionably the invidious connotation given the term anarchist in the popular mind is due principally to acts of terror, such as the assassination of Pres. William McKinley. Generally speaking, violence (and atheism) has been most associated with anarchism in the Latin countries. Allied with syndicalism as a mass movement, it reached a high point for a short period in the Spanish Civil War in Catalonia when anarchosyndicalists assumed authority. In the contemporary world, however, anarchism has little significance as a political movement. It survives principally in intellectual circles as an ideal to be approximated, if not realized, and as a means of protest against the mass society and centralized economic and political order.

Critique. Anarchism's fundamental assumption of man's natural goodness is contradicted not only by the theological doctrine of original sin but also by historical experience. Although the antagonistic tendencies in men may be less strong than the cooperative, it is unwarranted to attribute the former solely to the institutional environment while deeming the latter completely natural. Further, legal power subserving the common good is not an avoidable hindrance to, but a necessary precondition of, the full development of human freedom and the attainment of social justice. Finally, it is inconceivable that the state can be destroyed without violence; if violence is used, a new coercive state will necessarily succeed.

Bibliography: M. NETTLAU, Bibliographie de l'anarchie (Brussels 1897); Der Anarchismus von Proudhon zu Kropotkin (Berlin 1927). E. V. ZENKER, Anarchism (New York 1897). E. H. CARR, Michael Bakunin (London 1937). R. ROCKER, Anarcho-Syndicalism (London 1938). H. READ, The Philosophy of Anarchism (London 1940). G. D. H. COLE, Socialist Thought: Marxism and Anarchism (London 1954). J. JOLL, The Anarchists (London 1964). I. L. HOROWITZ, ed., The Anarchists (New York 1964). D. NOVAK, "Place of Anarchism in the History of Political Thought," Review of Politics 20 (1958) 307-29.

[A. J. BEITZINGER]

ANASTASIA, SS.

Anastasia is the name of a martyr saint commemorated in the Canon of the Roman Mass and in the second Mass of Christmas. The only known fact regarding Anastasia is that during the persecution by DIOCLETIAN a woman of that name suffered martyrdom at SIRMIMUM, where the faithful constructed a church in her honor. Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople (458-471), had her body translated to a sanctuary in the Byzantine capital. Various theories have arisen to explain her connection with Rome. In the fourth century Pope Damasus decorated a Roman basilica known under the title of "Anastasia," which apparently served the Palatine and imperial palace. Thus, the Church of Anastasia is an important Roman edifice having some connection with the emperor and the pope. Since the word "Anastasia" means Resurrection, H. GRISAR suggested that the church may have been built to commemorate that Christian mystery.

But P. Whitehead believes it took its name from the founder, probably the Emperor Constantine's sister, Anastasia. The name Anastasia was added to the Canon of the Mass late in the fifth century, and in the sixth century the basilica is referred to as a title church. The basilica, constructed between the Circus Maximus and the Palatine palace, seems to have originally been cruciform in style. It underwent various reconstructions and is an imposing structure with three aisles.

Feast: Dec. 25.

The Roman Martyrology cites another Anastasia, on April 15, who, with Basilissa, supposedly buried the bodies of SS. Peter and Paul and was beheaded by NERO. No evidence supports the existence of Anastasia and Basilissa.

Bibliography: H. GRISAR, Analecta Romana 1 (Rome 1899) 595-610. L. DUCHESNE, Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 7 (1887) 387-413. P. B. WHITEHEAD, "The Church of S. Anastasia in Rome," American Journal of Archaeology 2d ser. 31 (1927) 405-420. R. KRAUTHEIMER, Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae (Vatican City 1937-) 1:42-61. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:98; 4:613-614.

[E. G. RYAN]

ANASTASIUS, ST.

Hungarian archbishop; d. Nov. 12 c. 1036-39. A German disciple of Bishop ADALBERT OF PRAGUE, Anastasius (or Ascherich; Ascric; Astericus; Astrik; Radla-Astericus) became abbot of Adalbert's newly founded monasteries at Brevnov, near Prague (993), and then at Miedzyrzecz, Poland. He later undertook a mission to Hungary at the request of King STEPHEN I of Hungary, according to Stephen's vita (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 11:232-33). There Anastasius became abbot of St. Stephen's foundation at Pannonhalma, and later archbishop of Esztergom, possibly the only Hungarian metropolitan see (K. Schünemann). In 1007 Anastasius attended the Synod of Frankfurt, and in 1012 he was at the consecration of the church of St. Peter in Bamberg. His possible German origin and his certain presence at German synods is witness to the continued close links between Germany and the Christianization of Hungary under Duke Geza and Stephen I.

Feast: Nov. 12.

Bibliography: K. SCHÜNEMANN, Die Deutschen in Ungarn bis zum 12. Jahrhundert (Berlin-Leipzig 1923) 35-37, 46-48. A. BRACKMANN, Kaiser Otto III und die staatliche Umgestaltung Polens und Ungarns (Abhandlungen der Deutschen) 1939) 23-26; Zur Entstehung des ungarischen Staates (ibid. 1940) 17-19. R. BÄUMER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 1:494. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956)

Martyrdom of St. Anastasia, miniature in the 11th-century "Menologion of Basil II" (Vat. Cod. gr. 1613, fol. 110).

4:325–326. F. DVORNIK, The Making of Central and Eastern Europe (London 1949).

[V. I. J. FLINT]

ANASTASIUS I, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

491 to 518; b. Epidamnus, modern Durrës, Albania, 431; d. Constantinople, July 9, 518. He married the widowed Empress Ariadne and was named emperor after a successful administrative career. At heart he was a Monophysite, who as a layman had engaged in preaching and had exhibited traits of religious scrupulosity. Before being crowned emperor, he was forced to sign a profession of faith in the Council of Chalcedon by the patriarch of Constantinople, Euphemius. His reign was troubled by the strife wrought by the HENOTICON. An able administrator, he did much to reorganize the interior administration and settle the external problems of the empire. He attempted to impose MONOPHYSITISM on the Eastern bishops, aided mainly by SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH and PHILOXENUS OF MABBUH. In 496 he succeeded in deposing Euphemius, the patriarch of Constantinople, on surreptitious charges that stemmed from his intransigent support of the Council of Chalcedon; he deposed also Patriarch Macedonius (511), as well as Flavian of Antioch (512) and Elias of Jerusalem (516). The imposition in the liturgy of the Monophysite Trisagion brought strong reactions in Constantinople, and one of the imperial officers on the Danube, Vitalian, revolted (513–515). His attempts at reconciliation with Rome did not put an end to the ACACIAN SCHISM; and only in Syria and Egypt were the religious policies of Anastasius temporarily successful. However, he proved to be one of the most efficient and remarkable Byzantine emperors, despite the failure of his religious policy.

Bibliography: L. BRÉHIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 2:1447–57. P. CHARANIS, Church and State in the Later Roman Empire: The Religious Policy of Anastasius (Madison, Wis. 1939). E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire (Paris 1949–59) 2: 77–217.

[P. ROCHE]

ANASTASIUS I, ST. POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 27, 399 to Dec. 19, 401. Anastasius was apparently a Roman. St. Paulinus of Nola, whom he received in Rome and invited to attend his anniversary in 400, praised his charity and zeal. Jerome likewise held him in high esteem, particularly as he favored the anti-Origenist group of Jerome's friends in Rome.

After Rufinus of Aquileia translated Origen's Peri Archon in 398, omitting or correcting heterodox doctrines ascribed to Origen, Jerome was encouraged to make a literal translation, thus renewing the controversy over the orthodoxy of Origen, a theologian about whom Anastasius knew very little. Rufinus had enjoyed the confidence of Pope Siricius, but evidently Jerome's friends in Rome, particularly Marcella, and Eusebius of Cremona alerted Anastasius to the perceived dangers of Origen's teachings. When he received a cautionary letter from THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA, probably instigated by Jerome, he convened a Roman synod to condemn Origenism and then wrote to Simplicianus, Bishop of Milan, and to his successor, Venerius, proscribing Origenistic heresies. Rufinus, feeling himself implicated, wrote an Apologia addressed to Anastasius in which he gives an orthodox explanation of his faith and justifies his translations of Origen. Anastasius further wrote to JOHN OF JERUSALEM, and in mentioning Rufinus declared himself disinterested in the latter's fate, as long as he did not propagate Origenism.

Anastasius had also written to the Council of Carthage, which convened on Sept. 13, 401, to urge the African bishops to continue the battle against the Donatists (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 3:1023; 4:491). The Africans ignored his advice, however, and negotiated with the Donatists. He died on Dec. 19, 401 (Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, 1:219) and was buried "ad ursum pileatum."

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al. (Graz 1956). J. P. KIRSCH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART, et al. (Paris 1912–) 2:1471–73. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:218–219. F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1, 2; 1922). E. CASPAR, Geschichte der Papsstums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 1:285–287, 291. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 1:49. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980), 2:126–128, 250–254. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 36–37; Jerome (London 1975), 246–253. E. CLARK, Origenist Controversy (Princeton 1992), 171–173. A. DIBERARDINO, Patrology (Westminster, Md. 1986), 4:581–582

[P. T. CAMELOT]

ANASTASIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 24, 496, to Nov. 19, 498. When GELASIUS I was succeeded by the conciliatory Anastasius

II, hopes were raised that the ACACIAN SCHISM could be brought to an end. Papal legates were dispatched to Constantinople to announce the pope's election and to sound out the Emperor ANASTASIUS I. The pope was prepared to make a notable concession by recognizing the baptisms and ordinations performed by Acacius, but required that Acacius' name be removed from the diptychs. He made no mention of Peter Mongos. The success of the mission was compromised by the senator Faustus, the emissary of the Gothic King Theodoric, who led the emperor to believe that Rome could be won over to acceptance of the HENOTICON if the emperor recognized Theodoric's rule in Italy.

The pope's conciliatory efforts in his friendly reception of the deacon Photinus, sent to Rome by the archbishop of Thessalonica, who had been one of the most determined supporters of Acacius, displeased some of the Roman clergy and they renounced communion with Anastasius II, thus creating a schism within Rome itself. The pope died at this juncture, "struck dead by the divine will" according to the Liber pontificalis. This statement perpetuated the legend of the pope's "apostasy" during the Middle Ages. Dante placed him among the heretics in the sixth circle of hell. Pope Anastasius II wrote a letter to the bishops of Gaul condemning traducianism. A letter to King CLOVIS I congratulating him on his conversion is apocryphal, as Clovis was not baptized until after the pope's death. Anastasius II was buried in the portico of St. Peter's.

Bibliography: A. THIEL, ed., Epistolae Romanorum pontificum (Braunsberg 1868) 1.615–639. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:258–259; 3:87. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages, 2nd ed. (New York 1962). R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957) 105. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 1:49. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980), 2:430. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 49–50. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979), 67–68.

[J. CHAPIN]

ANASTASIUS III, POPE

Pontificate: c. June 911 to c. October 913; b. Rome; d. there. He was the son of Lucian, but little is known of him, except that he was a man of good repute. He succeeded SERGIUS III and ruled in a time of turmoil when the government of Rome was dominated by THEOPHYLACTUS, consul et senator, and his energetic wife, THEODORA. The papal throne was at that time entirely in the control of this powerful family (see TUSCULANI). There is extant only one authentic document of Anastasius' reign, a bull granting the PALLIUM to Ragembert, Bishop of Vercelli. Another bull, purporting to grant extensive jurisdiction to the bishop of Hamburg, is spurious. Anastasius was buried in ST. PETER'S BASILICA.

Bibliography: A. CLERVAL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:1475. F. X. SEPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munic 1954–59) 2:350. G. HOCQUARD, Catholicisme 1:510–511. R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna, (1999) 34–35. S. SCHOLZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 120–121.

[A. J. ENNIS]

ANASTASIUS IV, POPE

Pontificate: July 12, 1153, to Dec. 3, 1154; b. Conrad de Suburra, Rome. As cardinal bishop of Sabina (named probably 1126), he actively supported the election of Innocent II in 1130 and served as his vicar in Rome when that pope was absent in France. Already old and experienced, he was elected pope without opposition on the day of Eugene III's death and consecrated on July 12, 1153. Anastasius was charitable to the Romans during famine, and he built a papal residence near the Pantheon. During his pontificate, WILLIAM FITZHERBERT was reinstated and Sweden began to pay PETER'S PENCE. When his legate to Germany failed to settle the matter of Frederick I Barbarossa's translation of WICHMANN from Naumburg to the See of Magdeburg, a move already denounced by Eugene, Anastasius accepted Wichmann and bestowed the pallium on him in Rome. He was criticized for his overly compliant attitude.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 188:989–1088. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 2:89–102. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE ((Paris 1886–92) 2:388. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 9:221–231. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (2d rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 3:116–120. F. X. SEPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1956) 3:212, 606ff. J. LAUDAGE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (3d ed. Freiburg 1995). J.N.D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 173.

[M. W. BALDWIN]

ANASTASIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarch, 730 to 753. At the dismissal of Germanus as patriarch of Constantinople because of his opposition to ICONOCLASM, the Emperor LEO III appointed the syn-cellus Anastasius as patriarch (Jan. 22, 730). Anastasius was excommunicated by Pope GREGORY III as a heretic and intruder, and the emperor in turn detached the Hellenized provinces of Sicily, Calabria, and the Balkan Peninsula from Roman allegiance, attaching them to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. Thus a further step was taken in the rupture between Rome and Byzantium. In 741 Anastasius supported the revolt of usurper Artabasdus, crowned him emperor, and agreed to the restoration of the holy icons in the city's churches. On suppression of the rebellion by the Emperor CONSTANTINE V Anastasius was severely punished and humiliated publicly, but retained the patriarchal throne. His subsequent reign was marked by an intensification of iconoclastic propaganda directed by the emperor himself. The patriarch died while preparations were being made for the Iconoclast council of 754.

Bibliography: B. KOTTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:491. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State (Oxford 1956) 145–147, 152–153. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople (Kadikoi-Bucharest 1932) 1.2:8–9.

[F. DE SA]

ANASTASIUS, PATRIARCHS OF ANTIOCH, SS.

Anastasius I, Patriarch of Antioch; d. c. 599. He was apocrisarius of the See of Alexandria at Antioch and was elected patriarch in 559. He showed himself an intrepid defender of orthodoxy, opposing strenuously Emperor JUSTINIAN I's edict on Aphthartodocetism (565), and was exiled to Jerusalem in 570 by Emperor JUSTIN II. Pope GREGORY I, then apocrisarius of Pope PELAGIUS II at Constantinople, sent several consoling letters to the exile, and on becoming pope interceded with Emperor Maurice for Anastasius' reinstatement (593). In exile Anastasius wrote much against heresy; five of his philosophical works are available in Latin translations. Because of the diversity of his argumentation, he is considered a precursor of scholasticism. He exercised great influence on later Greek theologians.

Feast: April 21.

Anastasius II, Patriarch of Antioch; d. c. 609. His letter to Pope Gregory I announcing his election and profession of faith is lost, but Gregory's reply exists (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 7:48). His Greek translation of Gregory's Liber regulae pastoralis also has disappeared. He was killed during an insurrection of the Jews when Emperor Phocas attempted to convert them by force.

Feast: Dec. 21.

Bibliography: Anastasius I. Patrologia Graeca 89:1293–1308. A. RAES, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961) 1:1064–65. E. STOMMEL, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:490–491. S. VAILLÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:1166. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:1460. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 619. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925). R. DEVREESE, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche (Paris 1945) 81, 83, 99, 118, 119. Anastasius II. A. RAES, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961) 1:1052–53. H. RAHNER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:491. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:1460.

[F. DE SAJ]

ANASTASIUS SINAITA, ST.

Seventh-century Palestinian monk, theological controversialist, and exegete revered as a saint by the Byzantine Church and included in the Roman Martyrology; d. Mt. Sinai, c. 700. He is of unknown origin and is confused with other authors. Anastasius was a monk on Mt. Sinai who left the monastery to dispute with heretics in Egypt and Syria and became known as the New Moses. His writings are edited uncritically and do not permit a fair judgment. The Hodegos, or Viae Dux, in 24 chapters, was composed in the desert against the monophysites (c. 685). The arguments on which it is based are buttressed by Aristotelian definitions and citations from the Fathers and the councils that are frequently faulty, indicating that he quoted from memory. In the Hodegos he mentions four other works: a Dogmatic Tome, the Apologetic Tome, the Treatise against Nestorius, and a Treatise against the Jews, which are now lost. A Quaestiones et Responsiones (Eratopokriseis) is in substance the work of Anastasius, but in its present form it shows signs of later additions. It deals with the whole gamut of monastic life and secular culture, and answers objections to the faith with Biblical and patristic texts. Eleven books of an exegetical work, Commentary on the Hexameron, are preserved in Latin, and only the twelfth is in the original Greek. The author depends on Pseudo-Dionysius and engages in exaggerated allegorism. A Dialogue on the Jews (Patrologia Graeca 89:1203–72) is not authentic.

Feast: April 21 (Orthodox Church).

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 89:35–1288. B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 633, 644. G. BARDY, Revue biblique 42 (1933) 339–343; Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:546–547. J. D. BAGGARLY, The Conjugates Christ-Church in the Hexameron of Ps.-Anastasius of Sinai (Rome 1974). J. B. PITRA, Iuris ecclesiastici Graecorum historia et monumenta, 2 v. (Rome 1868) 2:238–294. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:1482–83. U. RIEDINGER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:492. H.G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 442–446. M. SALSANO, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961) 1:1059–61.

[F. DE SAJ]

ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN

Enigmatic personality, very influential behind the scenes in Rome from the 840s to 870s; b. probably Rome, c. 810–817; d. c. 878. By his own account he was the nephew of Arsenius, the influential bishop of Orte, rather than his son, as HINCMAR OF REIMS held (Annales Bertiniani, ann. 868). His knowledge of Greek, which he learned at an early age, brought him into prominence. The beginning of his career was stormy and even scandalous. Created cardinal priest of St. Marcellus by LEO IV in 847 or 848, Anastasius soon abandoned his church for motives still obscure but in which ambition must have played a part; he was excommunicated (Dec. 16, 850), anathematized (May 29, and June 19, 853), and deposed (Dec. 8, 853). Between the election and the consecration (Sept. 29, 855) of BENEDICT III, successor to Leo IV (d. July 17, 855), Anastasius attempted to secure the pontifical throne by force and for a few days stood as antipope. Benedict III later admitted him again to lay communion. Anastasius henceforth altered his whole attitude, becoming a zealous defender of the succeeding popes. It is this change that explains why, up to the time of HERGENRÖTHER, Lapôte, and Perels, the existence of two men named Anastasius (Anastasius the cardinal and Anastasius the librarian) was admitted. Anastasius became abbot of S. Maria in Trastevere under NICHOLAS I, was freed from his suspension on the day of the consecration of ADRIAN II (Dec. 14, 867), and immediately afterward was named librarian of the Holy Roman Church, a post he retained under JOHN VIII until his death (the last official mention of him is May 29, 877, the first allusion to his successor, Zacharias of Anagni, March 29, 879).

It is hard to exaggerate the part Anastasius played from 861 onward in drawing up papal letters, especially those dealing with the Byzantine Church and the Patriarch PHOTIUS, whose determined opponent he was. At the beginning of 868 Anastasius was acting patron to SS. CYRIL (CONSTANTINE) and Methodius on their arrival in Rome with the Slavonic liturgy. When Eleutherius, the son of Arsenius, shortly afterward (March 10, 868) ravished the daughter of Adrian II and a few months later killed her and her mother, Stephania, Anastasius was accused of complicity in the murder, whereupon the previous condemnations were at once reimposed. After being rehabilitated, probably before the middle of 869, he was sent by Emperor LOUIS II to Constantinople, on the occasion of the eighth ecumenical council, CONSTANTINOPLE IV, to arrange a marriage between Louis's daughter, Ermengard, and the eldest son of the Byzantine Emperor Basil I. The project did not succeed, but Anastasius made good use of his stay, now in questioning METROPHANES OF SMYRNA, the bishop whom Photius had once exiled to Cherson, about the discovery there of the relics of Pope St. CLEMENT I by Cyril (Constantine), now by helping the official delegates of the Holy See to the Council, at whose last session (Feb. 28, 870) he also assisted. As the acta of the official delegates perished, it was his personal copy that was accepted in Rome; in 871 Anastasius offered Adrian his Latin translation of these acta, preceded by a long dedicatory epistle. He was to do precisely the same thing, at the beginning of the pontificate of the new Pope John VIII, with the acta of the seventh ecumenical Council (NICAEA II, 787). During John's pontificate Anastasius' literary activity was particularly intense, consisting mainly of translations (of unequal value) from Greek into Latin. Thus, he composed for John the Deacon of Rome (Hymmonides) a Chronographia tripertita out of extracts from the Byzantine chronicles of Patriarch NICEPHORUS I, GEORGE SYNCELLUS, and THEOPHANES and a Collectanea relating to the history of MONOTHELITISM. For Emperor Charles II the Bald, both before and after his coronation (Christmas 875), he translated the Scholia of St. MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR and of Patriarch JOHN III Scholasticus to the works of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS and the life of the latter by Patriarch METHODIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE (Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 554d), as well as summaries of liturgical treatises attributed to Maximus and to Patriarch GERMANUS I OF CONSTANTINOPLE and a passio of St. DEMETRIUS. His hagiographical work over 20 years included versions of lives, miracles, or translations relative to SS. JOHN THE ALMSGIVER, Patriarch of Alexandria, Basil of Caesarea, John Calybites, Bartholomew the Apostle, Pope Martin I, Stephen the protomartyr, Peter of Alexandria, Cyrus and John, and the 10,000 martyrs of Mt. Ararat. His translations of two short works of Cyril (Constantine) and his letter to Photius when he was restored to favor by John VIII are lost. Of the LIBER PONTIFICALIS, the composition of which was once gratuitously attributed to Anastasius, probably only the notice on Pope Adrian II is from his hand.

Bibliography: ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN, Epistolae sive praelectiones, ed. E. PERELS and G. LAEHR, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 7:395–442. U. WESTERBERGH, Anastasius Bibliothecarius. Sermo Theodori Studitae de sancto Bartholomaeo apostolo (Stockholm 1963). J. HERGENRÖTHER, Photius Patriarch von Konstantinopel, 3 v. (Regensburg 1867–69). A. LAPÔTRE, De Anastasio bibliothecario sedis apostolicae (Paris 1885). E. PERELS, Papst Nikolaus I und Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Berlin 1920). G. LAEHR, "Die Briefe und Prologe des Bibliothekars Anastasius," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 47 (1928) 416–468. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism: History and Legend (Cambridge, Eng. 1948). P. DEVOS, "Anastase le bibliothécaire: Sa Contribution à la correspondance pontificale. La date de sa mort," Byzantion 32 (1962) 97–115; "Une Passion grecque inédite de S. Pierre d'Alexandrie et sa traduction par Anastase le bibliothécaire," Analecta Bollandiana 83 (1965) 157–187.

[P. DEVOS]

ANATHEMA

A Greek term (ἀνάθεμα) found in the sense of accursed or separated from the fold in Rom 9.3 or 1 Cor 16.22. Theologically, the anathema in the canons of councils generally means that the doctrine so condemned is heretical and it's contradictory defined as revealed truth (see DEFINITION, DOGMATIC). Such is the case for the canons of Vatican I. However, P. Fransen's study of the anathema as used in Trent has shown that not only revealed doctrine but also DOGMATIC FACTS or disciplinary laws can be covered by a condemnation under anathema of their denial. In such a case, the anathema expresses repudiation of an inadmissible doctrine or practice.

Bibliography: A. VACANT, 1.1:1168–71. A. BRIDE, Catholicisme 1:516–517. H. VORGRIMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:494–495. P. FRANSEN, "Réflexions sur l'anathème; me au concile de Trente," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses (Bruges 1924–) 29 (1953) 657–672.

[P. DE LETTER/EDS.]

ANATHEMAS OF CYRIL

A summary under 12 heads (hence the alternative names, κεφάλαια, capitula) of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA's teaching against NESTORIUS. They were worded in such a way that refusal to accept any of them is to be regarded as a denial of the Catholic faith. "If anyone does not confess . . . let him be anathema."

Nestorius was condemned in Rome in 430, and Pope Celestine commissioned St. Cyril of Alexandria to obtain from him a retraction of his errors. On receiving the papal instructions, Cyril took it upon himself to draw up 12 propositions and send them with a covering letter to Nestorius. This action was unfortunate. He went beyond his brief in drawing up what amounted to a new profession of faith, and the way he formulated his doctrine was misunderstood in Antioch and Constantinople. At this time the use of certain terms in Christology was not yet stabilized. Moreover, there were two different current approaches to the theology of the Word Incarnate. Both were legitimate, both were based on scripture; but whereas Alexandria stressed the unity of Christ and thence proceeded to consider the divine and human elements, Antioch began with the humanity and then turned attention to the mystery that this man was also God. Cyril seems to have been unaware of the difference in terminology and emphasis of the two schools. What is more, the sources of some of his phrases were suspect. Both the μία φύσις (one physis) and the analogy between the human and divine nature in Christ and the union of body and soul in man were taken from Apollinarist works on the mistaken assumption that they were Athanasius'. It was not surprising then, that the Anathemas met with opposition. Theodoret of Cyr and Andrew of Samosata wrote refutations, and Cyril was obliged to defend his views in three apologies: Against the Eastern Bishops (Patrologia Graeca 76:315–386); Letter to Eutropius (Patrologia Graeca 76:385–452); Explanation of Twelve Chapters Pronounced at Ephesus (Patrologia Graeca 76:293–312). The text of the Anathemas can be found in Enchiridion symbolorum 252–263.

Contents. The first Anathema deals with the chief objection to Nestorius, since it defends Mary's title of THEOTOKOS, Mother of God. The second and third show the inadequacy of Cyril's vocabulary. In describing the unity of Christ he speaks indiscriminately of a physical or hypostatic union. For him the terms physis and HYPOSTASIS are interchangeable, and they are used to stress the fact that Christ is truly one, that there is a real union, not a mere association or harmony of two distinct realities. At Antioch the terms physis and hypostasis were also interchangeable, but there they were applied to the humanity and to the divinity to convey the idea that Christ is not only truly man but truly God as well. And so whereas Cyril maintained there was but one physis or hypostasis, Antioch maintained that there were two. Yet both views were within the realm of orthodoxy.

Some of the Anathemas have to do with predication. Both divine and human attributes are to be referred to the same Christ (4). The divine Word really suffered and died (12). St. Cyril later allowed that it was lawful to distinguish between statements concerning the human nature and those concerning the divine. The Nestorian heresy meant the need for caution in the use of certain titles and expressions in reference to Christ. He would not allow Christ to be called Theophoros, God-bearer. Some of the Fathers did use this name, but it does not sufficiently indicate the intimate union of the divine and human in Christ (5). Although scripture speaks of Christ as a servant, one cannot allow the Word of God to be called the master of Christ as Nestorius had done (6). Similarly, Nestorius had misconstrued Heb 3.1. The High Priest of men is not a man, but the Incarnate Word Himself (10). Neither is Christ an instrument of the Word; He is the Word (7). And so there is to be a single adoration of Christ, the Word Incarnate, not a coadoration of the man and the Word (8). Cyril brings out the fact that the Holy Spirit is not an alien power but the very Spirit of Christ (9). In the eleventh Cyril states that the flesh of the Lord has power to vivify, since it is the flesh of the divine Word. Antioch suspected such sentiments of APOLLINARIANISM, not recognizing that by flesh was meant the living, animated flesh.

Subsequent History. At the Council of EPHEBUS in 431 approval was given to Cyril's letter to Nestorius (no. 4 in collected letters; Patrologia Graeca 77:44–49), and this was accepted as the authentic interpretation of Nicaea I. But the other letter of Cyril (no. 17; Patrologia Graeca 77:105–121) to which the 12 Anathemas were appended did not receive such formal recognition. Later, at the time of Pope Vigilius, there was to be confusion as to which of the letters was solemnly approved. As Galtier has shown, the Anathemas are not to be taken as the solemn dogmatic teaching of the Council of Ephesus, although they are to be found in the acts of the Council. This is not to say that one can disregard the Anathemas. The first one with its defense of Theotokos was certainly accepted, and even the others reflect the mind of the Council. But the true meaning of these propositions was clouded by the lack of terminological precision; and when MONOPHYSITISM arose, the Church defended its position without recourse to the Anathemas. Cyril himself recognized their inadequacy in the discussions after Ephesus; and when union was achieved in 433 with John of Antioch, there was no mention of them. The contention that Monophysitism was a natural outcome of Cyril's teaching cannot be maintained; and if certain less happy terms of his were dropped at Chalcedon, it is incorrect to say that there was an abandonment of his theology.

In the changed conditions of the 6th century there was an attempt to incorporate into the Church's teaching certain formulas of Cyril that had been omitted at Chalcedon, including the Anathemas. But much of this stemmed from a desire to find agreement among the various contending parties. When the good name and traditions of ALEXANDRIA and ANTIOCH were at stake, much depended on the official recognition of the orthodoxy of the great figures in these churches. Consequently, the mention of the Anathemas in subsequent documents is often motivated by reasons other than theology. Now that the terminology has been stabilized, it is only the Monophysite churches that keep to the Cyrilline way of speaking.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, II (IN THEOLOGY); CHRISTOLOGY, CONTROVERSIES ON; JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 2:2642–43. G. JOUSSARD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl. Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 1:495–496. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–53), 3:116–142. J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960). H. DU MANOIR DE JUAYE, Dogme et spiritualité chez saint Cyrille d'Alexandrie (Paris 1944) 491–523. E. L. MASCALL, Via Media: An Essay in Theological Synthesis (Greenwich, Conn. 1957) 79–120. J. H. NEWMAN, Historical Sketches, 3 v. (New York 1903–06) 2:307–362 (Theodoret). P. T. CAMELOT, Épêse et Chalcedoine (Histoire des conciles oecuméniques 2; Paris 1962). H. M. DIEPEN, “Les Douze anathématisés au concile d'Épêse et jusqu'en 519,” Revue Thomiste 55 (1955) 300–338. P. GALTIER, “Les Anathématisés de saint Cyrille et le concile de Chalcedoine,” Recherches de science religieuse 23 (1933) 45–57; “L'unio secundum hypostasim chez saint Cyrille,” Gregorianum 33 (1952) 351–398. J. LEBON, “Autour de la définition de la foi au concile d'Épêse,” Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 8 (1931) 393–412. L. R. WICKHAM, “Cyril of Alexandria and the Apple of Discord,” Studia Patristica, vol 15, pt 1 (Berlin 1984): 379–392.

[M. E. WILLIAMS]

ANATOLIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarch; b. Alexandria c. 400; d. Constantinople July 3, 458. He was a disciple of St. Cyril, who ordained him deacon and sent him to Constantinople as his apocriary. Anatolius was chosen by Dioscorus of Alexandria and the eunuch Chrysaphius to succeed Flavian as bishop of Constantinople after the Robber Synod of Ephesus in August of 449. His good faith was challenged by Pope Leo I, who sent legates to Constantinople, demanding that he condemn Eutyches and Nestorius explicitly and subscribe to Leo's Tome to Flavian (Leo, Ep. 80, 85).

On the accession of Marcian and Pulcheria as emperors in late August of 450, Anatolius accepted Leo's conditions, agreed to the rehabilitation of the bishops deposed at Ephesus in 449, and exhumed the body of Flavian for burial in the Church of the Holy Apostles in Constantinople. He encouraged Emperor Marcian to call the Council of Chalcedon in 451 and played a critical part in its decisions, taking his position immediately after the papal legate. In agreeing to the condemnation of Dioscorus for his unjust activity at the Robber Synod, not for doctrine, he was instrumental both in convincing the Illyrian and Egyptian bishops of the orthodoxy of Leo's Tome and in formulating the statement of faith that became the council's decision. Anatolius, accused by Pope Leo of ambition in promoting canon 28 of the council, which declared the See of CONSTANTINOPLE second after Rome, protested his innocence but eventually wrote a letter of submission and entered into full communion with Rome. He was rebuked by Leo for exceeding his authority in consecrating Maximus successor to Domnus of Antioch, but in general he cooperated with the Pope in pursuing an anti-Monophysite policy, particularly after the accession of Emperor Leo I in 457. His part in the coronation of Marcian as emperor is not clear, but the ceremony for Emperor Leo set the precedent for all subsequent Byzantine coronations.

Bibliography: M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 2:1497–1500. LEO I, Epistularum Collectiones, Acta Conciliarum Occumenicorum 2.4. P. JAFFÉ, Regeste pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Graz 1956) K 452–540. S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (Paris 1693–1712) 15:588–832.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

ANATOLIUS OF LAODICEA, ST.

Third-century bishop; d. Alexandria, c. 282. Founder of a school for Aristotelian philosophy, Anatolius achieved public honors in his native city. Consecrated coadjutor bishop by Theotecnus of Caesarea in Palestine, he became bishop of Laodicea in 268. He was the author of a work on the dating of Easter, a manual of arithmetic in ten books, and one of theology (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 7.32).

Feast: July 3 (Byzantines).

Bibliography: ANATOLIUS OF LAODICEA, Fragmenta ex libris arithmetica, Patrologia Graeca 10:231–236. Acta Sanctorum July 1:571–585. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 2:227–230. J. QUASTEN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:497. M. ANDRIEU, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 2:1493–94.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ANAXAGORAS

Greek philosopher; b. Clazomenae in Asia Minor, c. 500 B.C.; d. Lampsacus in Ionia, c. 428 B.C. As a young man, he was probably acquainted with the work of Anaximenes. During the Persian invasion of Ionia, he settled at Athens, where he engaged in scientific inquiry, wrote, and taught such personages as Pericles and Euripedes. He appears to have been the first thinker to bring the scientific-philosophical spirit from Ionia to Athens. He was celebrated for his astronomical investigations, especially his discovery of the true cause of eclipses, and respected for his high moral character. In middle life, after 30 years at Athens, he was indicted by Pericles's political foes on a charge of impiety, namely, claiming the sun was but an incandescent stone. Through the persuasive influence of Pericles, he was released. However, having been compelled to leave Athens, he retired to Lampsacus, a Milesian colony, where he may have founded a school.

Teaching. Anaxagoras most likely wrote only one book, probably under the customary title On Nature. It was composed in an attractive and lofty style and was sold at Athens for one drachma during the time of Socrates's trial. From a critical examination and interpretation of the extant fragments, a rather self-consistent cosmological system can be constructed.

In his study of the physical universe, Anaxagoras was confronted with two interrelated problems: stability and change, unity and plurality. Among his predecessors and contemporaries, the Milesians, Pythagoreans, and HERACLITUS emphasized becoming and multiplicity, whereas PARMENIDES, ZENO OF ELEA, and Melissus stressed permanency and oneness. Anaxagoras attempted to bridge the gulf between these extremes with a compromise solution.

Stability and Change. In his explanation of the special qualities of individual things, Anaxagoras assumed the existence of as many original qualitative principles as there are qualitative determinations in perceptible things. On the empirical ground of innumerable phenomena, he pluralized the Parmenidean being into an unlimited number of seeds (H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker. Griechisch und Deutsch 4 59A). Each seed is infinitesimal, infinitely divisible, eternal, qualitatively unchangeable, stable, and homogeneous, for this simple principle, however much it is divided, always separates into parts qualitatively the same as its whole; accordingly, Aristotle called them “ὁμοιομερῆ” or “like things” (Phys. 187a 25). Agreeing with Parmenides that coming-to-be and ceasing-to-be are only apparent, Anaxagoras explained the generation and corruption of complex things as simply the mixing and unmixing of seeds (Fragmente 17).

Unity and Plurality. Anaxagoras's account of unity and plurality logically develops from his theory of stability and change in accordance with Parmenides's two canons: the exclusion of real change and the impossibility of deriving plurality from unity. Anaxagoras reasoned that the manifold different sense objects can be adequately explained only by a plurality of originally different seeds, each a qualitative unit. Although all the primordial seeds—e.g., flesh, bone, and hair—are mixed in individual things, there being “a portion of everything in everything” (Fragmente 6), yet each complex thing is (and is called) whatever preponderates. Anaxagoras theorized that in the far distant past all the seeds co-existed in the unity of a primeval agglomerate, and that, through the powerful forces of vortex motion, they were separated and then organized to form the present visible cosmos (Fragmente 2, 9, 15).

Mind. Although the seeds are movable in space, they are not in motion of themselves. Rather they require an ultimate, universal principle of their orderly movement—Nous or Mind (Fragmente 12, 13). Alone in motion of itself, Mind communicates orderly movement to the seeds, separating them from the pristine conglomerate. Mind is no less illimitable than the chaotic congeries. Like the seeds, it is eternal (Fragmente 14); simple, “mixed with no thing” (Fragmente 12), homogeneous; quantitatively divisible, yet qualitatively unchangeable; participated by some things, yet remaining essentially identical with itself. Unlike other things, however, Mind is the finest and purest being; it is independent, since it is self-ruling and self-moving, the first principle of motion and order in the cosmos, with “complete understanding of everything” and it “has the greatest power” (Fragmente 12).

Influence and Critique. Anaxagoras's conception of Mind represents a major contribution in the history of philosophy. For his supreme psychophysical principle, transcendent being of beings and unifying cause of all becoming, he was justly commended by ARISTOTLE as “a sober man in contrast with the random talk of his predecessors” (Meta. 984b 15–18). Both PLATO (Phadeo 98) and Aristotle (ibid. 985a 18), however, criticized Anaxagoras for failing to go beyond the function of Mind as the initiator of cosmic motion to its subsequent causal influence in the production of natural phenomena. Once Mind originates movement, its causality—somewhat suggestive of teleology—becomes less direct and rather obscure, and then purely mechanical factors seem to assume hegemony.

Nevertheless, in Anaxagoras's thought there is the emergence of a dualism between Mind and nonmental reality. Although Mind is still conceived as something material, it is a distinct, independent, universal, primary cause of orderly motion in the cosmos. This notion is given a central role and greatly enriched in the natural theology of subsequent Greek and Christian philosophers.

Bibliography: K. FREEMAN, The Pre-Socratic Philosophers: A Companion to Diels, Fragmente der Vorsokratiker (2d ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1959); Ancilla to the Pre-Socratic Philosophers (Cambridge, Mass. 1957). G. S. KIRK and J. E. RAVEN, The Pre-Socratic Philosophers: A Critical History with a Selection of Texts in Greek and English (Cambridge, Eng. 1957). J. BURNET, Early Greek Philosophy (4th ed. London 1930; reprint 1957). W. W. JAEGER, The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers, tr. E. S. ROBINSON (Oxford 1960). J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, MD 1946—) 1:66–71.

[P. J. ASPELL]

ANCESTOR WORSHIP

An important special form of worship of the dead found in certain cultures. It is concerned with dead relatives, particularly blood relatives. Although ancestors of the larger kinship groups are also included, the cult involves especially the immediate members of the family to the third generation. Families and clansmen, through their veneration of ancestors, maintain solidarity and a sacred dignity. Although the cult of ancestors is, for the most part, characteristic of the primitive religions of the matriarchal agricultural peoples, and is connected especially with planting and harvesting, in general it is the patriarchal feature that is dominant in it.

Of the early higher cultures, the Chinese was the one in which ancestor worship attained its greatest development. It exercised influence on Japanese Shintoism, although in Japan, as in Peru, ancestor worship had its own root in the existing clan system. Among the Finns, a corner in the house was regarded sacred to ancestors. The pagan Scandinavians set out barley and beer on fixed days for their farmer ancestors. The "cult of the fathers," i.e., the worship of male forbears, was widely practised not only among the ancient Germans but also in Aryan India; in fact it is so well attested for other Indo-European peoples that it must go back to the age of primitive Indo-European unity. In Greece, the dead were believed to become incarnate in snakes, and if these creatures appeared in a house, they inspired a feeling of special awe.

H. SPENCER (1820–1903) held that manism was the primitive form of religion, but his theory has received no corroboration from investigations of even the lowest and simplest cultures. Mythical ancestors or more or less mythical forbears were given the status of heroes. However, historical members of families were not raised immediately to divine status by their people. On the other hand, it is known that even higher cosmic beings, like Amaterasu, the Japanese sun-goddess in the imperial palace, became ancestor divinities.

Images of ancestors were especially significant in ancestor worship. The ancestor tablets of the Chinese probably go back to such representations. In rites at the grave, these were marked with sacrificial blood by the son of the dead man. They had their place at the domestic altar, before which all significant family happenings were reported. The chief place of cult was the grave, but the temple dedicated to ancestors was important also. The priestly function in the ancestor cult was performed originally by the head of the house.

The Feast of All Souls, celebrated among the ancient Germans in the Yule Festival, the Feast of Lights held in July in the Far East, and the Urabon Feast of the Japanese are all connected with the reception and entertainment of the spirits of ancestors.

Bibliography: F. HAMPL et al., F. KÖNIG, Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1956) 25–30. W. CROOKE et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 1:425–467. C. M. EDSMAN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 6:959–961. J. HAEKEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:222–223. W. SCHMIDT, The Origin and Growth of Religion, tr. H. J. ROSE (2d ed. London 1935) 61–72. W. OTTO, Die Manen (Berlin 1923). F. KRAUSE, Maske und Ahnenfigur: Ethnologische Studien (Leipzig 1931). H. FINDEISEN, Das Tier als Gott: Dämon und Ahne (Stuttgart 1956). A. E. JENSEN, Myth and Cult among Primitive Peoples, tr. M. T. CHOLDIN and W. WEISSELEDER (Chicago 1963). F. HERRMANN, Symbolik in den Religionen der Naturvölker (Stuttgart 1961) 109–111.

[A. CLOSS]

ANCHIETA, JOSÉ (JOSEPH) DE, BL.

Jesuit priest, "Apostle of Brazil" cofounder of São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro; b. San Cristobál de la Laguna, northern end of Tenerife, Canary Islands, Spain, March 19, 1534; d. Reitiba (now Anchieta), Espíritu Santo, Brazil, June 9, 1597. Anchieta was born into a noble family related to St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA. After studying for a year in the Jesuit college at Coimbra, Portugal, he entered the Society of Jesus on May 1, 1551. Following his novitiate the 19-year-old Anchieta was sent to Brazil (1553) where he worked in the missions until his death 44 years later.

At first, Anchieta was in the captaincy of São Vicente and was one of the founders of the village of São Paulo de Pirtatinga and the Jesuit school there. He learned Tupi, the language in general use on the coast, and prepared a grammar for it.

In 1567, Anchieta was appointed superior of the Jesuits in the captaincy of São Vicente. During his ten years (1577–1587) as the fifth provincial of Brazil, he was the major architect of a plan later used elsewhere to liberate the indigenous people from brutal slavery under the colonists. He gathered the natives into aldeias, communities similar to the pueblas in Mexico and the reducciones in the Spanish colonies of South America, where they could be instructed in the faith, protected from exploitation, and taught the arts and letters. Much of the indigenous culture was preserved because he encouraged native crafts and music. He also possessed a fair knowledge of medicine, which he employed to help the natives. The last years of his life he spent in the captaincy of Espíritu Santo.

Anchieta was, above all, a man of action and a missionary of the first rank. During his life he was the object of popular veneration because of his apostolic work, his lofty ideals, and a certain untenable and unsubstantiated reputation for heroic deeds. He was said to have suppressed cannibalism practiced on enemy captives, who were eaten at ritual banquets, and to have protected the chastity of Christian native women, who were often raped in local wars. His fame as a miracle-worker added to his effectiveness as a missionary. No one has been so openly termed a saint, apostle, and father of Christianity in colonial Brazil as has Anchieta. Two biographers, Sebastián Beretario, who wrote in Latin, and Simão de Vasconcellos, who wrote in Portuguese, reflected in their writings the sincere feeling of veneration toward him then current in seventeenth-century Brazil. This devotion continues to be strong today among Brazilian Catholics. Pilgrimages are still made to the house of his birth in Tenerife, and a bronze statue of him was erected in La Laguna in 1960. It is said that he baptized two million natives. Although so high a number may be apocryphal, it assuredly testifies to his reputation for numerous baptisms.

Anchieta was an excellent writer, using both Portuguese and Tupi-Guaraní. In addition to two catechetical texts, he attempted to teach the faith to the native people by composing many canticles, dialogues, and religious plays. One of his morality plays, the three-hour Auto de Pregação Universal, performed in the open-air at Bahia, may have been the first acted in the New World. His other important theatrical venture was the allegorical Na Festa de S. Lourenço or Misterio de Jesus. He compiled the first Tupi-Guaraní grammar (1555) and later a Tupi dictionary. His medieval-style poetry combined religious images with native customs.

After his death his body was buried in the Jesuit chapel at Espírito Santo where local tribes came in vast numbers to honor him. The bishop of Bahia preached at his funeral and named Anchieta the "Apostle of Brazil." Although Anchieta's cause was introduced by the petition of the Brazilian Jesuits in 1615 and he was declared venerable on Aug. 10, 1736, it was forgotten during the suppression of the Society of Jesus in the second half of the eighteenth century. Pope John Paul II beatified Anchieta on June 22, 1980.

Feast: June 9 (Jesuits).

