Although far more moderate than most of the Jansenists, both in substance and in style, Nicole is characteristically Jansenist in his commitment to endless controversy and his love for fine distinctions. He probably originated the famous distinction between doctrine and fact with which Port-Royal tried to evade the condemnation of the five propositions from the AUGUSTINUS, which they were willing to accept as erroneous, but not as contained in the book. Although he was refused Sacred Orders by his bishop, Nicole leaped to the defense of clerics, who were not so ready with the pen, when they were attacked for rejecting the condemnation of the five propositions. He was constantly trying to enlist St. Thomas Aquinas in defense of his case, and even wrote a book titled Conformity of the Jansenists and the Thomists concerning the Five Propositions.

Among his numerous writings a few are especially deserving of mention. His fame was established by his Latin translation of the Provincial Letters of Pascal, published with notes and additions under the name of William Wendrock. He wrote extensive scholarly works against the Calvinists in defense of transubstantiation and the Real Presence, as well as a more general attack on Calvinist positions that produced a whole literature of controversy. Perhaps his greatest work is his Essais de morale, which first appeared in four volumes and were printed, emended, added to, and reprinted again and again until the edition of 1753 filled 14 volumes. The weakness of human nature and the incapacity of the natural man for virtue dominates his characteristic Jansenism in morality. In response to attacks on Jansenism he wrote two works that were later published together and give important details of life at Port-Royal, Les Imaginaires et les visionnaires ou dix-huit lettres sur l'hérésie imaginaire.

Bibliography: J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:634–646. H. BREMOND, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France depuis la fin des guerres de religion jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1917–36) 4:418–588. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:444–448. L. WILLAERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:948–949.

[A. ROCK]

NICOMEDIA

Ancient city of Bithynia in Asia Minor, modern Izmit, Turkey. From the 3rd to the 1st century B.C. it was the capital of Bithynia; later, the titular See of Bithynia Prima. Nicomedia was founded by King Zipoetes, whose son Nicomedes I made it his capital (c. 264 B.C.) and adorned it with numerous magnificent buildings. At the turn of the 2nd century B.C. Hannibal sought asylum at his court. Nicomedia remained the capital of Bithynia even after King Nicomedes III (or IV) willed the country to Rome (74 B.C.). PLINY THE YOUNGER in his letters to Trajan speaks of the senate house, an aqueduct that he had built, a forum, and the temple of Cybele. As capital of the province Nicomedia was one of the first cities in northern Asia Minor to be christianized. The first bishop of Nicomedia was Prochorus. Under Marcus Aurelius, Bp. DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH wrote a letter to the faithful of Nicomedia (c. 170) warning them against the heresies of Marcion. Origen lived there with his benefactor, Ambrose (c. 240); and the emperor DIOCLETIAN built there an imperial palace, a hippodrome, a mint, and an arsenal. CONSTANTINE I was brought up there; the pagan philosopher Libanius taught there; and LACTANTIUS served as tutor to the children of the emperor. There was a Christian church close to the imperial palace, that was destroyed (303) when Diocletian initiated a severe persecution of the Christians of Asia Minor and hundreds were martyred. Under Maximinus Daia, in 312 the persecution in Nicomedia took the lives of many faithful members of the clergy, among them Bishop Anthimus and the priest Lucian of Antioch.

In the mid-4th century Bp. Eusebius of Nicomedia granted asylum to Arius, thus making the city a center of ARIANISM. Two of its Arian bishops, Eudoxius and Demophilus, became archbishops of Constantinople. A Novatian sect settled in Nicomedia toward the end of the century. To the metropolitan See of Nicomedia (325) belonged the Dioceses of Chalcedon, Prusa, Apollonias, Hadrianoi, Caesarea in Bithynia, Nicaea, Chios, Neocaesarea, and Prusias; in the 7th century it was listed as seventh among the metropolitan sees of the Patriarchate of Constantinople.

During the 4th century Nicomedia suffered an invasion of the Goths and an earthquake (Aug. 24, 354), which ruined most of its buildings; fire completed the catastrophe. The city was rebuilt during the reign of JUSTINIAN I (527–565), but subsequently was destroyed by the Shah Khusru (Chosroes) II. In 711 Pope Constantine I visited the city, and in 1073 John Comnenus was proclaimed emperor there. In about 1330 the sultan Orkhan captured the city and restored its ramparts, parts of which still display the two epochs of Nicomedia's history, the Roman and the Byzantine. Nicomedia continued to be a metropolitan see until 1923; since then it has been a Latin titular bishopric.

In a journey through Asia Minor in 1555, H. Derscham recognized walls and foundations of the ancient city, but could not identify them [Tagebuch einer Reise nach . . . Kleinasien, ed. F. Babinger (Munich 1923) 154–156, 238]. No systematic excavations had been attempted at Nicomedia by the late 20th century; however, some remains of buildings and inscriptions came to light in 1937. A contemporary portrait of Diocletian is of great interest.

Bibliography: B. KOTTER and O. FELD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1001–02. R. JANIN, Échos d'Orient 20 (Paris 1921) 168–182, 301–319; Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 9:20–28. V. SCHULTZE, Altchristliche Städte und Landschaften, (Gütersloh 1922) 2.1:244–305. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 12.1:1236–45. W. RUGE, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISOWA et al., 17.1 (Stuttgart 1936) 468–492. F. K. DÖRNER, Inschriften und Denkmäler aus Bithynien (Berlin 1941) 1–106, bibliog.

[G. LUZNYCKY]

NIDER, JOHANN

Dominican theologian, writer, diplomat, and reformer; b. Isny (Württemberg) c. 1380; d. Nuremberg, Aug. 13, 1438. Nider (Nyder, or Neider) entered the Order of Preachers at Colmar c. 1400, and under the saintly Conrad of Prussia was formed in the spirit of strict observance. Following his novitiate, he began his philosophical and theological studies at the University of Vienna and completed them at Cologne, where he was ordained. He soon became celebrated as a preacher throughout Germany and Switzerland. Nider attended the Council of CONSTANCE, participating in the debates over the doctrines of Hus. In 1423 he became professor of theology at the University of Vienna, and attracted many disciples by his reputation. He was prior of Nuremberg from 1425 to 1429. Throughout Germany he preached the reform initiated by Bl. RAYMOND OF CAPUA and furthered by Bl. John DOMINICI. Nider was prior of the convent of strict observance at Basle, 1429–36, and from 1429 to 1438 was vicar over all the reformed priories in Germany. In 1431 he went as theologian to the Council of BASLE, which sent him as legate to the Bohemian church. In Bohemia he preached against the HUSSITES and attempted to reunite those who had broken communion with Rome. He was conciliar legate in 1434 to the Diet of Ratisbon. In 1436, on completion of his term as prior of Basle, he returned to the University of Vienna, where he was elected dean of the faculty of theology.

His principal work, the Formicarius (5 v., 1517), was written in 1437. It is a collection of anecdotes and dialogues, a rich source for the religious history and political mind of the first part of the 15th century. It also contains long developments on diabolical activity. His other works are the Praeceptorium divinae legis (17 editions before 1500); Tractatus de contractibus mercatorum (8 editions before 1500); Alphabeticum divini amoris, which was later attributed to Gerson; De modo bene vivendi, erroneously thought to be a work of St. Bernard; and many other moral and ascetical works.

Bibliography: Scriptores Ordinis 1.2:792–794; 2.2:822. K. SCHIELER, Magister Johannes Nieder, aus dem Orden der Prediger-Brüder (Mainz 1885). M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11:851–854.

[J. F. QUIGLEY]

NIEBUHR, HELMUT RICHARD

Protestant theologian and educator; b. Wright City, Mo., Sept. 3, 1894; d. Greenfield, Mass., July 5, 1962. Niebuhr was born of Gustave and Lydia (Hosto) Niebuhr and was the younger brother of Reinhold NIEBUHR. After graduating from Eden Theological Seminary, Webster Groves, Mo., in 1915, he was ordained a year later in the Evangelical and Reformed Church. Niebuhr married Florence Marie Mittendorff on June 9, 1920. He obtained his B. D. at Yale Divinity School, New Haven, Conn., in 1923, and his Ph. D. at Yale University in 1924. In 1931 he joined the faculty of the Yale Divinity School where his major interest was the relationship of Christian faith to civilization. Although he was not as well known as his brother, his thought commanded wide attention. While acknowledging the need for the Church and Scripture, he warned against their deification “as though the historical and visible church were the representative of God on earth, as though the Bible were the only word that God is speaking.” He sought more of an I-Thou relation between God and man, and felt that Protestant theology could best minister to the Church by resuming “the general line of march represented by the evangelical, empirical, and critical movements.” Theological formulas were for him “not the basis of faith, but only one of its expressions and that not the primary one.” His works include The Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929), The Kingdom of God in America (1937), The Meaning of Revelation (1941), and Christ and Culture (1951).

Bibliography: “Portrait,” Life (Dec. 26, 1955) 140:39–40. “Remembered Mentor,” Christian Century (July 25, 1962) 79: 905. R. M. KEISER, Roots of Relational Ethics: Responsibility in Origin and Maturity in H. Richard Niebuhr (Atlanta 1996). R. MELVIN, Recovering the Personal: Religious Language and the Post-critical Quest of H. Richard Niebuhr (Atlanta 1988). J. W. FOWLER, To See the Kingdom: The Theological Vision of H. Richard Niebuhr (New York 1985). C. D. GRANT, God the Center of Value: Value Theory in the Theology of H. Richard Niebuhr (Fort Worth 1984). J. A. IRISH, The Religious Thought of H. Richard Niebuhr (Atlanta 1983). D. E. FADNER, The Responsible God: A Study of the Christian Philosophy of H. Richard Niebuhr (Missoula, Mont. 1975).

[E. DELANEY]

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD

Protestant ethicist and educator; b. Wright City, MO, June 21, 1892; d. Stockbridge, MA, June 1, 1971. He was the son of Gustave and Lydia (Hosto) Niebuhr and elder brother of H. Richard Niebuhr. After attending Eden Theological Seminary, Webster Groves, MO, he went to Yale University and received the B.D. in 1914 and the M.A. in 1915. He was ordained in the Evangelical Synod Church and undertook pastoral duties in Detroit, MI. The struggles of the labor movement in Detroit came to Niebuhr's attention, and his involvement in them was the basis for his later work in Christian social ethics. In 1928, Niebuhr took an academic post at Union Theological Seminary in New York City, and married Ursula Keppel-Compton in 1931.

At first an ardent pacifist, Niebuhr shared the optimism of the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement—an optimism that had its secular counterpart in the thought of John Dewey. However, by 1932, with the publication of Moral Man and Immoral Society, he argued against the “Social Gospel” that the law of love would never lead to social perfection and against the disciples of Dewey that expertise should never replace wisdom. An adequate social ethic needed more than moral piety or scientific intelligence. This realization led Niebuhr to a renewed appreciation of some biblical themes which had been neglected by the regnant liberal theology. In particular Niebuhr emphasized the doctrine of original sin. Human pride is everywhere at work and especially in the political order with the temptations of power. He thus supported political policies that carefully delineate the limits of power. His works include Does Civilization Need Religion? (1927), The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 v. (1941 and 1943), and Man's Nature and His Communities (1965).

See Also: NIEBUHR, HELMUT RICHARD.

Bibliography: C. W. KEGLEY and R. W. BRETALL, eds., Reinhold Niebuhr: His Religious, Social and Political Thought (New York 1956). G. HARLAND, The Thought of Reinhold Niebuhr (London 1960).

[W. HAYES]

NIEDERALTAICH, ABBEY OF

In the Bavarian Benedictine Congregation, Diocese of Passau; on the left bank of the Danube near the mouth of the Isar. Since the 12th century it has been called Altaha inferior to distinguish it from the nearby Abbey of Oberaltaich (Altaha superior). The Agilulfinger dukes founded it before 750 and settled it with monks from REICHENAU, who brought with them the Burgundian cult of St. MAURICE, patron of the church. Niederaltaich colonized and evangelized the Bavarian forest, Bohemia, Moravia, and Hungary, settling KREMSMÜNSTER (777). Ruined by the Hungarian wars, it was reduced to a group of canons by 1000. Bishops PILGRIM OF PASSAU and WOLFGANG OF REGENSBURG included it in the GORZE-TRIER-REGENSBURG REFORM. Under St. GODARD (d. 1038), later bishop of Hildesheim, Niederaltaich headed a reform, settling or reviving TEGERNSEE, HERSFELD, Ossiach, Bakonybel, Ostrow (St. Iwan), Brevnov, and Olomouc

Reinhold Niebuhr.

(Olmütz). St. Günther was a missionary and colonizer, and Bl. Richer became abbot of Monte Cassino; Judith was one of several women recluses at Niederaltaich. The abbey lost its free imperial status (857–1156) in the investiture controversy and was put under the bishop of Bamberg. Abbot Herman (1242–73), compiler of the Annales Altahenses, restored the abbey to its former prestige. Eight of Niederaltaich's monks were requested as abbots at a time when the old religious orders were in decline. Rebuilt after the ruin of the Thirty Years' War, the abbey was destroyed with its library in fires (1659, 1671). Abbot Joscio Hamberger (1700–39) revived it and had the baroque church built. The abbey was secularized (1803) but resettled from METTEN (1918) and united to the Priory of Innsbruck-Volders (1927) before it became an abbey again (1930). Its Ecumenical Institute has a leading role in the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

Bibliography: G. LANG, Die Heiligen und Seligen von Niederaltaich (Metten 1941). R. BAUERREISS, Lexikon für Theologie und

Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:950–951.

[E. M. HEUFELDER]

NIEDERMÜNSTER (ALSACE), CONVENT OF

Former abbey of nuns in the Diocese of Strasbourg; founded before 710 by St. ODILIA, at the foot of the hill topped by her convent of MONT SAINTE-ODILE. Gundelinde, niece of the foundress, was its first abbess. A famous relic of the true Cross was venerated at Niedermünster from Carolingian times until the 17th century, when it was transferred to the Jesuits at Molsheim. Niedermünster enjoyed its most brilliant era in the 13th century, but declined in the 14th. The abbey suffered partial destruction during the Peasants' Revolt (1525); it died out completely after a fire in 1542. Important ruins of the church, which had been consecrated in 1180, still remain.

Bibliography: M. BARTH, Die heilige Odilia, Schutzherrin des Elsass, 2 v. (Strasbourg 1938); Handbuch der elsässischen Kirchen im Mittelalter, 3 v. (Archives de l'Église d'Alsace NS 11–13; Strasbourg 1960–63).

[J. CHOUX]

NIEHEIM (NIEM), DIETRICH OF

Chancery official in the Roman Curia, publicist of the WESTERN SCHISM; b. Brakel, Westphalia, c. 1340; d. Maastricht, Netherlands, end of March 1418. Supported by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, MARSILIUS OF PADUA, and Alexander of Roes, he gave the first comprehensive presentation of CONCILIARISM in his Dialogus de schismate (1410), in which he called for the reunion and reform of the Church. His Avisamenta (1414) contains the program for the Council of CONSTANCE. As a representative of the historically conservative approach to the empire, he stressed the right of the German emperors to call a general COUNCIL of the Church. He was an intimate of several Roman popes; in 1395 BONIFACE IX tried in vain to bestow upon him the bishopric of Verden (Germany). The Anima, the German hospital in Rome, claims him as its founder.

Bibliography: K. PIVEC and H. HEIMPEL, "Neue Forschungen zu Dietrich von Niem," Nachrichten der Akademie d. Wissenschaften in Göttingen (1951) H.4. H. HEIMPEL, Dietrich von Niem, c. 1340–1418 (Münster 1932). Neue deutsche Biographie 3:691–692. J. LEUSCHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:386. E. F. JACOB, Essays in the Conciliar Epoch (3d ed. Notre Dame, Ind. 1963) 24–43.

[H. WOLFRAM]

NIELSEN, LAURENTIUS

Missionary to Sweden; b. Oslo, Norway, 1538; d. Vilnius (Vilna), Lithuania, May 5, 1622. Educated in the Lutheran faith, Nielsen received a master of arts degree in Copenhagen and in 1558 began studies for the Lutheran ministry in Louvain. Through contact with the Jesuits there, his interest in Catholicism grew. On Feb. 2, 1564, he was admitted into the Society of Jesus, and he was ordained to the priesthood the next year. He remained in Louvain until he was chosen for the Swedish mission by the Jesuit general, Everard Mercurian, with the hope that Nielsen's knowledge of the language and his Lutheran background would hasten the conversion of King John III.

John, partly through the influence of his Catholic wife, the Polish Catherine Jagellon, and partly through consideration of the political advantages of a role as mediator in the religious struggles in Europe, had indicated his interest in reconciliation with Rome. Nielsen arrived in Stockholm (1576), where he taught theology at the new college founded by the king and defended the king's liturgical innovations, which caused general displeasure in Lutheran Sweden. In 1577 the Jesuit Antonio POSSEVINO arrived in Stockholm to negotiate the conversion, and in May of 1578 he absolved John from schism and administered Communion.

Nielsen left Sweden in 1580 and taught theology at the colleges in Olmütz (1582), Prague (1587), and Braunseberg (Braniewo). In 1606 he founded a college in Denmark. Among his published writings are Confessio christiana de via Domini (Cracow 1604) and De reformatione religionis christiana (Cracow 1616).

Bibliography: A. THEINER, Schweden und seine Stellung zum heiligen Stuhl unter Johann III. Sigismund III. und Karl IX., 2 v. (Augsburg 1838–39). I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:959. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 5:1707–09. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:497–499, with bibliog.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH WILHELM

German philosopher and poet; b. Röcken (Prussian Saxony), Oct. 15, 1844; d. Weimar, Germany, Aug. 25, 1900.

Life. The son of a Lutheran pastor, Nietzsche was reared in a strictly religious atmosphere. After his father's death (1849), his mother moved to Naumburg; Nietzsche then attended the humanistic Gymnasium and the renowned Fürstenschule of neighboring Pforta (1858–64). He studied classical philology under F. W. Ritschl at the universities of Bonn and Leipzig (1862–67) and discovered the philosophy of A. SCHOPENHAUER. Though never endorsing Schopenhauer's metaphysical PESSIMISM, Nietzsche sensed in the emphasis on the supremacy of will as a universal principle a dynamism that appealed to his thirst for life in its plenitude. To Nietzsche's faltering Christian faith Schopenhauer seemed to offer a possibility of self-redemption.

On Ritschl's recommendation, Nietzsche, aged 24, was appointed professor of classical philology at the University of Basel in Switzerland, a chair he held from 1869 to 1879, when his steadily declining health forced his resignation. Of considerable consequence was Nietzsche's meeting and short-lived friendship with Richard WAGNER. Until 1872 Nietzsche's life was actually centered in Wagner's villa near Lucerne. He expected of Wagner's music drama a rebirth of the ancient Greek tragedy of Aeschylus and Sophocles. In defense of Wagner and attacking the "Socratic rationalism" of Euripides, Nietzsche wrote Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik (Leipzig 1872). But the ambivalent love-hatred attitude that marked his relationship with Wagner led to disillusionment and eventual total estrangement.

From 1879 to 1889 Nietzsche lived alternately at Sils-Maria in the Swiss Engadine Alps, at Nice, and at Genoa, suffering from multiple physical ailments. His final mental collapse occurred in Turin in January 1889. His remaining 11 years Nietzsche lived in Jena and Weimar under the care of his sister Elisabeth. His mental disease was never accurately diagnosed, and the assumption that Nietzsche was suffering from progressive paralysis induced by syphilis remains unsubstantiated.

Thought. Nietzsche was a Lebensphilosoph, castigating the separation of philosophy and science from life. In his sensitive mind the spiritual crisis of the modern age appeared focalized. He was among the first to diagnose HISTORICISM and SCIENTISM as symptoms of decadence and of a nihilism that threatened the foundations of Western civilization. He called for a new beginning and a "transvaluation of all values" in order to stop such threats.

The development of Nietzsche's thought proceeded in three stages. The study of antiquity and the influence of Schopenhauer and Wagner first made Nietzsche experience the "ground of being" as a dialectic of opposites, of "Dionysian" and "Apollonian" life principles. His vision of a synthesis in Greek tragedy and in Wagnerian music was short-lived. The four Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (Leipzig 1873–76) characterize this period.

Friedrich Nietzsche. (Archive Photos)

Then, after the break with Wagner and the emancipation from Schopenhauer's "pessimism of weakness," Nietzsche applied psychological "experimentalism" to an examination of man and his world, launching a radical attack on traditional theology, metaphysics, and morality. With L. FEUERBACH, Nietzsche saw the idea of God and of absolute Truth as nothing but "projections" of man's most precious qualities into an illusory "beyond"; they must be reclaimed, he argued, for the enrichment of man and his "this-worldly" existence. The "death of God" he solemnly proclaimed and dramatically analyzed in the story of the "madman" in section 125 of Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (Chemnitz 1882–86). See also Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (Chemnitz 1878–80) and Morgenröte (Chemnitz 1881).

Nietzsche finally implemented his early thinking with the "deadly gospel" of biological and social Darwinism. The "world-ground" he now saw as Wille zur Macht, a "will-to-power" that by "sublimation" would generate the "Super-Man" (Übermensch). Christian "slave morality," born of the ressentiment of weaklings, was to be superseded by a "master morality, beyond good and evil." The future "lords of the world" were to rise above brute animality by ascetic self-discipline seasoned by suffering. See Also sprach Zarathustra (Chemnitz 1883–84), Jenseits von Gut und Böse (Leipzig 1886),

Zur Genealogie der Moral (Leipzig 1887), Der Fall Wagners (Leipzig 1888), Ecce Homo (1888; publ. Leipzig 1908), Der Antichrist (Leipzig 1888), and Die Götzendämmerung (Leipzig 1889). The “vision” that inspired Nietzsche’s doctrine of “the eternal recurrence” he interpreted as the revelation of a cosmological law functioning without a divine lawgiver. An eternal cyclical movement of existence was seen as a substitute for the creative activity of a personal Deity. The certainty of the “eternal return” was to justify a joyous affirmation of all existence, signaling a final victory over NIHLISM.

Appreciation. The ambivalences and self-contradictory theses in Nietzsche’s thinking account for some gross misinterpretations of his philosophy. However, Nietzsche’s distorted idea of Christianity bears the imprint of Luther’s pessimism regarding the corruption of fallen human nature and of Schopenhauer’s Buddhistainted view of Christian doctrine. Nietzsche’s alleged anti-Semitism and chauvinism—eagerly propagated by the National Socialists—are refuted by his scathing denunciation of racism and his condemnation of the power politics and crude materialism of the German Empire. A distorted Nietzsche image was created also by his sister, who was bigoted and proved unreliable as executrix of Nietzsche’s literary remains. But Nietzsche’s philosophy did foster the rise of IRRATIONALISM, SUBJECTIVISM, VOLUNTARISM, and a biologism based on the élan vital of a naturalistic Lebensphilosophie. Nietzsche’s philosophical influence is most conspicuous in secular HUMANISM and in EXISTENTIALISM. The hymnal musicality of his prose and poetry also influenced several literary and artistic schools and movements.

See Also: LIFE PHILOSOPHIES.

Bibliography: Works. Gesammelte Werke, 20 v. (Leipzig 1901–1926); Gesammelte Werke: Musarionausgabe, 23 v. (Munich 1920–29); Werke und Briefe: Historisch-kritische Gesamtausgabe (Munich 1933–), in progress; The Complete Works, ed. O. LEVY, 18 v. (London 1909–13); The Philosophy of Nietzsche (New York 1937), contains four major works; The Portable Nietzsche, comp., ed., and tr. W. KAUFMANN (New York 1954); The Use and Abuse of History, tr. A. COLLINS (2d rev. ed. New York 1957); Joyful Wisdom, tr. T. COMMON (New York 1960). Literature. F. COPLESTON, Friedrich Nietzsche: Philosopher of Culture (London 1942). H. A. REYBURN et al., Nietzsche The Story of a Human Philosopher (London 1948). W. KAUFMANN, Nietzsche: Philosopher, Psychologist, Antichrist (Princeton 1950). F. A. LEA, The Tragic Philosopher: A Study of Friedrich Nietzsche (New York 1957). M. HEIDEGGER, Nietzsche, 2 v. (Pfullingen 1961). R. J. HOLLINGDALE, Nietzsche: The Man and His Philosophy (New York 1999). M. CLARK, Nietzsche on Truth and Philosophy (Cambridge 1990). J. RICHARDSON, Nietzsche’s System (Oxford 1996).

[K. F. REINHARDT]

NIEVES, ELÍAS DEL SOCORRO, BL.

Baptized Mateo Elías (Matthew Elijah), Augustinian martyr of Communist revolutionaries; b. Isla San Pedro, Yuriria, Guanajuato, Mexico, Sept. 21, 1882; d. near Cortazar, Mexico, March 10, 1928.

Born into a modest peasant family and baptized with urgency because he was in danger of death, Nieves had an early, strong vocation to the priesthood. However, he contracted tuberculosis and was temporarily blind (age 12). He regained his sight, and he assumed the responsibilities as head of household upon his father’s death. Nevertheless, he was admitted (1904) to the Augustinian college at Yuriria. When he professed his vows (1911), Mateo took the name Elías del Socorro (Elijah of Our Lady of Succor) in acknowledgment of the help he received overcoming his hardships. He was ordained in 1916.

Nieves served in various parishes within Guanajuato until he was assigned to the poor, isolated parish of La Cañada de Caracheo in 1921, where he helped to build the church—physically and spiritually. In disobedience to governmental orders (1926) that forced priests to abandon rural areas, Nieves courageously hid in a cave in the nearby hills of La Gavia in order to continue administering the sacraments to his parishioners under the cover of darkness.

After fourteen months of clandestine ministry, he was arrested together with two campesinos, José Dolores and José de Jesús Sierra. Although he was dressed in the rags of a peasant, the hem of his habit betrayed him. He was questioned, and since he immediately admitted being a priest, he was detained. A parishioner negotiated for the freedom of the laymen, but they refused to abandon their pastor. En route under guard to the provincial capital of Cortazar, the two companions were killed. At the next resting place, Nieves was taunted and then shot. He faced death with fortitude, blessing his executioners, and witnessing to his faith in Christ.

His body has been moved to the parish church at La Cañada de Caracheo. Fr. Elías was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Oct. 12, 1997, together with another Augustinian, Mother Maria Teresa FASCE, who documented Nieves’s martyrdom for her convent. He is a patron of Mexico.

Feast: Oct. 11.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis, no. 20 (1997): 999. L’Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 42 (1997): 1, 2, 11, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

NIFO, AGOSTINO

Italian philosopher; b. Sessa Aurunca, ca. 1470; d. Sessei Aurunca, 1538. Educated at the University of Padua, where he first began to teach. He left for Naples in 1499. His early acceptance of AVERROES' doctrine of the unity of the intellect as the true interpretation of Aristotle was replaced by rejection of that interpretation in his De intellectu (Venice 1503). In that work he presents excerpts from ALBERT THE GREAT's De natura et origine animae as the "true position" on the nature of the soul and intellect. He also borrows from Saint THOMAS AQUINAS and Marsilio Ficino to argue for the immortality of the soul. He had begun to learn Greek and to take the Greek Commentators, especially Simplicius and Themistius, as the best interpreters of Aristotle. On his return south, he taught at Naples and Salerno and was a member of the circle of the humanist Giovanni Pontano. He functioned as a physician. He taught at Rome in 1514 and at Pisa from 1519–1522 and later at Salerno. His own De immortalitate animae (Venice 1518) was a reply to Pietro Pomponazzi's work on the same subject. He declined an invitation from Paul III in 1535 to teach again at Rome. He wrote commentaries on most of Aristotle's works but there is no collected edition of his writings.

Bibliography: E. P. MAHONEY, Two Aristotelians of the Italian Renaissance: Niccolotto Vernia and Agostino Nifo (Aldershot 2000). B. NARDI, Saggi sull'aristotelismo padovano dal secolo XIV al XVI (Florence 1958).

[E. P. MAHONEY]

NIGER, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

An arid, impoverished, and landlocked country in west-central Africa, the Republic of Niger is bordered on the north by Algeria and Libya, on the east by Chad, on the south by Nigeria, on the southwest by Burkina Faso and Benin, and on the west by Mali. The tropical southern savannah is home to most of Niger's population, while the north is characterized by sand dunes and desert plateau, the terrain broken by the mountainous Air region in its center. Peanuts, cowpeas, cotton and rice are among the nation's primary agricultural products, while natural resources include uranium, coal, iron ore, tin, gold and petroleum. Droughts, erosion, desertification and the destruction of wildlife populations due to poaching are among the problems faced by Niger, a country whose economy centers on subsistence agriculture and the export of uranium. The average life expectancy of a native Niger was 41.2 years in 2000; only 14 percent of the population was literate.

Europeans first entered Niger in the late 1700s, and missionaries arrived soon after, accessing the region via

Capital: Niamey.
Size: 458,997 sq. miles.
Population: 10,075,510 in 2000.
Languages: French, Hausa, Djerma.
Religions: 21,350 Catholics (.2%), 9,269,470 Muslims (92%), 10,675 Protestants (.13%), 774,015 practice indigenous religions.
Diocese: Niamey, immediately subject to the Holy See.

the Niger river running south from Mali. The first Catholic mission, established in 1831 at Niamey, was entrusted to the Society of African Missions from the Vicariate of Dahomey (now Benin). In 1942 the Prefecture Apostolic of Niamey was created, with jurisdiction over northern Dahomey. When northern Dahomey was separated from this prefecture in 1948, Niger, with a portion of Upper Volta, was entrusted to the Redemptorists, but in 1949 the area of the Prefecture of Niamey was restricted to Niger. In 1961 the prefecture became the Diocese of Niamey.

Made a territory of French West Africa in 1904, Niger became an autonomous state of the French Community in 1958. It was granted full independence on Aug. 3, 1960. A military council took strict control of the government for most of the 1970s and 1980s, but in 1989 political activity was again made legal, resulting in the election of a coalition government led by Mahamane Ousmane. In 1990 Tuaregs rebels became active in the north, and violence against the government continued for five years before being resolved. In 1993 a constitution was drafted that authorized Niger's first free elections, but military coups in 1996 and again in 1999 further disrupted the nation. In 1999 a National Reconciliation Council make a further effort to establish civilian rule, and Mamadou Tandja was elected president with 60 percent of the vote. International aid, which had been suspended during the 1999 coup, resumed in 2000 as the government sought to develop Niger's struggling economy.

By 2000 Niger had 21 parishes, its faithful tended by four secular and 37 religious priests. Religious at work in the country included nine brothers and 90 sisters, who worked in the areas of health care and education, administering the country's eight primary and three secondary Catholic schools, as well as a hospital and health center in Galmi. Predominately Islamic, Niger's constitution nonetheless protected freedom of religion, and although a minority faith many followers of the Church were influential due to previous ties to the former French colonial government. Major Christian holidays were officially recognized by the state.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde, 2:627–629. Annuario Pontificio has data on all diocese.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

NIGERIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Federal Republic of Nigeria is a country in West Africa, bordering Niger on the north, Chad on the north-east, Cameroon on the east, the Gulf of Guinea on the south and Benin on the west. Its coast is primarily mangrove swamp and from there the landscape rises to a plateau region, with mountains in the east and a semi-desert region to the north. Agricultural products include cocoa, soybeans, cotton, tobacco and timber, while natural resources consist of petroleum and gas reserves, coal, tin, lead, zinc and iron ore.

A largely agricultural country, Nigeria was created out of the British territories of Northern and Southern Nigeria in 1914. It received a federal constitution for three autonomous regions in 1954 and became an independent dominion in the British Commonwealth six years later. Part of the British Cameroons voted to join Nigeria in 1961. In 1963 Nigeria became a federal republic in the Commonwealth with three regions (northern, eastern and western) and the federal territory of Lagos. The most populous country in Africa, Nigeria is divided along religious lines: the Muslims that comprise half its population inhabit the north, while Christians form an important minority in the south and west. Among the region's many tribes, the Igbo are predominately Catholic.

History. Once a part of the Songhai Empire, Nigeria's coast was visited by Portuguese traders who introduced Christianity in the 15th century. While the coastal area was entrusted to the Capuchins in the 17th century, systematic evangelization did not begin until 1840, when Protestant and Catholic missionaries appeared along the coast. Ceded to Great Britain by its African king in 1861, Nigeria was administered by a succession of colonies until 1886 when it became the Colony and Protectorate of Lagos.

Nigeria became a part of the vast Vicariate Apostolic of the Two Guineas, created in 1842, but was transferred to Gabon when that vicariate was created in 1863. Priests from the Society of AFRICAN MISSIONS (SMA) arrived along with British rule in 1861. Prefectures apostolic were later formed for Upper Niger (1884) and Lower Niger (1889), after the country was briefly divided into two protectorates, the HOLY GHOST FATHERS (CSSP) sharing the missionary labor with the SMA. The Prefecture of Eastern Nigeria was created in 1911 for the more difficult missions in the Islamic north.

In 1914 the region was given the status of a single colony, and it became the Federation of Nigeria in 1954. In 1950 the hierarchy was established with two ecclesiastical provinces. Nigeria was granted its independence on Oct. 1, 1960; the same year an apostolic delegation for six countries in west-central Africa was created and headquartered in Lagos, Nigeria's capital.

In 1967 the eastern region of Biafra seceded from Nigeria, creating a state of civil war that lasted into 1970. In 1991 the capital was moved from Lagos to the central city of Abjua. By 1993 the country was ruled by General Sani Abacha, who promised to return the country to civilian rule within three years. However, his regime continued, amid charges of corruption and human rights abuses, and the imprisonment of many Nigerians on charges of insurrection, prompting Nigerian bishops to speak out in favor of democracy and the growing violence. During a March of 1998 visit by Pope John Paul II, Abacha's regime was addressed, the pope noting that "(there is) no place for intimidation and oppression of the poor and weak, for the arbitrary exclusion of individuals and groups from political life, and for the abuse of power and authority." The pope's visit was preceded by a government crackdown on dissidents.

Religious Strife Marks Transition to 21st Century. Elections were held in Nigeria in 1999, following the adoption of a new constitution based on Islamic law, English law and tribal law. President Olusegun Obasanjo, a Christian, was faced with numerous economic problems, among them broadening an economy reliant on petroleum exports and modernizing the nation's agricultural industry. Also of concern were continual flare-ups of ethnic tensions, such as the violence between Ijaw and Itsekiri in the oil-rich Delta State.

Capital: Abjua.
Size: 356,700 sq. miles.
Population: 123,337,822 in 2000.
Languages: English; Hausa, Yoruba, Igbo, and Fulani are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 16,033,916 Catholics (13%), 61,789,210 Muslims (50%), 33,301,215 Protestants (27%), 12,694,679 practice indigenous faiths (10%).

While the government did not impose a religion, it allowed states to adopt the Islamic Shari'a law as they chose. Under the strict imposition of such laws, alcohol was banned, only people with beards would be awarded government contracts, Islam became a required subject in public schools and men and women were not allowed to travel together on public transportation. Violations of law garnered such harsh punishments as public stoning and amputation. In the 1990s this prompted several northern states—among them Amfara, Kano, Niger and Sokoto—to become what critics argued were de facto Islamic states, as state governments funded the construction of mosques and otherwise supported the Islamic faith. By early 2000 northern Nigeria was wracked by ethnic violence as state governments sought to expand Shari'a into Kaduna state, which had a significant Christian population. Churches and mosques were destroyed, while thousands died in scattered riots, prompting the government to restrict some religious activity.

In February of 2000 President Obasanjo and Muslim leaders in northern Nigeria agreed that the imposition of Muslim law should cease. However, tensions continued to exist, resulting in violent flare-ups by religious extremists. In Kaduna it was reported in May of 2000 that a bounty had been placed on the head of all Catholic priests. The report came shortly after a priest in Kaduna was brutally murdered by a Muslim mob. As northern states continued to respond to the will of extremists and adopt the Shari'a criminal code, bishops increased their calls to the government to protect the rights of non-Muslims. "It is dangerous to presume that all is well simply because we are no longer burning houses or killing one another," Abuja Archbishop Onaiyekan noted publicly. "No one should expect a situation of blatant injustice to continue indefinitely without consequences."

By 2000 Nigeria had 1,528 parishes, tended by 2,494 diocesan and 640 religious priests. Within the country, 428 brothers and 2,968 sisters dedicated themselves to humanitarian efforts and the operation of the nation's 2,870 primary and 244 secondary schools. In addition to the continued religious strife in the northern states, the attention of the Church was directed towards the rising death toll resulting from the spread of AIDS within Nigeria's population, as well as government efforts to legalize abortion during a constitutional review in 2002.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde, 2:630–638. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses and prefectures.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

NIHIL OBSTAT

The Latin expression nihil obstat means literally “there is nothing standing in the way.” As a contemporary canonical term nihil obstat is employed in at least two ways: to name the kind of evaluative judgment that an ecclesiastical censor makes about a writing submitted for approval prior to publication, and to describe the form of clearance given by the Holy See to a person who is eligible for certain kinds of teaching positions in ecclesiastical faculties.

In the context of the Church's discipline on the censorship of books (cc. 823–832 in the 1983 Code of Canon Law), the local ordinary (usually the diocesan bishop) appoints a censor to review books which are submitted for the ordinary's permission to publish (imprimatur). The censor makes a judgment about the book by comparing it to or measuring it by “the teaching of the Church about faith and morals as it is proposed by the ecclesiastical magisterium” (c. 831). The censor grants the nihil obstat if he or she perceives that the writing will not be harmful to the faith or morals of the Christian faithful. It is an essentially negative judgment: “I detect nothing harmful; I have no opposition.” In making this decision censors should bear in mind the maxim which Pope John XXIII applied to this process, “In essentials unity, in debatable questions liberty, in all things charity” [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 51 (1959) 867].

In the context of the regulation of ecclesiastical faculties, which are those empowered by the Apostolic See to grant academic degrees having canonical effects in the Church (c. 815–821), the nihil obstat is required for those teachers who are to be given permanent tenure or a promotion to the highest rank of the professoriat [Sapientia christiana (April 15, 1979) n. 27; ActApS 71 (1979) 483]. The nihil obstat is granted by the Congregation for Catholic Education. No criteria for making the judgment have been published, hence the grounds for giving or withholding the nihil obstat are obscure. The nihil obstat of the Holy See is the declaration that there is nothing to impede a nomination which is proposed.

[J. A. CORIDEN]

NIHILISM

Nihilism is a 19th-century Russian intellectual movement expressed in a party program of revolutionary reform and terrorism. The word is derived from nihil, “nothing,” and was popularized by Ivan Turgenev's novel Fathers and Sons (1862). Russian nihilism has little in common with what is called nihilism in the West. It was born under the czarist absolutism that evoked a powerful revulsion and antagonism in all lovers of freedom and righteousness. A movement for the liberation of human beings from any sort of enslavement found its fullest expression, especially between 1860 and 1870, in nihilism, of which the chief protagonists were Nikolai G. Chernishevsky (1828–89), Nikolai Dobrolyubov (1836–61), and Dmitry I. Pisarev (1841–68). To them the struggle for the complete emancipation of individuality was the highest value. They were extremely hostile toward everything that they termed abstract and refused to grant value to any manifestation that had no social consequences. They waged a rude and relentless war against any kind of social, political, and religious “oppression.” In the concrete, they renounced God, spirit, soul, state, church, morality, nationality, and “high” culture. They were earnest in their desire for the creation of a “new man” and the destruction of the old. Their consistency and tenacity in propagating their crude materialist and utilitarian philosophy was comparable with religious endeavor. Many nihilists carried self-sacrifice so far as to volunteer to take the place of revolutionaries under sentence of death, lest the movement should be deprived of its leaders.

Materialism and atheism were at once preconditions and logical consequences of nihilist criticism and negation. The nihilists railed against the “unpractical” rigors of Christian morality. To them all things were lawful as long as they were useful for the individual. Their ethos was expressed in Chernishevsky’s novel What Is to Be Done? (1863), recognized as the nihilist catechism. It emphasized love of truth; repudiated falsehood, embellishment, and exalted rhetoric; and rejected every sort of felicity that life offers. These principles were consistently followed in personal relationships and, above all, in friendship and in marriage. In nihilist circles friendship was based upon inexorable straight-forwardness, and marriage was regarded as the truest of all relationships of life.

Nihilism adopted an attitude of suspicion toward “high” culture created by a privileged class and designed only for this class. Art as a manifestation of idealism was absolutely renounced. The nihilists aimed at annihilating aesthetics either in externals or in the forms of social intercourse. They patronized the natural sciences to which they looked for the solution of all problems. In economics they propagated utopian socialism. The negation of higher authority, scientific and artistic individualism, the spirit of absolute independence, the struggle against theological and theocratic idealism, the extreme radicalism, and, to a large extent, the anarchism of the nihilists anticipated communism in Russia.

Group of boys marching at head of Catholic procession, Lagos, Nigeria. (©Paul Almasy/CORBIS)

Bibliography: T. G. MASARYK, The Spirit of Russia, tr. E. and C. PAUL, 2 v. (2d ed. New York 1955). H. KOHN, The Mind of Modern Russia (New York 1962). G. A. WETTER, Dialectical Materialism: A Historical and Systematic Survey of Philosophy in the Soviet Union, tr. P. HEATH (New York 1959). N. A. BERDIAEV, The Russian Idea, tr. R. M. FRENCH (Boston 1962).

[C. C. GECYS]

NIKON, PATRIARCH OF MOSCOW

Patriarchate 1652–1660; b. Vel'demanovo, near Nizhniĭ Novgorod (Gorkiĭ since 1932), Russia, 1605; d. near Yaroslavl, Aug. 17, 1681. Nikon was the name in religion of Nikita Minin (or Minov), who came of peasant stock. After ordination as a Russian Orthodox priest (1625), he served in a rural parish until 1627, when he went to Moscow. After the death of his children he became a hermit on the island of Anser in the White Sea (1635) and then entered the monastery at Kozheozerskiĭ, where he became abbot (1643). In 1646 he was presented to Czar Alexis I (1645–76), whose influential counselor he became. He was appointed metropolitan of Novgorod (1646) and patriarch of Moscow (1652). Nikon was a zealous pastor, a popular preacher, and a promoter of the evangelization of Siberia. The liturgical reforms he decreed in 1653 brought the Russian liturgy to closer conformity with Greek and Ukrainian customs but suppressed numerous Russian traditional practices. Because of this he incurred the enmity of AVVAKUM and other conservatives who formed the ultranationalistic and antigovernment sect of RASKOLNIKS. Nikon's liturgical innovations paved the way for Moscow's political absorption of the Ukraine (1654–67). Once this was accomplished, Nikon's usefulness to the ambitious czar was ended. Nikon alienated the czar by his attempt to make the Church completely independent of the state. He further challenged the Russian tradition of CAESARO-PAPISM by asserting the superiority of the patriarchal dignity over that of the czar. During the czar's frequent absences from Moscow, Nikon acted as regent and did so in an authoritarian manner. The combination of religious and civil opposition led to Nikon's deposition (1660). In 1666 a synod in Moscow, attended by some of the Oriental patriarchs, exiled Nikon to the remote monastery of Belozerskiĭ-Ferapontov, but it definitively approved his liturgical reforms. He was granted amnesty by Czar Fëdor III (1676–80), but he died soon after, while journeying to his favorite monastery of Voskresenskiĭ.

Bibliography: W. PALMER, The Patriarch and the Tsar, 4 v. (London 1871–76). J. LEDIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.1:646–655; 14.1:292–304.

[F. L. FADNER]

NILLES, NIKOLAUS

Liturgist and canonist; b. Rippweiler, Luxembourg, June 21, 1828; d. Innsbruck, Jan. 31, 1907. After his ordination in 1852 Nilles was appointed curate at Anseberg (1853–58). He entered the Jesuits on March 20, 1858. In 1859 he was appointed professor of Canon Law at the University of Innsbruck and held the chair almost until his death; from 1870 to 1896 he was also rector of the seminary. He contributed 57 articles to the Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht and 94 to the Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie. He also published the following works: Symbolae ad illustrandam historiam ecclesiae orientalis in terris coronae S. Stephani (2 v. Innsbruck 1885), De rationibus festorum sacratissimi Cordis Jesu et purissimi Cordis Mariae (2 v. 5th ed. Innsbruck 1885), and Kalendarium manuale utriusque ecclesiae orientalis et occidentalis (2 v. 3d ed. Innsbruck 1896–97).

Bibliography: M. BLUM, Das Collegium Germanicum zu Rom und dessen Zöglinge aus dem Luxemburger Lande (Luxembourg 1899) 94–109. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.2:2067–69. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 9.2:1732–34.

[C. TESTORE]

NILUS OF ANCYRA, ST.

Abbot, ascetic writer also known as Nilus "the Elder" or "the Wise"; b. probably Ancyra (modern Ankara, Turkey), date unknown; d. Ancyra, c. 430. The romantic Narrationes de caede monachorum in monte Sinae (Patrologia Graeca 79:589–693) purports to be biography, and explains the modern misnomer, Nilus Sinaites. According to this legend, Nilus was prefect of Constantinople but left office, wife, and home to become a monk with his son Theodulus on Mt. Sinai. When the monks were attacked by barbarians, Theodulus was captured but later he was set free and reunited with Nilus, who had escaped. Impressed by their piety, the bishop of Eleusa ordained them priests and sent them back to Sinai.

Nilus's own works give more reliable biographical data. In Constantinople he esteemed JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, regarded him as his teacher, and boldly took his side against his foes. Nilus left Constantinople and became abbot of a monastery near Ancyra. His skill as a spiritual counselor is attested by his treatises on moral and ascetic subjects and by more than 1,000 letters addressed mostly to otherwise unknown recipients. Several of these are merely excerpts from his own treatises or the works of others, particularly of John Chrysostom. Many of his writings explain passages of Scripture; in these he follows the literal or historical sense but makes free use of allegorical interpretations. He refutes ARIANISM in eight letters to Gainas, general of the Goths. Other topics range from proper uses of mosaics in churches to condemnation of peculiar practices among monks, such as the STYLITES. The tracts De oratione and De malignis cogitationibus, formerly attributed to Nilus, are the work of EVAGRIUS PONTICUS.

Feast: Nov. 12.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) v. 79. NILUS OF ANCYRA, Narratio, ed. F. CONCA (Leipzig 1983). K. HEUSSI, Das Nilusproblem (Leipzig 1921). G. T. STOKES, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, 4 v. (London 1877–87) 4:43–45. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–86) 3:496–504. M. T. DISDIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 11.1:661–674.

[P. W. HARKINS]

NILUS OF ROSSANO, ST.

Abbot, propagator of Greek monasticism in Italy, also known as Nilus the Younger; b. Rossano, Calabria, Italy, c. 905; d. Abbey of Santa Agata, near Frascati, Italy, Dec. 29, 1005. After the sudden death of his wife and daughter and his own recovery from a serious illness, Nilus underwent a profound religious conversion and joined a community of Basilian monks near Mercurion, where the traditions of BASILIAN MONASTICISM in Italy had been kept alive in spite of the declining power of the Eastern Empire on the peninsula. He soon left the cloister and led a rigorously ascetic life in a secluded cave, in imitation of the fathers of the desert. But the Saracen invasions forced him c. 950 to found and settle down in the monastery of San Adriano near Rossano, and while abbot there he was offered, but refused, the archbishopric of his native city. Continued Muslim incursions forced his group of Basilian monks to take refuge for a while at MONTE CASSINO, the motherhouse of Benedictine monasticism. Nilus's community next settled nearby at Valletuce and fifteen years later established its LAURA at Serperi near Gaeta. It was here, c. 1000, that Nilus received Emperor OTTO III, who was highly impressed by the abbot's work. Although Nilus had supported Pope GREGORY V against the antipope John XVI, who was supported by the CRESCENTII, he pleaded in vain with both pope and emperor to show mercy to the usurper when he fell into their hands. Nilus also found time to write a few pieces of liturgical poetry and some letters. In 1004 he received from Gregory, count of Tusculum, a grant of land on the lower slopes of Monte Cavo, where he made a foundation that remains today the center of Greek monasticism in Italy. Although he died before work was well under way, he is still listed as the first abbot of GROTTAFERRATA. One of his successors, Bartholomew the Younger (d. c. 1065), wrote a Greek life of Nilus.

Feast: Sept. 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum 7:259–320. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 120:15–165. Analecta Bollandiana 61 (1943) 204–206. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957) 1370. G. MINASI, San Nilo di Calabria (Naples 1892). A. ROCCHI, Vita di San Nilo abate (Rome 1904). J. GAY, L'Italie méridionale et l'Empire byzantin (Paris 1904). S. GASSISI IEROMONACO, "I Manoscritti autografi di San Nilo Juniore . . ." Oriens Christianus 4 (1904) 308–370; Poesie di San Nilo Juniore e di Paolo Monaco abati di Grottaferrata, in Oriens Christianus 5 (1905) 26–81. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:107–108. T. MINISCI, Santa Maria di Grottaferrata . . . (Grottaferrata 1955). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 607–608. G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia (Rome 1961), passim. B. CAPPELLI, Il monachesimo basiliano ai confini calabro-lucania; studi e ricerche (Naples 1963). G. PASSARELLI, Nilo di Rossano: fiore di melograno (Reggio Calabria 1990).

[B. J. COMASKEY]

NINA, LORENZO

Cardinal, secretary of state; b. Recanati (Marches), Italy, May 12, 1812; d. Rome, July 25, 1885. After seminary studies in Recanati and Rome, he studied law at the University of Rome and was ordained in 1834. After entering the service of the Roman CURIA, he became successively secretary of the rota; then, in the Congregation of the COUNCIL, first auditor to the secretary and later under-secretary. Pius IX named him assessor of the Holy Office and cardinal (March 1877). LEO XIII appointed him secretary of state (Aug. 9, 1878); ill health forced his retirement (Dec. 16, 1880). Although affable and prudent, he was less a diplomat than a theologian. He favored a settlement with the Kingdom of Italy. He had to deal in Belgium with the "school war" that led to the rupture of diplomatic relations (June 1880) and in France with the hostility of the Third Republic toward religious congregations. In both cases he urged Catholics to moderation. Through the nuncio to Vienna, Ludovico JACOBINI, he negotiated for a settlement of the KULTURKAMPF.

Bibliography: E. SODERINI, Il pontificato di Leone XIII, 3 v. (Milan 1932–33); tr. B. B. CARTER, v. 1 The Pontificate of Leo XIII (London 1934), v. 2 Leo XIII, Italy and France (1935), v. 3 not tr.

[J. M. MAYEUR]

NINEVEH

Ancient city of Assyria and its capital under the last kings of the Assyrian Empire. Its position on the eastern bank of the Tigris (opposite modern Mosul) where this river is joined by the Khosar River made the site a natural fortress, for water from the latter stream, which ran through the center of the city, could be diverted to fill the moats on the north, east, and south sides of the city. The massive walls that were erected in the last period of the city's existence (seventh century B.C.) enclosed an irregular-shaped area of c. 1,800 acres; the wall on the north was c. 7,000 feet long, on the east c. 3 miles long, on the south c. 1,000 feet long, and on the west (along the Tigris) c. 2 1/2 miles long. Two large mounds on the western side now stand out over the ruins of the rest of the city: that of Nebi Yūnus (the Prophet Jonah), on which is the reputed tomb of Jonah, formerly a Nestorian shrine, but now Muslim, and that of Quyunjik (little lamb).

The site of Nineveh (Akkadian Ninua and Ninā; Heb. nīnēwēh) was occupied from at least 3800 B.C. until the time of its utter destruction by the Medes and Babylonians in 612 B.C. Although earlier Assyrian kings, who regularly resided at Assur (Asshur) or Calah (modern Khorsabad), had often used Nineveh as a secondary capital, it was only during the most glorious period of Assyrian history under the last three rulers of the Assyrian Empire—Sennacherib (705–682), Asarhaddon (681–670), and Assurbanipal (669–c. 633)—that Nineveh became the sole capital.

Although the native Arabic-speaking people still call this immense field of ruins Ninawa, as they have apparently done for centuries, the Western world, even in Greco-Roman times, did not know where the famous city lay. The site was first clearly identified and made known to the Western world by C. J. Rich in 1821. The sacred nature of the mound of Nebi Yūnus, which covers the palace of Sennacherib, has prevented extensive excavation from being made there; but the mound of Quyunjik, with its palaces of Asarhaddon and Assurbanipal, has been subjected to repeated excavations. The earlier excavations were merely treasure hunts, which were extremely successful in sensational finds of sculptures and inscriptions; it is only in the 20th century that the site has been scientifically excavated, with careful regard for the archeological strata and the pottery so useful for chronology. Almost all of the inscriptions (especially cuneiform tablets), as well as most of the sculptures found at Nineveh, are now in the British Museum. The excavations were made here by P. E. Botta (1842), A. H. Layard (1845–47, 1849–51), H. Rawlinson (1853–55), H. Rassam (1854 and 1877–83, when he discovered Assurbanipal's great library of cuneiform tablets), G. A. Smith (1873–74), E. A. Wallis Budge (1888–89), L. W. King (1902). R. Campbell Thomson (1927–28), and the latter with M. Mallowan (1929–32).

In the Bible, Nineveh is said to have been built by Nimrod (Gn 10.11). Sennacherib returned home there after his failure to capture Jerusalem (2 Kgs 19.36; Is 37.37). ZEPHANIAH foretold the destruction of Nineveh (Zep 2.12–15), and the whole Book of NAHUM is a vivid description of its capture by the Medes and Babylonians. Jonah is said to have preached to the people of Nineveh, "the great city" (Jon 1.2; 3.1–10; 4.11), and Jesus referred to their repentance as a model for the men of His own time (Mt 12.41; Lk 11.32). TOBIT is portrayed as living in this city with his fellow exiles (Tb 1.3; 7.3; 11.1; 14.4, 15).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1644–45. M. RUTTEN et al., Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:480–506, R. C. THOMPSON and R. W. HUTCHINSON, A Century of Exploration at Nineveh (London 1929). A. PARROT, Nineveh and the Old Testament, tr. B. E. HOOKE (Studies in Biblical Archaeology 3; New York 1955; London 1956). S. A. PALLIS, The Antiquity of Iraq (Copenhagen 1956).

[L. A. BUSHINSKI]

NINGUARDA, FELICIANO

Italian Dominican, theologian, writer, and bishop; b. Morbegno (Sondrio), 1524; d. Como, 1595. In 1554 he was appointed vicar-general of the Order, and later professor of theology at the University of Vienna. He was invited by the Archbishop of Salzburg to be his procurator at the third session of the Council of TRENT (1562–63). Then he was entrusted with implementing the reform decrees of Trent in visitations of the religious houses of the mendicant orders in Austria, Bohemia, and Moravia. At the same time, as papal commissioner, he worked toward the reform of the Diocese of Salzburg and convoked a provincial synod in 1569. He was made bishop of Scala (Salerno) in 1577, and shortly after was appointed apostolic nuncio to Bavaria, where he served until 1583. He was transferred to the episcopal see of Santa Agata dei Goti (Benevento) in 1583, and, finally in 1588, to that of Como, his native diocese, where he died. His works include the Defensio fidei maiorum nostrorum (Antwerp 1575); Manuale parochorum (Ingolstadt 1582); Enchiridion de censuris, irregularitate et privilegiis (Ingolstadt 1583); and the Manuale visitatorum (Rome 1589).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2:313–314. K. SCHELLHASS, Der Dominikaner Feliciano Ninguarda und die Gegenreformation in Süddeutschland und Österreich, 1560–1583 (Rome 1930). A. WALZ, I Domenicani al Concilio di Trento (Rome 1961).

[A. L. REDIGONDA]

NINIAN, ST.

Early fifth-century apostle of Galloway, Scotland. Ninian, a Briton by birth, educated in the Roman rite and tradition (“regulariter” according to BEDE, Eccl. Hist. 3.4), preached to the southern Picts and built in Galloway, southwest Scotland, a church of stone, called the Candida casa, dedicated to St. MARTIN OF TOURS. His “converts among the Picts” were probably the “apostates” referred to in the letters of St. PATRICK (Epist. 2, 15). His settlement, renamed Whithorn by the Anglo-Saxons, became a monastic center to which many Irish monks went for religious training in the sixth century. The inscription on his tomb, located at the Candida casa, was apparently interpreted in an anti-Celtic sense by Plechtelm, the first Anglo-Saxon bishop of Galloway, so that much of what Bede relates, including the dedication to St. Martin (not earlier than 500 according to P. Grosjean), is untrustworthy.

Feast: Sept. 16.

Bibliography: P. GROSJEAN, “Les Pictes apostats dans l’Épître de S. Patrice,” Analecta Bollandiana 76 (1958) 354–378. J. MACQUEEN, St. Nynia (London 1961). M. ANDERSON, St. Ninian (London 1964). AELRED, Saint Ninian, ed. I. MACDONALD (Edinburgh 1993). D. BROOKE, Wild Men and Holy Places: St. Ninian, Whithorn and the Medieval Realm of Galloway (Edinburgh 1994). P. HILL, Whithorn and St. Ninian: The Excavation of a Monastic Town, 1984–91 (Stroud, Gloucestershire 1997).

[J. RYAN]

NIRVĀṆA

The word (in Pāli, nibbāṇa) originally meant extinction as by fire. In HĪNAYĀNA Buddhism, which denies the existence of God and soul, all beings are transitory. The craving for permanence is the cause of pain and leads to rebirth, whose process can be stopped only by achieving nirvāṇa. The visible nirvāṇa (samditṭhika nibbāṇa), attained in the present life by an arhat (Pāli, arahant), a being perfected by enlightenment and asceticism, is extinction of lust, hatred, and ignorance producing no seed or nucleus of further rebirth. At death the arhat enters the invisible absolute nirvāṇa (parinibbāṇa), which is variously interpreted as: annihilation of individual personality; liberation from rebirth into an ineffable state; a state of perfect bliss; a populous and blissful heaven where personality abides.

In MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism, a bodhisattva, perfected by enlightened asceticism and moved by compassion, forgoes nirvāṇa to help others until all have found salvation. In AMIDISM, the oldest and most popular school, nirvāṇa is the Pure Land of Western Paradise that Amitābha, the supreme being of mercy and love, promised all those who invoked his name with faith. For the Mādhyamika school, instead, the universe exists only in the illusion of the percipient. What really exists is emptiness—the absolute truth, being, nirvāṇa, and the Body of Essence of the Buddha (dharmakāya). For the nihilist Vijñānavāda school the universe exists only in the mind of the perceiver, and nirvāṇa is an absurd notion. In VAJRAYĀNA (DIAMOND VEHICLE), nirvāṇa is identical with the final bliss attending the union of the phenomenal Means with the noumenal Wisdom, best symbolized and effected by sexual intercourse. In China and Japan, however, these same tenets were interpreted in a way more consonant with the general belief in the survival of the individual soul and with popular idol worship.

See Also: BUDDHISM; INDIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: L. DE LA VALLÉ POUSSIN, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:376–379; The Way to Nirvāna (Cambridge, Eng. 1917). T. STCHERBATSKY, The Conception of Buddhist Nirvana (Leningrad 1927). V. P. VARMA, “The Philosophy of Nirvana in Early Buddhism: A Critical and Sociological Study,” Journal of the Bihar Research Society 45 (1959) 226–243. W. T. DE BARY, ed., Introduction to Oriental Civilizations, 3 v. (Records of Civilization 54–56; New York 1958–60).

[A. S. ROSSO]

NISCH, ULRIKA FRANZISKA, BL.

Baptized Francizka, also called Francizka of Hegne, virgin of the Sisters of Mercy of the Holy Cross of Ingenbohl (Barmherzigen Schwestern vom Heiligen Kreuz); b. Oberdorf-Mittelbiberach (on the Röss River near Württemberg), Schwabia, Germany, Sept. 18, 1882; d. Hegne near Rorschach am Bodensee, May 8, 1913.

Franziska was born into extreme poverty and neglected by her parents until she was seven. Her grandmother and aunt or godmother raised her until her parents took her home to assume the household duties. She became a farm servant at age twelve and in 1901 was sent to Rorschach, Switzerland, as a domestic servant. There she fell ill, was hospitalized, and was nursed by sisters of the Holy Cross of Ingenbohl, the Swiss congregation founded by Maria Theresia Scherer.

Upon her recovery and despite having no dowry, she was accepted into the order at the German provincial house at Hegne (Oct. 17, 1904), where she was professed (April 24, 1907). She served the order as cook at Bühl, then at Saint Vincent's in Baden-Baden, but later returned to Hegne. Sister Ulrika, known for her simplicity and joy, was gifted with profound mystical experiences, especially visions of the angels and saints, until 1912.

Following her death from tuberculosis at age thirty, her grave at Hegne became a pilgrimage site. Since 1991, her mortal remains have been housed in the convent church crypt at Hegne. She was beatified on Nov. 1, 1987 by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 8.

Bibliography: B. BAUR, Kein Maß kennt die Liebe. Ulrika Nisch, Kreuzschwester von Hegne (Constance 1963). W. BÜHLMANN, Er hat auf meine Niedrigkeit geschaut: der Weg von Schwester Ulrika Nisch Kreuzschwester von Hegne, Mutterhaus Ingenbohl/Schweiz (Beuron 1987). K. HEMMERLE, Die leise Stimme: Ulrika Nisch ihr Weg und ihre Botschaft (Freiburg 1987). G. MOSER, Aus unserer Mitte: Rupert Mayer, Ulrika Nisch, Edith Stein (Rottenburg, 1988). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1987): 1117. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 47 (1987): 7–8.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

NISIBIS

Nisibis, modern Nusaybin, is a city in Turkey on the Syrian border, about 130 miles northwest of Mosul, formerly an important military and commercial center, as well as the site of a noted Nestorian theological school. The city, which is situated by the river Yaghygha (ancient Mygdonius) as it flows through a narrow canyon from the mountains into the plains, was referred to at the beginning of the first millennium B.C. in Assyrian inscriptions under the name of Nasibina. In the 3rd century B.C. it was the capital of a rich province under the Seleucids, and was called Antiochia Mygdonia by the Greeks. For some time it was also the residence of the kings of Armenia.

Because of its strategic importance and its location on the upper trade route from Mosul to the west, the city was the scene of warfare until recent times. In 68 B.C. it was captured by Pompey but was retaken by the Persians 15 years later. In A.D. 115 its capture by Emperor Trajan earned him the title of "Parthicus." Once more lost to the Persians, it was restored to Roman rule by Septimius Severus in 297 and served as a frontier fortress. In 338, 346, and 350 it was besieged by the Persian king Shapur II; the sieges are described by St. Ephrem in his Carmina Nisibena. In 363 Emperor Jovian was forced to cede the city to Persia, at which time the Christians were allowed to depart. Most of the population, then, including the Christian theological school, settled in Edessa. After being taken by the Arabs in 640, the city continued to prosper well into the 10th century. Ravaged by the Mongols in 1260, Nisibis declined rapidly and by the 14th century was in ruins. By the mid-20th century it was a small town of about 3,000 inhabitants on the main railroad from Baghdad to Alep and into central Turkey.

The beginnings of Christianity in Nisibis are uncertain. According to legend, ADDAI AND MARI, two of the 72 disciples of Christ, are said to have established the church there. The first known bishop, however, was Jacob (290–338). In 410 it appears as a metropolitan see with seven suffragans, ranked immediately after Seleucia–Ctesiphon and Beth–Lapat. From the second half of the 5th century the bishops were Nestorians, and the school of NISIBIS became the theological center of the Persian Nestorian Church. There exist ruins of an ancient, two-nave church called Mar Yakub, used until very recently by the JACOBITES. Nisibis is also a Latin titular see.

Bibliography: M. LE QUIEN, Oriens Christianus, 3 v. (Graz 1958) 2:995–998, 1192–1204. C. PREUSSER, Nordmesopotamische Baudenkmäler, 2 pts. (Leipzig 1911) 40.

[G. T. DENNIS]

NISIBIS, SCHOOL OF

About the middle of the 4th century NISIBIS was known as a center of theological studies, counting among its teachers St. EPHREM. When the city came under Persian rule in 363, St. Ephrem and the school moved to Edessa within the boundaries of the Roman Empire. After the Council of Ephesus in 431 a large number of Nestorians settled in Edessa and, for a short period, took over control of the theological school. Because of imperial persecution, however, they were forced to seek refuge outside the empire and moved to Nisibis, where their opposition to the official Roman doctrine and, consequently, to the Roman emperor earned them the protection of the Persian rulers. The theological school of EDESSA was continued in Nisibis under the patronage of the Nestorian metropolitan Bar Sauma. Its foundation can be dated to about 457, the year in which its first great teacher, Narsai (Narses), who had taught in Edessa, arrived and began lecturing on theology, a task that he continued for some 40 years. For 200 years or more the school of Nisibis flourished under a succession of famous teachers, such as Abraham, the nephew of Narsai, Paul, Elias bar Sīnājā, ʿABDISHO (Ebedjesus) bar Berīkā, and others. The number of students seems to have been considerable; Abraham de beth Rabban, the second successor of Narsai and rector of the school for 60 years, had over 1,000 students. The graduates of the school filled the episcopal sees throughout the then prosperous Church in Persia, so that the entire Church in that region and in its missionary areas became Nestorian in doctrine. The foundation of another theological school about 541 by Aba Mar in Seleucia-Ctesiphon was a strong blow to Nisibis, and the establishment of the school of Baghdad about 830 led to its rapid decline.

From the beginning the theological teaching at Nisibis was based on the works of Nestorius, Diodor of Tarsus, and in particular, THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA. In general, the instructors at Nisibis limited themselves to explaining the doctrine of Theodore, especially his commentaries on Scripture, adding very little of their own. Among the Nestorians Theodore was known as "The Commentator" par excellence. Following the pre-Chalcedonian terminology of Theodore they spoke of two natures and two hypostases with one prosoyon in Christ. The doctrine was officially accepted by the Persian Church in a synod at Seleucia-Ctesiphon in 486 and again in 612.

The curriculum and the statutes of the school of Nisibis, undoubtedly based upon those of Edessa, have been conserved, and they probably represent the oldest statutes of any Christian theological school known to exist. The detailed regulations were revised and made stricter in 496 and again in 590. The course of studies lasted three years, and instruction was given gratuitously. The school was under the direction of a rector (Rabban) and a master who, aided by a council, was in charge of disciplinary and financial matters. There were two principal professors: the first, referred to as the Interpreter, explained Scripture according to the commentaries of Theodore of Mopsuestia; the other was known as the Master of the Lessons. The students were obliged to live in community, somewhat similar in organization to a modern seminary. They studied in a common hall where the desks differed according to students' ranks. They were forbidden to enter the Roman (Byzantine) Empire without special permission. The school was practically exempt from episcopal jurisdiction and enjoyed a number of civil privileges as well.

A description of the organization and the spirit of the school is given by a 6th-century teacher: Mar Barhadbešabba ʿArbaya, Cause de la fondation des écoles [ed. A. Scher, Patrologia Orientalis, four (Paris 1908) 317–404, Syriac text with French translation]. A history of the school and an account of the teaching of Narsai and Abraham have been given by the same author [Patrologia Orientalis 9 (Paris 1913) 588–631].

Bibliography: R. NELZ, Die theologischen Schulen der morgenländischen Kirchen (Bonn 1916) 77–110. A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922) 113–115. I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, Patrologia syriaca (Rome 1958) 107–111. W. DE VRIES, Sakramententheologie bei den Nestorianern (Orientalia Christiana Analecta [Rome 1935–] 133; 1947); Der Kirchenbegriff der von Rom getrennten Syrer (ibid. 145; 1955). W. F. MACOMBER, "The Christology of the Synod of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, A.D. 486," Orientalia Christiana periodica 24 (1958) 142–154; "The Theological Synthesis of Cyrus of Edessa, an East Syrian Theologian of the Mid-Sixth Century," ibid. 30 (1964) 5–38.

[G. T. DENNIS]

NIVARD, BL.

Cistercian monk; b. Fontaines-les-Dijon, Burgundy, France, c. 1100; d. c. 1150. Nivard was the youngest brother of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. Following his brother's example, he joined CÎTEAUX at an early age and was later transferred to CLAIRVAUX. By order of Bernard, he participated in the foundation of a number of new Cistercian monasteries in various capacities; further details of his life, including the date and place of death, are unknown. According to unsubstantiated tradition, he was buried at Clairvaux. His cult can be traced to the 16th century but was restricted to certain Cistercian communities.

Feast: Feb. 7.

Bibliography: G. MÜLLER, "Der heilige Nivard," Cistercienser-Chronik 8 (1896) 43–51. S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense (Tilburg 1948–49) 1:188–189. W. W. WILLIAMS, Saint Bernard of Clairvaux (Westminster, MD 1952) 4–84. M. RAYMOND, The Family That Overtook Christ (Boston 1986) 365–413.

[L. J. LEKAI]

NIZA, MARCOS DE

Franciscan priest, discoverer of Arizona and New Mexico; b. c. 1495; d. Mexico City, March 25, 1558. Fray Marco was probably a native of Nice, hence a Savoyard and neither French nor Italian. He was already a priest, a member of the Friars Minor of the Regular Observance, and reputed a learned man when, in 1531, he left Europe for New Spain. Nothing is known of his earlier life.

While being detained at Hispaniola he heard about Peru, which was then being conquered, and volunteered his services for that region. Once commissioned by the commissary general of the Indies to act in his name, Fr. Marcos de Niza, as vice-commissary, became the leader of the first Franciscan friars to enter Peru, then comprising Ecuador and the present Peru. He participated in two expeditions there between 1531 and January 1535. His memorandum, executed at Santiago del Quito (Riobamba), Aug. 29, 1534, might be regarded as the official proclamation of the existence of the Custody of the Name of Jesus.

From April 20, 1535, to at least Sept. 25, 1536, Fray Marcos was in Guatemala. From there he proceeded to Mexico, arriving before April 4, 1537. In 1538 he was commissioned to explore the land north of Mexico; upon his return in August of 1539, he submitted a report, his Relación, De Niza is credited with discovering present-day New Mexico. In 1540 he accompanied Coronado on his conquering expedition. From 1540 to 1543 Fray Marcos served also as provincial of the Province of the Holy Gospel in Mexico. Fray Marcos, crippled by paralysis induced by the hardships suffered during two of his later expeditions, was sent to the warmer climate of Jalapa, where Mendieta met him in 1554. Shortly before his death he asked to be brought back to Mexico City to be laid to rest.

Bibliography: A. BANDALIER, The Discovery of New Mexico by the Franciscan Monk Friar Marcos de Niza in 1539, trans. M. T. RODACK (Tucson 1981). C. HALLENBECK, The Journey of Fray Marcos de Niza (Dallas 1987).

[G. J. UNDREINER]

NIZĀRĪS

A sect of the Ismaʿīlī or “Sevener” Shīʿī division (see SHĪʿITES) of Islam, headed by the Agha Khān. At the death of the Ismaʿīlī Fāṭimid Caliph al-Mustanshir in A.D. 1094, the all-powerful minister al-Afḍal passed over the caliph’s eldest son, Nizār, and recognized Nizār’s younger brother al-Mustāʿlī as IMĀM, or religious leader. The Ismaʿīlīs living outside Fāṭimid territory in Persia, under the leadership of Ḥasan-i Ṣabbāḥ, master of the fortress of Alamūt, maintained their loyalty to Nizār. They later claimed that their imāms were his descendants, a statement difficult to prove or disprove. Those Ismaʿīlīs who followed imāms of the line of Mustaʿlī were, after the extinction of the Fāṭimid Caliphate by SALADIN in 1171, confined to the Yemen and the west coast of India, where they became known as Bohras.

Under Ḥasan-i Ṣabbāḥ’s “new preaching” the Nizārī sect, from its strongholds in Persia and Syria, passed to active struggle against the ʿAbbāsīd and SELJUK SUNNĪ authorities (see ʿABBĀSIDS; SUNNITES), seeking to establish its own version of the Islamic state. One of their most common weapons was the careful stalking and assassination of enemies of the sect, by devotees (fidāʿī-yīn) who usually lost their lives in the act. For this, their enemies gave them the contemptuous name of Hashshāshīn, addicts of hashish (intoxicating hemp), thus implying that only drug-crazed men could act so recklessly. The epithet has been europeanized as “assassin,” and has become a name for any common murderer by violence. The act of the fidāʿī was regarded within the sect as heroic and meritorious.

The crusaders came in contact with a branch of the Nizārīs in Syria, where their local head was known as the Shaykh al-Jabal, the “Old Man of the Mountain.” The most vigorous of these leaders, Rashīd al-Dīn Sinān, played an important role in the affairs of 12th-century Syria. In 1256 the strongholds of the sect in Persia were razed by the invading Mongols of Hūlāgū Khān, and the Nizārīs entered a period of voluntary concealment (taqīya). In 1817 the Imām of the Nizārīs married a daughter of Fath ʿAlī Shāh of Persia and was given the title of Āghā Khān, which his descendants have since used as their secular title. In 1840 the Agha Khan emigrated to India where Nizārī missionaries had converted numbers of Hindus, now known as Khojas, to their doctrine. The Agha Khans of the present day have become international figures, and have done much to reorganize and modernize their community.

Bibliography: M. G. S. HODGSON, The Order of Assassins (The Hague 1955). J. N. HOLLISTER, The Shiʿa of India (London 1953). B. LEWIS, “The Ismaʿīlīs and the Assassins,” The First Hundred Years, ed. M. W. BALDWIN, v.1 of A History of the Crusades, ed. K. M. SETTON (Philadelphia 1955–). J. VON HAMMER-PURGSTALL, A History of the Assassins, tr. O. C. WOOD (London 1835).

[J. A. WILLIAMS]

NOAH

Son of Lamech and the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth (Gn 5:28–32). In the Flood story in Genesis 6:1–9:19, God preserves Noah and his family, so that Noah is the ancestor of all humankind after the Flood. Following God’s directions, Noah preserves some from each species of animals and birds to repopulate the earth in a renewed creation after the flood. Following the flood another story describes Noah as the first to plant a vineyard and make wine (Gn 9:20–28). Outside Genesis, Noah is referred to or mentioned three other places in the Old Testament, twice in the Deuterocanonical Books, and six times in the New Testament.

Noah's Ark. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Noah and the Flood. The account of Noah in Genesis has long been recognized as a composite woven from two of Israel's ancient oral traditions, often designated the Priestly source (P) and the YAHWIST source (J). A narrative from J in 6:1–8 has the Lord resolve to destroy all living things because of what has become of the world, but then “Noah found favor in the sight of the Lord.” This is seconded by a P affirmation: “Noah was a righteous man, blameless in his generation; Noah walked with God” (v. 9). The P source continues with its account of how the sorry state of conditions on earth brings God to announce to Noah his intention to make an end of all living things (v. 11–13). But God tells Noah to build an ark, and gives specific instructions for its materials, dimensions, and layout. Noah is to enter the ark with his family and a male and female pair of all living creatures, along with appropriate food for them and the creatures. “Noah did this; he did all that God commanded him” (v. 14–22). In a section from J, the Lord commands Noah to enter the ark with his family, “for I have seen that you alone are righteous before me in this generation.” And he is to bring seven pairs of each clean animal and bird, but single pairs of the unclean creatures. “And Noah did all that the Lord had commanded him” (7:1–5). After Noah entered the ark as “God had commanded him; and the Lord shut him in” the flood came and continued forty days and nights in J or 150 days in P until all living things were dead and “only Noah was left, and those that were with him in the ark” (7:6–24). Then “God remembered Noah” and the waters began to recede. After 150 days, the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat (8:1–5). An account from J tells how Noah opened the window of the ark and sent out a raven, then three times a dove to determine when the waters had subsided (v. 6–12). The P source then tells how Noah removed the cover from the ark and saw that the earth was drying. When the earth is dry, God tells Noah to leave the ark and begin live again on the earth (vv. 13–19). From J, Noah's first act was to build an altar and to sacrifice some of the clean animals and birds. The odor pleased the Lord, who then promises never again to destroy all living creatures (v. 20–22). The P account describes Noah and his sons as the ancestors of all subsequent humanity. Like the first humans of Genesis 1:26, humans continue to have authority over animals. God repeats the blessing given to humanity in Genesis 1:28. But now, humans are permitted to eat animals, and humans are responsible for punishing the crime of murder. And God promises in a covenant with Noah and all creation, never again to destroy life and the created order (9:1–19).

"God Orders Noah to Build the Ark," by Marcantonio Raimond, c. 1500–34. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Noah's Vineyard. Another story from the J source, not originally connected to the flood account, describes Noah as the first to plant a vineyard and the first to make wine. Noah's sons are not married and share Noah's tent. In the story Noah drinks the wine and becomes drunk in his tent. Noah's son Ham, the father of Canaan, then "saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brothers outside." Shem and Japheth then respectfully cover the nakedness of their father, without seeing it. The story is thought to be a euphemistic account of how Ham or Canaan took advantage of Noah's drunkenness to sexually violate Noah's wife (see Lv 18:8). When Noah awakes and learns what has happened, he curses Canaan and blesses Shem and Japheth. The curse and blessing are the only spoken words attributed to Noah in the Bible (9:20–27).

The placement of this story after that of the flood shows how the inclination of human hearts continues to be evil after the flood (8:21). The alienation of humans, even within a family, as a consequence of sin, continues. But now it is Noah, not the Lord, who pronounces the curse because of human sin. The three sons in the original story were Shem, Japheth, and Canaan. Ham was introduced to harmonize the story with the names of Noah's sons in the previous flood account and with the account of the nations descended from Noah that follows in chapter 10.

Noah's Name. The J story of Noah's vineyard originally followed the folk etymology about Noah's name at Genesis 5:29. Lamech named his son Noah saying, "Out of the ground that the Lord has cursed this one shall bring us relief from our work and from the toil of our hands." Lamech alludes to a consequence of the first sin in Genesis 3:17 where the Lord declared that the ground is now cursed and only by "toil" and "labor" will it yield food for humans. Lamech's pun associates Noah's name nōah with the verb nhm, "to provide relief." Noah then became "a man of the soil," planted a vineyard, and produced wine that provides humans relief from their work and toil. The Septuagint, however, translated the verb in 5:29, διαναπαύσει, "he will bring rest," reflecting an understanding that Noah's name is derived from the verb nwh, "rest." In the various ancient Near Eastern flood stories, the heroes have various names (See GILGAMESH EPIC). The connection of Noah from the vineyard story with the hero of Israel's version of the Flood story probably occurred during the developing oral stages behind the J source. This is reflected in several puns in the J flood story related to the concept of "rest." For example, "then the ark came to rest, wattānah" (8:4), "the dove found no resting place, mānōah" (8:9), "then the Lord smelled the pleasing (literally, 'restful'), hannīhōah, aroma" (8:21). In the Latin Vulgate and its derivative translations the name appears as Noe, from the Septuagint's Νῶε.

Other Biblical References to Noah. The prophet Ezekiel identified Noah, along with Daniel and Job, as righteous (Ez 14:14–20). Ben Sira included Noah among Israel's great ancestors, noting that it was Noah's righteousness that led God to preserve life on earth (Sir 44:17–18). Second Isaiah compared God's decision to no longer be angry with Israel with God's promise that "the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth" (Is 54:9). The Gospel according to Luke lists Noah among Jesus' ancestors (Lk 3:36). In the Gospel according to Matthew, the lifestyles of Jesus' contemporaries is said to be like those of Noah's contemporaries prior to the flood (Mt 24:37–38). In 2 Peter 2:5, Noah is "a herald of righteousness," while in Hebrew 11:7 Noah is "an heir of the righteousness which comes by faith" because he heeded God. God's patience while Noah was building the ark was being built is the focus of 1 Peter 3:20.

Bibliography: W. BRUEGGEMANN, Genesis (Atlanta 1982). A. F. CAMPBELL and M. A. O'BRIEN, Sources of the Pentateuch: Texts, Introductions, Annotations (Minneapolis 1993). N. COHN, Noah's Flood: The Genesis Story in Western Thought (New Haven 1996). A. DUNDES, ed., The Flood Myth. (Berkeley 1988). J. W. ROGERSON, Genesis 1–11 (Sheffield 1991). G. J. WENHAM, Genesis 1–15 (Waco, Texas 1987). C. WESTERMANN, Genesis 1–11 (Minneapolis 1984).

[J. E. JENSEN]

NOAILLES, LOUIS ANTOINE DE

Cardinal archbishop of Paris; b. château of Tessières, near Aurillac, May 27, 1651; d. Paris, May 4, 1729. As the second son of Anne Jules, first duke of Noailles, he was educated in Paris and received a doctorate in theology at the Sorbonne (1676). Ordained a priest in 1675, he was made bishop of Cahors in 1679, and in June 1680, bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, a see that conferred a peerage. In 1682 Noailles took part in the Assembly of the Clergy that adopted the four Gallican articles (see GALLI-CANISM). Respect for his piety and unblemished life led to his appointment as archbishop of Paris in April 1695, an appointment supported by Mme. de Maintenon. His difficulties then began. At Châlons in 1695 he had approved Pasquier QUESNEL's Réflexions morales, but in 1696 he condemned a posthumous publication of the Jansenist Martin de Barcos's Exposition de la foi . . . touchant la grâce et la prédestination that exposed an extreme form of Augustinism. He was then attacked by an anonymous pamphlet that demanded whether one should follow Noailles the bishop of Châlons in approval of Quesnel, or Noailles the archbishop of Paris in condemning the same teachings in Barcos's book. Despite this difficulty, Noailles promoted a new edition of Réflexions morales (1699). He was made cardinal in 1700 at Louis XIV's solicitation. During these same years he condemned several Quietist writings (see QUIETISM). In so doing, he supported BOSSUET and became estranged from FÉNELON.

On July 16, 1705, Clement XI published the constitution Vineam Domini Sabaoth. This condemned the Cas de conscience, printed in 1703 and signed by 40 doctors of the Sorbonne, arguing that respectful silence concerning the five propositions of Jansenius should not debar an ecclesiastic from absolution. The cardinal had forced them to retract, the two who would not being exiled. He then acted, perhaps reluctantly, in support of Vineam Domini, though under his guidance the assembly of bishops who received it added a strong Gallican pronouncement as an introduction to the pontifical document. Moreover, he showed himself slow and weak on the issue of the suppression of PORT-ROYAL effected by Louis XIV in 1709. On the other hand, he turned more and more against the Jesuits, strictly controlling their faculties to preach or hear confessions in his diocese. In the same year, when the bull UNIGENITUS, condemning 101 of Quesnel's propositions, was referred to the Assembly of the Clergy, Noailles, who felt directly attacked, opposed it. These actions brought the cardinal openly into disfavor, and Louis XIV forbade his appearance at court. In 1714, with Noailles still opposing, the Unigenitus was registered by royal order. The king then decided to have him tried by a national council; there were also talks of his "Decardinalization." However, Louis died in 1715, and in a dramatic reversal of fate Noailles became chair of the "Ecclesiastical council" established by the Regent, the duke of Orléans. Though he was never the leader of the opposition, he continued to resist Unigenitus. On April 3, 1717, he joined other bishops in an appeal against the bull to a future general council, although this appeal remained secret until 1718. In August 1718 the Regent ordered acceptance of Unigenitus throughout France, all appeals already made being annulled. Cardinal de Noailles only formally withdrew his appeal in August 1720; he did not formally accept Unigenitus until October 1728. The cardinal was a good administrator of his diocese, spending generously in repairing and adorning the cathedral of Notre Dame. He was also noted for his charity. He died in 1729, leaving his property to the Hôpital Général, the Hôtel-Dieu, and the Hôpital des Enfants-Trouvés.

Bibliography: É. DE BARTHÉLEMY, Le Cardinal de Noailles . . . (Paris 1886). J. CARREYRE, Le Jansénisme durant la Régence 2 v. (Louvain 1929–33); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:678–681. A. LE ROY, Le Gallicanisme au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle: La France et Rome de 1700 à 1715 . . . (Paris 1892). J. F. THOMAS, La Querelle de l'Unigenitus (Paris 1950). C. URBAIN and E. LEVESQUE, Les Dernières années de Bossuet (Paris 1929). L. CEYSSENS, "Le cardinal de Noailles," in Autour de l'Unigenitus (Leuven 1987). P. BLET, Le Clergé de France, Louis XIV et le Saint-Siège de 1695 à 1715 (Rome 1989). J. M. GRES-GAYER, Théologie et pouvoir en Sorbonne (Paris 1991). P. CHAUNU, M. FOISIL, F. DE NOIRFONTAINE, Le basculement religieux de Paris au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1998). M. J. MICHEL, Jansénisme et Paris, 1640–1730 (Paris 2000).

[D. R. CAMPBELL/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

NOAILLES, PIERRE BIENVENU

Founder of the Holy Family Sisters of Bordeaux; b. Bordeaux, France, Oct. 27, 1793; d. there, Feb. 8, 1861. After a very irreligious youth, he suddenly reformed following a visit to the Parisian church of Saint-Sulpice (1813), entered the seminary of Saint-Sulpice, and was ordained (1829). As curate in Bordeaux he took a special interest in the sick, outcasts, orphans, and peasants. To aid them he founded in 1820 the Holy Family Sisters. Until 1903, when the Holy See definitively approved the constitutions, there were seven branches of this institute, each engaged in a different type of apostolate, and bound together only by constitutions common to all of them. Since that time there have been only four branches, engaged in teaching, care of the sick, and social work, and, at one community in Bordeaux, in perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. Noailles entered into an agreement with Charles Eugène de MAZENOD whereby the spiritual direction of the sisters was confided to the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE, whose superior general was also the head of the Holy Family Sisters (1858–1903). Since 1903 the sisters have had their own mother general, who resides in Talence, near Bordeaux. Despite numerous difficulties, Noailles established 124 houses. In 1961 there were 4,812 sisters, and 294 houses in 15 countries in Europe, Asia, Africa, South America (Brazil), and North America (Canada). In 1944 the cause for Noailles's beatification was introduced in Rome.

Bibliography: J. BAFFIE and P. ORTOLAN, Vie de bon Père Pierre-Bienvenu Noailles, 2 v. (Bordeaux 1880–81). M. HEIMBU-

CHER, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1932–34) 2:516–517. C. SALOTTI, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 36 (1944) 309–212.

[J. DAOUST]

NOBILI, JOHN

Missionary; b. Rome, Italy, April 8, 1812; d. Santa Clara, Calif., March 1, 1856. He entered the Jesuits in Rome on Nov. 14, 1828 and subsequently taught in the Jesuit colleges at Loretto and Fermo in Italy. After ordination in 1843, he volunteered for the missions in the Oregon Country of North America. On Aug. 5, 1844, Nobili with his Jesuit companions, Michael Accolti and Peter De Smet, arrived at Ft. Vancouver. From 1845 to 1848 he worked among the indigenous people and settlers of New Caledonia (now British Columbia). During these years, Nobili helped to establish chapels in various forts or trading posts of the Hudson's Bay Company, and his successive missionary journeys extended as far as the southern boundary of Alaska. Unexpectedly, he was recalled from his missionary work by his superior, Rev. Joseph Joset. After making his final profession as a Jesuit in May 1849, he was assigned to accompany Accolti to California. Nobili arrived in San Francisco on Dec. 8, 1849, and then assisted the Rev. Anthony Langlois in the parish of St. Francis and in the pueblo of San Jose, located 50 miles south of San Francisco. In 1850 the new bishop of Monterey, Joseph S. Alemany, OP, asked him to administer the Mission Santa Clara, several miles from San Jose, and to establish there a college for young men. Despite the secularization of the mission, Nobili established Santa Clara College, the first Jesuit and Catholic college in California. Although it was not chartered by the state of California until April 28, 1855, instruction began on March 19, 1851. Nobili served as its first president until his premature death.

Bibliography: G. J. GARRAGHAN, Jesuits of the Middle United States, 3 v. (New York 1938). J. W. RIORDAN, The First Half Century of St. Ignatius Church and College (San Francisco 1905).

[J. B. MCGLOIN]

NOBILI, ROBERTO DE

Missionary in South India and pioneer in the method of missionary adaptation; b. Rome, September 1577; d. Mylapore, India, Jan. 16, 1656. His parents, Count Pier Francesco de Nobili, a general in the Papal Army, and Clarice Cioli, a Roman lady, were both of noble birth. He was educated at the Roman College and there declared his intention of becoming a Jesuit missionary. On the death of his father (1593), his guardian and cousin Cardinal Francesco Sforza brought pressure to bear to dissuade him from this plan, and Nobili fled from Rome and put himself under the protection of the Duchess of Nocera. He completed his education in the Duchess's house; and, in 1596, with his family's reluctant consent, entered the Jesuit novitiate in Naples. In 1600 he returned to Rome for theological study, and he was ordained three years later.

Missionary Endeavors. In April of 1604 Nobili left for India. He sailed from Lisbon in a Portuguese carrack and, like all non-Portuguese missionaries, was considered a vassal of the king of Portugal, who, by his privilege of ecclesiastical patronage (the padroado) bore the responsibility for the evangelization of India. After suffering a shipwreck near Mozambique, Nobili arrived in Goa on May 20, 1605. He learned Tamil among the Paravas of the Fishery Coast and in November 1606 was sent by his provincial, Alberto Laerzio, to the important inland town of Madura. This was a new departure; before this the Gospel had been preached only to Indians on the coast, where missionaries could be protected by Portuguese naval guns.

Nobili's older companion in Madura was a Portuguese Jesuit, Gonçalo Fernandez, who followed the missionary method used in India throughout the 16th century. Neophytes were required to dress, eat, and behave like the Portuguese colonials. Moreover, they had to take Portuguese surnames. Conversion was, in fact, linked with cultural domination and was therefore strongly resented by the Hindus. Christian converts were, along with the Portuguese, considered as parangis (despised foreigners) and as such were outcasts in Indian society. The parangis were further despised for eating beef, drinking wine, and wearing shoes (leather was considered impure).

Nobili believed this method was mistaken, and decided to adapt himself to native customs, as Matteo Ricci had done in China. After trying vainly to persuade Fernandez to work within the framework of the caste system rather than to cut across it, Nobili decided to live separately. He adopted the saffron dress, wooden clogs, and vegetarian diet of a sannyasi (holy man). He marked his brow with a rectangular shape of paste to signify that he was a teacher. When the people of Madura learned that he was the son of a count, they identified him with the caste of rulers, or Rajas. As a Raja sannyasi Nobili was now free to associate with Indians of the higher castes without defiling them.

Conversion of Sivadarma. Nobili's method met with success. In the first 18 months he converted 50 people of Madura, his first convert being a Sivaite schoolteacher whom he christened Albert in honor of his provincial. In 1608 Nobili became friendly with Sivadarma, a Brahmin Sanskrit scholar, who tried to convert Nobili to the system of nondualistic Vedanta professed by most Brahmins in Madura. Through Sivadarma, Nobili became the first European to get firsthand knowledge of Sanskrit, the Vedas, and Vedanta. Meanwhile other Brahmins, jealous of Nobili's successes, tried to have him dubbed a Parangi and expelled. At a meeting of 800 Brahmins, Sivadarma defended Nobili and explained that even though his skin was white Nobili was a learned sannyasi and quite different from a parangi. Nobili was allowed to remain, and in 1609, he converted Sivadarma. But his baptism raised grave questions. Should Sivadarma have to discard the characteristic Brahmin thread, a triple strand of white cotton worn from the left shoulder across the breast, and the kudumi, or single plait of hair? On the coast Brahmin converts had been forced to do so and as a result were treated as outcastes by other Brahmins. After studying the Laws of Manu and the history of the thread and kudumi, Nobili drew a distinction between religious and civil signs; the thread and kudumi he decided belonged to the latter group. With the approval of his ordinary, Archbishop Ros of Cranganore, Nobili baptized Sivadarma on Whitsunday 1609, allowing him to retain thread and kudumi.

Controversy over Adaptation. Fernandez complained about Nobili's methods, including his tolerance of such Indian habits as the marking of the brow with santal and the ceremonial ablutions. In 1610 the newly appointed visitor of the provinces of Goa and Malabar, Nicolau Pimenta, censured Nobili, who promptly appealed to Rome. Claudius ACQUAVIVA, the general of the Jesuits, wrote to India suggesting modifications of Nobili's method—notably that Brahmin converts should discard the thread—but adding that “no change should be made which might compromise the existence of the mission.” In a brief dated Feb. 18, 1618, Paul V ordered Archbishop de Sa and the inquisitors of Goa to hold a conference at which Nobili was to be present and to write a report on the whole affair. After Nobili had presented his case, the first inquisitor voted against his method, the second in favor of it; of the remaining 20 theologians and Indian priests only four sided with Nobili. However, when the report was forwarded to Europe, both the grand inquisitor of Portugal and the new pope, Gregory XV, in the constitution Romanae Sedis Antistes of Jan. 31, 1623, approved Nobili's method and decided that Brahmin converts should be allowed to retain the thread and kudumi.

During the years of controversy Nobili was forbidden to baptize, and spent much of his time writing, chiefly in Tamil. His most important book, Gnanopadesam (spiritual teaching), is virtually a Summa theologiae. In 1623 he was again free to baptize, and thenceforth traveled widely in South India, founding new missions. In 1640, as the result of a Portuguese war against the Nayak of Madura, Nobili and his fellow missionaries were arrested and imprisoned for about a year. In 1654 Nobili, his eyesight failing, was retired from Madura. When he had first arrived, there was not a single Christian in the hinterland of South India. When he left, the number of Christians totaled 4,183.

Nobili spent his last years in a hut outside Mylapore, still wearing his saffron clothes, living on a vegetarian diet, and dictating revised versions of his books.

Bibliography: J. BERTRAND, La mission du Maduré d'après des documents inédits, 4 v. (Paris 1847–54). ROBERT DE NOBILI, Première apologie, tr. P. DAHMEN (Paris 1931). V. CRONIN, A Pearl to India: The Life of Roberto de Nobili (New York 1959). P. M. D'ELIA, “L'abolizione del giuramento contro i riti Malabarici in India,” La civiltà cattolica 91.2 (1940) 331–340, 424–431. P. DAHMEN, Robert de Nobili (Münster 1924); Un Jésuite Brahme (Bruges 1924). R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916) 5:40–43, 1042. Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 22 (1953) 690, no. 135. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 5:1779–80. F. DE GRAEVE, “Roberto de Nobili: A Bold Attempt at Inculturation,” in Religion in the Pacific Era, eds. F. K. FLINN and T. HENDRICKS (New York 1985). J. GALLAGHER, Apostle of India: The Story of Roberto de Nobili (London 1982). F. X. CLOONEY, “Roberto de Nobili, Adaptation and the Reasonable Interpretation of Religion,” Misology 18 (1990) 25–36. S. AROKIASAMY, Dharma, Hindu, and Christian according to Roberto de Nobili: Analysis of Its Meaning and Its Use in Hinduism and Christianity (Rome 1986). I. G. ZUPANOV, Disputed Mission: Jesuit Experiments and Brahmanical Knowledge in 17th-Century India (New York 1999).

[V. CRONIN]

NÓBREGA, MANUEL DA

Jesuit cofounder with the governor general of Portuguese authority in Brazil; b. Portugal, Oct. 18, 1517; d. Rio de Janeiro, Oct. 18, 1570. He received a degree in canon law at the University of Coimbra in 1541. He failed to win a competition for a teaching position and entered the Jesuits on Nov. 21, 1544. After serving various apostolic missions in Europe, he was appointed director of the Jesuits in America at the age of 31. He embarked for Brazil with five companions in the company of the first governor general, Tomé de Sousa. He landed there, according to tradition, carrying a cross, and his first statement to his European companions contains a sentence which is a program: “this land is our enterprise.” He helped in the foundation of Salvador, capital of Bahia, and was one of the most efficient advisers of the governor. During the administration of the second governor, at odds with the first bishop, Nóbrega left Bahia for the south. He again became a principal figure in the councils of the third governor, Mere de Sá, who led Brazil for 15 years. He planned the foundation of São Paulo in 1554 and worked toward the foundation of Rio de Janeiro in 1565. He traveled as missionary and observer through all of the captaincies of Brazil, from Pernambuco to São Vicente. He was the first Jesuit superior and the first provincial of Brazil. After turning the province over to Luis da Grã, he remained superior of the southern captaincies of Espírito Santo, Rio de Janeiro, and São Vicente. He founded the Colégio de Rio de Janeiro in 1567 and was its first rector. He was appointed provincial for the second time but died before he could take over the position. He is buried in Bahia in the present cathedral, formerly the Jesuit church, beside Mem de Sá. He was an excellent priest and good administrator, and was called the "Father of the Province." Southey considered him the greatest political figure in colonial Brazil.

Bibliography: S. LEITE, História da Companhia de Jesus no Brasil, 10 v. (Lisbon-Rio de Janeiro 1938–50). R. SOUTHEY, History of Brazil, 3 v. (London 1817–22).

[A. J. LACOMBE]

NOCK, ARTHUR DARBY

Historian of ancient Greek and Roman religion; b. Feb. 22, 1902, Portsmouth, England; d. Jan. 11, 1963, Boston, Mass. Nock was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and attracted early notice for his masterful knowledge of Greek and Latin scholarship. His first major work was an edition of Sallustius, On the Gods and the Universe (Cambridge 1926). Its introductory survey of the religious and cultural background of the fourth century A. D. shows that same balance of thoughtful generalization and specific fact that was to make his chapters on Roman religious developments in the Cambridge Ancient History (v.10, 1934; v. 12, 1939) small masterpieces of exposition. In 1930 he became Frothingham Professor of the History of Religion at Harvard University and editor of the Harvard Theological Review.

His numerous articles and reviews, often as important as contributions to scholarship as the books he criticized, centered increasingly on ancient magic and religion and on Christian beginnings. His Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo (London 1933; repr. 1961) is an indispensable guide to an understanding of the religious experience of the Hellenistic and Roman age and of the coming of Christianity as it may have appeared to pagans. His little book St. Paul (London 1938; repr. 1963) was followed by a magisterial four-volume edition in collaboration with A. J. Festugière, OP, of the Corpus Hermeticum (Paris 1945–54).

Far more interested in piety and cult than in philosophy and theology, he dwelt upon the practice and the expression of the common man in antiquity, providing a sharp and detailed picture in which the literary and philosophical texts are illustrative rather than central. He had a special interest in GNOSTICISM, criticizing the view that it was a pre-Christian entity. An edition of his collected shorter writings, including a list of his publications, was in press in 1965.

Bibliography: Arthur Darby Nock: Essays on Religion and the Ancient World, ed. and intro. Z. STEWART, 2 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1972); bibliography of Nock's writing.

[Z. STEWART]

NOËTUS OF SMYRNA

Monarchian heretic who taught in Smyrna, c. 180 to 200. His teachings are known from the antiheretical writings of HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME (d. 235). He seems to have been the first to have taught PATRIPASSIANISM, i.e., that the Father was born, suffered, and died, since the Father and the Son are only different ways (modi) of God's self-revelation. He admitted only an allegorical interpretation of St. John's Gospel, thus rejecting the doctrine of the Logos, and he accused his opponents of ditheism. A synod of the presbyters of Smyrna condemned him c. 200. One of his disciples, Epigonus, brought his doctrines to Rome.

Bibliography: HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME, Contre les hérésies, ed. and tr. P. NAUTIN (Paris 1949); Philosophumena, ed. P. WENDLAND (GCS 26; 1916) 9:3–9:3. C. H. TURNER, Journal of Theological Studies 23 (1921–22) 28–35. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.2:2193–2209. B. KOTTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 7:1018

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

NOLDIN, HIERONYMUS

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Salurn of the South Tyrol, Austria, Jan. 30, 1838; d. Vienna, Nov. 7, 1922. Ordained in 1861, Noldin entered the Society of Jesus four years later, and after ten years of study and teaching became rector of the Jesuit theologate at Innsbruck. There, in 1883, he wrote his first book, Die Andacht zum Heiligsten Herzen Jesu (11th German ed. 1923; first English tr. W. K. Kent, OSC, The Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, 1905). From 1886 to 1890 Noldin edited Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie and then taught moral theology for 19 years at the University of Innsbruck. In 1902 he published his major work, Summa Theologiae Moralis, a three-volume Latin textbook including sections on the fundamental principles of morality, the Commandments, and the Sacraments, and two appendixes, one on the Sixth Commandment and the use of marriage, and the other on ecclesiastical penalties. This influential textbook was in its 16th edition before the author's death and enjoyed several later editions under the direction of A. Schmitt, also of the University of Innsbruck. The 33d edition appeared in 1961 under the editorship of G. Heinzl. Noldin wrote three other smaller works, including Decretum de Sponsalibus et matrimonio cum declaratione (c. 1900) and De iure matrimoniali iuxta codicem (1919).

Bibliography: A. SCHMITT, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 47 (1923) 11–20. G. HEINZEL, "Hieronymus Noldin und sein Werk," ibid., 80 (1958) 200–210.

[J. UPTON]

NOLL, JOHN FRANCIS

Bishop and editor; b. Fort Wayne, Indiana, Jan. 25, 1875; d. Huntington, Indiana, July 31, 1956. Son of John G. and Anna (Ford) Noll. After completing his studies at St. Lawrence College, Mt. Calvary, Wisconsin, Noll attended Mt. St. Mary's Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio. He was ordained for the Diocese of Fort Wayne by Bp. Joseph Rademacher in June 4, 1898. After two years as curate in various parishes, he became pastor at Kendallville, Indiana, in 1900, and of St. Mary's in Huntington, Indiana, in July of 1910, remaining there until he was named bishop of Fort Wayne. While pastor at Besancon, Indiana, Noll's interest in apostolic work among non-Catholics led him to publish a booklet, Kind Words from Your Pastor, in 1904. At Hartford City, Indiana, in 1908, he began a parish magazine that was later printed for hundreds of parishes as The Family Digest. In 1912, in answer to the Menace and other anti-Catholic papers, he began to publish a four-page paper, Our Sunday Visitor.

Despite his other activities, he never ceased to be a writer and editor. To inform non-Catholics, he produced Father Smith Instructs Jackson (1913) and The Fairest Argument (1914). In 1925 he founded the magazine Acolyte, which in 1945 became the Priest. His pamphlets, numbering approximately 150, embraced such titles as The Catholic Church vs. the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, A Catechism on Birth Control, Instructing Non-Catholics before Marriage, and The Parochial School, Why? His longer books included A Vest Pocket of Catholic Facts (1927), The Decline of Nations (1940), and Our National Enemy Number One, Education without Religion (1942). In 1941 he added a second volume to the History of the Diocese of Fort Wayne begun by his predecessor, Bp. Herman J. Alerding, in 1907.

Noll was made domestic prelate in 1923, was named bishop of Fort Wayne May 12, 1925, and was consecrated by Cardinal George W. Mundelein June 30, 1925. Noll deserves credit for introducing into the diocese the Redemptorists (1927), the Capuchins (1928), the Slovak Franciscans (1929), the Oblates of Mary Immaculate (1934), the Society of the Priests of the Sacred Heart (1935), and the Crosier Fathers (1938). He reorganized Central Catholic High School, Fort Wayne, as a coeducational institution in 1938. He opened Bishop Noll High School in Hammond and St. Joseph High School in South Bend, Indiana, and established a minor seminary for the diocese at Lake Wawasee under the Crosier Fathers.

Nationally, Noll was one of the founders of the Catholic Press Association. He was one of the original members of the episcopal committee that formed the Legion of Decency to combat immorality in motion pictures, and he acted as the first chairman of the National Organization for Decent Literature. He was a member of the Board of Catholic Missions for more than 25 years. He devoted much time to the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), especially as a member of the conference's executive committee, chairman of its Department of Catholic Action, and chairman of its Committee of the Department of Lay Organizations. In this last capacity, he gave aid and direction to the National Council of Catholic Men and the National Council of Catholic Women. Among his other activities and offices was chairmanship of the National Committee on a Religious Census, which sought inclusion of religious affiliations in the Federal census. He raised $125,000, chiefly through Our Sunday Visitor, to erect a statue of Christ as the Light of the World at the NCWC Building in Washington, D.C. Pius XII made Noll an assistant to the papal throne March 14, 1941, and personal archbishop Sept. 2, 1953.

[T. T. MCAVOY]

NOMINALISM

A term deriving from the Latin nomen, meaning name, and used to designate a variety of doctrines and movements in philosophy. (1) In an ontological sense, nominalism is a doctrine according to which only individual things exist. In opposition to Platonic REALISM, which explains the similarity of individuals by saying that they share a common property or nature, i.e., by assuming the existence of UNIVERSALS that are not individuals, nominalism holds that if individuals similar to one another may be said to share anything, this can be only a spoken or written name or a mental image, i.e., something itself individual. In the strict sense nominalism is opposed also to CONCEPTUALISM, for it does not accept universals that are not individuals even as objects of thought. (2) In a polemical sense, nominalism is frequently used as an epistemological term roughly synonymous with extreme conventionalism, EMPIRICISM, or POSITIVISM. This is so because ontological nominalism has often led to a skeptical attitude concerning the objective value of intellectual knowledge. It would be wrong, however, to think that the refusal to accept universal essences must of necessity make the use of words entirely arbitrary. Ontological nominalism as such need not deny that individuals are essentially related; it merely rejects the assumption that related individuals have some namable thing that is not an individual in common. (3) Historically, “nominalism” is a term applied to philosophical and theological movements in early and late SCHOLASTICISM whose representatives were called nominales. Their doctrines included, among others, ontological nominalism in the broader sense, i.e., not excluding conceptualism.

Greek Origins. Even though the term “nominalism” appears much later, the doctrine can be found already in antiquity. Thus Antisthenes the Cynic is said to have objected to PLATO: “I see a horse, but I do not see horseness” (Simplicius, In Arist. Categ. 208.30). Aristotle defended an intermediate position between those of the CYNICS and Plato; in his view, although only individual beings with individualized natures exist in physical reality, the intellect is able to form universal concepts of such natures. This view may be referred to as a realistic conceptualism—realistic, in order to distinguish it from an idealistic conceptualism of the Kantian school.

The Stoics, who are often classified as nominalists, accepted the individuals of the material world but in addition, as an ontological foundation for logic, they postulated a special kind of universal, namely, τὸ λεκτόν, “what is said,” the meaning of sentences or words. The Stoic position, therefore, amounted to an original form of conceptualism. It resembles the position of the nominales of scholasticism, but as yet no line of direct influence has been traced from one school to the other.

Early Scholasticism. The famous scholastic discussion of universals arose in the wake of a renaissance of Aristotelian logic or, more exactly, in connection with an argument concerning logic’s place with respect to the other sciences (J. Reiners). The Neoplatonic tradition had assumed that logic was concerned with a special kind of thing, namely, with the CATEGORIES and PREDICABLES. BOETHIUS had distinguished between physics as a science of things (res) and logic and grammar as sciences of words (voces); he had stated also that the treatise on the categories dealt with words. Then, at the beginning of the 11th century, some writers asserted that predicables too could be considered not only as things but also as names.

Toward the end of the century, a controversy arose between those who taught logic in the old way as dealing with things (in re) and those who, like John the Sophist, the master of Roscelin, taught logic as concerned with words (in voce). Finally, ROSCELIN OF COMPIÈGNE explicitly denied that universals, i.e., the predicables of GENUS and SPECIES, could be things. His arguments, known from his disciple Peter ABELARD, were mainly negative, showing how Platonic realism leads to incongruous consequences. An important positive argument appealed to the authority of Aristotle, who defines a universal as “that which can be predicated of many” (On Interpretation 17a 39). Assuming that only words (and not things) could be predicated, it concluded that universals had to be words.

Such nominalism, however, did not exclude a realistic conceptualism (B. Geyer). It seems that Roscelin simply did not consider the problem of the CONCEPT. Abelard, however, explicitly discussed the universality of products of thought (ficta) and accepted the objective existence of the meanings (dicta) of sentences, as did the Stoics. To stress that words are not merely sounds, Abelard in his later writings preferred to say that universals were sermones, i.e., meaningful terms of discourse. He was convinced that there had to be an ontological justification for the use of general names: e.g., although two men do not share some “thing,” man (in homine), they do share the status of being man (in esse hominem). Roscelin and Abelard continued the tradition of the earlier dialecticians by applying logical analysis to theological matters. Roscelin’s incautious teachings elicited from St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY the first-known polemics against nominalism (De fide trin. 2), and the nominalists’ heretical formulations of the mystery of the Holy Trinity were later condemned by the Church (see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 721–739). (See DIALECTICS IN THE MIDDLE AGES.)

High Scholasticism. In high scholasticism the nominalist school disappeared. Everyone now taught logic as a science of meaningful words (scientia sermocinalis), and the new logical theories of the consequentiae and of the suppositions of terms, initiated by Abelard, were in full elaboration. But leading logicians, such as Peter of Spain (Pope JOHN XXI), found the acceptance of universals no longer problematical, and they did not hesitate to say that a universal term in suppositione simplici stood for a universal thing (res universalis). It was rather among Aristotelian theologians, such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS, that Abelard’s criticism of Platonic realism continued to be developed.

Late Scholasticism. A new school, whose members again were called nominales, originated in the 14th century with WILLIAM OF OCKHAM at its head. Intending to purify Aristotelian doctrine from Avicennist-Neoplatonist corruptions (see E. A. Moody, Logic, 9–11), Ockham rejected the doctrine of formal distinctions proposed by John DUNS SCOTUS, according to which common natures could be distinguished in individual things. For Ockham all distinctions within a thing can be only real distinctions, and all the components distinguished are as individual as the thing itself. Like Abelard, he stressed that universals are only names or terms: two similar individuals do not agree in a common nature but only “in themselves” (conveniunt se ipsis—In 1 sent. 2.4EE). By denying the reality of relations he made the separation between individuals even more radical.

Ockham's Nominalism. But again this type of nominalism did not immediately exclude conceptualism. Ockham recognized not only spoken or written terms but also mental terms or concepts. In his explanations as to how concepts are to be understood, however, he was hesitant: whereas in the beginning he tended to consider them as objective products of thought (ficta), he later estimated that it might be sufficient to identify them simply with the subjective acts of thinking (intellectiones) [see Boehner, “The Realistic Conceptualism of William of Ockham”]. Since psychological acts are concrete and individual, the latter interpretation of the concepts amounts, in the terminology explained above, to ontological nominalism in the strict sense.

Ockham defended his ontological viewpoint by revising the logic of the suppositions of terms accordingly. Furthermore, he insisted that science was, properly speaking, of terms and not of things (Philosophical Writings, ed. and tr. P. Boehner [Indianapolis 1964] 11), since one knows propositions and these are made up of singular and universal terms. By this he did not mean to deny that one knows about real things, for in the logic of suppositions he explicitly explained how terms stood for things. His peculiar preoccupation with terms, however, explains why Ockhamist nominalists were also called terminists (terministae).

The above-mentioned identification of concepts and acts of thinking was in keeping with the famous principle of economy that Ockham often applied in logical analysis: “Plurality is never to be posited without necessity” (numquam ponenda est pluralitas sine necessitate—In 1 sent. 27.2K), or “What can be explained by fewer assumptions is vainly explained by more” (frustra fit per plura quod potest fieri per pauciora—Summa tot.log. 1.12). This principle, later called “Ockham’s razor,” can be found already before Ockham, but it characterizes very well the pragmatic aspect of nominalism. Ockham also recognized clearly the connection between ontological assumptions and linguistic formulations. For example, he explained the abstract noun humanity nominalistically by the complex phrase “man insofar as he is man” (Summa tot.log. 1.8). Such reformulations have gained special prominence in the contemporary discussion of nominalism (see below).

But Ockham was more than a logician. His ontological nominalism was intimately connected with his theological view of a free, all-powerful, and all-merciful God. (Distinctive of late scholastic nominalism is the fact that it included members of both the arts and theology faculties.) For Ockham, the affirmation of a real distinction in things implied that God could create one of its components without the other. In view of God’s absolute power (potentia absoluta), the coexistence of individuals was entirely contingent; the actual order of nature and grace, moreover, was necessary only insofar as God in fact directed His power in this way (potentia ordinata). As a consequence, arguments depending on man’s experience of the de facto order could lead only to probable conclusions. For Ockham, God’s inner life was entirely beyond the reach of philosophical investigation. Since he admitted only real distinctions, he taught that God’s nature could be only of unanalyzable simplicity, rejecting even the existence of exemplary ideas in God’s mind. In his view, only theologians could attempt to formulate the mystery of Trinitarian life.

Ockhamist School. The followers of Ockham formed a new school, the via moderna, in opposition to the old schools of SCOTISM and THOMISM, the via antiqua. In England the first Ockhamists were ROBERT HOLCOT and ADAM WODHAM. In Paris the extremism of the first admirers of Ockham led in 1339 to a decree of the arts faculty prohibiting the teaching of the new doctrine (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis 2:485). Apparently some participants in the scholastic art of disputation had made exaggerated use of Ockham’s method of logical analysis, calling some propositions of accepted authorities, and even those of Scripture, “false according to their formulation” (falsae de virtute sermonis) or “simply false” (simpliciter falsae). The opponents of the nominalists blamed Ockham’s doctrine that science was of terms and not of things for these exaggerations; thenceforth they were quick to stress that they were interested primarily in things and not in terms (nos imus ad res, de terminis non curamus—see Ehrle, 322).

Yet more dangerous were early accusations of heresy. Two thinkers whose doctrines were related to Ockhamism, NICHOLAS OF AUTRE COURT and JOHN OF MIRECOURT, were condemned by Pope Clement VI (see Enchiridion symbolorum, 1028–49). But the theological writings of Ockham himself were never condemned by the Church, and later nominalist theologians were careful not to overstep the bounds of orthodoxy.

Growth of Ockhamism. OCKHAMISM soon attracted leading personalities such as JOHN BURIDAN, NICHOLAS OF ORESME, ALBERT OF SAXONY, and MARSILIUS OF INGHEN. Although these men did not accept all of Ockham's theses, they did help the nominalist school to gain respectability. It spread to old universities, but especially to newly founded centers of learning throughout Europe. Only a few places, such as Cologne and Louvain, remained devoted exclusively to the via antiqua. Unfortunately, the rivalry between antiqui and moderni meant endless quarreling. Thus in Paris in 1474 the realists succeeded in curbing a strong nominalist party with the help of royal power, although in 1481 the prohibitions were abolished.

In the 14th and 15th centuries the leaders of the conciliar movement, PETER OF AILLY and Jean GERSON, belonged to the via moderna. (Ockham himself had already suggested the establishment of a general council to counterbalance papal power.) The nominalist school has thus been characterized as "the late medieval ecumenical movement" (H. Oberman). Its theologians intended to heal the divisions in the Church by returning to the golden age of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX and PETER LOMBARD. The quarrels of the antiqui about metaphysical distinctions seemed to them "to thin out the food" of true biblical revelation, and apologetical proofs based on purely philosophical reasons (remoto Christo) were regarded as of little use (Ockham's criticism had made their conclusions already doubtful). The influential theologian and faithful interpreter of Ockham in the late 15th century was Gabriel BIEL.

Reformation and Modern Science. There has been much debate over the relationship between the nominalist school and the Reformation. Protestants used to stress Martin LUTHER's break with the "corrupted" Catholic tradition of the late Middle Ages, whereas Catholic authors, accustomed to see in Thomism the recommended doctrine of the Church, considered the Reformation to be a consequence of the "decadent" scholasticism of the nominalists. Both views seem to be mistaken. Luther had been strongly influenced by the theology of Biel, but in his doctrine of justification he rejected the nominalist SEMI-PELAGIANISM, according to which man can do his very best by his natural power and so put himself in the proper disposition for the infusion of grace. It may also be mentioned that other Reformers, such as John WYCLIF, John HUS, and John CALVIN, were of Scotist origin and that Huldrych ZWINGLI had a Thomist background, while Johann ECK, a foremost defender of the Catholic position, belonged to the nominalist school. During the late Middle Ages, nominalism, Scotism, and Thomism were all equally accepted schools of Catholic thought. It is true that, after the Council of Trent, the nominalist semi-Pelagianism came to be antiquated and can no longer be considered compatible with Catholic belief. But, on the other hand, there are reasons to believe that Biel's teachings about Scripture and tradition and his Mariology were forerunners of the Tridentine formulations (see Oberman, 423–428).

Also prevalent is a theory to the effect that modern empirical science was a direct result of Ockham's philosophy. It is true that from his doctrine of the contingency of the world order it follows that the only adequate ground for asserting a causal relation between two phenomena is the empirical observation of regular sequence. But Ockham himself had shown no particular interest in empirical science; and although many 14th-century physicists, such as J. Buridan and N. Oresme, were associated with the via moderna, it must be stressed that in their physical theories they did not follow Ockham but rather continued the work of their realist predecessors (see Weisheipl).

Modern Empiricism. At Oxford the Ockhamist tradition of grammatical and logical analysis survived until far into the 17th century. T. Hobbes's logic clearly goes back to the nominalist version of the logic of terms, and, continuing up to the "ordinary language" school of philosophy of the 20th century, one finds a steady series of warnings not to be misled by the use of abstract nouns.

What characterized modern philosophy, however, was not linguistic analysis but EPISTEMOLOGY. Here the empiricist postulate to justify all knowledge by reduction to sense experience necessarily led to a strict ontological nominalism. J. LOCKE still accepted general ideas, but G. BERKELEY and D. HUME made it clear that if an idea was a picture formed by sensation or by the imagination, then it could be the picture only of something individual. There is, for example, no such thing as a picture of a triangle in general that is "neither oblique nor rectangle, neither equilateral, equicrural, nor scalenon, but all and none of these at once" (cf. Berkeley, Principles, Introd. 13; Hume, Treatise 1.1.7). The use of general names was explained psychologically by saying that a general name evoked, through habitual association, a whole chain of similar individuals. Among positivists and psychologist logicians, such views were frequently discussed throughout the 19th century, e.g., by J. S. MILL. They were later subjected to a thoroughgoing criticism by E. HUSSERL.

Contemporary Discussion. With the rise of mathematical logic, psychological questions were pushed into the background. But the problem of universals reappeared in the 20th century in a new form, consequent on the development of set theory by G. Cantor. In this theory, sets or classes are Platonic universals and are not to be confused with wholes, i.e., with “heaps” or concrete collections of individuals. A sphere, for example, is identical with the whole made up of its two halves or with the whole made up of its quarters, but in set theory the sphere, the set that has the two halves as elements, and the set made up of the quarters are three different entities. With a finite number of atomic individuals, one is able to compose only a finite number of different “heaps”; in set theory, however, the number of sets, sets of sets, etc., that can be formed from these same individuals is infinite. At first the Platonic assumption of higher and higher infinities of sets was generally accepted, and set theory became the basis of all mathematics; numbers were defined as particular sets of sets of individuals. But about 1900 various antinomies were discovered when unrestrained Platonism led to contradictions (see ANTINOMY). Up to the present no single way of repairing the Platonic edifice has satisfied all logicians, and some (S. Leśniewski, T. Kotarbiński, N. Goodman, W. V. O. Quine, J. H. Woodger, and R. M. Martin) have come to doubt the meaningfulness of the very notion of set. In other words, nominalism has been again resuscitated.

Yet simply to deny the existence of Platonic entities is no longer sufficient. It has become clear that a limitation of ontological assumptions implies that some logical languages are no longer meaningful. The nominalist has therefore the task of formulating everything in a suitable nominalistic language. This encounters great difficulties, and most logicians accept a limited form of Platonism. Logical positivists, such as R. Carnap, try to escape into their conventionalism: although unable to do without a Platonic language, they continue to claim that metaphysical questions are meaningless and that the issue is simply a matter of linguistic convention.

See Also: LOGICAL POSITIVISM.

Bibliography: A. CARLINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:927–931. J. AUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1020–23. J. KLEIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1505–08. B. MATES, Stoic Logic (Berkeley, Calif. 1953). G. M. A. GRUBE, “Antisthenes Was No Logician,” American Philological Association, Transactions and Proceedings 81 (1950) 16–27. P. VIGNAUX, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1: 717–784; Nominalisme au XIV<sup>e</sup> Siècle (Montreal 1948). J. REINERS, Der Nominalismus in der Frühscholastik (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 8.5 (Münster 1910). E. A. MOODY, The Logic of William of Ockham (New York 1936); “Ockham, Buridan and Nicholas of Autrecourt: The Parisian Statutes of 1339 and 1340,” Franciscan Studies 7 (1947) 113–146. P. BOEHNER, “The Realistic Conceptualism of William of Ockham,” Traditio 4 (1946) 307–335. E. HOCHSTETTER, “Nominalismus?” Franciscan Studies 9 (1949) 370–403. F.

EHRLE, Der Sentenzen Kommentar Peters von Candia des Pisaner Papstes Alexanders V: Ein Beitrag zur Scheidung der Schulen in der Scholastik des vierzehnten Jahrhunderts und zur Geschichte des Wegestretes (Franziskanische Studien Beiheft 9; Munster 1925). G. RITTER, Studien zur Spätscholastik, 3 v. (Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Heidelberg, Philos.-Hist. Klasse, v. 12.4, 13.7, 17.5; 1921–27). H. A. OBERMANN, The Harvest of Medieval Theology: Gabriel Biel and Late Medieval Nominalism (Cambridge, Mass. 1963). J. A. WEISHEIPL, The Development of Physical Theory in the Middle Ages (New York 1960). R. I. AARON, The Theory of Universals (Oxford 1952). E. C. LUSCHEI, The Logical Systems of Leśniewski (Amsterdam 1962). W. V. O. QUINE, From a Logical Point of View (Cambridge, Mass. 1953). N. GOODMAN, The Structure of Appearance (Cambridge, Mass. 1951); “A World of Individuals” in The Problem of Universals: A Symposium (pa. Notre Dame, Ind. 1956). R. CARNAP, Meaning and Necessity: A Study in Semantics and Modal Logic (2d ed. Chicago 1956). T. KOTARBIŃSKI, “Sur l’attitude réiste (ou concrétiste),” Synthese 7 (1948–49) 262–273. E. HUSSERL, Logische Untersuchungen (2d ed. Halle 1913–21).

[G. KÜNG]

NOMOCANON

From the Greek words νόμος (law) and κανών (a rule). The word nomocanon was first used in the 11th century to indicate canonical collections that were composed of both ecclesiastical and civil laws dealing with ecclesiastical matters. The word was used later to indicate a book containing “cases of conscience,” that was employed by the monks of Mt. Athos. The most popular use of the word, however, was in regard to canonical collections containing both secular and ecclesiastical laws. This type of canonical collection was proper to the Oriental Churches from the early Middle Ages and played an important role in the history of Oriental Canon Law.

From the fourth century on, an important place was accorded to ecclesiastical matters in imperial law, such as in the Theodosian Code, the Justinian collections, and the Novellae and Basilicae. From the time of Constantine, civil rulers had taken on the role of protectors of the Church. As a result civil rulers became involved in matters exclusively, or at least partially, ecclesiastical; and they began to order these matters with civil laws. Collections of these imperial laws dealing with ecclesiastical matters were made and at first added to strictly canonical collections as appendices. They were later included in the main body of canonical collections, alongside strictly ecclesiastical materials, thus giving rise to a new species of canonical collection that became known as a collection of nomocanons. A “rubric” (a brief sentence indicating the subject matter) was followed by several texts that were intended to demonstrate and support the particular norm in question. These texts were drawn from both civil and ecclesiastical authorities. Frequently only a summation of the text was given, with an indication where it could be found in its entirety.

Collections of nomocanons have been among the principal sources of Oriental Canon Law since the early Middle Ages. The earliest one is the Nomocanon L titulorum, compiled toward the end of the sixth century. It has been falsely ascribed to Joannes Scholasticus. It underwent several revisions and was in use until the 12th century. The most important of all collections of nomocanons is the Nomocanon XIV titulorum. It was compiled during the reign of Emperor Heraclius, about the year 629. It is most likely the work of Enantiophanes, although it has been falsely ascribed to Photius. It consists of decrees of councils, texts of letters of the Fathers, and imperial constitutions. It underwent several revisions: a second revision in 883, which definitively placed the imperial constitutions on a par with the ecclesiastical canons; a third revision in 1198 by the celebrated canonist Theodore BALSAMON. In 928 it had been accepted by a council held at Constantinople, under the Patriarch Nicholas the Mystic, as the universal law of the Oriental Church.

Bibliography: R. NAZ Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 6:1014. C. DE CLERCQ, ibid. 2: 1171–74. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini: v. 1, Historia fontium (Turin 1950) 71–72, 407. A. VAN HOVE Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I (Mechlin 1928–) 1:168–171.

[J. M. BUCKLEY]

NON EXPEDIT

This phrase, “it is not expedient,” is of biblical origin (1 Cor 10.22) and has long been used by the Roman CURIA to indicate a negative reply for reasons of opportuneness. Signified here is its most famous application expressive of the Holy See’s policy prohibiting Italian Catholics from participating in political elections and most other political activities of the new kingdom, which unified the peninsula by seizing the STATES OF THE CHURCH and ending the papal temporal power and whose attempt to solve the ROMAN QUESTION by the Law of GUARANTEES (1871) proved unacceptable to PIUS IX.

Origins. Giacomo MARGOTTI, a journalist in Turin, anticipated this policy when he inaugurated a widely successful propaganda campaign in 1857, urging Catholics to abstain from civil elections and coined the phrase nè eletti nè elettori (neither elected nor electors). Yet in 1866 Pius IX permitted Catholics who were elected deputies to take the oath of loyalty to the state provided they added: salvis legibus divinis et ecclesiasticis (divine and ecclesiastical laws remaining intact). The non expedit policy first received formal acceptance in the decree of the Sacred Penitentiary (Sept. 10, 1874). Since numerous Catholics were uncertain whether the non expedit was an absolute prohibition or a recommendation, Pius IX issued a brief that declared abstention a duty and reproved attempts to entice Catholics to the polls (Jan. 29, 1877). LEO XIII renewed the prohibition on the eve of the 1880 elections, in a more solemn manner in the encyclical Immortale Dei (Nov. 1, 1885), and again in his approval of the Holy Office decree (June 30, 1888).

Application. Filippo Meda made the formula nè eletti nè elettori gradually give way to another, preparazione nell’ astensione (preparation in abstention), which advocated that Catholics should not be mere abstentionists, but should use their civil rights, improve social and political institutions by instilling in them Christian principles, regain society to Catholicism, and terminate the hostility between Church and State. The non expedit did not apply to administrative elections and other forms of civic activity. Catholic participation in administrative elections was always rather sizable, and it was greeted with satisfaction by the Catholic press not as a preparation for political elections, but as an act of hostility against the revolution. Especially in the big cities of Genoa, Turin, and Naples, the administrative elections of 1878, 1879, and 1880 resulted in sensational Catholic successes; Catholics in Rome joined in the Unione Romana and gained control of the communal government (1879–87). In political elections, on the other hand, the non expedit was observed in orderly fashion by Italian Catholics, thereby causing a very notable electoral absenteeism, which created a deep chasm between the “legal country,” representative of a small group of citizens who possessed and exercised the right to vote, and the “real country,” constituting the vast majority, which did not possess, or refused to exercise, this right.

Disappearance. Confronted with the dangerous expansion of parties of the extreme left and with the rupture of diplomatic relations between France and the Holy See, PIUS X (1903–14) edged toward a reconciliation with Italy, whose government, headed by Giovanni Giolitti, proved to be more conciliatory. On the eve of the political elections of Nov. 13, 1904, BONOMELLI explained to the pope the risk to the social order involved in Catholic electoral abstention and the consequent victory of the extreme left, and Pius X advised Catholics to follow their consciences. This authorization abrogated the non expedit virtually but not formally, because the encyclical Il fermo proposito (June 11, 1905) confirmed the generic prohibition against participating in elections, but admitted a dispensation when bishops recognized the necessity of using the ballot for the good of souls and the supreme interests of the Church and society.

When the Universal Council (Consiglio universale) was established (1913), Giolitti, president of the Council of Ministers, feared a leftist victory and sought to introduce into the ministerial majority representatives of the Catholics, who were economically potent, especially in country districts and who enjoyed the veneration surrounding Catholic religious tradition. This led to the Gentiloni pact inviting Italian Catholic support of candidates who would follow the Catholic Electoral Union's religious and social ideas. With the formation of the Popular party (Jan. 19, 1919), inspired by Don STURZO, Italian Catholics finally entered the political life of Italy as an autonomous force. About this time Benedict XV abrogated the non expedit.

Bibliography: G. DALLA TORRE, I cattolici e la vita pubblica italiana, ed. G. DE ROSA, 2 v. (Rome 1962). G. DE ROSA, Storia del movimento cattolico in Italia, 2 v. (Bari 1966). F. OLGIATI, "Per la storia del Non expedit," Vita e Pensiero 33 (1950) 364–369; "La politica di S. Pio X e il conservatorismo," ibid. 37 (1954) 525–540. A. C. JEMOLO, Church and State in Italy, 1850–1950, tr. D. MOORE (Philadelphia, Pa. 1960). For additional bibliography see ROMAN QUESTION.

[R. MORI]

NONANTOLA, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery outside Modena, north central Italy; since 1926 an abbey nullius perpetually united with the archbishopric of Modena. It was founded (752) by ANSELM (d. 803), the first abbot, and endowed by the Lombard King Aistulf, receiving the relics of Pope St. Sylvester I in 756. It soon achieved political and cultural importance, and its possessions extended as far as Constantinople. It was favored and controlled by the emperors until 1083; resident abbots replaced absentee appointees in 1044. MATILDA OF TUSCANY brought the abbey to the side of the popes in the investiture controversy; the Liber de honore ecclesiae by Placidus (1111) defended papal rights. Nonantola was long a center of piety and learning with a famous library and scriptorium; it became an abbey in COMMENDATION (1449). Incorporation by the Cistercians (1514), reform by G. F. Bonhomini (1566), and the building of a seminary in 1567 by St. Charles BORROMEIO (a commendatory abbot) did not stop the abbey's decline; and it was suppressed in 1797 by the Revolutionary government. Restored as an abbey nullius (1815), it was united with Modena (1821), secularized (1866), and again restored (1926). Nonantola now has its own chapter, ordinary, and minor seminary and serves 31 parishes (1964).

Bibliography: G. TIRABOSCHI, Storia dell'augusta Badia di S. Silvestro di Nonantola, 2 v. (Modena 1784–85). Miscellanea di studi nonantolani (Modena 1953). G. GULLOTTA, Gli antichi ca- taloghi e i codici della Abbazia di Nonantola (Vatican City 1955). J. RUYSSCHAERT, Les Manuscrits de l'abbaye de Nonantola (Vatican City 1955). P. GROSSI, Le abbazie benedettine nell'alto medioevo italiano (Florence 1957). U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Topobibliographie, 2 v. (Paris 1894–1903) 2123. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2087–88. A. VASINA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1025–26.

[L. J. LEKAI]

NONBEING

Nonbeing or, in modern philosophical usage, nothing, is the negation of BEING; as such, it is to be distinguished from EVIL, which is the privation of being. Nonbeing is a being of reason, i.e., its meaning is constituted through reference to being by way of negation, which is an act of the intellect (ARISTOTLE, Meta. 1003b 10; 1004a 9–12; THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 16.3 ad 2, 5 ad 3, 7 ad 4; De ver. 1.5 ad 2). Because being has many senses, nonbeing, the product of its negation, has many senses also (Meta. 1089a 16). Thus PLOTINUS calls the One as well as matter and evil nonbeing because they are not ESSENCE, which he identifies with being (Enneads 1.8.3.1–8; 3.6.7.9–13; 3.8.10.28–32; 5.2.1.1–7; 5.5.6.1–13).

Nonbeing is not independent of being, nor is being constituted by nonbeing, as G. W. F. HEGEL claimed. In its adequating and assimilating grasp of being, the intellect produces—as a by-product, as it were—that which is inadequate or unassimilated to being, viz, nonbeing. Being is evident to the intellect as not nothing. This "not nothing," however, is not that which causes being to be; rather being is not nothing simply because being is.

The theological truth of creation out of nothing deepens the metaphysics of nonbeing. "Out of nothing" does not mean that nothing itself is a kind of matter out of which creatures come to be. Rather, it implies that the being of creatures—as a PARTICIPATION of, and therefore a nonidentity with, the being of God—is made possible by the divine intellection of that which is simply other than God. But that which is simply other than God, the Subsisting Being, is "pure" nothing. Creatures could not exist as other than God, if before creation God did not know what is simply other than Himself. This "other" in no way measures God's knowledge, but depends upon it. The divine ideas as the exemplars of creatures are the divine essence known as able to be participated. Since participation implies difference, God must know the ways in which creatures differ from His own being (deficiunt a vero esse; cf. St. Thomas Aquinas, C. gent. 1.54) as well as the ways in which they imitate it. But that which is simply different from, or other than, the subsisting plenitude of being (esse) is nothing. Such an explanation avoids PANTHEISM and explains the diversity in being without supposing matter or possibles independent of creation and without introducing real diversity into God, the source of the diversity of being. Essence, not nothing, is the intrinsic principle of the finitude of beings other than God. Nevertheless, nonbeing is the condition of the possibility of the procession of essence (as the principle limiting the esse of creatures) from God.

Abbey of Nonantola. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

For PARMENIDES and Gorgias, nonbeing is not in any sense whatsoever. In the Parmenides (142A; 161E–164B) and the Sophist (237A–239E; 257B–259B), PLATO suggests a reality of nonbeing that grounds becoming and multiplicity (cf. Aristotle, Phys. 191a 23–191b 34). For Aquinas the first division or opposition is that between being and nonbeing; from this first otherness (alteritas) springs the plurality of beings and their difference from each other and from the First Cause (In Boeth. de Trin. 4.1). For B. PASCAL, man is the mean between God and nothing, so that nothing is one of the extremes that locate man's being. For H. BERGSON, nothing is a pseudo-idea, resulting from a generalization of the displacement of one being by another. For M. HEIDEGGER, the naught is both the veil and the unveiling of the "to be," because the "to be" is not the totality of "that which is." In dread, the pathos of the naught or of the "no-thing-ness" of the "to be," man transcends beings or "that which is" toward the "to be" itself. For J. P. SARTRE, man is his own nothing and the being in which nothing comes into the world, because the primordial fluidity and otherness of consciousness is not held by any being-in-itself. (See EXISTENTIALISM)

See Also: PRIVATION (PHILOSOPHY).

Bibliography: G. KAHL-FURTHMANN, Das Problem des Nichts (Berlin 1934). E. PACI, Il nulla e il problema dell'uomo (Turin 1950). G. SIEWERTH Der Thomismus als Identitätssystem (2nd ed.

Frankfurt a. M. 1961). H. BERGSON, Creative Evolution, tr. A. MITCHELL (New York 1944). M. HEIDEGGER, Was ist Metaphysik? (8th ed. Frankfurt am Mainz 1960), tr. in part in Existence and Being, introd. W. BROCK (2nd ed. London 1957). J. P. SARTRE, Being and Nothingness, tr. H. E. BARNES (New York 1956).

[T. PRUFER]

NONCONFORMISTS

English Protestants who refused Anglican uniformity, also called Dissenters. In the 16th century the most important nonconformists were CONGREGATIONALISTS and Brownists; in the 17th century, PRESBYTERIANS and the RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (Quakers); in the 18th and 19th, METHODISTS. All nonconformist groups before the Civil War (1638–49) were frequently called PURITANS. Today the term “Free church” is preferred.

Although the name “nonconformist” dates from 1662, actual dissent began when Protestants refused Elizabeth’s Act of UNIFORMITY in 1559, objecting to bishops and Anglican liturgical usages, and advocating a “pure” (Calvinistic) Christianity. They favored local autonomy in church government, and many wished to limit the powers of the monarchy and even separate Church and State. James I therefore regarded them as a danger to the monarchy and in 1604 deprived 300 Puritan divines. Some, the Pilgrim Fathers, fled to the New World. In the reign of Charles I, Archbishop Laud’s attempt to eliminate Puritan usages helped bring about the Civil War, during which nonconformist factions quarreled bitterly among themselves, united only in their opposition to Catholicism and the Anglican Establishment. After the Restoration of Charles II in 1660, the Anglican Cavalier Parliament sought to impose religious uniformity by the Clarendon Code. These harsh measures were enforced by justices of the peace eager for revenge for the oppression they had suffered under Puritans in the Civil War, and some 20 percent of the English clergy came to be deprived. James II sought nonconformist support in 1687–88 by his Declarations of Indulgence, but without success because of nonconformist suspicion of Catholics. James’s Calvinist successor, William III, by the Toleration Act of 1689, granted freedom of worship to nonconformists (but not to Roman Catholics or UNITARIANS), though still excluding them from public office. Many nonconformists evaded this exclusion by taking the Anglican sacrament once a year. The restrictive legislation of 1660 to 1689 was not formally repealed, however, until 1828, the year of Catholic emancipation. Nonconformity waned during the heyday of 18th-century deism and might have died out save for the great Methodist revival.

Most 17th-century nonconformists came from the middle classes. The Whig party, organized in the 1670s, was for 150 years the champion and stronghold of Dissent. Its descendant, the Liberal party, contained most nonconformist groups of the 19th century. After 1850 nonconformists interested themselves in social questions. The rise of British socialism and the Labor party owes more to the nonconformist conscience than to Karl Marx. Among the important nonconformists were O. Cromwell, J. Milton, G. Fox, J. Bunyan, I. Watts, J. Wesley, C. Wesley, G. Whitefield, C. H. Spurgeon, R. W. Dale, and P. Forsyth.

Bibliography: T. PRICE, The History of Protestant Nonconformity in England, 2 v. (London 1836–38). H. S. SKEATS and C. S. MIALL, History of the Free Churches of England (London 1894). W. K. JORDAN, The Development of Religious Toleration in England, 4 v. (London 1932–40). E. ROUTLEY, English Religious Dissent (Cambridge, Eng. 1960). P. SCOTT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:209. W. F. ADENEY, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:381–393.

[B. NORLING]

NONJURORS, ENGLISH

The name given to eight bishops and some 400 clergy of the Church of England who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary after the Glorious Revolution of 1688 out of loyalty to their previous oath to James II (see JAMES II, KING OF ENGLAND). Among them was Archbishop Sancroft of Canterbury. They were not notably friendly to the deposed James II and would have accepted William and Mary as regents, but not as king and queen. They were all High Churchmen, believers in passive obedience and the divine right of kings, and regarded James II as their rightful sovereign. Three days after the landing of William, George Hickes, Dean of Worcester, preached a sermon on submission to persecuting princes, citing the early Christians as examples. In February 1690, Parliament deprived the bishops of their sees and benefices and expelled them from the Anglican Church. Though reduced to poverty and persecuted by the government, they held to their claim to represent, and their duty to preserve, the true Anglican succession. They held services in secret. In 1694 the exiled James consented to nominate two new bishops, and G. Hickes and J. Wagstaffe were consecrated in secret. In 1713 Hickes, the only living nonjuring bishop, consecrated three more bishops. After the death of the Young Pretender in 1788, nonjurors largely disintegrated. The last nonjuring bishop was Charles Booth, who died in 1805.

The nonjurors found support in JACOBITE families for whom they were chaplains or tutors. Many English regarded them as apostate Anglicans or stalking horses for popery. After some time they had, in London alone, 50 chapels. Through the mediation of Peter the Great in 1716 they entered into discussions for union with four Eastern patriarchs, but by 1725 the efforts had failed. In England they sympathized with and prayed for the exiled Stuarts but were never actively disloyal to the government. In Scotland, however, where most of the Episcopal clergy were nonjurors, they took part, in accord with Episcopal disestablishment in 1689, in Jacobite uprisings in 1715 and 1745. In 1701 on the death of James II, some nonjurors accepted Queen Anne and rejoined the Anglican Church while others held that their oath to James bound them to support his descendants. In 1714 they were split over the oath to George I. They were divided also on points of theology and liturgical usage. Their secession deprived the Church of England of a group of devoted, pious, learned, and experienced churchmen whose small numbers belied their importance. They continued the tradition of the CAROLINE DIVINES and may be regarded as forerunners of the OXFORD MOVEMENT. They included T. Brett, T. Carte, J. Collier, T. Deacon, H. Dodwell, T. Hearne, T. Ken, J. Kettlewell, W. Law, C. Leslie, and R. Nelson.

Bibliography: J. H. OVERTON, The Nonjurors (London 1902). C. GASKOIN, J. HASTINGS, ed. Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:394–396. N. SYKES, Church and State in England in the XVIIIth Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1934). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 963–964. D. CARTER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1509–10.

[B. NORLING]

NONNBERG, ABBEY OF

In Salzburg, Austria; the oldest abbey of Benedictine nuns in Germany or Austria. It was founded c. 700 by St. RUPERT and endowed by Duke Theodo of Bavaria and his wife St. Regintrude. Until 987 Nonnberg was part of the mensal possessions of the archbishop of Salzburg. In 1043 the abbey was rebuilt in honor of St. Erentrude (d. c. 718), the first abbess and probably the niece of St. Rupert. The rich abbey was reserved for the nobility until the 18th century. In 1242 Abbess Gertrude of Stein received pontifical privileges, the faldstool, and a golden crown; the abbess sat with prelates in the Land-tag. After a fire in 1423 the church was rebuilt (1464–1509). Archbishop Paris Lodron introduced the Tridentine reform (1623). The abbey, which founded or restored several other convents and was never suppressed, has always been a center of learning and education.

Bibliography: M. REGINTRUDIS VON REICHLIN-MELDEGG, Stift Nonnberg in Salzburg (Salzburg 1953). L. H. COTTINEAU, Rép-

ertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2089. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962): v. 1, author part; v. 2, subject part, 2:244. F. HERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1026–27. H. SCHMIDINGER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912– ) 15:697–698.

[N. BACKMUND]

NONNUS OF PANOPOLIS

Epic poet and Christian exegete; b. Panopolis, Thebaid, Egypt, c. 400; d. after 450. Nothing is known of the education or career of Nonnus. He is the author of an epic poem in 48 books called the Dionysiaca that was written at Alexandria and describes the journey of the pagan god Dionysus to India. He is also the probable author of an hexameter verse titled Paraphrase of St. John's Gospel because there is an obvious relationship between the two works in the language, style, and identical phraseology. Although the theme and language of the Dionysiaca are definitely pagan, the poem does embody Christian notions, whereas the Paraphrase reflects the epic form and uses pagan similes, particularly in the names of the gods. The older theory that the author wrote the Dionysiaca while a pagan and the Paraphrase after conversion has been rejected. He seems to have been steeped in the Egyptian Hellenistic tradition. In the Paraphrase he introduced pagan Eons as well as Monophysite theological ideas. He called Mary the THEOTOKOS and quoted Origen, Gregory Nazianzus, John Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca. ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 43:749–1228. A. SCHEINDLER, ed., Nonni Panopolitani Paraphrasis (Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana); 1881). W. H. D. ROUSE, ed. and tr., Nonnos Dionysiaca, 3 v. (Loeb Classical Library; 1940). R. KEYDELL, Pauly Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft. ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 17.1 (1936) 904–921. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:793–795. K. KUIPER, Mnemosyne NS 46 (1918) 225–270. L. R. LIND, L'Antiquité classique 7 (1938) 57–65. P. BERNARDINI MARZOLLA, Studi italiana di filologia classica 26 (1952) 191–209. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 327–328. W. BAUER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1510. F. L. CROSS, Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 964.

[F. X. MURPHY]

NORBERT OF XANTEN, ST.

Founder of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS and archbishop of Magdeburg; b. Xanten, Duchy of Cleves, Germany,

"St. Norbert of Xanten," painting by Peter Paul Rubens, 1622. (©Burstein Collection/CORBIS)

c. 1080; d. Magdeburg, Germany, June 6, 1134. Norbert was a son of the lord of Gennep and was made a canon at nearby Xanten. He served at the courts of Frederick, archbishop of Cologne (d. 1131), and Emperor Henry V. Norbert accompanied Henry to Rome; and although he repented of his part in the humiliation of Pope PASCHAL II in 1111, he remained with the emperor. In 1115 a bolt of lightning felled Norbert from his horse, and considering it an invitation to a life of perfection, he retired to Fürstenberg, a cell near Xanten, where he spent three years (1115–1118) in a life of penance. Ordained a priest, he unsuccessfully attempted to reform the canons of Xanten, and his occasional preaching journeys caused him to be called before the Synod of Fritzlar in 1118. Norbert then distributed his possessions to the poor and, barefoot, made a trip to Saint-Gilles, where Pope Gelasius II authorized him to preach throughout the universal Church. During 1119 he wandered through northern France, Hainault, and Brabant, preaching peace and reconciliation by his life of poverty and simplicity as well as by his words. On the advice of Pope Callistus II and with the support of Bartholomew, bishop of Laon (d. 1157), Norbert established a monastery near Laon in the isolated valley of Prémontré in 1120. In the same year he assisted at the Council of Soissons, which condemned Peter ABE-LARD. Norbert also traveled to Cologne for relics and on his return journey made a second foundation at Floreffe near Namur. Since his itinerant preaching had attracted many followers to Prémontré, a decision on their way of life was necessary, and Norbert decided that they should follow the Rule of St. Augustine. The life was chiefly contemplative, though the ministry of preaching was not excluded, certainly not for Norbert himself. Many foundations were made throughout Europe in the next few years, and in 1125 Norbert set out for Rome, where Pope Honorius II confirmed the order.

King Lothair III was at that time defending his crown against the Hohenstaufen, and at the Diet of Speyer in 1126, Norbert preached a sermon on loyalty and obedience that won him Lothair's continuing support. At Speyer the canons of the cathedral of Magdeburg were to choose a new archbishop in Lothair's presence, thus following the form established by the Concordat of Worms (1122). They chose Norbert, whose unwillingness was overcome only by pressure from Lothair and the papal legates. In July of 1126 Norbert, still barefoot, entered Magdeburg and was consecrated. He attempted to recover the lands of the Church lost through nepotism or confiscation and also to reform the lives of the clergy, but his efforts tended only to aggravate the discontent and rebellion in his diocese.

Meanwhile, the order Norbert had left behind at Prémontré went through a crisis without his leadership. Norbert summoned the Premonstratensian leaders to Magdeburg and asked them to choose as his successor HUGH OF FOSSE, who was able to give the order direction and structure. Norbert expected to aid his reform efforts by introducing Premonstratensian canons into Magdeburg, but this as well as his other reforms resulted only in several assassination attempts and the archbishop's temporary exile.

Since the Archdiocese of Magdeburg was located on the eastern edge of the empire, part of Norbert's work as archbishop involved attempting to Christianize the Wends, who inhabited the territory east of the Elbe River. Norbert never experienced there the success that he knew from his preaching in France, Belgium, and Germany. His real accomplishment in the East was the establishment of the Premonstratensians in Magdeburg and its suffragan dioceses. These in turn were later successful in bringing about the conversion of the Wends.

In the schism of 1130, Norbert supported Innocent II's claim to the papacy and helped persuade the emperor to adhere to Innocent's cause. He accompanied Lothair's expedition to Italy (1132–33) against Anacletus II (Peter Pierleoni) and joined Bernard of Clairvaux in a vain attempt to win over Anacletus by persuasion. Although his preaching helped strengthen the resistance to imperial attempts to win back the right of investiture, Norbert continued to serve Lothair after the trip back to Germany, until illness forced him to return to Magdeburg. His fever lasted until Pentecost of 1134. He died on June 6 and was buried on June 11 at the Premonstratensian church in Magdeburg. In 1582 Gregory XIII authorized a liturgical cult for St. Norbert, and in 1627 his body was moved from Magdeburg to Strahov Abbey in Prague. In 1672 Clement X extended his feast to the universal Church.

Feast: June 6.

Bibliography: Contemporary lives are the Vita A, ed. R. WILMANS, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores, 12:663–703, and Vita B, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 170:1253–1344, F. PETIT, Norbert et l'origine des Prémontrés (Paris 1981). W. M. GRAUWEN, Norbertus, aartsbisschop van Maagdenburg, (1126–1134) (Brussels 1978) (German translation with revisions: Norbert, Erzbischof von Magdeburg (1126–1134) [Duisburg 1986]). Analecta Praemonstratensia has many excellent articles on Norbert by W. M. GRAUWEN, from 48 (1972) until 72 (1996). K. ELM, ed., Norbert von Xanten, Adliger—Ordenstifter—Kirchenfürst (Cologne 1984).

[J. R. SOMMERFELDT/T. J. ANTRY]

NORFOLK

A line of Catholic earls and dukes whose peerage dates back to the 11th century, when Ralph, a staller or constable of the court of Edward the Confessor (reign 1043–66) and a benefactor of St. Riquier's Abbey, Pontthieu, was confirmed in his lands. The earldom proper was created in 1140 or 1141 for Hugh Bigod (d. 1176 or 1177), who ruled East Anglia from Framlingham castle. Roger, fifth Bigod earl of Norfolk (1245–1306), died without heirs.

The Mowbray Line. Edward I (reign 1274–1307) revived the earldom for his son, Thomas of Brotherton (1300–38), who in turn died leaving no son.

Thomas de Mowbray. First duke of Norfolk; b. 1366?; d. Venice, Sept. 22, 1399. Thomas was the grandson of Thomas of Brotherton's daughter, Margaret (c. 1320–1400), and received the revived dukedom in 1397. He had been earl marshal at 20, and had achieved power for revealing to Richard II (reign 1377–99) the plots of the earls of Arundel and Gloucester. In 1398 he was accused of treasonable words and fled abroad.

John de Mowbray. Second duke of Norfolk; b. 1389; d. Epworth, Isle of Axholme, Oct. 19, 1432. He distinguished himself in the wars with France (1417–21; 1423–24), and was restored to his father's dukedom in 1425. He was marshal at the coronation of Henry VI in 1429.

Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

John de Mowbray. Third duke of Norfolk, hereditary earl marshal of England and fifth earl of Nottingham; b. Sept. 12, 1415; d. Nov. 6, 1461. The son of John, he supported Richard, Duke of York, in the wars for the English succession (War of the Roses, 1455–85), but changed his allegiance to the Lancastrian King Henry VI in 1459. At the second battle of St. Alban's (1461) he fled from Henry VI's camp and fought for the Yorkist Edward IV, who was crowned king of England after his victory over the Lancastrians at Towton (1461).

John de Mowbray. Fourth duke of Norfolk; b. Oct. 18, 1444; d. Framlingham, Jan. 17, 1476. He also supported the Yorkist cause, but at his death the title again lapsed. Upon the marriage of his 5-year-old daughter, Anne, to Richard, Duke of York, second son of Edward IV, on Jan. 15, 1478, the dignity was added to his titles.

The Howard Line. The illustrious house of Howard, which long stood next in blood to the sovereign, traces its lineage to John Howard of Wiggshall St. Peter, Norfolk, whose son, William, became a judge in 1297. The Howards came to power as Yorkists.

John Howard. First duke of Norfolk; b. 1430?; d. Bosworth Field, Aug. 22, 1485. As John of Stoke Newland he became treasurer of Edward IV's household in 1468, and was summoned to Parliament as Lord Howard. He served as captain general at sea, and was later appointed lord admiral. On June 28, 1485, 12 days after young Richard, Duke of York and Norfolk, had been sent to the Tower by his uncle Richard III (reign 1483–85), John Howard was granted the vacant dukedom; as constable of the Tower he probably was in league with the prince's murderers. At the battle of Bosworth he commanded Richard's vanguard of archers. The "Jockey of Norfolk" fell while fighting alongside his sovereign.

Thomas Howard. Second duke of Norfolk; b. 1443; d. May 21, 1524. Like his father, John Howard, he fought for the cause of Richard III at Bosworth, and after defeat spent four years in the Tower as prisoner of the new Tudor king, Henry VII (reign 1485–1509). On release he was created earl of Surrey and proved an indispensable servant of the new monarchy as lord treasurer (1501–22) and as military general on the Scottish border. He inflicted the decisive defeat on the Scots at the battle of Flodden Field on Sept. 9, 1513, and for this service was elevated to the dukedom in February 1514, and named lord admiral. He was guardian of the realm while Henry VIII (reign 1509–47) met Francis I, King of France, on the Field of the Cloth of Gold at Calais on June 7, 1520.

Thomas Howard. Third duke of Norfolk; b. 1473; d. Kenninghall, Norfolk, Aug. 25, 1554. He succeeded his father, Thomas, and also became lord treasurer. In 1495 he was married to Anne, daughter of Edward IV. A man of "very great experience in political government," as the Venetian ambassador noted, he clung to office despite the upheavals of the Reformation. He rebuilt Kenninghall Palace in the form of a letter H, and the grandeur of it and his new palace at Norwich outdid the buildings of his rival Cardinal Thomas Wolsey. Like his father he was a fearless soldier and an astute politician. He had led the vanguard at Flodden Field, and was created earl of Surrey in February 1514. At intervals he devastated the Scottish border and raided the French coast. He led the council's attack on Cardinal WOLSEY, and at the latter's fall Thomas became HENRY VIII's most trusted adviser. His position had been strengthened by the king's marriage to his niece, Anne Boleyn (1533), and by his daughter's marriage to Henry's natural son, the Duke of Richmond. His enemies hoped that Anne's trial for adultery (1536) would bring down the whole house of Howard, but Norfolk, who presided, acquiesced in her execution, and scotched a rumor that he was to be sent to the Tower by remarking that it were no more likely than "Tottenham shall turn French."

That autumn he was sent to suppress the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE, the popular rising under Robert ASKE that was provoked by recent religious changes. At first he offered the rebels the choice of battle or submission, but at Doncaster, seeing their numbers so strong, he made a truce while their demands were forwarded to the king. In January under royal instruction he dealt with severity against the rebels, terrifying the north by his executions. In 1539 Norfolk put forward the Act of Six Articles, devised by Stephen GARDINER, which restated the doctrinal position of the Henrician Reformation. The passing of this act pointed to the decline of Thomas Cromwell's power, and it was Norfolk who in June 1540 arrested Cromwell at the council table and sent him to the Tower. In July, to consolidate his position the duke promoted the marriage of his niece Catherine Howard with Henry, but the sordid business of her trial and execution in February 1542 brought the house of Howard into disrepute. Thereafter, though far too useful to be cast aside, Norfolk remained outside the inner ring of councilors. In 1544 he defeated the Scots at Solway Moss and as general of the army in France captured Boulogne, though he was soon replaced by Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford and Duke of Somerset (1506?–52).

As the uncle of Prince Edward, Hertford was bent on becoming regent on the accession (1547), but to achieve this meant the overthrow of the Howards. A dynastic alliance between the families, proposed by Norfolk, founded and before the end of 1546 he was in the Tower, for his son Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, poet and soldier of renown, had played into Hertford's hands. Surrey, it was said, devised a plan for his sister, the widowed duchess of Richmond, to become Henry's mistress. He had designs on the regency himself and was indiscreet enough to quarter the royal arms with his own. There was sufficient evidence to send him to the block on January 19 on a technical charge of treason. Old Norfolk was compromised by his son's indiscretion. On January 29 King Henry appointed commissioners to give assent to the bill of attainder against the duke, but died during the night, so Norfolk's life was saved, though he remained a prisoner of state throughout Edward VI's reign. On Mary's accession (1553) he at once returned to power, and despite his age, he prepared for the coronation as lord treasurer and earl marshal. He died full of years and honors. Though he had suppressed the Pilgrimage of Grace and shared in the scramble for monastic lands, the third duke was essentially a conservative, and it was for political and dynastic reasons that he abhorred Protestantism and despised the New Learning.

Thomas Howard. Fourth duke of Norfolk; b. March 10, 1538; d. June 2, 1572. He was the son of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey. After a year in the custody of Sir John Williams he was placed at Reigate (1548) under his aunt, the Duchess of Richmond, who engaged John Foxe (1516–87) as his tutor. Brought to court on Queen Mary's accession (1553) he was placed in the households successively of Bps. Stephen Gardiner and John White, who sought to eradicate the teaching of Foxe. In 1554 he became a gentleman of the chamber of the Infante, Philip of Spain, and that summer succeeded to the dukedom of his grandfather. In 1555 he married Mary Fitzalan, daughter of Henry, Earl of Arundel, but she died in childbirth in June 1557. In the first week of Elizabeth's reign (1558–1603) Thomas married Margaret Audley, widow of Lord Henry Dudley. As premier peer and sole duke he was connected by descent or alliance with most of the nobility. He was the richest landowner and his Liberty of Norfolk was the greatest private franchise in the kingdom. Despite his power as a territorial magnate that enabled him to return East Anglian and Sussex members of Parliament to Westminster, Elizabeth delayed taking him into her confidence. In December 1559 she appointed him lieutenant general in the war against the French in Scotland, which culminated in the treaty of Edinburgh, breaking the "Auld Alliance." There he came close to William Cecil (1520–98) and shared his suspicion of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester (1532?–88), Elizabeth's favorite; for seven years opposition to Dudley remained the basis of Norfolk's political action. On the queen's recovery from serious illness in October 1562 Dudley was made a privy councilor, and on Cecil's insistence Norfolk entered the council the same day to balance Leicester's power. Cecil, with the duke's enthusiastic support, began negotiations for Elizabeth's marriage to the Archduke Charles of Austria, which were to founder on the question of his right to a private Catholic chapel. In the Parliament of 1566 Norfolk was spokesman for the lords, insisting that Elizabeth should marry and settle the succession, and he displayed real political courage. As a result the Hapsburg negotiations were resumed, but the duke was too ill to attend the vital council meetings in the autumn of 1567 that settled the issue, and in his absence Leicester's intrigues for a French match and his stirring Protestant opinion against the Austrian alliance and its begetters wounded Norfolk.

After Margaret Audley's death Norfolk married Elizabeth, widow of Lord Thomas Dacre, in January 1567. She was a devout Catholic. Her death in childbed that autumn brought him low and it was as a widower for the third time that he began to listen to the suggestion that he should marry MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Following Mary's flight to England Norfolk went as principal commissioner to York to investigate the charges brought against her in September 1568. Here William Maitland (1528?–73), Mary's secretary for foreign affairs, whispered his proposal that a match with Mary would at a stroke solve the Scottish problem and the question of the succession in England. The duke had been openly mentioned as a consort for Mary on two earlier occasions, but now that the Casket Letters had convinced him of Mary's guilt in Lord Darnley's murder (1567) he was noncommittal. Elizabeth suspected that Norfolk was not behaving impartially toward Mary and recalled him from York to an enlarged commission in London. Intrigues and the double dealing of James Stewart, Earl of Moray (1531?–70), here showed the duke in an unfavorable light and by the end of 1568 he had decided to go forward with the marriage scheme as the only avenue to power. To achieve this he made an uneasy alliance with Leicester and together they planned to get rid of William Cecil, then especially unpopular; but Elizabeth stood by her secretary and his opponents could only pursue their goal by intrigue. Other schemes were devised, such as the design of Henry FITZALAN, Earl of Arundel; John Lumley; Thomas, Earl of Northumberland; and Charles, Earl of Westmorland, for liberating Mary with Spanish arms and deposing Elizabeth. In all these schemes Norfolk's marriage with Mary was a cardinal feature.

Leicester prevaricated. He had insisted on obtaining Elizabeth's consent to the marriage himself and finally outwitted Norfolk. Elizabeth put Norfolk on his allegiance to deal no more with Mary and fearing for his life he fled from court to London and thence, on September 16, to Kenninghall. Having instructed the northern earls to call off their rising he went to Windsor to submit. The charges against him did not add up to high treason, but in the prevailing political uncertainty the Tower seemed the safest place for him, and the outbreak of the Northern Rebellion made an early release unlikely. In August 1570, after Norfolk had written a full submission, Elizabeth allowed him to go to the Charterhouse under strict supervision, on account of his health. Within weeks Roberto di Ridolfi (1531–1612), the Florentine banker, had him involved in his grand design for a Spanish invasion of England. Norfolk himself never signed the fatal letters to the Duke of Alva, Philip II, and the pope. With the unravelling of the Ridolfi conspiracy there was ample evidence to send Norfolk for trial on Jan. 16, 1572. Though he protested his innocence, his peers found him guilty. Elizabeth hesitated signing his death warrant but could not hold out indefinitely against the logic of statecraft, and the last duke of medieval creation was executed on June 2, maintaining his innocence and denying he was a Catholic. Though aloof and indecisive he remained a popular figure to the end.

The dukedom did not pass to Thomas' eldest son, Philip HOWARD, who lost the favor of Elizabeth I and was imprisoned allegedly for treason. Philip's eldest son,

Thomas (1586–1646), however, was restored to the earldom of Arundel in 1604. The friend of the antiquaries Sir Robert Cotton and Sir Henry Spelman, he formed the first notable art collection in England. Out of sympathy with the court of Charles I (reign 1625–49), he left England for Italy before the civil war, but contributed £ 54,000 to the royalist cause, in recognition of which he was created earl of Norfolk on June 6, 1644. His second son, Henry (1608–54), a zealous royalist, fought at Edgehill, and upon his return to his estates found that they had passed into the possession of Parliament. By a vote of the House of Commons, he was allowed to compound them for £ 6,000 in 1648. Henry's son Thomas (1627–77), while in exile with his grandfather, developed brain fever from which he never recovered, but at the restoration of Charles II (reign 1660–85) he became the fifth duke of Norfolk by an act of Parliament on Dec. 29, 1660. He died unmarried, and with him the earldom of Arundel descended with the dukedom. His successors for the next century play little part in public affairs: Henry, sixth duke (1628–84), brother of Thomas, succeeded in 1677; Henry, seventh duke (1655–1701), son of Henry, succeeded in 1684; Thomas, eighth duke (1683–1732), nephew of Henry, succeeded in 1701; Edward, ninth duke (1685–1777), brother of Thomas, succeeded in 1732; Charles, tenth duke (1720–86), descendant of the seventh duke, succeeded in 1777.

Charles Howard. Eleventh duke of Norfolk; b. March 5, 1746; d. Norfolk House, London, Dec. 16, 1815. He had been a member of Parliament for Carlisle and turned Protestant during the GORDON RIOTS. Described as a hard drinker, he, with the Prince Regent George, set the fashion for late and boisterous dinners. At a political banquet (1798) he gave a toast to "our sovereign's health—the majesty of the people," which offended King George. He was dismissed from his posts. Charles took in hand the rebuilding of Arundel Castle (1791) and lived to see the completion of the new Baron's Hall (1815).

Bernard Edward Howard. Twelfth duke of Norfolk; b. Sheffield, Nov. 21, 1765; d. Norfolk House, London, March 19, 1842. The third cousin of Charles, Bernard was a Catholic and by an act of Parliament, was allowed to retain the hereditary dignity of earl marshal. He was admitted to the House of Lords after the Catholic Relief Bill (1829), and was named a privy counselor in 1830.

Bernard Edward Howard. Thirteenth duke of Norfolk; b. London, Aug. 12, 1791; d. Arundel Castle, Feb. 18, 1856. He succeeded his father, Bernard, and became the first avowed Catholic member of Parliament since 1688, being returned as member for Arundel on May 4, 1829, following the passage of Catholic Emancipation.

As a supporter of Lord John Russell (1792–1878), he voted for the anti-Catholic Ecclesiastical Titles Bill (1850) and remained little more than Catholic in name until his deathbed reconciliation.

Henry Granville Howard. Fourteenth duke of Norfolk; b. London, Nov. 7, 1815; d. Arundel Castle, Nov. 25, 1860. He changed his surname to Fitzalan-Howard in 1842. He was a Whig member of Parliament for Arundel (1837–50) when he resigned his seat on the enactment of Russell's Ecclesiastical Titles Bill and broke with the Whigs. He was renowned for his zeal as a Catholic and for his charity.

Henry Fitzalan-Howard. Fifteenth duke of Norfolk; b. London, Dec. 27, 1847; d. there, Feb. 11, 1917. He succeeded in 1860 and was the first to play a notable part in public life since the Reformation. Educated under John Henry NEWMAN at the Oratory School, he became the recognized head of the English Catholic laity, and his influence aided Newman's election to the cardinalate in 1878. He was the first lord mayor of Sheffield and first mayor of Westminster. A Unionist, he resigned the post of postmaster general in 1900 to join the Imperial Yeomanry in South Africa. As earl marshal at the coronations of Edward VII (Aug. 9, 1902) and George V (June 22, 1911) he revised several ancient usages. He built churches at Arundel and at Norwich, the latter as a thank-offering for the birth of an heir to his second wife.

Bernard Marmaduke Fitzalan-Howard. Sixteenth duke of Norfolk; b. Arundel House, May 30, 1908. He officiated as earl marshal at the coronations of George VI (May 12, 1937) and Elizabeth II (June 2, 1953). An experienced landowner, he served as joint parliamentary secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture (1941–45). His interests in sports and the countryside made him a popular figure, and in 1962 and 1963 he was manager of the English Cricket XI on its Australian tour. He also directed the state funeral of Sir Winston Churchill in 1965.

Bibliography: A. COLLINS, The Peerage of England . . . , enl. S.E. BRYDGES, 9 v. (London 1812). J. E. DOYLE, The Official Baronage of England . . . 1066–1885, 3 v. (London 1885). E. LODGE, The Peerage and Baronage of the British Empire as at Present Existing (70th ed. London 1901). W. DUGDALE, The Baronage of England . . . , 2 v. (London 1675–76). C. READ, ed., Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485–1603 (2d ed. New York 1959). W. HUNT et al., The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901– ) 10:1–76, J. TAIT, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901– ) 13:1114–35. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 5:184–187. L. B. SMITH, A Tudor Tragedy:

The Life and Times of Catherine Howard (New York 1961). N. WILLIAMS, Thomas Howard, Fourth Duke of Norfolk (London 1964).

[N. WILLIAMS]

NORIS, HENRY

Theologian and historian; b. Verona, Italy, Aug. 29, 1631; d. Rome, Feb. 23?, 1704. Noris was the son of Alessandro Noris and Caterina Manzoni. After joining the Augustinians at Rimini (1646), he served as regent of studies at Pesaro, Perugia, Florence, and Padua. He then became tutor to the son of the grand duke of Tuscany and professor of ecclesiastical history in Pisa (1674–92). Brought to Rome by Innocent XII, he was named custodian of the Vatican Library (1692), consultor to the Holy Office (1694), and cardinal (1695).

One of the leading savants of the 17th century, Noris was the primary figure in the later school of Augustinian theology (see AUGUSTINIANISM, THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF). He became involved in many controversies, especially by reason of two of his writings, Historia pelagiana and Vindiciae augustinianae (both published in Padua in 1673) that contained his interpretation of the soteriology of St. Augustine, a doctrine that he claimed was wrongly understood by both the Jansenists and their adversaries. Noris was repeatedly accused of Baianism (see BAIUS AND BAIANISM) and JANSENISM, but he was cleared of these charges both during his lifetime and after his death (brief of Benedict XIV, July 31, 1748). Of his numerous works (about 19 in print, 14 in MS, and many letters), the best edition is the Opera omnia edited by P. and G. Ballerini (v. 1–4 Verona 1729–32; v. 5 Mantua 1741).

Bibliography: F. ROJO, "Ensayo bibliográfico de Noris, Belletti y Berti," Analecta Augustiniana 26 (1963) 294–363. G. BRUZONI, "Nove lettere inedite di fra Enrico Noris," Analecta Augustiniana 62 (1999) 179–211.

[A. J. ENNIS]

NORMALITY

The condition of being in accordance with a norm. A problem relative to normality has arisen in recent times particularly in the life sciences. The difficulty of discovering normal traits has been compounded by an initial un-sureness as to the way in which normality should be defined. Negatively, the normal is what is not abnormal, i.e., whatever functions at least sufficiently well to survive and to continue to function without requiring extraordinary assistance. Positively, two different norms have been proposed: the average norm, according to which the normal is what is characteristic of the greatest number; and the norm taken from the best, according to which the most perfect specimens are considered normal, all others to some extent falling short of normality. While each of the positive norms is easily reconciled with the negative, it is difficult to see how the positive norms are to be reconciled with one another, and hence to discover whether a given trait, admittedly not the best, should be considered normal or a falling short of the norm.

Types of Solution. Logically, the question of normality can arise only in a context of comparability, which involves in turn a multiplicity of similar things and also a judge to make the comparison. In a Platonic conception of the universe, the Ideas exist as the norms of all things. On any other hypothesis it is necessary to discover the norm. If the mind of the judge is taken as the sole source of the norm, either the norm is purely arbitrary, and hence of no scientific value, or the question recurs as a question about the nature of the mind itself. The source of the norm is therefore to be sought in nature as well as in judgment.

Several recent writers have noted that the question of determining the normality of anything, whether of the member of a species, the function of an organ, the mental state of an individual, or the working of a society, arises only in a context of means and end relationships.

Aristotle's Physics (192b 8–200b 9) supplies the elements of a solution to the problem of normality in the doctrine of CAUSALITY, particularly FINAL CAUSALITY. For Aristotle, NATURE in this regard is "the principle and cause of motion and rest to those things, and those things only, in which she inheres primarily, as distinct from incidentally" (192b 21–23). Each natural thing, inasmuch as it has a definite structure, has a definite function possible to it. What is definite in nature is made so by final cause. Parts are parts of a whole that specifies them by constituting their end; organs exist for the sake of the function they perform; actions are defined by the end to which they are directed. Things have definite tendencies, and the definiteness of these tendencies is explainable in terms of their final causality.

What is normal, therefore, is what performs its function well: An organ is normal if it functions in such a way as to serve the whole body; an action is normal if it attains the end such actions are directed to attain. The end may be attained perfectly or imperfectly; but if it is attained, even badly or in an extraordinary way, the function is to that extent normal. Only an act that failed to achieve the end it was directed to could be called altogether abnormal. Thus the majority, over a long period of time, can be said to be normal at least to the extent of having what is necessary for mere survival; and in this way the average is the norm. And since it belongs to the very notion of the END to be a GOOD, that which is most perfect, most in possession of its end, can also be said to be the norm. Thus the two norms, the average and the best, can be reconciled in the notion of the end.

Problems with Finality. There remains the difficulty of knowing the final causes of things. Certainly it is possible to infer from structure something of the nature of function; but no one has yet succeeded in defining even so common a natural being as a dog. The difficulty is particularly acute in the case of a human PERSON, since the person as such is unique and incapable of being defined. Negatively it may be quite clear that a person is functioning inadequately in some respect; but normality in the positive sense would seem to be impossible to determine absolutely in the case of the person. Only on the basis of actual functioning can the person be said to be normal in his personal traits; and since the potentialities of a person can never be known with complete adequacy, it is impossible to say to what extent he is realizing them. Admittedly, the natures of many things are unknown to man; but in many instances one does know what things are for; and to the extent that it is possible to discern means-end relationships, and to that extent alone, is it possible to judge the normality of anything.

Objections against the proposition that the final cause constitutes the norm in natural things are directed principally against the possibility of knowing the final cause. DESCARTES considered that on account of God's omnipotence and the weakness of the human intellect, it is impossible for man to know the final causes of natural beings, so that "what are called final causes are of no use at all in Natural Philosophy" (Meditations, 4). Evolutionists consider the evolution of new species an obstacle to the doctrine of natures in things. And historicity would replace human nature with history. A different objection, springing from the common confusion of final and EFFICIENT CAUSALITY, need not be considered here.

The fact of human ignorance of the purposes of many things, and particularly of "external finality" (e.g., of the purpose of a frog), does not invalidate human knowledge of many instances of "internal finality" (e.g., of the purpose of a frog's eye), especially in biology, where the notion of adaptation, or organization for an end, is fundamental. Evolution, which rests upon the chance mutations of genes and selective reproduction, logically presupposes the existence of the "matter" of the new species in the genes of the old and also the basic lawfulness of nature, which Aristotle (195b 30–200b 9) has shown must underlie CHANCE. The fact that human beings to some extent "make themselves" and make their culture argues for HABIT as "second nature" rather than against final cause. Explanation through final cause does not eliminate the usefulness of explanation through material, formal, or efficient cause. It merely makes evident the reason for the efficient cause's forming the matter in such a way as to bring about the desired result. Deficiency on the part of the other three causes, in turn, will result in partial or total interference with the attainment of a result that could be considered in reference to what was to be expected on the basis of the usual behavior of most individuals (the average norm) or on the basis of the behavior of those recognized as the best example of a group.

See Also: PERSONALITY.

Bibliography: A. POMPEI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:937. G. AMBROSETTI and C. NEGRO, ibid. 934–37. M. K. O'HARA, "Toward a Norm for Normality," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 36 (1962) 83–91. M. JAHODA, Current Concepts of Positive Mental Health (New York 1958). C. SMITH, Contemporary French Philosophy: A Study in Norms and Values (New York 1964). E. L. FACKENHEIM, Metaphysics and Historicity (Milwaukee 1961).

[M. K. O'HARA]

NORMANDY

Ancient province of France, originally called Neustria, bordered on the north and west by the English Channel, on the northeast by the Bresle River, which separates it from Picardy, and on the south by the region of the Vexin and the Epte River. After the French Revolution, Normandy was divided into the modern départements of Seine-Maritime, Eure, Orne, Calvados, and Manche.

Part of the Roman Empire after its conquest by Julius Caesar, Neustria (later called Normandy) was occupied by the FRANKS in the late fifth century and became a part of the Merovingian kingdom. In the fourth century St. Mello and St. VICTRICIUS OF ROUEN had introduced Christianity, which spread throughout the region. By the sixth century Normandy was divided into seven dioceses: Rouen, BAYEUX, Coutances, Lisieux, Avranches, Evreux, and Sées. Early Norman abbeys included SAINT-OUEN, Fontenelle, Jumièges, and Mont-Saint-Michel. After falling to the Carolingians in 751, the province remained under their rule until the ninth-century attacks of the Vikings (NORTHMEN). By the Treaty of St.-Claire-sur-Epte in 911, the Carolingian king Charles the Simple granted Rouen and its vicinity to the Norman leader Rollo, who was baptized a Christian and may have received Charles's daughter in marriage.

For a hundred years the Normans spread westward and southward from Rouen, incorporating the Bessin, the Evreçin, the Cotentin and the Avrançin in the time of Rollo's son William Longsword (930–942), who was assassinated during the expansion; and his son Richard I (942–996). Richard I married a newly-arrived Dane, Gunnor, whose descendents in the female line and their husbands came to constitute the new aristocracy of Normandy. While adopting Frankish customs and institutions, they spread their power through predatory kinship, and forged the most powerful duchy in northern France. Richard II (996–1026) married his sister Emma to King Ethelred Unraed of England, whose son EDWARD THE CONFESSOR bequeathed England to the future William the Conqueror.

During the eleventh century adventurous Normans established states in southern Italy and Sicily. In 1066 Duke William II the Bastard, later KING WILLIAM I THE CONQUEROR, defeated King HAROLD at Hastings and acquired the Anglo-Scandinavian kingdom. Upon William's death in 1087, Normandy went to his eldest son Robert Curthose and England to his second son, WILLIAM II RUFUS. HENRY I, the Conqueror's third son, gained the English crown in 1100, and conquered Normandy from his brother Curthose in 1106.

LANFRANC of Pavia arrived in Normandy about 1040, entered the abbey of BEC and became its schoolmaster and prior. ST. ANSELM arrived in the late 1050s, and when Lanfranc was appointed to the ducal abbey at Caen, Anselm became prior and later abbot of Bec. As its schoolmasters, Lanfranc and Anselm trained a whole generation of churchmen who spread throughout Northern Europe, but especially in Normandy and England. In 1070 the Conqueror brought Lanfranc to England as archbishop of Canterbury, and on Lanfranc's death Anselm succeeded him as archbishop. Together Lanfranc and Anselm populated the English church with Bec and Caen monks as abbots of English monasteries. A Bec monk, William Bona Anima, became Archbishop of Rouen. Bec monks, too, had come to rule most of the monastic houses of Normandy. Other important abbeys of Normandy included ST. EVROULT, where the Norman historian Orderic Vitalis wrote his massive history; FÉCAMP, St. Etienne, Caen, La Trinité, Caen, SAVIGNY, and SAINT-PIERRE-SUR-DIVES. Except for a brief period after Henry's death (1135), in STEPHEN'S reign (1135–54), Normandy was ruled directly by English kings until its loss by King JOHN in 1204 to the French King Philip II Augustus. The conquest of Normandy was a significant step in the formation of the French kingdom and enabled the French kings to model their institutions upon the more efficient ones that had developed in Normandy.

During the Hundred Years' War, France and England again fought over Normandy. Although conceded to England in 1359, it was returned to France in 1360 by the treaty of Brétigny. Until the invasion of Henry V in 1415, most of Normandy remained under French rule. But Henry's victories and internal French dissension led to the loss of Normandy, which was formalized by the Treaty of Troyes in 1420. Spurred by the victories and the martyrdom of JOAN OF ARC, the French mounted repeated campaigns in the years after 1431. By 1450 the English had been driven from Normandy, and it was again ruled by the French; it has remained so to the present. From the eleventh to the fifteenth century the Archdiocese of Rouen, which included all Normandy, held fourteen provincial synods. During the Wars of Religion, Normandy remained Catholic. John EUDES led the reform of the clergy there in the seventeenth century. The revolt of the Chouans was one of the factors that prompted the CONCORDAT OF 1801. Since then Normandy has included the Archdiocese of Rouen, with the Dioceses of Bayeux, Coutances, Evreux, and Sées.

Bibliography: D. C. DOUGLAS, William the Conqueror (Berkeley 1964). D. BATES, Normandy Before 1066 (New York 1982). D. BATES, William the Conqueror (London 1989). S. N. VAUGHN, Anselm of Bec and Robert of Meulan (Berkeley 1981). F. M. POWICKE, The Loss of Normandy, 1189–1204 (2nd ed.; Manchester, England 1961). É. PERROY, The Hundred Years' War (New York 1951). E. HALLAM, Capetian France 987–1328 (London 1980). J. DUNBABIN, France in the Making 843–1180 (Oxford 1985).

[S. N. VAUGHN/B. LYON]

NORMANS, THE

The Normans originated when a band of Norwegian Vikings led by the Dane Hrolf the Ganger (Rollo, in the French sources) settled in the region of the lower Seine River in the old area of Neustria, and were granted the county of Rouen, and the territory around the city of Rouen, by King Charles the Simple at the Treaty of Saint-Claire-sur-Epte in 911. Originally lumped together with the other Northmanni, or Normanni, to include Viking invaders all over Europe and stretching across the Atlantic, these Normans who settled on the Seine acquired a distinct identity separate from their Viking colleagues. Over the next hundred years, these Vikings centered in Rouen extended their control over the entire area previously known as Neustria, adding territories to the south and particularly to the west—the Bessin, the Cotentin and the Avranchin. This expansion in the west involved incorporating independent settlements of other Vikings around Bayeux and Caen, and subduing them to the rule of the count of Rouen.

Rollo was essentially still a Viking chieftain, as was his son William I Longsword, who succeeded Rollo as count in 930. Continuing in his Viking ways, in 942 William was killed in battle trying to extend his county eastward, toward Flanders. His son Richard I began the real construction of the future Duchy of Normandy. Richard's marriage to the Viking Gunnor, "of the noblest house of the Danes," who had settled with others in the area around Caen began the lines of Norman aristocracy—all descended from Gunnor and her female relatives. Eleanor Searle has labeled the subsequent Norman expansion as "Predatory Kinship." The Normans continued to solidify their duchy under Richard and Gunnor's son Richard II, who had gained such prestige that he was able to make a marriage alliance with England by marrying his sister Emma to King Aethelred Unraed.

Under these earliest Norman dukes the abbeys of Fécamp, Mont-St.-Michel, St. Ouen of Rouen, Fontenelle and Bernay were refounded, but the Norman counts tended to appoint their own relatives to bishoprics. The church in Normandy really began its organization under Duke William II the Bastard, who succeeded his father Robert the Magnificent as a child of seven in 1035. Shortly thereafter Lanfranc of Pavia came to Normandy and settled in as a monk of the newly-founded abbey of Bec. Abbot Herluin soon recognized his learning and appointed Lanfranc as prior. The school Lanfranc opened was the first in Normandy, and attracted both lay and clerical students from all over Europe. Duke William raised Lanfranc "as on a watchtower" to oversee the churches of Normandy, and Lanfranc began replacing the ducal relatives with Italian reformers as bishops. Duke William appointed Lanfranc as abbot of the new ducal foundation, St. Etienne, Caen, with its sister abbey for women, Holy Trinity, in 1060. Lanfranc chose the promising student Anselm to succeed him as Bec's schoolmaster and prior.

When William conquered England in 1066, beginning the line of Anglo-Norman kings, he brought LANFRANC to serve as Archbishop of Canterbury in 1070, and Lanfranc began replacing the abbots of England with monks of Bec, Caen, Lessay, and other abbeys under Bec's tutelage. ANSELM succeeded Herluin as abbot of Bec and Lanfranc as archbishop of Canterbury; by Anselm's death, he and Lanfranc had reformed the English church on the model of Bec's monastic ideals, while King WILLIAM I THE CONQUEROR reformulated the English government into an amalgamation of English tradition and Norman innovation, a propitious blend of both traditions, but always claiming to reconstitute the customs of his predecessor Edward the Confessor. Anselm struggled with kings WILLIAM II, Rufus, and HENRY I over investitures, and persuaded the latter to abandon them despite the insistence of both kings to maintain the customs of their predecessors. Both Lanfranc and Anselm worked to hold reforming councils in England. Their episcopates set the pattern that the English Church would follow thereafter—a pattern which survived the anarchy of the reign of the last Anglo-Norman king, Stephen.

In the time of Count Richard I of Normandy, some Normans began wandering southward and settled in southern Italy, which they viewed as a land of opportunity because of its political disunity. Many were hired as mercenaries by the LOMBARD counts and Byzantine officials, to fight against either or both, or against the invading Muslim forces from Sicily. Others made their fortune as highway robbers. Most prominent among these Normans were the 12 sons of Tancred d'Hauteville, a minor lord of the Cotentin; among them, Robert Guiscard (the crafty) emerged as the leader, who eventually carved out for himself a fief in the Apennines. Then he moved down to the plains, drove out the Greeks, supported Pope LEO IX after previously fighting against him, and finally received from Pope NICHOLAS II the investiture of the Duchies of Apulia and Calabria (1059). He also obtained license to conquer Sicily, which he and his younger brother Roger accomplished during the years 1061 to 1091. Robert Guiscard, like his contemporaries in Normandy, founded a string of abbeys, all originating with and connected to the Norman abbey of St. Evroul—St. Euphemia, Sant'Angelo at Mileto, St. Maria of Mattina, St. Maria of Camigliano, to which a number of Greek monasteries were subjected, in a manner somewhat reminiscent of the subjection of English abbeys to Bec monks. The bishoprics of southern Italy were reformed by the papacy rather than by the Normans, but Roger I the Great, in the last few years of the eleventh century, won from Pope Urban II the right to control the churches of his unified realm of Italy and Sicily. In Sicily, Roger permitted the Greek Church to remain dominant, while in Italy he subjected it to Latin rule. Although Robert Guiscard failed in his attempt to create a Sicilian-Dalmatian Empire, his brother Roger organized the new Sicilian state, and his son Bohemund distinguished himself among the leaders of the First CRUSADE, at the capture of Antioch, 1098. The same Norman line of Tancred d'Hauteville ruled, in the twelfth century, at Palermo: Roger II of Sicily was crowned king in 1130 at Antioch. Just as Canut and William the Conqueror had posed as legitimate successors of the Anglo-Saxon kings and preserved in England a number of its ancestral customs, so also the Norman kings of Sicily and the Norman princes of Antioch took on the dress of Byzantium and manifested a remarkable propensity for assimilation. Thus the organizing spirit of a handful of Normans succeeded in uniting the most dissimilar ethnic elements. Everywhere they gave birth to an original and brilliant civilization, be it Anglo-Norman, Sicilo-Norman, or Normano-Syrian.

Bibliography: DUDO OF ST. QUENTIN, History of the Normans, tr. E. CHRISTIANSEN (Woodbridge 1998). The Gesta Norman- normum Ducum of William of Jumieges, Orderic Vitalis and Robert of Torigni, ed. and tr. E. M. C. VAN HOUTS, 2 v. (Oxford 1992–5). O. VITALIS, The Ecclesiastical History of Orderic Vitalis, ed. and tr. M. CHIBNALL, 6 v. (Oxford 1969–80). WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, Gesta Regum Anglorum, ed. and tr. R. A. B. MYNORS; completed by R. M. THOMSON and M. WINTERBOTTOM (Oxford and New York 1998). R. H. C. DAVIS, The Normans and their Myth, (London 1976). D. BATES, Normandy Before 1066 (New York 1982). D. BATES, William the Conqueror (London 1989). D. DOUGLAS, William the Conqueror (Berkeley 1964). E. SEARLE, Predatory Kinship and the Creation of Norman Power (Berkeley 1988). F. BARLOW, William Rufus (Berkeley 1983). C. W. HOLLISTER, Henry I (New Haven 2001). G. A. LOUD, The Age of Robert Guiscard (Harlow, Eng. 2000). G. A. LOUD, Church and Society in the Norman Principality of Capua 1058–1197 (1985). H. E. J. COWDREY, The Age of Abbot Desiderius. Montecassino, the Papacy and the Normans in the Eleventh and Early Twelfth Centuries (Oxford 1983). D. MATTHEW, The Norman Kingdom of Sicily (Cambridge 1992).

[S. N. VAUGHN/R. FOREVILLE]

NORRIS, JAMES JOSEPH

Lay leader and international expert on relief, refugee, and migration problems; b. Roselle Park, N.J., Aug. 10, 1907; d. Rumson, N.J., Nov. 17, 1976. After graduating from high school in 1924, Norris joined the Missionary Servants of the Most Holy Trinity, where he collaborated closely with the order's founder, Thomas A. Judge. Leaving the order in 1934, he had a brief stint in the business world before the then Rev. Patrick O'Boyle (later the Cardinal Archbishop of Washington, D.C.) appointed him as executive assistant at the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin on Staten Island in 1936. For more than 30 years of his life, Norris was deeply committed to combatting the problems of poverty and injustice. When World War II broke out, Norris was made the assistant director (1941–42), and later executive director (1942–44) of the National Catholic Community Services. He also served with distinction as a commander in the U.S. Navy Armed Guard on active duty from 1944 to 1946.

In 1946 O'Boyle appointed Norris as the European director of War Relief Services for the National Catholic Welfare Conference, the forerunner of the Catholic Relief Services (CRS), helping in the rebuilding of the Church and national communities in Europe in the post-World War II period. From 1959 to his death he served as assistant to the executive director of CRS as that agency of the American bishops turned its energies from a recovered Europe to the third world countries, whose emergence were proving to be among the greatest challenges of the period. Norris also participated in negotiations with Mgr. Giovanni Battista Montini (the future Paul VI), resulting in the establishment of the International Catholic Migration Commission (ICMC) in 1951. Norris became the president of ICMC (1951–74), and honorary president (1974–76). In its first 25 years of existence, the ICMC assisted more than 200,000 migrants and refugees with loans of $40 million. In both his roles as a key official in the work of CRS and the ICMC, Norris pressed church officials to utilize the strength and stability of the Church to implement Christian principles on an international level as well as to make Catholics themselves more aware of their obligations in justice and charity to the less fortunate throughout the world.

Norris was the only layman invited to address a plenary session of VATICAN COUNCIL II. On Nov. 5, 1964, Norris spoke to the assembled Council Fathers during the debate on the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. Speaking in Latin, he spoke on the implications and challenges of "World Poverty and the Christian Conscience." One result of the address was the inclusion in the final draft of the Constitution of a proposal to establish a church agency or office which would secure full Catholic participation on social justice and world poverty (see Gaudium et spes, 90). In the ensuing years, Norris collaborated with Joseph GREMILLION, Luigi LIGUTTI, Barbara WARD, Gerald Mahon, and Arthur McCormack to lobby for the implementing of this conciliar provision. As a result of their persistent efforts, Pope Paul VI inaugurated the Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace, Jan. 6, 1967. National justice and peace commissions were set up subsequently around the world.

A month before his death, Norris was the first American to be awarded by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees the Fridtjof Nansen Medal, an award to persons who have distinguished themselves in helping solve problems of refugees and migrants on a world scale. Norris was the first layman to be named an official escort on Pope Paul VI's flight to Geneva in June 1966 to visit the International Labor Organization and the World Council of Churches. Pope Paul also named him a member of the Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace and for the Pontifical Commission "Cor Unum" and designated him as the Vatican's representative at the funeral of Martin Luther King Jr. At the time of his death he was survived by his wife, Amanda, and four sons.

Bibliography: E. EGAN, Catholic Relief Services: The Beginning Years (Baltimore 1988). R. J. KUPKE, James J. Norris: An American Catholic Life (Ph.D. diss. Catholic University of America 1995).

[J. C. O'NEILL/EDS.]

NORTH AFRICA, EARLY CHURCH IN

The Romans conquered Carthage in 146 B.C. and turned its territory into the provincia Africana, roughly northeast Tunisia, to which Tripolitania was added later on. In 46 B.C. the Numidian kingdom of Juba was annexed (Africa nova) and, with Africa vetus, formed Africa proconsularis. In the year 40 Mauretania was also annexed, and two provinces were formed: Caesariensis, of which Caesarea was the capital, and Tingitana with Tingis as its capital. Numidia became a separate province in 198. Flourishing cities developed and Roman civilization reached a high peak in the second and third centuries, with famed writers, both pagan and Christian. DIOCLETIAN divided Proconsularis into three provinces: Zeugitana, Tripolitania and Byzacena. Out of eastern Mauretania Caesariensis he carved Sitifensis, making Sitifis the capital. He placed the western part of Africa, Tingitana (today Morocco), under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Spain. Tingitana depended on the ecclesiastical province of Mauretania Caesariensis, whereas a separate ecclesiastical province corresponded to each of the other six civil provinces by the fourth century, though the civil and ecclesiastical boundaries were not quite the same.

Christianity. Apostolic origin for the African Church cannot be proved. Christianity probably came through Carthage, an important harbor, no later than the first half of the second century. The earliest dated event occurred on July 17, 180; 12 Christians of Scilli were martyred in Carthage. But as early as 197 TERTULLIAN (Ad Scap. 56) proudly appealed to the general Christian penetration of all ranks of society, which indicates that the evangelization had begun quite some time before. A striking fact is that the bishops were remarkably numerous, a condition explained by the fact that small dioceses were customary. By the year 225 at least 70 bishops were found in Proconsularis, and Numidia; by 411, there were 470 Catholic bishoprics and the number had grown to nearly 600 in 430. For this vast territory no metropolitan existed, except for Proconsularis, where the bishop of Carthage since the third century held metropolitan rights for all Africa. In the other provinces, the primae sedis episcopus was the bishop who exceeded the others by seniority.

Persecution under Decius. The Church seems to have been left in peace, until in the year 197 and especially in 202, a persecution took place, in which the most famous martyrs were PERPETUA AND FELICITY, with four companions. The recording of the events of their martyrdom is traceable possibly to Tertullian. Other works of this writer indicate that another persecution in 211–212 followed. But the greatest trial of the local church came in the persecution of DECIUS, who in 249–250 demanded of all inhabitants of the empire a certificate of sacrifice. The bishop of Carthage, CYPRIAN (249–258), testified to the large numbers of apostates (De lapsis 7–9). Some of these actually offered sacrifice (sacrificati, thurificati); others managed to obtain a false certificate to prove their compliance (libellatici, acta facientes). Yet, many suffered martyrdom.

After Decius' death in 251, a grave problem arose as to the treatment of the lapsi. Some confessors granted libelli pacis to the lapsi, but Cyprian demanded that the sacrificati and thurificati perform a lifelong penance. This occasioned a schism at Carthage, headed by the deacon Felicissimus and the priest Novatus.

Persecution under Valerian and Diocletian. St. Cyprian distinguished himself by his charitable work for those who suffered from famine and pestilence (252–254) and convoked various synods (255–256), where the question of the validity of baptism conferred by heretics was treated. Following the opinion of Tertullian (De bapt. 15) and many bishops of Asia, especially FIRMILIAN OF CAESAREA, Cyprian denied the validity of such baptism, thus setting a precedent for the DONATISTS. He withstood Pope STEPHEN I, who insisted on the Roman tradition, recognizing the validity of baptism conferred with the intention of doing the will of Christ. Though neither side yielded its viewpoint, no schism occurred, and the persecution of VALERIAN (257–259) claimed the pope and Cyprian as victims, along with many Africans, including those who were later called the massa candida.

The Emperor Gallienus restored peace to the Church, but it was rudely interrupted by the persecution of Diocletian in 295, which began in the army with the martyrdom of the young Maximilian at Theveste. Other martyrs were the veteran Typasius, the centurion Marcellus and the standard-bearer Fabius. When the persecution became general in 303, it claimed victims in Africa, including the 19 women and 30 men of Abitina near Carthage. The peace of 313 was to bring grave problems to the African Church.

Donatism. During the third century, heresy in Africa had been represented by MONTANISM, to which Tertullian adhered in his later life and MANICHAISM (not strictly a Christian heresy). A movement arose, however, that united social and religious elements, renewed the errors of Tertullian and Cyprian, and caused havoc in the African Church for more than a century. It was known as DONATISM. The Bishop of Carthage, Mensurius, died in 311. The Archdeacon Caecilianus, his successor, had made enemies by his previous severity. These claimed that one of his Episcopal consecrators, Felix of Aptungi, had been a traditor, that is, guilty of the sin of having given up the sacred books during the persecution, and thus he was incapable of validly administering a Sacrament. The Church was for them a society of saints, in which authority and spiritual effectiveness depended on personal sanctity. Catholics were considered traditores; on conversion, freely or by force, to Donatism, baptism was repeated, and the other Sacraments given by Catholics, including the Eucharist, were treated with contempt. Donatism spread rapidly, in spite of the Emperor Constantine's persecution of the sect. Donatist doctrine was condemned first by a Roman ecclesiastical sentence in 313 and then by the council at Arles in 314.

Donatus (d. c. 355) was the first outstanding schismatic bishop of Carthage; under him the sect spread into other provinces, especially Numidia, which became its stronghold. In 347, a group of nomadic workers from the south, called Circumcellions, was used by Optatus, the Donatist Bishop of Bagai, against the Roman troops who tried to uproot the schism. Later, these workers adopted Donatism as a convenient ally to oppose the Roman Empire, which hindered their desire for absolute freedom from restraint.

OPTATUS OF MILEVIS and St. AUGUSTINE narrate sad details of the horrors perpetrated by the Donatists, especially the Circumcellions, against Catholic priests and monks. The sect increased so rapidly that 270 bishops attended a Donatist council of 336. After the death in exile of Donatus, he was succeeded by Parmenianus (d. 391), who not only displayed organizing activity, but wrote anti-Catholic works. Refutations by Optatus of Milevis and Augustine and efficient pastoral opposition under the Catholic Bishop of Carthage, Aurelius (392–430), took effect. The Donatists themselves split into various sects, against whom Augustine sharply pressed their inconsistencies and elaborated his theology of the Sacraments.

The Emperor Honorius aided the Catholic cause, and in 411 a meeting was held at Carthage, at which 286 Catholic and 284 Donatist bishops were in attendance. Bishops from both sides were allowed to present their viewpoints, and after a three-day discussion, the imperial representative announced the victory of the Catholics. In 412 the emperor ordered the schismatics to return to the Catholic Church, threatening the disobedient with confiscation, corporal punishment and deportation. After some hesitation Augustine admitted the wisdom of the state's intervention against the destructive activities of the Donatists and Circumcellions; when many returned to the Church, from which fear of the wild fanatics had held them, the schism was greatly weakened. Yet, even Pope GREGORY I complained in the sixth century that the error was not yet completely eradicated in Africa.

St. Augustine and Pelagianism. Augustine, himself a convert from Manichaeism, devoted a series of brilliant works as priest and bishop to a refutation of Donatism when another error called for response, namely, PELA-

GIANISM. With his collaborator Celestius, Pelagius had denied original sin and claimed that man could perform good acts and avoid sin without internal grace. Both came to Carthage in 410, but Pelagius left at once for Palestine. Paulinus of Milan attacked the errors of Celestius and upon his refusal to retract, Celestius was excommunicated by the council of Carthage in 411. Augustine saw the fundamental rejection of Christianity implied in the heresy and brought out the works that earned him the title of "Doctor of Grace." Though Pelagius was declared orthodox by the Council of Diospolis in 415, provincial councils at Carthage and Milevis in 416 renewed the condemnation of Pelagianism, and when Pope Innocent I concurred, Augustine exclaimed: causa finita est (Serm. 131.10).

Pope ZOSIMUS (417–418), on receiving professions of orthodoxy from the two heretics, blamed the African bishops for excessive zeal in condemning men who admitted the necessity of grace. The African answer was a general council at Carthage in May 418, inspired by Augustine, in which the errors of the heretics were laid bare. Zosimus then condemned Pelagianism, but the stubborn opposition of JULIAN OF ECLANUM obliged Augustine to write several further tracts dealing with marriage and grace, as well as 12 books Contra Julianum. In 426–427 he composed his De gratia et libero arbitrio and De correptione et gratia for the monks of Hadrumetum who challenged human liberty in relation to predestination and questioned the gift of perseverance. Thus SEMI-PELAGIANISM met its chief refutation from the African Church.

Monasticism. The monastic movement was introduced into Africa in its cenobitic form by Augustine in 388 on his return from Italy. Previously, individual monks and virgins, including Donatist sisters, had existed in Africa, but no monastery is recorded before 388. Augustine propagated the movement, as convert, priest and bishop, living with a group of ascetics. His sister became superior of a convent of nuns at Hippo, and Augustine's monastery provided ten bishops for other churches, who transplanted the monastic life to their new dioceses.

Even during the period when the VANDALS ruled in Africa (429–534) monasticism flourished in both clerical and lay circles. The life of FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE (d. c. 533) is witness to this, for he followed Augustine's example and practiced a monastic way of life as layman, priest and bishop. Monasteries are found as far east as Tripolitania and as far west as Mauretania Caesariensis before, during and after the Vandal occupation. These barbarians had crossed from Spain in 429, besieged Hippo in the last days of St. Augustine and captured Carthage in 439. By treaty with the Emperor VALENTINIAN III in 442 they became the recognized masters of Zeugitana, Byzacena and part of Numidia. After the death of this emperor in 455 they seized the two Mauretanas, though their control there was nominal, owing to the bellicose nature of the native Mauri.

Of the six Vandal kings, all Arians, who ruled in Africa, Geiseric, Huneric and Thrasamund persecuted the Church severely, concentrating on the higher clergy. The first two kings nearly succeeded in extirpating the Catholic bishops in favor of the ARIANS. Hence in Zeugitana under Geiseric (429–477) the number of Catholic bishops was reduced from 164 to three. Yet, in his desire to make a favorable treaty with the Emperor ZENO, Geiseric in 475 allowed the return of the Catholic exiles. His son Huneric (477–484) forced all the Catholic bishops of Africa to come to Carthage in 484 for a discussion with the Arians, after which he sent them into exile, deporting the bishops of Zeugitana to Corsica and others into the African desert. Five hundred clerics of Carthage were scourged and exiled. Later Huneric dispatched some 5,000 Catholics including many clerics to exile among the savage Mauri and tried systematically to destroy monastic life in Africa by ordering that all monasteries of men and women, together with their inhabitants, be given to the Mauri. His death put an end to the persecution, and King Gunthamund (484–496) allowed the exiled bishops to return (494). King Thrasamund (496–523) conducted the most effective persecution. No bishops could be elected, and when this decree was violated in Byzacena, 120 bishops were exiled to Sardinia, from which they returned only after his death, when King Hilderic (523–530) granted a period of peace for the Church. The last king, Gelimer, was conquered by the army of JUSTINIAN I under Belisarius in 534.

Byzantine Influence. Under the Byzantines some of the Church's ancient splendor returned; capable theologians such as Ferrandus of Carthage and FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE and frequent councils gave it a part in the affairs of the universal Church. In the dispute over the THREE CHAPTERS, the African bishops refused to subscribe to the condemnation rendered by Justinian and the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II, and even excommunicated Pope VIGILIUS. African monks and bishops were among those who were exiled for their opposition.

Byzantine occupation, however, did not bring an enduring peace to Africa either internally or externally. The Mauri inflicted many defeats on Byzantine arms and many Christians, including 70 monks with their abbot Donatus, fled to Europe about the year 570. Internally, the corruption of civil officials went unchecked and revolts were frequent. Yet many Mauri became Christians. In the seventh century the Byzantine emperors favored MONOTHELITISM, which was rejected by many African monks under the inspiration of St. MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR. When in 638 the Emperor HERACLIUS with his Ecthesis imposed Monothelitism on the whole Church, most Africans refused to sign the document and in 645 revolted against his successor Constans II.

African ecclesiastical dissension prepared the way for the Arab invasions that began with a first raid in 643. The Arabs captured Carthage in 698 and took the last Byzantine stronghold at Septem, or Ceuta, in 709. The Mohammedans gradually brought about the extinction of Christianity, first by a rapid conversion of the volatile Mauri, then by a process of attrition, reducing the number of bishoprics to three for all Africa in the time of Pope GREGORY VII. They had disappeared entirely by the 13th century.

Bibliography: A. AUDOLLENT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed., A. BAUDRILLART et al., (Paris 1912–) 1:705–861. G. BARDY, Catholicisme, 1:186–191. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au sixième siècle (Paris 1925). G. BARDY et al., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935–) v. 3, 4, 5. J. GAUDEMET, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (Paris 1958). G. KRÜGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:175–176. Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord, eds., C. A. JULIEN and C. COURTOIS, (2d ed. Paris 1956). B. H. WARMINGTON, The North African Provinces from Diocletian to the Vandal Conquest (Cambridge, Eng. 1954). C. COURTOIS, Les Vandales et l'Afrique (Paris 1955). W. H. FREND, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed., T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)–] 4:128–147. J. J. GAVIGAN, De vita monastica in Africa Septentrionali (Turin 1962). E. L. GRASMÜCK, Coercitio: Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit (Bonn 1964).

[J. J. GAVIGAN]

NORTH AMERICAN ACADEMY OF LITURGY

The North American Academy of Liturgy (NAAL) is an ecumenical association of specialists in Christian liturgy and related arts and disciplines. The Academy's purposes are to provide channels for mutual professional assistance and for the sharing of methods and resources; to exchange technical information concerning research projects and activities of the members; to foster liturgical research, publication, and dialogue at a scholarly level; to encourage exchanges with individuals and communities of other religious traditions; and to communicate the activities of the Academy through the publication of annual proceedings.

Admission to the NAAL is restricted to persons of demonstrated competence in liturgical studies and to specialists in allied areas who contribute to the understanding of worship in a significant way. The Academy consists of members, who have established and demonstrated their competence in the fields of liturgy and related areas, and associates, who evidence a developing contribution in the field of liturgical studies and related areas.

The groundwork for the founding of the Academy was laid in December of 1973. To honor the 10th anniversary of Vatican Council II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, a conference for 70 people working in the field of liturgy was sponsored by Theological Studies at the Franciscan Renewal Center, Scottsdale, Arizona. The conveners of the conference were Walter Burghardt, SJ, and John Gallen, SJ. Travel costs and conference expenses were underwritten by the Friends of the Franciscan Renewal Center.

At the end of this conference, the group decided to meet a year later in January of 1975, at the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind., to continue its discussion and reflection and to found an official organization. At the end of the Notre Dame conference, the first officers of the Academy committee were elected: John Gallen, SJ, president, Rev. Daniel Stevick, vice-president, Dr. John Barry Ryan, secretary-treasurer, and Mary Collins, OSB, and Mr. Robert Rambusch, delegates. In 1977, the Academy was incorporated as a nonprofit organization in the state of New Jersey.

From its inception the Academy has presented the Berakah Award to honor a person who has made outstanding contributions in the field of liturgy. Published every summer, The Proceedings of the North American Academy of Liturgy contains papers from the annual meeting, seminar reports, and selected research essays.

Bibliography: M. COLLINS, "Liturgy in America: The Scottsdale Conference," Worship 48 (1974) 66–80. Papers connected with the Scottsdale Conference, Theological Studies 35 (1974) 233–311. Proceedings of NAAL Meetings, Worship 50 n. 4 (1976), 51 n. 4 (1977), 52 n. 4 (1978).

[J. B. RYAN/EDS.]

NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE

The North American College, located in Rome, Italy, began as a residence for seminarians training for the diocesan priesthood of the U.S. In time it developed three distinct divisions, each serving a different clientele: the seminary (admitting only individuals designated by their bishops), a residence for priests pursuing advanced studies, and an Institute for Continuing Theological Education.

Foundation and History. Promising seminarians for American dioceses had been sent to Rome by their bishops as early as 1790, but they had no separate seminary until the present institution was established by Pope Pius IX, Dec. 8, 1859, on the recommendation of Abp. Gaetano BEDINI. Bedini foresaw that such a seminary would not only strengthen the theological education of the American clergy but would also bind the Church in the U.S. more closely to the Holy See. The college was housed in a former Visitandine convent on Via dell'Umiltà, near the Fontana di Treve. The Holy See loaned the property to the American bishops until 1948 when Pope Pius XII, as an "act of deference" to the U.S. hierarchy, presented it to them outright. The seminarians attended classes at the Urban College of Propaganda Fide from 1859 to 1932, when the college became affiliated with the Gregorian University.

For a quarter century after its inauguration, the American College was financially insecure. Nevertheless it quickly became the American Catholic headquarters in Rome, and its rectors assumed a role of increasing influence as spokesmen for the American Church. During Vatican Council I (1869–70), 18 archbishops and bishops from the United States lived and held conferences in the college. On Sept. 20, 1870, papal Rome surrendered to the invading armies of the king of Italy. A few days before the final siege 13 students from the American College proffered their services to the papal army. Pius IX gratefully refused, reminding them that they were called to a nobler warfare.

Anticlerical policies of the Kingdom of Italy directly affected the North American College. In March 1884, the Italian government moved to confiscate the college buildings, still owned by the Congregation of Propaganda Fide. Informed of this threat, Cardinal John McCloskey of New York, immediately sought the aid of the U.S. government. President Chester A. Arthur, by his prompt personal intervention, averted the peril.

On Oct. 25, 1884, Pope Leo XIII, by the brief Ubi Primum, decreed the long-delayed canonical establishment of the American College, and bestowed on it "pontifical" status. Increased registration obliged the college superiors to add a new wing to the property in 1901. Two years before, the handsome Villa Santa Caterina at Castel Gandolfo had been purchased as a summer residence.

World War I vexed but did not impede the College. World War II forced it to close. In May 1940, when it became apparent that Italy would enter the struggle, the students were sent home to finish their studies. During much of the war the college proper and the Villa Santa Caterina harbored exiled children of Italian colonials.

When the college finally reopened on Sept. 4, 1948, the students commuted to classes from the Villa Santa Caterina pending the rehabilitation of the Umiltà property. Meanwhile work began on a new college near St. Peter's Basilica, in a section of the Janiculum Hill under the jurisdiction of Vatican City. Upon its completion Pius XII came in person to dedicate the new edifice on Oct. 14, 1953. The new structure, designed by Count Enrico Galeazzi, sometime governor of Vatican City, was built to house 300 occupants. Count Galeazzi is buried in the college crypt.

The Graduate Division. In 1931 with the Apostolic Constitution Deus Scientiarum Dominus Pope Pius XI laid the foundation for reform of programs leading to advanced degrees in ecclesiastical faculties. Two years later in 1933 the graduate division of the North American College was opened at the Casa San Giovanni on the Janiculum Hill for students already ordained. The title to this property, originally part of the 26-acre Villa Gabrielli owned by the province of Rome, had been acquired in 1924 jointly by Propaganda Fide and the U.S. hierarchy. When the seminarians moved to the new college in 1953, priests in various graduate programs occupied the old site, renamed Casa Santa Maria dell'Umiltà.

The American Bishops Office for U.S. visitors to the Vatican is also located at the Via dell'Umiltà address. It provides a service to American travelers seeking tickets for papal audiences and information about liturgical celebrations.

The Institute for Continuing Theological Education. The third division of the North American College began in 1970 as a response to the call of Vatican Council II for renewal and updating of pastoral ministers. Open to a limited number of priests each year, the institute invites lecturers and professors from the United States and the Roman theological faculties to offer classes. The institute began at Casa di Santa Maria dell'Umiltà, but was moved in 1984 to the college complex on Janiculum.

Administration. The American College is under the direction of both the Congregation for Catholic Education, representing the Holy See, and a episcopal Board of Governors, representing the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops. The pope appoints the rector from a list a list of three names proposed by the board. The following men have held this post: Bernard Smith, O.S.B. (1859–60), temporary; William George McCloskey (1860–68); Francis Silas Marean Chatard (1868–78); Louis Edward Hostlot, né Hasslocher (1878–84); Augustine Joseph Schulte (1884–85), temporary; Denis Joseph O'Connell (1885–95); William Henry O'Connell (1895–1901); Thomas Francis Kennedy (1901–17); Charles Aloysius O'Hern (1917–25); Eugene Francis Burke, Jr. (1925–35); Ralph Leo Hayes (1935–44); James Gerald Kealy (1945–46); Martin John O'Connor (1946–64); Francis F. Reh (1964–68); James A. Hickey (1969–74); Harold P. Darcy (1974–79); Charles M. Murphy (1979–84); Lawrence M. Purcell (1984–89); Edwin F. O'Brien (1990–94); Timothy M. Dolan (1994–2001); and Kevin C. McCoy (2001–).

The first class in 1859 numbered 12 students from eight American dioceses. It included the grandson of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton, and Michael A. Corrigan, the future archbishop of New York. From its opening to the year 2000, close to 5000 students enrolled in the seminary and graduate divisions. Twenty-two have been named cardinals.

Bibliography: M. V. DOHERTY, House on Humility Street (New York 1942). R. F. MCNAMARA, American College in Rome, 1855–1955 (Rochester, N. Y. 1956).

[R. F. MCNAMARA/R. RIEDE]

NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS

The word martyr has a very precise meaning in ecclesiastical literature. Those who bear the name do so only when a rigorous inquiry by the Church has attested to the fact that hatred of the faith motivated those who killed them. North America honors eight martyrs; all were of European and French origin and belonged to the missions of Canada, then called New France. Six of them were priests of the Society of Jesus: Isaac Jogues, Antoine Daniel, Jean de Brébeuf, Gabriel Lalemant, Charles Garnier, and Noël Chabanel. The other two, René Goupil and Jean de la Lande, were donnés, lay assistants, who, without binding themselves by religious vows, worked for the Jesuit missions. Unsalaries, they received food, shelter, and help in case of illness from the fathers. All the martyrs died between Sept. 29, 1642 and Dec. 9, 1649. They were beatified on June 21, 1925, and canonized June 29, 1930; their feast day is September 26. In terms of time and place of martyrdom, they make up two groups.

First Group. This included Goupil, Jogues, and la Lande, who were martyred near Auriesville, N.Y., at Ossernenon, seat of the Mohawk tribe in the U.S.

Goupil. He was born at Anjou, France, May 13, 1608; as a youth he entered the Jesuit novitiate in Paris, but was forced to leave because of deafness. He then studied surgery at the Orléans hospital; in 1640, he arrived in Canada, where he was assigned as donné to the Sillery mission near Quebec. As the infirmarian at Sillery and at the Hôtel-Dieu of Quebec, he set out for Huronia. When the flotilla taking him there fell into Iroquois hands, he was captured and underwent the rigors of barbaric torture. An Iroquois killed him with an axe stroke on Sept. 29, 1642, for having made the sign of the cross over a child. The first of this group of martyrs, he is the only one whose life has been told by another martyr, Jogues. The original of this document, which was recently translated into English, is kept in the archives of the College of St. Marie of Montreal. Catholic doctors of the U.S. honor Goupil as the first of their profession to have crossed the Adirondacks.

Jogues and la Lande. Jogues was born in Orléans, France, Jan. 10, 1607. In 1636, after ordination on July 2, he arrived in Quebec and was assigned to the Huron missions. He was taken with Goupil in 1642 as he was returning to the missions after a visit to Quebec, and he was subjected to all the cruelties that the Iroquois perpetrated on their prisoners. During his captivity he baptized 60 children and in midwinter conducted his annual retreat before an outdoor cross. He was ransomed by the Dutch of Fort Orange (Albany) in 1643, and he escaped to New York and thence to France. Urban VIII granted him a dispensation to celebrate Mass, despite his mutilated left hand, saying: "It would be shameful for a martyr of Christ not to drink the blood of Christ." In Canada again in the spring of 1644, Jogues was entrusted with a brief peace mission to the Iroquois. He departed Sept. 24, 1646, for Ossernenon, but a Mohawk war party captured him; on October 18 Jogues was tomahawked and the following day his companion la Lande suffered the same fate. Jogues was known to have desired the grace of martyrdom; so when the news of the double martyrdom reached Quebec in the spring of 1647, his fellow missionaries celebrated a Mass of Thanksgiving rather than one of Requiem for the repose of his soul.

Second Group. This group—composed of Daniel, Brébeuf, Lalemant, Garnier, and Chabanel—met death within the actual confines of Canada; the first three were killed by the Iroquois, and Chabanel by a Huron apostate.

Daniel. This first martyr of Huronia was born in Dieppe, France, in 1601 and became a Jesuit novice at 20. He arrived at Cape Breton in 1632 and went to Quebec the following year. In 1634 he left for Huronia, where he remained, except for two years during which he served as director of the Huron seminary in Quebec. On July 4, 1648, he had just celebrated Mass when the mission of St. Joseph was overrun by Iroquois. After ministering to the wounded and baptizing some of them, he was struck by arrows and shot, and his trampled and desecrated body was then cast into the fire that consumed the chapel.

Brébeuf and Lalemant. Brébeuf was born at Condé-sur-Vire, Normandy, France, March 25, 1593, and had already been ordained when he arrived in Canada, June 1625. The English occupation of Quebec in 1629 necessitated his return to France, but he was able to get back to his mission in 1633 and Huronia became his field of apostolate. Lalemant, born in 1610, was the nephew of Revs. Charles and Jerome Lalemant and had long dreamed of the Canadian missions. In 1646 he arrived at Quebec, but because of ill health, it was two years before he reached the Huron missions. There on March 16, 1649, an Iroquois band attacked the town of St. Ignace and captured Brébeuf and Lalemant, who were tied to stakes and underwent one of the worst martyrdoms ever recorded in history. Brébeuf suffered for three hours before dying; Lalemant died the following morning, March 17. The Relation states: "Before their death both their hearts were torn out through an opening made in their chest; these barbarians feasted on them inhumanly, drinking their warm blood which they drew from its source with a sacrilegious hand. While still full of life, pieces of their thighs, calves, and arms were removed by the butchers who roasted them on coals and ate them in their sight."

Father Isaac Jogues, North American martyr. (Archive Photos)

Garnier. He was born in Paris in 1605 and joined the Society of Jesus at 19; in 1636 he arrived in Canada, where he was assigned to the Huron mission. After devoting himself to it for 13 years, he was sent to St. Jean in 1649, when Fort St. Marie was abandoned. During an Iroquois attack on St. Jean, Garnier exhorted his faithful to flee but to keep the faith. He remained at his post and was first struck down by two bullets. Then, according to the Relation, "The Father received shortly thereafter two axe strokes on both temples which penetrated the brain." He died on Dec. 7, 1649.

Chabanel. He was born at Saugues in southern France, Feb. 7, 1613, entered the novitiate in 1630, and arrived in Canada in 1643. By education and temperament, this brilliant professor of rhetoric in France was far removed from the native ways of living and acting, and he had no aptitude for the Huron language; but in order to protect his missionary vocation, he made the vow of stability, with his superiors' permission. After serving with Garnier at St. Jean (with the Petuns?), he was on his way to Fort St. Marie II (Christian Island) when he was killed by an apostate Huron near the Nottawasaga River in Ontario, Dec. 8, 1649. He had expressed the desire to be a martyrem in umbra, a martyr in obscurity, unknown and forgotten. His death at first appeared to be shrouded in mystery, but in the Relation of 1650, Rev. Paul Raguenneau wrote: "We learned from very reliable testimony that Father Noël Chabanel was put to death by the apostate Huron whom we suspected. He himself admitted it and added that he had committed the murder in hatred of the faith, because he saw, in his words, all the evils befalling him and his family since he had embraced the faith."

Cult of the Martyrs. In Canada the belief that these missionaries were martyrs in the strict sense of the word led Rageneau, Jesuit superior at Quebec, to set up a dossier on the subject. This Manuscript, or Mémoire, of 1652, the original of which is kept at the College of St. Marie in Montreal, contains the text of the Relations and the deposition of trustworthy witnesses on the lives and circumstances of death of the martyrs. They were equally known and venerated in Europe, where the Relations, des Jésuites (1648–49), telling of the death of Brébeuf and Lalemant, was translated into Latin and Flemish. The Relazione of Rev. Francesco Bressani (Florence 1653) made them known in Italy, but events such as the society's suppression in 1773, the French Revolution in 1789, and the political changes of the times, in both Canada and the U.S., contributed to the martyrs' oblivion. Eventually, however, the cult of the martyrs, who had always had their devotees in American lands, was revived as a consequence of the Jesuit's return to Canada in 1842; of Edmund B. O'Callaghan's discovery of the Relations, a subsequent edition of which was published by the Canadian government in 1858 and later by R. G. Thwaites; and of the historical research of Felix Martin, John Gilmary Shea, Francis Parkman, and others. In 1912, following requests to the Holy See by the hierarchies of Canada and the U.S., the martyrs' cause was introduced; beatification followed in 1925 and canonization in 1930. Annually thousands of pilgrims visit the two sanctuaries erected in their honor: at Auriesville, the Ossernenon of old, where Goupil, Jogues, and la Lande are venerated; and at Midland, Ontario, near the site of old Fort St. Marie of the Hurons, commemorating Daniel, Brébeuf, Lalemant, Garnier, and Chabanel.

Feast: Sept. 26.

[L. POULIOT]

NORTH CAROLINA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of the 13 original states of the United States, North Carolina was inhabited primarily by Tuscarora, Catawba, and Cherokee people when the first attempts at colonization by English settlers were begun in the 1580s. It is located on the Atlantic seaboard between Virginia and South Carolina, and bordered on the west by Tennessee. Charles II granted a charter for the territory lying between Virginia and Florida, running west to the "South Seas," to eight "absolute lords proprietors" in 1663. North Carolina was established as a separate royal colony in 1729. In addition to the English, there were smaller groups of Scottish, Irish, Welsh, German, Swiss, and French settlers. Blacks, both slave and free, became a significant minority as the colony grew in population, and labor-intensive crops of rice, cotton, and tobacco formed an important sector of the economy.

While there is evidence that Hernando de Soto passed through the territory during his explorations of 1539 to 1543, and speculation by a few historians that some of the first colonists at Roanoke Island in the 1580s were Catholic recusants from England, the first explicit mention of Catholic residents in the colony was made by John Brickell (The Natural History of North-Carolina) in 1737. There was no official toleration of Catholicism in the colony until after independence, and much of the population, though Protestant, was unchurched. According to the diary of Bishop John ENGLAND of Charleston, in 1821 there were only about 150 Catholic adults in a statewide population of 650,000. The first priest on record as having resided in the state (1784–90) was a native of Ireland, Patrick Cleary, who originally came to settle his brother's estate in New Bern.

Dr. Thomas Burke of Hillsboro, elected a member of the first Provincial Congress in 1775 and later of the Continental Congress, was known to be a Catholic. In 1781 he became the state's governor, though the North Carolina Constitution of 1776 contained a test oath, barring from public office those who would deny the existence of God or "the truth of the Protestant Religion." This provision stood until 1836. The most famous Catholic legislator and jurist of the period was William J. GAS-

TON of New Bern (1778–1844), who was also the first student to enroll at Georgetown College in 1791. As early as 1823 Bishop England had sought Gaston's assistance in eliminating the offensive test oath, and in the Convention of 1835, Gaston, who by that time was a state supreme court justice, contributed to the effort which eventually resulted in substituting the word "Christian" for "Protestant."

John England, a native of Ireland, was named bishop of Charleston in 1820. At that time, the diocese included both North and South Carolina, as well as Georgia. By the time of his death in 1842, there were only four Catholic churches to be found in the state: in Washington, Fayetteville, Raleigh, and New Bern, each with small congregations. The number of adult converts was small, but it included both free blacks and slaves, who worshipped together with whites when a priest was present. England himself preached throughout the state, often using courthouses and Protestant churches as venues. In addition, he promulgated a Constitution of the Diocese of Charleston, which established elected representatives of the several congregations to govern the local church and to meet in state- and diocesan-wide conventions. His successors in office quickly abandoned the system he had established.

The spirit of tolerance in the state dissipated during the antebellum period, which saw the rise of the NATIVIST and anti-Catholic KNOW-NOTHING movement. Public lectures denouncing Catholicism, and the 1852 conversion of Levi Silliman IVES (1797–1867), the second Episcopal bishop of North Carolina, to Catholicism, contributed to religious tensions and prejudice. An exception to this trend was seen in the invitation of the graduating class of 1856 at the University of North Carolina to Archbishop John J. Hughes of New York to speak at their commencement. Unable to do so that year, he was again invited and gave the address at graduation in 1860.

Pope Pius IX established the Vicariate Apostolic of North Carolina on March 3, 1868, and he named James GIBBONS of Baltimore (1834–1921) its first vicar apostolic. He was assisted by three priests to serve the estimated 700 Catholics present throughout the state. When Gibbons was named bishop of Richmond in 1872 he retained responsibility for the vicariate until 1877, when he became coadjutor archbishop of Baltimore, with the right of succession. During his administration of the vicariate, the number of Catholics in North Carolina surpassed one thousand. In addition, the Sisters of Mercy from Charleston were established at Wilmington in 1869, and Benedictine monks from Latrobe, Pennsylvania, founded a monastery (and later a college) at Garibaldi, N.C. (later Belmont), in 1876.

John J. KEANE, who succeeded Gibbons as bishop of Richmond in 1878, also inherited the responsibility for the administration of the Vicariate of North Carolina. Mark S. Gross, the vicar general, refused the appointment as vicar apostolic in 1880, and Henry P. Northrop, a native of Charleston, was then consecrated a bishop for the vicariate in 1882. The following year Northrop was named bishop of Charleston and, like Gibbons before him, was responsible for the administration of the church in North Carolina while also resident bishop of a diocese, until 1887.

The fourth vicar to be appointed was the first abbot of Maryhelp Abbey in Belmont, Leo M. HAID, O.S.B. (1849–1924), who was ordained a bishop by Gibbons in 1888. In 1891 the monastery community obtained the assignment of nine counties, which included the city of Charlotte, for a period of 50 years, to the pastoral care of abbey. During Haid's tenure, a motherhouse of the Sisters of Mercy was established in Belmont (1892); an orphanage, named Nazareth, was founded outside of Raleigh (1897); and many churches were built. Father Thomas F. PRICE (1860–1919), a native of Wilmington, N.C., and in 1911 a cofounder of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (Maryknoll), had been ordained (1886). Authorized by Haid to function as an itinerant preacher in 1896, Price established a base at the orphanage, where in 1901 he founded the "Regina Apostolorum," an association of secular clergy whose goal was to evangelize North Carolina and foster vocations to the priesthood there. He also founded and edited Truth (1897), a national monthly magazine with more than 17,000 subscribers by 1905.

Pius X, by a papal bull of June 8, 1910, erected the abbatia nullius diocesis of Belmont, assigning eight counties from the vicariate to the new jurisdiction. Haid, now abbot-ordinary of Belmont, remained both abbot and vicar apostolic until his death in 1924. While the monastic community found the arrangement reasonable, providing for its own security as well as the financial and pastoral stability of the vicariate, the secular clergy, including Price, strongly objected to the arrangement, especially the provision that the monastic chapter had the right to nominate all future vicars apostolic of North Carolina, and they petitioned the Holy See for the establishment of a regular diocese within the state.

It was only after Haid's death that the Diocese of Raleigh was erected by papal decree on Dec. 12, 1924, leaving the abbatia nullius diocesis of Belmont with its unique status, as given in 1910. In 1944 seven of its eight counties were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Raleigh, and in 1960, Gaston County, with the exception of the monastery property, was incorporated into the Diocese of Raleigh. Finally, in 1977, the abbatia nullius diocesis was suppressed by papal decree, at the request of the U.S. hierarchy.

William J. Hafey, a priest from Baltimore, was consecrated as the first bishop of Raleigh and took possession of his see in 1925. He led a small and largely scattered Catholic population, which had relatively little social, cultural, or political influence in the state. He made an intense and somewhat successful effort to secure the assistance of religious men and women in order to support his pastoral efforts. By the time he was transferred to the Diocese of Scranton in 1937, the number of religious priests working had increased from eight to 26, and the number of sisters from 84 to 199. The total number of churches had also increased from 61 to 91, and the number of “stations” where Mass was at least occasionally celebrated, including private homes, grew from 60 to 154. The Catholic population rose from a little more than 6,000 to over 10,000 people during a time of little immigration into the state. Efforts were made for the evangelization and conversion of the black population, especially by some of the religious congregations of men which had been recruited for this work, with some small successes.

When Eugene J. McGuinness, a priest of Philadelphia who had been working with the Catholic Church Extension Society, was named the second bishop of Raleigh in 1937, he continued much of the pastoral direction of his predecessor, and the number of religious priests serving in the diocese rose to 59. The number of secular clergy continued to climb as well, from only 23 in 1925 to 53 in 1937, and to 83 in 1944, the year in which McGuinness was made the bishop of Oklahoma City and Tulsa. The Catholic population experienced a modest rise during those years, to nearly 13,000, as conversions continued and national wartime mobilization brought greater numbers of military personnel and their families into the state.

The first southern-born bishop of the diocese was Vincent S. Waters, a native of Roanoke, Virginia, who was the ordinary from 1945 until his death in 1974. With dedicated zeal he continued in the footsteps of his two predecessors, seeking to strengthen the institutional presence of the Church throughout the state. In addition, he boldly addressed the question of racial discrimination in an era of heated controversy. In May 1953, he issued a pastoral letter condemning the sin of racism and calling for the end of all racial barriers in Catholic institutions within the diocese. He began to implement his directive by closing the “black church” and school in Newton Grove and ordering the integration of the larger “white church” and school, a move that was widely regarded as prophetic by progressive voices, nationally and beyond, and largely decried locally. The process continued slowly, in most cases by closing churches and schools in black communities, through the 1960s.

Waters also established a diocesan paper, the North Carolina Catholic, as well as the North Carolina Laymen’s Association, and he sought to extend the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, along with the most contemporary teaching techniques, into all corners of the diocese. In the wake of the Second Vatican Council, having attended all the sessions, he embarked on a series of lectures and conferences, to which he invited nationally known theologians and pastors in order to educate clergy and laity on the teachings of the council. He soon encountered much opposition from some clergy and religious, however, who thought that he was impeding the pace of needed pastoral and liturgical reforms. A petition to the Holy See was formulated, seeking his removal; it was signed by several members of the diocesan clergy. Tensions were eased for some when Rome established the Diocese of Charlotte in November 1971, separating the 46 counties of western North Carolina from the Raleigh Diocese and naming the well-liked diocesan priest Michael J. Begley its first bishop.

The new diocese was made part of the Province of Atlanta, as was the Diocese of Raleigh when the former was created in 1962. Begley served from 1972 until his retirement in 1984, during a period of rapid population growth within the state and growth of Catholic Church membership. The immigration was largely from the northern states, fueled by an expanding economy, and was experienced also in the eastern part of the state. Beginning in the 1970s, and continuing throughout the following decade, another wave of immigration, bringing tens of thousands of Mexican and Central American laborers into the state, created a new pastoral reality for both dioceses, which slowly received an organized response in the form of special ministries.

The Diocese of Charlotte continued to develop its own identity under the leadership of its second bishop, John F. Donoghue, who established a separate diocesan newspaper, the Catholic News and Herald. This former chancellor of the Archdiocese of Washington was appointed the ordinary for Charlotte in 1984 and remained there until he was made the archbishop of Atlanta in 1993. He was succeeded by another Washingtonian, Auxiliary Bishop William F. Curlin, in 1994. At the beginning of the new millennium, the diocese counted more than 120,000 Catholics in its jurisdiction, served by 134 active priests, both secular and religious. The number of sisters involved in ministry continued to decline, from 249 in 1972 to 134, including those retired and infirm, in 2000.

In 1975, F. Joseph Gossman, an auxiliary bishop of Baltimore, took possession of the Diocese of Raleigh, committing himself to what he described as a collegial style of governance and to the ecumenical movement. Within 25 years, the population of the diocese had climbed dramatically to over 150,000 registered Catholics, which often did not include the number of Catholic Hispanics actually present. The number of religious communities who initiated a presence in the diocese also rose sharply. In 1975, 14 men religious from seven congregations served in the diocese; by 2000, there were 54 from 10 different communities. With regard to women religious, the number of congregations active also increased in that same time, from 16 to 28, but the total number of sisters working declined from 137 to 86, 10 of whom had been appointed “pastoral administrators” of parishes. The number of active diocesan priests during this quarter century failed to keep pace with the increased Catholic population, growing only by five, from 53 to 58 men.

Bibliography: P. BAUMSTEIN, My Lord of Belmont: A Biography of Leo Haid (Charlotte, N.C. 1985); “A Conflict of Mitres: The Diverse Politics and Cathedral Abbey of Bishop Leo Haid,” Word and Spirit 14, (1992), 76–95. J. BRICKELL, The Natural History of North Carolina (Dublin 1737; Murfreesboro, N.C. 1968). J. H. SCHAUNGER, William Gaston, Carolinian (Milwaukee 1949). S. C. WORSLEY, “Catholicism in Antebellum North Carolina,” North Carolina Historical Review 60 (October 1983), 399–430.

[J. F. GARNEAU]

NORTH DAKOTA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

It is difficult to determine exactly when Roman Catholicism entered into the Dakotas, but the Catholic population has continued to grow steadily. As of the 2000 census, the Roman Catholic population stood at 176,893, or roughly 27.5 percent of the total population of the state, in the two dioceses of Bismarck and Fargo, both suffragan sees of the Archdiocese of St. Paul, Minnesota.

French trappers and fur traders, ostensibly Catholic, had been trading with the native peoples of North Dakota—the Arikaras, the Mandans, and the Hidatsa—since the mid-18th century, but there is no evidence that they made a concerted effort to evangelize the local tribes. The first Frenchmen the North Dakota natives met were from the expedition of Sieur Pierre Gaultier de Varennes de La Verendrye, a hero of the War of Spanish Succession, in late autumn 1738. “On the morning of the 28th we arrived at the place indicated as a rendezvous for the Mandan, who arrived in the evening, one chief with 30 men and four Assiniboin,” La Verendrye recorded in November 1738. “I confess I was greatly surprised, as I expected to see people quite different from the other savages according to the stories that had been told us. They did not differ from the Assiniboin, being naked except for a garment of buffalo skin carelessly worn without any breechcloth. I knew then that there was a large discount to be taken off all that had been told me.” La Verendrye failed to find the Northwest Passage to the Pacific, but he put the northern Missouri River and North Dakota on the French map.

The first documented Roman Catholic presence for missionary purposes came in the summer of 1818 with the arrival of Father Severe Dumoulin at the fur trading post of Pembina, in which is now the extreme northeast corner of North Dakota. Fearing the effect of the restless and rootless fur trappers, the Bishop of Quebec, J. O. Plessis, sent Dumoulin and Father Joseph Norbert PROVENCHER, who set up a mission at Fort Douglas (later St. Boniface). The population of Pembina was composed of nearly 350 indigenous peoples and métis (peoples of Native American and European descent—mostly from Chippewa, Cree, and Assiniboin families). As the bishop had suspected, the fur trappers sold alcohol freely to the native peoples, and it was having a significantly adverse affect on the social structures and stability of the native cultures. Though unable to stop the flow of alcohol, the two priests did what they could to ameliorate the damage. In 1819, Dumoulin baptized 30 Native Americans. During his five years at Pembina, he baptized an additional 364 persons and married nearly 70 couples. Dumoulin also established a school, teaching the native and métis children to read and write French and Latin. The priest also said daily Mass (sometimes preaching in Ojibwa) and gave religious instruction to the children. Under the leadership of Dumoulin, the métis had an awakening as a new type of people. Economically, the peoples of Pembina were prospering as farmers, selling their produce to the Hudson’s Bay Company (HBC). Though the métis predominated in the area, the population continued the traditional buffalo hunt every summer and fall, shortly after the respective plantings and harvests. Usually, a priest would travel with them, enforcing the Sabbath as well as ensuring that the poorer hunters had as much chance to capture the buffalo as the better hunters.

In 1823, under orders from the U.S. Government, Major Stephen H. Long surveyed the U.S.-Canadian border. The new survey line ran through the northern end of Pembina, making most of it lay in U.S. territory. The British, noting Father Dumoulin’s ability to attract large numbers of indigenous peoples to Pembina, feared the Americans might use the native and métis population and the community as a base of operations against the Canadians, and so they forced the community to resettle north of the new border. The forced resettlement disrupted community life, and the population of Pembina dispersed. By 1836, Pembina was completely deserted. Upset and frustrated by the geopolitical developments and the disruption of his mission, Dumoulin departed for Quebec.

Despite Dumoulin's departure, other priests attempted to evangelize the region. The most prominent was Father George A. BELCOURT, who in 1848 established a new mission at Pembina. Unlike Dumoulin who had been driven back to Canada by the British government, Belcourt found himself exiled from Canada when he demanded that the Hudson's Bay Company give up its monopoly on the fur trade. The priest fought for the HBC to allow the non-HBC indigenous peoples to compete in a free and open market, which he considered just. The free traders lost, and as their leader, Belcourt found himself living in the Dakotas. His new mission at Pembina consisted of a log church, large garden, and a rectory. After a serious flood in 1851, Belcourt moved the mission to Walhalla, roughly 30 miles west of Pembina. There, the métis and the natives created a thriving agricultural community, despite frequent attacks by the Sioux. Belcourt continuously impressed the native peoples with his fluency in a variety of Algonquian languages. With the aid of the Sisters of the Propagation of the Faith, Belcourt also started an excellent school.

Other individual priests made their marks as well. One of the most famous missionaries to visit North Dakota was the Jesuit Father Peter John DESMET (1801–73). Though most of the Native Americans in the Dakotas greatly revered and sought the wisdom of DeSmet, he spent more of his energies among the indigenous peoples of the Pacific Northwest. Fearless and carrying no weapons of self-defense, just his breviary and flag of the Blessed Virgin Mary, DeSmet remains one of the only missionaries to have walked through the Dakotas unharmed. He attempted several times to establish a chain of Jesuit missions along the upper Missouri, but the U.S. government never consented.

At Fort Totten, Sister Mary Clapin and the Sisters of Charity established a school in 1874. As one of the chaplains at the fort, Father Jerome Hunt translated a hymnal, a prayer book, a history of the Bible, and a catechism into Lakota. In 1876, a Benedictine from St. Meinrad's in southern Indiana, Father Martin MARTY, established a mission at Fort Yates. Three years later, Pope Leo XIII declared all of Dakota Territory a vicariate and named Father Marty the first bishop.

When North Dakota became a state in late 1889, Pope Leo XIII established the region as a single diocese, naming John Shanley, a priest of Irish descent, the first diocesan bishop. Roughly 31,000 North Dakotans were Roman Catholic at the time. His 20-year reign saw considerable growth and prosperity among the Catholic population. The number and diversity of immigrants distinguished North Dakota from every other state in the Union. In 1890, almost 43 percent of its population was foreign-born. Ten years later, that percentage had only dropped to 35.4 percent. At the turn of the century, Norwegians or the children of Norwegians accounted for nearly 23 percent of the population; Germans 10.1 percent; Canadians 9.7 percent; and Germans from Russia, 7.5 percent. While most of the Norwegians were Lutheran, many of the Germans and Germans from Russia were Roman Catholic. Each ethnic group maintained allegiance to cultural patterns and traditions, and Bishop Shanley had to handle the situation delicately. To placate the more easy-going Germans from Russia, for example, Shanley recruited Swiss Benedictines whom the Germans from Russia greatly respected. They feared, however, true Germans, who they saw as harsh and oppressive. Frequently, priests would preach in a variety of languages, including Bohemian, German, and Polish. The tradition of speaking central and eastern European languages in the area continued during the Cold War when clerical refugees from Communist Europe fled to the United States.

Though homesteading reached its zenith in 1906, over 250,000 pioneers migrated to the state between 1898 and 1915. When Bishop Shanley passed away in 1909, the Holy See divided North Dakota into two dioceses, the Diocese of Bismarck and the Diocese of Fargo, reflecting the continued population growth in the state. The pope appointed a popular Benedictine, Vincent WEHRLE, as bishop of the former, and an Irishman, James O'Reilly, as head of the latter. Between 1910 and 1939, Bishop Wehrle presided over substantial growth in the diocese and fought socialism in all of its varieties, especially during the tumultuous 1920s and 1930s. Using the papal encyclicals Aeterni Patris and Rerum novarum, Wehrle especially objected to and sought to attenuate the power of the radical Non-Partisan League of North Dakota, which attempted to overturn the state constitution and implement a socialist regime in 1916 and 1917. Studious and pensive, Bishop O'Reilly also oversaw significant growth in the church during his reign. His successor in 1935 was the impressive Aloisius MUENCH of Milwaukee. In 1946 Muench became the Holy Father's personal envoy to postwar West Germany and was created a cardinal by John XXIII in 1959. Other bishops in the Diocese of Bismarck have been: Vincent J. Ryan (1940–51); Lambert A. Hoch (1952–56); Hilary B. Hacker (1956–82); John F. Kinney (1982–95); and Paul A. Zipfel (1996– ). Other bishops in the Diocese of Fargo have been: Leo F. Dworschak (1947–70); Justin A. Driscoll (1970–84); and James D. Sullivan (1985– ). Samuel J. Aquila, rector of the diocesan seminary in Denver, Colorado, was named a coadjutor bishop of Fargo in 2001.

Bibliography: H. R. LAMAR, ed., The New Encyclopedia of the American West (New Haven, Conn. 1998). J. A. LOGAN, ed., A Continent Defined (Lincoln, Neb. 1997). F. LUEBKE, ed., European Immigrants in the American West: Community Histories (Albuquerque 1998). R. C. CARRIKER, Father Peter John DeSmet: Jesuit in the West (Norman, Okla. 1995). J. D. LYSENGEN and A. M. RATHKE, eds., The Centennial Anthology of North Dakota History: Journal of the Northern Plains (Bismarck 1996). E. B. ROBINSON, History of North Dakota (Lincoln, Neb. 1966). W. NUGENT, Into the West: The Story of Its People (New York 1999). W. H. GOETZMANN and G. WILLIAM, The Atlas of North American Exploration: From the Norse Voyages to the Race to the Pole (New York 1992).

[B. J. BIRZER]

NORTHERN IRELAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the northeast part of the island of Ireland, Northern Ireland is an integral part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Comprised of the former Irish province of Ulster, Northern Ireland occupies the six counties of Antrim, Armagh, Down, Fermanagh, Londonderry and Tyrone as well as the boroughs of Belfast and Londonderry. Bordered on the south by the Republic of Ireland, Northern Ireland attained its present political status in 1920 by an act of the British Parliament that established two separate self-governing units within the island of Ireland. The inhabitants of Northern Ireland, within the boundaries drawn in 1920, had closer cultural and religious bonds with Great Britain and for these reasons preferred not to be part of the Irish Free State (now the Republic of Ireland). Ruled from London after a local legislature was disbanded in 1972, Northern Ireland achieved a new local government in the form of a 108-seat Assembly that was established in Belfast in 1999 to assume many of the functions formerly performed in London.

Separated from Scotland by the North Channel of the Irish Sea, Northern Ireland relies on its eastern region for much of its industry. Linen textiles and ship-building are among the region's traditional industries, although engineering, mining and chemical production has increased. Agricultural yields include barley and potatoes.

Development of Political and Religious Factions. Historically, the relationship between Northern Ireland and England extends back to the 17th century, when substantial colonies of Protestant immigrants from Scotland and England settled plantations on the greater party of the nine-county Province of Ulster. Only in this area was

Capital: Belfast.
Size: 5,462 sq. miles.
Population: 1,754,000 in 2000.
Languages: English.
Religions: 561,280 Catholics (32%), 1,175,180 Anglicans (Church of Ireland; 67%), 17,540 with other religious affiliation.
Archdiocese: Armagh, with suffragans Armagh, Clogher, Derry, Down and Connor, Dromore, Kilmore, Meath, and Raphoe; only Meath and Raphoe administer exclusively to the Republic of Ireland.

British colonization permanently effective. Paralleling the rise of the middle and working classes in Ireland's 26 Catholic counties during the 18th and 19th centuries was the rise of an Anglican and Presbyterian majority in the northeast. While Presbyterians first struggled against Anglican dominance, the two groups joined forces in the 19th century in a combined resistance against Catholic attacks on Protestant ascendancy. Failing to defeat the Home Rule movement of southern Ireland, northern Protestants accepted self-government for the six counties in which their ascendancy could be maintained. A province of Great Britain since 1920, the region maintained a remarkable stability and social conformity in which, on the whole, Presbyterians remained dominant. These two groups remained united due to the actions of the region's Catholic minority, which envisioned a unified Ireland politically distinct from Great Britain.

Beginning during the Home Rule movement of the early 1900s, and reappearing again during the Repeal movement under Daniel O' CONNELL, Belfast, Londonderry and other cities in Northern Ireland witnessed bloody faction fights. After World War I, a consistent policy discrimination against Catholic workers in the Belfast shipyards was carried out. Occasional recurrences of this bias continued, particularly in 1935, although by the late 1990s the Fair Employment Commission began to directly address religious discrimination with regard to employment. Ultimately a cold war situation took shape, as Catholic and Protestant communities remained aloof from one another to an extent unique in Western Europe. Exceptional periods of better relations existed during World War II when, in contrast to the position of neutrality adopted by the Republic of Ireland, Northern Ireland joined Great Britain in support of the Allied cause.

The Unionist party, which retained a political majority since the state was founded, at times justified discrimination against Catholics on the grounds that they were disloyal to the state, at other times on the grounds that they were anti-Protestant nationalists. In a rare break with the anti-Catholic status quo before the institution of the 1999 Assembly, the Northern Ireland high court had one Catholic judge appointed to its bench in 1965.

Group of men gather about Catholic demonstrator killed by British Army armored vehicle during protest, 1969. (©Michael Brennan/ CORBIS)

Social welfare and health programs were introduced in Great Britain following World War II, and these were also extended to Northern Ireland. While little discrimination existed in theory, Protestant majorities in local governments sometimes discriminated in such things as allocating council houses to non-Catholic workers. In a similar manner, government-sponsored secondary education was exported from England to Northern Ireland in 1947. Reflecting the northern province's demographics, the proportion of Catholic schools to Protestant was smaller and their types less varied: grammar schools were academic in their emphasis, intermediate schools more practical. This changed little through the 20th century, as substantial state support continued to be guaranteed to all schools, even those under Church control. However, discrimination against Catholics did exist in education. While education in Northern Ireland was theoretically nondenominational, in reality most of the administrative jobs within the education system were held by Protestants, giving the system a Protestant bias.

By the early 1960s repeated discrimination in housing, employment and electoral practices in favor of Protestants, as well as complaints of harassment at the hands of the region's overwhelmingly Protestant police force, prompted a groundswell of protest by the Catholic minority. This protest escalated into guerilla-style violence in 1968, following police intervention in response to a group of civil rights protestors. Over the next few years the conflict hardened into war as paramilitary groups such as the nationalist Irish Republican Army (IRA) led violent attacks on opposing groups, such as the loyalist Ulster Defense Association, in an effort to abolish Northern Ireland and join the Republic. Thousands of innocent men, women and children would die in the bombings and shootings to follow. British military units had occupied Northern Ireland by 1969, and their occupation became a permanent one.

Challenges Unite all Christians. The outbreak of civil war in Northern Ireland presented churches of all denominations with a unique challenge: how to fulfill a ministry of reconciliation in a politically divided community. Unconstrained by political or geographic boundaries, churches had the unique ability to bring people from throughout the island together. However, the violence that erupted in the region after 1968 put new stresses on all faiths, as the appeals of religious leaders' efforts to compromise in the interest of peace were at odds with extremists in both factions.

Because of their inability to relate to the region's violent extremist factions, churches in Northern Ireland threw their support behind the many lay-oriented groups working for reconciliation within the divided community: the Corrymeela and Glencree centers, Peace Point Belfast and Dublin, Protestant and Catholic Encounter (PACE), Women Together, Working for Peace and many others. The Inter-Church Emergency Fund for Ireland, whose committee included official Roman Catholics as well as delegates from the Irish Council of Churches, helped many peacemaking local enterprises get started. The Reconciliation Ireland Fund, co-sponsored by the National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA Ireland Program and Pax Christi USA, channeled funds to it. By working across faiths, Northern Ireland's religious leaders set an example of transcending differences that many hoped extremist factions would follow.

Amid the violence, individual priests made their own impact. In 1972 Edward Daly succored the fatally injured after a nationalist demonstration came under fire by British troops; he subsequently became bishop of Londonderry and a strong voice for the moderate stance of many Catholics. Denis Faul of Dungannon courageously denounced IRA killings and in the same breath the official policy of interning suspected terrorists, which he held created recruits for the IRA. The Jesuits opened a house in Portadown, a Protestant-loyalist citadel, from which they issued firsthand observations on the causes of tension. Above all, the Redemptorists of Clonard Monastery, in the heart of nationalist West Belfast, maintained a liaison with extremists that prepared the ground for the IRA cease-fire announced in August 1994. These contacts did much to sustain the image of the Church in the eyes of a hard-pressed people, intimidated by one side and harassed by the other.

In 1972 the British government shut down Northern Ireland's parliament in Stormont and imposed direct rule. The actions of labor leaders such as the Protestant minister Ian Paisley, who mobilized workers in major cities, crippled efforts to build a coalition government by causing the region's economy to come to a halt. In other cases churches were burned and schools destroyed. Throughout the 1990s, while the British government, as well as representatives from the Republic of Ireland, attempted to mediate differences among factions such as Sinn Féin (the militant arm of the IRA), violence continued to break out. Regular tensions flared on an annual basis, during the Protestant celebration of the Battle of the Boyne. Fought on July 12, 1690, the battle marked the overthrow of the Catholic King James II by Protestant King William of Orange; in celebration of this defeat and to provoke continued animosity, members of the Orange Order now marched through Catholic neighborhoods.

In December of 1993 Irish Prime Minister John Bruton and British Prime Minister John Major outlined the Downing Street Declaration, a peace plan accepted by both IRA and loyalist factions. While outbreaks of violence continued to erupt into the next century, they were brief, and negotiations resumed in their wake. On April 10, 1998, a peace settlement was approved between the IRA and all but the most extreme loyalist factions that was seen as capable of protecting the political and economic rights of the region's Catholic minority. Voters throughout Ireland approved the settlement by a hefty margin, and by the following year Northern Ireland had an Assembly seated in Belfast and work continued on building a coalition government that included the four political parties representing the major factions of Northern Ireland. However, it would be into the next century before guerilla groups would agree to disarm completely, and the annual Orange Order marches continued to precipitate mob-type violence.

At the time of the Downing Street Declaration, Armagh's Cardinal Daly told a parliamentarian assembly at the British House of Commons that governments should not yield to the threat of terrorist violence, that unionists were entitled to the guarantee that no change would be made in the status of Northern Ireland without majority approval, and that the "validity and value" of the nationalist aspiration to achieve a united Ireland by consent should be formally recognized. Throughout the three decades of "The Troubles" the Catholic Church had taken no position that contradicted these principles. Now, following decades of violence, the Church would be faced with a different threat to life, as the newly formed North Ireland Assembly met in 2000 to consider adopting Great Britain's liberal abortion policy. Once again, Protestant and Catholic leaders were united in their opposition.

For a history of the Early Church in Northern Ireland, please see IRELAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

Bibliography: P. N. MANSERGH, The Government of Northern Ireland: A Study in Devolution (London 1926). A. S. QUEKETT, The Constitution of Northern Ireland, 3 v. (London 1928–46). A. G. DONALDSON, Some Comparative Aspects of Irish Law (Durham, N.C. 1957). F. H. NEWARK, Notes on Irish Legal History (Belfast 1960). J. J. CAMPBELL, Catholic Schools: A Survey of a Northern Ireland Problem (Belfast 1964). W. CORKEY, Episodes in the History of Protestant Ulster, 1923–1947 (Belfast 1948). D. P. BARRITT and C. F. CARTER, The Northern Ireland Problem: A Study in Group Relations (London 1962). T. W. MOODY and J. C. BECKETT, Queen's Belfast, 1845–1949: The History of a University, 2 v. (London 1959); Ulster since 1800, ser. 1 and 2 (London 1954, 1957). British Association for Advancement of Science, Belfast in Its Regional Setting (London 1952). Ulster Yearbook 1953 (Belfast 1953). Irish Catholic Directory and Almanac (Dublin), annual. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses. For additional bibliography, see IRELAND.

[R. D. EDWARDS/D. J. BOWMAN/EDS.]

NORTHMEN

A generic term used to designate the migrant people who spread by sea from the sixth to the eleventh century from Scandinavia over the whole western section of the northern hemisphere. Little is known of the Scandinavian population in the prehistoric age. There are vestiges of the Ertebølle civilization in Denmark called Kokkenmodings (kitchen middens or refuse heaps); the Nøstvet civilization left a few remains in Norway and Skåne. Jutland's cultivated fields are similar to those of southern England. Trade with the Roman Empire was established through Pannonia and Poland, native amber being exchanged for bronze and metals. Burial under a mound or tumulus (gravhoje), figurative inscriptions on rocks, and the first runic alphabet characterized this Nordic civilization. In spite of the semantic kinship between Got (GOTHS) and Götaland, one must not take literally the adage of Jordanis, "Scandinavia, the mother of all Germanic peoples," except in the case of the Cimbri, VAN-DALS, Angles and Burgundians, who actually were from Jutland.

The Scandinavian people undertook great migratory movements during their development: after the migration of the Heruli (third to fifth centuries), the first authentically Scandinavian raid was that made on the Frisian coast by Hygelac, Beowulf's uncle, mentioned by GREGORY OF TOURS in 520. From this time on the Vikings became, without interruption, a part of Western History, even though into the seventh century their activity was confined to waters adjoining their homeland. The unification of Sweden (sixth to ninth centuries) and the migration of the Danes after the exodus of the Angles and the Jutes to Britain gave birth to new raids.

Of the many peoples who comprised the contemporary Scandinavian population it was the Suiones or Svear who gave their name to Sweden, and the Dani or Dene to Denmark. But before the tenth century, all these groups shared a common culture, religion, and language (Old Norse), and while groups of Vikings tended to go in the direction in which their originating coastal area faced (i.e., from modern Norway across the Atlantic, from modern Sweden to modern Russia, from Denmark to the islands and coasts of Europe), any distinction between these three modern groups in the Viking age is arbitrary; for Europeans used terms such as Dani (sometimes transposed into Daci), Northmanni, Normanni, to include both those from (modern) Denmark and those from (modern) Norway together; Dacigeni for natives of (modern) Denmark, Northguigigeni for those from (modern) Norway, and Rus or Varangians for those from (modern) Sweden.

Vikings and Varangians. The term "Vikings," now used to designate all those sea raiders who sailed the Western waters in their snekkjur, originally applied to the function of raiding and trading, not to the people. (The etymology of the term is still uncertain: vikingr, pirate; vik, bay; vising, mariner.) Viking exploits constituted an honorable sport in Scandinavian society: on long winter evenings the skalds would transpose a Viking's narrative into poetic language. Usually it was the young men who undertook the adventurous summer voyages for raiding and trading across Europe, hoping to make their fortune. Often outlaws in exile discovered the outlying lands across the Atlantic—the Orkneys, Hebrides, Faroes and Shetlands, stepping stones to Iceland; and Greenland and Vinland, modern America. These were in turn settled by colonists, often Norwegian in origin, who brought with them their wives, children and livestock. Indeed, women could and did lead these voyages of settlement. Both Danes and Norwegians colonized Ireland, founding the first cities and kingdoms on that island. The Danes welded together the islands of the Sound, Jutland, and Skåne; the expansion of this state would propel the Danes in the ninth century to move into East Anglia and Northumbria in Britain, and into Frisia, Brittany and the river basins of the Frankish coastline.

To the east—on the Baltic and on the Volga and Dnieper Rivers—the Scandinavian invaders were known under the name of Varangians or Rus (probably from the Russian warjag, tradesman; war, merchandise; vârar, pledge, oath; ruotsi, a Finnish word for men from the north; rousios, a Greek word for ruddy-complected, similar to the Latin word rufus, and to that same word in English meaning ruddy). There, organized in merchant companies, they set up trading posts on the Baltic coastline and colonized the area around Lake Ladoga. From there they moved down the rivers, heading for the great city of Constantinople. Although the Vikings raided the relatively richer West, they used the undeveloped Slavic lands as a stepping stone to the richer Byzantine and Islamic markets in the East, which were too strong to be raided and thus subjects of trade.

At the beginning of the ninth century, Göttrick, king of Denmark, compelled the local merchants to relinquish the market of Reric on the Baltic to the town of Hedeby (Schleswig) in Jutland, thus establishing the Viking Age. Around the same time, the Varangians reestablished a junction between the Baltic and the Caspian Seas, a step toward their goal of a direct route to Baghdad. The first Varangian route, that of the Volga, united the Baltic sea-coast, which was occupied by the Finnish tribe of the Kurs, with the shores of the Caspian Sea, then peopled by hostile tribes. But the Danes and the Swedes continued to search for a shorter route back to the West, success crowning the undertaking of Swedish King Olaf between 854 and 860, when the “great route of the Varangians to the Greeks” was opened, first by way of the Neman and the Dnieper rivers, and then by way of the Dvina and the Dnieper rivers. The Varangian chief Askold attacked the Khazars, seized Sembast, established the state of Kiev, and launched an assault on Constantinople (860). This Varangian advance into the Ukraine sometime between the departure of the AVARS and the invasion of the Patzinaks resulted in the treaty of 874, which authorized the new commercial route opening on the Black Sea. Thus the route served as a hinge in a vast trading network joining the West, by way of the Rhine and the middle Danube, to Samarkand and the Middle East. In spite of the agreements of Emperor LOUIS THE GERMAN with the Danish princes and with Byzantine Emperor Basil I, however, any benefit Western Europe derived from this route was ephemeral.

Friction between the Vikings and Western Europe began with the Frankish penetration into Frisia, Saxony, and Nordalbinga (Ditmarsh). Yet it was only c. 840—the end of the Carolingian ascendancy and contemporary to the reigns of Kings Offa of Mercia (d. 896) and Egbert of Wessex (d. 839)—that the massive Viking raids of England and the Continent began. Satisfied at first with booty and tribute, the Vikings aspired to conquer and settle after 875. The “grand army” successively attacked Britain’s East Anglia, Northumbria, and Mercia, laying the foundations of the Danelaw; the resistance of the kings of Wessex, Ethelred I and ALFRED THE GREAT, and the victory at Edington over Guthrum near the Danish camp at Chippenham set the southern boundary of Danish settlement along Watling Street. Repeatedly reinforced with fresh troops from Scandinavia, the remainder of the “grand army” moved on to attack western France between the Seine and Meuse rivers; the Viking capture of prosperous Rouen (885), on the Seine, opened the route to Paris. This key city was defended by Bishop Gozelin and Odo, count of Paris, and in 886 the Frankish King Charles the Fat bribed the Vikings to retreat. But at the dawn of the tenth century, a strong detachment of Northmanni settled on the lower Seine and threatened the Frankish kingdom more than ever, since efforts to Christianize the Scandinavians in the West had so far ended in failure. The mission of ANSGAR in Denmark, inaugurated in 823, retreated to Frisia; the missionary archbishop of Hamburg was sacked (845); the baptism of Guthrum in England brought no subsequent Christian baptisms. Only the state of Kiev was receptive to Christianity.

Northman States. The extraordinary dynamism of the Northmen generated new political states, some unstable, but others destined to play a major role in the medieval world. As for Kiev, since the fall of the Soviet Union, Russian historians are retreating from Soviet insistence on theories of a Slavic origin and tending to acknowledge a Nordic origin to that city-state, which incorporated Slavic societies. Other Varangian states were founded on the banks of the Sea of Azov as tributaries of the Khazars, and on the shores of Lake Ladoga (Aldjborg), which were eventually subjugated by Kiev. Under Varangian influence, the word “Russian” soon came to mean a people, a state, a Christian rite, and a civilization essentially Slavic. A second Nordic state, Novgorod, developed into a Russian kingdom as well.

Norwegian expansion westward, undertaken as it was by small groups of explorers followed by warriors, remained somewhat anarchical, with the exception of a few settlements in bay areas. A viable and functioning comital government was set up in the Orkney Islands, at the northern tip of Scotland, whose independence was at times compromised by alliances with the petty Scots kings to the South and by submission to the newly forming Christian monarchy of Norway. To this day, the Orkney Islanders remain fiercely independent and firmly Scandinavian. Numerous small petty comital governments grew up on the Western Isles along the west coast of Scotland, including the Isle of Man, and these two alternated alliances with Norway, petty Scots chieftains, and kings of Norway. In Ireland, the invading Danes formed trading posts first, then petty kingdoms, which were then rivaled by petty Norse-Irish kingdoms. These foundations grew into the first cities of Ireland—Dublin, Cork, Waterford, and Limerick. They served as catalysts to the Irish kinglets to unify and drive out the Vikings—but not until many had mingled their genes with the natives. After the Battle of Clontarf (1014), Ireland remained largely Celtic. The English conquered it in 1171.

The Northwestern searoute led some audacious navigators first toward Iceland (c. 870), which became the refuge for outlaws, whose clans and genealogy were recorded in the Landnámabók (late twelfth century), and then toward Greenland (settled 985), not yet occupied by the Inuit. The settlement of Iceland was completed by c. 930, when all the arable land was taken. The settlers imported the Gulathing Law from Norway, revised it, and set up the first democracy in Europe, presided over by an elected Lawspeaker, who served for three years and recited one third of the law each year. The Legislature, Allthing or Lögrétta, composed of Godar (chieftain-priests), made the laws, while each of the four Quarter Courts performed the judicial functions with juries of 12 men. The Fifth Court acted as a court of appeal. This government functions to this day. In 1000, the Allthing voted to make Christianity the official religion of Iceland, with the proviso that Icelanders could practice paganism in private. Iceland thereby acquired the technology of writing, which inspired the great Icelandic saga literature of the thirteenth century. From Iceland, Eirik the Red discovered and settled Greenland, from which his son Leif Eirikson launched his settlement of Vinland in 1000—the first European settlement in America, discovered in 1965 and excavated by Helge Ingstad at L'Ans-aux-Meadows, Labrador. Leif's sister Freydis Eiriksdottir also led an expedition intended to settle the new land of Vinland, and she located and stayed in the houses her brother had built, but like her brother she was driven off by Skraelings—screamers, or Native Americans. But Greenlanders, Icelanders, and Norwegians returned to Vinland to fish the rich cod banks until about 1350, when the settlement in Greenland disappeared. But mentions of Iceland and Vinland appear as late as 1200 in the German and papal records.

Meanwhile, King Harald II Bluetooth unified Skåne, the straits, Jutland, and a part of Norway to form the kingdom Denmark, and he attempted to force Christianity on his subjects. Likewise, King Harald Fairhair unified Norway and converted his subjects, while King Olaf the Fat (later known as St. Olaf) converted and unified Sweden. Olaf became the first Norse saint upon his death at the Battle of Stiklestad in 1030. The Danelaw—a name covering the Nordic settlement in England—reflects Danish sovereignty in its organization, both military and political, but at the same time it incorporates a sui generis society, on whose original features scholars do not agree. It stretched from Northumbria southward almost to the Thames, and its heart was the Kingdom of York in the north, briefly unified with the Kingdom of Dublin during the height of Viking hegemony in England. This intermingling of Vikings was typical; from Dublin to York to Rouen and Novgorod, there was a never-ceasing interchange of warriors and merchants. In a world ready for expansion, Denmark and later Normandy were the catalysts. Thus it was Hrolf the Ganger (Rollo), son of Ragnarald jarl of Möre, a Danish subject of Norwegian blood, who settled at the mouth of the Seine c. 906. The treaty of Saint-Clair-sur-Epte (911), between Frankish King Charles the Simple and Rollo, made the lower Seine a region of Nordic colonization by its surrender to the Viking band. Neustria eventually became Normandy, but only after a century of growth spreading outward from the original grant of the city of Rouen to Hrolf-Rollo and his men. The agreement required Rollo's conversion to Christianity, and gave him King Charles' daughter in marriage. By the eleventh century Normandy comprised the seven cities of Rouen, Bayeux, Evreux, Lisieux, Sées, Coutances, and Avranches—several of which were Norman foundations.

The unity of the ANGLO-SAXONS, reestablished under the royal line of Wessex, was endangered in the period beginning in 990 by the raids of Olaf I Tryggvesson and Sweyn I Forkbeard of Denmark. In 1016 all of England fell to Sweyn's son, King Canut of England and Denmark. Until his death in 1035, this Viking thus became the head of a land, of which England was the political, economic, cultural, and religious center. Canut converted to Christianity and became a king in the English tradition. He sent his wife Alfgifu to Norway with their son, Harald Harefoot, and married Emma of Normandy, wife of Aethelred Unraed, England's previous king, with an agreement that their sons would inherit England. To show his piety, Canut made a pilgrimage to Rome, c. 1025, and he made every effort to support the Church in England. His son Harold Harefoot succeeded him, only to die shortly after ascending the throne. His son by Emma, Hardacnut, then became king, but he also soon died. The Danish Earl Godwin supported Queen Emma in bringing her son by Aethelred, Edward the Confessor, to the throne. Edward married Godwin's daughter Edith, but they were childless, and his cousin William of Normandy, descendant of Rollo, eventually won England at the Battle of Hastings in 1066.

Christianization of Scandinavia. The conversion of Scandinavia was launched from several directions. The bishopric of Hamburg-Bremen sent numerous missionaries to Sweden and Norway, many of which were strenuously resisted. But Adam of Bremen gives persuasive accounts of these efforts and descriptions of the pagan religion. Viking settlement of England led many missionaries from England to travel to Norway and Denmark, especially in Canut's reign. But the conversion of all three countries was firmly linked to royal ambitions and kingdom-building by King Harald II Bluetooth of Denmark, Harold Fairhair of Norway, and St. Olaf of Sweden. Each of these kings saw the advantages of theories of Christian kingship, and they sought to construct kingdoms on the European model, as opposed to the Viking custom of small, territorial kinglets ruling limited areas. Conversion of Iceland was a practical matter: the Allthing voted to convert, probably to obtain the benefits of literacy and a European connection to offset the ambitions of King Harald Fairhair's successors to sweep Iceland into their own subjection (which one eventually did). In Normandy, the only Continental colony the Vikings successfully established, conversion took at least a century and was aided by immigrant churchmen from Italy.

LANFRANC and ANSELM, in connection with the reform papacy, reconstructed the Norman church. In Kiev and Novgorod, the Rus allied themselves with the Byzantines and converted to Orthodox Christianity. The prime decision was made by Prince Vladimir in 988, but his mother Olga, a Christian, may well have been instrumental in persuading him. Moreover, his conversion won him an imperial bride and significant trading privileges with Constantinople. But he insisted on adopting the Slavic language, not Greek, for the Russian church. And the Russian Primary Chronicle reports that he took away the children of the nobility and placed them in the schools he set up, so that literacy may also have been one of his motives for conversion. Even in their religion, the Vikings were a practical people.

Bibliography: ADAM OF BREMEN, Gesta Hammaburgensis Ecclesiae Pontificum, ed. B. SCHMEIDLER, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Hanover 1917). Tr. F. J. TSCHAN, History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen (New York 1959). Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, ed. C. PLUMMER and J. EARLE (Oxford 1892–99). Tr. D. WHITELOCK, D. C. DOUGLAS, and S. I. TUCKER, The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (New Brunswick, NJ 1961). G. N. GARMONSWAY, The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 1950. ANSKAR, Vita Anskarii auctore Rimberto, ed. G. WAITZ, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Hanover 1884). ST. REMBERT, Anskar, the Apostle of the North, 801–865, tr. C. H. ROBINSON (London 1921). Saxo Grammaticus, History of the Danes, tr. P. FISHER, ed. H. E. DAVIDSON (Woodbridge, Suffolk 1979). S. STURLESON, Heimskringla: History of the Kings of Norway, tr. L. M. HOLLANDER (Austin, Tex. 1964). DUDO OF ST. QUENTIN, History of the Normans, tr. E. CHRISTIANSEN (Woodbridge, Suffolk 1998). Russian Primary Chronicle, trans. S. H. CROSS and O. P. SHERBOWITZ-WETZOR (Cambridge 1953). G. JONES, A History of the Vikings (Oxford 1984). J. JOCHENS, Women in Old Norse Society (Ithaca, N.Y. 1995). J. BYOCK, Medieval Iceland (Berkeley, Calif. 1988). J. JESCH, Women in the Viking Age, (Woodbridge, Suffolk 1991). G. JONES, The Norse Atlantic Saga (Oxford 1954). P. H. SAWYER, The Age of the Vikings (rev. ed. London 1971). G. VERNADSKY, The Origins of Russia (Oxford 1959). I. ATKINSON, The Viking Ships (Cambridge 1979). H. R. E. DAVIDSON, The Viking Road to Byzantium (London 1976). P. G. FOOTE and D. M. WILSON, The Viking Achievement (London 1970). S. FRANKLIN and J. SHEPHERD, The Emergence of Rus, 760–1200 (London 1996). G. N. GARMONSWAY, Canute and his Empire (London 1964). M. K. LAWSON, Cnut (London 1993). J. MARTIN, Medieval Russia 980–1584 (Cambridge 1995). D. O’CORRAIN, Ireland before the Normans (Dublin 1972). R. I. PAGE, Chronicles of the Vikings (London 1995). A. W. BRØGGER, Ancient Emigrants: A History of the Norse Settlements of Scotland (Oxford 1929). K. J. KROGH, Viking Greenland, with a supplement of Saga texts by G. JONES (Copenhagen 1967).

[P. D. WATKINS]

NORTON, JOHN, BL.

Lay martyr; b. in Yorkshire, England; d. Aug. 9, 1600, hanged at Durham. He was the second son of Richard Norton, who had been attainted with rebellion in 1569, and his second wife Margaret Redshaw. John Norton and his wife were arrested in their home at Laymsley, Co. Durham, for harboring an illegal priest, Bl. Thomas PALASER. They were condemned to death, but Mrs. Norton was reprieved because she was pregnant. Palaser and Norton died with their companion Bl. John TALBOT. Norton was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

NORWAY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A northern European kingdom, Norway is located on the western coast of the Scandinavian Peninsula. It is bordered on the east by Sweden and Finland, on the south by Skagerrak, Denmark and the North Sea, on the west by the Atlantic Ocean and the North Sea, and on the north by the Arctic Ocean. A mountainous country characterized by arctic tundra in its northernmost regions, Norway contains many lakes and waterways and its irregular coastline area contains both fjords and small islands. In addition to strong timber and mining industries, Norway’s economy benefited from the discovery of oil and natural gas off its coast during the mid-1900s.

The Kingdom of Norway is a constitutional monarchy. Under the political control of Denmark between 1380 and 1814, and Sweden from 1814, the country regained its independence on June 7, 1905. Its constitution dates from 1814, with modifications dating from 1884. The state church is Evangelical Lutheran.

Christianity until 1500. Christianity came to Norway mainly from England and Ireland during the reign of King Hakon the Good (935–996). It did not, however, gain a real foothold before the reigns of OLAF I TRYGGVESSØN (995–1000) and St. Olaf Haraldson (Olaf II; 1025–30; see OLAF II, KING OF NORWAY, ST.). Soon after being killed in the battle of Stiklestad (July 29, 1030) Olaf II was revered as the sainted hero of medieval Norway. His shrine at Trondheim made that town the capital of the country. The first bishops had been attached to the king’s retinue, but St. Olav sent Bishop Grimkell to Bremen in northern Germany, the former bishopric of St. ANSGAR. Until 1100 Norwegian bishops, like other bishops of Scandinavia, were suffragans of the Capital: Oslo.

Size: 125,031 sq. miles.
Population: 4,481,162 in 2000.
Languages: Norwegian; Lapp and Finnish are spoken regionally.
Religions: 40,203 Catholics (.9%), 3,853,799 Evangelical Lutherans (86%), 89,705 other (2%), 61,000 Norwegian Humanists (atheist) (1%), 436,455 without religious affiliation.
Districts: The diocese of Oslo and the prelatures of Trondheim and Tromsø.

archbishop of Bremen. In 1104 the See of LUND (in southern Sweden, but then controlled by Denmark) became the metropolitan see for all the northern regions. The pope sent Cardinal Nicholas Breakspear, an Englishman, to Norway in 1152. In cooperation with the assembly of Norwegian peers he made the See of Trondheim metropolitan for all of Norway, including Norway proper, the Orkney Islands, the Faroe Islands, the Hebrides, the Isle of Man, ICELAND and GREENLAND. Dioceses within the country from 1153 included also Bergen, Stavanger, Oslo and Hamar. Since Breakspear became the next pope, ADRIAN IV (1154–59), his ordinances received the highest respect.

As elsewhere in medieval Europe, clashes between king and hierarchy were not infrequent. The struggle of Archbishops Eystein (1161–88) and Eirik (1189–1206) with King Sverre (1177–1202) revolved mainly about royal interference in the designation of bishops and pastors and the collection of ecclesiastical tithes. Eirik went into exile in Denmark and Eystein travelled to England where he was introduced to the new Gothic style. Eystein introduced the new style into Norway when he returned and oversaw construction of the cathedral at Trondheim. Many Church-State tensions were resolved by the short-lived Union of Tönsberg (1277), by which the king granted the Church freedom in ecclesiastical nominations, while the archbishop renounced rights the Church had previously enjoyed in the appointment of kings. When the peace-loving King Magnus Lagaböter (Lawmender) died in 1280, both his sons were minors, which allowed the regents to revoke the Union of Tönsberg. Protests from Rome and Trondheim were answered with the banishment of Archbishop Jon Raude and Bishops Andrew of Oslo and Torfinn of Hamar. Jon died in Sweden (1282) and Torfinn in Flanders (1285) after visiting Rome to seek help.

When the Bubonic plague afflicted the country in 1349, it ended the flourishing period of the Church in medieval Norway. Loss of life was tremendous; out of 300 priests in the archdiocese, only 40 survived, and only one of the five bishops survived. During the next two centuries no churches were built. This was evidence that the Church and the people had lost their strength.

Monastic life was introduced very early by English BENEDICTINES. The CISTERCIANS, DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS followed (see DACIA) and these religious orders were likewise decimated by the plague. The Swedish-based Scandinavian order of the Bridgettines appeared in the second half of the 14th century.

The Protestant Reformation. LUTHERANISM was introduced to Norway from Copenhagen by royal decree in 1537. Since 1380 the same kings had ruled Norway and Denmark; in practice Norway had become a Danish province. As a follower of Martin LUTHER, King Christian III (1336–59) had to resort to military force to get the Norwegians to recognize his sovereignty after his election. In southern Norway, Christian was acknowledged by officeholders of Danish descent, but in Trondheim Archbishop Olav Engelbrektsson organized resistance designed to promote Norwegian independence as well as defend the Catholic faith. Olav's small forces proved ineffectual and in April of 1537 he withdrew to the Netherlands, where he died at Lier on Feb. 6, 1538. The REFORMATION came to Norway from abroad; it served the political interests of the Danish king and the magnates but did not correspond to any desire among the populace—in fact, later historians would reject the theory that Lutheranism was generally accepted in Norway before 1600. While the property of parishes was ordinarily respected, the crown confiscated all possessions of monasteries and dioceses. Lutheran beliefs and practices were introduced with great circumspection. Generally priests were allowed to continue in their posts, but when they died the royal government provided Lutheran successors. Bishop Mogens of Hamar and Bishop Hoskold of Stavanger opposed the new order; the latter was committed to prison and died at Bergen; the former was brought to Denmark, where he died at Antvortskov (1542). The See of Bergen remained vacant after 1535. Hans Rev of Oslo, born in Denmark, was the only bishop to embrace Lutheranism. He did not ordain any bishops; thus the APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION was lost in Norway, as it was in Denmark.

By the late 1500s Catholic priests were no longer admitted to Norway. By the early 17th century it became apparent that many young men of the upper classes, even sons of Lutheran ministers, were attending JESUIT schools abroad. A royal decree of 1604 excluded from any school or church office any students of these institutions. A few years later several priests of the Lutheran Diocese of Oslo were brought to public trial in Skien (1613) and forced into exile as Catholic sympathizers; the evidence against them included correspondence with Catholics abroad and a disregard of Lutheran beliefs. The influence of the Norwegian Jesuit Laurentius Nicolai Norvegus was discovered. From 1624 capital punishment threatened any Catholic priest entering the country. Even so, the secular priest John Martini Rhugius visited his native country and stayed at Larvik for three short periods (1637–41) caring for a small number of widely scattered Catholics. Improved commercial relations attracted Jesuits from the Netherlands; they stayed in Bergen for six weeks in 1648, but enforcement of the draconian laws forced them to leave. After 1648, however, despite widely varying situations, Catholic priests continuously resided in Copenhagen, the capital and royal residence of the Danish-Norwegian kingdom. In Norway itself, which lacked a court and foreign ambassadors, it was possible for a Catholic priest to dwell only by serving as chaplain to foreign mercenaries in time of war or to foreign artisans in commercial establishments. Thus, foreign mercenaries made it possible for German Jesuits to stay in Fredrikstad (1677–91) as military chaplains to General Cicignon. The royal glassworks, begun after 1740, required skilled workers from the Catholic regions of central Europe. From time to time a priest from Denmark was permitted to visit the factories so that the workers could receive the Sacraments. After 1790 a priest, probably French, stayed some years with the French consul in Christiania, and a small, illegal Catholic congregation was tolerated. But all these instances were merely temporary arrangements and organized only for foreigners.

Church in Bud, a fishing village near Molde, Norway.
(©Wolfgang Kaehler/CORBIS)

Reestablishment of Catholicism. The first regular Catholic parish in Norway following the Reformation was founded in 1843 in Christiania (renamed Oslo in 1925). From 1814 Norway had the same king as Sweden, due to the political negotiations of the Protestant Karl XIV Johan (1763–1844). Although the Norwegian Constitution of 1814, which declared Norway independent, did not officially change the existing draconian legislation against Catholics, it was gradually permitted to lapse. Jacob Studach, chaplain to the Catholic Princess Josephine Beauharnais, visited Norway several times. In 1833 Studach was appointed vicar apostolic of Sweden and Norway and resided in Stockholm. After Studach sent the German priest Gotfred Montz to the Norwegian capital to baptize the French consul's child, Montz presented a petition to Karl XIV from about 60 Catholics he had met while in the capital. On March 6, 1843 provisional dispensations to celebrate Mass were granted, and on Easter Sunday, April 16, the first official Catholic service was held. The Dissenter Act of 1845 brought definitive regulations whereby religious freedom was granted to all Christians, although Lutheranism remained the official religion of the country. Austrian REDEMPТОRISTS were placed in charge of the parish (1849–54) and began the construction of St. Olav's Church (the present cathedral), dedicated in 1856. The next year a small chapel was opened in Bergen, the second largest town in Norway, by the secular priest Christopher Holfeldt-Houen. In the extreme north another effort was made in 1855 when the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (Propaganda) created the Prefecture Apostolic of the Arctic Missions (Poli Arctici) comprising the northern part of the Scandinavian Peninsula, the Russian peninsula of Kola, Iceland, Greenland, the Arctic part of Canada, the Faroes and from 1860 even the Shetland Islands, the Orkneys and Caithness in the north of Scotland. The first prefect apostolic was the Russian convert Djunkowski, who returned to Russia the Orthodox Church in 1863. On Norwegian territory, stations were established at Alta (1856) and at Tromsø (1859), where a small church erected in 1860 can still be seen. The difficulty of communication within the vast Prefecture Apostolic of the North combined with a lack of priests in the south to create entirely new divisions in 1869, when Rome created a prefecture apostolic for each of the three northern countries: Norway, Sweden and Denmark. Prefect Bernard Bernard, Djunkowski's successor, administered the entire Norwegian territory, with residence in Oslo (1869–87). Norway constituted a single vicariate apostolic from 1892 until 1932, when the country was divided into three ecclesiastical territories. The southernmost territory became the Diocese of Oslo and the central region established a vicar apostolic residence in Trondheim in 1953; two years later the northern territory was elevated to a vicariate apostolic with its seat in Tromsø. The areas of Trondheim and Tromsø were entrusted to religious congregations, northern Norway to the Fathers of the Holy Family and central Norway to the Fathers of the SACRED HEART (Picpus Fathers). Secular clergy, assisted by various orders and congregations, administered the Oslo Diocese. All three bishops depended directly on Propaganda.

The Church in the 21st Century. Although in the aftermath of the Reformation, Catholicism had become a minority religion, the Church's adherents were a vital force in Norwegian society by 2000. Factors energizing the Church as it moved into the next century were increased memberships, as well as discussion within the government of revisiting the relationship between the Lutheran Church and the state, a relationship that, if altered, would allow Catholics greater latitude. As Norwegian society became increasingly secularized during the 20th century, conditions such as that requiring the king and half the Cabinet to be avowed Lutherans were viewed as vestiges of a less liberal era. The state church also provoked anger for its decision, in July of 2000, to appoint an openly homosexual clergyman in contravention to established Lutheran doctrine. This decision was opposed by a majority of Lutheran bishops and caused those seeking a more traditional basis of faith to look elsewhere for spiritual guidance.

While Church membership in 1960 was only 7,875, within four decades over 40,000 Norwegians professed Catholicism as their faith. The increase was due in large part to the immigration of refugees from Central and Eastern Europe; one estimate held that 70 percent of the country's Catholics were born abroad. In 1995 instruction in "Religious Knowledge and Education in Ethics" became compulsory in all elementary and secondary schools, replacing a previously Lutheran curriculum. The teaching of Christian ethics in an increasingly diverse culture sparked court battles brought by Muslims and members of the Norwegian Humanist Association, an atheist group, which were still underway in the courts in 2000. Like other "dissenters" Catholic pupils were exempted from participation in services or prayer outside their faith, but were required to participate in such classes. Norway's four Catholic schools, which were exempt from such curriculum requirements, received no support from the central government, although municipal subsidies were sometimes available. Catholic hospitals, which administered to all denominations, existed in nearly all of the nation's 32 parish towns by 2000 and were run by sisters of various congregations. Of the 63 priests administering to Norway's Catholics, 40 were religious and 23 were secular; they were joined in their work by 215 sisters.

Bibliography: R. KEYSER, Den norske Kirkes historie under Katholicismen, 2 v. (Christiania 1856–58). C. C. A. LANGE, De norske Klosters historie I Middelalderen (2d ed. Christiania 1856). T. B. WILSON, History of the Church and State in Norway (London 1903). J. METZLER, Die apostolischen Vikariate des Nordens (Paderborn 1919). S. UNDSET, Saga of Saints, tr. E. C. RAMSDEN (New York 1934). C. JOYS, Hvad skjedde i Norge i 537 (Oslo 1937). I. H. KNUDSEN, De relationibus inter Sanctam Sedem et Norvegiam (Rome 1946). K. LARSEN, A History of Norway (Princeton, NJ 1948). E. MOLLAND, Church Life in Norway 1800–1950, tr. H. KAASA (Minneapolis 1957). H. RIEBER-MOHN, Catholicism in Norway (London 1959). G. SCHWAIGER, Die Reformation in dem nordischen Ländern (Munich 1962). O. GARSTEIN, Rome and the Counter-Reformation in Scandinavia, v.1: 1559–85 (New York 1964). Scandinavian Churches, ed. L. S. HUNTER (London 1965). H. HOLZAPFEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, eds., J. HOFER and

Nave of Norwich Cathedral. (©Angelo Hornak/CORBIS)

K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65). E. AMDAHL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1522–30. Annuario Pontificio (1964) 317. St. Ansgar's Bulletin (New York 1963).

[J. J. DUIN/P. SHELTON]

NORWICH, ANCIENT SEE OF

The Ancient See of Norwich was founded in 1095, when Herbert Losinga transferred his see there from Thetford, since Norwich had become the most important town in East Anglia. Losinga, one of the foremost men of his day, had been prior of FÉCAMP and abbot of RAMSEY, and then decided to introduce Benedictines into his cathedral. In 1096 he planned the buildings and dedicated them to the Holy Trinity; much of his work is still visible, so that Norwich remains the most purely Norman cathedral in Britain (see CHURCH ARCHITECTURE). Provision was made for a community of 60 monks. The wealth of the community increased during the following centuries mainly because of the appropriation of churches. Income came also from the shrine of St. WILLIAM OF NORWICH, a boy alleged to have been murdered by Jews in 1144. There were frequent disputes with the townsmen over the rights of tolls and commons. After a great affray in 1272, which resulted in the burning of the monastic buildings, the citizens had to contribute 3,000 marks toward the repairs. Bishop Percy built (c. 1360) a clerestory and spire to replace ones damaged in a storm, and Bishops Lyhert and Goldwell replaced the timber roof with one of stone. The diocese suffered heavily during the Bubonic plague: in one year Bishop Bateman made over about 800 institutions. In 1370 Henry DESPENSER was provided to the see; he was a military bishop, unusual in English history, who took a prominent part in the suppression of the Peasants' Revolt. The diocese was much affected by the LOLLARD heresy, and Bishop Alnwick labored hard to control the danger. The most distinguished members of the monastic community were the 14th century scholar-monks, Thomas Brinton and ADAM EASTON, both of whom spent most of their working lives at the papal Curia. The priory was dissolved in 1538, when the prior became dean and the monks were appointed canons of the new chapter.

Bibliography: E. H. CARTER, ed., Studies in Norwich Cathedral History (Norwich 1935). E. C. FERNIE, Architectural History of Norwich Cathedral (New York 1993). I. ATHERTON, Norwich Cathedral: church, city, and diocese, 1096–1996 (London 1996). J. NICHOLLS, The black monks' workshop: an introduction to Norwich Cathedral Cloister and Priory (Norwich 1999).

[F. R. JOHNSTON]

NOTARY (CANON LAW)

A notary can be defined as a person legitimately constituted by ecclesiastical authority to authenticate by his or her signature ecclesiastical documents. The function of notary has its roots in the notarius who took notes to aid the public scribes (tabelliones) in drawing up documents, and in the tabularius, who took notes and kept the records of court proceedings in Roman law. This latter official can be found fulfilling the same function in the Church of the 5th century, and by the 12th century he had acquired the name “notary” and the right to authenticate public documents with his signature. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) prescribed that every ecclesiastical court must have a notary.

Canon Law uses “notary” as a general term [Codex iuris canonici (Graz 1955) cc. 483, 484; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, cc. 253, 254] and “chancellor” as a specific type of notary [Codex iuris canonici (Graz 1955) cc. 482, 483; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, cc. 252, 253]. [See CHANCELLOR, DIOCESAN (EPARCHIAL).]

The general duties of a notary are as follows: to draft acts or documents regarding decrees, dispositions, obligations, or other things requiring their action; to record what has taken place, and to sign this record; to give access to records to those who legitimately request them; and to declare copies of documents to be in conformity with the originals [Codex iuris canonici (Graz 1955) c. 484; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 254].

The power of the notary may be extended to include the authentication of all ecclesiastical acts, or limited to judicial or processual documents only or to specified acts or occasions. The notary's duties are further limited to the territory in which the one appointing has jurisdiction. Lay persons may be appointed, but in matters involving the reputation of a cleric, the notary should be a priest. Although it is not required by law, knowledge of canon law is obviously of great value. Notaries can be freely removed from office by the diocesan bishop [Codex iuris canonici (Graz 1955) c. 485; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 255].

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:1015–20. G. BARRACLOUGH, Public Notaries and the Papal Curia (London 1934). J. C. BROWN, “The Origin and Early History of the Office of Notary,” Juridical Review 47 (1935) 201–240, 355–417. C. J. DUERR, The Judicial Notary [Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies] 312; 1951.

[C. J. DUERR]

NOTBURGA, ST.

Maidservant; fl. ninth or tenth century; or, according to a recent version of the legend, b. Rattenberg, Tyrol, c. 1265; d. Sept. 14, 1313. Most of her life was spent in the service of Count Henry of Rottenburg. Pious, a diligent worker, she was noted for charity to the poor, to whom she gave food and drink. She died at Rottenburg Castle and was buried at Eben. Her relics were exhumed in 1718; ecclesiastical confirmation of her cult was given on March 27, 1862. She is an extremely popular saint among the farmers and peasants of the Tyrol, Bavaria, Slovenia, Croatia, and Istria, where numerous churches and altars are dedicated to her. Patroness of maidservants and farmers, she is invoked in cases of animal sickness and for successful childbirth. Her symbols include a sickle, a metal jug and a loaf of bread (relating to her care of the poor), and a ring of keys.

Feast: Sept. 14.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 4:709–768. Andenken an die Feier der Heiligsprechung der Jungfrau und Dienstmagd Notburga von Rottenburg (Brixen-Lienz 1865). H. BACHMANN, “Die historischen Grundlagen der Notburgalegende,” Tiroler Heimat, 24 (1960) 5–49. W. VON PFAUNDLER, Sankt Notburga: Eine Heilige aus Tirol (Vienna 1962), complete bibliog. 282–300.

[D. ANDREINI]

NOTES, THEOLOGICAL

Most manuals of theology before the Second Vatican Council presented their doctrine in the form of theses, and to each thesis they regularly assigned a “theological note.” Thus one thesis may have been qualified as “of divine faith,” another as “Catholic doctrine” or, again, “theologically certain.” The system of theological notes indicated what kind of certitude the thesis involves, what kind of assent it demands. This article briefly treats the definition, author, division, and main types of theological notes.

Definition. A theological note is a judgment of the dogmatic or theological value of a proposition according to its relation with the norms of faith. The remote norms of faith are Sacred Scripture and tradition; the proximate norm is the teaching of the magisterium. [See TRADITION (IN THEOLOGY)]. A note presenting such an evaluative judgment is called “theological” because it makes known the theological value of a proposition. It is also called a “qualification” or “value” because it manifests the theological quality or value of the proposition.

A “theological censure” (see CENSURE, THEOLOGICAL) is a pejorative judgment that indicates a proposition is in some way opposed or harmful to faith or morals. If a thesis is given the theological note “of divine and Catholic faith,” then a proposition that directly contradicts this thesis will be given the theological censure of “heresy.”

Author. Strictly speaking, a dogmatic or theological evaluation of theses is matter for the ecclesiastical magisterium, since it alone has binding authority in the Church. But theologians can be empowered to pronounce sentence in doctrinal matters, and sometimes popes have given this power expressly to faculties of theology. Gradually it has come to be customary for theologians to pass judgment on the theological or dogmatic value of their own theses, though sometimes the Church has restricted their power and forbidden them to censure certain propositions that are still freely discussed among Catholics.

Division. There are many theological notes in use today: “divine faith,” “divine and Catholic faith,” “defined faith,” “ecclesiastical faith,” “proximate to faith”; “Catholic doctrine,” “theologically certain,” “common and certain doctrine”; “probable,” “more probable,” “common,” “more common,” and others.

The propositions that are qualified by these theological notes may be grouped into three or four general categories. The first embraces propositions that are in some way “of faith.” The second includes propositions that are “not of faith” but are in some way “theologically certain.” The third includes propositions that are “not certain” but are more or less “probable.” Many authors break the second category into two, so as to distinguish “theologically certain” propositions into those that are “Catholic doctrine” and those that are “not Catholic doctrine.” The reasons for this distinction will appear presently.

Main Types. It is now possible to consider the main types of theological notes in greater detail.

Divine and Catholic Faith. The most important theological note is that of “divine and Catholic faith.” It is given to truths that are dogmas of the faith and must be believed if one is not to incur the censure of heresy. Such truths demand an absolute assent, based not on intrinsic truth seen with the natural light of reason but on the authority of God revealing, who can neither deceive nor be deceived (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 3008).

The meaning of this note is best gathered from a dogmatic constitution of Vatican Council I: “by divine and Catholic faith everything must be believed that is contained in the written word of God or in tradition, and that is proposed by the Church as a divinely revealed object of belief either in a solemn decree or in her ordinary, universal magisterium” (Enchiridion symbolorum 3011).

Thus two points must be verified if a proposition is to be “of divine and Catholic faith”: it must be divinely revealed and it must be proposed by the Church for belief as divinely revealed. If it is divinely revealed, or, as the Council puts it, is contained in the written word of God or in tradition, then it is “of divine faith.” If it is also proposed by the Church as a divinely revealed object of belief, then it is “of divine and Catholic faith.”

Such a dogma of the faith can be proposed for belief by the Church in two ways: either by a solemn decree or by her ordinary, universal magisterium. If it is proposed for belief by a solemn decree, that is, if it is solemnly defined, then its theological note is slightly changed by many theologians so as to indicate this. Instead of saying that it is “of divine and Catholic faith,” they say that it is “of defined divine faith,” or simply “of defined faith.”

Such solemn definitions can be made by a pope speaking EX CATHEDRA, as in the definition of the Immaculate Conception by Pius IX and of the Assumption by Pius XII. Solemn definitions are also issued by ecumenical councils, such as Trent and Vatican I, in their various decrees and dogmatic constitutions.

But not only solemn definitions of the Church receive the note “of divine and Catholic faith.” It is also applied to truths proposed by the Church’s ordinary, universal magisterium as divinely revealed objects of belief. According to Pius IX, “that subjection which is to be made by an explicit act of divine faith must not be limited to those things which have been defined in express decrees of ecumenical councils or of Roman pontiffs; but it must also be extended to those things which, through the ordinary teaching of the whole Church throughout the world, are proposed as divinely revealed and, as a result, by universal and constant consent of Catholic theologians are held to be matters of faith” (Enchiridion symbolorum 2879). One finds truths of this kind in certain famous symbols, such as the so-called Athanasian Creed (Enchiridion symbolorum 75) or the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (Enchiridion symbolorum 150).

There are also some particular councils whose propositions have acquired universal and irreformable value from their confirmation by a Roman pontiff and acceptance by the Church as expressions of her faith. Such are the Council of Carthage (Enchiridion symbolorum 222) against the Pelagians and the Second Council of Orange (Enchiridion symbolorum 370) against the Semi-Pelagians. From these, too, we derive propositions that are “of divine and Catholic faith” and whose denial incurs the censure of heresy.

Divine Faith. This note is used by some theologians, and more frequently in the treatise on revelation than in other treatises. They consider a truth to be “of divine faith” if it is found in the written word of God or in tradition so clearly that, even if it were not proposed by the Church for belief as divinely revealed, it would still have to be believed by divine faith. For them such truths are the divinity of Christ and His Resurrection.

Ecclesiastical Faith. This is another note occasionally encountered in manuals of theology. It is a controverted note, maintained by some theologians, rejected by others. When used, it is applied to truths that are revealed only virtually, not formally, but that are proposed by the magisterium of the Church to be held absolutely and universally. These truths are often defined, but not as dogmas of the faith. They require absolute assent because they are backed by the infallible authority of the Church. Hence they are qualified as “of ecclesiastical faith.” An instance of such a truth is drawn from the Constitution of Alexander VII: “we declare and define that these five propositions taken from the book of the aforementioned Cornelius Jansen . . . were condemned in the sense intended by that same Cornelius Jansen” (Enchiridion symbolorum 2012).

Proximate to Faith. This frequently used note is applied to a doctrine that by almost unanimous consent is held to be revealed but is not yet expressly proposed as such by the infallible magisterium. That “God sincerely will the salvation of all adults” is said to be such a doctrine. This note does not command absolute assent.

Catholic Doctrine. This is a common theological note but an ambiguous one. Some theologians apply it to dogmas of the faith. For others it seems to have the same meaning as “proximate to faith.” By still others it is applied to one species of theologically certain propositions. Sometimes it is difficult to determine just what meaning it has.

It applies strictly to propositions that are not dogmas of the faith or strict theological conclusions from revealed truths, but yet are taught expressly and authentically by the magisterium of the Church. Such propositions, based on the authority but not the infallibility of the Church, require of the faithful a truly internal assent from a religious motive of obedience.

“Catholic doctrine” is said to extend to whatever the supreme magisterium wishes to teach expressly, without proposing it for belief, such as the chief ideas of encyclicals, propositions contrary to those that have been condemned, what is contained in the chapters of general councils without being certainly defined or what is easily deduced from these chapters, doctrinal decrees of the Roman pontiff or of Roman congregations if these have been approved and confirmed by the pope. These latter decrees are not irreformable and are of lesser weight than strictly papal precepts, but they too require an obedient assent.

Theologically Certain. This is another very common but not very satisfactory note. For it is sometimes applied only to strict THEOLOGICAL CONCLUSIONS, sometimes also to Catholic doctrine, sometimes even more widely to any common and certain doctrine of theologians. Hence “theologically certain” propositions must be carefully examined to determine just what this qualification means in each case.

In its strictest sense a proposition is called “theologically certain” if it is a certain theological conclusion from one premise that is revealed and from another that is not revealed but is naturally certain. Thus the proposition that Christ is capable of laughter is called theologically certain because it is deduced from a revealed premise (Christ is man), and from a naturally certain premise (every man is capable of laughter). (See ERROR, THEOLOGICAL).

In its widest sense, a “theologically certain” note is applied to propositions that theologians commonly hold as certain but that are neither strict theological conclusions from revelation nor Catholic doctrine. Many theologians qualify such propositions simply as “common and certain.”

Probable. Another very common note is “probable,” “more probable,” etc. A thesis is termed theologically “probable” if it rests on a fallible but sufficiently grave theological motive. The Ecumenical Council of Vienne used this note: “We . . . consider the second opinion which says that in Baptism informing grace and virtues are conferred on children as well as on adults, as more probable” (Enchiridion symbolorum 904).

In conclusion, one may note that theologians, while they found these and other theological notes very useful, did not find a way to achieve greater uniformity in the definition and use of them.

See Also: THEOLOGICAL TERMINOLOGY.

Bibliography: H. QUILLIET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2:2101–13. S. CARTECHINI, De valore notarum theologiarum et de criteriis ad eas dignoscendas (Rome 1951). J. B. FRANZELIN, Tractatus de divina traditione et Scriptura (4th ed. Rome 1896). L. DE GRANDMAISON, Le Dogme chrétien: Sa nature, ses formules, son développement (Paris 1928). J. SALAVERRI, “De valore et censura propositionum in theologia,” Estudios Ecclesiasticos 23 (1949) 170–88.

[E. J. FORTMAN]

NOTKER BALBULUS, BL.

Poet, chronicler, Sequence writer; b. either in Heiligau (now Elgg, near Zurich) or Jonschwil (near Sankt Gallen), Switzerland, c. 840; d. Sankt Gallen Abbey, April 6, 912. Born of a noble Swiss family, Notker entered the Benedictine Abbey of SANKT GALLEN as a child, remained there as a student under such masters as Iso and Moengal (Marcellus) the Irishman, and stayed on to become an admired and beloved teacher, despite the speech defect that won him the sobriquet Balbulus, the “Stammerer.” He was appointed librarian of the monastery in 890 and was guest master in 892 and 894, but his reputation is based on his literary activities.

Notker is now almost universally recognized as the monachus Sangallensis who c. 884 composed the anecdotal and highly imaginative Gesta Caroli (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum [new series] 12), based on folk tales and legends and written in colloquial Latin prose. This work, of which only the first part and some of the second are extant, won immediate and lasting popularity in the Middle Ages; its tales of CHARLEMAGNE’s encounters with his Frankish bishops are chiefly responsible for the emergence of the legendary (as opposed to Einhard’s historical) figure of Charlemagne in medieval literature. About 881 Notker wrote the Breviarium regum Francorum, a continuation of Erchanbert’s chronicle. He is the author of four hymns in honor of St. Stephen and the metrical Vita s. Galli, of which only fragments remain; the hymn Media vita, ascribed to him by a tradition that can be traced only to 1613, is probably not his. His extant letters reveal a man of spirit and wit.

It is, however, for his role in the development of the SEQUENCE that Notker is most often remembered. In the preface of his LIBER HYMNORUM [ed. W. von den Steinen (Bern 1960) with melodies], a collection of Sequences dedicated (c. 884–887) to Liutward, bishop of Vercelli and chancellor of Charles the Fat, Notker recounts that in 862 a monk from the recently sacked monastery of JUMIÈGES in France brought to Sankt Gallen an antiphony in which a text (prosa) had been set to parts of the jubilus (the melody that prolonged the final a of the Alleluia following the Gradual of the Mass). Considering this an excellent mnemonic device for committing to memory the difficult jubilus melody, Notker composed a text that both imitated and improved upon the French text, the Laudes Deo concinat. His master Iso praised his first attempt but suggested making each syllable of the text correspond to a note of the jubilus; this Notker did in the Psallat ecclesia, a text for the dedication of a church, which won the approval of both Iso and Moengal. Many scholars are not totally satisfied with this account of Notker’s, for it only obfuscates the question that they consider crucial to a proper estimate of his traditional role as originator of the Sequence; that is, to what extent was he influenced by the earlier and much simpler French Sequences of the eighth and ninth centuries (Analecta hymnica [Leipzig 1886–1992] 53)? In addition, scholars are not certain how many or, in some instances, which Sequences are to be attributed to Notker. The original manuscript of the Liber hymnorum is not extant, and though there are eight manuscripts dating from not later than the eleventh century, no two of them are identical. Nor is Ekkehard IV’s statement in the Sankt Gallen chronicle that Notker composed 50 Sequences of any help, since Ekkehard does not identify them by incipit. Whether or not Notker was the originator of the Sequence, there can be no doubt of his influence on German literature. His Sequences, in rhythmical prose and without rhyme, were in frequent use throughout northern Europe until the middle of the twelfth century. They are characterized by simplicity and nobility of language and style and by profundity and orthodoxy of theological content. Notker is also called the first musical composer of German stock, for he is known to have composed the music as well as the words of some of his Sequences, thus freeing the text from too great dependence upon an already existing musical composition.

Notker was beatified in 1512. Permission for a commemoration of him on April 8 was granted to the monastery of Sankt Gallen by a papal bull of Dec. 12, 1512, and was extended to the Diocese of Constance in 1513. His relics were brought to the cathedral of Sankt Gallen in 1628. Notker's vita by Ekkehard V (Acta sanctorum April 1:579–595) is not altogether reliable.

Personal note autographed by Notker Balbulus, Dec. 29, 909.

Feast: April 6.

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

Bibliography: J. JULIAN, ed. A Dictionary of Hymnology, 2 v. (2d ed. London 1907 repr. New York 1957) 1:812–816. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:354–367, for Notker's works. S. SINGER, Die Dichterschule von St. Gallen (Leipzig 1922). W. VON DEN STEINEN, Notker der Dichter und seine geistige Welt, 2 v. (Bern 1948). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1953) 211–215, brief but comprehensive survey in Eng. H. F. HAEFELE, "Studien zu Notkers Gesta Karoli," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 15 (1959): 358–392. W. KOSCH, Deutsches Literatur-Lexikon, ed. B. BERGER (Bern 1963). E. LECHNER, Vita Notkeri Balbuli. Geistesgeschichtlicher Standort und historische Kritik (St. Gallen 1972). R. L. CROCKER, The Early Medieval Sequence (Berkeley 1977). K. HALLER, Die Legende des heiligen Notker, ed. E.-A. KOEPEL (Göppingen 1983). H.-J. REISCHMANN, Die Trivialisierung des Karlsbildes der Einhard-Vita in Notkers "Gesta Karoli Magni" (Constance 1984). P. OCHSENBEIN, Die Notkere im Kloster Sankt Gallen (St. Gallen 1992). J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung. Ein Handbuch, 2 v. (Berlin 1964–65) 1:282–299.

NOTKER LABEO

Benedictine scholar, one of the earliest authors to translate Latin works into German, for which he was given the nickname Teutonicus; b. Thurgau, Switzerland, c. 950; d. Abbey of Sankt Gallen, June 29, 1022. Notker Labeo was one of four nephews of Abbot Ekkehard I to enter the community at SANKT GALLEN, which he joined as an OBLATE. Widely read in all branches of knowledge, he was later chosen to direct the monastic school, where one of his pupils was Ekkehard IV. In a letter (P. H. Piper, 1:859–61) to Bp. Hugh of Sion (d. 1017) Notker lists his works; of 11 translations, but only five are extant. His clear poetic style, which made him the earliest master of German prose, appears in his translations of BOETHIUS'S De consolatione philosophiae, the two extant books of Martianus Capella's De nuptiis Mercurii et philologiae, the Categories and Hermeneutics of ARISTOTLE (from an earlier translation into Latin by Boethius), and in the PSALTER, perhaps Notker's most famous work (an Old High German-Latin interlinear text, MS Sankt Gallen 21, dating from c. 1100). No copies have been found of Notker's translations of Boethius's De trinitate and Elements of Arithmetic (?), Vergil's Bucolica, the DISTICHA CATONIS, Terence's Andria, and the Homilia in Job of Pope GREGORY THE GREAT, to which Notker devoted his last days.

Notker wrote an original work in German on music, about the measurement of organ pipes, among other subjects. It is the first known German work on music. He is the author of a Latin work, the Computus, about how to determine dates, especially that of Easter. He is credited also with a Latin textbook, De arte rhetorica, composed principally of excerpts from Boethius.

Notker also contributed to the development of German orthography; in the letter to Hugh of Sion he recommended accents for German words (acute for short vowels, circumflex for long). His contribution to the German vernacular may be compared to ALFRED THE GREAT'S work in making Anglo-Saxon a literary language. Like Alfred, Notker translated the Latin classics to make them available to a wider audience.

Bibliography: Works. Die Schriften Notkers und seiner Schule, ed. P. H. PIPER, 3 v. (Freiburg 1895). Notkers des Deutschen Werke, ed. E. H. SEHRT and T. STARCK, 7 v. (Halle 1933–55). Literature. J. M. CLARK, The Abbey of St. Gall as a Centre of Literature and Art (Cambridge, Eng. 1926), passim. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 2:694–699. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903—50) 11.1:806–807. O. A. DIETER, The Rhetoric of Notker Labeo (St. Louis 1940). W. VON DEN STEINEN, Notker, der Dichter und seine geistige Welt, 2 v. (Bern 1948). A. K. DOLCH, Notker-Studien, 2 v. (Borna-Leipzig 1951–52). I. SCHRÖBLER, Notker III. von St. Gallen als Übersetzer und Commentator von Boethius . . . (Tübingen 1953). E. H. SEHRT, Notker-Wortschatz (Halle 1955). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 967. J. DUFT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:1051.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

NOTKER OF LIÈGE, BL.

Prince bishop of Liège; b. c. 940; d. Liège, April 10, 1008. He came of a noble Swabian family and was a nephew of Emperor Otto I. Although he seems to have been educated at Sankt Gallen, it is unlikely that he was provost there. Made bishop of Liège in 969 and called its "second founder," he directed his energies to strengthening Church discipline, building churches, and improving the schools of his diocese. As a result of his work, the CATHEDRAL school of Saint-Lambert, divided into clerical and lay sections, was among the best in the West. He was often in the service of the Emperors Otto II, Otto III, and Henry II; and on one of his four trips to Italy, he accompanied back to Germany the body of OTTO III, whose classical notions of the empire he had enthusiastically supported. He built a cathedral in Liège after the model of Aachen, but it was destroyed by fire in 1185. He was buried in St. John's at Liège, but the present relics there are not genuine.

Feast: April 9 or 10.

Bibliography: I. HELLER, ed., Aegidii Aureaevallensis gesta episcoporum Leodiensium, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825) 25:57–63. Acta Sanctorum April 1:58, 847. U. BERLIÈRE, "Une Biographie de l'évêque Notger au XII<sup>e</sup> siècle," Acta Sanctorum 8 (1891) 309–312. G. KURTH, Notger de Liège et la civilisation au X<sup>e</sup> siècle, 2 v. (Brussels 1905).

[W. E. WILKIE]

NOTRE DAME, SISTERS OF (SND)

The congregation of the Sisters of Notre Dame (SND, Official Catholic Directory, #2990), a pontifical institute, is devoted chiefly to education at all levels. It was founded in 1850, in Coesfeld, Germany, by two young teachers, Aldegonda Wolbring (Sr. Mary Aloysia) and Lisette Kuehling (Sr. Mary Ignatia), assisted by their spiritual director, Rev. Theodore Elting. The first members were trained by sisters from the Notre Dame Convent of Amersfoort, Netherlands, who gave them the rule that St. Marie Rose Julie BILLIART had adopted for her community. In 1900 the Holy See gave final approbation to this rule as adapted by the new congregation.

The first teacher-training school for the sisters and for other young women was opened, with government approval, in 1853 by Sr. Mary Bernarda Perger. Three years later, the Amersfoort sisters returned to their own community and the Coesfeld group elected their first superior general. Growth and expansion characterized the next 20 years until the congregation's further development was arrested by the anti-Catholic decrees of the KULTURKAMPF.

In 1874, therefore, Mother Mary Chrysostom, second superior general, welcomed the invitation of Bp. Richard Gilmour, of Cleveland, Ohio, to work in his diocese. She and eight sisters arrived in the U.S. in July 1874 and two months later they began to teach in St. Peter and St. Stephen schools in Cleveland, and the Mother of God school in Covington, Ky. Two hundred sisters were transferred to the U.S. during the next three years, and Cleveland became the administrative center of the community. In 1884 a few sisters were permitted to resume work in Germany, and when their work prospered, the motherhouse was reestablished in Muelhausen, Germany, in 1888. Over the several decades, new foundations were established in Latin America, Europe and Asia.

From the Cleveland province, other houses were established through the U.S. as the community expanded. In 1924, three new provinces were established: Covington, Ky., Toledo, Ohio, and Los Angeles, Calif. In 1947, the motherhouse was transferred to Rome, Italy.

[M. M. SMITH/EDS]

NOTRE DAME, SISTERS OF THE CONGREGATION DE

(Official Catholic Directory #2980); the Sisters of the Congregation De Notre Dame (CND) was the first religious community of women founded in North America. It was established at Montreal, Canada, by Saint Marguerite BOURGEOYS who, at the request of the governor of Montreal, opened the first school in Ville Marie, as the colony was originally called. This was in 1658, 16 years after the founding of the colony. Despite ecclesiastical opposition, she held firmly to the concept of an uncloistered congregation of simple vows, dedicated to Our Lady, following the Rule of St. Augustine, and committed to the work of education. Mother Bourgeois' company of school mistresses of Montreal was composed of recruits from France, Canadian-born girls, two former Indian pupils, and, in 1696, Lydia Longley, the first woman from the English colonies to join their ranks. Their society acquired legal status in 1671 with letters patent from Louis XIV. On Aug. 6, 1676, they attained ecclesiastical status as the Congregation de Notre Dame of Montreal by approbation of François de Montmorency Laval, Bishop of Quebec, and on June 24, 1698, received approbation of the rule that Mother Bourgeois had formulated. Final papal recognition of the community was granted when the constitutions were approved by Leo XIII in 1892.

The first foundation in the U.S. was made at Bourbonnais, IL, in 1860. By 1890 there were ten foundations in Illinois, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Maine, and New York. These and subsequent foundations formed, in 1946, a U.S. province with headquarters in Staten Island, NY. The motherhouse is in Montreal, Canada.

Bibliography: Histoire de la Congrégation de Notre Dame de Montréal, 10 v. (Montreal 1941).

[R. M. DONAHUE/EDS.]

NOTRE DAME DE NAMUR, SISTERS OF

(S.N.D.deN., Official Catholic Directory #3000); an international congregation of pontifical right, organized into 20 provinces located in Europe, Africa, Asia, and the Americas.

Saint Marie Rose Julie BILLIART founded the congregation in Amiens, France, in 1804, in response to post-Revolutionary poverty, widespread illiteracy, and the struggle of the Roman Catholic Church in France to reestablish itself. Convinced that education was a universal right, she dedicated the congregation to the education of the poor. With the assistance of the cofoundress, Françoise Blin de Bourdon, she spent the next 12 years shaping her vision into a systematic program of formal schooling for poor girls. The success of the early schools led to a rapid expansion so that at her death in 1816, Julie Billiart had established 19 schools in five dioceses of northwest France and Belgium.

She applied her innovative spirit to the organization of the congregation, creating structures that would be adaptive and responsive to emerging apostolic opportunities. Her approach envisioned a work that would not be limited to any one diocese, that would depend upon the leadership of women in the person of a superior general, and that eliminated the distinction between choir and lay sisters. This mode of organization occasioned misunderstanding with the bishop of Amiens, John Francis Demandolx, which led to Billiart's dismissal from the diocese and the relocation of the motherhouse to Namur, Belgium, where the congregation had already established a flourishing foundation.

The second generation, under the leadership of Françoise Blin de Bourdon, faced challenges arising from the decision of the Congress of Vienna in 1815 to create the Kingdom of the Netherlands by incorporating Roman Catholic Belgium into the newly formed state ruled by the Calvinist William of Orange. Determined to minimize Roman Catholic influence in Belgium, the Dutch government launched an attack on Belgian schools through increasingly hostile regulations. Successfully meeting the demands of the new regulations, the sisters made the transition from the limited educational program Billiart had designed to a more complex one, thus hastening the professionalization of the congregation's education system. In meeting Dutch demands, the congregation implemented rigorous standards for teacher training, accepted curricular development as essential for the adaptation to changing times and local circumstances, and provided, as far as possible, the resources to maintain the financial independence of its schools.

Facade of the convent of Notre Dame de Namur, Cincinnati, Ohio, the first U.S. foundation of the congregation.

To the United States and the World. Within this emerging system, the congregation strengthened its schools and created a flexible approach that the sisters transferred to the United States and Great Britain when the period of expansion from Belgium began in the 1840s. Accepting the invitation of Bishop John Purcell of Cincinnati, eight Belgian sisters established a foundation in his diocese in 1840 and under the leadership of Sister Louise VanDerSchrieck initiated a period of rapid movement eastward from Cincinnati to Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Washington, D.C. In 1844, inspired by the zeal of Pierre DeSmet, S.J., another missionary group left Belgium for Oregon, where the sisters remained until being transferred to California in 1852. The first foundation in Great Britain opened at Penryn in Cornwall in 1845 and relocated to London in 1848. During the 1850s, in quick succession, foundations opened in Liverpool, Manchester, and Sheffield. In order to meet the demand for teachers in these urban areas, the sisters opened a teacher training college at Mt. Pleasant in Liverpool in 1856, directed by Sister Mary of St. Philip Lescher. By the 1890s these established provinces had developed missionary interests in Africa and in East Asia, which led to foundations in the Congo in 1894, Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) in 1899, South Africa in 1907, Japan in 1924, and China in 1929. A second wave of overseas missionary activity occurred after World War II in Africa and South America. The need for teachers in newly independent African nations resulted in foundations in Nigeria in 1963 and in Kenya in 1965. In response to the 1961 Vatican appeal to the U.S. Church to give 10 percent of its personnel to Latin America, the congregation established foundations in Brazil in 1963 and in Peru in 1970. With the exception of the Chinese houses that were suppressed in 1949, each of these former missions has become an independent unit within the congregation, responsible for the recruitment, formation, and education of its sisters, for the development of its ministries, and for its governance.

The cumulative impact of changes occurring in the second half of the 20th century created new understandings of the role of the Church in the world. The Sister Formation Movement in the United States, the consequences of World War II in Europe and in Japan, and the experience of the liberation struggles in Africa created an awareness of international and social issues that prepared sisters to be receptive to the decrees of Vatican II. In response, therefore, to Perfectae Caritatis (1965), the council decree calling religious communities to reform and renewal, and to Ecclesiae Sanctae (1966) enjoining them to convene special general chapters as agents of renewal, the Special General Chapter of 1968–1969 engaged the congregation in a lengthy period of experimentation culminating in the approved constitutions of 1989. During this 20-year period the community developed a heightened appreciation of Billiard's spirituality and recovered her emphasis on education with a preference for the poor. Sensitive to the challenge to "read the signs of the times," the congregation has supported an expansive understanding of its commitment to education that values diverse expressions of teaching and learning, all directly or indirectly in service to the poor. This new understanding has enabled sisters to enlarge the scope of their ministries and to respond to contemporary needs in a multiplicity of ways, including work in parish and diocesan religious education and liturgical programs and justice and peace programs; work with immigrants, refugees, migrants, the homeless, and the unemployed; and service in hospital ministry, in hospice care, and as chaplains and tutors in prison ministry. Sisters also serve as attorneys, canon lawyers, doctors, nurses, social workers, superintendents of schools, and vicars of religious.

Provinces continue to sponsor formal education at all levels and sisters continue to serve in diocesan school systems as teachers and administrators. The congregation also sponsors four colleges and a junior college. The oldest of its colleges in the United States, Trinity College, was chartered in 1897; Emmanuel College was founded in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1919; Notre Dame de Namur University in Belmont, California, chartered in 1868, began to offer a four-year baccalaureate program in 1951. In 1949 the Japanese province established a four-year college in Okayama that is now Notre Dame Seishin University, and in 1961 opened Notre Dame Junior College in Hiroshima. During the final decades of the 20th century, the three U.S. colleges evolved from traditional undergraduate liberal arts colleges into comprehensive universities; they have introduced programs for working adults at the undergraduate level, have strengthened and expanded their graduate programs in education, and have introduced professional programs at the graduate level ranging from pastoral ministry to health care promotion. The transformation of the colleges is also evident in the shift in administrative leadership as laywomen and laymen replace sisters of Notre Dame in these positions.

The Special General Chapter of 1969 and successive chapters have fostered the internationality of the congregation; leadership at the general level actively promotes this emphasis by sponsoring an extensive array of international meetings that touch upon every aspect of community life, including renewal programs on the spirituality of Billiard, formation, finance, and archives. Continental meetings and pre-general chapter gatherings provide corporate reflection on the emerging general chapter issues. These meetings engender a spirit of interdependence and appreciation for the diversity of cultures, lifestyles, and theologies that exist within the congregation.

Bibliography: F. BLIN, The Memoirs of Frances Blin de Bourdon, SNDdeN, ed. T. SULLIVAN, et al. (Westminster, Md. 1975). F. ROSNER and L. TINSLEY, eds., The Letters of St. Julie Billiard, 7 v. (Rome 1975). C. CLAIR, La Bienheureuse Mere Julie Billiard (Paris 1906). M. LINSKOTT, Quiet Revolution (Glasgow 1975). L. QUINET, Vie de la Reverende Mere Julie (Paris 1862).

[J. BLAND]

NOTRE DAME DE SION, CONGREGATION OF

(Official Catholic Directory #2950); a religious community of women founded in France in 1846 by the RATISBONNE brothers, Marie Théodore, and Marie Alphonse. It has for its aim the promotion of true understanding between Christians and Jews. This work assumes many forms. The religious strive to break down the barriers of anti-Semitism by presenting a true picture of Jews and Judaism, and by giving non-Jews a profound respect for the people from whom Christ Himself chose to come. At the same time, they try to show to the Jews the true meaning of Christianity so often distorted by misguided zeal and lack of understanding on the part of Christians. The congregation, which has its generalate in Rome, has provinces on five continents. The Sisters of Sion have been teaching in the U.S. since 1892. The American provincial headquarters is in Kansas City, MO.

[M. DOLAN/EDS.]

NOTRE DAME DU LAC, UNIVERSITY OF

Founded 1842 by the Rev. Edward F. Sorin and a small band of religious brothers, all members of the Congregation of HOLY CROSS. This congregation of priests, brothers, and sisters, with the Holy Family as their patrons, had been founded in Le Mans, France, a decade before by the Rev. Basil A. Moreau, and the Holy Cross priests, brothers, and sisters have continued to serve the university to the present. The land on which the university was founded, 524 acres in northern Indiana, 80 miles east of Chicago and 180 miles west of Detroit, had originally been purchased by the Rev. Stephen T. Badin, the first priest ordained in the United States, and had subsequently been given to the local bishop. The bishop offered the land—including two small lakes, the basis of the university's official name, Notre Dame du Lac—to Father Sorin on condition that he establish a school, and this original grant has been divided and expanded over the years into the present 1,250-acre campus.

The school made steady progress in its first decades and, by the time of Father Sorin's death in 1893, had a student enrollment of 540 and a faculty of 52 on a campus of 24 buildings. Although chartered as a university by the State of Indiana in 1844, at least half of these students were in the preparatory department or high school, another 150 in the minims department or elementary school, and approximately 35 were apprentices in the manual labor school. Six courses of study were open to the college students: the classical course (general humanities), the scientific course, the English or belles-lettres course, law, civil engineering, and the commercial course, although this last was primarily a high school program. A master of arts degree was offered as early as 1859 on completion of three years of study in philosophy and literature beyond the bachelor's degree.

To demonstrate his patriotism in face of the anti-Catholic and anti-immigrant prejudice of the 19th century, Father Sorin scheduled early graduation ceremonies for the Fourth of July and named one of his first academic buildings Washington Hall. Seven priests from Notre Dame served as chaplains in the Civil War and one of them, the Rev. William Corby, CSC, gave general absolution to New York's famed Irish Brigade before the Battle of Gettysburg, an incident commemorated to this day by a statue of the priest on that battlefield. Notre Dame claimed a number of firsts in the latter half of the 19th century: in 1869 its Law School was the first on a Catholic campus; in the 1880s it was the first American college campus to be lighted by electricity; in 1888 it became the first Catholic university to open a residence hall with individual rooms for students (Sorin Hall); and in 1899 it was the scene of the first wireless telegraphic message sent in the United States.

In 1879, after a devastating fire, construction of the present administration building was begun, to be crowned with its famed golden dome in 1882. In 1888 the campus church, dedicated to the Sacred Heart, was completed, an impressive Gothic structure with stained-glass windows crafted by Carmelite sisters in France, murals painted by the Vatican artist Luigi Gregori, and the high altar designed by Froc-Robert of Paris. By the turn of the century, the university's most significant contributions to scholarship were probably the treatises on faith and evolution by the Rev. John A. Zahm, CSC, and the early aerodynamic studies of his younger brother, Dr. Albert Zahm.

The 20th Century. Major changes occurred in the early decades of the 20th century. The manual labor school was terminated in 1917, a summer session program was begun in 1918, the preparatory department or high school was closed in 1924, and the minims department or elementary school was eliminated in 1929, leaving Notre Dame for the first time an institution of exclusively higher education. The Rev. James A. Burns, CSC, president from 1919 to 1922, divided the college courses into five distinct colleges, each presided over by a dean. A committee on graduate study oversaw all graduate courses and degrees. With the impending loss of revenue from high school tuition, Father Burns undertook a major fund-raising campaign, completed it successfully, and organized a lay board of trustees to help manage the newly established endowment. The success of the school's football teams in the 1920s under the legendary coach Knute Rockne brought additional revenue and national fame. In the 1930s, during the presidency of the Rev. John F. O'Hara, CSC, later the cardinal-archbishop of Philadelphia, the faculty was strengthened by the addition of several European scholars fleeing Nazi domination: the mathematicians Karl Menger and Emil Artin, the physicists Arthur Haas and Eugene Guth, and the political scientists Ferdinand Hermans and Waldemar Gurian. During World War II the U.S. Navy was invited to set up V-7 and V-12 programs, and an estimated 11,000 naval officers completed their training on campus.

The Hesburgh Years. The decades following World War II were years of major growth and development, especially during the presidency of the Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, CSC, 1952–87. Student enrollment jumped from less than 5,000 to 9,600, the teaching and research faculty from 389 to 803, and the annual budget from $10 million to $176 million. The endowment increased from $9 million to $350 million, chiefly from several successful fund-raising drives and annual gift-giving of devoted alumni. By 1987 faculty salaries ranked in the highest quartile of the American Association of University Professors standings, and Notre Dame was consistently listed among the 25 best schools in the US News and World Report's influential survey. Over 30 new buildings were constructed, including ten residence halls and 11 academic buildings, in addition to major renovations of existing buildings.

Academic life and scholarly research were enhanced with the establishment of wide-ranging institutes: the Center for the Study of Contemporary Society, the Helen Kellogg Institute for International Studies, the Center for Civil and Human Rights, the Cushwa Center for the Study of American Catholicism, the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, and the Ecumenical Institute for Advanced Theological Studies in Jerusalem. The manuscript treasures of the Ambrosian Library in Milan were microfilmed for deposit at Notre Dame, as were documents pertinent to the United States in the Vatican's Propagation of the Faith Archives. A distinguished professors program was inaugurated to attract nationally and internationally renowned scholars to endowed chairs. Nine foreign study programs were begun, and a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa was installed in 1968.

In 1967 ultimate governance of the university was transferred from the Congregation of Holy Cross to a board of fellows (six Holy Cross priests and six laymen or women) and a predominantly lay board of trustees. In 1972 the university opened its doors for the first time to undergraduate women. Student unrest and anti-Vietnam War protests broke out in the late 1960s and early 1970s but on a much smaller scale than elsewhere, and the football success and national acclaim achieved by earlier coaches Knute Rockne and Frank Leahy continued under coaches Ara Parseghian in the 1960s and Lou Holtz in the 1980s.

Notre Dame at Century's End. The university continued its expansion under Father Hesburgh's successor, the Rev. Edward A. Malloy, CSC. Under the Board of Fellows and the Board of Trustees, the president is aided in guiding the university by a provost, an executive vice president, and nine other vice presidents. There were four undergraduate colleges (Arts and Letters, Science, Engineering, and Mendoza College of Business), the School of Architecture, the First Year of Studies, and the Law School. The student body at the end of the 20th century numbered 10,500. Of these, 8,000 were undergraduates, 1,500 were in graduate school, and another 1,000 were in the graduate professional programs of law, business, or divinity. Approximately 54 percent of the undergraduates were men and 46 percent women. Scholarly journals published at the university included the American Jour- nal of Jurisprudence, American Midland Naturalist, American Philosophical Quarterly, Bullán, Journal of Musicology, New Scholasticism, Notre Dame Journal of Formal Logic, Review of Politics, and U.S. Catholic Historian. The University of Notre Dame Press remains the largest Catholic university press in the world.

Religion has retained a central place in university life. Approximately 85 percent of the undergraduates are Catholic and 50 percent of the faculty includes Holy Cross priests, brothers, and sisters, as well dedicated Catholic laypersons. The university's Laetare Medal is awarded each year to an outstanding American Catholic.

Bibliography: T. J. SCHLERETH, The University of Notre Dame: A Portrait of Its History and Campus (Notre Dame 1976). A. J. HOPE, Notre Dame: One Hundred Years (Notre Dame 1943). P. S. MOORE, Academic Development, University of Notre Dame: Past, Present and Future (Notre Dame 1960). R. P. SCHMUHL, The University of Notre Dame: A Contemporary Portrait (Notre Dame 1986). T. T. MCAVOY, Father O'Hara of Notre Dame: The Cardinal-Archbishop of Philadelphia (Notre Dame 1967); "Notre Dame, 1919-1922: The Burns Revolution," Review of Politics 25 (October 1963) 431-450. T. M. HESBURGH, God, Country, Notre Dame (New York 1990). M. O'BRIEN, Hesburgh: A Biography (Washington, D.C. 1998). R. E. WEBER, Notre Dame's John Zahm (Notre Dame 1961).

[T. E. BLANTZ]

NOTRE DAME SISTERS

Formerly known as the School Sisters de Notre Dame (ND, Official Catholic Directory #2960), a pontifical religious congregation dedicated to strengthening family life, especially through various forms of educational work in Midwestern United States. The headquarters of this American province, one of four in the congregation, is in Omaha, Nebraska. The congregation traces its origins to Loffaine, France, where in 1597 (Blessed) Alix LeClerc and (St.) Peter Fourier organized a religious congregation of women to educate young girls, specifically the poor.

Two centuries later, Fr. Gabriel Schneider (d. 1867) collaborated with M. Karoline Gerhardinger to bring a branch of the School Sisters of Notre Dame from Germany to Bohemia, again to educate the poor, especially neglected girls. When this partnership did not come to completion, Fr. Gabriel began his own congregation of the Poor School Sisters de Notre Dame on Aug. 15, 1853. After its beginnings in Hirschau, it moved its headquarters to Horazdovice, where it remained until in 1950 when communism forced the sisters to relocate to Javornik. Today the general motherhouse is located in Hradec Karlovec, in the Czech Republic.

In 1910 many bishops invited the congregation to come to the United States to care for the spiritual needs of the Czech immigrants. Mother Qualberta Krivanec led five sisters to Fenton, Missouri, to take charge of an orphanage there. As new members joined, they moved to Omaha, Nebraska, where they established their headquarters. In these early years, they assisted Fr. Edward J. FLANAGAN in the formative years of Boys Town. With continued growth they staffed schools in Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, and South Dakota.

The Notre Dame Sisters (so called in the United States to distinguish them from the SSND groups) are called to strengthen family life through education, counseling, nursing, archdiocesan and parish work, and missionary work. They advocate for non-violence in all areas of their ministries. They also advocate for the elderly, especially through Seven Oaks of Florence, an independent living complex for low-income and frail elderly in Omaha. They are located in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, South Dakota, Nebraska and Honduras.

[M. HICKEY]

NOUMENA

A term used by philosophers, and mainly by Kantians, to designate objects that cannot be sensibly perceived and can only be mentally apprehended. This article sketches the pre-Kantian usages and then explains and criticizes the place of the term in KANTIANISM.

Pre-Kantian Usages. The word noumena (Gr. νοούμενα) is encountered in PLATO in several passages (Rep. 508C, 509D; Parm. 132C; Tim. 30D, 51D) and designates ideas of which it is said explicitly that they can be grasped only mentally and not sensibly (Rep. 507B; Tim. 51D). The only things accessible to sensible visualization, for Plato, are those that are subject to multiplicity and becoming; these do not exist in the full sense of the word, and form the τύπος ὁρατός (Rep. 532D). The Ideas, on the contrary, constitute the τύπος νοητός (Rep. 508C) and are the only true being (Phaedrus 247C, 249C; Tim. 28A), which, as such, is eternal and immutable and can be apprehended only mentally by reminiscence and dialectics. This is especially true of the original source of all ideas, of absolute goodness and absolute beauty—the beautiful and good in every respect that fully encompass all beauty and goodness (Symp. 210E-211D; Rep. 509B).

In Aristotle, the term noumena is encountered in one passage only (Meta. 1074b 36–1075a 5), where it is used three times; elsewhere, the term νοητά is employed in the same sense (e.g., Anim. 431b 20–432a 14). More specifically, Aristotle distinguishes what can be mentally comprehended from what can be sensibly perceived; on actuation, the latter coincides with sense PERCEPTION in the same way as the former with simple APPREHENSION (Meta. 1075a 3–5; Anim. 431b 22–23). Contrary to Plato, Aristotle holds that what can be apprehended only mentally is not separated from sensible phenomena, but is contained in phenomena and is to be sought in them (Anim. 432a 3–5). Thus the mind extracts essences from visible things (ibid. 431b 2); the essential forms inherent in such things therefore take the place of Plato's transcending Ideas. The apprehension of the noumena, which is a kind of INTUITION in Plato, appears thus as an ABSTRACTION in Aristotle. It is perfected by a reasoning process that ascends to the highest noumena, i.e., the Divine as eternal, immovable, and separate (Meta. 1026a 10–30).

St. THOMAS AQUINAS, working through St. AUGUSTINE as an intermediary, effected a synthesis of Plato and Aristotle. The noumena inherent in things (intelligibilia) are essences, and, above all, BEING; they are grasped by abstraction. Their bases, as transcendental noumena, are the archetypal ideas of the divine intellect, which, in turn, are founded upon the archnoumenon, i.e., upon God as the subsistent being; man ascends to this conclusion by metaphysical discourse.

Kantian Notion. According to I. Kant, noumena must be distinguished from PHENOMENA; the latter are called “phenomena, in so far as they are thought as objects according to the unity of the categories” (Critique of Pure Reason A 248). In this text, as opposed to ordinary usage, phenomena are distinguished from appearances; the distinction, however, must be correctly understood. When one says: “The senses represent objects as they appear, the understanding as they are, the latter statement” must “be understood in the empirical meaning” (ibid. A 258), i.e., as objects-for-man. On the contrary, the term “noumena (intelligibilia)” is applied to those things “which are merely objects of understanding, and which, nevertheless, can be perceived as such by intuition, though not by sensible intuition (therefore, coram intuitu intellectuali)” (ibid. A 249). Man's concepts themselves can never determine an object; for this purpose, an intuition is needed to supplement such concepts, and for man this can only be sensible. Man has no intellectual intuition that would make possible the “transcendental use” of his concepts, i.e., a use that would reach the thing-in-itself “beyond the sphere of possible experience” (ibid. A 248). The noumena are ordered to this usage, which is “not contradictory” (ibid. A 254), since they are “merely a limiting concept” (ibid. A 255); one encounters them not as “intelligible objects” but merely as “a problem” (ibid. A 256). But they are not an “arbitrary invention” (ibid. A 255); on the contrary, they are “necessary” (ibid. A 254), although only of “negative use” (ibid. A 255) “in order to impose a limit upon the presumptions of sensibility” (ibid.). Here, moreover, one should “prevent sensible intuition from being extended to things in themselves,” and one should not claim that “sensibility is the only possible mode of intuition” (ibid. A254). As a consequence, “our understanding attains in this way a sort of negative extension, i.e., it is not limited by, but rather limits, sensibility by giving the name of noumena to things, not considered as phenomena, but as things in themselves. But our understanding imposes also limits upon itself, recognizing that it cannot know these noumena by means of the categories; hence, it is compelled to think of them merely as of an unknown something” (ibid. A 256).

Beyond this usage lies that of the moral order, which shows man “as a being endowed with internal freedom (homo noumenon)” (Metaphysik der Sitten, Berlin Academy ed., 6:418), and which can give to his “causality as a noumenon” (Critique of Practical Reason; ibid. 5:50) “for the first time objective, although only practical, reality” (ibid. 48).

By way of evaluation, it may be said that Kant loses the synthesis characteristic of Aquinas by disregarding the process of abstraction that obtains the noumena, i.e., essences and being, from the phenomena. At the same time, he returns to Plato by assuming that the noumena are accessible to intellectual intuition alone, an accessibility that he justly denies to man.

See Also: CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF

Bibliography: I. KANT, Prolegomena, §§32–35. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:271–73. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946– ) 6:267–72. A. CARBINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:940–42.

[J. B. LOTZ]

NOVATIAN (ANTIPOPE) AND NOVATIANISM

Pontificate: 251. Novatian was the first, and for a long time the only, writer of the Roman Church to use Latin. The little that is known of his life is dependent on untrustworthy information supplied by his enemies. His name was certainly Novatianus, not Novatus as given by the Greeks. He must have been born c. 200, and received a good education in Latin, as his language attests, but he was not a Phrygian as Philostorgius asserts (Ecclesiastical History 8.15).

Pope Cornelius. In his letter to Bp. Fabius of Antioch, Pope CORNELIUS furnishes information on the baptism, ordination, and later conduct of Novatian (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.43.6–22) that is at least questionable. It may be true that he received Baptism by sprinkling during a severe sickness, but it is hardly credible that his ordination was performed despite the opposition of the clergy and many of the laity or that he hid himself during a persecution, refusing to give priestly assistance to his suffering fellow Christians. If these contentions are true, it is difficult to understand how he became the administrator of the Roman college of priests after the martyr death of Pope FABIAN (Jan. 20, 50). As such, he wrote letters to the Church throughout the world, of which two to St. CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE have been preserved (Cyprian, Epistolae 30, 36; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3:2).

Novatian as Bishop. After the election of Cornelius as the new pope in March or April of 251, Novatian had himself consecrated a bishop by three south Italian bishops, certainly not merely through foolish ambition as his enemies asserted; otherwise he would not have had the support of many clerics and contemporary confessors (Cyprian, Epistolae 46; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.43); but rather as a protest against the compliant attitude of the new pope on the question of penance.

Roman Synod. In an encyclical letter to the other bishops, Novatian announced his consecration (Cyprian, Epistolae 55; Ad Novat. 13). That same year a Roman synod of 60 bishops excommunicated him (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.43.2). The confessors made their peace with Pope Cornelius (Cyprian, Epistolae 53; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum [Vienna 1866–] 3), and, after some hesitation, Cyprian and the bishops of Asia Minor unanimously deserted Novatian (Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History 3.8). Nevertheless, he was able to propagate his church with his own bishops in every sector of the Christian world.

In the persecution under Gallus and Volusianus (251–253), Novatian had to flee Rome, and under Valerian in 258 he suffered martyrdom (Pacian, Epistolae 2.7), or at least became a confessor (Socrates, Ecclesiastical History 4.28). In 1932 a tombstone was discovered on the Via Tiburtina with the inscription: Novatiano Beatissimo/Martyri Gaudentius Diac[onus]/fec[it]; however, the relationship is questionable. The MARTYROLOGY OF JEROME cites a Roman martyr named Novatianus for June 27 or 29, but without a title.

Writings. Novatian’s writings do not merely show him to have been an elegant stylist, but they likewise manifest a good theological and philosophical education. Of the nine works listed by Jerome (De vir. ill. 70), only two have been preserved: one of them, his chief work, the De Trinitate, is basically apologetic in character and brings the teaching on the Trinity down to his time. In it he defends the oneness of Almighty God, and God the Creator, against the Gnostics (see GNOSTICISM); Christ as the Son of God the Creator, against Marcion; Christ as true man, against the Docetists; as true God, against the Adoptionists (see ADOPTIONISM); and as Second Person to the Father, against Sabellius (see SABELLIANISM); and he demonstrates, after a hymn of praise to the Holy Spirit, that despite the Godhood of Christ, there is only one God. The Holy Spirit is considered as unequal to the Father, but on this point Novatian merely reflects the consensus of Trinitarian theology of the third century.

His alleged angelology, as well as his supposed teaching on the absorption of Son in the Father, is a misunderstanding. Since he did not distinguish between the substantial attributes of the Godhood and the properties of the Persons, he could only preserve the Oneness of God through a SUBORDINATIONISM; all the more so, since he sees God not from an ontological viewpoint, but rather in the aspect of His power. Still his work is an improvement over that of Tertullian and Hippolytus

Opposition To the Church. Cause of the Strife. Novatian's dispute with the Church stemmed from the problem concerning the reception into the Church of those who had fallen in persecution. In his two letters to Cyprian, he praised Cyprian's refusal to grant a pardon to the lapsi before the end of the persecution, except in cases involving danger of death. Thus far one could go along with him, but as the sharpness of his first letter had caused some estrangement, so the second went beyond the limit. Novatian saw in Cyprian's temporary solution, not merely a cautionary measure, but a fundamental challenge. He thus betrayed the rigorism of an earlier period of which, at Rome, Callistus, and, in Africa, Agrippius, had broken through the first barriers. Behind Novatian's attitude there was a different conception of the Church.

If, with Cyprian, one believed that only an unconditional membership in the Church was a guarantee of eternal salvation, one would act differently than if, with Novatian, he believed the Church should be announced as a community of saints who must be kept free of all taint. While Cyprian saw in the refusal to grant pardon a prejudgment involving eternal damnation, Novatian believed that God's judgment would be compromised through pardon, since the way to God's mercy led through penance, compunction, and sorrow.

De Cibis Judaicis. This work, which has been preserved and is mentioned by Jerome, was written to Novatian's community from a distance. Here Novatian shows that the Old Testament prohibitions regarding food are to be understood in a spiritual and not in a literal sense. In particular, it is the vices symbolized by impure animals that should be avoided. The taste of their flesh is not forbidden, but rather the flesh of sacrifice. A particular chapter is directed against the immorality of early morning drinking.

Other writings listed by Jerome are lost, but apparently Novatian is the author of two works that have been preserved under the name of Cyprian. In a De spectaculis, the author is dependent on Cyprian and Tertullian for his condemnation of Christian attendance at spectacles and advises his readers to meditate instead on the beauties in nature and on the word of God. In a De bono pudicitiae, he praises virginity, continence in marriage, and marital fidelity.

Novatianist Churches. Thanks to his animated activity (Cyprian, Epistolae 55.24) and his rigorism, which later led his followers to deny the forgiveness of all grave sins after Baptism (Socrates, Ecclesiastical History 5.22), Novatian won a large following. Marcian of Arles went over to his side; and even in Spain, Rome, and Africa, there were Novatian communities with their own bishops. On their return to the Church, a dispute over Baptism broke out in Africa.

In the East, it was above all in Phrygia, where the Montanists had prepared the way, that almost all the greater cities had Novatian bishops; Constantine I invited the Novatian Bishop of Constantinople, Acesius, to attend the Council of Nicaea (Socrates, Ecclesiastical History 1.10). Their acceptance of the HOMOOUSIOS and their good relations with the Catholics won them longstanding sufferance in Constantinople (Socrates, ibid. 5.10). Cyril fought against them in Alexandria (Socrates, ibid. 7.7), and in Rome, they were opposed by Popes Innocent I and Celestine I.

In the West, the Novatians gradually submitted to the larger Church, and we hear of the return of a bishop with his whole community (Leo I, Epistolae 12.6). In the East they held out longer. Eulogius of Alexandria directed a large work against them, but cooperation between Church and State forced them to disappear, at first in the cities and then in the country, and by the end of the seventh century the last communities were extinct.

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:816–849. Cyprianische Untersuchungen (Bonn 1926) 403–406. M. SIMONETTI, “Alcune osservazioni sul De Trinitate di Novaziano,” Studi in onore di Angelo Monteverdi, 2 v. (Modena 1959) 2:771–783. F. SCHEIDWEILER, Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 55 (1954–55) 126–139. C. MOHRMANN, “Les Origines de la Latinité chrétienne à Rome,” Vigiliae christianae 3 (1949) 67–106, 163–183. R. J. DISIMONE, trans. On the Trinity (Fathers of the Church 64; Washington, D.C. 1974). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 2.819–820. H. GINZLOW, Cyprian und Novatian (Tübingen 1974). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New

Worshippers caress a statue of Christ as part of a novena at Baclaran Church in the Philippines. (Catherine Karnow/CORBIS)

York 1986), 18–19. P. MATTEI, ‘L’anthropologie de Novatien,’ Revue des Études Augustiniennes 38 (1992), 235–239.

[P. H. WEYER]

NOVENA

Nine successive days of prayer, private or public, to obtain special favors or graces. It differs from an octave, or the eight days of prayerful celebration that follow certain feasts, because the octave has a place in the liturgy that the novena (which generally precedes a feast with which it may be associated) has not. Moreover, the octave is celebrated in a more festal spirit, whereas the novena tends to be marked by a feeling of urgent need and yearning. The novena can be considered a triple TRIDUUM, involving a more prolonged concentration of devotion and spiritual effort.

The nine days that the Apostles spent in Jerusalem at the command of the Lord as they awaited the coming of the Holy Spirit (Lk 24.49; Acts 1.4) has been suggested as a scriptural prototype of the novena, but this devotion was first introduced not as an exercise preparatory to an event of great spiritual significance but as the observance of a period of mourning. The Greeks and the Romans, as well as other peoples of antiquity, were accustomed to observe nine days of mourning (novendialia), with a special feast on the ninth day, after a death or burial. This practice was adopted by Christians, but with Christian rather than pagan forms of observance. Nevertheless, the pagan origin of the custom gave offense to some, and protest eventually led to the substitution of a seven-day mourning period, seven being the number of the days of the Christian week and therefore considered to have greater religious significance. However, a vestige of the earlier practice remains in the novendialia, or Pope’s Novena, still observed after the death of a supreme pontiff. In the Middle Ages a like period was often observed after the death of other wealthy or noble individuals, but except for the novenas of Masses and prayers for the departed, this custom has fallen into disuse.

The devotional novena for the purpose of special prayers to gain some needed grace or to prepare for the celebration of some special occasion with greater solemnity made its appearance in the early Middle Ages. It began in France and Spain with a preparation of nine days for the feast of Christmas, the number nine representing the months Our Lord had spent in His mother's womb. The O ANTIPHONS that begin on December 17 are probably a vestigial survival in the liturgy of this ancient practice.

Preparatory novenas of this kind came in time to be celebrated in connection with other occasions, especially the feasts of popular saints or of Our Lady, and they were often undertaken publicly and with much external solemnity. Because Our Lady under various titles and the saints were popularly esteemed for their intercessory powers with respect to particular kinds of blessings, novenas came to be times of special supplication in which the devout sought favors such as could be hoped for through the intercession of the saints who were honored. Very often the favor sought was the recovery of health, and in times when medical science had little comfort or hope to offer those afflicted with disease it is understandable that people should turn so readily to heavenly intercessors for healing and protection.

Novenas have been attacked as superstitious, partly because of the peculiar efficacy the practice seems to attach to the number nine, and partly because of the many extraordinary and even miraculous effects with which some novenas have been credited. No doubt the possibility of superstitious abuse exists and it should be guarded against, and no other effectiveness should be attributed to novena prayers as such than is attributable to devout prayer earnestly and perseveringly undertaken in other forms. There is nothing doctrinally objectionable in the idea of a novena; on the contrary, it is a practice that can be most serviceable to true devotion and piety. Perseverance and constancy are qualities of all good prayer, and it is well that some devotional practices should give special emphasis to them by requiring repetition on successive days over a more or less extended period of time, for this manifests and stimulates the worshiper's earnestness and fervor. That one should pray more confidently and hope for special graces by the use of such means is not unreasonable.

The novena grew out of popular piety, and it was not until the 19th century that the Church recommended the practice by the granting of indulgences.

Bibliography: J. HILGERS, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 11:141–144. F.

BERINGER, Die Ablässe, ihr Wesen und Gebrauch, 2 v. (Paderborn 1921) 1:638–644. Enchiridion indulgentiarum (Rome 1952).

[P. K. MEAGHER]

NOVITIATE, CANON LAW OF

The novitiate is the required probationary period prior to profession of vows in a religious institute during which time the aspiring religious is initiated into the life of the particular institute and his or her call (vocation) to this institute verified. Because of the importance of novitiate for religious life, its major components and conditions are prescribed by the universal law of the Church (e.g., Codex iuris canonici, Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, and Potissimum institutioni, CICLSAL, March 2, 1990, AAS 82 (1990) 472–532); the proper law of each institute specifies and supplements the universal law. A period of probation is also required of candidates prior to incorporation into a secular institute or society of apostolic life; such groups, however, are not bound by the norms that follow as these groups are free to determine for themselves the manner and duration of the probationary period.

A period of probation prior to full membership has characterized religious life since its earliest expressions in the post-Apostolic era, but it was the Council of Trent (1545–63 at Sess. 24, cap. 15) that first mandated a one-year period of novitiate for all religious as a requirement for a valid subsequent profession. Current universal law for Latin rite institutes cites the minimum time as 12 months.

This article will consider the novitiate under five main headings: establishment of the novitiate, admission to the novitiate, the novitiate program, duration of the novitiate, and the termination or conclusion of the novitiate. The article will also highlight some significant differences between canonical norms governing Latin rite institutes and those governing institutes of the Eastern rites.

Establishment of Novitiate. In addition to being a period of time, the novitiate also refers to the designated place where the probationary period takes place. By means of a written decree the general or highest superior of the institute authorizes the establishment, transfer to another location, and suppression of a novitiate house. For Latin rite institutes the superior must have the consent of the council to act; for Eastern rite institutes the advice of the council suffices. If the novitiate is to be established as a new foundation, i.e., where no formally established house of the institute exists, the diocesan bishop of the place of establishment must also give written consent. Contrary to prior, more restrictive legislation, the highest superior in Latin rite institutes has authority to establish as many novitiates as are warranted, even more than one in a province if necessary. Independent monasteries, by their nature, have a right to their own novitiates. Over the last century, however, independent monasteries of similar traditions have been encouraged to form federations (Pius XII, Sponsa Christi AAS 43 (1951) 5–24; Perfectae Caritatis 22, AAS 58 (1966) 702–712); where such federations exist a single novitiate common to all monasteries of the given federation may be established.

Novices singing hymns. (©Ted Streshinsky/CORBIS)

The novitiate or period of probation generally takes place in a location designated by formal decree as the novitiate house. Several exceptions, however, are possible. In the first, the general superior, with consent of the council for Latin rite institutes and after consulting the council for Eastern rite institutes, may for serious reason permit an individual novice to make the novitiate in another house of the institute under the direction of another religious who assumes the role of director. The second exception, emphasizing the novitiate community rather than the novitiate building, allows for novices as a group to be assigned by the major superior (not necessarily the general superior) to another house of the institute for a certain period. The third exception, articulated only for Latin rite institutes (Codex iuris canonici 648), allows for novices in apostolic institutes whose formation program provides for apostolic experiences to reside outside the novitiate house during such assignments.

Admission to the Novitiate. Life in a religious institute begins with the novitiate and only those suitably prepared and properly disposed should be admitted. The right to admit candidates to the novitiate belongs to that major superior so designated according to the institute's proper law. For valid admission to the novitiate of a Latin rite institute it is required that a candidate be: (1) at least 17 years of age; (2) not bound by an existing marriage bond; (3) not bound by vows or other sacred bonds in another institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life; and (4) forthcoming about, i.e. not concealing, any prior membership in another institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life. In addition, to admit a person to the novitiate is a juridic act and the personal dispositions necessary for placing a valid juridic pertain (Codex iuris canonici 125). Therefore, both the candidate seeking admission and the admitting superior must be free from constraint and admission is invalid if either party acts under force, grave fear, or malice.

Requirements for valid admission to the novitiate in an Eastern rite institute are identical to those for a Latin rite institute with the following exceptions: (1) persons under certain canonical penalty or under legitimate threat of canonical penalty are barred; (2) monastic candidates must be 18 years of age; and (3) concealing one's prior membership in another institute or society of apostolic life is not an invalidating impediment.

In addition to the requirements for validity identified in universal law, the proper law of individual institutes may establish other requirements for valid admission or other conditions. Should an invalidating impediment be detected during the screening process, either a dispensation must be obtained or the admission be refused or deferred. Also should a member of one sui juris rite seek admission to an institute of another rite, an indult of accommodation must first be obtained from the Apostolic See.

Superiors have wide discretion in ascertaining the suitability of candidates for their particular institute. Suitability regarding health, character, and maturity may be established through a combination of personal self-disclosure on the part of the candidate, documentary evidence and further, even secret, inquiries on the part of the superior. Before admission a candidate must present proof of baptism, confirmation, and free status. If the candidate for admission is a cleric, the superior is first to consult with the cleric's proper ordinary. If the candidate had previously been in a seminary or in another institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life, testimony from the former seminary rector or major superior is required. Some assessment of financial solvency is also expected since those burdened by debts that they cannot repay may not be admitted. Other documentation might include medical evaluations, educational transcripts, proof of military service or immigration status, and letters of recommendation. In addition to these requirements for licit admission common to all, candidates for admission to an Eastern rite institute must also be free of family obligations (Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium 452). In seeking the necessary information to arrive at a determination about admission, superiors of Latin rite institutes are admonished to balance the demands of canon 220, avoiding damage to the good reputation of both the candidate and the institute and respecting the candidate's right to privacy.

Admission to the novitiate begins with the celebration of the Rite of Entrance for those in Latin rite institutes and with ceremonies determined in the proper law for Eastern rite institutes.

Novitiate Program. The novitiate is a probationary period, a designated place, and a process. The intense, interactive yet individualized process deepens the novice's lifelong configuration to Christ begun at baptism. The initiation that characterizes the novitiate goes far beyond simple instruction, incorporating physical, moral, intellectual, affective, and especially spiritual dimensions. (Potissimum institutioni, March 2, 1990, AAS 82 (1990) 472–532). It includes formation in the cultivation of human and Christian virtues; prayer; asceticism; liturgy; the teachings of the Church; and the history, life, and rule of the particular institute. As mature and responsible persons the novices share responsibility for their own formation and are expected to collaborate actively with the opportunities and graces of this process.

The novice director, a perpetually professed member of the institute legitimately designated according to proper law, functions directly under the authority of the major superior. The formation plan serves as a guide for the director, and for any persons assigned to assist the director, in discerning and testing the vocation of the novices and leading them gradually into the full life of the institute. The novitiate period is reserved solely for formation and, therefore, all activities in which the novices are involved should directly serve this purpose. Similarly, the novice director should be freed from other responsibilities that could interfere with this primary and critical role.

Duration of the Novitiate. For Latin rite institutes a minimum of 12 months is required for validity of the novitiate, but the institute's proper law may require up to two years. Apostolic institutes of the Latin rite also have the option of requiring, in addition to the minimum of 12 months in the novitiate itself, one or more apostolic experiences outside the novitiate during this probationary period. The duration of the novitiate for religious institutes belonging to the Eastern Catholic churches is similar to that of the Latin rite with the exception of Eastern rite monasteries with no temporary profession; for these monasteries a full and continuous three-year novitiate is required (Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium 457).

Absence from the novitiate is carefully regulated to protect this foundational period of formation, ensuring that the novice has sufficient freedom, accountability, and continuity to accomplish its ends. Current legislation greatly simplifies the question of absence from or interruption of the novitiate. During the basic required 12 months any absence from the designated novitiate house or community that lasts more than three months, from whatever cause, either continuous or interrupted, renders the novitiate invalid. An absence that lasts more than 15 days must be made up.

Under certain limited circumstances the minimum requirement of universal law (12 months) or of the particular institute (which may be up to two years) may be shortened. With the permission of the competent major superior, i.e., either the general superior or another major superior according to the proper law, first profession may be anticipated by up to 15 days. In the extraordinary situation of a novice in danger of death, the novice may be admitted to profession even absent the required time of novitiate. Should the novice recover the vows cease to bind and the novitiate is continued with profession being made in the usual manner.

NOW

Termination or Conclusion of the Novitiate. At any time during the novitiate a novice may freely leave the institute. Similarly, at any time during the novitiate the competent authority may freely dismiss a novice. At the completion of the prescribed novitiate one of three eventualities occurs: (1) if judged suitable, the novice may be admitted to temporary profession; (2) if judged unsuitable for profession, the novice is to be dismissed; or, (3) if there remains a question regarding suitability, the major superior has the option if the proper law permits, of extending the novitiate in a particular case for up to six additional months. For Eastern rite monastics an extension of up to one year is permitted.

[R. SMITH]

NOW

Now, in its secondary and common signification, a slice of time near the present, just gone or immediately impending. It primarily signifies the limit of the timeline or the punctiform divisor distinguishing, but linking, past and future. Because INDIVISIBLE, the now is essentially imperceptible. We conceive it directly, but implicitly, when we define TIME, and by thinking away the divisibility of time, we see that the now is indivisible. A complex proportional resemblance leads to its definition. As time is related to MOTION, so the now is related to mobile being. The alternant now, the temporal correlate of mobile being, is formally other in the diverse phases of time: the now is formally alternant qual alternant. A second and similar definition reads: the now is the number of mobile being; i.e., the alternant now is the formal pluralization of the mobile along the timeline. Because invariant and formal, the now measures times as the arithmetical one measures number.

[J. M. QUINN]

NOWOGRÓDEK, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Also called Sister Maria Stella Adela Mardosewicz and ten Companions; martyrs and members of the Congregation of the Holy Family of Nazareth; S. Maria Stella, b. Ciasnówka, Nieświesk, Poland, Dec. 14, 1888; d. Nowogródek, eastern Poland (now Navahrudak, Belarus), Aug. 1, 1943; beatified in Rome by John Paul II, March 5, 2000.

In 1929, Bishop Zygmunt Łoziński invited the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth to undertake the education of Nowogródek's children and care for the Church of the Transfiguration (Biała Fara). There they established (1931) a school. During the Russian occupation (Sept. 1, 1939, to June 21, 1941), the sisters were barred from their convent and school. When German forces ousted the Russians, the sisters again donned their habits and returned to their ruined Convent of Christ the King.

On July 18, 1943, the Nazis arrested and sentenced 120 citizens to execution by firing squad. The sisters were dedicated to serving families and volunteered to exchange places with the fathers of children. The male hostages were released to their families, although some were interned later in German concentration camps. The second time they offered themselves in place of the only remaining priest in the region. On July 31, 1943 the Gestapo ordered S. Maria Stella and 11 of the 12 sisters (one was working in the hospital at the time of the arrest) to appear at the Gestapo headquarters. Without investigation, they were sentenced to death. The order was carried out the next day, when they were executed in the woods five kilometers from Nowogródek. Initially the martyrs were buried in a common grave. On March 19, 1945, Sister Maria Margaret Malgorzata, the only survivor of the community, oversaw the translation of their mortal remains to the Church of the Transfiguration.

Their process was officially opened in 1991. On June 28, 1999, in addition to the superior, S. Maria Stella, the following were declared martyrs: Paulina Borowik (S. Maria Felicjta, b. Rudna, Lublin, Aug. 30, 1905); Józefa Chrobot (S. Maria Kanuta, b. Raczyn, Wielun, May 22, 1896); Helena Cierpka (S. Maria Gwidona, b. Granowiec, Odalanów, Apr. 11, 1900); Eleanora Józwick (S. Maria Daniela, b. Poizdow, Poldlasie, Jan. 25, 1895); Anna Kokołowicz (Maria Rajmunda, b. Barwasniszk, Vilnius, Aug. 24, 1892); Eugenia Mackiewicz (Maria Kanizja, b. Suwałki, Sept. 9, 1903); Leokadia Matuszewska (Maria Heliadora, b. Stara Huta, Świecie, Feb. 8, 1906); Weronika (Veronica) Narmontowicz (Maria Boromea, b. Wiercieliszki, Grodno, Dec. 18, 1916); Julia Rapiej (Maria Sergia, b. Rogoczyn, Augustów, Aug. 18, 1900); and Jadwiga (Hedwig) Żak (Maria Imelda, b. Oświęcim, Dec. 29, 1892).

At their beatification Pope John Paul II thanked the martyrs for their witness of love, their example of Christian heroism, and their trust in the power of the Holy Spirit: "You are the greatest inheritance of the Congregation of the Holy Family of Nazareth. You are the inheritance of the whole Church of Christ forever." They are patrons of Christian teaching.

Feast: August 1.

Bibliography: A. ZIENKIEWICZ, No Greater Love (Pulaski, Wisc. 1968). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 10 (8 March 2000): 3, 9.

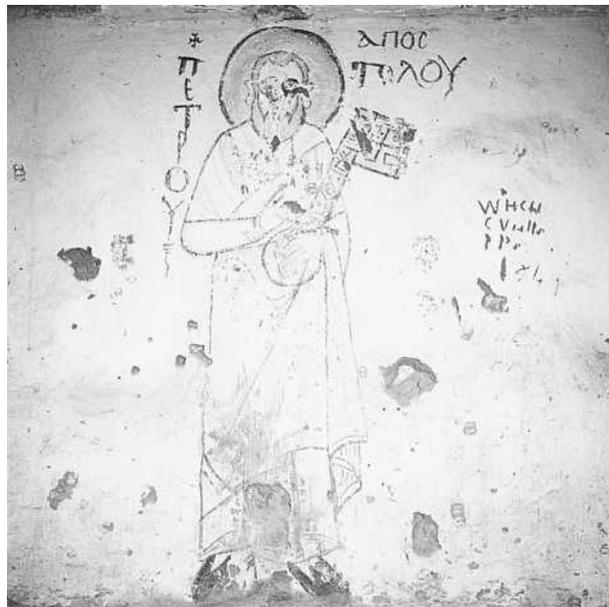

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

NOYES, ALFRED

English poet, critic, and biographer; b. Wolverhampton, Sept. 16, 1880; d. Isle of Wight, June 28, 1958. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He married an American, Garnett Daniels, in 1907; a year after her death (1926) he married Mary Weld-Blundell. His first book of poems, Loom of Years (1902), appeared when he was still at Exeter, and its warm reception determined him to devote his life to poetry. He varied this career with lecturing in the U.S. (1913) and teaching at Columbia University and Princeton (1914–23), with the exception of 1916, when he served in the British Foreign Office. For some years before his death he was afflicted with blindness.

Noyes was a conservative in politics and a traditionalist in poetry. His study of English patriotism led him to devote much of his early verse to Drake and other Elizabethans (e.g., in The Golden Hynde, 1908), a preoccupation that gave his early work an inevitable anti-Catholic tinge. His thought soon after began to center on the need for a philosophia perennis as the basis of civilization, and in his poetic trilogy Torchbearers (1925) he showed how this philosophy had been passed along by the great thinkers of every generation. From this originally secular line of thought he came to see that the supreme expression of this philosophy was to be found in the Catholic Church. He became a Catholic in 1927. His Unknown God (1934) details his intellectual pilgrimage to Rome. His novel No Other Man (1940) was prophetic in dealing with the holocaust wrought by a secret weapon. From his numerous volumes of poetry, Tales of the Mermaid Tavern (1913) and Poems of the New World (1943) may be singled out as displaying his earlier and later styles. Pageant of Letters (1940), essays on English poets from Chaucer to Alice Meynell, is representative of his best literary criticism.

His biography of Voltaire (1936) was delated to the Holy Office of the Vatican and a correction was demanded; Noyes's critic was under the impression that the atheistic views commonly attributed to Voltaire were condoned by the author. Noyes had no trouble in showing that his intention had been to prove that Voltaire held no such views. His poetry (collected edition, New York 1947) is rather old-fashioned in style, but the wide historical perspective he brought to his work marks him as a writer of considerable stature.

Wall painting of St. Peter from Ramses II's temple at Wadi es-Sebua, Egypt. (©Roger Wood/CORBIS)

Bibliography: D. STANFORD, "Alfred Noyes 1880–1958," Catholic World 188 (1959) 297–301. J. E. TOBIN, "Alfred Noyes: A Corrected Bibliography," Catholic Library World 15 (March 1944) 181–184, 189.

[C. HOLLIS]

NUBIA

Nubia is the section of the Nile Valley from the first cataract to the Sennar parallel. The conversion of Nubia to Christianity occurred in the 6th century, when there were close relations between the Byzantine Empire and the Christian state of Axum to the south. The region of Nubia was controlled by three kingdoms: Nobatia, in lower Nubia; Makuria, or Mukurra, in the Dongola region; and Alwa, or Alodia, with its capital near the present city of Khartoum. The inhabitants spoke Nubian, and seem to have pushed into the Nile Valley from Kordofan and Darfur a few centuries earlier. They were pagans and worshipped the gods of ancient Egypt and Meroe.

Conversion to Christianity. Christianity was brought to Nubia prior to the official conversion of the people by Monophysite refugees from Syria who had settled near Philae after the Council of CHALCEDON (451), and by a few Axumite followers of JULIAN OF HALICAR-NASSUS, who are reported to have been living in Alwa. Most historians agree that the first missions to Nubia, and especially to Nobatia, were directed from Constantinople rather than from Egypt or Ethiopia. According to John, bishop of Ephesus, Nobatia was formally converted to Monophysite Christianity c. 543 by a mission led by Theodore, bishop of Philae, and Julian, a priest sent from Constantinople by Empress Theodora (1). Although John was a contemporary of these events, he was a Monophysite and is considered biased by some scholars; they prefer the account of Euty chius, Patriarch of Alexandria (933 to 940), who claims that Nobatia was orthodox prior to the 8th century.

According to JOHN OF BICLARO, Makuria was converted to orthodox Christianity in 569, and the same year Longinus, a Monophysite, was invited by the king of Alwa to convert his kingdom. This happened soon after the pagan temples at Philae were closed by JUSTINIAN I at the expiration of a 100-year treaty that left them open for the pagan peoples to the south. The Nubian kings seem to have accepted Christianity in part to promote good relations with Byzantium and Axum, and in part out of admiration for Byzantine culture. Pagan customs seem to have lasted until the 7th century, although Byzantine influence in art, literature, politics, and religion remained strong during the Christian period. Officials bore titles used at the imperial court and Christian names of Byzantine origin were common. Among the educated, Greek appears to have been spoken as late as the 12th century.

Muslim Invasions. In 640 Nobatia repelled a Muslim invasion led by Abdullah ibn Saad, governor of Egypt, but in 651 an Arab force reached the capital of Makuria. Because of the spirited resistance of the Nubians, the Arabs did not hold the country, but concluded a peace treaty that had important provisions concerning trade. By 710 the kingdoms of Nobatia and Makuria had been united to form a single kingdom with its capital at Old Dongola. The influence of Dongola reached as far west as Darfur, where the ruins of a Christian church appear to exist at Ain Farah.

In the 8th century, the Nubian Church was wholly Monophysite. At that time the Arabs, who preferred Coptic Christianity to the orthodox discipline of Constantinople, interfered with the appointment of new orthodox bishops. However, funerary inscriptions occurring as late as the 12th century are written in Greek and bear prayers from the Byzantine Euchologia. Between 850 and 1100 both Alwa and Dongola apparently prospered. Each country was divided into a number of bishoprics; those south of Aswan had cathedrals at Dakka, Qasr Ibrim, and Faras. Excavations in the cathedral at Faras have brought to light a list of 27 bishops who held office there, as well as a vast number of wall paintings showing kings, bishops, and religious scenes that are in an unparalleled state of preservation. Churches were common throughout the region and many are still standing.

Islamization. For a time the Nubians controlled much of upper Egypt. The presence of Christian refugees and Egyptian priests probably accounts for the prevalence of Coptic as a written language. Religious books were written also in Old Nubian. During this period, Nubians appear to have been free to settle in upper Egypt, while Muslims were free to purchase land in Nubia. By the 10th century Islam was widespread in the northern part of lower Nubia. In the 12th century Egyptian invasions and Bedouin attacks brought an end to Christian culture in most of lower Nubia, and led to the concentration of the population in fortified communities farther south. The architecture of some of the forts is said to reflect crusader influence. Christian power in Dongola was weakened by disputes over the succession to the throne, and in 1315 Kerenbes, the last Christian king, was deposed and removed to Cairo. During the rest of the century, the Beni Kanz, Hawara, and other Arab tribes rapidly introduced Islam to the Dongola region. The kingdom of Alwa was overrun by Muslims c. 1500 and the Nubian language gave way to Arabic.

Recent discoveries show that the Christian religion persisted for a time in many communities in lower Nubia, as it still does in upper Egypt. A scroll found in a bishop's tomb at Qasr Ibrim records his appointment to that office in 1372. In Ethiopia, Francisco Alvares heard reports that suggested the survival of Christianity in the Dongola region c. 1525; and a colony of Nubian Christians is said to have been living near Esna, in upper Egypt, in the 1630s. In the last century, the Nubians living at Tafa, near Aswan, took pride in their descent from the Christians of medieval Nubia.

Bibliography: U. MONNERET DE VILLARD, Storia della Nubia cristiana (Orientalia Christiana Analecta, (Rome 1935- ). L. P. KIRWAN, The Oxford University Excavations at Firka (Oxford 1939) 49-51. G. S. MILEHAM, Churches in Lower Nubia (Philadelphia 1910). The UNESCO Campaign to Save the Monuments of Nubia has produced new information about Christian Nubia that appears in Kush (Kharloum 1953- ), The Journal of the Sudan Antiquities Service, and in the The Journal of Egyptian Archaeology (London 1914- ).

[B. G. TRIGGER]

NUDITY

Clothing in one form or another is universal in all but a few human societies. Nakedness among men is found, for example, among some split tribal groups in the Sudan and on the Zambezi River, in both cases as a survival of ancient Negrito practice. Even in these cases women wear an apron of leaves around the middle of their bodies, and not merely at menstruation. Where dress is normal, exhibitionist acts of nakedness often have a magical meaning. In the Norse myth of Loki and in the Japanese myth of Amaterasu, such exposure takes on a cynical aspect and is intended either to cause shock or to arouse joy. The Baubo motif among the Greeks is to be interpreted as a form of fertility magic. In the realm of magic, nakedness wards off a spell or other harmful form of magic, compels love, and gives strength to one's own practice of witchcraft and conjuring. Complete disrobing at the questioning of an oracle, in lustrations, and in temple incubation was a mark of reverence. Eschatological nakedness [see Anthropos 58 (1963) 579] and the ancient Arab practice of offering sacrifice naked, because of the dirt on clothes, is primarily religious in character, while the nakedness of the "air-clothed" Jainist monks is based rather on asceticism. Naked dances are connected with spirits (as in New Guinea) but also with fertility divinities.

In the Bible. In OT history the cult practice of sacred nudity does not appear as part of Israel's religion; rather, it is expressly forbidden, and exposure of one's nakedness is looked upon as shameful. In the NT, nakedness appears most significantly in a metaphorical sense in contexts commanding the Christian to clothe the "naked," i.e., the "ill-clad."

Certain pagan religions of the ancient Near East practiced sacred, ritual nakedness. Professional prophets and dervishes would work themselves into a frenzy at the shrine of a god, slashing their limbs (cf. Dt 14.1), mumbling unintelligible sounds, and whirling their naked bodies before idols in order to induce favors from the gods. There is no indisputable case of Israelite Prophets' presenting themselves stark naked before Yahweh, for the ethical spirit of the OT insisted on the personal decency of the one who was to approach Yahweh (Ex 20.26). The closest Israelite parallel to the sacred nudity of pagan prophets is that of Saul, who "stripped himself also of his garments and prophesied with the rest before Samuel and lay down naked all that day and night" (1 Sm 19.24). It is quite probable that this "nakedness" consisted in wearing only a loincloth; David is spoken of as dancing naked before the ark, even though he was girt with a linen EPHOD (2 Sm 6.14, 20). The Israelites with their high regard for personal modesty considered exposure of one's nakedness a disgrace and a shame (Gn 9.22–27), which was inflicted as punishment on prisoners of war (Is 47.3) and women guilty of adultery (Jer 13.26). Various Hebrew words for naked often mean partly clothed (Dt 28.48; Lam 4.21; 2 Chr 28.15; Ez 18.7, 16).

The Greek γυμνός means both completely naked and poorly clothed, and it is also used figuratively in the meaning of bare, exposed, and uncovered. In the episode of the young man fleeing the scene of Jesus' arrest (Mk 14.52), and perhaps in the narrative of Acts in which the evil spirit strips the Jewish exorcists (19.6), the word means "completely naked." When John writes that Peter was "stripped" while fishing (21.7), the meaning is that he was without his outer garment and was merely wearing a sleeveless blouse or smock. The Christian duty of clothing the naked refers to the obligation of helping those who are poorly clothed (Mt 25.36, 38, 43–44; Jas 2.15). In Heb 4.13 "naked" conveys the idea that all things are exposed to the eyes of God. In another sense the soul is said to be naked in the state between death and resurrection, since it is stripped of the body, which is its natural covering (2 Cor 5.3), and the "bare" grain of wheat is naked and unclothed before reaching its full growth (1 Cor 15.37). The words naked in 1 Cor 4.11 and nakedness in Rom 8.35 and 2 Cor 11.27 refer to extreme misery and destitution.

[A. CLOSS/F. J. MONTALBANO]

NUGENT, FRANCIS

Capuchin friar, agent of the Counter-Reformation, and founder of the Capuchins in Ireland and Germany; b. Ballebranagh, County Meath, Ireland, 1569; d. Charleville, France, May 18, 1635. Nugent's father was Sir Edward Nugent; his mother, Margaret O'Connor, was of the princely O'Connor Faly. At the age of 13, Nugent was sent to the Scots-Irish college at Pont-à-Mousson in Lorraine. From there he went to Louvain, secured his M.A., and in 1590 was appointed to lecture in philosophy in the University. He joined the Capuchins at Brussels on Oct. 4, 1591, the first Irishman to do so. While he was still a deacon, his preaching at Valenciennes (September 1594) brought him fame; as a result, a Capuchin friary was founded there. He became prominent in the pre-Quietist mystical movement in the Low Countries and was de-lated to Rome. Nugent, twice tried by the Inquisition in Rome, defended himself successfully and earned the commendation of Pope Clement VIII, who presided in August 1600 at the second trial. Nugent served in France for five years as guardian and professor of theology—Friar Joseph of Paris (François LE CLERC DU TREMBLAY) was one of his pupils.

He returned to the Low Countries (1605), where he held office continuously as guardian and definitor of the Belgian province. When in Rome as delegate for a general chapter of his order, he secured a papal brief, on May 29, 1608, from Paul V, authorizing a Capuchin mission to “England, Scotland, and Ireland.” Before he could realize this project, he was appointed commissary general of the Capuchin mission to the Rhineland, Aug. 28, 1610. Under his guidance the Capuchins became a powerful religious force in Germany, particularly through his Confraternity of Our Lord’s Passion. Because of internal disputes among the Capuchins, he was dismissed from his post, and in March 1615 was given a foundation at Charleville as a center for the mission to Ireland. Nugent also directed the Capuchin missionaries in England and Scotland, but in a minor capacity.

During 1623 and 1624 he negotiated with James I of England for religious toleration for English and Irish Catholics. He visited England and Ireland secretly during 1624 and 1625 and went to Rome as agent for the Irish hierarchy. A long, drawn-out dispute with the Walloon Capuchins came to a head in 1631 when he opposed a Walloon visitor sent to Charleville by the Capuchin vicar-general. Nugent was deposed from office in January 1632 and lived in retirement at Charleville until his death. Though intellectually powerful, he was primarily a man of action, founding Capuchin houses at Valenciennes (1595), Courtrai (1610), Cologne (1611), Charleville (1615), and Dublin (1624). Courageous, tenacious, and resourceful, he was a leader of men, but often too demanding; he had the defects and virtues of the pioneer.

Bibliography: Most studies have been euglogistic and uncritical. Exceptions are: A. DASSEVILLE, “Francis Nugent,” Round Table of Franciscan Research 15 (1950) 103–117. P. HILDEBRAND, “Franciscus Nugent,” Franciscaansch Leven 11 (1928) 21–28; 21 (1938) 301–312, 339–346; De Kapucijnen in de Nederlanden en het prinsbisdom Luik, 4 v. (Antwerp 1945–48) 1:146–151, 274–287; 3:13–29. F. X. MARTIN, “Sources for the History of the Irish Capuchins,” Collectanea Franciscana 26 (1956) 67–69; Friar Nugent (Rome 1962). A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:849–850.

[F. X. MARTIN]

NUMBERS, BOOK OF

The fourth book of the Pentateuch bears the Hebrew title bammidbār, “in the wilderness,” recalling the traditional 40 years of Israelite wandering in the desert between Egypt and the Promised Land. In English Bibles the name is derived ultimately from the title in the Septuagint (LXX), Ἀριθμοί, suggesting the book’s interest in the census and other matters calling for arithmetical precision, such as the division of the land. [See CENSUS (IN THE BIBLE)]. This article covers the sources and literary form, authorship, and division of the book.

Sources and Literary Form. The Book of Numbers incorporates a mass of legal, statistical, and liturgical material into the historical narrative of events that took place between Sinai and the last days at Moab. Since the thrust of the account is toward the permanent establishment of norms—sanctioned by Mosaic authority—within the community, the book does not convey the absorbing concern with the acts of God in history that are found in the Deuteronomic (see DEUTERONOMISTS) and Yahwistic (see YAHWIST) traditions.

The merged Yahwistic and Elohist (see ELOHIST) traditions are found in the book, but the principal source is the Priestly Tradition (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL) that has contributed almost three-quarters of the material and has given the final form and spirit to the work.

In assessing the historical value of this heterogeneous assemblage, whose origin is very complex, two extremes should be avoided: It should not be expected that the book give a detailed, purely factual, and documentary description of events; it should not be judged according to the standards and ideals of modern historical writing. On the other hand, to consider the historical events irrelevant would falsify the author’s perspective. For him a religious message was important because it implied an impact of God in time and space, the irruption of God into man’s history. In addition, historical and archeological studies have enormously enhanced respect for the basic historicity of the Israelite traditions in the Book of Numbers and elsewhere in the OT.

Authorship. The Book of Numbers is a compilation of material from different strata of traditions and has no clearly recognizable unity. Jewish and Christian tradition has ascribed the book to MOSES, but this must be understood only according to contemporary knowledge of what composition and authorship meant in Old Testament times. It may be said that the book was composed in the spirit of Moses and of material that in part goes back to Moses himself. In its final form, the Book of Numbers is post-Exilic.

Division. The absence of any logical and consistent plan in the arrangement of its contents makes it difficult to provide an adequate division of the book. However, selecting the geographical factor as the basis of division, the work may be divided into three parts: The first section covers the last days at Sinai (1.1–10.10). The material is from the Priestly Tradition and is concerned mostly with legal and ecclesiastical affairs. The second division concerns the journey from Sinai to Moab (10.11–22.1). This period includes the sojourn at Cades, as well as the story of Israel’s abortive attempt to enter the Promised Land from the south. The last section is concerned with the events on the Plains of Moab (22.2–36.13). The BALAAM cycle dominates this section, which includes also the transfer of leadership to Josue [see JOSHUA, SON OF NUN], directions concerning the occupation of Canaan, and miscellaneous laws from different periods. As the book ends, the Israelites are prepared to cross the Jordan and launch the assault on Canaan.

Bibliography: H. CAZELLES, Les Nombres (BJ 4; Paris 1952). G. B. GRAY, Numbers (ICC; New York 1903). B. D. EARDMANS, "The Composition of Numbers," Oudtestamentische Studien 6 (1949) 101–216. S. R. DRIVER, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (New York 1905). G. E. WRIGHT and R. H. FULLER, The Book of the Acts of God (Garden City, N.Y. 1957). I. FRANSEN "Du désert à la terre promise. Les plus anciens récits du livre des Nombres," Bible et vie chrétienne 5 (1954) 68–84.

[F. L. MORIARTY]

NUMEROLOGY

This article is concerned with the employment of numbers in a symbolic religious, magicoreligious, and philosophical sense. One or the other form of symbolic usage is found almost universally, but the explanation for the choice of some numbers as sacred or magical is not always clear, being lost in the remote past of the cultures involved. In practice, it is often difficult to separate the religious, magical, and philosophical usages, especially in the higher cultures or civilizations. Accordingly, it will be convenient to group the various usages under each number treated. Special attention is given to number symbolism in the ancient Near East and the Greco-Roman world.

Numbers One to Six. The number one is confined principally to religiophilosophical use. It represents the monad of the Pythagoreans and the One of Plato and the Neoplatonists.

The number two pairs or symbolizes opposites that have a clear relation with one another in ancient mythology and religion: right hand-left hand, earth-heaven, sun-moon, day-night, Ahura Mazda-Ahriman in Persian religion, yang-yin in Chinese thought. Whereas one is regarded as a male number, two is considered female.

The Number Three. The number three is one of the oldest and most widespread of all sacred or symbolical numbers, playing an equally important role in religion, magic, and philosophy. The divine family of father, mother, and child is already represented in the earliest strata of prehistoric Jericho and is well known from the Egyptian group of Osiris, Isis, and Horus. Divine triads—such as Indic Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; Greek Zeus, Athena, and Apollo; Roman Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus—are common. Lesser divinities are likewise widely found in triads: the three Fates, the three Graces, the three Furies, and similar groups in Teutonic and Finno-Ugric mythology. Three-headed gods are found from ancient Ireland to India. The Babylonians, Greeks, and Hindus all distinguished three worlds—Heaven, Earth, and Lower World, or Heaven, Earth, and Water. In sacrificial ritual the Romans offered a joint sacrifice of a pig, a sheep, and a bull; and in most ancient rituals there were threefold prayers, threefold invocations of the dead, and sacred festivals of three days' duration. There was a similar threefold repetition of magic formulas or incantations. The triangle was regarded by the Greeks as a perfect figure and had a central place in Greek mathematics and mystic symbolism. Time was thought of in terms of morning, midday, and evening and of past, present, and future. It should be observed also that there was a close relationship between three and nine, and groups of nine things are very often to be explained as a mere tripling of groups of three.

The Number Four. The number four was connected very early with the four phases of the moon, the four seasons, the four points of the compass, and the geometrical figure of the square. It was a symbol of completeness and perfection. Among the Greeks, four marked the birthdate of Hermes. The Ionic philosophers identified four elements, and Pythagoras adopted four as a symbol of justice. Later, four cardinal virtues were stressed by Plato; and Simonides, Plato, and Aristotle spoke of "the four-square man." The Greeks, the post-Vedic literature, and the Zoroastrians all referred to four ages or periods of the world. The Romans used fourfold prayers as well as threefold ones (see Ovid, Fasti 4:778). The number four, especially as embodied in the square, has had an important place in the history of magic.

The Numbers Five and Six. The number five had a natural significance from the five fingers. It was the number of the Babylonian goddess Ishtar, whose symbol, the pentagram, or five-pointed star, was regarded as a magic protection against evils. The Romans offered certain sacrifices at five-year intervals, and the censor held office for a five-year term. In Manichaeism there were five Archons and five Aeons. In Chinese tradition five is a lucky number. The number six represents the macrocosm and is symbolized by the six-pointed star, a combination of two triangles.

Numbers Seven to Ten. The number seven occupies the supreme place in Babylonian religion and astrology. Its use and symbolism were disseminated widely eastward and westward from Mesopotamia. The Babylonians recognized seven planets: Jupiter, Venus, Saturn, Mars, Mercury, the Sun, and the Moon. Each day of their seven-day "week" was sacred to one of these celestial bodies. The four phases of the moon were comprised in a period of  $4 \times 7$  days. The Babylonian underworld had seven divisions, and the temple towers, or ziggurats, had to have seven stories. Among the Greeks, Apollo's birthday was celebrated on the 7th of the month. In Old Persian religion there were seven Amesha Spentas, and the Rigveda speaks of seven regions and seven ponds and of the god Agni (Fire) as having seven tongues and seven wives. The tripling of seven (21) is very common in Indic literature. In Buddhism seven is as important as eight. It is to be noted that seven itself is the sum of the two sacred numbers three and four.

Numbers Eight and Nine. The number eight symbolizes perfection. The Elamites had eight heavens. Of greater importance is the use of eight in Buddhism to indicate the eightfold path that is central in its teaching. The number nine, so often used as a tripling of groups indicated by three, was much favored by the Celts, Germans, and Finno-Ugric peoples. The Greeks had nine Muses beside the three Fates and three Graces. The Chinese regarded nine as a symbol of perfection. The pagoda of nine stories was modeled on the Chinese conception of heaven.

The Number 10. The number ten, the combined total of the fingers, symbolized perfection and wisdom. In Pythagoreanism the all-important Τετρακτύς was constituted by the sum of 1+2+3+4, arranged in a series of dots with the monad forming the apex of an isosceles triangle. The number ten was significant also in the Hermetic literature. It can be resolved, furthermore, as 7+3, 6+4, and 5+5, with various symbolic meanings attached to such analyses.

Numbers 12, 40, 60, 70, 72, and Others. The number 12 is a great cosmic symbol, made up of 3×4 or 5+7. It is the number of the Zodiac in Babylonia and elsewhere, either under Babylonian influence or independently, for example, in China and in Greece. The Babylonians divided their year into 12 months and their days into 12 hours. The Greeks divided their year in the same way, worshiped a pantheon of 12 Olympian gods, and recorded 12 labors for Hercules. The Gnostics introduced 12 Aeons into their system. The Babylonians assigned the number 13 to their underworld and also to the intercalary month in their lunar calendar. It was considered unlucky because it exceeded the just and fixed number 12. There are some examples of 11's being considered as unlucky for exceeding 10. The number 14, as the double of seven, was regarded as lucky. The number 15 was the sacred number five, the symbol of Ishtar, in triple form. The numbers 25, 50, and 100 had no special significance apart from being used as round numbers in legends and stories.

The number 40, however, was important. The precise origin of its symbolic use is obscure. The tradition that the Pythagoreans transferred the germination of the bean, which took 40 days, to the human fetus and then reckoned the period of pregnancy as 7×40 (280 days) is more plausible than convincing. At any rate, 40 was used also for a period of years corresponding to a generation and then applied symbolically in various other ways. The number 60 (5×12) was fundamental in the Babylonian sexagesimal system but without special significance for religion. However, 70 (7×10) and 72 (one-fifth of the circle of 360 degrees) were both used symbolically to emphasize size and multiplicity.

The Alphabet in Numerology. The letters of the Greek alphabet were given numerical values at an early date. These letter-numbers served as the foundation for the development of an elaborate system of symbolism and divination based on the addition of the numerical values of the letters in given words and their synonyms or opposites. An example from a late Byzantine treatise (see Dornseiff 96) is sufficient to illustrate the practice:

θεός (9+5+70+200)=284; ἀγαθός (1+3+1+9+70+200) = 284; ἄγιος (1+3+10+70+200) = 284.

See Also: ASTROLOGY; DIVINATION; ABRAXAS.

Bibliography: H. J. ROSE, The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. M. CARY et al. (Oxford 1949) 614. A. SCHIMMEL and W. FUNK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 6:1861–64, with bibliography. T. DAVIDSON et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:406–17. R. THURNWALD, Reallexikon der Vorgeschichte, ed. M. EBERT, 15 v. (Berlin 1924–25) 14:459–79, with bibliography. R. MEHLEIN, “Drei,” Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)–] 4:269–310, with bibliography. A. STUIBER, “Dreieck,” ibid. 310–13. E. T. BELL, The Magic of Numbers (London 1952). C. M. EDSMAN, “Alphabet und Buchstabenmystik,” Reallexikon der Vorgeschichte 1:246. F. DORNSEIFF, Das Alphabet in Mystik und Magie (2d ed. Leipzig 1925).

[M. R. P. MC GUIRE]

NUMEROLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)

Numbers may be used as simple expression of numerical values, as rhetorical expressions of the same, or as symbolic expressions of realities in some way related to numbers.

Simple Enumeration. In all existing Hebrew and Greek manuscripts of the inspired text, words expressing numbers are spelled out in full. In early times the Israelites may have used strokes or digits of some sort to express numbers, as did the Babylonians and Egyptians (e.g., in the Elephantine papyri). In later times both Jews and Greeks used the letters of their respective alphabets as numerical signs. The Masoretes indicated divisions of the Biblical text in this manner. The decimal system was basic, but traces of a duodecimal or sexagesimal system exist. (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES IN THE BIBLE.) In Hebrew the digits 1 to 9 were represented by the first nine letters of the alphabet ('to t), the decades 10 to 90 by the next nine (y to š), and 100 to 400 by the last four (q to t). All other numbers were expressed as combinations of these. The abbreviation (yh) for the sacred name of God, Yahweh, was avoided by writing 15 as 9 plus 6 (tw) instead of 10 plus 5 (yh). The explanation for some apparent errors in textual transmission may lie in the similarity of certain letter numbers, especially in the primitive script; e.g., the confusion of d (3) with z (7) may explain the discrepancy in the parallel texts of 2 Sm 24.13 and 1 Chr 21.12. Erroneous transmission of the text, however, is not the only explanation of numerical discrepancies in the Bible. Biblical inspiration does not demand that every enumeration in the Bible be a direct revelation from God. Human values that are simply the vehicle for the transmission of divine truth are not made divine absolutes by the fact of inspiration, but are to be judged according to the nature of the human contingencies in which they appear.

Rhetorical Use of Numbers. Peculiar to Semitic rhetoric was the use of two numbers in sequence in order to emphasize the completeness of the enumeration. The use is frequent in numerical proverbs and oracles (Pry 30.15, 18, 21, 29; Sir 25.7, 26.5, 19; Am 1.3–2.6). Much more general and varied are what one might call round numbers. Certain numbers are used to express an indefinite amount, large or small: 1 for someone, 2 for a couple, 3 for a few, and 1000 for very many (e.g., Hos 6.2; Ex 20.6; Is 30.17). An exact number may be given for what is only an approximation. Since the superlative in Hebrew is rendered by triple repetition (Is 6.3), the number 3 signifies a certain completeness. Because of the four cosmic directions, the number 4 connotes a certain totality (in every direction). Because of the five fingers of the hand, the number 5 may signify a relatively sufficient number. Possibly because of its connection with lunar phases (approximately seven days between each quarter), the number 7 is especially significant as indicating a complete cycle or series, and multiples of 7 emphasize the extent of the series (Gn 4.15, 24; Prv 24.16; Mt 18.21–22; Mk 16.9). The number of fingers of both hands, ten, may signify all of a kind, i.e., a totality (Ex 34.28; Jb 19.3; Mt 25.1). Since it was associated with the 12 months of the solar year, the number 12 suggests a complete cycle. The number 40 is a very frequent round number and designates a rather long period the exact duration of which is not known, but the general idea is that of reaching full maturity, or perhaps more generally, any large number that could be counted but not quickly or easily (cf. the Persian word "forty-footer" meaning a centipede; see Nm 14.34; 2 Sm 5.4; Mk 1.13). The numbers 60, 80, and 100 are sometimes found as round numbers, but 1,000 is quite frequent and evokes the idea of a large number. However, there is no real proof that it simply means "group" or "clan" and is not a real number. The rhetoric of "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (1 Sm 18.7) signifies that David slew a fabulously large number (cf. Lv 26.8). In fact, many large numbers that are given as sums may actually be very rough estimates, or exorbitant exaggerations expressive of a hyperbolic intent rather than an exact summation.

Numerology. While usually classed together, a distinction can be made between symbolic and mystic numbers.

Symbolic Numbers. A symbol is something that represents an idea, sacred or otherwise, by convention or because of some association. What is important are the things symbolized, but the symbol is a rallying point that emphasizes a common aspect. The conventional and rhetorical use of numbers readily leads to symbolism through particular association, but it is often difficult to determine just where the transition begins. Moreover, the same number may have different symbolic connotations. The number 1, for example, is associated with God's uniqueness (Dt 6.4; Sir 1.6; Jn 17.11; Rom 3.30). The superlative, 3, denotes that a thing is entirely what it is said to be (e.g., dead for three days, i.e., really dead; God thrice holy, i.e., perfectly holy); it is often associated with the perfection of God's being or action (Gn 18.2). The number of cosmic totality, 4 (e.g., the four living creatures in Ez 1.5; Ap 4.6), designates comprehensiveness (four plagues, Ez 14.21; four beatitudes, Lk 6.20–22). The number 6 is associated with the creation of man and his personal efforts (six days to work), a fullness of human action but lacking the final completeness in God. The number 7 traditionally designates a complete series. Although it can designate a full complement of evil (seven devils of St. MARY MAGDALENE) as well as of good, it is particularly associated with sacred objects and with cult (week, SABBATH, feasts, sacrifices, angels, etc.). From such a concept the apocalyptic speculations of Dn 9.2,24 about the 70 weeks of years (10 jubilees of seven times seven years) lead to the DAY OF THE LORD independently of any real chronology. In general, as a number of perfection (3 plus 4), seven and its multiples, and even its half (Dn 7.25), occur frequently as symbolic numbers. As a round number of totality, ten may have some special symbolism, but it is not well defined (ten plagues of Egypt, ten commandments). Through its association with the temporal cycle, 12 seems to designate cyclic perfection or the perfection of order and government. Whether or not the division of Israel into 12 tribes arose from the monthly assignment of sanctuary care to a particular tribe cannot be ascertained, but 12 as a symbol of the people of God is found throughout the Bible—12 APOSTLES, 12 gates of the new Jerusalem, the number of the saved 144,000, i.e., 12,000 for each of the 12 tribes, etc. (Mt 19.28; Ez 48.30–34; Rv 7.4, 7.8, 21.12–14). The number 40 acquires also a certain symbolism through association with successive periods in salvation history, periods characterized by the struggle with evil from which man is ultimately saved by the power of God (Gn 7.12, 17; Dt 8.2, 9.9; 1 Kgs 19.8; Mt 4.2). The number 1,000 and its multiples, as a very large round number often without any exact numerical sense, may symbolize the perfect age. (See MILLENARIANISM.) The fabulous ages of the antediluvian patriarchs, quite modest alongside their Mesopotamian counterparts, probably have some special significance. However, this is scarcely discernible now (even the textual traditions do not agree on the numbers), except in the case of Henoch, the just man, who lived 365 years, the perfect number of the solar year. Perhaps there is a similar symbolism for the ages of Israel's ancestors, the census in Numbers ch. 1, the 38 years in Jn 5.5, and the 153 (sum of numbers from 1 to 17) fishes in Jn 21.11. Some numbers may be the result of gematria, the designation of a person or thing by the numerical value of the letters of a word. For example, in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1.1–17), where three series of 14 ancestors each are given, there may be gematria based on the name of David (in Hebrew dwd, i.e., 14), to show that Jesus is eminently Davidic and messianic. The interpretation of the beast's number, 666, in Ap 13.18 as Nero Caesar (written in Aramaic) is commonly accepted but not certain. Given the symbolism of 6, the triple repetition may simply designate the number of the man who refuses to enter into the designs of God and to advance to the perfection of 7.

Mystic Numbers. As distinct from a symbolic, a mystic number may be defined as a number having some hidden significance or even hidden power that only special knowledge, investigation, or supernatural enlightenment can discover and put to use. The Bible never attributes any special power to numbers, even though it recognizes that God "disposed all things by measure and number and weight" (Wis 11.20). Things are not related simply because they have the same number. Number has no special meaning apart from the thing signified. Moreover, the main purpose of inspiration is revelation, not concealment. The allegorical interpretations given to numbers by some of the Fathers of the Church, e.g., St. Augustine, must be considered as done merely by way of fanciful accommodation. While avoiding the excesses of the Pythagoreans (see PYTHAGORAS AND PYTHAGOREANS) and the later Cabalists (see CABALA), some Fathers and their audiences were fascinated by numbers and their supposed hidden meanings. The Biblical symbolism of numbers, where it really exists, is quite controlled and secondary to the more important intentions of the Biblical authors.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek (1649–53). W. H. BENNETT, J. HASTINGS and J. A. SELBIA, eds., Dictionary of the Bible, 5 v. (Edinburgh 1942–50) 701–704. O. RÜHL, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935– ) 1:461–464; (Eng.) 1:461–464. J. SAUER, "Zahlensymbolik," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>1</sup>, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 10:1025–30. X. LEON-DUFOUR, ed., Vocabulaire du Théologie Biblique (Paris 1962) 687–691. J. BONSRIVEN, Vocabulaire Biblique (Paris 1958) 110.

[H. J. SORENSEN]

NUMISMATICS

Coins of fixed weight, stamped with governmental authority and used as money for exchange of value, and also medals, frequently supply dates, depict styles of weapons, clothing, and art forms, indicate attitudes, or testify to the existence of an institution or administrative procedure otherwise not known from written or archeological sources. They thus have value for both religious and secular history. They are important not only for tracing the evolution of the Roman Empire but also for the history of the Church from antiquity to modern times. After a brief survey of the Roman imperial coinage as background, this article discusses chiefly the coins and medals of direct concern to Church history. Hebrew coinage, and Hellenistic coinage that is pertinent, are covered in other articles.

Roman Coinage from Augustus to Constantine.

During the Republic, magistrates called the tres viri auro, argento, aere flando, feriundo (the three men for minting and striking [coins] of gold, silver, and bronze) controlled the issue of coinage under the authority of the Senate, which was indicated by the stamp S.C. for Senatus consulto. The obverse image gradually changed from the goddess Roma and the Dioscuri on horseback to Jupiter, to the figure of Victory, to Juno of Lanuvium in a chariot, etc., and eventually to the personal history and portraits of the magistrates. In 44 B.C. the head of Julius Caesar appeared on silver coins. Augustus permitted the Senate to coin bronze, but in practice he exercised complete control of the mints, and only the portraits of members of the imperial family were authorized. On the reverse side of the coinage political phrases were employed, such as the signis receptis of Augustus commemorating the recovery of the standards lost to the Parthians at the battle of Carrhae. Later Vespasian proclaimed his subjection of the Jews with the legend Iudaea capta. Further propaganda purposes were served by the portrayal of civic virtues, such as Abundantia, Concordia, Pudicitia, and this continued almost to the end of the empire. The imperial coinage regularly records the titles of the emperors and, until the reign of Alexander Severus (d. 235), the current or last consulship of the given princeps and his tribunician year.

Byzantine gold coin with Constantine VI as a youth and his mother, the Empress Irene, on obverse; reverse shows three other Eastern emperors, Leo III, Constantine V, and Leo IV.

Thus the life of the Roman state is depicted on its coins: official acts of the princeps, his liberalitas in the distribution of money and bread, the arrival of the grain fleet at Ostia, the departure on a military expedition against the barbarians, the adventus or salute by the troops to the emperor sitting before them on horseback, the circus games and temple sacrifices, public and family religious cults and ceremonial, the association of members of a dynasty or colleagues in the rule of the empire, and the rise and fall of individual emperors. The establishment of the tetrarchy by Diocletian after 293 is depicted on medals, and the coins of Diocletian demonstrate the gradual growth of the emperor's religiopolitical consciousness of himself as the protégé of Jupiter (Iovi conservatori Augusti); and the coins of Maximian show him as a protégé of Hercules. The emperor gradually assumed a maiestas divina, as the comes or numen praesens of the godhead; he possessed the divine virtues of pietas and felicitas. This concept was already portrayed on coins that began with Aurelian's deo et domino nato. In solving the difficult historical problems concerned with the chronology of the tetrarchy and the reasons for its dissolution, coins play an essential part.

Constantine and Christian Coinage. In 306 CONSTANTINE I is depicted on the imperial coinage as still a protégé of Hercules in the divinely ordered Diocletian tetrarchy; but in the official speech delivered at Constantine's wedding to Fausta, the daughter of Maximian (spring 307), the latter is compared to the sun god (Sol invictus) rather than to the Jupiter of the tetrarchy's political theology. After 310, with the death of Maximian, Constantine's coinage no longer portrays Hercules; instead, Mars conservator is depicted as the protective deity accompanying the Sol invictus. This is a return to the tradition of Aurelian and Gallienus. Stress is placed, too, on the legitimacy of Constantine's rule, which can be traced to his lineage as the son of Constantius Chlorus. Subsequent coinage indicates the steps whereby Constantine gradually achieved full control of the empire, the year 312 being the turning point in both his religious and political thinking.

Silver coins minted at Treves (312–313) portray Constantine as Victor, crowned with an ornamented helmet at whose peak is the Christian monogram CHI-RHO; and a similar portrait appears on a silver medallion at Ticinum (315) and on coins issued at Siscia (317–318). Coins in 320 carry the Vexillum with the Monogram of Christ; in 326 the Christian LABARUM appears with the legend Spes publica. However, as the empire was still pagan, Constantine did not interfere with the ordinary representations of the civic cult or the pagan portraiture of the emperor, and it took a century before all signs of pagan cult disappeared from the imperial coinage. Under Constantius II, Victory is depicted on a coin in the form of an angel crowning the emperor, who holds the standard of the cross. The legend reads: Hoc signo victor eris. During this period the Christian monogram appears frequently and is often accompanied by the alpha and omega. After a temporary revival of pagan types under Julian the Apostate, Christian-oriented coins predominate.

Byzantine and Medieval Coins. A medallion in gold commemorates the founding of Constantinople in 330 with the turreted statues of the two capitals, Rome and Constantinople, as the subject of equal veneration. After the death of Theodosius I (395) the gradual partition of the empire under Honorius (395–425) and Arcadius (395–408) is pictured on the coinage current at the time of the birth of Byzantium. Byzantine money as such begins under the Emperor ANASTASIUS I (491–518) with a new copper coinage and also a gold coin modeled on the solidus of Constantine, eventually called the bezant. It was divided into a half (the semissis) and a third (the tremissis). The main silver coin was the miliarensis, along with a small coin, the siliqua or keration.

Under Heraclius (610–641) the double miliarensis was first issued. Gradually the effigy of the emperor on the obverse of these coins was changed to that of the basileus in a majestic setting and clothed in hieratic vestments. Christ appears first on the reverse of a coin of A.D. 451, where He is depicted as assisting in the marriage of Marcian and Pulcheria. His next appearance, however, is much later, namely, on the coinage of Justinian II (685–695). From c. 900 the Virgin Mary, and eventually the saints, appear on coins, despite the difficulties over ICONOCLASM, whose history can be traced to the coinage of the period.

From the 10th century the Byzantine emperor is usually depicted in the company of a sacred personage; this is particularly true of the cup-shaped solidi called the nummi scyphati, which appear in the 11th century. In 1261 MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS issued coins with the Virgin Mary standing in the midst of the walls of Constantinople after its reconquest from the Crusaders.

The principal inscriptions on the later Byzantine coinage refer to the emperor on the obverse and to the city of minting on the reverse, along with a reference to the saint depicted and often a prayer. From the time of JUSTINIAN I profiles give way to the full face of the emperor, and the language of the inscriptions changes from Latin to Latin and Greek under Heraclius and to Greek alone under ALEXIUS I COMNENUS.

Coinage of the Medieval West. The Byzantine solidus or bezant had a widespread use in the Middle Ages and was the dominant gold coin to the 13th century. The Merovingians still imitated the golden triens of the Romans, but Charlemagne struck silver denarii in imitation of the Roman imperial types. Under the Capetians, however, the Byzantine influence is marked; the king is represented as a basileus, seated beneath a canopy, or standing with scepter in hand, or on horseback, or as a knight in battle. The legends have both a religious and a political significance: Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus Imperat; or Karolus Dei gratia Francorum rex. Under Henry II of England the Ave Maria on coins issued in his name as king of France reflects a political situation that lasted until the end of the Hundred Years' War.

The Arabs first adopted current Persian silver coins in the Orient; Byzantine copper coins in Syria and Palestine; and in Africa, the current gold coinage. Byzantine influence predominates in the Caliphite mints begun at Bashran (A.D. 660) and in the regular coinage established by Abdalmik (A.D. 695), having a gold dinar, silver dirhem, and a copper fels. The inscriptions are in Arabic and are uniformly religious. The various dynasties, such as the Omayyads and Abbasids, the Fatamids and Seljuks, continued the adaptation of Byzantine coinage, whereas the Mongols and Ottomans gradually adapted their coins to those of the Mediterranean commercial powers.

With the development of feudalism, individual suzerains as well as cities and monastic centers issued their own coinage. Although the golden solidus was the ideal coin, its large value gave way before a silver coinage under the Carolingians, and for general usage the denarius or penny of some 24 grains became almost the sole coin in circulation. The Arab silver piece, the dirhem, was worth two denier or denarii and spread with the Carolingian coinage to Germany, Italy, England, Scandinavia, Castile, and Aragon. A continuous depreciation in the value of coinage, which Gresham's (1519–79) law of bad money driving out good money would later explain, brought the denarius so low by the 12th century that it was issued in Germany as a bracteate, stamped on only one side.

Normans and Venetians. The Norman dukes in Sicily and southern Italy quickly adopted the Muslim money, but Roger II (1130–54) struck Latin coins with the legend Dux Apuliae, and they accordingly came to be known as ducats. Frederick II (1215–50) continued the Arab coinage but also struck Roman gold solidi and half solidi showing his bust on the obverse, as the Emperor Augustus, and the imperial eagle on the reverse side. The famous gold florin with St. John the Baptist on the obverse and the lily of Florence on the reverse was first struck in 1252 and quickly became a standard of value. Venice struck gold coins of the same weight as the florin (c. 1280), showing Christ standing on the obverse and the doge receiving the gonfalon from St. Mark on the reverse. Although it was at first called the ducat, it became known as the zecchino or sequin. This coinage, which was imitated by the other maritime and commercial Italian city-states, caused the Mameluke sultans of Egypt to employ the weight of the florin and sequin for their gold money in commerce between Europe and India. In the 14th century a heavy silver coin appeared called the denarius grossus, or groat, and in its successive types can be traced the artistic evolution that was leading into the Renaissance.

Papal Coinage. The popes began to strike money when Adrian I (772–795) issued a gold Beneventan type coin on which a crude hieratic human figure adorns the obverse, and a cross with an inscription, the reverse. The names of the popes and the Western emperors are associated on papal coins from Leo III (795–816) to Leo IX (1049) in monogrammatic inscriptions. Under John VIII (872–882) the bust of St. Peter appears; it is crowned with a conic miter in coins of Sergius III (904–911), whereas on the coins of Agapetus II (946–955) Peter is depicted with the keys and a cross. With Benedict VI (973–974) a series of papal effigies began. However, from Leo IX (1049) to Urban V (1362) no papal coins were issued. The Roman Senate struck coins after 1188 with the effigies of Peter and Paul crowned with nimbi on ducats of gold and with inscriptions, such as S. Petrus Senator Mundi, Roma Caput Mundi, and SPQR (Senatus Populusque Romanus).

Boniface VIII (1295–1303) issued a large silver coin from the mint at Ponte della Sorgia bearing his portrait under a miter; he carries a key and cross in his right hand, and the whole is accompanied by the legend Domini Bonifacii Papae. Clement V (1305–14) depicted the pope in frontal figure with miter, giving his blessing, and John XXII (1316–34) stamped the full figure of the pope on the obverse, mitred and sitting on a throne. Charles of Anjou (King of the Two Sicilies 1266–85), struck gold ducats when he was governor of Rome, and Cola di Rienzi (1347–48) did the same as tribune. Charles's coins imitate the Venetian type and show Peter giving the gonfalon to a kneeling senator; later coins portray the coat of arms of the senator who issued the money.

Some papal issues of money were struck at Avignon between 1342 and 1700, and there were papal mints at Ancona, Bologna, Piacenza, Parma, and Ferrara. On his return to Rome, Urban V (1362–70) claimed the sole right to issue papal money; and from Martin V to Pius IX there was a continuous papal coinage on which the effigy of the popes appears in realistic and often highly artistic style. Callistus III (1455–58) struck ducats of gold and an issue of silver grossi denarii exhibiting the bark of Peter (or navicella) with full rigging surmounted by a cross and the legend Modice fidei quare dubitetis. Julius II (1503–13) put both Peter and Paul on the ship with a blown sail and the legend Non prevalebunt. This type was continued under later popes. Papal coins were struck also with Biblical scenes, representing Christ, the crib, the ark of Noa, etc., or to commemorate the architectural accomplishments of Renaissance and later popes.

Renaissance and Modern Period. With the issue of the thaler or dollar in Germany in 1518, silver money was widely used all over Europe, but it did not displace the denier since it was issued in various weights and purity by different countries. The ability to represent nature, the human portrait, and other objects had reached the zenith of accomplishment in Renaissance medallions, and the artistic style of medals influenced that of coinage. However, the requirements of rapidly expanding trade soon made the production of coins a commercial interest, and art was all but forgotten. In general trade the denier was the coin of exchange, while the solidus or German shilling was used as a gauge for money of account, and the system of librae (L), solidi (s), and denarii (d), was adopted; the pound was divided into 12 shillings and 20 pence to the shilling.

French and English Coinage. In France during the Middle Ages the common coin was the denier of the Abbey of St. Martin of Tours (denier tournois), while the royal coinage was known as monnaie parisie. St. Louis IX (1226–70) introduced the gold sou and the gros tournois, and thus began an important reform in the French monetary system. Fourteenth-century French coinage had considerable artistic merit, and French medallions produced during the Renaissance and the Napoleonic period exhibit the same high artistic quality.

Following the example of Pepin, Offa of Mercia (757–796) introduced the silver penny into England. Some types have the king's head or a religious symbol on the obverse and an ornament and inscription on the reverse. This coinage was imitated in the several English kingdoms and prevailed down to the late 10th century. Edward III in 1343 introduced a gold coinage that included the florin and the noble showing the picture of a rose. Edward IV (1461–70) struck a new gold coin, the angel. Henry VII brought in sovereigns worth 20 shillings and the shilling itself; his coins show a marked advance in portraiture.

Several attempts were made to introduce a copper coinage to replace the private tokens in wide, local circulation, but it was only in 1613 that John Harrington obtained a patent to produce copper farthings. The gold sovereign of James I was called a unite from the legend Faciam eos in gentem unam. Owing to the scarcity of gold during the civil wars, 20- and 10-shilling silver pieces were issued; but the Oxford mint put out 3-pound pieces, on one of which John Rawlins depicted the king on horseback looking over the town, and on the reverse, the heads of the “Oxford Declaration.” In 1672 a true copper coinage of halfpence and farthings was introduced.

Italian and German Coinage. In Sicily and southern Italy the Normans first adopted the Arabic currency; but gradually Robert Guiscard (Duke of Apulia) and Roger I and Roger II of Sicily introduced also gold and silver coins modeled on Latin usage, while the Emperor Frederick II issued the first gold ducats or augustals. Charles of Anjou’s gold coinage, already mentioned, quickly spread through the Levant. With Ferdinand I of Aragon the coinage of the Two Sicilies began to display the artistic portraiture that was characteristic of the Italian city-states all during the Renaissance.

In Germany, after Louis IV of Bavaria (1314–47), local coinage in the Low Countries, along the Moselle, and in the Rhinelands and Bavaria predominated over the imperial coinage. The introduction of the groat and the florin late in the 14th century began the modern period. From the 16th century, the thaler—first produced by the Counts of Schlick, in St. Joachimsthal in Bohemia, in 1518—became the dominant silver coin. The counts Palatine, who began coining in 1294, had mints at Heidelberg and Frankfurt. The margraves of Brandenburg minted coins in the late Middle Ages also, continuing the practice after 1701 as the kings of Prussia.

An abundance of gold in the 15th and 16th centuries is evident from the coins of Hungary and Transylvania. Early Polish coinage reflects direct English, German, and Byzantine influence, while the emerging Scandinavian states adopted the Anglo-Saxon types, using the runic alphabet for legends. During the late Middle Ages these lands drew upon the common European inheritance. In the Balkan states, both Byzantine and Venetian influences were predominant, as they employed images and legends that are entirely Christian. In Russia the Byzantine coinage held sway until Peter the Great modernized the currency. Ecclesiastical city-states, such as Cologne, Münster, Treves, Augsburg, Salzburg, and Mainz, issued their own coinage between the 11th and 18th century, as did other independent cities.

Contemporary coinage, while generally reflecting the standards of modern minting skills, suggests the vagaries of political fortunes in the various nations of the world. Moreover, it is dominated by the practical demands of trade and commerce, artistic considerations playing a secondary role. Modern metal coinage has become largely token currency; paper money takes the place of the earlier gold and silver coinages.

Numismatic Study. Collections of coins and medals are known to have existed in antiquity. On the occasion of celebrations, the Emperor Augustus gave rare or valuable coins to his entourage; and the bronze medals issued by the Antonine emperors trace the legendary history of Rome on their reverse; festive gold medals of Constantine Chlorus struck in 302 were discovered in Arras in 1922.

During the Middle Ages a number of medals were issued in commemoration of special events, such as the expulsion of the English from France at the close of the Hundred Years’ War, and were distributed as gifts among the civil and ecclesiastical nobility. The main collections of coins and medals were inaugurated by the monasteries, most of which had a treasury for coins connected with the copyrooms and libraries. These monastic collections, seized by modern European governments after the French Revolution, became the foundation of many numismatic displays in public museums.

Petrarch and his circle of savants were among the first to recognize the value of coins for the interpretation and illustration of literary sources. With Cola di Rienzi, Petrarch turned to the study of numismatic evidence in an attempt to resurrect the customs of the ancient Roman republic and suggested that every library be equipped with an archive of numismatic specimens. This suggestion was honored by amateur savants and princes as well as by emerging commercial houses, such as the Fuggers, and by ecclesiastical nobles from prince-bishops to cardinals and popes. In 1553 Guillaume Rouille published a Promptuarium, which contained engravings of the Roman emperors obtained from coins and medals; and in 1570 Fulvio Orsini, the protégé of Pope Gregory XIII (1572–85), issued his Imagines et elogia virorum illustrium et eruditorum. His predecessors had been interested mainly in the iconography of the Roman rulers, but he extended his study to include a view of the past in all its achievements.

The treatise De asse et partibus eius by the great French classical scholar Guillaume Budé (1468–1540) was the first really systematic study on Roman coinage. Despite the increasing interest in coins and medals, the science of numismatics was founded only at the end of the 18th century by the Jesuit J. H. von ECKHEL (1737–98). Since that time the study of coins and medals has been pursued systematically and scientifically throughout the world. Owing to the progress of archeology, furthermore, large numbers of coins and medals not hitherto known are constantly being added to the earlier collections.

Bibliography: P. GRIERSON, Coins and Medals: A Select Bibliography (London 1954). J. BABELON, “Numismatique.” L’Histoire et ses méthodes, ed. C. SAMARAN (Paris 1961) 329–392. H. HOCHENEGG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1069–70. G. LANCZKOWSKI and W. JESSE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1184–87. R. S. POOLE et al., Encyclopaedia Britannica, 24 v. 11th ed. (New York 1911) 19:869–911. J. ECKHEL, Doctrina numorum veterum, 8 v. (Vienna 1792–98), v.9, Addenda (Leipzig 1826). J. MAURICE, Numismatique constantinienne, 3 v. (Paris 1908–12). P. GARDNER, A History of Ancient Coinage (Oxford 1918). C. SUTHERLAND, Art in Coinage (London 1955). H. MATTINGLY, Roman Coins from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire (London 1928; rev. ed. 1960). W. WROTH, Catalogue of the Imperial Byzantine Coins in the British Museum, 2 v. (London 1908). B. LAUM, Über das Wesen des Münzgeldes (Halle 1930). C. T. SELTMAN, Greek Coins (2d ed. London 1955). R. SEDILLOT, Toutes les monnaies du monde (Paris 1954). E. BERNAREGGI, Monete d’oro con ritratto del rinascimento italiano (Milan 1954). M. BLOCH, Esquisse d’une histoire monétaire de l’Europe (Paris 1954). C. SERAFINI, in B. APOLLONI-GHETTI et al., eds., Esplorazioni sotto la confessione di San Pietro in Vaticano, 2 v. (Vatican City 1951), numismatic appendix.

[F. X. MURPHY]

NUN

Traditionally, in the Latin Church, the title nun was used to designate a woman who took solemn vows in a contemplative religious order. Though the distinction between solemn vows and simple vows is not made in the 1983 Code of Canon Law of the Latin Church, the term nun applies properly to members of religious orders who by tradition still profess solemn vows and who observe some form of enclosure. Even though the Code does not define the term as such, it is used throughout the postconciliar document Ecclesiae Sanctae II to designate religious women with solemn vows. In popular parlance, however, the term is used at present for any member of an institute of consecrated life, as well as a member of a society of apostolic life.

In the Eastern Christian tradition, monastic life is given pride of place before other forms of consecrated life since it was the prototype of all cenobitical religious life. The term nun does not appear as such, but female members of monasteries, orders and congregations are referred to by the generic term “religious.”

Perfectae Caritatis, the Vatican II Decree on the Renewal of Religious Life abolished the distinction formerly made in women’s institutes between choir sisters and lay sisters. “Unless circumstances do really suggest otherwise, it should be the aim to arrive at but one category of sisters in women’s institutes” (Perfectae Caritatis, 15). It is left to the constitutions of each order to define those nuns who are bound to the choral recitation of the Divine Office. Similar norms oblige religious women in the Eastern Catholic Churches.

Bibliography: Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, Latin-English (Washington, D.C. 2001). V. POSPISHIL, Eastern Catholic Church Law, 2nd rev. and aug. ed. (New York 1996). J. BEAL, et al, New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York/Mahwah, NJ 2000). R. MCDERMOTT, “Two Approaches to Consecrated Life: The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches and the Code of Canon Law” Studia Canonica 29 (1995) 193–239.

[C. BARTONE]

NUNC DIMITTIS (CANTICLE OF SIMEON)

Title (in Latin) of the short hymn sung by Simeon on the occasion of the presentation of Jesus in the Temple (Lk 2.29–32). Enlightened by the Holy Spirit, Simeon recognizes in the Infant presented by Mary the long-awaited “Christ of the Lord,” that is, the Messiah sent by God (v.26). The Holy Infant is the embodiment of God’s salvation; this salvation is universal, that is, destined for all: “prepared before the face of all peoples,” Gentiles as well as Jews (v.31; cf. Is 49.6; 60.3). For the Gentiles, salvation is described as a light (cf. Is 42.6) that is revelation of divine truth (v.32). For the Jews, the Savior is “glory” (v.32), in that He is from “the Israelites . . . according to the flesh” (Rom 9.5), and brings salvation “to Jew first and then to Greek [Gentile]” (Rom 1.16). The Nunc Dimittis is sung daily at Compline (Night Prayer) in the Catholic Church, and as the second canticle at the Office of Evensong in the Anglican tradition.

Bibliography: R. F. TAFT, The liturgy of the hours in East and West: the origins of the divine office and its meaning for today, 2nd rev. ed. (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). G. GUIVER, Company of voices: daily prayer and the people of God (New York 1988). P. F. BRADSHAW, Daily prayer in the early church: a study of the origin and early development of the Divine Office (London 1981).

[A. LE HOULLIER/EDS.]

Miniature from the St. Alban Psalter illustrating “Nunc Dimittis,” 12th century, in the Treasury of the Cathedral in Hildesheim, Germany.

NUNCIO, APOSTOLIC

A nuncio (from the Lat. nuntius, messenger) is the diplomatic representative of the APOSTOLIC SEE, that is, Rome, as well as the personal legate of the Holy Father to a civil government. In countries (usually Catholic) where the ambassador of the Holy See is automatically accorded the honorary status of dean of the diplomatic corps, the simple title “nuncio” is used. In other countries, such as the United States where the position of “dean” of the diplomatic corps rests with the ambassador with the longest tenure, the title “pro nuncio” is used. In either case, the duties are the same.

Although the duties of the papal nuncio include both diplomatic representation and internal Church matters, the latter consume a far greater portion of his time. In addition to general monitoring of the situation of the Church, other duties include the nomination and selection of bishops, review and transmission to the Holy See of official government requests, and service as the conduit for official Vatican correspondence with American Catholics and Church officials.

Early History. The history of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Holy See begins in 1779, when John Adams, writing in a nation-by-nation diplomatic survey prepared for the Confederation Congress, speculated erroneously that the Papal States would be among the last to recognize the newly independent United States, even were they to seek such recognition. “Congress,” he predicted, “[would] probably never send a minister to his Holiness” because “[he could] do them no service.” As for a “catholic legate or nuncio. . . or in other words an ecclesiastical tyrant,” he wrote: “It is hoped the United States will be too wise ever to admit [one] into its territories.” The realities of international diplomacy were soon to prove him wrong.

When the Revolutionary War ended, some of the newly independent states were under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Bishop of Quebec, and the remainder were subject to that of the Vicar Apostolic in London and his vicar in New York. Both bishops had taken steps to distance themselves from the Revolution: the Bishop of Quebec because of what he considered to be the anti-Catholic views of some of the Revolution’s leaders, and the Vicar Apostolic of London because of his concern that Catholics in England not be perceived as disloyal to the Crown. So it became necessary, for both political and administrative reasons, for the Holy See to revise the jurisdictional arrangement.

In 1783, an informal diplomatic contact with Benjamin Franklin, then the American minister to the French Court, was made by the Papal Nuncio at Versailles in order to determine the desires of the American government on this issue. If no suitable American candidate could be found, the nationality of the individual soon to be named as America’s first Catholic bishop would present a delicate diplomatic issue. The choice of a foreigner, especially a British subject, worried Franklin, and the Vatican’s diplomatic note accordingly referred to the alternative of appointing a citizen of a “friendly” nation: an obvious reference to France.

The question posed to Franklin by the Holy See was referred to a committee composed of Thomas Jefferson, Elbridge Gerry and Hugh Williamson. Although the committee declined to offer the pope the requested advice on the grounds that the federal government had no power to involve itself in religious matters, the members did note their respect for the pope as a “sovereign and a state.” Mutual recognition, albeit on an informal basis, thus commenced in 1783.

Among the prelates attending the mass congregation which climaxed the annual German Catholic Conclave at Fulda were: (left to right) Cardinal Wendel, of Munich; Josef Cardinal Frings, of Cologne; and Archbishop Aloysius Muench, the Apostolic Nuncio, September, 1954. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Initial Relations. The first formal relationship began 14 years later in 1797 with the appointment of John B. Sartori as consul to Rome to look after American commercial affairs. This consular relationship continued without interruption until 1870 when the Papal States became a part of Italy. The Papal States sent consuls general to the United States in 1826 and 1895.

The election of Pope Pius IX in 1846 and the resulting liberalization in the government of the Papal States led to considerable debate over the issue of United States-Vatican relations in the American press. Many were opposed, but others who favored his policies, urged a closer relationship. The New York Herald, for example, favored the appointment of a chargé d'affaires or ambassador to the pope "as more respectful to the pope, and more suitable to our dignity and greatness as a people." Thus, when President Polk recommended the creation and funding of a diplomatic mission to the Vatican in his 1847 State of the Union message, the stage was set for formal diplomatic relations at a level short of full recognition. Jacob L. Martin was appointed as chargé d'affaires, and was later upgraded to the status of minister. The Vatican, however, did not reciprocate, and appointed no delegate during the period between 1848 and 1868.

During the Civil War, the American mission served as the locus of successful Union efforts to assure the non-recognition of the Confederacy by the Holy See: Jefferson Davis' request for papal recognition was met with only an ambiguous reply. Official American diplomatic contact with the Vatican was suspended in 1868 as a result of rumors that American Protestants in Rome had not been permitted to practice their religion. "America," said Congressman Thaddeus Stevens, had no desire to have representation "at any Court or Government which prohibits free worship within its Jurisdiction of the Christian religion.” Funds for the legation in Rome were cut off in 1867 to make a point—a point which would have been valid had the rumors of religious suppression been true. Diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the United States were formally terminated in 1871 when President Grant officially recognized the new government of Italy and that the Papal States had ceased to exist.

The first apostolic delegate was sent to the United States by the Holy See in 1893, but he was not accredited to the United States government, and his duties were limited to matters internal to the Church. During the period from 1871 to 1939, American relations with the Vatican were informal, but included such important contacts as the Taft mission to Rome to deal with the Philippines at the close of the Spanish-American War and the many contacts between Woodrow Wilson and Benedict XV during World War I.

Unofficial diplomatic recognition of the Vatican by the United States was reestablished at the outbreak of World War II in 1939 with the appointment of Myron Taylor (13:953c), with the rank of Ambassador, as Franklin Roosevelt’s personal representative. After Taylor resigned in 1950, no replacement was named, and personal representatives were sent only for special occasions. This unofficial relationship lasted until 1970 when President Nixon resumed the practice begun by Roosevelt by naming Henry Cabot Lodge as his personal representative. Lodge served in the post from 1970–77. David Walters, appointed by President Gerald Ford, served at the post from 1977–78. President Jimmy Carter’s representative was Robert Wagner, Sr., who served from 1978–81, when he was replaced by President Ronald Reagan’s choice, California businessman and Catholic William Wilson.

Official Representation. In 1983, at the urging of the Reagan administration, Congress quietly repealed the 1867 ban on appropriations for a diplomatic legation to the Holy See and provided for the establishment of full diplomatic relations. President Reagan appointed William Wilson, who was then serving as the president’s personal envoy, as U.S. Ambassador, and the Senate confirmed the nomination on March 7, 1984, thus reestablishing formal diplomatic relations after a lapse of 117 years. The Holy See, in turn, named Archbishop Pio Laghi, who had been serving as apostolic delegate, as pro nuncio, thus transforming the Apostolic Delegation on Massachusetts Avenue in Washington, D.C., into the Papal Nunciature or Embassy. On Oct. 15, 1986, the U.S. Senate confirmed the nomination of Frank Shakespeare, former head of CBS Television Service, as the second American ambassador at the Holy See.

The establishment of full diplomatic relations was the subject of two unsuccessful court cases filed by several religious groups and numerous individuals on the grounds that such an appointment would violate the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Reagan, the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held that the establishment of diplomatic relations is “one of the rare governmental decisions that the Constitution commits exclusively to the Executive Branch” and that federal courts have no power to interfere. In Phelps v. Reagan, a Kansas Baptist minister alleged that diplomatic recognition of the Holy See was designed by the Reagan Administration to utilize “the ecclesiastical machinery of a specific church. . . in carrying out its foreign policy, and. . . to advance Reagan’s personal partisan agenda by currying favor with American members of a specific church in an election year.” The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit called the arguments “flamboyant” and dismissed the case because taxpayers and citizens have no standing to seek judicial oversight of the president’s conduct of foreign affairs.

Bibliography: COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, United States Senate, 98th Cong. 2d Sess., Hearings Nomination of William A. Wilson to be Ambassador to the Holy See (Feb. 2, 1984). AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE V. REAGAN, 786 F.2d. 194 (3d Cir 1986), certiorari denied sub nom. AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A. V. REAGAN, 107 S. Ct. 314 (1986). PHELPS V. REAGAN, 812 F.2d 1293 (10th Cir. 1987). S. W. BETTWY, “United States-Vatican Recognition: Background and Issues,” Catholic Lawyer 29 (1984) 225. S. W. BETTWY and M. K. SHEEHAN, “United States Recognition Policy: The State of Vatican City,” California Western International Law Journal II (1981) 1. J. AGONITO, “Ecumenical Stirrings: Catholic-Protestant Relations During the Episcopacy of John Carroll,” Church History 45 (1976) 358–373. M. MARTIN, “United States-Vatican Relations,” American Catholic Historical Society Record 69 (1958) 20–55. “The Status of the Holy See in International Law,” American Journal of International Law 46 (1952) 308. A. C. RUSH, “Diplomatic Relations: The United States and the Papal States,” American Ecclesiastical Review 126 (1952) 12–27. H. R. MARRARO, “The Closing of the American Diplomatic Mission to the Vatican and Efforts to Revive It, 1868–1870,” Catholic Historical Review 33 (1948) 423–447. L. F. STARK, “Was the Papal Consulate in the United States Officially Ended?” Catholic Historical Review 30 (1944) 165–170. W. J. LALLON, “The Apostolic Delegation at Washington,” Ecclesiastical Review 95 (1936) 576–592. P. LAGHI, “The True Meaning of Vatican Diplomacy,” Origins 13 (May 3, 1984) 769–771.

[R. A. DESTRO]

NUNES BARRETO, JOÃO

Patriarch of Abyssinia; b. Porto, Portugal, date unknown; d. Goa, India, Dec. 22, 1562. He entered the Society of Jesus as a priest in 1544 and was sent to Morocco, where he labored to redeem and care for Christian slaves. Ten years later he was called to Rome; and at the counsel of St. Ignatius Loyola and King John III of Portugal, he was named patriarch of Abyssinia by Paul IV. With Melchior Carneiro and Andrew Oviedo, chosen to be his coadjutors, he traveled to Lisbon in 1555 and after their consecration there sailed for Goa. King John, like his predecessors, dreamed of establishing communications with the descendants of PRESTER JOHN, medieval Christian monarch in Asia whose legend began in the 12th century. He also wished a firm alliance against the Muslims. Nunes sent Bishop Oviedo to win the favor of Negus (Emperor) Claudius (Calāwēdōs) of Abyssinia, but after much hardship the mission was not fruitful. In 1557 Pedro Paez, SJ, converted Negus Susenyos, but by 1633 the Jesuits were expelled due to the suspicions of Negus Fasilidas.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 5:1840–41. E. CERULLI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1070. P. TACCHI VENTURI, Storia della Compagnia di Gesù (2d ed. Rome 1950–) 2.2:559–565. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934); photoduplicated with rev. and suppl., 2 v. (Louvain-Heverlee 1962) 1316. S. DELACROIX, ed., Histoire universelle des missions catholiques, 4 v. (Paris 1956–59) 1:230–231. R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916–) v. 15.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

NUNRAW, ABBEY OF

To date the only Cistercian monastery built in Scotland since the Reformation. It was founded in 1946 as a daughterhouse of ROSCREA (Ireland) at Haddington, East Lothian, near Edinburgh, and made an abbey in 1948. The site originally belonged to a Cistercian convent (founded 1152–58), which passed into private hands on the death of the last prioress (1563).

Bibliography: M. SHERRY, Nunraw (Edinburgh 1963). Royal Commission of Ancient and Historical Monuments of Scotland: County of East Lothian (Edinburgh 1924) xxix, xliv, xlvi, 45. W. F. GRAY and J. H. JAMIESON, A Short History of Haddington (Edinburgh 1944) 9, 22, 29–30, 41, 83, 121, 146. Transactions of the East Lothian Antiquarian Society, 5 (1952) 2–24; 6 (1953) 1–5. The Catholic Directory for the Clergy and Laity of Scotland, 1964 (Glasgow 1964) 75.

[L. MACFARLANE]

NUTTER, ROBERT, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Askew, Rowley; b. c. 1555 at Burnley, Lancashire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered July 26, 1600 at Lancaster. Born into a wealthy family, he and his brother Bl. John Nutter (beatified 1929) studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, before being smuggled across the English Channel to enter the English College at Rheims. Robert was ordained there Dec. 21, 1581. He returned to England with Bl. George HAYDOCK using forged names and passports. The next 18 years were divided between ministerial work and imprisonment. Sentenced into exile at Boulogne with 20 other priests, but using the alias, Rowley returned to England, where he was again committed to prison at Newgate on Nov. 30, 1585. In 1587, he was transferred to the Marshalsea, then to Wisbeach Castle, Cambridgeshire (1589–90). He and several other fervent prisoners established and followed a monastic rule of life. From prison Nutter wrote to the French provincial requesting that he be admitted to the Dominican Order as a tertiary. According to the report of attorney Thomas Hesketh, he was professed a Dominican in the presence of secular priests at Wisbeach, which was certified to the provincial at Lisbon. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: Catholic Record Society Publications I, 110; II, 248, 252, 256, 270, 273, 277, 279, 282; III, 16, 156, 384, 385, 398. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924), I, 120–21. M. J. DORCY, “Ven. Robert Nutter,” St. Dominic’s Family (Dubuque, IA 1964), 341–342. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

O

O ANTIPHONS

The seven antiphons that were traditionally sung at the Magnificat in the Divine Office on the seven days before the vigil of Christmas (December 17–23), each antiphon beginning with the interjection “O.” During this season the liturgical readings and chants, selected chiefly from Isaiah, announce the coming of the Messiah, and the closer the feast of Christmas approaches, the more the liturgy accentuates its call to the Savior with the cry “Come!” (Veni). During the Middle Ages the O antiphons enjoyed great popularity. Intonation was assigned in succession to the dignitaries of the monastery or cathedral chapter. Thus the first antiphon, O Sapientia, was intoned by the abbot; the next day, O Adonai, by the prior; O Clavis David, by the cellarer, and so on. The largest bell was rung throughout the singing of the O antiphon and its Magnificat.

Textual Structure and Sources. The O antiphons are all constructed on a plan similar to that of orations: first an invocation to the Messiah with a title inspired by the Old Testament (e.g., “O Emmanuel”); then an amplification stating an attribute of the Messiah and developing the invocation (“our King and our Law-giver, the one awaited by the nations, their savior”); finally, an appeal commencing always with “Come” and referring to the initial invocation (“Come to redeem us, Lord, our God”). Their sources may be either of scriptural origin or of ecclesiastical composition, the latter being a free manner of juxtaposing scriptural texts from different sources. (1) The texts of the O antiphons are virtually a mosaic of borrowings from the Prophetic and the Sapiential books: O Sapientia (Eccl 24.5); O Adonai (Ex 6.13); O Radix Jesse (Is 11.10); O Clavis David (Rv 3.7; cf. Is 22.22); O Oriens (Zec 6.12); O Rex Gentium (Hg 2.8); O Emmanuel (Is 7.14; 8.8). These terms from the Old Testament were very early applied to Christ. Four of them (Sapientia, Rex, Emmanuel, Radix) were already employed by Pope St. Damasus (366–384) in his Carmen de cognomentis Salvatoris (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 103:378). None of the seven invocations, however, can be found in the De nominibus Christi of the Gelasian Decretal(s), sometimes attributed to the same pope [cf. Dobschütz, (Texte und Untersuchungen 38 1912) fasc. 4:3]. The term Clavis David is applied to Christ by St. Ambrose (De institut. virg. 9.62, Patrologia Latina 16:321); it was repeated in the Pontificale romanum in the admonition Accipe virgam virtutis for the consecration of a king. (2) Non-scriptural words are few and are used to link the terms borrowed from Scripture. The two pleas Veni ad salvandum nos (from O Emmanuel) and Veni ad liberandum nos (from O Radix) do not seem to be of scriptural origin. The second appears to be taken from a Responsorium breve of the Advent liturgy and is a very ancient text, since this appeal for liberation is found in the same words in the MOZARABIC antiphony of Leon and is repeated at the beginning of an oration of the Mozarabic sacramentary (ed. M. Ferotin, col. 162, line 30).

Number and Origin. In inverse order the initials of each invocation (Sapientia, Adonai, Radix, Clavis, Oriens, Rex, Emmanuel) constitute the acrostic ERO CRAS. This is interpreted as the response of Christ to the faithful who have called upon Him during the week: “Tomorrow I shall be there.” From this acrostic we can draw two conclusions: (1) The primitive order of the antiphons was the same as that preserved today in the Roman Breviary, rather than that indicated by Amalarius (De ordine antiphonarii, ed. Hanssens, Studi e Testi 140:46) or that found in the Ambrosian antiphony or in many Gregorian MSS. (2) The original number of the antiphons was seven. Other antiphons modeled on these seven (such as O Thomas Didyme or O Virgo virginum) are not by the same author. They do not enter into the framework of the acrostic; and, above all, they are not addressed to the Messiah. O Thomas Didyme was composed for the feast of St. Thomas the Apostle (December 21), always celebrated during the period when the O antiphons are sung. O Virgo virginum, in honor of the Virgin Mary, is probably earlier, having been cited by Amalarius, and was sometimes sung on the vigil of Christmas. Amalarius attributes the composition of the O antiphons to some anonymous “cantor” (De or. antiphonarii, ch. 13, ed. Hanssens, Studi e Testi 140:44), who probably lived in the eighth century, perhaps even in the seventh. All are adapted to the same melodic theme in the 2d mode. The Magnificat that follows is sung in the solemn tone as on great feasts. Both text and melody were probably composed by one and the same author.

Manuscript page containing O antiphons, from 12th-century antiphony of Saint-Denis (Bib. Nat. MS lat. 17296, fol. 14r).

Bibliography: C. CALLEWAERT, “De groote Adventsantifonen O” in his Sacris erudiri (Steenbrugge 1940). W. J. MCGARRY, He Cometh (New York 1941). “Les Grandes Antiennes,” Revue Benedictine 2 (1885–86) 512–516. W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington IN 1958) 400.

[M. HUGLO]

O DEUS EGO AMO TE

A hymn of uncertain authorship, but attributed to St. Francis XAVIER. It is a famous Latin version of No me

mueve, mi Dios, an anonymous Spanish soneto known to have existed for many years before it was first printed in 1628. The sonnet was familiar to IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA and to Francis Xavier (d. 1552), who, in his missionary instructions, used Spanish and Portuguese versions of it. In the Latin hymn the five stanzas of irregular rhythm glow with an ardent love for the crucified Christ. The literal expression of this love has been criticized because it excludes both hope of reward and fear of punishment: Nec amo Te ut salves me./ Aut quia non amantes Te/ Aeterno punis igne. English versions of the hymn are found in numerous hymnals. Another hymn, O Deus ego amo Te/ Nam prior Tu amasti me, paraphrases in its five stanzas the familiar prayer ascribed to Ignatius Loyola, the Suscipe or “Take, O Lord.”

Bibliography: H. A. DANIEL, Thesaurus hymnologicus, 5 v. (Halle-Leipzig 1841–56) 2:335; 4:347, for text. U. CHEVALIER, Repertorium hymnologicum (Louvain-Brussels 1892–1921) 2:12896–98. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 826, 1296. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948) 193–194, for a tr. M. C. HUFF, The Sonnet “No me mueve, mi Dios” (Washington 1948). J. M. COOPER, “An Aspect of Perfect Love,” American Ecclesiastical Review 115 (1946) 101–120. F. J. CONNELL, “Unselfish Love of God,” ibid. 113 (1945) 59–61.

[G. E. CONWAY]

O FILII ET FILIAE

An Easter hymn of 12 three-line stanzas, with a triple Alleluia at the beginning and end of the hymn, and a single Alleluia after each stanza. Each verse has eight syllables and is embellished with end rhyme. The date and authorship are uncertain. Because of its simplicity it was formerly dated in the 12th century, but Julian claims 1650; others ascribe it to the Franciscan, Jean Tisserand (d. 1494). This hymn tells the story of the Resurrection: the coming of the holy women and the disciples, the message of the angel, the doubts of Thomas, and his act of faith. Numerous translations and variations exist of the text and melody.

Bibliography: F. A. MARCH, ed., Latin Hymns (New York 1874). P. GUÉRANGER, The Liturgical Year (Dublin 1868–93).

[G. E. CONWAY]

O ROMA NOBILIS

An early medieval poem in three monorhymed stanzas discovered in the early 19th century and declared the official hymn of the HOLY YEAR of 1950. The first stanza praises Christian Rome, the second invokes the aid of St. PETER, and the third, that of St. PAUL. The text is complete in only one MS (Vat. lat. 3227) from the early 12th century; a second (Monte Cassino 318) from the 11th century carries only the first strophe. The Beneventan script of both MSS suggests an origin in or near the abbey of MONTE CASSINO, probably from the late ninth or early tenth century, but TRAUBE's ascription to Verona is still prevalent. This nonliturgical poem is most frequently described, but without basis, as a medieval pilgrims' song. Its literary fame rests mainly upon the studies of B. G. Niebuhr (editio princeps, 1829) and L. Traube (1891). As early as 1822 the poem was being sung, in Rome and Berlin, in a choral setting by the papal choirmaster G. BAINI, who claimed to have drawn his melody from the not readily intelligible neumes of the Vatican MS. In 1909 at Fribourg, P. Wagner published the Vatican melody from the exact notation in solmization letters given in the Monte Cassino MS and demonstrated the complete inauthenticity of Baini's transcription. In both text and melody it is the matter of rhythm that largely occupies scholars today, although they are concerned also with the relation of the authentic melody of this poem to a secular piece, O admirabile Veneris idolum. Original settings of O Roma nobilis were produced by LISZT (1879) and L. Perosi (c. 1940). The setting in B. Reiser's Laudes festivae [(2d ed. Vatican City 1940) No. 97:306] is of unrecorded and doubtful origin.

Bibliography: F. J. E. RABY, ed., Oxford Book of Medieval Latin Verse (Oxford 1959) No. 101, text. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Analen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:383–385. Baini's transcription autograph in MS Rome Casanat. 3081. L. TRAUBE, Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Munich 1835) 19.2 (1891) 299–309 with facs. of Vat. MS. P. WAGNER, in Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 22 (1909) 1–16. B. M. PEEBLES, American Benedictine Review 1 (1950) 67–92, and in Catholic Choirmaster 36 (1950) 102–104, 143. I. ANGLÈS et al., in Roma nobilis, ed. I. CECCHETTI (Rome 1953) 1:685–689, 1183–86 (Liszt), 1187–91 (Perosi). A. MACHABEY, Cahiers de civilisation médiévale 2 (1959) 204. L'Anno santo 1950. . . a cura del Comitato centrale A. S. (Vatican City 1952) 481, 886–887.

[B. M. PEEBLES]

OAK, SYNOD OF THE

The Synod of the Oak was a local council convoked illegally in 403 by Theophilus, Patriarch of Alexandria, in a suburb of Chalcedon called "The Oak," to depose JOHN CHRYSOSTOM from the See of Constantinople. In 401 Theophilus had excommunicated and exiled the TALL BROTHERS, and other Nitrian monks who had offended him as Origenists. They appealed to John Chrysostom, who gave them hospitality but withheld ecclesiastical communion pending final settlement of their case. They also appealed to the Emperor Arcadius, and Arcadius summoned Theophilus to appear before a synod of 40 bishops in Constantinople, over which Chrysostom would preside. Chrysostom protested that, canonically, Theophilus had first to be heard by a synod in his own province.

First strophe of "O Roma Nobilis," 11th century, Monte Cassino MS (MS 318, fol. 291).

Theophilus had no such canonical qualms. On his way to the capital, he threatened that he would depose John and, on his arrival (403), connived among court and clergy to achieve that end. His plotting prospered and he moved across the Bosphorus to "The Oak," where, although outside his jurisdiction, he convoked a synod of 36 bishops. Of these, at least 29 were his own Egyptian suffragans; the others were John's foes, including some Ephesian bishops whom John had deposed for simony. Two Egyptian bishops were sent to John with a curt command for him to appear before Theophilus and his synod. John refused to appear before a court whose members were at once accusers, judges, and witnesses. Next, two of John's own clergy were told to summon him. John sent back a protest citing the illegality of the synod, and the three bishops who carried this reply were manhandled by the synodal fathers. A final summons, from the emperor himself, demanded his presence. Sure of his canonical position, John again refused, and was tried in absentia. In 46 charges he was accused of a misuse of church funds, tyrannical treatment of his clergy, irregularities in ritual, invasion of jurisdiction, and even high treason. All charges were frivolous, exaggerated, or totally false. Nevertheless, after 14 sessions, the synod condemned and deposed him. The charge of treason was referred to the emperor, who then ordered Chrysostom into exile.

Titus Oates. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: C. BAUR, John Chrysostom and His Time, tr. M. GONZAGA, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1960–61) 2:237–261. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and cont. by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 2:137–154. E. VENABLES, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, 4 v. (London 1877–87) 1:526–528. A. BIGLMAIR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl. Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 3:722. PHOTIUS, “Bibliotheca, 59,” Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 103:105–114. E. SCHWARTZ, Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 36 (1937) 168–181.

[P. W. HARKINS]

OATES PLOT

The Oates Plot (or Popish Plot), named after Titus Oates (1649–1705), the principal informer, provoked the last large-scale persecution of Catholics in England. Between 1678 and 1681 more than 25 Catholics were executed in England, many more died in prison, and many hundreds were imprisoned. In what follows an account is given of (1) the political and religious background, (2) the actual outbreak of the plot, (3) its political consequences and management, and (4) some of the outstanding trials and martyrdoms.

Background. At the Restoration of Charles II in 1660, a measure of practical toleration had been accorded to Catholics and Dissenters, though fines for recusancy were still levied. The king was obviously well-disposed toward Catholics. Positive legislation in favor of toleration for Catholics was attempted immediately after the Restoration, but this was bedeviled by the rigidity of the king’s adviser, Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon (1609–74). After the fall of Clarendon in 1667, the question of Catholicism played a part in Charles’s negotiations with Louis XIV. By the Secret Treaty of Dover (1670) Charles had agreed publicly to declare himself a Catholic at such time as should appear to him most expedient. The moment never came (till his deathbed), but in 1672, as an earnest of his intentions, Charles proclaimed the Declaration of Indulgence, removing the penal laws against all Nonconformists and recusants and permitting public worship to Dissenters and private worship to recusants. The subsequent Parliament, however, introduced the Test Act, which disabled Catholics from holding public office, and Charles was compelled to re-enforce the PENAL LAWS.

Royal Succession. The next problem concerned the royal succession of James, Duke of York. Owing to the barrenness of Charles’s wife, James was clearly the next in line to the throne, but his refusal in 1673 to take the Sacrament in the Church of England confirmed suspicions of his conversion to Catholicism. Parliament feared a popish successor and an inevitable alliance with France. If Charles could not be induced to divorce his infertile Catholic wife, then means had to be taken to prevent a Catholic successor. On the other hand, Louis XIV wished to stabilize his Continental conquests, to secure English neutrality while he did so, and to prevent an English alliance with the Dutch. In February 1676, therefore, Charles and Louis entered into another secret treaty, whereby, in return for financial aid, Charles promised his neutrality. But to prevent any possible agreement between Charles and Parliament, Louis also intensified his large-scale bribery of members of Parliament through his ambassadors in England. One of the agents for the distribution of parliamentary bribes was a professional newsletter writer, Edward Coleman, secretary to the Duke of York. Coleman was an overenthusiastic convert. He had come into conflict with the authorities because of his infringement of the state monopoly of licensed news, and in 1676 a French apostate, De Luzancy, accused him of dealings with a French Jesuit, Father St. Germain. From December 1676, with the knowledge of Charles II, Coleman's correspondence was being intercepted at the post office by the secretary of state.

In the year prior to the Plot, the king's chief minister, Thomas Osborne, Earl of Danby, was pursuing a difficult policy. By economic reform he was attempting to organize the treasury in such a way that Charles would be as little as possible dependent on either Parliament or Louis for his revenues. At the same time Danby was attempting to maintain a court party in Parliament on a basis of a policy of public nonalignment with France and strong Anglican safeguards for the monarchy and the constitution; but if the worst came to the worst, money from Louis was preferable to concessions to Parliament. The marriage alliance between William of Orange and the Princess Mary, daughter of James, Duke of York, in October 1677 was followed by a treaty of neutrality with the States-General. At the Congress of Nijmegen (1678) negotiations for a general European peace settlement were proceeding.

Early in 1678 the parliamentary opposition, led by the recently disgraced Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury (1621–83), was gaining ground. The strength of the movement toward a Dutch alliance against Louis was growing, and an anti-popery scare was started in April. In the early summer Louis seemed to be ready to wreck the negotiations at Nijmegen and to be preparing for a new war. In May 1678 he signed yet another secret treaty of neutrality with Charles, but then on the strength of that Louis signed a separate peace treaty in July with the States-General of Holland. Charles thus got neither the benefit of a French subsidy nor the credit for a Dutch alliance. Danby's policy was in ruins, and he might well expect trouble from Parliament in the autumn of 1678, since he had alienated almost all support there. It is against this background that the emergence of the Popish Plot in the late summer of 1678 must be seen.

Oates and the Outbreak of the Plot. Titus Oates was born in 1649 at Oakham, Rutlandshire, son of Samuel Oates, an Anabaptist weaver. After a highly unsatisfactory career at Merchant Taylors' School, London, and at Cambridge University, he eventually succeeded in 1670 in being ordained in the Church of England. He left two clerical appointments under a cloud and was even unsuccessful as a naval chaplain. By 1676 he had already been found guilty of perjury and was strongly suspected of sodomy. He then made the acquaintance of Matthew Medburne, a Catholic actor, who introduced him into a club at the Pheasant Tavern, Fuller's Rents, London, that served as a meeting place for Catholics and Nonconformists (Richard BAXTER was a member). In 1677 Oates succeeded in being appointed as a Protestant chaplain in the household of the Catholic Duke of Norfolk at Arundel

House in the Strand. About the same time he made the acquaintance of Dr. Israel Tonge (1621–80), Rector of St. Michael's, Wood Street, London. Tonge was anti-Royalist and anti-Jesuit, and was a crank. Oates found him credulous enough and offered to act as a spy on the Jesuits. On Ash Wednesday, March 3, 1677, therefore, Oates had himself received into the Catholic Church by William Berry, alias Hutchinson, a mentally unbalanced priest. In April of the same year Oates obtained an introduction to Richard Strange, Provincial of the Society of Jesus, who arranged for him to go to the English College, Valladolid. Oates arrived there in June; after four months he was expelled and returned to England. He next petitioned to be sent to the Jesuit College of Saint-Omer and arrived there in December 1677. During his stay at Saint-Omer he heard that the annual meeting of the officials of the Jesuit English province was being held in London on April 24, 1678. Oates returned to England in June and put his information at the disposal of Tonge; at the same time he attempted to blackmail the London Jesuits.

Tonge, armed with "revelations" of a Jesuit plot to assassinate the king, obtained access to Danby and to Charles. The king took little interest, but Danby saw the possibility of an anti-popish "scare" to distract public attention from the failure of his foreign policy. On August 26 Tonge warned Danby that letters concerning the plot had been sent to Rev. Thomas Downes, alias Father Beddingfield, SJ, the Duke of York's confessor at Windsor. Danby hurried to Windsor to intercept them, but Beddingfield had already collected them, had seen them to be forgeries, and had given them to the Duke of York. On September 6 Oates and Tonge approached a London magistrate, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, to make an affidavit concerning a deposition of 43 articles concerning a Jesuit plot, though they would not at first allow Godfrey to see the text of the deposition. Godfrey, to the chagrin of Danby, informed the Duke of York, who demanded an investigation by the Privy Council in order to expose the accusations. Oates and Tonge, therefore, with the aid of others unknown, proceeded to draft further depositions. On September 28 Tonge was summoned to attend the Council, but before the Council meeting Oates and Tonge had a plot narrative of 81 articles attested before Godfrey. Both narratives were of course a farrago of nonsense, but the development of the plot between September 6 and 28 is highly interesting. The first depositions centered on the Jesuit "consult" of April and the efforts to assassinate the king. In the later version, more names of those in Oates's immediate environment and names of those who could be arrested easily were given. The new depositions included information against Edmund Coleman; Medburne, the actor; Dr. Fogarty, Oates's physician; the Benedictines in the Savoy; and Abp. Peter TALBOT in Ireland.

There is every reason for assuming that between September 6 and 28 Oates and Tonge were being guided from another source and that that source was Danby.

The king sat with the Council on the morning of September 28 and made no attempt to disguise his disbelief in Oates, but went off in the afternoon to the races at Newmarket. Nonetheless, Oates's effrontery carried the day, and the Council adjourned in the evening having issued warrants for the arrest of the conspirators. Danby made a special point of having the Council sign a special warrant for the seizure of Coleman's papers, knowing full well the sort of correspondence that Coleman had been maintaining over the past years. Meanwhile, on the same day, Godfrey had warned Coleman of what was afoot; Coleman did not destroy his papers, but surrendered on September 30. Though not by contemporary standards treasonable, Coleman's letters were compromising and indiscreet, and he made it clear in his letters to François de LA CHAIZE, SJ, Louis XIV's confessor, that he was trying to obtain money from France to influence Parliament in favor of popery. On top of all this, on October 12, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey disappeared and on October 17 was found strangled, with a sword through his body. Parliament met four days later.

If Danby encouraged the Oates Plot in the hopes of making it an instrument of the Anglican-Royalist wing of the court party against the papist Duke of York, there is no doubt that after the reassembly of Parliament the plot was utilized by Shaftesbury, the leader of the opposition, against the whole court party and the monarchy. Shaftesbury and the Whigs worked up mass hysteria and mob violence as a means of trying to bar the Duke of York from the succession and ultimately to drive Charles from the throne. For three years the cry of "No popery" was used constantly for political ends.

Political Consequences. From October 1678 to March 1681 Charles stood virtually alone against Shaftesbury and the Whig opposition. Danby was impeached in December 1678, and the court party was in ruins. Charles has been blamed for not intervening to save those Catholics condemned to death for crimes of which he knew they were innocent. But to expect Charles to have interposed the royal prerogative against the process of the courts at such a juncture is a sentimental misunderstanding of his constitutional position. On two things he stood firm: his personal honor and the succession of his brother. When Oates began to accuse Queen Catherine of treason, Charles made it clear that he would fight back with all the means in his power. Furthermore, he persuaded the unskillful Duke of York to leave the country and then, by prorogation and dissolution, frustrated successive attempts of Parliament to introduce an Exclusion Bill. For the rest he could do nothing but try to ride out the storm. Ultimately, in March 1681, he succeeded in convincing Louis XIV that the only chance for the survival of the English monarchy and the succession of the Duke of York was for the king to rule without Parliament. With a substantial subsidy from Louis in his pocket, Charles summoned his last Parliament at Oxford. On March 21 they met; on March 28 the Commons were beginning to read the Exclusion Bill when the king suddenly dissolved Parliament and for the rest of his reign ruled alone.

The king gradually reasserted his power. In April 1681 Chief Justice William Scroggs, who had conducted most of the plot trials, was removed from office. In July Shaftesbury was sent to the Tower. In November John Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, a satire on Shaftesbury and the Whigs, appeared; within a year Shaftesbury fled to Holland and died. In June 1683 the "Rye House" Plot was discovered: this was a Whig plot to assassinate Charles on his way to Newmarket. The great Whig magnates who were implicated were prosecuted with the same vigor as the Catholics had been during the Popish Plot. As for Oates, in June 1684 the Duke of York took action against him for scandalum magnatum, and damages of £ 100,000 were given against him. While still in prison, Oates was indicted for perjury and came up for trial in February 1685, but the trial was deferred on account of the death of Charles. In May he was found guilty of perjury and sentenced to be pilloried and whipped annually. In 1688, on the abdication of James and the accession of William III, Oates was released from prison and became once more a government pensioner. He died in 1705.

The Trials. The first trial was obviously designed to instill terror. On Nov. 15, 1678, William Staley, a Catholic goldsmith, was arrested on the evidence of two obvious rascals and charged with having said that the king was a rogue and that he would stab the king if no one else would. He was brought to trial six days later, condemned, and executed on November 26. It was in this atmosphere that the trial of Coleman began on the following day. Seven of the jurors in Staley's case served at Coleman's trial. The most damning evidence against Coleman lay in letters written to François de la Chaize in 1675, but it is significant that the whole of Coleman's captured correspondence was not published until the end of 1680, and Coleman remained remarkably reticent about his political activities. He was condemned and executed on December 3. On Dec. 17, 1678, William Ireland, SJ, procurator of the English province; John Grove, a layman employed by the Jesuits; and Thomas Pickering, OSB, a lay brother; together with Thomas Whitebread, SJ, and John Fenwick, SJ, were tried for treason. There was only one witness against Whitebread and Fenwick, but instead of being freed, they were remanded to prison by Lord Chief Justice Scroggs. Ireland and Grove were executed on Jan. 24, 1679; Pickering was respited, probably at the instance of the queen, but was eventually executed on May 9.

On Feb. 5, 1679, three servants at Somerset House, Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, were tried and condemned for the murder of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey on the perjured testimony of Miles Prance, a Catholic goldsmith, who had originally been arrested as a conspirator but induced to turn king's evidence. Green and Hill were executed on February 21 and Berry, a Protestant, was executed on February 28.

On Feb. 8, 1679, occurred the first acquittal. Samuel Atkins, a Protestant and a clerk of Samuel Pepys, had been arrested in November 1678 for complicity in Godfrey's murder. (The Whigs had hoped that the young man would implicate his master, Pepys, a trusted servant of the Duke of York at the Admiralty.) Fortunately, the efficient Pepys had been able to produce witnesses, all Protestants, to prove an alibi. This was doubtless a setback to the Whig plot managers, and it was not until June 13 that the next batch of major treason trials took place.

First came five Jesuits: Thomas Whitebread, the English Provincial; William Harcourt, Superior of the London district; Anthony Turner; John Fenwick; and John Gavan. Whitebread and Fenwick maintained that they could not be tried twice for the same offense, but this was overruled. Defense witnesses were produced from Saint-Omer who swore that Oates was at Saint-Omer in April 1678 and thus could not possibly have been at the Jesuit "consult" as he had claimed, but to no avail. The following day Richard Langhorne, a Catholic lawyer who had acted for the Jesuits in their business affairs, was also tried and condemned. The five Jesuits were executed on June 20 and Langhorne on July 14.

On July 10 Parliament was dissolved. On July 18 Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician; William Marshall, OSB; William Rumley, OSB, a lay brother; and James Corker, OSB, were tried for treason and acquitted. Wakeman and Rumley were released, and retired to the Continent, but Corker and Marshall were remanded to prison to be tried for their priesthood.

Meanwhile a number of priests were put to death in the provinces on account of their priesthood. William PLESSINGTON, secular priest, was executed at Chester on July 19; Philip EVANS, SJ, and John LLOYD, secular priest, were executed at Cardiff on July 22; Nicholas Postgate, secular priest, at York on August 7; Charles MIHAN (Mahoney), OSF, an Irishman, at Ruthin, North Wales, August 12; John WALL, OSF, at Worcester, August 25; John KEMBLE, secular priest, at Hereford, also August 25; and David LEWIS, SJ, at Usk, August 27. It is noteworthy that at Stafford, Andrew Bromwich, a secular priest, though condemned to death for priesthood, was reprieved after taking the Oath of Allegiance and that Charles Carne, a secular priest, who asserted at his trial at Hereford that he had taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy was acquitted also.

On Feb. 11, 1680, Sir Thomas Gascoigne, an elderly Yorkshire baronet, was tried for treason on the evidence of two servants and was acquitted. Nevertheless his daughter Lady Tempest was sent for trial at York, together with Sir Miles Stapleton, Mary Pressicks, and a priest, Thomas Thwing. On March 17, at York assizes, they challenged so many jurors that the trial had to be held over until the summer. Eventually they were tried on July 28. Thwing was condemned and executed on October 23; the others were acquitted.

The "Meal Tub" Plot. The so-called Meal Tub Plot brings an element almost of farce into the tragic story. A Catholic midwife, Mrs. Elizabeth Cellier, a woman of extraordinary energy and fortitude, had been bringing what help she could to the Catholics in prison for the plot, and had provided for some of the defense witnesses at the trials. While visiting the jails, she met Thomas Dangerfield, imprisoned for debt, and fell, it seems, a victim to his plausible manners. She paid off his debts, and on his release he acted for her as a spy on the Whigs. He was, however, playing a double game. He gave Mrs. Cellier some papers that he claimed proved the existence of a Presbyterian plot. These Mrs. Cellier hid in a meal tub in her house. Then he made a confession to the authorities, claiming that the papers were forgeries inspired by the Catholics and that the Earl of Castlemaine, Lady Powis, and Mrs. Cellier had tried to bribe him to kill the king. Lord Castlemaine and Mrs. Cellier were tried for treason in June 1680 and acquitted. Mrs. Cellier then published her own account of her dealings with Dangerfield and of her trial. For this she was fined and condemned to stand in the pillory on September 11.

In November 1680, concurrently with its attempts to push through the Exclusion Bill, the House of Commons resolved to act against the Catholic lords who had been in the Tower since the outbreak of the plot in 1678. They chose as their first victim William Howard, Viscount Stafford. The trial of Stafford by his peers in the House of Lords took place from November 30 to December 7. If Stafford had had a jury trial, he might have been acquitted. As it was, his fate depended on a public declaration by each individual peer. Fifty-five lords found him guilty and thirty-one declared him not guilty; he was condemned to death. On December 18 Stafford, at his own request, came to the bar of the House of Lords to make a statement. He told of his efforts to obtain toleration for the Catholics at the Restoration by payment of a collective fine and went on to tell of his efforts at the time of the Test Act to secure an alliance between Shaftesbury's party and the Duke of York. At the mention of Shaftesbury he was ordered back to the Tower and was executed on December 29.

The last plot trial was that of Oliver PLUNKETT, Archbishop of Armagh. Plunkett had been arrested and brought as prisoner to Dublin Castle on Dec. 6, 1679. The reason why the Viceroy James Butler, Duke of Ormonde, had delayed so long was that, previous to the plot, Plunkett had been willing to cooperate with the authorities in the condemnation and extirpation of violence and brigandage. But by the efforts of Henry Jones, Protestant Bishop of Meath and a strong anti-Royalist, who was in close correspondence with Colonel Mansell, one of the English Whig plot managers, it was arranged that Plunkett should be brought to England to stand trial. On Oct. 30, 1680, he was brought to London and committed for trial; a host of Irish informers, mostly apostate priests, were brought over to testify against him. He was not brought to trial until May 3, 1681. By this time, after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament in March, the plot was well on the wane. Nevertheless, Plunkett was found guilty of treason and executed on July 1, 1681. What principally told against him at his trial was the fact that the Irish prosecution witnesses were new and had not been discredited as the English informers had been. Though Plunkett was the last to be executed for the plot, many Catholics sentenced or awaiting trial remained in jail until the end of Charles II's reign.

The savagery and long persistence of the Oates Plot was attributable principally to Shaftesbury and the Whigs, it can also be partly attributed to the general cynicism and dissoluteness of the age. But a great share of the blame must be attributed to the bribery and corruption of the English Parliament by Louis XIV, the Most Christian King.

Bibliography: J. POLLOCK, The Popish Plot (London 1903; new ed. Cambridge, England 1944), brilliant pioneer work but unbalanced. J. LANE, Titus Oates (London 1949), excellent. F. S. RONALDS, The Attempted Whig Revolution of 1674–81 (Urbana, IL 1937), thorough and detached. J. WARNER, History of . . . the Presbyterian Plot, ed. T. A. BIRRELL, tr. J. BLIGH, 2 v. (Publications of the Catholic Record Society 47, 48; 1953–55), a near contemporary account. D. OGG, England in the Reign of Charles II, 2 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1955; repr. pa. London 1963), excellent on political background. Besides bibliog. in the above volumes, see C. L. GROSE, A Select Bibliography of British History, 1660–1760 (Chicago 1939), and suppl. in Journal of Modern History 12 (1940) 515–534. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924), invaluable martyrology. J. LINGARD, The History of England, 10 v. (Copyright ed. London 1883), relevant chapters are still useful. Special topics: on Coleman, Coventry MSS v.11, Longleat House, Wiltshire and Bulstrode Papers v.12, Carl H. Pforzheimer Library, New York. On Atkins, A. BRYANT, Samuel Pepys, 3 v. (2d ed. London 1948–49) v.2, The Years of Peril. On Plunkett, A. CURTAYNE, The Trial of Oliver Plunkett (New York 1953) and E. CURTIS, Blessed Oliver Plunkett (Dublin 1963), popular treatment.

[T. A. BIRRELL]

OATHS

Oaths are appeals to God in witness of the truth of statements or of the binding character of promises. The oath has been in use among all peoples; it continues to be regarded as a useful social institution and a formal guarantee of truthfulness necessary in organized society. Some (e.g., the Quakers) have interpreted Mt 5.4 to be an absolute prohibition of oaths, but Christ's words are a condemnation only of the type of trivial or profane oaths that were permitted under pharisaical casuistry (see OATHS IN THE BIBLE).

There was some difference of opinion among the Fathers of the Church regarding the licitness of oaths. Chrysostom regarded them as a snare of the devil to be avoided under all circumstances (Serm. ad pop. Ant. 15; In Act. Apost. hom. 8). Augustine was not concerned about a gospel prohibition, but thought that the oath should be avoided because of the danger of perjury that would arise from the frequent use of it (In psalm. 88.4; De mend. 28). Others, basing their arguments on New Testament usage, especially on the example of St. Paul, who frequently expressed himself in language indistinguishable from an oath (e.g., 1 Thes 2.5; 2 Cor 1.23; Gal 1–20; Rom 1.9), thought the taking of oaths was permissible in proper circumstances. This view prevailed in Christian times. Oaths became part of the judicial procedure; and oaths pledging fealty, fidelity, or the faithful performance of the duties of an office were recognized as having a social value. Theologians have generally held that an oath taken under proper conditions is not only licit but is also an act of the virtue of religion inasmuch as it is an expression of homage to the wisdom and power of God (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, 2a2ae, 81.2).

By reason of the matter with which it is concerned an oath is either assertory (declaratory), that is, it calls upon God to witness that one is speaking the truth; or it is promissory, that is, it calls upon God to guarantee one's pledge to do or not to do something. In mode, an oath is either invocatory or imprecatory. In the former, one calls upon God as a witness; in the latter, one invites God's punishment if what is sworn to is false. An oath may also be either implicit or explicit. In the one, God is mentioned by name; in the other, the formula or gesture used is generally understood to imply the invocation of Him.

King Charles swearing his oath upon the Gospels, miniature in the "Coronation Book of Charles V," French, 1365 (Cotton MS Tiberius VIII, fol. 46v).

To be licit, an oath demands truthfulness, judgment (prudence), and justice (Jer 4.2). The first of these conditions requires the person who takes the oath to speak truly and, in the case of a promissory oath, to be sincere in his intention to fulfill his promise. Judgment, or prudence, requires sufficient reason for taking the oath. In an assertory oath justice demands that the statement should not be sinful (as would be the case, for example, if it were defamatory); in a promissory oath, that which is promised should be morally lawful.

In the case of the promissory oath, the object of the promise must be possible and morally good. A promise of what is impossible, evil, or vain dishonors God and has no binding force. Moreover, it is understood that one undertakes to keep the promise only so long as the fulfillment remains morally possible, provided legitimate authority does not forbid it, and provided no notable change occurs in the matter of the promise, and the beneficiary of the promise does not yield his right to the fulfillment.

Because God is called to witness in an oath, the Church, as the official representative of Christ, legislates on the taking of oaths and claims the power of releasing those who are bound by promissory oaths.

See Also: PERJURY.

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae, 2a2ae, 89. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, rev. and enl. ed. by L. W. GEDDES (New York 1958) 2:44–48. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, rev. A. SCHMITT and G. HEINZEL, 3 v. (Innsbruck 1961–62); v. 1 contains complementa, De castitate and De poenis ecclesiasticis, separately paged, 2:208–223. N. IUNG, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 14.2:1940–56.

[M. HERRON]

OATHS (IN THE BIBLE)

The custom of swearing, or taking oaths, that is, of putting a curse on oneself if what is asserted is not true or if a promise is not kept, has always been widespread among all people who believe either in the magical power of such self-maledictions or in the avenging justice of a deity who punishes those who swear falsely. This article is concerned with the taking of oaths as mentioned in the Bible.

In the Old Testament. Anthropomorphically, God Himself is often presented in the Old Testament as taking oaths, especially in regard to His covenant [See COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE)]. Thus, “he promised on oath to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob” (Gn 50.24) to make their descendants a great nation and to give them a special land (Gn 22.16–18; 26.3–4; 35.12). He renewed this sworn promise to Moses (Dt 1.8). Later, “the Lord swore to David a firm promise” [Ps 131(132).11] of an everlasting posterity and rule [Ps 88(89).4–5, 36–37] and an eternal priesthood [Ps 109(110).4]. It is these promises that are reaffirmed by the prophets (Jer 33.21–22; Mi 7.20). Besides these oaths that promise great blessings, there are the oaths that threaten with punishment the Israelites who revolted in the desert (Nm 14.28–35).

Whether men swore by God explicitly (Gn 21.23; Jos 2.12) or implicitly (Gn 42.15; 1 Sm 1.26), an oath was a serious matter (Ex 20.7), for the oath always involved a conditional or contingent curse. Moreover, the oath was ever regarded as a sign of loyalty to God (Dt 6.13; Is 48.1), and therefore a false oath was basically a profanation of God’s name (Lv 19.12; Ex 20.7). Oaths were employed both in judicial matters and in a variety of everyday affairs. Thus oaths were taken to certify the truth of an utterance and to pledge fidelity to one’s word (1 Sm 14.44; 20.13; 25.22; 2 Sm 3.9; Gn 25.33; 47.31); to ascertain the guilt of a person suspected of a crime, e.g., in the trial by ORDEAL (Nm 5.16–28); and to ratify an alliance (Gn 21.24, 26, 31) or a friendship (1 Sm 20.16–17).

In the New Testament. It is only in the New Testament that the oaths made by God in the Old Testament attain their perfect fulfillment: by sending the Messiah God has been faithful to “the oath that he swore to Abraham our father” (Lk 1.73), His promise to David has been fulfilled by Christ’s Resurrection (Acts 2.29–35), and it is God’s solemn oath that ratifies Christ’s eternal priesthood and guarantees the reality and efficacy of the New Covenant (Heb 7.21, 25).

Respect for oaths seems to have been carefully preserved by the ancient Israelites, but by the time of Christ’s coming the Pharisees had distorted this traditional respect through their casuistry. Christ energetically attacked these legalistic abuses, demanding absolute sincerity of his disciples (Mk 23.16–22). He proclaimed a new ideal: “But I say to you not to swear at all” (Mt 5.34). St. James restates this teaching: “Let your yes be yes, your no, no” (Jas 5.12). Yet Christ did not absolutely abolish or condemn the use of the oath; His demand set the Christian ideal, but did not rule out the possibility of an oath on certain occasions. Thus, e.g., St. Paul often employed oath formulas in order to testify to the truth of his assertions (Rom 1.9; 9.1; 2 Cor 1.23; 11.31; Gal 1.20).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1656–58. J. PEDERSEN, Der Eid bei den Semiten (Leipzig 1914). S. H. BLANK, “The Curse, Blasphemy, the Spell, and the Oath,” Hebrew Union College Annual 23.1 (Cincinnati 1950–51) 73–95. F. HORST, “Der Eid im AT,” Evangelische Theologie 17 (1957) 366–384.

[J. V. MORRIS]

OATHS, ENGLISH POST-REFORMATION

From the first days of the English Reformation oaths, tests, and formal declarations were used to secure submission to the changes imposed by conformity to the Established Church. Later they were employed to penalize Catholics, and finally, as a condition of relief from legal disabilities.

Oath of Supremacy, 1534 to 1559. The early history of this oath is complicated. The statute (22 Henry VIII ch. 15) of 1530 confirmed HENRY VIII’s pardon of the English clergy for unlawfully acknowledging Thomas WOLSEY’s legatine authority in return for a grant of £100,000 and the Convocations’ recognition (February and March 1530) that he was “of the Church and Clergy of England, [the] especial Protector, single and supreme Lord, and, as far as the law of Christ allows, even Supreme Head.” The qualification, “as far as the law of Christ allows,” inserted in the Convocations’ declaration at the instance of St. John FISHER, was omitted in a similar acknowledgement made by Parliament after the break with Rome in the Dispensations Act, 1534 (25 Henry VIII ch. 21). Then, the first Act of Succession in 1534 (25 Henry VIII ch. 22), having recited and approved Thomas CRANMER’s annulment of the king’s marriage with CATHERINE OF ARAGON and Henry’s marriage to Anne Boleyn, enacted that everyone “at their full ages . . . shall make a corporal oath” to keep “the whole effects and contents of this present Act.” Refusal was punishable with loss of goods and life imprisonment, but no form for this oath was provided. The text of the oath taken by Lords and Commons (Lords' Journals, 1.82) before Parliament was prorogued in March 1534 refers, however, not only to the Act of Succession but to “all other Acts and Statutes made since the beginning of this present Parliament . . . anything therein contained,” and thus to the Dispensations Act. This may have been the form of oath that was widely tendered and taken during the summer of 1534, but refused by John Fisher and Thomas MORE, among others.

In December 1534 an Act of Supremacy (26 Henry VIII ch. 1) reaffirmed that the “King is the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England called Anglicana Ecclesia,” and a second Act of Succession (26 Henry VIII ch. 2) gave a form of oath said to be that intended by the earlier act. It differs from that in the Lords' Journals only by omitting the phrase “made since the beginning of this present Parliament,” and so equally required an acknowledgement of royal supremacy. Another statute (26 Henry VIII ch. 13) made the denial of any royal title treason, so that refusal of the oath was (after Feb. 1, 1535) treason. It was for this offense that Fisher and More were convicted and executed. In July 1536 an act “For Extinguishing Papal Authority” (28 Henry VIII ch. 10) provided a new oath by which all officeholders (ecclesiastical and lay) and all who held lands of the king or took holy orders or religious vows swore they would “assist and defend” the supremacy. The Act of Succession, 1544 (35 Henry VIII ch. 1), enacted another new and very long oath that involved a profession of faith in the royal supremacy. It was to be taken by all officeholders and by anyone when required.

All legislation inconsistent with papal primacy was repealed in 1554 (1 and 2 Philip and Mary ch. 8) and most of it was revived by the first of Elizabeth I's statutes, the Act of Supremacy, 1559 (1 Elizabeth I ch. 1). This reintroduced what was substantially the 1536 oath, viz, “I, A.B., do utterly testify and declare in my conscience that the Queen's Highness is the only Supreme Governor of the Realm . . . as well as in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal, and that no foreign . . . prelate . . . hath or ought to have any jurisdiction power . . . or authority ecclesiastical or spiritual within this realm.” It was to be taken by the clergy and by all holding office under the Crown, and by those taking university degrees; refusal entailed disability from holding office or preferment. It appears in practice not to have been tendered in the universities or to the parochial clergy; an undertaking to use the Book of COMMON PRAYER was thought sufficient. A statute of 1563 (5 Elizabeth I ch. 1) provided that the oath could be required of schoolmasters, lawyers, and legal officials, and that refusal by anyone should be punished on the first occasion by the penalties of PRAEMUNIRE (forfeiture of lands and goods, and life imprisonment) and on a second (after the lapse of three months), as treason.

Oath of Allegiance (or Obedience), 1606. In response to a royal proclamation of November 1602, distinguishing between Jesuits and the secular clergy, and extending to the latter, in veiled language, hope of some amelioration of the laws against them, 13 secular priests on Jan. 31, 1603, submitted to Elizabeth I a Protestation of Allegiance in which they denounced papal sponsored plots of invasion, and bound themselves to disobey any papal decree of excommunication or deposition of the Queen. She was dying, however, and the Protestation had no immediate effect. After the Gunpowder Plot (1605) the persecution of Catholics was intensified, and the first of two severe statutes (3 and 4 James I ch. 4, 5) included (ch. 4 sec. 8, 9, 27) a device to create dissension among the Catholics. Although there could be no serious doubts as to Catholic loyalty, the Protestation and the negotiations preceding it had shown that there were differences of opinion on the pope's deposing power, which was stoutly defended by the Jesuits, among others. The following Oath of Allegiance was therefore drafted to exploit these differences and to cast doubt on that loyalty: “I, A.B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge . . . that our sovereign lord, King James, is lawful and rightful king . . . and that the pope neither of himself nor by any authority of the Church or See of Rome, or by any other means with any other, has any power to depose the king . . . or to authorise any foreign prince to invade him . . . or to give license to any to bear arms, [or] raise tumults . . . Also I do swear that notwithstanding any sentence of excommunication or deprivation I will bear allegiance and true faith to His Majesty. . . . And I do further swear that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical this damnable doctrine and position,—that princes which be excommunicated by the pope may be deposed or murdered by their subjects or by any other whatsoever. And I do believe that the pope has no power to absolve me from this oath. I do swear according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words.” The oath became law on June 26, 1606. It could be required of anyone convicted or suspected of recusancy, and refusal entailed liability to the penalties of praemunire. After 1610 (7 James I ch. 6) it could be demanded of anyone over 18. Subscription did not, however, relieve Catholics of any of the penalties of the anti-Catholic legislation as the 1603 signatories had hoped.

On Sept. 22, 1606, Paul V condemned the oath “as it contains many things evidently contrary to faith and salvation,” though he prudently refrained from enumerating them. James I replied that the oath was not meant to encroach upon anyone's conscience, and among the Catholics, minimizers maintained that the oath might be interpreted by the lawgiver's intention and might, therefore, be taken. But the Church's doctrine has always been that oaths are addressed to God Himself and must be accepted in the precise sense of the words pronounced. If James had made his subjects swear specifically "in the sense by him explained," the oath might perhaps have been endured, but when he made them "swear according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words" to what was injurious to Catholic consciences, this could not be tolerated. The most objectionable words were those condemning the deposing power as "impious, heretical, and damnable." The doctrine of the deposing power was, as far as practical politics went, already merely an embarrassment. But it was implied by the then-current Catholic teaching on the nature of the Church, and until the previous two or three generations it had been generally accepted as a valuable safeguard for liberty, both religious and civil. Many, including Paul V, had not realized that the power would never be in vogue again, even in Catholic countries, and they believed that it could not be denied without seriously impairing the Roman primacy. And while Robert BELLARMINE, Robert PERSONS, and several other early opponents of the oath thus went further in condemning it than later theologians have done, it is still difficult to see how a Catholic could conscientiously swear that a doctrine long maintained by the popes and by many in the Church, albeit not de fide, was "impious, heretical, and damnable." On its side, Rome could not allow the state to judge what was heresy or to specify the conditions under which Catholics would disobey the Holy See. Resistance to the oath was not, therefore, chiefly or solely the result of belief in the deposing power as Catholics such as Thomas PRESTON (ROGER WIDDRINGTON), who wrote in its defense, or those with Gallican leanings, such as Charles BUTLER or M. A. Tierney, have claimed. (The Sorbonne on June 30, 1681, very shortly before approving the Gallican Articles, censored the oath and found in it very little that was objectionable.) English Catholics like William BISHOP (later made a bishop by Rome) and Leander Jones, President of the English Benedictines, who explicitly rejected the deposing power, nevertheless refused the oath. Bishop was imprisoned for refusing it, while Jones consented only to an oath of his own drafting.

The archpriest George BLACKWELL, then head of the English clergy, had at first disapproved of the oath, but then in July 1606, after conferring with some of the leading clergy, allowed it. Later, after the Pope's brief, he disallowed it again, and finally, being imprisoned, he took the oath, relying on James's statement that no encroachment on conscience was intended. In a pastoral letter

Blackwell recommended the faithful to do the same. The Pope issued a new brief (Aug. 23, 1607) repeating his prohibition, and on Sept. 28, 1607, Cardinal Bellarmine wrote to Blackwell exhorting him to obey the brief. As this also proved ineffectual, a new archpriest, George Birkhead, was appointed in February 1608, and Blackwell was told that his faculties would be withdrawn if he did not retract within two months. This he refused to do, and much to James's satisfaction, continued to defend his opinion for three years before he was finally suspended. Meanwhile James himself answered the missives sent to Blackwell in an anonymous tract Triplici Nodo, Triplex cuneus ("A triple wedge for a triple knot," i.e., the two briefs and Bellarmine's letter). This was answered by Bellarmine, also anonymously, in Responsio ad librum: Triplici nodo, triplex cuneus (1608). James now dropped his anonymity and reprinted his tract with a Premonition to Christian Princes and an appendix on his adversaries' supposed mistakes (January 1609). Upon this Bellarmine published under his own name his Apologia pro responsione ad librum Jacobi I (1609). James opposed to this a treatise by a learned Scots Catholic, W. Barclay, De potestate papae (1609). Barclay was a decided Gallican, and Bellarmine's answer, Tractatus de potestate summi pontificis in rebus temporalibus (1610), gave such offense to the Gallican party that it was publicly burned in Paris by a decree of Nov. 26, 1610. A similar fate befell Francisco SUÁREZ'S answer to James, Defensio Fidei Catholicae adversus Anglicanae sectae errores, both in Paris and London. At every stage of the contest a host of other combatants joined the fray. On the papal side were Cardinal Du Perron, Leonard Lessius, Jakob Gretser, Thomas Fitzherbert, Martin Becanus, Caspar Scioppius, Robert Persons, N. Coeffeteau, A. Eudaemon Joannes, and Matthew Kellison. On the other side were Bp. Lancelot Andrewes, Isaac Casaubon, Paolo Sarpi, William Barlow, Robert Burhill, Pierre du Moulin, William Barrett, John Barnes, and especially the Benedictine Thomas Preston writing as Roger Widdrington. Most of the Protestant books written in Latin, together with the works of Preston and Barclay, were put on the Roman Index.

Some idea of the pressures caused by the oath may be gathered from the Acts of the Martyrs of England and Wales (see ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF) during these years. When William LAUD succeeded to Canterbury, the policy of splitting the English Catholics and driving the Jesuits from England was revived (1634), and in a new attempt to induce Catholics to take the oath another book defending it was produced, it seems by Preston, using (with his consent) the name of William Howard. An answer written in extreme terms by a young Jesuit, Edward Courtney, vere Leedes, led to Courtney's imprisonment, and was used to foster the impression that only Jesuit intrasigence prevented a settlement between the English government and the Catholics. Courtney was attacked also by Leander Jones who had come to England hoping that he could negotiate a rap-prochement between Rome and Canterbury, or, failing that, toleration for the English Catholics. Jones unsuccessfully urged that Rome should withdraw its condemnation of the oath if Charles I declared it involved “nothing else but a true and natural civil obedience and loyalty” and was not “a denial of any spiritual authority belonging to His Holiness,” and he attempted to devise a formula for the oath that would be acceptable to both sides. Similar proposals were mooted during the Commonwealth and after the Restoration, but none were acceptable to Rome.

Oath of Abjuration, 1643 and 1655. With the success of the Puritans in the civil wars the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance naturally fell into desuetude, though they were not repealed until 1650. An act of Aug. 29, 1643, provided that Catholics should forfeit two-thirds of their estates, personal and real, and that everyone should be “adjudged a papist” who refused an oath renouncing papal supremacy, transubstantiation, purgatory, and other doctrines. No Catholic could possibly take this oath. In 1655 the penalties that before 1650 attached to failure to attend the Anglican Church were, by an ordinance, attached to refusal of this oath, which was reissued in an amended (and more objectionable) form. This measure was, however, only sparingly enforced.

Test Oaths, 1672 and 1678. In 1672 after the conversion of James, then Duke of York, a Test Act compelled all holders of office under the Crown to make a short “Declaration against Transubstantiation,” viz, to swear that “there is not any transubstantiation in the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper . . . at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever” (25 Charles II ch. 2). This test was effective: James resigned his post as Lord High Admiral. After the OATES PLOT (1678) a much longer test was devised with a further clause that “the invocation of the virgin Mary, or any saint and the Sacrifice of the Mass . . . are superstitious and idolatrous . . . and that I make this declaration without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever, and without any dispensation already granted me by the pope.” (30 Charles II st. 2 ch. 1). This formula later became notorious as the “King’s Declaration.” At the time it was appointed for officeholders and members of both Houses, except for the Duke of York.

James II largely freed himself from the obstacle to appointing Catholics to office which the Test Act imposed. He did this by exercising the prerogative dispensing power after the judges had held in Godden v. Hales (1686; II State Trials 1165) that it was contrary to the principles of the constitution to deprive the Crown of the services of any of its subjects when they were needed. After the REVOLUTION OF 1688 the test was more stringently enforced; a clause was even added to the Bill of Rights requiring the sovereign himself to take the declaration (1 William and Mary sess. 2 ch. 2). Since the test was obligatory on all officeholders, the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance became otiose, and were therefore cut down to a line or two and joined with the Oath of Fidelity to King William (1 William and Mary sess. 1. ch. 8). This oath could be tendered to anyone by any two justices of the peace at their discretion. Persons refusing the oath were deemed popish recusants and were thereupon liable to all the penalties of the statutes punishing absence from church and were disabled from practicing as lawyers and voting at elections (7 and 8 William and Mary ch. 4; 1 George I st. 2 ch. 13).

The Irish Oath, 1774, to Emancipation, 1829. The first relaxations of the system of penal oaths were due to external pressure: the need to pacify Canada and the military demands of the war of American Independence. The Quebec Act, 1774 (14 George III ch. 83), provided that Catholics resident in the province might freely practice their religion, and should not be obliged to take the Oath of Supremacy under 1 William and Mary sess. 1 ch. 8. A simple oath of allegiance was substituted. In the same year the Irish Parliament similarly authorized an oath of allegiance to King George and rejection of the Stuart Pretender, which involved no rejection of the pope’s spiritual authority or any article of faith and which could be taken by Catholic soldiers. The alleged malpractice of “no faith with heretics” was renounced; so was the deposing power, but without the objectionable words, “impious, heretical and damnable.” The “temporal and civil jurisdiction of the pope, direct and indirect within the realm” was also renounced, and the promise was given that no dispensation from the oath should be considered valid. This Irish Oath was embodied in the first Catholic Relief Act, 1778 (18 George III ch. 60), which provided that English Catholics on taking it should be freed of the worst penalties of laws passed during the reign of William and Mary (11 and 12 William III ch. 4); the clergy readily took the oath.

In 1788 a committee of lay Catholics with Gallican leanings (who later formed the Cisalpine Club) were negotiating with the government for further relief. To them Lord Stanhope made it clear that if more concessions were required, more assurances should be given. A long Protest was accordingly drafted, which not only rejected the alleged malpractices disowned by the Irish Oath, but did so in strong and untheological language. It reintroduced, for instance, the objectionable terms “impious, heretical, and damnable'' of the 1606 oath. Nevertheless, the committee insisted (1) that the words would be understood in a broad popular way, and (2) that to obtain the Relief Act, it must be signed at once. For this reason it was freely signed by laity and clergy and by the four vicars apostolic, although two later retracted their names. When the signatures had been obtained, the new Relief Bill was brought forward by the government with an oath founded on the Protest (hence called the Protestation oath), which excluded from relief those who would not swear to it and accept the name of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters." This bill would have divided the Catholic community. The successful opposition to it was led by John MILNER, then only a country priest, and the second Relief Act, 1791 (31 George III ch. 32) passed without any significant changes in the previous oath and without changing the name of Catholics. Even though the Emancipation Act, 1829 (10 George IV ch. 7) was eventually carried without any tests, this was not at first foreseen. The Catholic Committee continued its endeavors to disarm Protestant prejudices with proposals (like the Veto) that savored of Gallicanism. So too did the oath annexed to the bill proposed in 1813, which, from its length, was styled the "Theological Oath."

Repeal of the Statutory Oaths, 1867 to 1910. The Relief Acts were generally only measures of relief, leaving the old statutes, oaths, and tests on the statute book. The disused tests and oaths were repealed between 1867 and 1910. In 1867 the declaration was repealed (30 and 31 Victoria ch. 75). After this, the only person bound to pronounce the oath was the king himself at his accession. In 1871 the Promissory Oaths Act removed all the old Oaths of Allegiance (34 and 35 Victoria ch. 48). Between 1891 and 1908 five unsuccessful bills or motions were introduced into Parliament for the abolition of the king's declaration, and it was only in 1910 that this last anti-Catholic declaration was repealed by the Accession Declaration Act (10 Edward VII and 1 George V ch. 29).

Bibliography: Statutes of the Realm, ed. A. LUDERS et al., 12 v. (London 1810–28). Statutes at Large (London 1762–). Acts and Ordinances of the Interregnum 1642–60, ed. C. H. FIRTH and R. S. RAIT, 3 v. (London 1911). C. BUTLER, Historical Memoirs Respecting the English, Irish, and Scottish Catholics from the Reformation to the Present Time, 4 v. (London 1819–21). H. TOOTELL, Dodd's Church History of England, ed. M. A. TIERNEY, 5 v. (London 1839–43). For particular oaths: P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963) v.2. R. G. USHER, The Reconstruction of the English Church, 2 v. (New York 1910). C. J. RYAN, "The Jacobean Oath of Allegiance," American Catholic Historical Review 28 (1942) 159–183. G. SITWELL, "Leander Jones's Mission to England, 1634–35," Recusant History 5 (1959–60) 132–182. T. CLANCY, "English Catholics and the Papal Deposing Power 1570–1640," ibid. 6 (1961–62) 114–140, 205–227; 7 (1962–63) 2–10. W. K. L. WEBB, "Thomas Preston OSB, alias Roger Widdrington 1567–1640," Biographical Studies 2 (1953–54) 216–268. W. BIRCHLEY, The Catholiques Plea (London 1659); Reflections on the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance (London 1661). H. THURSTON, Titus Oates' Test (London 1909). J. MILNER, Supplementary Memoirs of English Catholics (London 1820). B. N. WARD, Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England, 1781–1803, 2 v. (London 1909); The Eve of Catholic Emancipation, 3 v. (London 1911–12).

[P. R. GLAZEBROOK]

OBADIAH, BOOK OF

The fourth of the MINOR PROPHETS. The "Vision of Obadiah," which is its own title (v.1), comprises only 21 verses and is thus the shortest book of the Old Testament. It falls easily into two parts: (1) the punishment of Edom on the DAY OF THE LORD because of its treachery against Judah when Jerusalem fell in 587 B.C. (1–15) and (2) Israel's victorious revenge (16–21). Verse 15b forms the closing sentence of the first part: the law of retaliation (Ex 21.23–25) will be applied to Edom. The passage in Jer 49.7–16, 22—with some differences of text and order of sentences—is similar to verses 1–14 of Obadiah, and both pieces may be dependent on a common source. Edom, a long-standing enemy of Israel, will be the object of a day of vengeance described in Is 34.1–17; 63.1–6; Ez 25.12–14; 35.1–15; Jl 4.19; and Mal 1.2–5. In Obadiah verses 11–14, vividly recall Edom's joy over Judah's calamity of 587 and its treachery on that occasion; these are the reasons for the downfall of Israel's ancient foe. The second part is eschatological; Edom's ruin is a sign of the Day of YAHWEH against all the pagan nations. Although the author was concerned primarily with Edom, the very mention of the Day of the Lord widened his horizon, and he saw the local event (judgment on Edom) as a symbol of the worldwide punishment of all Israel's enemies.

The Book of Obadiah was composed probably in the early 5th century, though it may contain material that was somewhat earlier. Edom's predicted downfall occurred before 312 B.C. (when the Nabataeans occupied Petra), and Edom was possibly already threatened c. 460. Thus, a reasonable date for "Obadiah's Vision" would be after 587 and before 460 B.C. Faith in God's fidelity toward Israel is the main theme of the book. Obadiah affirms that the day will come when oppressed Zion will become the place of salvation because of a catastrophic divine intervention ushering in a new and different order. The new order will recapture past glories, emerge in a new age beyond the divine JUDGMENT, and bring about the fulfillment of God's purpose in history. Obadiah is nationalistic in conceiving the day of Yahweh as a national restoration. The description of the new Israel (19–21) envisions the restoration of approximately the Davidic boundaries and is consistent with the aspirations of Obadiah's contemporaries.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMANN (New York 1963) 3–4. M. STENZEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65). W. VOLLBORN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1547–48. S. BULLOUGH, Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture, ed. B. ORCHARD et al. (London-New York 1957) 666–668.

[J. MORIARITY]

OBAZINE (AUBAZINE), ABBEY OF

Former French abbey, Diocese of Limoges, the present Diocese of Tulle. It was founded in a forest by a group of hermits under STEPHEN OF OBAZINE, a follower of the great hermit monk, ROBERT OF ARBRISSEL. The BENEDICTINE RULE was adopted, according to the interpretation of the monks of Dalon, a neighboring community of similar background. Once it was formally organized into an abbey in 1142, it soon founded two other monasteries, La Valette and Bonnaigue, and a convent for nuns, Coyroux. Obazine merged with the CISTERCIANS in 1147. It founded four more affiliated houses (those of La Garde-Dieu, La Frenade, Grosbos, and Gourdon).

The wars and rule by commendatory abbots led to gradual decline. In 1768 it had only six monks. It was suppressed during the French Revolution. The remodeled early Gothic church (1156–90) survives as a parish church. Other monastic buildings house a community of nuns.

Bibliography: U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Topobibliographie, 2 v. (Paris 1894–1903) 2:2165–66. G. MÜLLER, “Der Gründer der Abtei Obazine,” Cistercienser-Chronik 40 (1928). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:185–186. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947– ) 1:1006–07.

[L. J. LEKAI]

OBEDIENCE

The foundation of obedience is AUTHORITY. All true authority is ultimately divine. It is either immediately divine or, if vested proximately in men, it is derived from that of God. Authority is ordained to good, common or private. Of a number of possibilities of achieving this good, authority determines and proposes the one that is to be realized. The will of authority is expressed in Law, which is the binding rule of human action. Law, moreover, must be understood to include not only that which is written or externally manifest, but also that which the authoritative will of the Creator has implanted in the structure of created being, natural or supernatural. The adaptation of an individual’s will to the authoritative will expressed in Law is obedience. By its act, the object or content of the legislator’s determination is freely adopted by the obedient will and becomes a principle of initiative and action leading to the effect intended by the legislator. The subject who obeys embraces the possibility of action that the will of authority has determined should be realized. He accepts it as commanded, and renounces conflicting possibilities. Thus does he render to authority what is its due, namely, submission. A stable readiness to such submission is the virtue of obedience. This, with respect to certain determined objects, can be confirmed by VOW.

Obedience in Judeo-Christian History

A special value was attributed to obedience in both Old and New Testaments, and in later Christian history this received further emphasis through the development of the concept of religious obedience.

Old Testament. In the Old Testament, obedience to the authority of Yahweh was exercised within terms of the Covenant, whose content was embraced by the formula: “You shall be my people, and I shall be your God” (Jer 11.4; Hos 2.25; Jer 7.23; 24.7). Under the Covenant, the people assumed the obligation of fulfilling the Law. This, according to the broader concept of Deuteronomy and the Psalms, was the summit of divine revelation, considered as a norm of life. Thus the Law was the foundation of religion, of ethics, and, because of the theocratic constitution of the people, of civil life in Israel (1 Sm 8.7–9; 10.19). Hence the insistence upon a knowledge of the Law, and upon conformity of life to its demands (Ex 13.8–9; Dt 33.10; Lv 10.11; Hos 4.6; Prv 19.16; Sir 19.17; 21.11; Wis 6.18). Psalm 119 is a canticle of praise of the beauty and blessing of the Law, which is no insupportable yoke laid upon the shoulders of men (cf. Acts 15.10), but refreshment to the soul, joy to the heart, and light to the eyes (Ps 19.8–9); it is sweeter than honey (Ps 119.103); it is the theme of the song of the people in their place of exile (ibid. v. 54). Just as the lot of the first parents depended upon the command of Yahweh (Gn 2.16–17), so the efficacy of the Covenant and the promises attached to it depended upon the obedience of the people to the Law (Ex 19.5; Jer 11.2–5). For this reason Yahweh watched jealously over its fulfillment (Ex 20.5; Dt 28.15–19; Jer 11.2–5). Obedience is worth more than sacrifice (1 Sm 15.22; Eccl 4.12).

Obedience to Yahweh included obedience to the civil authority, which derived its power from God (Wis 6.13). The king was chosen by God (Dt 17.14; 1 Sm 8.22; 10.1; 10.24; 16.13; 2 Sm 7.18); he was the son of God (2 Sm 7.14); he was helped by God (2 Sm 7.3); was anointed by Yahweh (1 Sm 24.10; Ps 89.39); was sacrosanct (1 Sm 24.10; 2 Sm 1.14); and was to be feared as Yahweh Himself (Prv 24.21).

New Testament. The Israel of God of the New Testament is the Church-Bride (Gal 6.16), subject to Christ, her Spouse (Eph 5.21–24). Christians here upon Earth are pilgrims (Heb 11.13), seeking their own country (ibid. v. 14), obedient to the first leader of their journey, Christ (Heb 2.10; 12.2), and to their superiors in the Church (Heb 13.7). The Father, raising Christ from the dead, “put him above every Principality, and Power and Virtue and Domination . . . and all things he made subject under his feet, and him he gave as head over all the Church, which indeed is his body” (Eph 1.20–23). Aggregation to this body is effected by baptism (1 Cor 12.13; Rom 6.3–11; Col 2.12), by which the Christian is made a “new creation” (Gal 6.15), who ought to walk in a newness of life (Rom 6.4), living in “obedience to faith” (Rom 1.5, 16.26), living not to himself but to God (Rom 5.11, 14.7–8), under the “new covenant” (Mt 26.28; 2 Cor 3.6), under the new commandment of charity (Jn 13.34). As an all-embracing principle, this commandment contains in itself virtually the whole content of the Christian life (Mt 22.40); it includes the fulfillment of the other commandments (Gal 5.14); it sums them up (Rom 13.9); it is the fulfillment of the Law (Rom 13.10). Thus the whole of the New Testament also is, by the commandment of charity, reducible to obedience.

From the very beginning of the New Testament, in its center, which is Christ, it was permeated with obedience by the determination of the Incarnate Word to do the will of the Father (Heb 10.5–7). This purpose, hidden although present from the first instant of the Incarnation, continued through the whole life of Christ. To Him the doing of His Father’s will was His food (Jn 4.34); that others might live by the same nourishment He taught them to pray, “Thy will be done” (Mt 6.10), and whoever does this will is His brother and sister and mother (Mt 12.50). This readiness to obey the Father is especially and vividly manifest in His Passion (Lk 22.42). The work of the life of Christ is a work done in obedience to the will of the Father (Jn 17.4). St. Paul expresses the obedience of Christ’s life in these words: “He humbled himself, becoming obedient to death, even to death on a cross” (Phil 2.8).

In the New Testament, as well as in the Old, obedience to God includes obedience to human authority, since true human authority is from God. When the Pharisees asked whether it was lawful to give tribute to Caesar, by His answer—“Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and to God the things that are God’s” (Mt 22.21)—He acknowledges the rights of civil authority so long as this does not violate the rights of God (cf. Acts 4.19; Dn 3.18). According to His words to Pilate—“Thou wouldst have no power at all over me were it not given thee from above” (Jn 19.11)—God Himself grants civil authority its power, and the lot of Christ depended upon this divine grant. According to St. Paul, “Let everyone be subject to the higher authorities, for there exists no authority except from God, and those who exist have been appointed by God. Therefore who resists the authority resists the ordinance of God” (Rom 13.1–2). Since the following verses discuss rulers who are a terror not to the good but to the evil, commending the good and as God’s ministers carrying the sword to execute wrath on those who do evil, it is evident that St. Paul is speaking of civil authority that does not abuse its rights. To such authority obedience must be rendered not only because of fear of punishment, but also for conscience’s sake (ibid. v. 5). The same holds true for the relationship of Christians toward the Roman tax-gatherers (vv. 6–7). According to St. Peter, the faithful must subject themselves not only to supreme but to subordinate rulers for the sake of God (1 Pt 2.13–14). If the passages in Revelation concerning the adoration of the beast and its image (13.12–17; 14.9–11; 16.2; 20.4) are understood as referring to the Roman emperor, they do not express an attitude of hostility toward civil authority as such, but toward the paying of divine honors to the emperor. The freedom of the children of God was not to be made a pretext for rebellion against civil authority, for this freedom supposes full subjection to the will of God and to those who hold their authority from Him (Gal 5.13; Rom 6.18). Slaves were to obey their masters as they would Christ (Eph 6.5), not only the good and moderate ones, but the severe as well; harsh and unjust treatment they were to endure after the example of Christ (1 Pt 2.18–23). In marriage the woman was to be subject to the authority of the man (1 Cor 11.3; Eph 5.22–23; 1 Pt 3.1) as to that of the Lord (Eph 5.22), or “as is becoming in the Lord” (Col 3.18). The authority of the husband, however, should be exercised without harshness (Col 3.19; Eph 5.25–29). Children were to be subject to the authority of their parents (Col 3.20) in the Lord (Eph 6.1). Obedience to parents is a condition of happiness (Mt 15.4; 19.19) and is acceptable to God (Col 3.20; 1 Tm 5.4). But Christ ought to be loved more than one’s parents (Mt 10.37). The authority of parents ought to be used without undue severity (Col 3.21). All human authority, in fact, ought to be exercised after the example of Christ’s, who did not come to be served but to serve (Mk 10.45), and He made Himself the servant of His Disciples, although He was their Master and Lord (Jn 13.13–16). In the Christian community authority is not to be distorted into despotism, but to be considered a service (Mk 10.42; Lk 22.25). “Let him who is greatest among you become as the youngest, and him who is chief as the servant'' (Lk 22.26; Mk 10.43–45). This principle is true especially for the elders who ought to feed the flock of the Lord not under constraint, but willingly, according to God; nor yet for the sake of base gain, but eagerly; nor yet as lording it over their charges, but as becoming from the heart a pattern to the flock (1 Pt 5.2–3).

Religious Obedience. From ordinary Christian obedience, founded on the doctrine of the New Testament, the idea of religious obedience gradually emerged. The first anchorites were not drawn to their hermitages with any formal intention of subjecting themselves to the yoke of obedience to any human superior, but rather by their desire to seek the sort of annihilation proclaimed in the Gospels and the self-denial demanded by Christ, and to fulfill the obligations undertaken in baptism to renounce Satan and the world. Nevertheless, confidence in some outstanding ascetic's experience in the spiritual life inclined many individuals to submit themselves to the direction of such a person. This submission was based less upon a juridically defined authority than upon a kind of spiritual paternity of a more or less charismatic nature. The subjection was freely undertaken, was revocable, was not confirmed by vow, nor did one subject himself for life. (Cf. I. Hausherr, Direction spirituelle en Orient autrefois [Orientalia Christiana Analecta 144; Rome 1955].) Associated with an individual's confidence in the greater experience of another was his distrust of his own disordered will; this made renunciation of this will and submission to the will of a spiritual father seem good. Submission of this kind was esteemed as a great virtue among the anchorites.

The solitude of the hermits, however, though relative, seemed to provide too little opportunity for the exercise of this virtue. It was partly to provide greater scope for it that the cenobitical way of life was introduced with its hierarchical structure. Among the cenobites a new value was found in submission. They aimed at securing the spiritual welfare not only of the individual but of the community as a whole as well. Submission in a monastery meant entering upon a cloistered life under the authority of an abbot whose power was determined by rule or constitutions. Obedience was now not only, not even primarily, based upon confidence in a person but upon a foundation of juridical obligation. Not the person but the office of the religious superior was the primary consideration. Together with humility, the enemy of pride—the original sin of man—obedience took an absolute character. It left no room for questioning or judgment where commands were concerned. Apart from the rule and the will of the superior, nothing was valued as holy or prudent. There was something primitive in this attitude. The concept of obedience needed to be humanized and to be based upon a less pessimistic view of nature. It would be mitigated in time, owing to the demands of the apostolate, by a greater adaptability, a greater respect for initiative, and a more refined sense of the personal dignity of the individual. Meanwhile, the motives underlying primitive asceticism were not without value. The love of Christ, the imitation of His obedience, the practice of humility, are at the heart of all religious life. (Cf. M. Olphe-Galliard, Histoire de l'obéissance religieuse: Des Pères du desert au cénobitisme de saint Basile et de saint Benoît, in L'Obéissance et la religieuse d'aujourd'hui [Paris 1951] 29–30.) As early as St. Augustine (Epist. 211) and St. Caesarius of Arles (Regula Sanctarum Virginum, ed. G. Morin, Florilegium Patristicum 34) there was insistence upon the use of discretion in the exercise of authority. "[Let the superior] be to all an example of good works; let her correct the unruly, strengthen the fainthearted, sustain the weak, bearing always in mind that she must render an account to God for them." Even more did St. Benedict in his Regula Monasteriorum (ed. B. Linderbauer, Florilegium Patristicum 17) strive to make provision against rigid authoritarianism and too great an insistence upon uniformity.

When religious, either as a community or as individuals, undertake missionary or cultural labors in the world, religious obedience must begin to keep in view not only the sanctification of the individual religious and the good of the community but also the demands of the apostolate. With religious engaged in work of this kind, obedience cannot ordinarily consist in doing only that which the rule or the superior commands. It would be unsuited to the apostolate, for the rule cannot make provision for all concrete circumstances, nor can a superior foresee them and by anticipatory commands chart the course to be followed in every particular case. There is frequent need for personal decision by the individual religious in accordance with the spirit of the rule and his general understanding of what his superior would want him to do. (See J. Loosen, "Gestaltwandel im religiösen Gehorsamsideal," Geist und Leben 24 [1951] 196–209.)

The vow only gradually came to be annexed to the practice of religious obedience. The precise nature of the formula that was signed by the monks in Atripe is not known, for it has not come down to us in its entirety (J. Leipoldt, "Schenute von Atripe und die Entstehung des nationalen agyptischen Christentums," Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 25.1 [1903] 109, 195–196), but it seems to have been a true religious profession, made to God, and probably for the whole time a monk remained in the monastic state or in the monastery. There is no evidence in the part of the formula we possess, however, of a vow of religious obedience.

St. Basil seems to have exacted from those seeking admission to the cenobitic life in his monasteries a declaration, at least implicit, of obedience (Regulae brevius tractatae 1–2; Patrologia Graeca 31:1081–84). The violation of obedience was a “theft and sacrilege” (Basil, De renunt. saec. 4; Patrologia Graeca 31:633). But there is no proof of the existence of a special vow of obedience. (See D. Amand, L’Ascèse monastique de saint Basile, [Maredsous, Belg. 1949] 324–335.) Without doubt, however, the vow of obedience is contained in St. Benedict’s Regula Monasteriorum: “Taken to the oratory, before all let him make the promise of stability and of conversion of life and of obedience in the presence of God and his saints” (ch. 58).

Theological Considerations

In Christianity, obedience is the concrete realization of the fundamental commitment to God to which the Christian is obliged by the fact of his baptism. By baptism he is, ontologically speaking, holy—or, in other words, consecrated through Christ to God. In correspondence with this ontological state, he ought to live not for himself but for God. But to live for God is to fulfill His will, which is the will of Supreme Authority. The will of God can be known in concrete situations by applying to them the norms of divine positive law and of natural law, and by the actual enlightenment of the Holy Spirit. Just as the whole life of Christ was one of obedience, so also should be the whole life of the Christian, since it is the formal or at least implicit fulfillment of God’s authoritative will. This obedience is acceptable to God because it is realized in virtue of the obedience of Christ through the Holy Spirit who shapes the obedience of Christians, whom He moves, to the image of the obedience of Christ.

The principal divine law of Christian life is the commandment of charity. Its fulfillment is, implicitly at least, obedience as well as charity. It is obedient charity. (See B. Häring, Das Heilige und das Gute [Karilling vor Munchen 1950] 284–290.) This obedience is as extensive as charity itself. The commandment, as the ultimate end of the Christian life, is confined by no limits. It can be said that so much love is of precept, and that what exceeds the limits of precept is a matter of counsel. Yet everyone is commanded to love God as much as he can (Thomas Aquinas, C. retrah. relig. ingress. 6; cf. Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 184.3). The power to fulfill this commandment is the theological virtue of charity. To the limitlessness of the command there corresponds a limitlessness in the internal dynamism of the virtue. It is a universal love of benevolence that admits no limits to its desire to do good to the one who is beloved. This desire, by its own inner dynamism, with the universal laws of morality before it, as these are seen with the inner illumination necessary to grasp their relevance to a present situation, seeks to express itself. For this expression, acts are necessary. These, of themselves, may be only of counsel, but they are performed, when they are necessary to the life of charity, as though they were of precept, and this because of the preceptive character of charity itself. This life of obedient charity, although it might at times be explicitly renewed, need not, however, be continuously self-conscious. When the Christian living in the state of grace does not think explicitly of God and does not move toward Him with explicit acts of charity, but conducts himself in accordance with Christian standards, his will, controlling his actions, is perfected and informed by charity, and his charity is activated, implicitly at least, in all his virtuous action. (See Thomas Aquinas, In 3 sent. 23.3.1.1.)

Besides the law of charity there are other divine laws, each with its own content. To each there corresponds a proper fulfillment that implicitly or explicitly involves obedience. The chastity of the Christian, for example, is obedient chastity. Obedience does not take anything away from the proper nature of the virtues that it includes, any more than charity—which intrinsically informs obedience and the other virtues included in it—destroys the proper nature of those virtues or the specific distinction between them.

Obedience and Human Law. Since every human law must be included under divine law, and since human authority, whether ecclesiastical or civil, is a participation of divine authority, obedience to human law, if we consider it objectively, is ultimately given to God and in its origin is determined by charity, of which it is an expression. The direct object of the obligation of human law is indicated in the law itself. Indirectly, the law obliges one to use the means necessary for its fulfillment, to procure materials necessary for its observance, to avoid setting up obstacles, without sufficient reason, that would prevent the observance of the law, and to remove such obstacles as have been set up without sufficient reason. Human law, as preceptive, obliges to the act of obedience and to the acts of whatever other virtues may be involved in obedience. The obligation is in proportion to the importance of the object of the law to common or private welfare. The object has importance either on its own account, or dependently upon circumstances or upon the end for the sake of which the law was made. Proper fulfillment of the law supposes true interpretation of it and right application to the particular cases in which it is to be observed. In a concrete case one does not proceed simply in accordance with the words of the law, but rather in accordance with its true meaning, giving the reality of the concrete case due consideration. It belongs to EPIKEIA, as St. Thomas said, “to moderate . . . the observance of the words of the law” (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 120.2 ad 3). And epikeia is the more important part of justice (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 120.2 ad 1).

Obedience and Personal Responsibility. True obedience is not a robotlike activity produced entirely by the external impulse coming from the superior. It is a personal act elicited by the subject himself, who in obedience adapts his will to the will of the superior, and it is ultimately the subject who moves himself to act. The possibility that a superior could command something objectively sinful requires the subject, even in his obedience, to keep clearheaded and to remain capable of independent thought. To obey without moral certainty of the lawfulness of what is commanded would be immoral. In his own conscience, the subject remains responsible for whatever he does even when he acts under obedience. The fact that a thing is commanded does not take away responsibility from the subject. His theoretical or speculative judgment regarding the morality of what is commanded is governed per se by the objective light of truth, not by the mind of the superior. A commanded action does not become good because the superior thinks it good, for the superior is not the cause of truth. Acting in accordance with its nature and subjecting itself to truth, the mind of the subject, even when it is in disagreement with the mind of the superior, is obedient: it yields its obedience to Him who created the intellect to act in this way, and who is the Supreme Superior.

When the morality of what is commanded is not evident, reverence, piety, and the supernatural context of the virtue of obedience will incline the speculative judgment of the subject to agreement with his superior. When the speculative judgment of the subject has no cause to see compliance as immoral, the practical judgment, which governs the doing of what is commanded, must submit itself to the command of legitimate authority acting within its proper limits. This is so even when the subject knows, from a speculative point of view, that the situation could be better dealt with otherwise, or even that the superior’s command proceeds from malice. (See F. Suárez, De religione Societatis Iesu, lib. 4, cap. 15.) Ordinarily no long process of reasoning is required to establish the legitimacy of a command, for the supernatural enlightenment with which God assists the Christian suffices to facilitate judgment and protect him against harmful error. On the other hand, it must not be assumed that the subject’s own judgment, as opposed to that of his superior, is something necessarily inordinate or worthy of contempt. The intellect, which judges, is by no means completely corrupt by reason of original sin. Indeed, in spite of the consequences of original sin, it is elevated by faith and may well be aided by the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, and understanding. Caution, however, is necessary, for self-interest or a morbidly hypercritical spirit can dull the intellect’s capacity to discern the legitimacy of a concrete command.

Obedience, therefore, does not exist for the purpose of lessening personal activity. Ultimately, even under obedience, a subject must seek the will of the Father by passing judgment upon the lawfulness of a concrete command, by personally accepting and fulfilling it, and in the fulfillment, through his own initiative, determining and realizing the necessary details undefined in the command itself.

From the fact that the superior participates in the authority of God, it does not follow that a subject, faced with a concrete command, must conduct himself as he does in accepting a matter of faith, in which he simply accepts revealed truth, relying only on the authority of God revealing. The subject ought indeed to believe that all legitimate human authority is from God, because this is a revealed truth. But he cannot accept on faith that any concrete command is legitimate, for that is something about which God has revealed nothing. The legitimacy cannot be discerned except by the personal effort of the subject, and only after this is manifest can the subject know that the concrete command expresses the will of God.

Superior and Subject. The superior who commands ought to be himself obedient even while he commands. He owes obedience to God. No one who is in command is only a superior; he is at the same time—and primarily—a subject. The whole end of obedience demands submission on the part of both subject and superior. Moreover, just as there is for the subject, simply because he is a subject, no guarantee of his right fulfillment of commands, so the superior, simply because he has legitimate authority, is not guaranteed the right use of his authority. Before God, superior and subject are redeemed children of the Father, seeking to do His will. It is the superior’s duty to seek this by commanding according to the will of God; it is the subject’s duty to seek it in fulfilling the legitimate commands according to the will of God. Not only is the subject to see Christ in his superior, but the superior must also see Christ in his subject, for the subject is a member of the Mystical Body of Christ. Because the superior’s authority is derived from Christ, the subject has additional reason to see Christ in his superior. By the fulfillment of a legitimate command, he ought to minister to the life of the Body of Christ, and in the same way the superior in his exercise of authority should minister to that same life. But it must not be thought that God binds, moves, and illuminates the Christian to the doing of His will only through the commands of a human superior. Such an opinion is contrary to ecclesiastical tradition concerning the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, and it contradicts the historical fact that the life of the Church has been influenced again and again by ideas and movements that did not have their origin in obedience to a human superior but that came immediately from God.

Although the end of obedience requires obedience of both subject and superior, and although both are equal as Christians, nevertheless superior and subject, as such, do not stand on the same level. God who leads men not only immediately but also through men, by granting a participation in His authority to the superior, places him over the subject, and He gives to the superior, within the limits of his authority, the office of commanding, and He gives the subject the duty of carrying out the commands of his superior. Every effort to lower the superior within the proper ambit of his authority to the level of the subject is damaging to the essence of obedience. Such efforts cause the idea of authority and hence of true superiority to be lost to sight, and obedience fades into a dialogue that has no real power to bind the subject but leaves him free to determine for himself what he ought and what he ought not to do.

There is a certain dialectical tension between the need of obedience and the need of liberty. The goal of educating in obedience is to effect a synthesis of both elements, or, in other words, a free obedience, which will be a capacity, partly acquired and partly infused, to recognize and understand and to carry out with personal decision and a sense of responsibility the orders given by one in authority.

Orders, commands, or prohibitions that are well chosen develop respect for authority. There should be a progressive unfolding of the meaning and content of the superior's commands so that infantile forms of submission give way to others determined by objective values, particularly by religious values, which can more easily provide a solid basis for ready and free obedience.

Deviations. Distortions of obedience consist of an obsequious submission rooted in a variety of undesirable causes: egoistic ambition; a weakness with regard to the regulation of one's own life, so that obedience becomes a refuge of a person unable to make decisions or unwilling to assume responsibility; a pathological need that a person may have for a hero to admire and worship; or want of courage, or, seen from another point of view, fear of a servile kind. Genuine obedience to the will of the Father carries with it not only the submission of one's will to the command of a superior, but also, when there is abuse of authority, prudent and firm opposition.

See Also: COUNSELS, EVANGELICAL; FREEDOM; FREEDOM, SPIRITUAL; PIETY, FAMILIAL.

Bibliography: J. B. RAUS, De sacrae obedientiae virtute et voto secundum doctrinam divi Thomae et S. Alphonsi, juxta normas ac codicem juris canonici (Lyons 1923). F. VALENTINE, Religious Obedience (London 1951). R. E. REGAN, "The Exercise of Authority by Religious Superiors in Modern America," Religious Community Life in the United States, 2 v. (New York 1952) 1:178-185. P. K. MEAGHER, "The Spirit of Religious Obedience in America," ibid. 1:186-199. S. GIET, "Saint Bernard et le troisième degré d'obéissance ou la soumission de jugement," L'Année théologique augustinienne 7 (1946) 192-221. B. HARING, "Freiheit oder Gehorsam?" Geist und Leben 21 (1948) 108-121. K. ESSER, "Gehorsam und Freiheit," Wissenschaft und Weisheit 13 (1950) 142-150. H. MOGENET, "L'Obéissance religieuse vertu évangélique et humaine," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 27 (1951) 75-95. L'Obéissance et la religieuse d'aujourd'hui (Paris 1951). Congressus Generalis de Statibus Perfectionis, 1950, Acta et documenta, 4 v. (Rome 1952) 2:396-429. J. LECLERCQ, The Religious Vocation (New York 1955). T. CAMELOT, "Obéissance et liberté," La Vie spirituelle 86 (1952) 154-168; title varies. P. PHILIPPE, "La Portée du vœu d'obéissance," ibid. 509-524. H. HOLSTEIN, "Le Mystère de l'obéissance," Études 278 (1953) 145-157. J. PÉRINELLE, Les Voies de Dieu (Paris 1956) 459-518. K. RAHNER, "Reflections on Obedience . . . a Basic Ignatian Concept," Cross Currents 10 (1960) 364-374. M. LABOURDETTE, "La Vertu d'obéissance selon saint Thomas," Revue thomiste 57 (1957) 626-656. K. V. TRUHLAR, Problemata theologica de vita spirituali laicorum et religiosorum (Collectanea spiritualia 8; Rome 1960) 81-121; La Vie spirituelle Suppl. 7 (1953) 249-359; Geist und Leben 29 (1956) 1-56; Ciencia Tomista 83 (1956) 219-422. P. LUMBREERAS, "La obediencia dialogada," ibid. 82 (1955) 65-84.

[K. V. TRUHLAR]

OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY

Obediential potency is a concept originally developed in the theology of miracles, now frequently used in the description of the NATURAL ORDER's relationship to the SUPERNATURAL. In its broadest sense obediential potency means the openness of every creature to the Creator's power to effect in it something beyond the powers of ordinary natural causes; it is the very being of an existing creature as obedient, subject, or as some hold, positively ordered to God's power to act in it. Here the term itself is first examined, then its use regarding miracles and the supernatural.

Term. It derives from two traditions: the first, going back to Ambrose (Hex. 1.4.13, 3.1.1) and perhaps to Scripture (Mt 8.27) or Cicero (De leg. 3.1.3), spoke of nature's obedience to God in creation and miracles; the second, from Augustine (Gen. ad litt. 9.17.32), studied the possibility in the creature of its being miraculously changed (cf. Peter Lombard, 2 Sent. 18.6). These traditions united in the late 12th century to produce the concept of obediential potency (Landgraf 1.1:243, fn.26). The term first appeared in the 13th century as potency of obedience (potentia obedientiae), e.g., in the Summa said to be Alexander of Hales's (1a2i:231, 469, 491; Quar. ed.

2:288, 632, 686), in Albert the Great (In 2 sent. 18.7; In 4 sent. 11.4 ad 1), Bonaventure (In 1 sent. 42.3 ad 1 neg.; In 1 sent. 42.4), and in Thomas Aquinas frequently (e.g., De ver. 29.3 ad 3). Obediential potency (potentia obedientialis) occurred in Albert (ST. THOMAS, Summa theologiae, 2.8.31.1.4 sed contra 1; cf. Gillon 304, fn. 3) and in Thomas (De virt. in com. 10 ad 13) and gradually became the usual form.

Miracles. If the laws of nature are fixed by God, how can He work a miracle without upsetting these laws and betraying a lack of wisdom? Theologians answer with the concept of obediential potency: although the creature has no positive capacity or exigency to be changed miraculously, its being is subject or obedient to what God wills to do in it beyond the activity of ordinary causes so long as no contradiction occurs. The creature is purely passive; God can do in it whatever is not repugnant to its nature. As author and governor of creatures, God includes in His providence the extraordinary interventions of His power. A miracle is thus possible. This doctrine, taught by Augustine, was formulated in terms of obediential potency by medieval theologians and has remained constant in theology.

The Supernatural. Since for Thomas Aquinas obediential potency implies pure passivity and total indetermination, he finds it inadequate to express the relationship to the supernatural of intellectual creatures; he holds instead that as IMAGE OF GOD they have a capacity for or are apt for GRACE, are ordered or habilitated to grace, have a natural DESIRE TO SEE GOD, even though the supernatural transcends their nature. Although several medieval theologians did speak of the obediential potency of nature for the supernatural, it was Cajetan who most influenced the modern use of obediential potency for this relationship. Reacting to Scotus's doctrine of man's innate desire for the supernatural and seeking to maintain the gratuity of the supernatural, he said that of itself human nature has only an obediential potency for supernatural elevation in the sense that God's elevating it is possible since this is not repugnant to human nature (In St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1.1.1.7–12; 1.12.1.9–10). (See ELEVATION OF MAN.) His use here of obediential potency, connoting by its origin a passive non-repugnance to miraculous change, was soon imitated by many commentators professing to follow Aquinas; they were urged to this by the need to react against M. Baius's teaching of man's exigency of the supernatural. (See BAIUS AND BAIANISM.) Modern followers of these commentators still retain this use of obediential potency. Some modify this position by distinguishing between the transcendental obediential potency of all things to God's intervention and the specific obediential potency to the supernatural that is proper to intellectual creatures, since they can know universal being and good.

Many theologians today oppose this school of thought. They argue that it gives a view of the supernatural as merely juxtaposed or extrinsic to nature, furthers SECULARISM'S tenet that man can find completion solely in the natural order, makes the supernatural seem adventitious. This reaction was influenced by M. BLONDEL'S and H. de Lubac's efforts to show the intimate connection and continuity between the intellectual creature and his supernatural destiny and vocation. (See IMMANENCE APOLOGETICS; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL.) Some, including those studying Aquinas by historical method, would eliminate the use of obediential potency from this area of discussion. Others, while rejecting the pure passivity of nature regarding the supernatural, still describe the relationship in terms of obediential potency but define this as the positive order or direction of nature to its fulfilment in the supernatural. Each seeks in his own way to maintain the Church's teaching that man's supernatural elevation surpasses the powers and exigencies of his nature (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1921, 3005, 3891; H. Denzinger, ibid., 2103).

Other particular uses of obediential potency include the obediential potency of the human intellect to infused knowledge, prophecy, etc.; of human nature for the hypostatic union; of things and words for sacramental signification and efficacy; of the whole universe to PRETERNATURAL perfection under the headship of Christ.

See Also: ANIMA NATURALITER CHRISTIANA; BEATIFIC VISION; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; MAN; MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF); SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL; SUPERNATURAL ORDER.

Bibliography: P. DUMONT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:2665–72, for Suárez's special doctrine of passive and active ob. pot. F. BUUCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 8:646–647. G. COLOMBO, "Il problema del soprannaturale negli ultimi cinquant'anni," Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica, 2 v. (Milan 1957) 2:545–607. A. DARMET, Les Notions de raison séminale et de puissance obédientielle chez saint Augustin et saint Thomas d'Aquin (Belley 1934). H. DE LUBAC, Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946); "Saint Thomas, Compendium theologiae, c. 104," Recherches de science religieuse 36 (1949) 300–305. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, De revelatione, 2 v. (5th ed. Rome 1950) 1:345–355. "Die Vorbereitung auf die Rechtfertigung und die Eingießung der rechtfertigenden Gnade," in A. M. LANDGRAF, Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik, 4 v. (Regensburg 1952–56) 1.1:238–302. W. R. O'CONNOR, The Eternal Quest (New York 1947). K. RAHNER, Nature and Grace, tr. D. WHARTON (New York 1964). M. SCHMAUS, Katholische Dogmatik (6th ed. Munich 1962) 2.1:115 (pp. 217–235). B. STOECKLE, Gratia supponit naturam: Geschichte und Analyse eines theologischen Axioms (Studia anselmiana 49; Rome 1962) 232–263. L. CHARLIER, "Puissance passive et désir naturel selon Saint Thomas," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 7 (1930) 5–28, 639–662. P. M. DE CONTENSON, "Surnaturel," Bulletin Thomiste 8 (1947–53) 794–804, 9 (1954–56) 551–555, 10 (1957–59) 462–468. L. B. GILLON, "Aux origines de la puissance obédientielle," Revue thomiste 47 (1947) 304–310. É. H. GILSON, "Sur la problématique thomiste de la vision béatifique," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 31 (1964) 67–68. H. DE LUBAC, Augustinisme et théologie moderne (Paris 1965) esp. 242–251; Le Mystère du surnaturel (Paris 1965) esp. 87–88, 142, 179–189.

[W. H. PRINCIPE]

OBERAMMERGAU

Oberammergau is the name of a village in Upper Bavaria where a celebrated Passion play is presented by the villagers every ten years. In 1633 the villagers vowed to put on the Passion play every ten years in thanksgiving for deliverance from the plague. It may, however, have been performed before 1634. The play takes up to eight hours to perform. It was performed at ten-year interval from 1634 to 1674, and then in the decimal years from 1680 to the present with the only exceptions being in 1870 when it not performed due to the Franco-Prussian War, in 1920 because of the aftermath of World War I, and in 1940 because of World War II. Extra performances were held in 1934 and in 1985 to celebrate the 300th and 350th anniversaries. Adolf Hitler attended the 1934 performance. The text of the Passion play has been changed several times. Originally in verse, it is now in prose. The oldest text can be traced to 1600 and shows influences from the Passion plays held at St. Ulric and at St. Afra in Augsburg. For the 1985 performance the text was revised in view of charges of anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism. The Passion play of Oberammergau still occasions ecumenical concerns, particularly among Jews, for its perceived anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism.

[D. P. SHERIDAN]

OBJECT

Object is a term derived from the Latin obiectum, meaning what is thrown against and signifying anything that confronts another, generally a knowing SUBJECT. Among scholastics, the object is what specifies a knowing power or a science. See FACULTIES OF THE SOUL; SCIENCE (SCIENTIA). A distinction is commonly made between the formal object (obiectum formale), or the aspect under which the thing is related to the knowing power or HABIT, and the material object (obiectum materiale), or the THING itself abstracting from this relation; the formal object is further divided into the obiectum formale quod, or the precise aspect that is known, and the obiectum formale quo, or the way in which (or the means by which) it is known. In moral science, object is frequently used to designate the goal or purpose of human action; in this meaning it becomes synonymous with END.

Among modern thinkers, object is opposed more directly to subject and thus takes on a more epistemological connotation; its main use is to designate the content or term of KNOWLEDGE. Some employ it to distinguish the content of thought from the act of thinking (L. Lavelle); others make it synonymous with the thing-in-itself as this exists independently of being known (G. Marcel). The main problem of PHENOMENOLOGY and of some forms of EXISTENTIALISM is that of bridging the gap between subject and object in the knowing process; realist philosophers provide such a bridge in the notion of INTENTIONALITY (see OBJECTIVITY).

Objective is a derivative of object and takes on somewhat the same connotations in different philosophical systems. In IDEALISM, something is objective if it constitutes a proper object of thought; in REALISM, and in ordinary linguistic usages, a thing is objective if it is extramental and independent of the conditions imposed by the knower. Knowledge is said to be objective if it is impersonal and universally acceptable, and a person is said to be objective if he abstracts from his particular feelings, tastes, and prejudices and restricts himself to areas of common agreement. Objectivism, when used by philosophers, is opposed to subjectivism; it may be a synonym for realism or for POSITIVISM, depending on the option of the user.

See Also: EPISTEMOLOGY; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.

Bibliography: P. FOULQUIÉ and R. SAINT-JEAN, Dictionnaire de la langue philosophique (Paris 1962) 485–490. A. LALANDE, Vocabulaire technique et critique de la philosophie (8th ed., rev. and enl. Paris 1960) 695–703. A. GUZZO and V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 3:990–1002. J. M. BALDWIN, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:440–441; ed., Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology, 3 v. in 4 (New York 1901–05; repr. Gloucester 1949–57) 2:191–193. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:275–332.

[B. A. GENDREAU]

OBJECTIVITY

In the PHENOMENOLOGY of E. HUSSERL, the characteristic of an object of awareness, by virtue of which it can be grasped as the same by distinct acts of apprehension. By this definition, aspects of both physical bodies and essences, as well as psychological realities such as memories, are "objectivities," insofar as they can be so understood. The acts of perceiving, thinking, and remembering, by which such ideas are grasped, are, on the other hand, subjective and transient. Husserl customarily distinguishes between Gegenständlichkeit and Objektivität, the former term referring to the status of things in the physical world, the latter to the meaningful aspects through which these things, as well as all other targets of awareness, are given to man. The second term, therefore, refers to a realm of objectivities that encompasses both the “interior” and the “exterior” worlds of EPISTEMOLOGY, and for this reason it is more fundamental.

Objective vs. Subjective. As it is commonly used, objectivity means not only a phenomenal, or descriptive, characteristic, but also a principle of value. Objective means that whatever the case, it is true for all subjects. In this sense it is the opposite of subjective opinions and preferences, that is, to judgments and evaluations distorted by a subject’s emotions, stereotypes, biases, and the like. When used as a pejorative term, it indicates that there are factors wrongly influencing judgments and evaluations. An objective judgment or an objective evaluation is, therefore, one in which a resolution is determined essentially by the object’s intrinsic meaning and value, by “the way things are,” rather than by the way a particular person or group (subject) thinks they are or prefers them to be.

Criteria of Objectivity. One problem, of course, is how to decide what is true for everyone. The first spontaneous criterion could be that of common consent exemplified by language or action. There may be an assumption that whatever is objective is independent of an individual’s assessment; hence, that whatever idea is common to everyone is not the effect of psychological or cultural predispositions. Reference to unicorns, fairies, phlogiston, and the ether are good examples of the limitations to this criterion. To say that it has limitations, however, is not to say that it is useless when properly confined and controlled. Although common consent at a given time is clearly not sufficient ground for concluding that an idea is objective, it could be considered to be at least a necessary condition. The lack of common consent in matters of morality, however, is remarked on by many philosophers, from Socrates to the present, who nevertheless admit the possibility of objective moral norms.

In the study of nature as well, the criterion of common consent has proved to be insufficient, and has been supplemented by the controlled method of VERIFICATION, a method that attempts to minimize or eliminate the influence of subjective elements. The so-called “scientific method,” by reason of its success in promoting consensus among its practitioners and in extending one kind of understanding of nature, has resulted in “scientifically established” almost becoming a synonym for objective. In fact, some schools of philosophy have defended that synonymy, at the price of relegating secondary qualities and values to the realm of the subjective. If the rules for following the scientific method could, in fact, function as an unambiguous procedure for formulating and testing the truth of a judgment, it would constitute a necessary, if not sufficient, condition for objectivity. Here too, however, the history of scientific innovators such as L. PASTEUR, N. COPERNICUS, I. KANT, and G. Cantor shows, in retrospect, that no system of rules can prescribe the way in which the rules are to be employed. Once again, this only notes a limitation to a method of verifying objective conditions, and does not dismiss a given method as worthless.

Phenomenology’s Reaction. The answer to the fundamental question regarding the objectivity of a point of view relies upon that point of view being independent of an individual attitude and therefore, at least in principle, accessible to all; it must also be established by a fixed method. Phenomenology suggests that this is impossible and lists the reasons why these criteria are limited. Phenomenology’s fundamental premise is that objectivity is only possible with the “cooperation” of the subject. That which is disclosed by experience is essentially related to the noetic attitude or INTENTIONALITY of the subject toward the world. For example, the scientific attitude is a way of understanding the meaning and being of the world that casts some things into relief and others into shadow. Other levels of meaning—the aesthetic, the religious, the social—may be rendered inaccessible if this attitude is predominant. The aim of phenomenology is, then, to describe and correlate various intentionalities, all of which are potentially revealing, some more fundamental than others, to achieve true objectivity.

In traditional terms, these observations point toward a difference between de jure and de facto objectivity, the former virtually accessible to all, the latter actually so accessible, at least to those with the requisite faculties and training. A final question is raised by those who contend that, in some instances, objectivity is accessible only to a unique individual. Gabriel Marcel has argued that this concept passes beyond the realm of the publicly verifiable, but does not lose touch with objectivity (see EXISTENTIALISM). Such an apparent exception tests the general rule in an important way because they can be applied to religious affirmations.

Bibliography: S. STRASSER, Phenomenology and the Human Sciences (Pittsburgh 1963). G. MARCEL, The Mystery of Being, tr. G. S. FRASER, 2 v. (Chicago 1950–51). M. POLANYI, Personal Knowledge (Chicago 1958). Y. SIMON, Introduction à l’ontologie du connaître (Paris 1933).

[F. J. CROSSON]

OBLATE

The word oblate, meaning “one offered” or “made over to God,” has had various nuances in the history of the Church.

Children. From the 4th century onward the term was applied to children dedicated to a monastery by their parents. This practice, which is first found in the Eastern Church in the Rule of St. BASIL, was inspired, it appears, by the narrative of the dedication of the child Samuel by his parents (1 Sm 1.25–28): “All the days of his life he shall be lent to the Lord.” Its early presence in Western monasticism is attested by the BENEDICTINE RULE, and by the Rules of CAESARIUS and AURELIAN OF ARLES. St. BENEDICT, for example, allowed in his Rule (c. 59) for infant oblation by noble parents, stating that the parents should draw up the petition on behalf of the infant, and then wrap the petition and the boy’s hand in the altar cloth. For the next five centuries and more such parental oblations generally were held to bind oblate children (male and female) irrevocably to the monastic state. Any liberal readings of the prescriptions of St. Benedict’s Rule that emerged were more than offset by the rigorous interpretation found in the influential Liber de oblatione puerorum, which RABANUS MAURUS, Abbot of Fulda, wrote to defend himself against the decision of a council at Mainz in 829. There he was charged with imposing the monastic habit by force on the later famous Saxon monk GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS, who at a tender age had been made an oblate by his noble father. By the 12th century, however, when in fact the practice of child oblation had almost disappeared, it was the teaching of the legal schools that a valid act of oblation or of profession could not be made before puberty; but there was no general Church legislation on the matter until the Council of Trent fixed 16 years as the minimum age of profession (cf. Session 25, De Regularibus, c. 15; ConOecDecr 757).

Adults. From the 7th century the term “oblate” was used also of adults who as conversi (lay brothers), devoti, donati, or commissi, looked after the material interests of monasteries. These oblates were never regarded fully as monks, although in the Cistercian order, unlike other monastic orders, it was recognized that “lay brothers” were committed to a life that was consecrated as that of the monks; the acceptance of lay brothers as an integral part of a religious institute occurred only with the founding of the Dominican Order in the early 13th century.

Secular Oblates. In the 13th century, also, the class known as secular oblates came into being to cover those who, while remaining in the world and retaining the usufruct of their goods, donated their possessions to a monastery and lived according to the monastic rule under the direction of the abbot. Under this heading, perhaps, should be listed the association of noble Roman ladies founded by St. FRANCES OF ROME in 1425 as the Oblates of Mary and later affiliated to the Olivetan BENEDICTINES as Oblates Regular of St. Benedict. These Oblates, who now have foundations in Switzerland and the United States, do not give up their property, nor make vows, but live in a community under a mother president to whom they make revocable vows of obedience.

Congregations of Oblates. The word oblate has also been adopted by certain religious congregations founded since the Council of Trent, the principal of which are:

1. Oblates of SS. Ambrose and Charles (see AMBROSIANS), a community of secular priests (originally “of St. Ambrose”) founded for pastoral work in Milan in 1578 by St. Charles BORROMEO.

2. OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE (OMI), a missionary congregation founded in 1816 at Aix-en-Provence by Eugène de MAZENOD (later bishop of Marseilles) for the systematic reevangelization of France.

3. Oblates of the Virgin Mary (OMV), founded at Carignano, near Turin, Italy, in 1815 by Bruno Lanteri and approved in 1826.

4. Oblates of St. Charles Borromeo (of Westminster), a community of secular priests founded at Bayswater, London, in 1857 by Dr. H. E. (later cardinal) MANNING at the instigation of Cardinal WISEMAN and along the lines of the Ambrosians. The community received pontifical approval in 1877.

5. OBLATES OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES (OSFS), founded at Troyes in 1871 by Abbè Brisson (d. 1908) for the education of the young.

6. OBLATES OF ST. JOSEPH (Guiseppeini of Asti, OSJ), a congregation for the education of the poor, which Guiseppe Menello (later bishop of Acqui) founded at Asti, Italy, in 1878.

7. Oblates of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and Immaculate Heart of Mary (see ST. EDMUND, SOCIETY OF), founded in Burgundy, France, by Ven. M. J. B. MUARD in 1843, with headquarters at the Abbey of PONTIGNY, where St. Edmund of Canterbury was buried. Dedicated to education and the foreign missions, the congregation was approved in 1911.

Bibliography: Sources. BENEDICT, Regula Monasteriorum, ed. C. BUTLER (3d ed. Freiburg 1935). RABANUS MAURUS, Liber de oblatione puerorum contra eos qui repugnant institutis b. p. Benedicti, Patrologia Latina ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 107:419–440. Literature. L. OLIGER, “De pueris oblati in Ordine Minorum,” Archivum Franciscanum historicum 8 (1915) 389–447; 10 (1917) 271–288. A. LENTINI, “Note sull’oblazione dei fanciulli nella Regola di S. Benedetto,” Studia anselmiana 18–19 (1947) 195–225. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 12.2:1857–77. J. MARCHAL, Le 'Droit d'oblat': Essai sur une variété de pensionnés monastiques (Paris 1955). S. HILPISCH et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1083–87.

[L. E. BOYLE]

OBLATE SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE

(OSP, Official Catholic Directory #3040); a diocesan congregation of religious women founded in 1829 at Baltimore, Md., by the French-born Sulpician Jacques Nicholas Joubert (d. 1843) for the Christian education of African-Americans. The original group included Elizabeth Lange, Marie Magdalen Balas, Rosine Boegue, and Almaide Duchemin, the first Black women in the U.S. to take religious vows. They followed a rule written for them by Joubert and received the approbation of Rome in 1831. Guided by a young Redemptorist, Thaddeus Anwander, who undertook their direction in 1857, the sisters extended their field of labor beyond the confines of Baltimore. By 1900 they were conducting schools and orphanages in rural Maryland, Washington, D.C., Missouri, Kansas, and (until 1961) Cuba. The Oblate mission field was gradually expanded to include Alabama, the Carolinas, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, and Virginia. Although the education of black youth in the U.S. constitutes the congregation's special apostolate, the sisters serve wherever needed, staffing elementary and secondary schools, a junior college, and catechetical, retreat, and day-care centers. The motherhouse and novitiate are located in Baltimore.

[M. A. CHINWORTH/EDS.]

OBLATE SISTERS OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES

(OSFS, Official Catholic Directory #3060); a congregation with papal approbation (1911), founded in 1866 by Father Louis BRISSON and Mother Francis de Sales Aviat (d. 1914) at Troyes, France, under the inspiration of Mother Maria Salesia CHAPPUIS. The congregation is devoted to educating youth, and assisting their spiritual formation by means of catechetics, retreats, counseling, summer camps and spiritual direction. The general motherhouse is in Troyes, France. The U.S. headquarters is in Childs, Md.

Bibliography: K. BURTON, So Much, So Soon (New York 1953). P. DUFOUR, Le Très Révérend Père Louis Brisson (Paris 1937).

[H. A. PAUL]

OBLATE SISTERS OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

Religious congregation (Oblatas del Santísimo Redentor, OSSR, Official Catholic Directory, #3030) with papal approbation whose motherhouse is in Ciempozuelos (Madrid), Spain. The institute was founded in Madrid in 1864 by Mother Antonia María de Oviedo y Schontal (d. 1898) and José Benito Serra (1810–88), a Benedictine and former missionary in Australia. Their purpose was to establish homes for wayward girls. Later, the sisters took up also other forms of social work, as well as teaching. The congregation spread from Spain to Europe (Italy), North America (U.S.), South America (Colombia, El Salvador, Guatemala) and Africa (Cameroon). The U.S. headquarters are in New York, NY.

[A. J. ENNIS]

OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE

(OMI, Official Catholic Directory #0910); A congregation of religious men founded at Aix-en-Provence, France, in 1816 by Charles Joseph Eugène de Mazenod. The members of this society were known first as Missionaries of Provence, then as Oblates of St. Charles (1825). Their success in parochial mission work led to a rapid expansion of the institute, and houses were established in Marseilles (1822) and Nîmes (1825). A rule, written by the founder in 1818, was approved by the first members of the congregation and received episcopal approbation in November 1818. However, by 1823 certain bishops were contesting the validity of the vows pronounced by the missionaries and were threatening to recall their subjects who had joined the society. Further hostility to the group arose when its members opposed Jansenism and showed themselves favorable to papal infallibility and ultramontanism. It became clear that the stability of the society could be ensured only by approbation higher than that of the bishops. Mazenod, therefore, went to Rome and on Feb. 17, 1826, secured the definitive approval of the Holy See for the congregation, henceforth to be known as the Oblates of Mary Immaculate.

Development. Although the first objective of the Oblates was the preaching of missions to the poor of the rural areas, it was not long before their field of work was broadened. In 1824, the congregation accepted the task of improving the clergy by the establishment of seminaries, and two years later the Oblates assumed charge of the major seminary at Marseilles. Seminary work was extended to Ajaccio, Corsica; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Buffalo, N.Y.; Frejus, Romans, and Quimper in France; and Ottawa, Canada. After the death of the founder, seminaries were accepted in Asia and Africa.

In 1831, a general chapter of the society voted to take up the work of the foreign missions. The first mission foundations were made in Canada in 1841 and a year later in the U.S. Subsequently, missions were opened in the Oregon territory (1847), Ceylon (1847), Algeria, Northwest Africa (1848–50), Natal, South Africa (1850), Australia, Japan, the Philippines, and Laos. The congregation's efforts began later in Latin America, where foundations were made in Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Haiti, Mexico, Paraguay, Peru, Surinam, and Uruguay.

In addition, the Oblates went to England in 1841 and later spread to Germany, Switzerland, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Italy, and Poland. Teaching was added to the original works because of the need in the mission countries. In 1848, Bishop Joseph-Eugene Guiges, OMI founded the College of Bytown which in 1866 was granted university status by the Parliament of United Canada, and in 1889 received its pontifical charter. In 1965 it became St. Paul's University and split into two entities: The University of Ottawa and St. Paul's University. St. Paul's retained the Faculties of Theology and Canon Law and related Institutes, one of which is the Ukrainian Catholic Church's Skeptytsky Institute which conducts the only doctoral program of Eastern Christian Studies in the Western Hemisphere. Establishments of this kind were opened in a great number of countries in the years that followed. Parochial work, originally not considered a part of the congregation's apostolate, was included also, particularly in places like America, Africa, and Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), where parishes were not only accepted but also established by the Oblates.

The development of the congregation is also associated with the care of Marian shrines. The founder accepted nine of them, and this number was increased through the years. The national Marian shrine of Canada, Our Lady of the Cape, Quebec, is under the care of the Oblates. Three shrines in the U.S. are under their jurisdiction: Our Lady of Lourdes, San Antonio, Tex.; Our Lady of the Snows, Belleville, Ill.; and Our Lady of Grace, Colebrook, N.H. Under the direction of the diocesan clergy, the Oblates serve at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C.

Approximately 185 years after its foundation, the congregation was divided into six regions, comprising 40 provinces, 18 delegations and 15 missions. It had more than 4,600 members, of whom about 3,500 were priests, including one cardinal, ten archbishops and 33 bishops. In addition 661 scholastics were preparing for the priesthood and 540 served as coadjutor brothers. It had given to the Church three cardinals, Joseph Hippolyte Guibert (1802–86), Archbishop of Paris, and Jean Mary Rodrigue VILLENEUVE (1883–1947), Archbishop of Quebec, and Francis George, (1937–), Archbishop of Chicago. Pope John Paul II canonized the founder, Bp. Eugene de Mazenod, on Dec. 3, 1995. Two other Oblates, Fr. Joseph Gerard and Fr. Jozef Cebula, have been beatified. Preliminary steps have been taken toward the canonization of four others.

Canada. When the Oblates arrived in Montreal in December 1841, they lost no time in taking over the care of the native missions, a work that led them to the remotest regions of James Bay and Labrador. In 1845, Alexander Taché, an Oblate seminarian, went to western Canada, where eventually he became successively bishop and archbishop of Saint Boniface. The conquest of western Canada for the Church was accomplished largely by the Oblates. They preached the gospel as far as Alaska, the shores of the Arctic sea, and Hudson Bay. Ten years after their arrival they had covered the entire expanse of Canada. They were named the first bishops of almost all the episcopal sees of the West: Saint Boniface, Edmonton, Saint Albert, Prince Albert, Gravelbourg, Vancouver, New Westminster, Mackenzie, Yukon, Grouard, and Hudson Bay. They also supplied the first bishop of Ottawa, the vicars apostolic of James Bay and Labrador, bishops to Timmins and Amos, and a cardinal archbishop of Quebec.

United States. From Canada, the Oblates spread to the U.S., where they preached their first mission at Cooperville, N.Y., in 1842. In the Oregon Territory they ministered to Native American tribes and newly arrived immigrants between 1847 and 1860. While still under superiors residing in Canada, they established foundations in Pittsburgh, Pa.; Buffalo and Plattsburgh, N.Y.; Burlington, Vt.; Detroit, Mich.; St. Paul, Minn.; and Lowell, Mass. In 1849, a mission was opened in Texas. The first attempt was shortlived, but a permanent foundation was made in 1851. They established a school in Galveston and made a foundation in Brownsville. In 1858 they crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico with foundations at Matamoros, Aqualeguas, and Victoria.

The Oblates in the U.S. were members of the Canadian province until 1883, when they formed a separate American province that included all the Oblate foundations within the U.S. Father James McGrath was named first provincial, and a year later the first novitiate was established in the new province at Tewksbury, Mass. Later, other provinces were created: the Eastern, with headquarters located at Boston, Mass.; the Southern, at Houston, Tex.; the Central, at St. Paul, Minn.; the Western, at San Fernando, Calif.; and St. John the Baptist province, which is not territorial but was established for the benefit of the French-speaking population, with headquarters at Lowell, Mass. Because of dwindling numbers and in order to focus efforts in evangelization, the five American provinces merged into one in 1999. American Oblates staff missions in Brazil, Japan, the Philippines, and Haiti. Some are in the Canadian north as well as in Africa, Sri Lanka, Laos, Chile, and Brazil. There are American Oblate missionary bishops in the Philippines and Haiti. The American Oblates conduct missions also in Denmark and Greenland; one member was named bishop of Stockholm, Sweden.

In the U.S., the Oblates preach parochial missions, direct retreat houses, conduct high schools, and care for numerous parishes from coast to coast. Without counting those working in foreign fields, American Oblates in 2001 numbered 531, of whom 454 were priests, including one cardinal, one archbishop and one bishop, 36 coadjutor brothers and 41 scholastics.

Rule and Administration. In addition to the three canonical vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the Oblates take a vow of perseverance by which they pledge in a particular way to remain in the congregation until death, even in the event that for extrinsic reasons the members should be obliged to disperse.

Supreme authority is found in the general chapter, which is convoked by the superior general every six years to strengthen the bonds of unity and to express the members participation in the life and mission of the congregation. The ordinary governing authority is in the hands of the Superior General, elected by the general chapter for six years, with six renewable. He is assisted by a general council comprised of the councilors for the congregation's six regions of Canada, United States, Latin America, Europe, Africa and Asia/Oceania, as well as by a vicar general and two assistants general, also elected by the general chapter. A new general council is elected by the general chapter after it has elected a new superior general. A secretary general, bursar general, procurator to the Holy See and a postulator for the causes of canonization are named by the superior general with his council in plenary session.

The superior general is bound to visit the congregation, either personally or by means of his assistants or other visitors whom he chooses, every six years. The congregation is divided into six regions, 40 provinces, 18 delegations and 14 missions. Within the province, delegation or mission, each local community has its superior. Provincials are appointed by the superior general in council after consulting individually the members of a province. The provincial in council appoints the superior and council of a delegation subject to confirmation by the superior general in council, while the superior of a mission is appointed by the competent major superior. The congregation receives among its members candidates for the priesthood who are trained in its novitiates and scholasticates, and frequently also in its juniorates or minor seminaries. It also receives men who, while not aspiring to the priesthood, wish to devote their technical, professional or pastoral skills, as well as the witness of their life, to the work of building up the church as brothers.

Bibliography: Constitutions and Rules of the Congregation of the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate (Rome 2000). G. CARRIÈRE, Histoire documentaire de la Congrégation des Missionnaires Oblats de Marie Immaculée dans l'Est du Canada (Ottawa 1957–63) 5 v. pub. J. E. CHAMPAGNE, Les Missions catholiques dans l'Ouest canadien, 1818–1875 (Ottawa 1949). K. CRONIN, Cross in the Wilderness (Vancouver 1960). B. DOYON, The Cavalry of Christ on the Rio Grande, 1849–1883 (Milwaukee 1956). Études Oblatés J. LEFLON, Eugène de Mazenod, Bishop of Marseilles, Founder of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, tr. F. D. FLANAGAN (New York 1961–). Missions de la Congrégation des Missionnaires Oblats de Marie-Immaculée chronological compilations of official reports and personal letters. T. ORTOLAN, Cent ans d'apostolat dans les deux hémisphères: Les Oblats de Marie Immaculée durant le premier siècle de leur existence, 4 v. (Paris 1915–). T. RAMBERT, Vie de Monseigneur Charles-Joseph-Eugène de Mazenod, 2 v. (Tours 1883). A. REY, Histoire de Monseigneur Charles-Joseph-Eugène de Mazenod, 2 v. (Marseille 1928). G. M. WAGGETT, "The Oblates of Mary Immaculate in the Pacific Northwest of the U.S.A. 1847–1878," Études Oblatés 6 (1947) 7–88.

[G. CARRIÈRE/C. HURKES]

OBLATES OF ST. CHARLES

(OSC); an English institute of secular priests founded by Henry Edward MANNING in London (1857). The great increase in the Catholic population at that time, because of Irish immigration and conversions resulting from the Oxford Movement, led Cardinal WISEMAN to depute Manning to establish this group. Manning modeled the new institute on the Oblates of Milan, but modified their rule, composed by St. Charles BORROMEO, to suit English conditions. Pius IX approved the rule in 1877. The aim was to have diocesan priests living in communities and engaged in pastoral and domestic mission labors. Under Manning, the first superior, the Oblates established four parishes in the western section of London, built primary and secondary schools, and introduced several sisterhoods into the Westminster archdiocese to aid them. Herbert VAUGHAN, while an Oblate, founded the MILL HILL MISSIONARIES.

Bibliography: E. S. PURCELL, Life of Cardinal Manning, Archbishop of Westminster, 2 v. (4th ed. London 1896).

[D. WARD/EDS.]

OBLATES OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES

A religious congregation of men, the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, at times popularly known today as “De Sales Oblates,” were founded in Troyes, France, by Reverend Louis Brisson in 1872. His early death prevented St. Francis de Sales from proceeding very far in his desire to establish a congregation of men whose spirit would be similar to that of the Order of the Visitation of Holy Mary which he had co-founded in 1610 with St. Jane de Chantal. After his death, however, St. Jane de Chantal encouraged Reverend Raymond Bonal to make a similar foundation which lasted until the early 18th century. Mother Marie de Sales Chappuis, the Superior of the Troyes Visitation Monastery, persuaded the Monastery’s chaplain, Father Brisson, to make another attempt.

Early History. Father Brisson asked Father Claude Perrot, a Benedictine monk of the Abbey of Notre Dame des Ermites in Einsiedeln, Switzerland, to assist him in the formulation of constitutions for the projected congregation. Father Perrot’s initial attempts, short treatises on spiritual subjects, were taken verbatim from the writings of St. Francis de Sales. In time, they were formulated into constitutions in the canonical sense. To these was added the “Spiritual Directory” which is a series of brief, insightful instructions on the right manner and disposition for performing “the actions of every day.” When his bishop asked Father Brisson to take over the administration of St. Stephen’s, a failing diocesan school for boys, he saw this request as the opportunity which Providence was providing him for bringing about his new foundation. In the fall of 1872, the clerical faculty members of the School, now named Saint Bernard’s, began their novitiate. The congregation received its first Roman approval, the Decretum laudis, in December, 1875, and its definitive approval on Dec. 8, 1897.

Charism of the Congregation. The charism of the Oblates is the imitation of St. Francis de Sales in his own celebrated imitation of Jesus. The members of the congregation live and spread the spirit and doctrine of their Patron through sharing his spiritual legacy as found in his major works such as the Introduction to the Devout Life and the Treatise on the Love of God. For the congregation, a principal focus of Salesian spirituality is the saint’s “Spiritual Directory.” This masterpiece is not so much a book as it is a spiritual strategy for living the spirit of Jesus in simple and concrete way throughout the course of each day. Its essential practices, such as the direction of intention and interior prayer, lead, in time, to a state of continual, loving union with God in heart, will, and life. This is how Scripture describes the human life of Jesus and how Oblates live Jesus themselves and teach others to do so. In this way, they participate in his saving mission today.

Imbued with the inviting spirituality of their Patron, the members of the congregation, priests and lay brothers, work to satisfy the human family’s hunger for union with the Holy. They do this by showing those they serve how to observe Jesus’s double commandment of love. In imitation of Jesus, they are shown how to love God with affective love, that is, in prayerful union with Him and with effective love by generously responding to His divine will for them as that will unfolds in the course of each succeeding present moment of life. They are taught how to love others by meeting their spiritual and human needs in a compassionate, concrete and caring manner; and by living the relational virtues with them: charity, humility, gentleness, patience, simplicity, and joyful optimism.

While being responsive to the Church’s changing apostolic needs, the Oblates are generally involved in the Christian education of youth, parochial ministry, and foreign missions.

Expansion. In July 1882 five missionaries were sent to Pella, a small village in the region of South Africa known as Namaqualand. With later territorial additions, this region became the Apostolic Vicariate of the Orange River, which was later divided into what are now the Diocese of Keimoes-Upington, in South Africa, and the Diocese of Keetmanshoop in Namibia. Even today, Oblates continue to constitute the largest number of clergy in both dioceses. Because of political unrest and anticlerical sentiment, the Oblates who had been assigned to Brazil in 1885 were soon transferred to Montevideo, Uruguay. As soon as conditions improved, however, the congregation returned to Brazil, this time to Rio Grande do Sul. In July, 1889, the congregation established a school in Naxos, Greece, which was soon followed by one in Athens. By the end of the 19th century, European foundations had also been established in Italy, Austria, and England. Although the congregation later withdrew from England and Greece, its presence in Europe continues in Austria, France, Germany, Italy, Monaco, the Netherlands, and Switzerland.

In 1893 Father Joseph Maréchaux was assigned as chaplain to a new congregation of sisters in White Plains, New York—the Sisters of Divine Compassion. Three years later, five companions joined him, forming the original community of Oblates in the United States. Within a few years, all were assigned elsewhere, however. In the meantime, another Oblate had been sent as chaplain to the Monastery of the Visitation, then located in Wilmington, Delaware. Two other Oblates, fleeing anti-religious laws in France, joined him there in 1903. Together they established Salesianum, a private high school for boys in Wilmington, as well as a novitiate. The first provincial for the United States was appointed in 1906, the same year that the novitiate was transferred to Childs, Maryland. In 1924 the congregation established a house of studies for its scholastics near The Catholic University of America, in Washington, DC.

In 1926 the congregation accepted an invitation from the Archdiocese of Philadelphia to staff the newly established Northeast Catholic High School for boys. Rapidly following that foundation, the congregation spread throughout the United States, principally along the East Coast: Delaware, the District of Columbia, Florida, Maryland, New York, New Jersey, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Virginia; in the Midwest: Michigan and Ohio; and in the West: California, Oklahoma, and Utah.

Recent Developments. In 1983, after an extensive period of discernment and two exploratory visits, the congregation established a foundation in Bangalore, India. At present, there is a flourishing house of studies there, with plans underway for further expansion in India and elsewhere in Asia. In recent years, Oblates have begun small but promising ministries in Bénin, Ecuador, Ukraine, Haiti, and Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula.

The Mother House of the congregation is located in Rome. The congregation is governed by a Superior General who is elected for a six-year term, once renewable, and by four general councillors, three of whom are elected by the General Chapter while one is appointed by the Superior General. World-wide, there are 650 Oblates in ten provinces or regions. Each province or region is governed by a major superior who is either elected or appointed according to the prescriptions of particular statutes for a four-year term, twice renewable. They are assisted in governance by an elected council. The novitiate lasts one year. The perpetual profession of simple vows follows three years or more of annual vows.

Bibliography: OSFS, Official Catholic Directory #0920. P. DUFOUR, Les Oblats de Saint François de Sales (Paris 1938). K. BURTON, So Much so Soon: Father Brisson, Founder of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales (New York 1953).

[L. S. FIORELLI]

OBLATES OF ST. JOSEPH

The Congregation of the Oblates of St. Joseph (OSJ, Official Catholic Directory #0930) was founded in 1878

by Giuseppe Marelli (1844–95), Bishop of Acqui, Italy. After surviving its difficult early years, the congregation was given final approval by the Holy See April 11, 1909. The Oblates of St. Joseph are engaged in various apostolic works in parishes, schools, and foreign missions. The founder wished his followers to be ready to serve the bishops in whatever tasks were given to them. The generalate is in Rome. The congregation came to the U.S. in 1929 at the request of Thomas C. O'Reilly, Bishop of Scranton, Pa. In 1931 they opened houses in California at Madera, Santa Cruz, Sacramento, and Tomales. In the U.S. the congregation is divided into two provinces: the eastern province embraces Pennsylvania, New York, and Washington, D.C.; the western, California.

[S. CHINI/EDS.]

OBLIGATION, MORAL

Since Immanuel KANT proposed his theory of duty for duty's sake, based on his doctrine of the categorical imperative, the theme of duty or obligation has become the central one in almost all modern ethical theories. It occupies so important a place in moral reflection that in the history of philosophy moral systems are classed according as they center on the twin notions of duty and obligation or not. Kant's ethical theory, based on the notion of duty (Pflicht) for duty's sake, was deeply influenced by his religious background and upbringing (see PIETISM). Much more recently Henri BERGSON, in a truly epoch-making work (Les deux sources de la morale et de la religion, 1932), proposed a moral theory built around a double source of moral obligation, namely, social pressure and personal attraction (aspiration) in love and friendship. For both of these eminent thinkers, the notion of duty or obligation is fundamental in moral teaching. In contemporary thought, the English (principally Oxford) moral philosophers have devoted much energy to the semantics of moral theory in general and to the linguistic analysis of obligation in particular (Hare, Nowell-Smith, Ewing, and others). This article, however, is limited to examining the concept of obligation in the Christian ethos, or in the context of the history of salvation (Heilsgeschichte).

Semantics and Metaphysics of Obligation. The notion of duty and obligation is found in the sources of revelation and in sacred theology, but in a subordinate or secondary position. This is explainable by the fact that, as against the Kantian conception of things (namely, that an action or way of life is good because it presents itself as a duty or obligation through the categorical imperative), the attitude found in the sources of revelation and in theology (in fact, in most systems of moral philosophy up to the time of Kant) is just the contrary. The attitude may be expressed this way: because an action is good in itself or because it is prescribed in the law of God (see St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 108.1 ad 2) and as such is a manifestation of His will, it is here and now a duty and consequently it obliges. It should be carefully noted that “duty” and “obligation,” although very closely related terms, are not synonymous. They are, it may be said, the twin facets of one and the same reality—duty indicating the objective reality (to be realized and put into execution) and obligation being the necessity in which one’s freedom finds itself when it comes face to face with this reality. Duty is what one is bound to do by moral or legal obligation (see Summa theologiae 1a 2ae, 99.5 and passim for the distinction between moral and legal obligation and duty). The very word obligation (from ob-ligare) signifies the state of being bound around or enveloped by some constraint or necessity or force limiting the scope of free activity or perhaps orientating and safeguarding it (see FREEDOM; see also St. Thomas, In 3 Sent. 18. 1.2 ad 5; De ver. 23.1; De malo 16.5; Summa theologiae 1a, 103.8 in fine c.; In 1 meta. 3.58–60). One arrives at much the same notion by examining the word duty, which came into English from the French through Anglo-French (dû, dueté) and ultimately from the Latin debere, which itself is composed of de and habere meaning to have something from another, to be in possession of something that in reality belongs to another [see Meillet-Ernout, Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue latine (4th ed. Paris 1959–60) s.v. debeo].

Going just one step further from this nominal definition of obligation, one gets an insight into the metaphysical roots of obligation. For, supposing the fact of creation [St. Thomas frequently refers to the gift (beneficium) of creation: C. gent. 3.120; Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 100.5 ad 2; 2a2ae, 85.2; 122.4; and even once to the right of God based on the fact of creation (ius creationis): In 3 Sent. 9.1.1.1], it follows that all created things, sharing in or participating the being and perfections of God, are by that very fact participated being (ens per participationem) and as such belong (ontologically) to the Supreme Being, from whom they receive all they are and have. In this precise sense all creatures must be said to be parts of the Creator; that is, every participated being is, by definition, a part of and belongs to unparticipated, uncreated, uncaused Being, which is God. This is perhaps one of the most brilliant and profound theological insights of St. Thomas, who then proceeds to apply it in many different theological fields. He uses it, for instance, to show that the angels love God by natural love more than themselves, first of all by natural and instinctive inclination and then by conscious and voluntary ordination (cf. Summa theologiae 1a, 60.5; In Dion. de div. nom. 4.9, 10). All created things, then, from the greatest to the smallest, belong to God in their totality, not only as they come from the hands of their Maker and thus enter into being, but also, and perhaps above all, in the fullness of their being and perfection, that is, in the full self-realization brought about by their own free action and life, through which precisely they give full glory to their Creator, whose work they are (cf. Summa theologiae 1a, 103.2; 1a2ae, 1, 7–8; 1a2ae, 21.4 ad 3; C. gent. 3.16–21). This notion is of paramount importance in considering those beings that grow and develop into the perfection or fullness of their being; and above all in considering creatures whose growth into plenitude of being is under their own guidance, as is the case with human beings. Man, endowed with reason and free will, moves or guides himself into the perfection that God, the Creator, has destined for him, whether that perfection is completely proportionate to his connatural powers or corresponds rather to a gratuitous divine call and to gratuitously donated life principles (infused virtues) leading ultimately to consummation in participated divine life in the vision of heaven.

Thus, whether in the order of nature or of supernature, the metaphysical roots of all responsibility and obligation are founded in God’s plan for His creation and for its ultimate consummation in and through Christ. In the Book of Sirach it is said that God, having created man from the beginning, committed him into the hands of his own counsel and at the same time gave him His law to guide him (Sirach in the Vulgate 15.14–16; Summa theologiae 1a, 103.5 ad 2). St. Thomas put the matter this way: just as the ship is committed by the maker or owner to the care of the captain to guide it, care for it, and bring it safely to port, so did God commit man to the care and guidance of his reason and will to bring him to the goal set by God, namely, eternal life, beatitude, and salvation (cf. Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 2.5; 2a2ae, 85.2).

From this theonomic notion of obligation and responsibility (based on the interpersonal relationship between the Creator and His creature), it should be immediately manifest that obligation may in no wise be conceived as something imposed from without, hampering freedom and growth, but rather as an exigency of being, and in particular as an exigency of human being in dependence of the divine Being, who wishes that His creatures come to perfection (cf. 1 Thes 4.3) and thus give Him the honor and glory that is His due. In terms of the nominal definition that was the starting point of this analysis, it can be said: man’s first and fundamental duty is the perfection appointed him by God and consequently due to God, and his first and fundamental obligation is that of bringing himself to that divinely appointed consummation in being.

Obligation in the Old and New Testament. In the context of the history of salvation, it is evident that God, the Creator and Master of all things, entered into personal contact and dialogue with His creatures, with men, calling them to a special sharing in His life and friendship and entering into a covenant, or alliance, with them, and Himself established the conditions of that alliance, setting them down in brief in the Law, in the Decalogue of Sinai. The observance of the Law and the carrying out of all its prescriptions was the one guarantee of retaining the goodwill and friendship of Yahweh. Hence the reverence, devotion, and love with which the chosen people looked upon the Law. The Law and all its prescriptions, that is, the conditions of the alliance, bind or oblige them in all their doings. Of that they are fully conscious. This concentration and insistence on the Law may in no way be thought of as a kind of legalism, but rather, as a modern exegete has felicitously put it, as true nomocentrism. The voice of God came to Moses on Mt. Sinai: "Thus shall you say to the house of Jacob; tell the Israelites: you have seen for yourselves how I treated the Egyptians and how I bore you up on eagle wings and brought you here to myself. Therefore if you hearken to my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my special possession, dearer to me than all other people, though all the earth is mine. You shall be to me a kingdom of priests, a holy nation" (Ex 19.3–6). When Moses told the people what the Lord had said and made known to them all the commands He had given, they answered, in the conviction that an obligation was being imposed on them: "Everything the Lord has said, we will do" (Ex 19.7; 24.3); and forthwith Moses committed all to writing (Ex 24.4). The observance of the Law of Yahweh brings blessing and happiness (Ex 23.20–33; Dt 28.1–14); its breach, maledictions and misfortune (Lv 26.14–43; Dt 28.1.5–68).

The notion of obligation in the New Law and under the New Alliance remains fundamentally the same; but there are, for all that, important differences, differences not so much of content as of spirit or attitude, caused in men by the teaching and example of Christ and by His efficacious (sacramental) healing and sanctifying influence on those who believe in Him. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spoke in times past to the fathers by the prophets, last of all in these days has spoken to us by His Son" (Heb 1.1), whom when the time had matured, He sent, in order that we might receive adoption as sons, sending the spirit of His Son into our hearts, so that from being slaves and bondsmen we might, with and in Christ, become sons and heirs by the act of God (cf. Gal 4.4–7). This is the fulfillment of God's promise to enter into a new covenant with His people by transforming their hearts and renewing their spirit (cf. Ez 11.19). However, one must never forget Our Lord's constant and insistent warning that He came not to abolish the Law or the Prophets, but to fulfill them down to the minutest detail (Mt 5.17–18) by seeing that they be observed from within, from the spirit of sonship, and out of love for the person of the Lawgiver. Another warning of Christ must also be kept in mind, namely, that the sole proof of one's love for Him is the keeping of His Commandments (cf. Jn 14.15, 21; 1 Jn 5.2; Jn 1.6).

In the context, then, of the New Alliance, it is evident that the roots of obligation for the new people of God are visibly and outwardly the Law and the Prophets and, in the inner being of the new creation (2 Cor 5.17), the new spirit of sonship and friendship infused into men's hearts through and in Christ, together with men's consciousness of this new nobility and dignity (see CONSCIENCE). Here it is really a question of noblesse oblige, and St. Paul, in the parenetic sections of his Epistles, returns to it again and again (see Eph 5.3; Col 3.12; Gal 5.22; Rom 6.22). The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Vatican Council II (ch. 2.5, 7) insistently recalls the people of God to a recognition and to a renewed consciousness of the dignity of their divine calling and of the obligations that calling imposes, echoing thereby the words of St. Leo: "Recognize, O Christian, your dignity and having become a partaker in the divine nature, do not degrade yourself by returning to your former baseness. Remember the Head and the Body of which you are a member" (Serm. 21.3; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE [Paris 1878–90] 54:192–193).

Here a point of the greatest importance must be carefully noted. Yahweh did not conclude the alliance with individual members of the chosen people, but with the people as such, making known to them through His Prophets the terms of the alliance laid down by Him and the conditions of its observance. So it was in the course of sacred history; in the designs of divine providence, so it still is in the context of the New Alliance with the new people of God. The conditions of the alliance, it must be confessed, affect and oblige each individual, and the Spirit of God moves the minds and inspires and informs the consciences of the individual faithful (cf. Mt 10.29–33; Lk 12.6–7). To guarantee the genuineness and authenticity of such inspirations—whether in matters of faith or morals—Christ, foreseeing the ever-present danger of error and deception, endowed His Church with an infallible teaching authority vested in its pastors, who receive Christ's injunction to go teach all nations to observe all whatsoever He had commanded them (Mt 28.20), as well as the assurance that whoever listens to them listens to Him (Lk 10.16). This important matter was emphasized in a special way in Vatican Council II (cf. loc. cit. 2.12.2).

Obligation and Law. Before termination of the discussion on the notion of obligation in the context of the history of salvation and of the Christian ethos in particular, one final matter must be mentioned. The radical binding force of divine (and natural, which is a direct and immediate participation of divine) law, as the main source and root of obligation in the context of the history of salvation, has been examined above and need not be further expatiated. However, the question of the binding force of positive human law—whether civil, ecclesiastical, or religious—must be considered, since there is the ever-present danger of either exaggerating its binding force (see RIGORISM) or of so minimizing it that it no longer has any real meaning as law (see LAXISM). This question is all the more important in that positive law affects men more tangibly and obviously and, as man-made, appears more readily as an unwarranted curtailment of man's innate freedom. Besides, a wrong conception of things in this domain can, and indeed at times must, inevitably lead to a falsification of conscience and eventually to SCRUPULOSITY. First, the principle of St. Thomas with regard to the general binding force of positive (human) law should be carefully noted: when there is no evidence of the fact, it is a dangerous thing to lay down categorically what is or is not a mortal sin (Quodl. 9.7.2). Second, all positive law, if it be just and prudently made, whether civil or ecclesiastical or religious, binds in conscience and must be observed ut in pluribus (see Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 96.1 ad 3; 1a2ae, 96.6 and passim) under pain of sin and corresponding punishment as laid down in the law itself. Third, there is the special case of laws of constitutions that stipulate explicitly that they do not bind under sin, but oblige only to undergo the penalty attaching to their violation. This is the case, for instance, with regard to the 1932 constitutions of the Dominican Order (32.1, dating from the general chapter of Paris, 1236; Monumenta Ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum historica, ed. B. M. Reichert [Rome-Stuttgart-Paris 1896–] 3.8) and, following that example, the constitutions and rules of many other orders, congregations, and confraternities. Fourth, it should be noted that therein is the source of much confusion in later moral theology. For such rules and constitutions were (and are) said to bind sub levi or sub gravi, meaning that they oblige to the acceptance of the light or grave penalty imposed by them, but in no wise insinuating that there is any question of sin: quite the contrary. In later times, and especially in post-Reformation theology, the origin of these expressions was overlooked, and they were wrongly given the meaning of obligation under light or grave sin. Hence arose the bitter discussion during the 17th century. The bitterness seems to have disappeared, but the confusion persists, and so far shows no sign of being dissipated.

Bibliography: A. MOLIEU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 9.1:871–910. G. ERMECKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:426–428. K. E. LOGSTRUP, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:313–317. X. LÉON-DUFOUR et al., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962) 20–29. R. NAZ and C. LEFERVRE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1953–65) 6:635–677. J. TONNEAU, “L’Obligation ad poenam des constitutions dominicaines,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 24 (1935) 107–115; “Devoir et morale,” ibid. 38 (1954) 233–252. W. FARRELL, “The Roots of Obligation,” Thomist 1 (1939) 14–30. L. B. GEIGER, Le Problème de l’amour chez saint Thomas d’Aquin (Montreal 1952). H. M. BAUMGARTNER, Die Unbedingtheit des Sittlichen: Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Nicolai Hartmann (Munich 1962). H. REINER, “Wesen und Grund der sittlichen Verbindlichkeit (obligatio) bei Thomas v. Aquin” in Sein und Ethos: Untersuchungen zur Grundlegung der Ethik, ed. P. ENGELHARDT (Mainz 1963) 236–266; “Beatitudo und obligatio bei Thomas von Aquin: Antwort an P. Pinckaers,” ibid. 306–328. S. PINCKAERS, “Eudämonismus und sittliche Verbindlichkeit in der Ethik des hl. Thomas: Stellungnahme zum Beitrag Hans Reiner,” ibid. 267–305. CAJETAN, “De obligatione et observatione praecceptorum tam in religione, quam extra” in Opuscula omnia, t.1, tract. 25; Commentarii in Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 95–96; 2a2ae, 186.9. BARTHOLOMAEUS DE MEDINA, Expositio in Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 96.4. G. G. MEERSSEMAN, “La Loi purement pénale d’après les statuts de Confréries Médiévales,” Mélanges Joseph de Ghellinck, 2 v. (Gembloux 1951) 2:975–1002. S. KUTTNER, Kanonistische Schuldlehre von Gratian bis auf die Dekretalien Gregors IX. (Studi e Testi 64; 1935). R. M. HARE, The Language of Morals (Oxford 1952).

[C. WILLIAMS]

O'BOYLE, PATRICK A.

First resident archbishop of Wash., D.C., cardinal; b. July 18, 1896, Scranton, Pa.; d. Aug. 10, 1987, Washington, D.C. He graduated from St. Thomas College (later renamed the University of Scranton), and St. Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers, N.Y. Ordained in New York's St. Patrick's Cathedral on May 21, 1921, by Patrick Cardinal HAYES, Father O'Boyle's first assignment was to St. Columba's parish in Manhattan, south of the infamous Hell's Kitchen, where he saw and experienced the urban version of the hard life.

Early Charitable Work. His work among the parish poor caught the eye of Cardinal Hayes, who gave him the first of a series of assignments concerned with the cause of the needy. In 1933, he was appointed assistant director of the Children's Division of the New York Catholic Charities; he supervised various Catholic charitable organizations and child care agencies, notably the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin on Staten Island, one of the country's largest child care institutions with more than 1,100 children enrolled. During this same period, he was a faculty member at Fordham University School of Social Work. In 1941, he was named assistant director of New York's Catholic Charities, and in 1943, he became director of War Relief Services of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (1946–48). He served as director of Catholic Charities of New York.

Archbishop. On Nov. 15, 1947, Monsignor O'Boyle was named the first residential ordinary of the archdiocese of Washington, D.C. The Washington archdiocese had been created in 1939, but it had remained united with the archdiocese of Baltimore until Archbishop O'Boyle was appointed ordinary. (It was the first time in the United States that a priest had been named an archbishop without first serving as a bishop.)

Ordained to the episcopacy in January of 1948, O'Boyle was installed in St. Matthew's Cathedral as archbishop of Washington on Jan. 21, 1948. During his 25-year tenure as archbishop, the number of Catholics in the archdiocese more than doubled. The number of parishes increased by 50, and 317 buildings were constructed under his leadership, including schools to educate the children of the postwar baby boom; St. Ann's Infant and Maternity home for unwed mothers and their babies; Carroll Manor for the elderly; and the Lt. Joseph P. Kennedy Institute to serve the mentally handicapped.

One of his first acts as archbishop was to order the desegregation of Catholic schools and churches, an order that The Washington Post called "one of the most influential acts of moral leadership in this city's history." The desegregation of the Catholic schools began six years before the Supreme Court outlawed segregation in the public schools in its historic Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954. He also spoke out forcefully in support of racial justice and equality during the 1960s and 1970s and earned a reputation as an outspoken friend of those who were being denied basic human and civil rights.

Archbishop O'Boyle attended all the sessions of the Second VATICAN COUNCIL. He was elected to the Commission on Seminaries, Universities and Catholic Schools, where he played a significant role in shaping the Declaration of Christian Education (Gravissimum educationis). In a formal intervention during the final session, he urged greater sensitivity to Jewish feelings "out of consideration of truth and charity," and he recommended several changes in the wording of the declaration concerning Jews and non-Christians. In the final session, as chairman of the Administrative Board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, he spoke "in the name of all the bishops of the United States gathered in Rome," urging that schema 13 (later to emerge as Gaudium et spes) contain a condemnation of racism and racial discrimination in all its forms.

Cardinal. He was created cardinal on June 28, 1967, by Pope PAUL VI and given his titular church, St. Nicholas in Carcere. By reason of his position as ordinary of the Archdiocese of Washington, O'Boyle was also chancellor of The Catholic University of America. Although inclined to be less involved in university affairs than previous chancellors had been, he intervened at critical periods, during the early 1960s, for example, in order to insure the success of the New Catholic Encyclopedia, and during the spring of 1967, when a nationally publicized protest of faculty against an action of the trustees had led to a week-long suspension of classes. He was a keen participant in the reorganization of the board of trustees and the development of new bylaws for university governance in 1968. In years of financial crisis during the late 1960s and early 1970s, he used his personal influence to obtain support for the institution.

Doctrinal Defender. Although considered by many to be a liberal on civil rights and social issues, Cardinal O'Boyle was perceived as an outspoken and unbending opponent of dissent where the Church's doctrinal or moral teachings were concerned. This was most evident in his staunch support of Pope Paul VI's 1968 encyclical, Humanae vitae, that upheld the Church's teaching against artificial contraception. His support of the encyclical led to a controversy involving 50 priests of the archdiocese and some priest faculty members of The Catholic University of America.

Equally outspoken on other moral issues, he opposed sterilization on grounds that it frustrates a natural right to conceive that neither the state nor an individual can take away; and he criticized government birth control programs as an intrusion into the private rights of citizens. He was critical of the Supreme Court's 1973 decision legalizing abortion; he equated abortion with murder and compared it with Hitler's slaughter of the Jews.

Cardinal O'Boyle submitted his resignation at the mandatory retirement age of 75 in 1971. His resignation was accepted in 1973. He continued to reside in Washington until his death after a short illness. He is interred in St. Matthew's Cathedral crypt. His papers from the Vatican II years are in the archives of the Mullen Library on the campus of The Catholic University of America.

Bibliography: Washington Post (Aug. 12, 1987) A22. V. A. YZERMANS, American Participation in the Second Vatican Council (New York 1967).

[J. F. DONOGHUE]

OBRECHT, JAKOB

Composer, also called Hobrecht, Obertus, etc.; b. Bergen-op-Zoom, Holland, Nov. 22, 1452; d. Ferrara, "Salve Regina," 16th-century manuscript by Jakob Obrecht.

Italy, 1505. He was at the University of Louvain in 1470 and was ordained in 1480. In 1479 he became choir director in his native town, and from 1484 to 1485 he served at Cambrai cathedral; he was then appointed succentor at Bruges. On a short leave of absence in 1487 he visited Ferrara at the invitation of Duke Hercules I. From 1492 to 1496 he was a chaplain of Antwerp cathedral, but he spent his last few years at Ferrara, where he died during the plague. Composer of some 30 secular works, he first gained prominence for his Masses, some of which were inspired by (if not based upon) material by Frye, BUSNOIS, A. Agricola, and OKEGHEM. Mostly scored for four voices, they exhibit some conservative features (rigid cantus firmus treatment, little melodic imitation), although harmonically they have strong tonal tendencies. His thematic material derives from a variety of sources: a German song in praise of the Virgin (Missa Maria zart), a Marian antiphon and other texts (Missa Sub tuum praesidium), an antiphon for Holy Thursday (Missa Caput);

a secular song (Missa L'homme armé), a motet by another composer (Missa Ave Regina caelorum); it was the custom to honor past masters by borrowing their melodies, polyphonic textures, and structural ideas, integrating them into new works with entirely different texts. In his motets, he sometimes shows an old-fashioned predilection for polytextuality (Beata es, Maria; Salve crux arbor), though his treatment of texture usually leans toward the clarity and fluidity of Desprez. Among his masterpieces are his settings of the MARIAN ANTIPHONS SALVE REGINA, ALMA REDEMPTORIS MATER, and AVE REGINA CAELORUM. A motet-Passion long ascribed to him is now known to be the work of Antoine Longueval.

Bibliography: Werken, ed. J. WOLF, 30 v. (Amsterdam 1908–21). Opera Omnia, ed. A. SMIJERS and M. VAN CREVEL (Amsterdam 1953–). O. J. GOMBOSI, Jacob Obrecht (Leipzig 1925). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). B. MURRAY, "A New Light on Jacob Obrecht's Development," Musical Quarterly (New York 1957) 43: 500–516. "Jacob Obrecht's Connection with the Church of Our Lady in Antwerp," Revue

belge de musicologie 11 (1957) 125–133. L. FINSCHER, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 9:1814–22. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, ed. N. SLONIMSKY (5th, rev. ed. New York 1958) 1175. B. J. BLACKBURN, "Obrecht's Missa Je ne demande and Busnoys's Chanson: An Essay in Reconstructing Lost Canons," Tidschrift van de Koninklijke Vereniging voor Nederlandse Muziekgeschiedenis 45 (1995), 18–32. J. M. BLOXHAM, "Plainsong and Polyphony for the Blessed Virgin: Notes on Two Masses by Jacob Obrecht," The Journal of Musicology 12 (1994), 51–75. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996). R. D. ROSS, "The Motets of Jacob Obrecht: A Stylistic Analysis" (Ph.D. diss. University of Cincinnati, 1973). R. C. WEGMAN, Born For the Muses: The Life and Masses of Jacob Obrecht (Oxford: 1994.) "Agricola, Bordon, and Obrecht at Ghent: Discoveries and Revisions," Revue Belge de Musicologie 51 (1997), 34–48.

[D. STEVENS]

OBRECHT, M. EDMOND

Fourth abbot of Gethsemani, Ky.; b. Stotzheim, Alsace, Nov. 13, 1852; d. Gethsemani, Jan. 4, 1935. He entered La Grande Trappe, La Trappe, France, at the age of 23, intending to live all his days there in cloistered silence and anonymity. Instead, he traveled all over the globe, was known to four successive popes and many bishops, and was loved by countless people. He was ordained at Seez in 1879 and sent immediately to Rome as secretary to the procurator general of the three Trappist observances. When these amalgamated into an order in 1892, he was commissioned to collect funds in the United States for the ancient Abbey of Tre Fontane, Rome, which had become the generalate of the restored order. After four years, he returned to Rome, was sent to a struggling abbey in the French Jura, and shortly after appointed provisional superior of Gethsemani. By strong measures he saved this monastery for the United States and his order, and was elected its abbot in 1898. Exceptional administrative abilities brought him appointments as visitor to monasteries in Europe, Canada, the United States, Asia, and Africa. Obrecht was named apostolic administrator of Mariann Hill Mission in South Africa; he determined the status of these monks as missionaries and not Trappists.

Bibliography: M. AMEDEUS, Dom Edmund M. Obrecht, OCSO (Gethsemani, Ky. 1937). M. RAYMOND, Burnt Out Incense (New York 1949).

[R. FLANAGAN]

OBREGONIANS (POOR INFIRMARIANS)

The popular title of the Least Brothers (Hermanos Minimos), founded at Madrid in 1568 by Bernardino Ob-regón; b. near Burgos, Spain, May 20, 1540; d. Madrid, Aug. 6, 1599. Obregón, a young man of noble lineage who had begun his ecclesiastical studies, discontinued them to become an officer in the army of Philip II. Having served in several campaigns, he found himself one day at court, where a sweeper accidentally splattered his uniform with mud. Obregón angrily slapped the humble worker, who instead of retaliating, begged pardon. Heartily impressed, Obregón gave up his military career and began to nurse the sick. Soon he and some companions took over the administration of the general hospital of Madrid and spread their work to Portugal, Belgium, and the colonies. In 1594 Obregón reedited the Constitutions they had been following, and four years later his group was permitted to take the vows of religion according to the rule of the Third Order of St. Francis of Paola, adding a fourth vow of free hospitality. Paul V authorized the Hermanos Minimos in 1609 to wear a gray habit having a black cross on the left side as monogram. In 1592 Obregón founded an asylum for poor children in Lisbon. He also wrote an early manual on the care of the sick, Instrucción de enfermos y verdadera practica de como se han de aplicar los remedios que enseñan los medicos (Madrid 1607). In 1589 Obregón assisted at the deathbed of his former commander, Philip II. The Order of Hermanos Minimos disintegrated during the French Revolution.

Bibliography: Enciclopedia universal ilustrada Europeo-Americana (Barcelona 1908–30, suppl. 1934–) 39:408–409.

[M. P. TRAUTH]

O'BRIEN, MATTHEW ANTHONY

Missionary; b. Nenagh, Ireland, May, 1804; d. Springfield, Ky., Jan. 15, 1871. He was the son of John and Grace (Meagher) O'Brien. In 1826, having received his early education in Ireland, he came to the United States and worked his way to Kentucky. He studied and taught at St. Mary's College, Marion County, Ky., from 1829 until he entered the Dominican Order of St. Rose Priory, near Springfield, Ky. O'Brien made his religious profession on Sept. 8, 1837 and was ordained in the summer of 1839 by Bp. Richard P. Miles, OP, of Nashville, Tenn. He completed his studies while serving as assistant novice master at St. Rose and was then transferred to St. Joseph's parish near Somerset, Ohio. There for eight years he performed missionary and pastoral duties. In 1850 O'Brien was elected provincial of the Dominican province of St. Joseph, which then consisted of only 20 missionary priests in the four states of Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, and Wisconsin. During his administration as provincial, he opened St. Joseph's College in Somerset, Ohio, and preached parish missions from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico and from St. Louis east beyond the Alleghenies. From 1854 to 1857 O'Brien was prior of St. Rose in Kentucky, where he built the parish church and reopened the old College of St. Thomas, which had flourished from 1807 to 1828. In 1857 he resumed his missionary preaching, interrupting it for only two years when he was pastor of St. Peter's in London, Ontario, Canada.

Bibliography: V. F. O'DANIEL, An American Apostle: The Very Reverend Matthew Anthony O'Brien, O.P. (Washington 1923)

[J. B. WALKER]

O'BRIEN, TERENCE ALBERT

Bishop of Emly and martyr; b. Tower Hill Castle, Cappamore, County Limerick, 1600; d. Balls Bridge, Limerick, Oct. 31, 1651. As the son of Murtagh O'Brien and Catherine Galwey, he was related to many of the public figures of his day. His paternal uncle, Maurice O'Brien, was Protestant bishop of Killaloe (d. 1613); his grandfather, Sir Geoffrey Galwey, was recusant mayor of Limerick in the early 1600s. Terence, educated at St. Peter Martyr Priory in Toledo, Spain, was ordained there c. 1628. After returning to Limerick, he labored in Ireland until 1643, when he was elected provincial of the Irish Dominicans. While attending a general chapter in Rome (1644), he sought assistance for the Irish Confederation, then in revolt against the English. O'Brien, a strong supporter of the Papal Nuncio Giovanni RINUCCINI in the internal and factional struggles within Irish Catholicism, was created bishop of Emly on Rinuccini's recommendation in 1647, and consecrated at Waterford, April 2, 1648. The increasing strength of the Parliamentarians' offensive against the Irish rebels led to his eventual capture after the surrender of Limerick in October 1651. He was condemned to death "as an original incendiary of the rebellion," and executed by the English; he is generally regarded as a martyr.

Bibliography: R. BAGWELL, Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885-1900) 14:773-774. M. J. HYNES, The Mission of Rinuccini . . . (Dublin 1932). J. O'HEYN and A. COLEMAN, Irish Dominicans of the 17th Century (Dundalh 1902).

[P. S. MC GARRY]

O'BRIEN, THOMAS C.

Editor, translator, liturgical scholar, teacher; b. Providence, Rhode Island, October 14, 1923; d. Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, June 18, 1991. Thomas O'Brien taught for a number of years at the Dominican House of Studies in Washington, D.C., and became a recognized authority on the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas. In 1966, he left the Dominicans and the following year married Florence Gaudet.

Among his writings on St. Thomas was his study Metaphysics and the Existence of God (Thomist Press 1960). O'Brien joined the team of scholars working under the general editorship of the English Dominican Thomas Gilby in the 1960s to prepare the renowned English-Latin critical edition of the Summa Theologiae. He was responsible for six of the 60 volumes.

From 1966 to 1970 he worked on the editorial staff of Corpus Instrumentorum Publications in Washington, D.C., and from 1970 to 1975 he taught at the Hartford Seminary Foundation in Connecticut. While at Corpus, his projects included the Corpus Dictionary of Western Churches (1970), of which he was general editor. He also completed the editing of the Encyclopedic Dictionary of Religion (3 vols., 1979). Returning to Washington in 1977, O'Brien served as executive editor of volume 17 of the New Catholic Encyclopedia, a thematic and comprehensive account of how the Church had changed as a result of Vatican Council II.

From 1979 until his death in 1991, he served as editor, researcher, and translator on the staff of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL). He was editor and translator of the Documents on the Liturgy: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts, 1963-79. O'Brien was a major contributor to the liturgical texts produced by ICEL throughout the 1980s, particularly the Order of Christian Funerals (1985), the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1986), and the Book of Blessings (1987).

O'Brien's principal and enduring work was as research specialist on the Latin texts of the Missale romanum of Paul VI. His research was an essential part of ICEL's project to revise its 1973 edition of the Missale. From this research he compiled "A Lexicon of Terms in the Missale romanum," with more than 500 entries.

[J. M. SCHELLMAN]

O'BRIEN, WILLIAM VINCENT

Dominican priest; b. Dublin, Ireland, c. 1740; d. New York City, May 14, 1816. He became a Dominican at S. Clemente, Rome, apparently making his profession there in 1761. He completed at least part of his ecclesiastical training at the Dominican house of studies in Bologna, Italy, where he was ordained. For 17 years he preached in the Dublin area and he became preacher general of the Dominican Order. In 1787 he went to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. While working there and in New Jersey, he supported the prefect apostolic, John CARROLL, against those who opposed the creation of a bishopric at Baltimore, Maryland. In October 1787 Carroll appointed him pastor of St. Peter's Church, Barclay Street, New York City. He organized and brought peace to that divided parish, and for 20 years he helped to keep order among Catholics in New York State. Under the auspices of Abp. Alfonso Núñez de Haro, O'Brien went to Mexico City, Mexico, about 1790, to raise funds for his church. He returned in 1792 with vestments, paintings, and money enough to install pews and erect a tower and portico. In 1800 he opened at St. Peter's the earliest free school and Catholic educational institution in New York State. During the yellow-fever epidemics of 1795 and 1798, O'Brien ministered to his people. Chronic illness forced his retirement in 1806, but he continued a limited ministry until the end of 1808.

Bibliography: V. F. O'DANIEL, The Dominican Province of St. Joseph (New York 1942).

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH]

O'CALLAGHAN, JEREMIAH

Writer; b. County Kerry, Ireland c. 1780; d. Holyoke, Mass., Feb. 23, 1861. He was ordained for the Diocese of Cloyne, Ireland, in 1805. His views on usury and his criticisms of banking alienated him from his bishop. For 11 years he was refused acceptance by various bishops, but in 1830 Bp. Benedict Fenwick of Boston, Mass., accepted him for that diocese. He was sent into Vermont, where he spent most of his remaining days as a missionary to scattered settlements of Catholics. In Burlington, Vt., he was offered five acres of land, on which he built St. Mary's Church in 1832. When it was burned to the ground by nativists in 1838, O'Callaghan rebuilt it, dedicating it to St. Peter. In his churches he permitted no pew rent or seat money, but only three voluntary offerings each year. From Vermont he traveled into the western areas of Massachusetts and the eastern regions of New York to celebrate Mass for Catholics and to administer the Sacraments. After 1837 he was aided by Rev. John B. Daly, who divided the state with him and matched his energy and zeal. The priests reported a Catholic population of 5,000 in Vermont in 1840. O'Callaghan served as procurator of the clergy at the first diocesan synod held in Boston from Aug. 21 to 26, 1842. When Burlington was made a diocese in 1853, he returned to Massachusetts and served at Northampton and at Holyoke, where he built a new church. O'Callaghan wrote pamphlets of a polemic nature during these years, explaining Catho-cism to Protestants and answering the charges leveled against the Church by non-Catholic pamphlet writers and preachers. The best-known of all his works was his often reprinted Usury or Interest (1824), which contained an account of his early years.

Bibliography: R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston . . . 1604-1943, 3 v. (Boston 1945).

[T. F. CASEY]

OCCASION

(Opportunitas agendi) may be defined as that which affords an opportunity for a free agent to exercise its CAUSALITY. The word "free" here does not refer simply to intellectual FREEDOM, but applies analogously to sensory freedom as well; hence, the actions of a dog, as proceeding from an interior principle and as guided by knowledge, may be termed free in this wider use of the word. An occasion can provide a mere opportunity for a cognitive being to act, or it may serve as a kind of inducement for action. If the latter is the case, the occasion tends to merge with the act's final cause, making it difficult to distinguish one from the other in the concrete situation. Examples of occasions will clarify the definition. If a teacher absents herself from a room of fourth graders, she provides an occasion for her charges to become rowdy. Or again, a beautiful summer day may serve as an occasion for a family picnic.

An occasion does not strictly cause the agent to act, although it does exercise influence upon the agent. It is to be noted also that it is not absolutely necessary that a suitable occasion be present for the agent to act. The agent well may act, even when no formal occasion is presented to it; thus the schoolchildren could become rowdy whether the teacher is present or absent, and a family could go on a picnic regardless of weather conditions. Occasion pertains primarily to the AGENT, and should be distinguished from CONDITION, which pertains primarily to the patient (see ACTION AND PASSION).

An exaggerated emphasis has sometimes been given to occasion, particularly in the era of modern philosophy, where it has been used to deny creatural causality. Particularly associated with this movement are the post-Cartesians A. GEULINCX and N. MALEBRANCHE.

See Also: OCCASIONALISM.

Bibliography: J. M. BALDWIN, ed., Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology, 3 v. in 4 (New York 1901-05; repr. Gloucester 1949-57). L. DE RAEYMAEKER, The Philosophy of Being, tr. E. H. ZIEGELMEYER (St. Louis 1954). B. GERRITY, Nature, Knowledge and God (Milwaukee 1947). T. N. HARPER, The Metaphysics of the School, 3 v. (London 1879-84; reprint New York 1940) esp. v.2.

[G. F. KREYCHE]

OCCASIONALISM

A philosophical doctrine with implications in both metaphysics and epistemology. In metaphysics, occasionalism teaches that there is no causal interaction between beings—their contiguity merely serves as the OCCASION for the causal influx of God; He is the only true cause. In epistemology, occasionalism teaches that the senses perceive regular sequences of events but that they do not perceive any causal interaction between these events. Thus the intellect, whose truth is measured by the evidence of the senses, can draw the conclusion that event B follows event A, but not that event B is caused by event A. One cannot, therefore, say with certitude whether there is present in nature a causal influx among beings. One cannot know whether things are causes. A metaphysical occasionalist denies that there are true causes; an epistemological occasionalist denies that man can know them. It is as a metaphysics that occasionalism is usually treated (see CAUSALITY).

History. The main points in the historical development of occasionalism can be discussed in terms of its role in Arabian philosophy and in the teachings of William of Ockham, Nicolas Malebranche, and David Hume.

Arabian Philosophy. When the Muslims were introduced to the philosophy of Aristotle during the 9th century, there soon arose a conflict between this philosophy and some of their basic religious beliefs (see ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY). Aristotle taught that natures are self-contained centers of activity with substantial stability and permanence. This view seemed irreconcilable with the Islamic religious belief in the absolute power and creative activity of God. For the universe of Aristotle was sealed off from the direct, immediate, and all-pervasive power of God. Rejecting Aristotle, some Muslims fashioned a world more in keeping with their religious beliefs. According to these thinkers, known as Mutakallims, the universe is composed of discontinuous atoms; these are indivisible particles devoid of magnitude but completely homogeneous, and they are continuously created by God, who can create or annihilate them at will. No atom endures for two moments of time; each is created at every instant. God's causal efficacy as regards these atoms, and therefore all created things, is both absolute and exclusive. Atoms do nothing. But God wills the regular patterns man observes in the universe. For example, when a white garment is placed in black dye, God creates the corresponding atoms of blackness in the garment. And the same is true of all apparent human activity. Thus when a man is said to move a pen, this is the result of the direct intervention of God who creates four simultaneous accidents: the will-act of the man to move the pen; the power to move it; the movement of the hand; and the actual movement of the pen. The regular sequence of events are merely the willed occasions for God's causality.

Ockham. The occasionalism in the thought of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM may be summed up as follows. By the very fact that it is, an individual can be only itself and nothing more. Each existent is absolutely and irreducibly singular. Thus there are no relations among things. For a relation would be something that two things had in common. And since causality, as an objective factor of nature, would be a relation of dependence of one thing upon another, man can never demonstrate that one thing is the cause of another. He has only the empirical presence of sequenced events, and these he calls causes and effects. The only thing that he can affirm with certitude is that, on the occasion of this regular and repetitive sequence, the mind acquires the habit of thinking that one event really causes another. The irreducible singularity and self-identity of Ockham's existent makes any inferential transfer by the intellect to the supreme, uncaused being of God philosophically impossible. (See NOMINALISM; OCKHAMISM.)

Malebranche. Like the Muslim Mutakallims before him, it was in defense of religion and the divine power that Nicolas MALEBRANCHE, a Catholic priest and member of the French Oratory, taught that there is only one true cause, and it is God. This fervent and pious philosopher was convinced that the chief cause of idolatry was man's tendency to attribute to natural powers, like the sun or the rivers, the causal source of the life and fertility in the world. Malebranche held that a true cause must know not only what it does but how it does it. When a man moves his hand, he cannot tell how he does it. So he cannot be the true cause of this motion. He is only, says Malebranche, the occasional cause; the true cause, and only true cause, is God.

The occasionalism of Malebranche seems often more nominal than real. In traditional doctrine, God is said to be the first uncaused cause; it is maintained also that all other causes can cause only in actual and continued dependence upon the divine power (see CAUSALITY, DIVINE). At times it seems that Malebranche's occasional causes fit the definition of a true finite cause, in the sense that they are not mere passive occasions. For example, Malebranche will admit that, when one moves one's hand, one does something. This is especially true in his treatment of an act of free choice. The act is personal, and the one placing it is responsible for it; this could not be the case if one were merely a passive occasion for God to make (cause) the choice. But Malebranche's definition of a true cause is unacceptable, as demanding too much. (See CARTESIANISM.)

Hume. The doctrine of David HUME is similar to Ockham's. Ockham denied relations, and hence the relation of being a cause, because of his teaching on the irreducible singularity and self-identity of the existent. Hume denied CAUSALITY because it is an unknowable fact. Nothing is in the INTELLECT unless it is also somehow in the SENSES. Hume interpreted this to mean that what a man cannot sense has no meaning for his intellect. All that a man senses is a regular and repetitive sequence of events; he does not sense any causal power affecting these events. Causality is simply the anticipation of this sequence by the mind, an anticipation that has been engendered by habit. Hume was an occasionalist in the sense that he considered sequences of events to be the occasion for the engendering of the habit of anticipating their regularity, which man calls causality. (See EMPIRICISM.)

Philosophical Implications. The principal philosophical implications of occasionalism are those relating to the existence of God and the freedom of the human will.

Existence of God. The only valid demonstration in philosophy for the existence of God would be an intellectually seen inference from the beings of man's experience to their causal source. To deny the possibility of man's ever knowing whether causality is an objective truth actually bearing upon the being of things is to deny the possibility of an inference, intellectually grasped, of a causal source. To deny the principle of causality is to cut off any way to demonstrate the knowability of the existence of a First Cause. Occasionalism in epistemology means agnosticism in natural theology.

Freedom of the Will. If one holds in his metaphysics that only God is a true cause and creatures only the occasions on which God exercises His causality, the consequences are logically devastating for created beings. For if creatures do nothing (and what else could a mere occasion mean?), they have no end; they are not for anything, and so have no reason for being. In a word, occasionalism makes of a being a contradiction in terms. It also logically destroys FREE WILL; for if a person is not the true cause of his free actions, he can hardly be said to be the cause of why they are free. In a word, causality and being are so closely connected (causality is the exercise of being), that to empty creatures of their causality is to empty them of their being.

See Also: EFFICIENT CAUSALITY; INSTRUMENTAL CAUSALITY; METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946- ); v.4, Descartes to Leibniz (1958). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30) 2:336-38. F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (11th, 12th ed. Berlin 1923-28) 3:261-69, 663-664. J. LATOUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 7:1123-25. A. DEL NOCE, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:974-80. M. FAKHRY, Islamic Occasionalism and Its Critiques by Averroës and Aquinas (London 1958). M. GUEROUULT, Malebranche, v.2.2. L'Ordre et l'occasionalisme (Paris 1959).

[M. R. HOLLOWAY]

OCCULTISM

A general term employed to designate all those pseudosciences or practices, such as magic, alchemy, astrology, the various forms of divination, clairvoyance, theosophy, or spiritism, which claim to have knowledge of, or even control over, the hidden mysteries or powers of nature. Modern science, and especially psychology, has gradually refuted such claims, although there are occult phenomena and practices in Asia and Africa that still require further investigation and explanation. The pseudomysticism of the devotees or practitioners of occultism should not be confused with genuine mysticism in the Christian sense, nor should occultism be confused with parapsychology or related branches of the science of psychology. The terms occultism and the occult arts are too vague to be satisfactory. Hence they have given way to specific designations, such as magic, alchemy, and astrology.

Bibliography: H. VORGRIMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 7:1125. G. R. S. MEAD, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908-27) 9:444-448. A. KÖBERLE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 4:1614-19.

[P. SCHMIDT]

OCEANIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Oceania is a region in the central and south Pacific Ocean that contains numerous islands. It is located east of the Philippines, Indonesia, and Australia. Oceania includes Polynesia, the huge triangle formed by Hawaii, New Zealand, and Easter; Melanesia, the island groups south of the equator, north and east of Australia from Papua New Guinea to the Fijis; and Micronesia, stretching northward from the equator to the Marianas and eastward from the Palau to the Gilbert Islands. The following essay presents discussion of the development of the Catholic church in the region as a whole, followed by discussion of events in some of the island groups.

THE CHURCH IN THE REGION

Early Contacts. The Polynesians were the first group in Oceania to have extensive contacts with Europe-

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragans
Agaña (Guam)	Caroline Islands (Micronesia) and Chalan Kanoa (North Marian Islands)
Honiara (Solomon Islands)	Auki and Gizo
Nouméa (New Caledonia)	Port Vila (Vanuatu) and Wallis-Futuna
Papeete (Tahiti)	Taiohae (Marquesas Islands)
Samoa-Apia (West Samoa)	Samoa-Pago Pago (American Samoa) and Tokelau
Suva (Fiji Islands)	Rarotonga (Cook Islands) and Tarawa and Nauru (Kiribati)
In Papua New Guinea:
Madang	Aitape, Lae, Vanimo, and Wewak
Mount Hagen	Goroka, Kundiawa, Mendi, and Wabag
Port Moresby	Alotau-Sideia, Bereina, Daru-Kiunga, and Kerema
Rabaul (New Britain)	Bougainville and Kavieng (New Ireland)
The diocese of Tonga is immediately subject to the Holy See. An apostolic prefecture is located on the Marshall Islands, and a mission sui juris is located at Funafuti, on the island of Tuvalu. ans; they established relations with the newcomers and were fairly successful in adapting to European ways. In Melanesia, and particularly on the island of New Guinea, climate, terrain, and fierce resistance among indigenous peoples inhibited the introduction of European ideas for several centuries, and parts of Melanesia continue to practice the ancient religions of their ancestors. In Micronesia development was hindered by the multiplicity of small islands scattered over more than two million square miles. Language presented a particularly formidable obstacle to religious instruction: 12 Polynesian and 15 Micronesian tongues, and between 500 and 600 Melanesian languages or dialects were known to be spoken in the region. Before the coming of the missionaries, Oceania had no written languages.

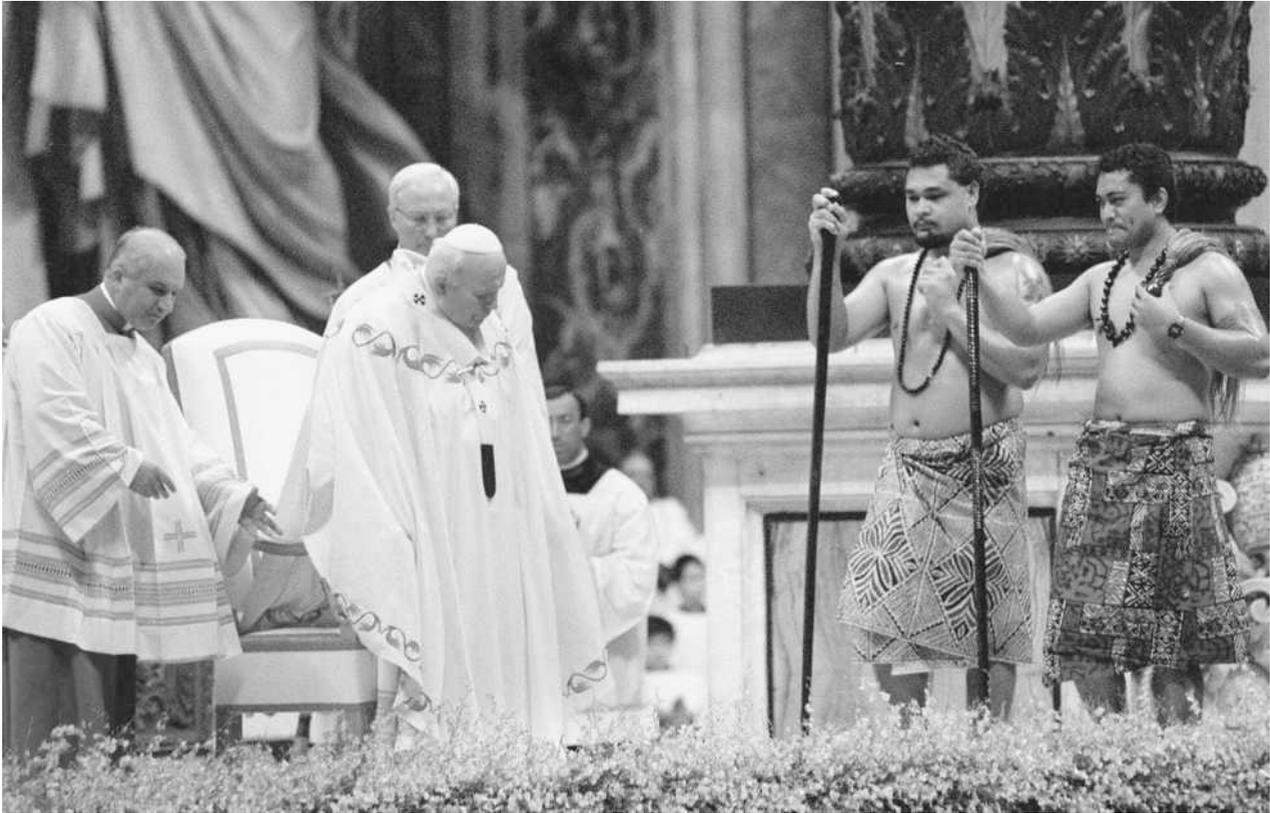

Cultural and economic patterns in Oceania varied in accordance with the broad divisions of race, the size, nature, flora and fauna of the islands, possibilities of intercommunication, and other factors. Contact with Europeans, beginning with sailors, beachcombers and missionaries, and continuing to the accelerated development occasioned by World War II, also affected culture. The economy, originally a purely subsistence one, was modified by the raising of cash crops as European contacts gave rise to new needs and the possibility of satisfying them.

Catholic Missionary Activity. The first priest known to have visited Oceania was the fleet-chaplain of Magellan in 1521. Native people occasionally met with chaplains of the Spanish ships. A Hawaiian tradition seems to indicate the presence of a priest there for some time, probably in the late 16th century. The names of many islands—Pentecost, Espiritu Santo, Asuncion—are evidence of the faith of the explorers. In 1658 Jean Paulmier de Courtonne proposed missions in “the southern land,” although nothing came of this. In 1798 the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (Propaganda) entrusted the PACCANARISTS with a mission field extending from the Cape of Good Hope to Japan, Australia, and adjacent lands, including part of Oceania. Again there was no result. In 1829 Henri de Solages, appointed prefect apostolic of Réunion island, near Madagascar, proposed to extend his mission to Oceania. Propaganda confided to de Solages a prefecture extending from Easter Island to New Zealand, and from the equator to the Tropic of Capricorn, but this plan ended with his death in Madagascar in 1832. A similarly unsuccessful attempt to evangelize Tahiti was made by Spanish Franciscans who arrived from Peru in 1772–75. The first regular mission in Oceania was established in the Marianas in 1668 by Diego de Sanvitores, SJ; this mission was later staffed by the Augustinian Recollects and after by the Capuchins.

From about 1800 the Pacific area was visited by a flood of adventurers, whalers, and traders seeking profit and pleasure. It is doubtful that the Polynesians would have survived had it not been for another group who came to save them, in every sense of the word. These were the missionaries, first non-Catholics and then Catholics. Their sometimes bitter differences and petty persecutions are regrettable, but the zeal and spirit of Christian sacrifice displayed by men and women of both groups were noble. The presence of Protestants stimulated later comers and led to an astonishing Catholic expansion.

In 1825 Pierre COUDRIN, founder of the Fathers of the SACRED HEARTS, offered his group’s services to the Holy See concurrent with a request of Propaganda for the establishment of a mission in Hawaii. The Prefecture Apostolic of the Sandwich Islands was established in 1825 and the first priests and brothers arrived two years later. By 1831 these priests were expelled from Hawaii and sought another mission; the prefecture made from the

Pope John Paul II during a Mass officiated inside St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican, celebrating the Special Assembly for Oceania Synod of Bishops, Rome. (Photo by Massimo Sambucetti; AP/Wide World Photos)

Marquesas, Tuamotus, and Society Islands in 1833 was entrusted to them. This prefecture, together with the prefecture of the Sandwich Islands, formed the Vicariate Apostolic of Eastern Oceania (1833), extending from the Sandwich, or Hawaiian, Islands south to the Society Islands, and westward from Easter Island to the northern Cook Islands.

Western Oceania, a new mission, was accepted by the MARIST FATHERS. As a result, in 1836 the Vicariate of Western Oceania was erected over Melanesia and the Caroline, Marshall, and Gilbert Islands of Micronesia. The first missionaries, including St. Peter CHANEL, set out the same year. The first missions were established in Wallis and Futuna, New Zealand, and then in Tonga, New Caledonia, Samoa, and elsewhere. The following years brought tragedy as the Church attempted to establish a presence in Oceania. By 1850 the two vicariates of Eastern and Western Oceania had been divided into ten vicariates. In 1841 St. Peter Chanel was martyred at Futuna; Bishop Epalle was killed on Santa Isabel in 1845; Brother Blaise Marmoiton was killed in New Caledonia, and about the same time two priests and a brother were killed and eaten in the Solomons. The Marists lost so many men that they had to withdraw from the Solomons.

The Milan Foreign Mission Society, later called the PONTIFICAL INSTITUTE FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, replaced the Marists but in turn withdrew after the murder of Father Mazzuconi in 1855.

In 1847 Propaganda encouraged Bishop BATAILLON to set up a seminary. In 1856 three students from Oceania entered the Propaganda College in Rome. In 1859 a minor seminary started near Sydney, Australia; it closed after some years, then reopened in 1874 on Wallis as a major seminary and produced a number of priests for Wallis, Futuna, Tonga, and Samoa.

Nearly 30 years passed before the Vicariates of Melanesia and Micronesia were confided to the SACRED HEART MISSIONARIES. In 1882 they began work in New Britain, establishing a flourishing mission under the direction of Bishop COUPPÉ. Three years later they landed in New Guinea, progressing to the Gilbert and Ellice Islands in 1888 and to the Marshalls in 1891. The Society of the DIVINE WORD was called upon to take charge of northeastern New Guinea in 1896. Countless religious—priests, brothers, and sisters who were members or associates of these two institutes—died of malaria and other diseases; others were killed by the natives. In western

New Guinea, missions were established from Indonesia. The Caroline Islands mission, begun by Jesuits in 1731, collapsed with the order's expulsion from the Spanish colonies in 1767, but began again under Spanish Capuchins when Spain's jurisdiction over the islands was established in 1886. Their effectiveness was such that after 1945 the rate of development in Papua New Guinea would require the added services of Franciscans, Capuchins, Dominicans, Passionists, Montfort Fathers and Marianhill Missionaries to staff newly formed prefectures or vicariates.

Mission Methods and Problems. When missions commenced in Oceania, anthropology and its related sciences were practically nonexistent, providing European missionaries with little or no preparation for the task of relating to the indigenous people of the region. To communicate, missionaries had to learn the language and prepare a grammar and dictionary at the same time, a task made more difficult by their failure to comprehend native cultures. Missionaries also had little or no medical training, with the result that malaria and other tropical diseases killed many, both natives and Europeans. Tragic blunders were made, the result of ignorance of native beliefs and customs, and the missions perhaps rightfully received the blame for the disintegration of native life and the death of thousands. However, this disintegration had already begun with the arrival of the whalers, beachcombers, and slavers; it likely would have been much worse but for the presence and the efforts of the missionaries. Paying for their inevitable mistakes often with their lives, missionaries were the principal force guiding the natives to the modern era: they introduced formal education, a written language, printing presses, and training in arts, crafts, and other skills. Most schools in Melanesia remained under mission control into the 20th century, though they were eventually aided and supervised by governments. Some missionaries found time to do anthropological and ethnological work of inestimable value.

Catholicism was introduced to Samoa, Tonga, Fiji, the Gilberts, and other islands with the help of natives who had been converted elsewhere. When the Solomon Islands missions were begun again in 1897, Samoan and Fijian catechists accompanied the priests. Catechists, after training, were entrusted with the care of congregations that would otherwise only receive a visit from the priests after long intervals; they taught school, conducted daily prayers and Sunday services, baptized in case of necessity, assisted the sick, and buried the dead.

The Modern Era. World War I impeded the missions in Oceania principally by interrupting the supply of personnel and income. World War II had a more direct impact, as mission stations were destroyed and missionaries interned. From 1940 to 1945, 128 priests, brothers, and sisters were killed or died of disease and starvation while in Axis captivity. In New Guinea, New Britain, the Solomons, and Micronesia, stations and staffs were almost annihilated. The interruption of regular instruction plus the demoralizing influence of wartime conditions led to a revival of pagan beliefs in some areas.

From the mid-20th century onward, conditions improved greatly. Oceanian mission schools underwent constant improvement, with many vicariates providing some form of technical education, often under the guidance of brothers. Sisters conducted schools, dispensaries, hospitals, and leprosaria, and did much to raise the status of women from their former condition of servitude in the islands. With the opening of a major seminary in New Caledonia in 1939, priests were trained for all the French language vicariates of Oceania.

Vincentians and Columban Fathers continued to be active in the region, along with Marist Brothers, Christian Brothers of Ploermel, Brothers of the Sacred Heart, and many congregations of sisters. Oceania also had a number of diocesan institutes of brothers and sisters.

Political changes altered the face of Oceania through the second half of the 20th century, as the breakup of colonial empires continued and trust territories established by the United Nations following World War II were dissolved. In 1963, the western half of the island of New Guinea, long held by the Dutch, was ceded to Indonesia as part of the Irian Jaya province; 12 years later the eastern half of the island became the independent state of Papua New Guinea. In 1970 Tonga and Fiji gained independence after a century as a British colony. In New Caledonia a nationalist movement that took shape in the 1980s lost support and the region remained under French rule. In 1986 the Federated States of Micronesia and the Republic of the Marshall Islands were both formed from the remnants of the U.N. Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and organized under the diocese of Caroline Islands.

By 2000 the population of Oceania was 29 percent Catholic. In 1998 an historic meeting occurred during the first Synod of Bishops for Oceania; problems addressed by the 117 bishops in attendance included increasing secularization, chronic unemployment, poverty, and sexual abuse by clergy. Issues relating to the specific ministry of the region included the shortage of priests, inculturation, religious pluralism, the rights of minorities, and geographical barriers. The Church remained steadfast in its ability to respond to the many natural disasters that affected the region; the devastation wrought by a 1998 tidal wave that swept through Papua New Guinea, destroying entire villages along the northern coast, was addressed by Catholic organizations throughout the region.

[S. J. BOURKE/EDS.]

THE CHURCH IN SPECIFIC ISLAND GROUPS

The Cook Islands. Consisting of 15 small islands stretching over 850,000 square miles, the Cook Islands are divided into two groups: the mountainous Lower Cook Islands of volcanic origin and the coral Northern Cook Islands. Captain James Cook discovered the region between 1773 and 1777. Christian evangelization began in 1821 by Protestants from the London Missionary Society; almost all the Maori population were converted to Christianity, a native clergy established, and a workable civil administration organized. The first Catholic missionaries were the Fathers of the Sacred Hearts, who arrived in 1894; they were followed by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny five years later. Initially the Catholics encountered concerted opposition from local Protestant pastors and were for a time limited to their mission schools as the only practical channel of missionary activity. The Cook Islands became a British protectorate in 1888, and remained predominantly Protestant. Annexation to New Zealand in 1901 brought an ever-improving public school system that heavily taxed the resources of the missionaries to emulate. In 1922 the islands were detached ecclesiastically from the Vicariate Apostolic of Tahiti and became a prefecture apostolic; they became a vicariate apostolic in 1948 and later a diocese was established at Rarotonga. By 2000 the population of 20,407 contained 3,000 Catholics. Formal relations with the Holy See were established in April 1999.

[T. GRANNELL/EDS.]

The Fiji Islands. The Fiji Islands comprises the Fiji Archipelago and Rotuma, as well as some 100 inhabited islands. The indigenous population, Melanesian with Polynesian strains, were originally a fierce people with many brutal customs. French Marist Fathers, sent by Bishop Bataillon in 1844, began Catholic evangelization after British Wesleyan missionaries were solidly established. Finding the resultant religious and national tensions overpowering, they almost abandoned the area. As conditions slowly improved, a prefecture apostolic was created (1863) with 1,650 Catholics in three mission stations. Father Jean Baptiste Bréhéret, SM, struggled for 24 years against the increasing strength of Methodism, which, up to 1870, had won the chiefs. The vicariate (diocese in 1966) at Suva was erected in 1887 with seven stations and 4,650 Catholics. Bp. Julian Vidal, SM (1887–1922), built permanent churches, including Suva cathedral, instituted a native sisterhood (1891), and opened the famed leprosarium at Makogai (1911). He and Bishop Nicolas, SM (1922–41), introduced teaching congregations of brothers and sisters for their new schools. Beginning in 1944 Bp. Victor Foley, SM, revitalized education, beginning with teacher training, and encouraged the foundation of credit unions among the Fijians. In 2000 the population of 832,494 was predominately Protestant; the Catholic population of approximately 82,500 was divided among 34 parishes and tended by 113 priests. There were 44 primary and 18 secondary Catholic schools in operation on the islands.

[J. E. BELL/EDS.]

Kiribati. Kiribati encompasses a group of islands situated near the meeting point of the equator and the international dateline. Sixteen coral atolls, occupying 166 square miles, comprise the region, formerly the Gilbert Island colony. The region was made part of the Vicariate Apostolic of Micronesia in 1844, although missionaries were not yet at work in the region. Protestant missionaries arrived in Kiribati c. 1850, followed by the first French Catholics, members of the Sacred Heart Missionaries, in 1888. Along with the Ellice Islands (now Tuvalu), the region was incorporated into the Vicariate Apostolic of the Gilbert Islands in 1897, the same year it became part of the British Commonwealth as the Gilbert and Ellice Island Colony of the Western Pacific High Commission. The vicariate spread over more than two million square miles of the Pacific Ocean. This vast distance, plus the fact that the Gilbertese are Micronesian, while the Ellice Islanders are Polynesian and their languages very dissimilar, resulted in the eventual split in the group. During World War II the mission suffered heavy losses. Through the remainder of the 20th century, education remained a major concern of the Catholic mission, which enrolled 90 percent of the children in its schools by the 1970s. After 1966 the region gained a diocese at Tarawa and Nauru that supported Kiribati's 23 parishes. Half the population of approximately 80,000 was Catholic in 2000.

French Polynesia. French Polynesia is comprised of the 11 Marquesas Islands and Tahiti, and totals 118 islands and atolls. Discovered by the Spanish in 1595 and visited by Captain James Cook in 1774, they were claimed by France in 1842 though the Island of Nuku Hiva was briefly garrisoned by Americans in 1813. The unusual fierceness of the islanders, more than their geographic remoteness, hindered early evangelization. The Protestant London Missionary Society arrived in the region in 1785 but withdrew in 1825 because of these difficulties. Picpus Fathers worked in Tahiti beginning in 1831. The Fathers of the SACRED HEARTS arrived in the Marquesas Islands in 1838; in ten years they converted only 216. While the baptism of the king and queen of the Marquesas in 1853 marked progress, missionaries continued to confront such issues as the adherence to pagan customs, alcoholism, tribal wars, and diseases such as that which decimated the population between 1838 and 1880. Persecution forced the missionaries to abandon the islands more than once, although by 1900 Catholicism began to take root. The Vicariate Apostolic of the Marquesas Islands (1848) became the Diocese of Taiohae in 1966. An overseas territory of France since 1946, the region is administered from Tahiti. By 2000 there were 85 parishes in the region, and the population of approximately 250,000 was 30 percent Catholic and 50 percent Protestant.

[EDS.]

New Britain. New Britain is the largest island in the Bismarck Archipelago, 13,000 square miles in area. Administratively it is part of Papua New Guinea. Following its discovery by the British in 1700, Wesleyan missionaries were the first to arrive. MARIST FATHERS arrived in 1844 and were joined by the Milan Foreign Missions Institute. In 1882 the area was entrusted to the Sacred Heart Missionaries. The region was administered as New Pomerania after becoming a German colony in 1884. Louis Couppe, the first vicar apostolic, arrived in 1888 and developed the mission after abolishing the "religious districts." After being part of the Vicariate Apostolic of Central Oceania from 1836, and that of Melanesia from 1844, in 1889 New Britain joined the Solomon Islands as the Vicariate Apostolic of New Britain. Undeterred by catastrophes such as the murder of seven religious in the Baining Mountains in 1904, in 1912 Couppe founded the Daughters of the Immaculate Conception, a native sisterhood that had more than 70 members by the mid-1900s. In 1921 the region became part of the Trust Territory of New Guinea. Despite World War II, which resulted in a Japanese invasion and the deaths of 58 missionaries, 23 of whom were murdered, growth caused the division of the Vicariate of Rabaul through the creation of Kavieng. The vicariate of Rabaul eventually advanced to the status of archdiocese.

[J. GLAZIK/EDS.]

New Caledonia. New Caledonia, 7,367 square miles in area, is a French overseas territory comprising the islands of New Caledonia and Île des Pins, the Loyalty Islands, and several other islet groups. Protestant evangelization in the region began in 1834, when Polynesian catechists came to the Loyalty Islands, and the London Missionary Society organized a mission two decades later. In 1843 Bishop Guillaume Douarre, together with four other Marist Fathers, founded a mission at Balade to evangelize the Melanesian natives. In 1847 the Vicariate Apostolic of New Caledonia was established, but its success was short-lived when Brother Blaise Marmoiton was slain and the other missionaries expelled. France's annexation of the region in 1853 preserved the safety of the mission but gradually changed its character. The main island became a penal colony, on which 11,000 libérés remained as settlers. French governors promoted colonization and exploited the islands' extensive mineral resources, supplanting the indigenous tribes. When successive vicars apostolic expressed distress at the ill effects of these changes on native life, they met anticlerical opposition in government circles and bowed finally to the inevitable. Missions were reorganized to care for growing numbers of Europeans, while also tending Melanesian converts and some 11,000 immigrants from Vietnam, Indonesia, the Wallis Islands, and elsewhere. By the late 1800s political and religious tensions led Protestants to entrust their mission to the Société des Missions Évangéliques of Paris, although the London Missionary Society did not completely withdraw until 1921. In 1966 New Caledonia came under the jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of Nouméa. By 2000 the region had a population of 201,816, over 60 percent Catholics. The region contained 28 parishes tended by nine secular and 35 religious priests. Other religious aided in the operation of the region's 34 primary and 22 secondary Catholic schools.

[J. E. BELL/EDS.]

Papua New Guinea. Sighted by the Portuguese in 1511, the island of New Guinea was discovered and claimed by Spain in 1527, and British explorers ventured into the eastern region in the 18th century. The Dutch annexed the western half in 1828, while the forbidding climate, dense forests, and difficult terrain in the east caused it to be left undeveloped until 1884, when England established a protectorate over Papua and Germany established the colony of Kaiser-Wilhelmsland in the northeast. New Guinea was included in the Vicariate Apostolic of Melanesia, created in 1844 and entrusted to the Marist Fathers, although slaughter and disease brought that mission to an end before it reached the island. The Milan Foreign Mission Society received the area in 1852 but suffered a similar fate. In 1881 the vicariate was entrusted to the Sacred Heart Missionaries, who founded a mission on Yule Island in 1885. Kaiser-Wilhelmsland was entrusted to the Divine Word Missionaries as a prefecture apostolic in 1896. In both regions, Catholics had been preceded by Protestant missions and both the German and British-Australian governments impeded normal development of the mission by creating exclusive territorial spheres of influence for the various Christian missionary groups. The missionaries laid out extensive coconut plantations and later added cocoa and coffee plantations that made the missions partially self-supporting. In 1904 Britain ceded Papua to Australia; during World War I the Australians captured Kaiser-Wilhelmsland and administered it first as a mandate territory of the League of Nations and then as a trust territory of the United Nations. During World War II more than 100 priests, brothers, and sisters were killed, and in the next few decades new vicariates apostolic were established in the region. In 1964 a regional major seminary was erected at Madang. Papua New Guinea achieved independence in 1975, although the region was the site of violence throughout the 1990s as the island of Bougainville fought unsuccessfully for independence. By 2000 the region had four archdiocese: Manang, Mount Hagen, Port Moresby, and Rabaul, under which were administered the region's 374 parishes. The population of 4,926,984 was estimated to be 30 percent Catholic. Many of Papua New Guinea's priests continued to be foreign by the end of the 1990s.

[R. M. WILTGEN/EDS.]

New Ireland. New Ireland, at about 2,800 square miles in area the largest island after New Britain, is located in the Bismarck Archipelago to the northeast of Papua New Guinea. Mariners from the Netherlands were the first to explore this section of Melanesia. The Marquis de Rays established the colony of Port Breton, to which were sent over 500 colonists. Ecclesiastically it pertained successively to the Vicariates Apostolic of Western Oceania (1836–44), Melanesia (1844–89), New Britain (1889–1922), and Rabaul (1922–57). From 1884 until the end of World War I the island was a German colony named New Mecklenburg. Wesleyan missionaries arrived first, the first Catholic mission begun in 1902 by the Sacred Heart Missionaries. The mission survived World War I without serious damage, its members making significant scientific contributions to ethnology, botany, and linguistics. After 1921 the region became an Australian mandate, part of the trust Territory of New Guinea. World War II brought Japanese occupation and considerable destruction to the missions. In 1957 the Vicariate Apostolic of Kavieng was created, and entrusted to the Sacred Heart Missionaries. Kavieng was later created a diocese.

[J. GLAZIK]

Solomon Islands. The Solomon Islands, which includes several islands and totals 16,120 square miles in land area, is located east of New Guinea. With the mountainous, forested interior impassable except by foot, travel occurred mostly along the coasts by canoe or ship. The Melanesians native to the region speak a wide variety of languages, pidgin English being the lingua franca. Mission work in the Solomons was begun by the Marist Fathers when Bishop Épalle landed on Santa Isabel and was immediately slain. Violence and disease cost the Marists two more bishops and five priests before they withdrew temporarily. In 1898 Bishop Vidal, SM, resurrected the southern mission with more success. Bishop Broyer, SM, inaugurated the apostolate in the northern islands in 1899, but missionaries were so enfeebled by malaria that they won only 353 converts in the next decade. The Vicariate Apostolic of the Southern Solomon Islands, erected in 1912, included the islands of Guadalcanal, San Cristobal, and Malaita, while the Vicariate Apostolic of the Northern Solomon Islands, erected in 1930, included Bougainville. By 1942 Catholics numbered 27,000, but World War II brought devastation to these missions and caused missionaries to be evacuated, interned, or killed by the Japanese. It also invigorated antiwhite, anti-Christian cults, which were active but localized two decades later, as the Catholic population grew. In 1959 the two apostolates were combined with the islands of Santa Isabel, New Georgia, and Choiseul as the Vicariate Apostolic of the Western Solomon Islands and entrusted to the Dominicans. This vicariate was later raised to the archdiocese of Honiara. The region achieved independence in 1978 and by 2000 had a population of 466,194, 19 percent of whom were Catholic. The 29 parishes among the islands were tended by 51 priests, half native. The Church operated 28 primary and eight secondary schools on the Solomon Islands, most of which were subsidized by the state in lieu of a state-run education system.

[J. E. BELL/EDS.]

Tonga. Located in Polynesia, the Kingdom of Tonga contains about 200 islands, with a total land area of 259 square miles. The first attempts at evangelization were made by Protestant missionaries, who entered the region in 1797. Tonga was the first island group to be visited by Bishop POMPALLIER, who arrived in Vavau harbor in October 1837. Though at first well received, Pompallier was later refused permission to remain because of the influence of Wesleyan missionaries, established in Vavau since 1826. In 1842 Father Chevron and Brother Attale, members of the Marist Fathers, arrived at Nukualofa; they were allowed to land and reside with the pagans at Pea, although during the next few years the intermittent wars waged by Tautaaahau in an effort to make himself king of Tonga created a dangerous environment for Catholics. Tautaaahau, a Protestant, considered all Catholics enemies, and it was only the occasional intervention of French gunboats that obtained some toleration for Catholics. In 1842 Tonga became part of the Vicariate of Central Oceania; it became a separate vicariate in 1937. Tonga constituted the Vicariate Apostolic of Tonga and Niue Islands in 1957, and later broke with Niue to become in 1966 a diocese directly subject to the Holy See. Evangelization progressed steadily, and during the mid-20th century there was notable progress in Catholic education in the region. By 2000 the population of 102,320 was 16 percent Catholic, organized in 12 parishes. Diplomatic relations with the Holy See were established in 1994. At the beginning of the 21st century, Tonga was the last surviving monarchy in all of Oceania.

[S. J. BOURKE/EDS.]

Tuvalu. Tuvalu, the former Ellice Islands, encompasses a group of islands situated near Kiribati consisting of nine coral atolls and covering 14 square miles. Made part of the Vicariate Apostolic of the Gilbert Islands in 1897, and civilly, the Gilbert and Ellice Island Colony of the Western Pacific High Commission of the British Commonwealth, Tuvalu eventually became independent due to the fact that its native population was Polynesian and their languages dissimilar to those of the Micronesian natives of the former Gilbert Islands (now Kiribati). Protestants were the first to arrive in the region followed by French missionaries of the Sacred Heart in 1888. World War II brought heavy losses, after which time the missions were staffed by religious from Australia. A mission sui juris was established at Funafuti in 1997, the year after Tuvalu established diplomatic relations with the Holy See. In 2000 the population of 10,840 was estimated to contain approximately 120 Catholics.

[EDS.]

Vanuatu. Formerly the New Hebrides, Vanuatu is a rugged archipelago largely of volcanic origin located northeast of New Caledonia and west of the Fiji Islands, 5,700 square miles in land area. The natives are Melanesians. Protestant missionaries entered the region in 1839, and evangelization came at the cost of many lives. Marist Fathers came from New Caledonia early in the 19th century, but concentrated Catholic efforts waited until 1887, when Bp. Hilarion Frayasse, SM, sent four missionaries and several native helpers, with the urging and help of the French government. Progress was slow. In 1904 the Vicariate Apostolic of New Hebrides Islands was created, and by 1938 Catholics numbered 2,600; Protestants 10,000; and those following native faiths 30,000. The diocese of Port Vila was established at the capital city in 1966, and the region became politically independent in July of 1980. Protestant missionary groups remained mostly English-speaking and very influential through the 20th century. Catholic missions remained associated with the French language, which was taught in the region's Catholic-run schools. By 2000 the population of 190,000 was estimated to be 16 percent Catholic.

Wallis and Futuna Islands. Located 120 miles apart and with a total area of 100 square miles, the Territory of Wallis and Futuna Islands is located northeast of the Fiji Islands and west of Western Samoa. In 1836 Bp. Jean Pompallier sent the Marists Father Pierre Bataillon and Brother Joseph Luzy to Wallis and Father Pierre CHANEL with Brother Nizier to Futuna. Bataillon's forceful character, charity, and integrity greatly impressed the Polynesian king of Wallis, and by 1840 conversion efforts were proving successful on that island. Chanel met with less success on Futuna; he was slain in 1841 and became the first canonized martyr of the Pacific Islands mission. Wallis, which strove to create a native clergy, became entirely Catholic with the baptism of all its 2,700 inhabitants in 1842, as did Futuna in 1843. Under French control since 1842, the islands were a protectorate administered by New Caledonia until 1961, when they became part of the French Overseas Territories. In 1935 the Vicariate Apostolic of the Wallis and Futuna Islands was created as part of the Vicariate Apostolic of Central Oceania, and entrusted to the Marist Fathers; it was raised to a diocese in 1966. By 2000 the population of 15,280 was predominately Catholic, and its priests native Polynesians.

[J. E. BELL/EDS.]

Bibliography: J. B. F. POMPALLIER, Early History of the Catholic Church in Oceania, tr. A. HERMAN (Auckland 1888). J. ROMMERSKIRCHEN and J. DINDINGER, Bibliografia missionaria (Rome 1936-), annual. C. R. H. TAYLOR, A Pacific Bibliography (Wellington, N.Z. 1964). F. M. CAMMACK and SHIRO SAITO, Pacific Island Bibliography (New York 1962). J. VERSCHUREN, "A Growing World: Problems of the Catholic Missions in Oceania," Carmelus 7 (1960) 277-330. C. DESTABLE and L. M. SÉDÈS, La Croix dans l'archipel Fidji (Paris 1943). P. O'REILLY, Caledoniens (Paris 1953). A. BURNS, Fiji (London 1963). V. DOUCERÉ, La Mission catholique aux Nouvelles-Hebrides (Lyons 1934). H. LAVAL, Mangareva (Braine-le-Comte, Bel.). J. HÜSKES ed., Pioniere der Südsee (Hiltrup 1932). L. MCDUGALL, MSC Missions (Sydney 1945). Seventy-Five Glorious Years, 1882-1957 (Vunapope, New Guinea 1957). R. W. ROBSON, Handbook of Papua and New Guinea (2d ed. Sydney 1958). A. M. MANGERET, Mgr. Bataillon et les missions de l'Océanie, 2 v. (2d ed. Lyon 1895). E. SABATIER, Sous l'Équateur du Pacifique. Les Îles Gilbert et la Mission Catholique, 1888-1938 (Paris 1939). SOANE MALIA [J. F. BLANC], Chez les Méridionaux du Pacifique (Lyons 1910). A. GRIMBLE, A Pattern of Islands (London 1952). The Official Year Book of the Catholic Church of Australasia (Sydney), annual. A. DUPEYRAT, Papouasie: Histoire de la mission, 1885-1935 (Paris 1936). A. FREITAG, Glaubenssaat in Blut und Tränen (Kaldenkirchen 1948). R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916-) 21. Le missioni cattoliche: Storia, geografia, statistica (Rome 1950). S. DELACROIX, ed., Histoire universelle des missions catholiques, 4 v. (Paris 1956-59) 3. K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958-62) 5. Bilan du Monde (Tournai 1964). Annuario Pontifica has data on all diocese.

OCHINO, BERNARDINO

Renowned preacher; b. district dell' Oca, Siena (hence his surname), 1487; d. Slavkov, Moravia, c. 1564. Ochino entered the Observant Franciscans (c. 1504), and after broad studies, he rose to be provincial and finally vicar for the Cisalpine province of his order. Craving a yet stricter rule, he transferred in 1534 to the Capuchins, of whom he was vicar-general from 1538–42 (see FRANCISCANS, FIRST ORDER). As a Lenten preacher, the gaunt ascetic of resonant voice and terrifying directness was eagerly sought by competing towns and bishops. In 1536, while in Naples, he had become acquainted with Juan de VALDÉS and his circle. Several of his later sermons were popularizations of the works of Valdés, and his understanding of the atonement was Valdesian. In 1539 he delivered at Venice a remarkable course of Prediche, showing a Protestant tendency in the doctrine of justification, all under the guise of opposing it.

Suspected and cited to Rome in 1542, Ochino was deterred from presenting himself on the advice of PETER MARTYR VERMIGLI at Florence. He escaped across the Alps, settling in Geneva, where he was cordially received by Calvin. He married a lady of Tusca who had once heard him as the great Capuchin preacher. From 1542 till 1545 he preached to the Italian congregation and wrote, publishing in 1544 his Apologhi, a collection of reminiscences and satirical anecdotes about popes, cardinals, priests, and friars. He served as minister of the Italian Protestant congregation at Augsburg (1545–47). When the city was occupied by the imperial forces, he escaped by way of Basel and Strassburg to find asylum in England (1547–53). Here he was made a prebendary of Canterbury and preached to the Italians in London, receiving a royal pension. Here also he composed his Dialogue of the injuste usurped primacie of the Bishop of Rome and the Labyrinth, the latter opposing predestination.

At the accession of Mary Tudor he became pastor of the Italian congregation at Zurich, where he published his Dialogo del Purgatorio, in which he upheld the view that the true purgatory is Jesus himself, purifying man of his sins. In his Syncerae et verae doctrinae de Coena Domini defensio he described the Lord's Supper in a Zwinglian fashion. His XXX Dialoghi, brought together in 1563, occasioned his banishment. His Protestant adversaries maintained that he was weak on the doctrine of the Trinity and that he had justified polygamy under color of a pretended refutation.

He found refuge in Poland under the protection of Prince Nicolas Radziwiłł and preached in Cracow until the edict of August 1564 banished all foreign dissidents. After losing, during his wanderings, three of his children, he found asylum in Slavkov with Niccolò Paruto, an exiled Venetian nobleman who espoused antitrinitarian Anabaptism. He died of the plague.

Bibliography: R. H. BAINTON, Bernardino Ochino (Florence 1940). B. NICOLINI, Il pensiero di Bernardino Ochino (Naples 1939). G. MÜLLER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1555–56.

[G. H. WILLIAMS]

OCKHAMISM

A philosophical and theological system of thought based on the teachings of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM that flourished in the universities of Europe during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Characteristics. This philosophical and theological movement has not been adequately characterized by historians, nor has the label “Ockhamist” a completely definite connotation. Even those upon whom the name is imposed exhibit great variety in their theological thinking and are not infrequently opposed to one another. There are, however, general trends that are characteristic of the movement and that have caused it to be referred to as the via moderna as opposed to the via antiqua of the earlier scholastics.

Conceptualism. The most basic notion is, perhaps, the note of CONCEPTUALISM that began to enter into explanations of knowledge. According to this theory, the terms in a proposition signify a CONCEPT that stands for some extramental reality. This concept is a SIGN that can refer to one thing or to many. As a sign it is a mental reality and, like any reality, is itself singular and unique. It is universal only insofar as it can stand for many. Hence, its universality is purely functional and does not in any sense refer to a common nature possessed by many things outside the mind. This makes necessary a whole new logic of SUPPOSITION, that is, the manner in which terms stand for things, and gives a new turn to the old Aristotelian logic.

Singulars. Reality itself is a collection of absolute singulars, the distinguishable units of which are things and qualities. All other modifications of things are reduced to the reality of the things themselves. Things are similar, for example, because they are themselves; quantity is indistinguishable from the thing in its magnitude. Such a universe of unique singulars cannot have any necessary connections between the beings that compose it. Furthermore, since singulars depend for their being on the will of God and since the will of God can accomplish anything that does not involve a contradiction, it is always possible to have one given singular without another. Since, for example, an effect is different from its cause, it is possible for God to sustain the effect without its proper cause.

Motion. Another characteristic distinctive of Ockhamism, worth mentioning because it can serve to differentiate this movement from other types of nominalism, is its attitude toward motion. Ockham denied the existence of motion as an entity separate from the moving body, holding that motion was merely a term replacing a series of statements that the body was now here, now there, and so on. Others who are commonly referred to as nominalists, such as JOHN BURIDAN, ALBERT OF SAXONY, and NICHOLAS ORESME, were not only convinced of the reality of motion but, through their attempts to discover its proper cause, contributed to the origin of modern science (see M. Clagett).

Divine Will. The theory of divine omnipotence based on what God can will without contradiction is one of the dominant themes in later Ockhamism. It is basically an attempt to overcome the necessitarianism of Greek philosophy, a necessitarianism that Ockham thought the whole theory of the divine ideas had failed to solve. In place of a universe conceived as an expression of divine intelligibility, there is posited a universe radically contingent upon the divine will, even to the natures of things themselves. The same notion appears in ethics and morality, in which sin comes to be equated with prohibition and good is determined by the will of God instead of by any intrinsic intelligibility. Most of the Ockhamists went so far as to assert that God could command someone to hate Him. And why not, if good and evil are completely determined by what God wills them to be?

Knowledge. The experience one has of such a universe of unique singulars can never be more than a de facto association of many such singulars. There is an intuitive grasp of the individual thing sensibly affecting one here and now. All other knowledge is abstract knowledge. Since, in the first place, there is no necessity in such a universe and since relationship is not a reality distinct from the things themselves, there is no hope of establishing the necessity of the causal proposition. As a result, the conclusions of the natural sciences and of the philosophy of nature became at best highly probable propositions. Neither do the traditional arguments for the existence of God based on efficient, formal, and final causality any longer provide a demonstration for such existence. The same can be said about the existence of the human soul and its immortality.

Role of Faith. Hence, many of the conclusions that previous scholastic theologians considered to be capable of rational demonstration were made matters of faith only. The result was an ever widening gap between philosophy and theology, or better, perhaps, the relegation of philosophy to the status of a quasi-science of predictability about the events in nature and a corresponding skepticism about the validity of metaphysics. H. Oberman is probably correct when he questions the retreat to faith as stemming entirely from the low opinion of knowledge prevalent among Ockhamistic thinkers [The Harvest of Medieval Theology (Cambridge, Mass. 1963) 35]. But neither are the alternatives he suggests completely satisfactory. There may be other reasons; but granting the Ockhamistic metaphysics and logic, there is little else that can be done except to restrict drastically the range of human reason.

Chief Proponents. The via moderna had its influence, and the main themes of the movement appear consistently in the works of such men as ROBERT HOLCOT, ADAM WODHAM, GREGORY OF RIMINI, PETER OF AILLY, and Ockham's commentator, Gabriel BIEL. The two men who seem to represent best the extremes of the position are JOHN OF MIRECOURT and NICHOLAS OF AUTRELCOURT.

John of Mirecourt divides all knowledge into that which is evident and that which is held with fear of error. Evident knowledge in the strictest sense is that which can be reduced to the principle of CONTRADICTION. Experiential knowledge is also evident, but it is never capable of leading to a strict DEMONSTRATION. The proofs for God's existence and the causal proposition are classed under the knowledge that is held with fear of error. The theme of the divine omnipotent will shows up strongly also. God can cause any act, including the act of hatred of Himself. John also thought an act could be contrary to the natural law without being demeritorious.

Nicholas of Autrecourt held also that the only certain knowledge was that which could be reduced to the principle of contradiction. Experience provides certain knowledge, but in a universe of individuals the existence of one thing can never be inferred from the existence of another. It is impossible for logic to detect any necessary connections in nature. Nicholas also repeated John of Mirecourt's opinion that God could cause an act of hatred of Himself. In his philosophy of nature, Nicholas returned to the old Greek ATOMISM, preferring it to the hylomorphic theory of Aristotle. Besides, a universe of disparate atoms with no necessary connections between them was all the more dependent on God.

Others, such as John Buridan, MARSILIUS OF INGHEN, and Nicholas of Oresme, made use of Ockham's logic, although they differed from Ockham in their analyses of the world of nature.

Influence. The University of Paris issued condemnations against Ockham in 1339 and against John of Mirecourt in 1347. In 1346 the Holy See condemned Nicholas of Autrecourt. Nevertheless, the movement continued to flourish. Terminist logic became prevalent not only in Paris and Oxford, but also at the universities of Heidelberg, Vienna, Erfurt, and Leipzig.

It would be inaccurate to maintain a direct influence of John of Mirecourt or Nicholas of Autrecourt on modern and contemporary EMPIRICISM. Christian theologians such as these were logicians and philosophers only in a secondary way. Nevertheless, there are some striking resemblances between the philosophizing of the late Middle Ages and such modern empiricists as J. LOCKE and D. HUME. And the logic of supposition, with its emphasis on functionality, is not too far divorced from the approach of contemporary linguistic analysis.

Criticism. With its world of absolutely singular entities and its rejection of any necessary connection between them, Ockhamism effectively destroyed any certain knowledge of that world beyond the intuitive grasp of an immediately present sense object. Since all abstract knowledge had nothing to do with existence, such knowledge could be at best a logic of possibilities with only an indirect reference to the real order. These possibilities, moreover, were abstracted from sensible experience. Hence, metaphysics was reduced to a logic of concepts that could not transcend the material world from which such concepts were taken. The causal relationship became a way of thinking about experience, rather than an insight grounded in the actual relationships between things. The rejection of any proof for the existence of God based on efficient or final causality was simply a necessary conclusion from such premises.

There is little reason to be surprised, then, when revelation and faith began more and more to take over conclusions held as rationally demonstrable by the earlier scholastics. Along with this went a corresponding SKEPTICISM about the intellect's ability to achieve any certainty either in natural science or in philosophy. The God who was believed to have created such a world did so with an arbitrariness restricted only by the principle of contradiction. Instead of the divine essence as intelligible being the source and exemplar of the universe, it is the divine will that establishes all things even to their intelligible natures. Instead of right reason being the norm of morality, now the command to act in such a way alone determines moral good and evil. A universe so conceived cannot do without faith. Once that faith was lost, skepticism or a return to reason conceived as sufficient for itself were the only possible answers.

See Also: NOMINALISM; SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography: W. OCKHAM, Quodlibetal Questions, tr. A. FREDDOSO, and F. KELLEY (New Haven, Conn. 1991). M. BASTIT, Les principes des choses en ontologie medievale: Thomas d'Aquin, Scot, Occam (Bordeaux 1997). J. P. BECKMAN, Wilhelm von Ockham (Munich 1995); Ockham-Bibliographie (Hamburg 1992). G. LEFF, The Dissolution of the Medieval Outlook: An Essay on Intellectual and Spiritual Change in the Fourteenth Century (New York 1976). A. A. MAURER, The Philosophy of William of Ockham in the Light of Its Principles (Toronto 1999). K. B. OSBORNE, ed., A History of Franciscan Theology (St. Bonaventure 1994). C. PANACCIO, Les mots, les concepts, et les choses: La semantique de Guillaume d'Occam et le nominalisme d'aujourd'hui (Montreal 1992). P. V. SPADE, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Ockham (Cambridge 1999).

[H. R. KLOCKER]

O'CLERY, MICHAEL

Franciscan lay brother, scribe, hagiographer, and historian (in Gaelic Mícheál Ó Cléirigh); b. Donegal, Ireland, c. 1590; d. Louvain, Netherlands, 1643. O'Clery studied in Irish schools before going to the Spanish Netherlands some time before 1621. He entered the Franciscan Order in about 1622 at Louvain, where the Irish Franciscans had established the College of St. Anthony in 1607. Many important scholars and writers were attached to the College and it became the center of a movement to provide the Irish people with religious literature in their own language. A printing press, installed at the College in 1611, turned out many books during the next 60 years. At the time of O'Clery's entrance, Fathers Hugh WARD, Patrick FLEMING, and others connected with Louvain, had formed a plan to publish the lives of the Irish saints. O'Clery was dispatched to Ireland in 1626 to collect hagiographical material and send it to Louvain. He remained in Ireland at this task for 11 years.

In addition to a great amount of transcription, O'Clery compiled works of his own—calendars of saints' feasts, and genealogies of saints and kings—and reedited some early historical documents. In collaboration with three other scholars he produced (1632–36) his greatest work, The Annals of the Four Masters, an annalistic compilation from many sources covering the history of Ireland from the earliest times to 1616. In 1637 he returned to Louvain, where he compiled his Foclóir nó Sanasan Nua (a glossary of obscure words), which was printed on the college press in the year of his death.

O'Clery's achievement lay in rescuing from destruction many Irish historical records. Some of his material was used by Father John COLGAN, successor to Fathers Ward and Fleming, in his Acta sanctorum Hiberniae (1645) and Triadis thaumaturgae seu divorum Patricii, Columbae, et Brigidae acta (1647). The plan to publish the Saints' lives fell through after the death (1673) of Colgan's successor, Father Thomas Sheerin, but most of the material in O'Clery's manuscripts was published during the nineteenth century.

Bibliography: B. JENNINGS, Michael Ó Cléirigh, Chief of the Four Masters, and His Associates (Dublin 1936). T. Ó CLÉIRIGH, Aodh Mac Aingil agus an Scoil Nua-Ghaedhile i Lobhain (Dublin 1936). S. O'BRIEN, ed., Measgra i gcuimhne Mhichíl Uí Chléirigh: Miscellany of Historical and Linguistic Studies in Honour of Brother Michael Ó Cléirigh (Dublin 1944).

[G. S. MACEOIN]

O'CONNELL, ANTHONY, SISTER

Civil War nurse; b. Limerick, Ireland, Aug. 15, 1814; d. Cincinnati, Ohio, Dec. 8, 1897. Mary, the daughter of William and Catherine (Murphy) O'Connell, came to the United States as a child and attended the school conducted by the URSULINE Sisters in Charlestown, Mass. Through William Tyler, a convert and priest, she became acquainted with Mother Elizabeth SETON's foundation at Emmitsburg, Md., and joined the Sisters of Charity in 1835. Two years later, as Sister Anthony, she was sent to Cincinnati, Ohio, to care for orphans. During the next 17 years she was active in the administration of hospitals and homes for children, establishing St. John's Hotel for Invalids as the city's first modern medical institution. In 1852 she was one of the seven founders of the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati, and she served twice as procuratrix-general of the new congregation. In 1861, in response to a government appeal for nurses, Sister Anthony labored in Cincinnati and at various military hospitals. For her work she was praised as "the Florence Nightingale of America." After the war, her congregation was presented with Cincinnati's former Marine Hospital, which was renamed the Good Samaritan. In 1873 St. Joseph's Infant Home, the first hospital for unmarried mothers and abandoned infants in the area, was opened by the congregation. Until 1882 Sister Anthony was administrator of the Good Samaritan Hospital and also of St. Joseph's Home, where she died.

Bibliography: Archives, Sister of Charity, Mount St. Joseph, Ohio. E. R. JOLLY, Nuns of the Battlefield (Providence 1927). M. A. MCCANN, History of Mother Seton's Daughters, 3 v. (New York 1917–23).

[L. C. FEIERTAG]

O'CONNELL, DANIEL

Irish statesman; b. Carhen, Cahirciveen, Co. Kerry, Aug. 6, 1775; d. Genoa, Italy, May 15, 1847. O'Connell was the eldest son of Morgan (1739–1809) and Catherine (O'Mullane) O'Connell. The O'Connells farmed and traded in Kerry, where their ancestors had held military and church offices before the wholesale confiscation of Irish land by Oliver Cromwell. On the advice of an uncle, Count Daniel Charles O'Connell (1745–1833), a distinguished French general, Daniel was sent for education to the Austrian Netherlands—first to the English College at St. Omer (1791) and, the following year, to the Douay English College. Early in 1793, the French overran this area and O'Connell went to London, where he studied law until 1797; he was called to the Irish bar in 1798. In 1802 he married his cousin Mary, daughter of Dr. Thomas O'Connell of Tralee.

Emancipation Advocate. O'Connell had been an able student. His diary reveals that he had grasped quite clearly the idea of the English common law, and particularly the concept of the rights of the subject. He was one of the first Catholic lawyers permitted to practice in Ireland after the first anti-Catholic penal laws were modified. O'Connell, one day to be called "the Liberator," was quickly drawn toward the defense of his coreligionists whose political ambitions were being frustrated by the refusal of EMANCIPATION. In 1797 he had been associated with the revolutionary society of United Irishmen and also had joined the volunteer artillery corps of the Dublin lawyers. Yet he took no part in the rebellion of 1798. From 1799 for at least ten years he was a freemason—the Irish bishops did not implement papal condemnations of FREEMASONRY until much later. O'Connell was instrumental in securing the reelection as grand master of Richard Hely-Hutchinson, Lord Donoughmore (1756–1825), a man whose services in the cause of Catholic emancipation he greatly admired. O'Connell probably ended his connection with the freemasons before 1824, and apparently on the advice of Abp. John TROY (1739–1823).

A highly successful barrister who was earning nearly £8,000 a year by the late 1820s, he was particularly effective in cross-examination, and in defense. His aggressive technique gave courage to Catholics long exploited legally by the Protestant ascendancy. But his method, as in the John Magee case (1814), while it weakened the reputation of opponents, was not always fully effective; the loss of one of his cases could entail the imposition of heavy punishments on his clients. Magee, for example, was imprisoned and fined for publishing criminal libels against the government.

As early as 1800 O'Connell had spoken at a meeting of Dublin Catholics in opposition to the legislative union with Great Britain; his position was contrary to the views of many of the bishops and upperclass laymen. During his 30-year career as a lawyer he gave much time to the successive Catholic organizations that attempted to secure political and social equality. Until 1812 the most important of these was the Irish Catholic Committee on which O'Connell replaced John Keogh (1740–1817) in the year (1807) when the policy of petitioning Parliament for the abrogation of the penal laws was again taken up systematically. This committee was suppressed by the government in 1812 and was succeeded by the Irish Catholic Board, of which O'Connell was also made a member. In 1813 English members of Parliament, who were pro-Catholic and who believed emancipation could be secured, introduced relief measures. These empowered the government by arrangement with the Holy See to exercise a veto on nominees to bishoprics in Great Britain and Ireland. The proposal was acceptable to the papal secretary of Propaganda G. B. (later Cardinal) Quarantotti, but the bill was abandoned because of the opposition of Bp. John Milner (1752–1826) and of O'Connell, whose views were those of the majority of the board. O'Connell's objection was that if the veto power was thus conceded, the clergy would appear to be civil servants, and in that role would forfeit the people's confidence. For this same reason O'Connell later rejected several relief bills introduced by Henry Grattan (1746–1820). Furthermore, O'Connell had hopes that if Grattan's friends, the Whigs, failed in their purpose, he could secure it through pro-Catholic Tories such as William Conyngham Plunket (1764–1854). For these reasons, also, he avoided committing himself on the subject of parliamentary reform. This issue had become associated with the Whig opposition to the Tory government of Robert Banks Jenkinson, second Earl of Liverpool (1770–1828). At this point of history, however, the pro-Catholic Tories were too weak to be truly effective and, accordingly, on April 25, 1823, O'Connell and Richard Lalor Sheil (1791–1851) started the Catholic Association, which charged membership dues of one shilling a year. Within 12 months O'Connell had gained a nationwide support, which had been effectively organized by the diocesan clergy and by the Catholic professional classes.

Alarmed at this development, the government introduced an act to suppress all such societies (1825). O'Connell went to London to promote a Catholic petition; he was persuaded by Plunket and Sir Francis Burdett (1770–1844) to accept a relief bill balanced by provisions for state payment of Catholic clergy and for disfranchisement of 40-shilling freeholders. Despite support by a majority of government ministers in the House of Commons, the proposal was defeated in the House of Lords, a vote largely influenced by a speech of the prime minister Lord Liverpool. In July of the same year, O'Connell organized the New Catholic Association, which in the general election of 1826 achieved spectacular successes and which ended the monopoly of political control of the freeholders in Waterford, Louth, and Monaghan. The government now began to fear that O'Connell would make it impossible for them to win Irish elections.

It was in this atmosphere that Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington (1769–1852), who succeeded as prime minister in 1828, now was obliged to give way on the emancipation issue, for O'Connell had himself defeated the government supporter, William Vesey-FitzGerald (1783–1843), at a by-election for Co. Clare. Since Wellington was in power, the Irish Catholic Association had decided to oppose the reelection of any member accepting office from the government. Although Vesey-FitzGerald had been favorable to Catholic emancipation, his defeat made it clear that the government risked losing supporters, and that it dare not risk a general election. Such an election in Ireland would almost certainly result in the return of a solid bloc of pro-Catholics hostile to the government's policy.

Daniel O'Connell.

O'Connell's victory, by a vote of 2057 to 982, was regarded as the death knell of landlord control of freeholders' votes. The clergy had utilized every influence in stimulating their people to believe that the issue was essentially a religious one. Thus, to Wellington, emancipation became a necessary concession in a final effort to ensure "that the Irish nobility and gentry would recover their lost influence, the just influence of property." It was the great merit of O'Connell that his efforts helped to build for the Irish masses the growing power that led to eventual control of their elected representatives. The passage of the act of Catholic emancipation, however, was accompanied by the statutory abolition both of the Catholic Association and of the voting rights of the 40-shilling freeholders (1829). Only those Catholics who would take an oath of allegiance to the British king, and thereby deny the temporal power of the pope in the United Kingdom, might thus secure legal exemption from the penal laws. Future members of religious orders need not expect such protection. Even O'Connell himself, without reelection, could not take his seat in Parliament unless he first subscribed to the anti-Catholic oath and declaration made applicable to all members before the Clare election. That no one dared oppose his reelection was some indication that the center of political gravity in Ireland had changed permanently.

Further Political Struggles. For some years after 1829, O'Connell's connections with Catholic issues were peripheral. His attempt to organize a nondenominational movement to repeal the union of the British and Irish parliaments was unsuccessful. He was feared by the dominant Protestant ascendancy, which in any case was not prepared to share its power. Determined to break that power, O'Connell appealed to the parliamentary reformers and to the democracy. In November 1830, Wellington, convinced that he could no longer prevent reform, retired and was succeeded as prime minister by Charles Grey (Viscount Howick and Earl Grey, 1764–1845). With O'Connell's support, this Whig leader secured the passage of the great reform act of 1832, which abolished many unrepresentative boroughs and gave to the upper middle class some share in political power. The Irish act (1833), which maintained many of the unrepresentative bulwarks of Protestant ascendancy, was less satisfactory. Further, social equality was still denied to farming Catholics who now began to refuse to pay tithes to Protestant clergy. The result was that a new form of agrarian revolt, partly countenanced by the Catholic clergy, became common. After 1834, under Grey's successor, William Lamb, Viscount Melbourne (1779–1848), O'Connell made more progress in securing "justice for Ireland" and in particular for the Catholics. A reform administration in Dublin, one particularly influential among the police, abandoned the habit of equating loyalists and Protestants. Catholics were slowly admitted to government offices, but legislative reforms did not go beyond converting tithes into a rent charge upon lands (1838), and abolishing the more indefensible parliamentary boroughs (1840). Meanwhile, since 1830 the existence of a nondenominational system of elementary education was causing increased Catholic and Protestant resentment particularly on the part of Abp. John MACHALE] (1791–1881) of Tuam; his opposition led him to support O'Connell who had revived the repeal of the union question in the Precursor Society in 1838. O'Connell convinced MacHale that the Repeal Association, established in 1839, would prevent the Tory government of Sir Robert Peel (1788–1850), Melbourne's successor (1841), from reestablishing Protestant ascendancy, or, at the least, from permanently obstructing further Catholic emancipation. With renewed clerical support in most parts of the country (Abp. Daniel MURRAY of Dublin almost alone held aloof) O'Connell organized an enthusiastic national following. Despite his confident predictions of success for this great moral movement in 1843, Peel secured O'Connell's imprisonment for seditious conspiracy (June 30, 1844). He was released, after a successful appeal, three months later. Catholic Ireland treated this event as an occasion for spiritual rejoicing; even Archbishop Murray took part by sanctioning a Te Deum. Meanwhile, Peel had endeavored to divert Catholics from the Repeal Association by supporting a more moderate policy, which featured the state endowment of nondenominational higher colleges and a substantially increased subsidization of St. Patrick's of Maynooth. Through a bequests act, Peel also offered improved facilities for Catholic charities. A simultaneous approach was made to Rome to discourage Irish ecclesiastical involvement in politics. This attempt boomeranged when MacHale insisted on the danger to Catholicism from the colleges and bequests bills. Unfairly, O'Connell argued that the bequests law would be used to bar charities to religious orders. Rome ultimately condemned the legislation for colleges but not the bequests act. Immediately afterward, O'Connell was able to influence the clergy against that more militant group in the Repeal Association, the Young Irelanders, who were opposed to a renewed Irish alliance with the Whigs who had returned to power under Prime Minister Lord John Russell in June 1846. Rather than deny the right to resort to force in any extremity, the Young Irelanders left the Repeal Association.

Thereafter O'Connell desired to persuade the state to take measures to counteract the potato blight, which had first appeared in the autumn of the preceding year. The attempt was unsuccessful; the Whig government proved incapable of arresting the catastrophe, now known as the "Great Famine." Within ten years, the resultant fever, starvation, and emigration reduced by 25 percent the population of Ireland, which had once been more than eight million.

After O'Connell's death from a sudden cerebral illness, suffered at Genoa while he was on a pilgrimage to Rome, his son Daniel was received by Pope Pius IX. Under that pope's auspices a two-day funeral oration for O'Connell was delivered by Gioacchino VENTURA DI RAULICA (1792–1861). The speech glorified the union of religion and liberty.

O'Connell's religious convictions, apparently weakened in his youth, had been reinforced during his maturity, and were quite strong in his last years. Those years were, however, somewhat darkened by what seems to have been almost an obsession with the possibility of his eternal damnation.

O'Connell's Significance. This Irish statesman was the greatest single influence in the emergence of Irish political nationalism. He linked the constitutional movement of Grattan and of the 18th-century Protestant patriots to the emancipated Catholics. In his appeal to the masses he was closer to Theobald Wolfe Tone (1763–98) and to the United Irishmen than to Grattan, though in his mature years he opposed both the use of physical force and of revolutionary methods. His substitution of the clergy for the landlords as the local leaders of the people strengthened their mutual ties even after clerical interference at the end of the career of Parnell had weakened the Church's relations with the nationalists. A friend to Catholic liberal Europe and a forceful supporter of the advocates of Negro emancipation in America, O'Connell's influence on Irish nationalism helped to shape the 20th-century Republic of Ireland.

Bibliography: R. D. EDWARDS, "The Contribution of Young Ireland to the Development of the National Idea," in Essays Presented to T. Ua Donnchadha, ed. S. PENDER (Cork 1947). A. HOUSTON, ed., D. O'Connell: His Early Life, and Journal, 1795 to 1802 (London 1906). D. O'CONNELL, A Memoir on Ireland, Native and Saxon (Dublin 1843; 2d ed. 1844). J. O'CONNELL, ed., Life and Speeches of D. O'Connell, 2 v. (Dublin 1846), by his son. W. J. FITZPATRICK, ed., Correspondence of D. O'Connell, 2 v. (London 1888). O'Connell MSS in National Library of Ireland, and University College Dublin. J. A. REYNOLDS, The Catholic Emancipation Crisis in Ireland, 1823–1829 (New Haven 1954). J. F. BRODERICK, The Holy See and the Irish Movement for the Repeal of the Union with England, 1829–1847 (Rome 1951). C. G. DUFFY, Young Ireland, 1840–1849, 2 v. (2d ed. Dublin 1884–87). G. S. LEFEVRE, Peel and O'Connell, a Review of Irish Policy (London 1887).

[R. D. EDWARDS]

O'CONNELL, DENIS JOSEPH

Bishop; b. Donoughmore, County Cork, Ireland, Jan. 28, 1849; d. Richmond, Va., Jan. 1, 1927. He was the son of Michael and Bridget (O'Connell) O'Connell. The family immigrated to the United States and settled in South Carolina, where two brothers of Michael, Jeremiah J. and Joseph P., were missionaries. When Bishop James Gibbons was looking for candidates to build up the clergy of his new Vicariate of North Carolina, he met young Denis O'Connell. A close friendship developed between Gibbons and O'Connell, one that extended over a long lifetime and major national and international issues of Catholicism in the late nineteenth century. After preliminary studies at St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md., O'Connell was sent (1871) to the North American College, Rome, for theology courses at the Urban College of the Propagation of the Faith. He was ordained on May 26, 1877 and received a Roman doctorate in theology. After returning to Richmond, where Gibbons had been transferred, O'Connell began priestly work as assistant at St. Peter's cathedral there. He was back in Rome within a few months, a postulator for Gibbons's pallium as newly appointed coadjutor archbishop of Baltimore. For the next five years he worked in the Diocese of Richmond under the direction of Bishop John J. Keane.

In the fall of 1883 Gibbons called O'Connell to Baltimore to assist in the preliminary arrangements for the Third Plenary Council of BALTIMORE, at which he served as one of the four secretaries. After the council he returned to Rome with the American bishops' committee to secure ratification of the conciliar decrees. In 1885 he was appointed rector of the North American College in Rome, and for the next 18 years he served as liaison man and Roman agent for members of the American hierarchy. During his term as rector (1885–95), the student body was enlarged, the physical plant improved, and an honor system established at the college. He also served as a Roman agent for Gibbons, who was elevated to the cardinalate in 1886.

O'Connell, the Roman intermediary, was made a domestic prelate in 1887; he took active part in the Roman aspects of the controversies centered on such questions as the KNIGHTS OF LABOR, Cahenslyism, The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, the coming of an apostolic delegate to the United States, Henry George and the single tax, Archbishop John Ireland's FARIBAULT school PLAN, and AMERICANISM. As the lines of difference developed between so-called liberal and conservative members of the American Church of that period, O'Connell became a symbol of the liberal wing's position. He identified himself unqualifiedly with the policies of Gibbons, Ireland, and Keane, and alienated conservative-minded American bishops, who held differing views on the burning issues of the developing Church in the United States. Criticisms of O'Connell's activities, apart from his rectorship, increased to the point that his resignation from the college was requested on the grounds that he did not have the full confidence of the body of American bishops. From 1895 to 1903 O'Connell served as rector of Cardinal Gibbons's titular church of Santa Maria in Trastevere in Rome.

On Jan. 12, 1903, through the influence of his friends, O'Connell was appointed third rector of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., which was then badly in need of academic, organizational, promotional, and financial direction. From 1903 to 1910 he worked, with some success, to establish educational improvements at the university. An annual collection was inaugurated that was to be taken up in all the dioceses of the United States for the advancement of the pontifical university in Washington. Student enrollment was increased; several prominent and capable professors were engaged; and academic procedures were formalized according to accepted standards in the academic community. The base of the university's educational program was extended to include undergraduate training as well as graduate studies. But O'Connell found it difficult to adjust to the American system of educational operation through a board of trustees and with input from the faculty. A financial crisis almost destroyed the university in 1904, when the total endowment funds of the institution were endangered by the financial failure of Thomas E. Waggaman, treasurer of the university, who had invested the funds of the university in his enterprises. The university's endowment was reduced by two-thirds of its investment value; confidence in its financial management was severely weakened; and extensive and prolonged revival was slow to take place.

On Dec. 12, 1907, O'Connell was named a titular bishop, a move that advanced his growing desire to be relieved of the rectorship in Washington. After Archbishop Patrick W. Riordan of San Francisco, Calif., petitioned Rome for his old friend O'Connell to become auxiliary bishop, the appointment was made on Dec. 25, 1908. When O'Connell was transferred to the See of Richmond on Jan. 19, 1912, as a suffragan of Cardinal Gibbons, the old discussions began anew that O'Connell would be appointed coadjutor of Baltimore and succeed to the premier see. But he was too old for such a consideration when Cardinal Gibbons died in 1921, and the bishop of Richmond continued directing the activities of the diocese of his youth until Jan. 15, 1926, when he resigned because of failing health.

[C. J. BARRY]

O'CONNELL, JOHN PATRICK

Theologian, editor, actively involved in the liturgical apostolate; b. Chicago, Ill., Jan. 12, 1918; d. Chicago, Feb. 20, 1960. Educated at Quigley Seminary, Chicago, and St. Mary of the Lake Seminary, Mundelein, Ill., where he earned the degrees of M.A. and S.T.D., he was ordained on May 1, 1943. After serving as a parish priest and as a teacher at Barat College, Lake Forest, Ill., he was selected by Cardinal Samuel Stritch to be the editor for The Catholic Press, Inc., of Chicago, of the Holy Bible (Holy Family edition, 1950, and several subsequent editions); the Sunday Missal; the Prayer Book and the Life of Christ, issued as a set (1954); the Bible Story (1959); and Christ and the Church (1960). Under his direction, The Catholic Press also published the French La Sainte Bible (1956), the Spanish Sagrada Biblia (1958), and after delays extending beyond his death, Portuguese and Italian translations of Holy Scripture. O'Connell was a member of the Mariological Society and of the Catholic Biblical Association.

Influenced by his pastor, Joseph P. Morrison, O'Connell became a zealous promoter of the liturgical apostolate. He served the Liturgical Conference as secretary (1946–47); as treasurer (1949–52); as a member of its Board of Directors and Advisory Council; and as editor of the proceedings of the 1946, 1957, 1958, and 1959 Liturgical Weeks. During the last years of his life, he was engaged in the work of programming the annual Liturgical Weeks. O'Connell contributed many articles to publications and addressed many clerical and lay audiences in spreading knowledge of the Church's worship.

At the directive of Cardinal Stritch, Father O'Connell made preliminary surveys with a view to the publication of a new edition of the Catholic Encyclopedia. Shortly after he was named a papal chamberlain on Dec. 28, 1959, he fell prey to a fatal disease. Until the day of his untimely death, he continued working to complete many of the projects he had undertaken.

Bibliography: F. R. MCMANUS, Yearbook of Liturgical Studies 1 (1960) xi–xiv.

[N. RANDOLPH]

O'CONNELL, WILLIAM HENRY

Cardinal and second archbishop of Boston; b. Lowell, Mass., Dec. 8, 1859; d. Boston, Mass., April 22, 1944. He was the youngest of 11 children of John and Brigid O'Connell, natives of County Cavan, Ireland. His father died when he was five but family sacrifices enabled him to attend Lowell public schools and then to enter St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Maryland, to study for the priesthood. However, in 1879 he left the seminary and entered Boston College, from which he graduated in 1881 with first honors in philosophy and physics. He reapplied for the priesthood and was sent by Abp. John J. Williams to the North American College in Rome. Illness terminated O'Connell's studies at Rome before he could obtain a doctorate. He was ordained June 7, 1884, returned to the U.S. in December, and did pastoral work for the next ten years, first at St. Joseph's in Medford, then at St. Joseph's in Boston's West End.

Early Career. Late in 1895, when a conflict of opinion in the U.S. hierarchy led to the resignation of the rectors of the North American College in Rome and the Catholic University of America, Cardinal James Gibbons named O'Connell rector of the NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE. During the next six years, O'Connell doubled the enrollment of the North American College, rehabilitated its finances, and purchased the Villa Santa Caterina at Castel Gandolfo for summer sessions. He was made a domestic prelate in 1897. His relations with Pope Leo XIII, Papal Secretary of State Cardinal Rampolla, and the future Cardinal Merry del Val were cordial. He also formed friendships in Roman society and diplomatic circles that resulted in the bequest to the North American College of the library of the bibliophile William Heyward, and in the decoration of the college refectory at the expense of the American theater magnate, Benjamin F. Keith. In 1918 O'Connell received from the Keith estate a personal bequest totalling almost $2.5 million. He devoted the entire sum to charities for various Catholic institutions, rendering the final account of these disbursements in 1936.

On May 19, 1901, in the Corsini Chapel of the Basilica of St. John Lateran, O'Connell was consecrated third bishop of Portland, Maine, by Cardinal Satolli. Taking possession of his see, which had been vacant for nearly a year, he visited every parish in the state. He redecorated the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, introduced a forerunner of the Catholic Youth Organization, and fostered retreats for the clergy. In 1903 he declined the Holy See's appointment to the Archdiocese of Manila in the Philippine Islands, which had recently been acquired by the U.S. Aware of the untrue reports that he had supported the Spanish cause against the U.S. in 1898, O'Connell frankly informed Rome that such gossip would impede his work in the Philippines and recommended that another choice be made.

After the Russo-Japanese War, O'Connell was named special papal envoy to Emperor Mutsuhito on Aug. 31, 1905. He had a personal audience with the emperor and empress and was decorated with the Grand Cordon of the Sacred Treasure. He made a thorough survey of the mission field in Japan, reporting to Pius X in Rome in January 1906. His recommendations, all adopted, included the introduction of many religious orders into Japan, the fostering of a native clergy, and the founding of a Catholic university at Tokyo, to be staffed by Jesuits.

Assignment to Boston. On Feb. 21, 1906, Pius X, disregarding the recommendations from the bishops of New England, named O'Connell titular bishop of Constantia, and coadjutor with right of succession to the aged Archbishop Williams of Boston. The news was not favorably received in Boston but O'Connell remained unperturbed. He concluded his affairs in Portland and went to Boston to be installed formally on April 3, 1906. At the death of Williams on Aug. 30, 1907, the 47-year-old O'Connell took up the reins that he would hold firmly for the next 37 years.

A born leader, O'Connell once said: "I have never hesitated to speak as plainly as possible . . . whenever direction was needed." He began at once to reorganize the large archdiocese in which he found many institutions debt ridden and run down. In 1908, when the apostolic constitution of Pius X, Sapienti consilio, removed the Church in the U.S. from mission supervision to full national status like that of the Church in older European countries, O'Connell was a leader in establishing diocesan administrative offices. His zeal for the missions, both foreign and home, was shown in his support of the Catholic Missionary Congress held at Chicago in 1908 and at Boston in 1913. He encouraged two Boston priests in the founding of new missionary congregations. James Anthony WALSH was released from the Boston archdiocese to become a cofounder of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society; the Vincentian Thomas JUDGE, born in Boston, was aided in his work for home missions in founding the MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST HOLY TRINITY, a community of sisters, the MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST BLESSED TRINITY, and the Missionary Cenacle Apostolate. O'Connell also pioneered in supporting (1917) the open-air preaching of the Jewish convert and lay apostle to the man in the street, David GOLDSTEIN.

O'Connell was created the first native cardinal of Boston on Nov. 26, 1911. A group of non-Catholics in Boston presented him with a purse of $25,000, which he used for improving his titular Church of San Clemente in Rome. In the Boston archdiocese he placed institutions on a sound financial basis, encouraged early and frequent Communion, and introduced retreats for the laity, bringing the Passionists, the Religious of the Cenacle, and the Franciscans to Boston to conduct retreat houses.

Other Contributions. On the national scene, O'Connell's diocese was outstanding in both World Wars in efforts for servicemen. Patriotism was a frequent theme in his sermons. When President Wilson first proposed his Fourteen Points, the Cardinal spoke at Madison Square Garden (Dec. 10, 1918), eloquently urging self-determination for Ireland as well as for other peoples. In 1924, he spoke out publicly against the proposed child labor amendment to the Constitution as infringing on the rights of parents and of the states. He also spoke against birth control and preached against graft in politics. O'Connell helped to convert the National Catholic War Council of World War I into the National Catholic Welfare Conference. He was prominent in bringing about the change that today enables cardinals from any part of the globe to participate in the election of a new pope. In 1914, and again in 1922, the old rule of convening the conclave ten days after the death of a pope had frustrated O'Connell's journeys across the Atlantic. He protested so strongly that Pius XI personally promised to extend the time to 18 days. Thus, in 1939, O'Connell was able to reach Rome in time for the election of Pius XII.

Despite his preoccupation with the administration of mundane matters, the cardinal was a man of prayer and a patron of letters. An amateur organist, he composed the music for The Holy Cross Hymnal (Boston 1915). His music for the Latin motet Juravit Dominus, written in 1882, was sung for many years at first Masses of priests at the North American College in Rome and in the Boston archdiocese. The Universalist Church of the Redemption in Boston, with its fine organ, was bought by the cardinal and was dedicated as St. Clement's Church on Dec. 8, 1935. He served from 1932 to 1936 as a trustee of the Boston Public Library. To encourage Lenten devotions he translated from the Italian The Passion of Our Lord by Cardinal Gaetano De Lai (Boston 1923). O'Connell's particular devotion throughout his life was to our Lady of Perpetual Help.

In 1937 he was awarded an honorary degree by Harvard University, the first native Catholic prelate to be so recognized. During his administration parishes in the archdiocese increased from 194 to 322, and clergy from 600 to more than 1,500. Admissions to St. John's Seminary tripled; a score of new religious congregations were introduced into the area; parochial elementary schools were doubled and high schools tripled—taught by a total of more than 3,000 priests, brothers, and sisters. Three colleges for women were founded under his auspices and he aided the establishment of Boston College on its Chestnut Hill campus. In 1908 he purchased as a diocesan organ, the weekly newspaper, the Pilot; in 1934 he laid the cornerstone of a diocesan center, a six-story building with presses and offices for the Pilot, offices for diocesan bureaus, and a meditation chapel. An archdiocesan residence, the Crehan Library, and the chancery were built; he also enlarged St. John's Seminary, staffing it with diocesan priest-scholars. Active and vigorous in the service of the Church to the last week of his life, O'Connell, at his death, was buried in the mausoleum he had built on the seminary grounds.

Bibliography: W. H. O'CONNELL, Reminiscences of Twenty-Five Years (Boston 1926); Recollections of Seventy Years (Boston 1934). R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston . . . 1604 to 1943, 3 v. (New York 1944). D. G. WAYMAN, Cardinal O'Connell of Boston (New York 1955).

[D. G. WAYMAN]

O'CONNOR, JOHN JOSEPH

Cardinal, archbishop of NEW YORK; b. Jan. 15, 1920, Philadelphia; d. May 3, 2000, New York. The fourth child of Thomas and Dorothy Gimple O'Connor, he grew up in a working-class neighborhood in southwest Philadelphia, where he attended local public elementary and junior high schools and West Catholic High School for Boys before entering St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in 1936. Ordained a priest of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia on Dec. 15, 1945, he spent the next seven years as a teacher and guidance counselor in archdiocesan high schools while also serving as a parish priest.

In 1952 O'Connor began a 27-year career as a navy chaplain. His service with the Marines during the Vietnam War earned him the Legion of Merit. He strongly defended American involvement in the Vietnam War in A Chaplain Looks at Vietnam (Cleveland 1968), but later he expressed regret for having done so. In 1972 O'Connor was appointed the first Catholic senior chaplain at the U.S. Naval Academy, and in 1975 he attained the highest position available to him when he became the U.S. Navy Chief of Chaplains with the rank of rear admiral. He retired in 1979. During his military career, he also earned a doctorate in political science from Georgetown University.

In 1979 O'Connor was appointed titular bishop of Curzola and auxiliary to the military vicar, Terence Cardinal COOKE. O'Connor first became well known nationally when he was appointed to the five-member episcopal committee that prepared "The Challenge of Peace," the pastoral letter issued by the U.S. hierarchy in 1983. One week after the publication of the pastoral letter, he was appointed the bishop of Scranton, Pa. He was installed in June of 1983, but he remained in Scranton for only another seven months; on Jan. 31, 1984, he was appointed archbishop of New York in succession to Cardinal Cooke, who had died the previous October. One year later, Pope John Paul II made him cardinal, with the titular church of Ss. Giovanni e Paolo. On the same day as his elevation, it was announced that the Military Ordinariate had been reorganized as the Archdiocese for the Military Services, U.S.A., severing the connection between the archbishop of New York and the Military Ordinariate that had existed since its inception in 1917.

Cardinal Cooke, a shy man who disliked confrontation, made no attempt to fill the national role of his predecessor, Francis Cardinal Spellman. By contrast, O'Connor seemed to welcome confrontation and clearly aimed at assuming a prominent role in the U.S. hierarchy. He liked to be compared to the feisty John Hughes, New York's first archbishop, and he favored a style of leadership that seemed to be modeled on that of John Paul II.

Although he was 64 years old when he became archbishop, O'Connor adopted a grueling schedule with heavy emphasis on preaching and public appearances, the frequent use of both the press and television, and numerous pastoral visits to parishes and institutions. He also enjoyed occupying center stage at large-scale special events, such as the annual Mass for the Disabled in St. Patrick's Cathedral and a youth rally at Yankee Stadium that drew 40,000 people. In deference to New York's large Hispanic population, he mastered Spanish sufficiently well to celebrate Mass and preach in that language.

As in Scranton, O'Connor gave high priority to right-to-life issues. At a press conference in June of 1984, he answered a question about Catholic politicians and abortion legislation with the statement: "I do not see how a Catholic in good conscience can vote for an individual expressing himself or herself as favoring abortion." The comment was widely interpreted as a criticism of Congresswoman Geraldine Ferraro, the Democratic candidate for vice-president, and it led to public sparring between O'Connor and Governor Mario Cuomo of New York.

O'Connor's well-attended weekly press conferences after Sunday Mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral gave him a forum to comment on public issues. He relished the publicity, but he discontinued the press conferences in 1990, candidly admitting that he had said "some dumb things."

Two groups with whom O'Connor established particularly warm relationships were organized labor and New York's large and influential Jewish community. The Service Employees International Union, grateful for his support of labor unions, publicly hailed him as "the patron saint of working people." Commenting on the award, Monsignor George G. Higgins said, "Few bishops in U.S. history have been as consistently supportive as Cardinal O'Connor of labor's basic rights." Dr. Ronald Sobel, senior rabbi of Temple Emanuel-El, said: "I know of no member of the American Catholic hierarchy who has been more consistently sensitive to the interests of the Jewish people." At the time of the Persian Gulf War in 1991, the former admiral tried to restrain widespread pro-war enthusiasm by declaring: "No war is good. Every war is at best the lesser of evils." Mario Cuomo, with whom he often clashed, paid tribute to O'Connor's commitment to social justice by saying, "His work should have earned the cardinal a reputation as one of the Vatican's favorite social progressives as well as one of its premier conservative dogmatists."

O'Connor committed the archdiocese to maintaining its network of parochial schools, especially in poor neighborhoods, despite the sharp decline in the number of teaching sisters and brothers. The Catholic Church also remained a major provider of health care and social services to the poor in New York City. However, the staffing of parishes became increasingly difficult since O'Connor was reluctant to close or consolidate parishes even as the number of active diocesan priests fell from 777 in 1983 to 585 in 1999. The number of diocesan seminarians decreased even more precipitously, from 221 to 84, despite O'Connor's persistent personal efforts to promote vocations.

John Joseph Cardinal O'Connor. (Catholic News Service)

Cardinal O'Connor offered his resignation to Pope John Paul II on reaching the mandatory retirement age of 75, but the pope allowed him to remain in office. In October of that year O'Connor welcomed the pontiff to New York for a successful papal visit that included a Mass before 125,000 people in Central Park. In late August of 1999 O'Connor underwent surgery for a brain tumor from which he never fully recovered, although he continued to make limited public appearances until the following March. On the occasion of his 80th birthday, the U.S. Congress bestowed upon him its highest civilian award, the Congressional Gold Medal. He died on May 3, 2000. He was buried in the crypt of St. Patrick's Cathedral, next to Pierre TOUSSAINT, a Haitian born into slavery who worked as a barber in New York and whom John Paul II had declared "Venerable" in 1996. O'Connor had brought Toussaint's remains to St. Patrick's from an abandoned cemetery for blacks in lower Manhattan, and he had requested that he be buried next to him.

Bishop Edward Michael Egan (left) at funeral Mass for John Cardinal O'Connor, St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Bibliography: J. O'CONNOR and E. KOCH, His Eminence and Hizzoner (New York 1989). N. HENTOFF, John Cardinal O'Connor: At the Storm Center of a Changing Catholic Church (New York 1988).

[T. J. SHELLEY]

O'CONNOR, MARTIN JOHN

Archbishop, rector of NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE, nuncio, and president of the Papal Commission for Social Communications; b. Scranton, Pennsylvania, May 18, 1900; d. Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, Dec. 1, 1986. The only child of John and Belinda Caffrey O'Connor. After graduation from St. Thomas College (now University of Scranton), O'Connor entered the North American College in Rome where he earned doctorates in theology and canon law; he was ordained in Rome in 1924. Returning to the diocese of Scranton, Father O'Connor served in various administrative offices, and in 1943 he was consecrated Auxiliary Bishop of Scranton.

In December of 1946, O'Connor was named rector of the North American College in Rome. He was responsible for restoring the Via dell' Umlta and Castel Gandolfo properties, abandoned during the war years, and for building the new college on the Janiculum. Pope Pius XII dedicated the new facility on Oct. 14, 1953. In all, O'Connor served as rector for 18 years. Pope John XXIII named him archbishop in September of 1959.

Role in the Media. In 1948 Pius XII directed that a commission for religious and didactic films be organized with O'Connor as president. This commission was replaced in 1952 by the Pontifical Commission for Motion Pictures and extended in 1954 to include radio and television. In 1961 John XXIII, laying down new rules, elevated the Pontifical Commission for Cinema, Radio, and Television to a permanent office of the Roman Curia. Pope Paul VI, at the mandate of the Fathers of Vatican Council II, established the Pontifical Commission for the Media of Social Communications and extended its competency to embrace all media, the press in particular, and appointed to it experts from various countries, including laypersons and members of the press. O'Connor was named president, a position he had held continuously from the inception of the various commissions until his retirement in 1971.

On June 5, 1960, John XXIII appointed O'Connor to the General Preparatory Commission for the Second Vatican Council. Ten days later, he appointed him president of the Preparatory Secretariat for Press and Entertainment. The Secretariat was charged with the preparation of a schema on the media of social communications which, after presentation to the Council Fathers and redrafting, was promulgated on Dec. 4, 1963, by a decree of the Council titled Inter mirifica. Paul VI, at the beginning of the second period of the council, appointed O'Connor chairman of the newly formed press committee that oversaw the accreditation of more than two thousand correspondents and the daily publication, in nine languages, of resumes of the council speeches.

O'Connor served as a member of the press committee at the First General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops in 1967. In 1969 Paul VI convoked an Extraordinary Assembly of the Synod of Bishops of which O'Connor was a member. He was appointed to the Second General Assembly in 1971.

Paul VI appointed him nuncio to Malta, a post he held from 1965 to 1969. In 1966 he was appointed vice president of the Post-Conciliar Commission for the Apostolate of the Laity. In 1968 he was named consultor to the Pontifical Commission for Latin America. O'Connor retired in 1971 after having served the Church in Rome during five Pontificates. He returned to the United States in 1979.

Bibliography: V. A. YZERMANS, American Participation in the Second Vatican Council (New York 1967).

[T. V. BANICK]

O'CONNOR, MARY FLANNERY

Novelist and short-story writer; b. Savannah, Ga., March 25, 1925; d. Milledgeville, Ga., Aug. 3, 1964. She was the daughter of Edward Francis and Regina (Cline) O'Connor, of a pioneer Georgia Catholic family. At the age of 12 she moved with her parents to the Cline family home at Milledgeville. There she attended Peabody High School and graduated (1945) from Georgia State College for Women. She later (1948) studied creative writing at the University of Iowa. The initial attack of an incurable malady brought her home from New York a year later to live with her mother on the farm near Milledgeville, where she spent her remaining years.

Quiet and kind-heartedly humorous, O'Connor was committed to a Christian iconoclasm against the fraudulence and pietism of a secular age. She sought to make "the distortions in modern life" apparent to those "used to seeing them as natural." She did this through an original use of humor, horrendous satire, and violence in two novels and a score of stories. Her work, first meeting with hostility and dismay, won wide literary acclaim in the United States and abroad, and within a decade she was accorded front rank and received many recognitions. Her first novel, Wise Blood (1952, reissued 1960), is the story of a lunatic-fringe preacher who tries to found a church without Christ. Preaching a progressive nihilism, he backs his way into the Cross. The novel parodies the atheistic existentialism then pervading the literary and philosophical scene. (See EXISTENTIALISM IN LITERATURE). In A Good Man Is Hard To Find (1955), a collection of ten of her stories, O'Connor created a new form of humor to bare "the distortions." She employed it perhaps nowhere with more impact than in the title story. There, what is apparently secular satire on the accidental encounter of a gabbling grandmother and her unlovely family with a psychotic criminal who calls himself the Misfit turns into a religious ordeal that brings the grandmother salvation, along with a bloody slaughter. The story of Jonas (with emphasis on the action at sea) provides the theme of her second novel, The Violent Bear It Away, (1960) and, in variation, of a later story, The Lame Shall Enter First. These dramas probe deeply the theology of free will (which she viewed as a conflict of wills in the sinner) and freedom (which she called a mystery). Nine of her last stories appeared posthumously in Everything That Rises Must Converge (1965), confirming further that the violent themes of her works conceal an apocalypse for her time.

Bibliography: M. F. O'CONNOR, "The Lame Shall Enter First," Sewanee Review 70 (1962) 337-379. Current Biography (1958) 317-318. J. F. FARNHAM, "The Grotesque in the Novels of F. O'C.," America 105 (May 13, 1961).

[B. CHENEY]

O'CONNOR, MICHAEL

First bishop of Pittsburgh, Pa., diocese; b. Queens-town, Ireland, April 27, 1810; d. Woodstock, Md., Oct. 18, 1872. He was the eldest son of Charles and Ellen Kirk O'Connor and brother of Bp. James O'Connor, first bishop of Omaha, Nebr. Michael entered the College of Propaganda, Rome, in 1824, was ordained on June 1, 1833, and received his doctorate in 1834. He then became vice rector of the Irish College and professor of Scripture of the Propaganda College. His mother's death in 1834 led him to refuse the rectorship of St. Charles Seminary, Philadelphia, and he returned to Ireland to care for his family. While he was preparing for a professorship at the College of St. Patrick, Maynooth, the Philadelphia invitation was renewed in 1838. He accepted and was rector of St. Charles Seminary from 1839 until he went to Pittsburgh as vicar-general of the diocese in 1841. When his appointment as first bishop of Pittsburgh was pending in 1843, he hastened to Rome to ask permission to become a Jesuit. Pope Gregory XVI's answer was: "You will be a bishop first and a Jesuit afterwards." He was consecrated on Aug. 15, 1843.

During his episcopate the number of priests in Pittsburgh increased fivefold and the number of churches more than doubled. He opened a chapel for African Americans, founded the Catholic, a weekly diocesan newspaper, and built a cathedral. A number of religious communities, including the first Sisters of Mercy to establish a convent in the United States, were invited into the diocese. Two colleges and St. Michael's Seminary were opened. The bishop advocated the right of Catholic education to share in public funds and encouraged development of parish schools. In 1853 the diocese was divided and O'Connor was transferred to Erie, but a year later the Holy See, moved by petitions of the clergy and laity, restored him to Pittsburgh. His health began to fail, and he took long trips to Europe, the Near East, and the Caribbean.

He resigned his see in 1860 and entered the Jesuit novitiate at Gorheim, Sigmaringen, Germany. Two years later he made his solemn profession. At first assigned to Boston College in Massachusetts, O'Connor later became assistant to the Jesuit provincial of Maryland. As a Jesuit he was an active preacher, lecturer, and retreat master. In 1870 he went to London to consult physicians about his health and returned to the United States on the same ship that carried the future Cardinal Herbert Vaughan and the first Mill Hill missionaries to African Americans. His last public appearance was at the black church of St. Francis Xavier, Baltimore, which he had been instrumental in acquiring. He retired to Woodstock College, Maryland, six months before his death in 1872.

Although O'Connor excelled in theology and patristic studies, his busy life left little time for writing and he published nothing except some newspaper articles and printed lectures.

Bibliography: A. A. LAMBING, A History of the Catholic Church in the Dioceses of Pittsburgh and Allegheny (New York 1880). W. P. PURCELL, Catholic Pittsburgh's One Hundred Years (Chicago 1943).

[J. J. HENNESEY]

O'CONNOR, THOMAS FRANCIS

U.S. Catholic Church historian and bibliographer; b. Syracuse, N.Y., Aug. 14, 1899; d. St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 15, 1950. He received his B.A. (1922) from the College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Massachusetts, and his M.A. (1927) from Syracuse University. He taught at Little Rock University, Arkansas (1928–30); St. Louis University, Missouri (1931–37, 1948–50); and St. Michael's College, Winooski Park, Vermont (1937–39). He served for a time after 1941 as historiographer of the Diocese of Syracuse and was historiographer of the Archdiocese of New York from 1944 to 1948. Although O'Connor had a vast store of knowledge of the bibliography and history of the church in the U.S., he left practically no notes. Vollmar's Catholic Church in America (2d ed. New York 1963) lists 24 titles published by O'Connor in various historical journals. He was active in various historical societies and was president of the American Catholic Historical Association (1946–47). His early and unexpected death was caused by a hemorrhage resulting from a long-standing tubercular condition.

[E. R. VOLLMAR]

OCTOECHOS

In Byzantine music the term Octoechos (Gr. ὀκτώ, eight, and ἦχος, mode) has two distinct though closely allied meanings. In general it refers to the system of eight modes that forms the compositional framework of Byzantine ecclesiastical music: four authentic and four plagal modes, as in Western chant. More particularly it designates a collection of proper hymns, chiefly for the Morning and Evening Services, providing an entire set of such pieces for each mode. The collection was designed for performance in cycles of eight weeks: in the 1st week (beginning after Easter) the hymns of Mode I Authentic would be used, in the second week the hymns of Mode II Authentic, and so on, until after the completion of the modal series the cycle recommenced with Mode I. Thus the Octoechos, taken in conjunction with the hymns of feasts fixed by the calendar, and those of the Lenten and Easter seasons, made provision for music throughout the church year. In its earlier form it comprised pieces for the Sundays only; later additions supplied hymns for the weekdays as well, the whole compilation receiving the name of Great Octoechos (ἡ μεγάλη Ὀκτώηχος) or Parakletike (Παρακλητική).

Origins. The origins of the system, as of the collection based upon it, are obscure. It appears to owe little if anything directly to the classical and Hellenistic Greek tonal system, despite the assignation of classical names to modes of the Octoechos by some medieval Byzantine theorists. Attempts by modern scholars to trace it to the musical vestiges or cosmological beliefs of earlier Near Eastern peoples are speculative at best. Even the time of its appearance in Christian hymnody cannot be determined with any precision. An 11th-century text of the Plerophoriai of John of Maiuma (c. 515) contains an allusion to "music of the Octoechos," but its authenticity is questionable. Grave doubt attaches also to the oft-repeated assertion that a hymn collection of the same period, the work of SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH (512–19), was an Octoechos. The sole surviving MSS of this collection present it in Syriac translation, and the earliest of these MSS, more than a century and a half later than the presumed original, shows no sign of an arrangement according to mode; only in much later copies does such a categorization exist. In any case it seems that the eight-mode system had become established within the Greek liturgical world by the end of the 7th century. To cite one piece of evidence: a papyrus fragment no later than early 8th century gives a modal sign—though no other musical notation—for the hymns it preserves. Byzantine tradition ascribed the composition of the Octoechos, or at least a large part of its Sunday nucleus, to St. JOHN DAMASCENE (c. 750). In its generality the attribution is certainly dubious, but it may contain some element of historical fact. The very earliest musical MSS (10th century) have "John the Monk" as author of the canons of the Octoechos; and the initial letters of another set of Sunday hymns form the word Ἰωάννου (of John)—this sort of acrostic signature is traditional in Byzantine hymnology. But even if the identity of this "John" with the Damascene were assured, whether he was in any sense the composer of the music that the MSS convey would remain doubtful—and this is true generally of the poets to whom hymns are ascribed. In the 9th century, after the resolution of the iconoclastic controversy, the Octoechos was completed by the addition of the weekday hymns, the work of monks of the STUDIO monastery in Constantinople—in particular Joseph the Hymnographer (883). The final canon in the series has as its acrostic τῆς Ὀκτώηχος τῆς νέας θεῖον τέλος (the divine conclusion of the New Oktoechos), perhaps the earliest known instance of the term's referring unambiguously to a corpus of hymns. Not until much later does the word occur as heading of a separate MS or section of a MS.

The Modes in Their Technical Aspects. As for the musical system itself, the songs from every particular mode are composed largely from a restricted set of melodic formulas characteristic of that mode. These formulas may be employed in many different combinations and variations; nevertheless, most of the phrases of any given hymn are reducible to one or another of this small number of basic melody-fragments. (For formulas of Mode I as they are exemplified in a selection of phrases from a number of hymns, see E. Wellesz, A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography [2d ed. Oxford 1961] app. V.)

The church music belonging to various peoples, such as the Serbs, the Armenians, the Syrians, and the Copts, as found in our own times, exhibits analogous modal systems, depending in the same fashion on melodic formulae—the specific formulae, of course, differing from one musical culture to another. (No musical documentation from the Byzantine period exists for any of these peoples; there are, e.g., medieval Armenian musical MSS, but their notation is undecipherable.) Study of these modal systems has led some scholars to conclude that, in such a system, each mode is defined simply by its characteristic melody patterns, rather than by some abstract scale pattern: the latter sort of definition was the subsequent rationalization of theorists. Byzantine theory in its full development did provide such a rationalization; and the system thus defined appears to be essentially identical to that of Latin plainchant. This conclusion is suggested by the medieval Latin practice of assigning Greek number names to the Latin modes; it is confirmed by Wellesz' publication of a hymn whose Greek text had been translated into Latin, and whose music appears substantially the same in both kinds of notation. The total range of the system (with rare extensions) covers what is represented in modern transcription as the two-octave white-key gamut a–a". Within this, Mode I Authentic has an approximate range of d–d', with finalis on a' or d'; Mode II Authentic, e–e', with finalis on b' or e'; Mode III Authentic, f–f', with finalis on c' or f'; Mode IV Authentic, g–g', with finalis on d' or g. The plagal modes have ranges lying a fourth below the numerically corresponding authentic; they use only the lower finalis of the two found in the corresponding authentic modes. This diatonic system remained the basis of Byzantine music down to the 17th and 18th centuries, when it disappeared, along with the entire repertory embodying it, under the Turkish influence, leaving only the texts and the modal assignments as they had been in medieval times. For a categorization of the contents of the Oktoechos as a musical service-book, see Tillyard.

Bibliography: E. WELLESZ, Eastern Elements in Western Chant (Monumenta Musicae Byzantinae 1; Oxford 1947); "Die Struktur der servischen Oktoechos," Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft 2 (1919) 140–48. H. J. W. TILLYARD, The Hymns of the Oktoechos, 2 v. (Monumenta Musicae Byzantinae 3, 5; Oxford 1940, 1952). J. JEANNIN and J. PUYADE, "L'Oktoechos syrien," Oriens Christianus NS 3 (1913) 82–104, 277–98. A. BAUMSTARK, Festbrevier und Kirchenjahr der syrischen Jakobiten (Paderborn 1910). E. W. BROOKS, "The Hymns of Severus," Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. GRAFFIN and F. NAU (Paris 1903– ) 6:1–179; 7:593–803. F. NAU, "Jean Rufus, évêque de Maïouma: Plérophories," ibid. 8:1–208. L. TARDO, L'Oktoechos nei MSS. melurgici (Grottaferrata 1955). Παράκλητικὴ ἦτοι Ὀκτώηχος ἡ μεγάλη (Rome 1885); Ὀκτώηχος (Rome 1886). O. STRUNK, "The Tonal System of Byzantine Music," Musical Quarterly 28 (1942) 190–204; "The Antiphons of the Oktoechos," Journal of the American Musicological Society 18 (1960) 50–67.

[I. THOMAS/EDS.]

O'CULLENAN, GELASIOUS (GLAISNE)

Order of Cîteaux, abbot of Boyle, Co. Roscommon, Ireland; b. probably at Mullaghshee near Ballyshannon, Co. Donegal, 1554; d. Dublin, Nov. 21, 1580. He was the eldest of seven sons of whom six became ecclesiastics, five being Cistercians. At an early age Glaisne entered the monastery, completed his novitiate and theological studies at Paris, and eventually became a doctor of the Sorbonne. Having visited Rome, he returned to Ireland, where he was made abbot of the suppressed Abbey of Boyle. There he carried on his sacred ministry until his arrest in 1580 with Eoghan O Maoilchiarrain, Premonstratensian abbot of Holy Trinity in Loch Cé. Imprisoned in Dublin Castle, they were tortured and, having refused to conform, were sentenced to death and executed. Glaisne's near-contemporary, the Cistercian Menologist Chrysostomus Henriquez, called O'Cullenan "the ornament of the Cistercian Order, the splendour of our age, and the glory of all Ireland." Glaisne's name is included in the list of Irish martyrs awaiting beatification.

See Also: IRISH CONFESSORS AND MARTYRS.

Bibliography: C. HENRIQUEZ, Menologium Cisterciense (Antwerp 1630). M. HARTRY, Triumphalia chronologica Monasterii Sanctae Crucis in Hibernia, ed. D. MURPHY (Dublin 1895). J. MACENLEAN, "Eoin Ó Cuileannáin . . .," Archivium Hibernicum 1 (1912) 77–121.

[C. S. Ó CONBHUÍ]

O'DALY, DANIEL

Priest and diplomat; b. Kilsarkon, County Kerry, Ireland 1595; d. Lisbon, June 30, 1662. His father, Con-

chubhar, was a bard and soldier of Gerald, earl of Desmond, his mother an O'Keefe from Duhallow barony. He entered the Dominicans in his youth and because of the persecution in Ireland, he was educated in Spain, studying first in Lugo, then in Burgos, where he was ordained. After further studies he returned to Emly diocese as a "fugitive" priest. He was recalled to Louvain to teach in the newly erected college for Irish Dominicans and he became superior in 1624. While raising funds in Madrid, he obtained Philip IV's consent to begin the College of Corpo Santo at Lisbon, a foundation similar to that of Louvain. He later founded the convent of Bom Sucesso for Irish-born Dominican nuns at Belem in Lisbon, in return for which concession he recruited a body of Irish soldiery for Spanish service in the Low Countries. With the restoration of the Portuguese monarchy (1640), he was appointed confessor to Luiza de Guzman, wife of the new king, John of Braganza. Several diplomatic missions followed: in 1649, to Charles Stuart at Jersey; in 1650 a secret mission to Pope Innocent X concerning the nomination of Portuguese bishops then being blocked by Spain; in 1655 to France first as envoy, then as accredited ambassador to negotiate financial and military help. After King John's death (1656), O'Daly acted as chief adviser to the widow-regent. He also helped to negotiate a matrimonial alliance between Charles II of England and Catherine of Braganza. He refused nomination to the archbishopric of Goa, but he was eventually nominated bishop of Coimbra in 1662 by the regent who had previously endowed Corpo Santo when it needed expansion. He died as bishop-elect and was buried in Corpo Santo, where a slab bearing his inscription is preserved despite the 1755 earthquake. Both his foundations survive to the present day. His Latin history of the Geraldines was published in 1655, Initium, incrementum et exitus Geraldinorum, with an appendix on religious persecution in 17th-century Ireland. The work, though slight, has merit and was translated into French by Abbé Joubert in 1697 and into English by C. P. Meehan, Dublin, 1847.

Bibliography: D. O'DALY, History of the Geraldines, tr. C. P. MEEHAN (2d ed. Dublin 1878); MSS in Bom Sucesso Convent, and in National Archives, Lisbon. T. DE BURGO, Hibernia Dominicana (Kilkenny 1762). M. A. O'CONNELL, For Faith and Fatherland (Dublin 1888). E. PRESTAGE, The Diplomatic Relations of Portugal with France, England, and Holland from 1640 to 1688 (Watford 1925); Frei Domingos do Rosário (D. O'Daly) diplomata e politico (Coimbra 1926).

[M. B. MACCARTAIN]

O'DANIEL, VICTOR FRANCIS

Educator, historian; b. Cecilville, Ky., Feb. 15, 1868; d. Washington, D.C., June 12, 1960. His parents, Richard

Jefferson and Sarah Ann (Hamilton) O'Daniel, sent him to public and parochial schools near Cecilville. He then studied at St. Rose Priory, Springfield, Ky., where he entered the Order of Preachers on March 21, 1886, and at St. Joseph's Priory, Somerset, Ohio. After ordination on June 16, 1891, at Columbus, Ohio, he took further studies in theology (1893–95) at the Dominican house of studies at Louvain, Belgium, and received the lectorate in theology. Upon returning to the United States, he was professor of theology at St. Rose's and St. Joseph's priories (1895–1901), and at the Dominican houses of study in Benicia, Calif. (1901–06) and Washington, D.C. (1906–13). He held the office of novice master for various periods during his teaching career.

As first archivist of St. Joseph's province, a post he held from 1907 to 1960, O'Daniel organized the Dominican archives in Washington, assembling a valuable collection of materials, much of which would otherwise have been lost. In 1909, when the order awarded him a master's degree in theology, he did extensive research in Europe, especially in the Dominican archives in Rome. He devoted himself exclusively to historical work after 1913. In 1915, with Peter GUILDAY, he was cofounder of the Catholic Historical Review and was an associate editor from 1921 to 1927. In addition to the historical studies which he wrote for this journal, O'Daniel's works include The Dominican Province of St. Joseph: Historical-Biographical Studies (1930), The Dominicans in Early Florida (1942), and biographies of such Dominicans as Edward D. Fenwick, Charles H. McKenna, and Richard Pius Miles.

Bibliography: W. ROMIG, ed., The Book of Catholic Authors 4th ser. (Grosse Pointe, Mich. 1947). "V. F. O'Daniel," Domini-cana 26 (1941) 111–112, 237–243; 45 (1960) 283–284.

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH]

ODDI, DIEGO, BL.

Baptized Giuseppe; Franciscan lay brother; b. June 6, 1839, Vallinfreda near Rome; d. June 3, 1919, Bellegra, Italy. Born into a poor family, Giuseppe Oddi labored in the fields rather than attend school. At age twenty, he felt a mysterious spiritual calling and responded by praying each evening before the Blessed Sacrament. Shortly thereafter (1860) he made a pilgrimage to the Bellegra (Rome) hermitage of St. Francis of Assisi, where he was deeply impressed by the prayer life of the brothers. He returned in 1864 and was met by Mariano da ROCCACASALE (1778–1866; beatified with Oddi), who helped Oddi discern his vocation. Overcoming his parents' objections, Oddi entered the friary at Bellegra as a tertiary oblate (1871), but later professed solemn vows (1889). During his forty years as a brother, he begged alms throughout the Subiaco region. A miracle attributed to Brother Diego's intercession was approved April 6, 1998, leading to his beatification by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 3, 1999.

Feast: June 6 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 19 (1999): 965. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 40 (1999): 1–3; 41 (1999): 2.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ODERISIUS, BL.

Abbot and cardinal; d. Dec. 2, 1104. He was descended from the family of the counts of Marsi, educated at the Abbey of MONTE CASSINO under Abbot Richer (d. 1055), and created cardinal in 1059. He served as prior of Monte Cassino under Abbot Desiderius, later Pope VICTOR III, and succeeded him as abbot in 1087. Oderisius governed Monte Cassino in the same spirit as his predecessor and completed the great buildings that Desiderius had begun. He became involved in Byzantine-German politics, but apparently without prejudice to his primary loyalty to the apostolic see. An author himself, Oderisius was a friend of scholarship and encouraged LEO MARSI-CANUS to begin his chronicle.

Feast: Dec. 2.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 7:912. L. TOSTI, Storia della badia di Monte-Cassino, 3 v. (Rome 1842–43) 2:4–23. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:384–385. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1095–96.

[B. D. HILL]

O'DEVANY, CONOR, BL.

Bishop of Down and Connor, martyr; b. c. 1553; d. Dublin, Feb. 11, 1612. He entered the Franciscan Friary of Donegal (date unknown) and was consecrated bishop of Down and Connor Feb. 1, 1583. In 1587 O'Devany (or Conor) was one of the Irish prelates who met in the Diocese of Clogher, where the decrees of the Council of Trent were promulgated. In 1588 he was arrested and confined in Dublin Castle, but two years later he was released by W. Fitzwilliam, the lord deputy, since "the law at present does not authorize the execution of the prisoner and the only charge against him is the exercise of spiritual authority." In 1591 he was granted special ecclesiastical faculties by Cardinal William ALLEN because of his piety and zeal. He also collected materials on the lives of those who were persecuted for the faith. These were later included in the Analecta nova et mira by David Rothe, Bishop of Ossory from 1617 to 1619 (ed. P. Moran, Dublin 1884). In 1605 O'Devany was accused by spies of visiting the pope and the king of Spain at the request of Hugh O'Neill, and was again arrested and imprisoned. There he remained until his trial for high treason in 1611. Found guilty, he was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. Two ministers accompanied the bishop to the scaffold, offering him bribes if he would renounce his faith. There he was executed together with a secular priest, Patrick O'Loughran (see IRISH CONFESSORS AND MARTYRS). O'Devany was beatified on Sept. 27, 1992.

Bibliography: J. T. GILBERT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 14:864–865. D. MURPHY, Our Martyrs (Dublin 1896), bibliog.

[L. MCKEOWN]

ODILIA, ST.

Abbess and patroness of Alsace, also called Adilia, Othilia, Otilia; b. c. 660; d. c. 720. The daughter of Atlich (d. c. 700), duke of Alsace, Odilia was first abbess of the convent of Hohenburg (MONT SAINTE-ODILE) and foundress of Niedermünster. According to a 10th-century vita of questionable reliability, written probably at Mont Sainte-Odile (Odilienberg), she was born blind and taken secretly to a convent, possibly Baume-les-Dames, to escape the wrath of her father. It is reported that she miraculously received her sight when St. ERHARD baptized her, and this extraordinary incident accounts for the portrayal of the saint holding a book on which two eyes are lying. Her cult is very old and widespread; her name was inserted into the Litany of All Saints as early as the ninth century. Odilia is invoked as the patroness of those afflicted with diseases of the eye, and the collect of the Mass for her feast day likewise recalls the saint's cure from blindness and prays that through Odilia's intercession the faithful may turn their eyes from earthly vanity to God.

Feast: Dec. 13.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 6:24–50. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:424–427. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:551–553. M. COENS, Analecta Bollandiana 54 (1936) 20, 27; 55 (1937) 68. A. BURG, Histoire de l'Église d'Alsace (Colmar 1946). A. SCHÜTTE, Handbuch der deutschen Heiligen (Cologne 1941) 272. J. BILLING, Die Heiligen der Diözese Strassburg (Colmar 1957) 25–31. C. RIFFENACH and F. ALLEMANN, Odile d'Alsace (Strasbourg 1985). L. MANCINELLI, Il miracolo di Santa Odilia (Turin 1989). G. TRENDEL and M. VOGT, Le Mont Sainte-Odile, trange et sacr. (Strasbourg 1992). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 12: 413–417. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 3:999–1003.

[H. DRESSLER]

ODILO OF CLUNY, ST.

Fifth abbot of Cluny; b. Auvergne, France, 962; d. Abbey of Souvigny, Jan. 1, 1049. He was a member of the Mercoeur family who became a cleric at Saint-Julien in Brioude and later requested the monastic habit at CLUNY, which at that time was governed by (St.) MAJOLUS OF CLUNY, fourth abbot there. Odilo, chosen by Majolus as coadjutor in 991, was the acting abbot by 994 and showed immediately his outstanding qualities of leadership and organization. His 50 years as abbot (999–1049) were characterized by an ever-growing number of Cluniac daughter houses and properties grouped into an “order” under his firm authority (see CLUNIAC REFORM). This formation of an “order” was one of the consequences of EXEMPTION, for Cluny centralized under itself all monasteries that had received the privilege of temporal immunity and exemption from episcopal power granted by GREGORY V in 998 or 999, and confirmed by Pope JOHN XIX in 1027. The papacy always upheld the monks of Cluny in any resulting conflicts of jurisdiction, for it recognized clearly the importance of monasticism in strengthening papal authority, in fighting SIMONY (see GREGORIAN REFORM), and in spreading Christianity, e.g., in Spain.

Odilo's diplomatic activity is well known. He received the imperial insignia from Emperor HENRY II, to whom he had been counselor since 1002. Cluny listed Henry in the necrology of the abbey after the emperor's death in 1024. Odilo was equally loyal to the Capetian monarchy; he was able to be the mediator between Emperor CONRAD II and the king of France, Robert II, in 1025. Such political activity shows that Cluny and its abbots were not basically opposed to seignorialism, even if relations between Odilo and Emperor Henry III were less than cordial.

About 1030 to 1031 the abbot established the commemoration of ALL SOULS' DAY for his own monastery and dependent houses. This was later adopted by the universal Church. In 1041 Odilo favored the extension of the Truce of God. He was always concerned with helping the poor, going so far as to sell the holy treasures of the monastery during a famine in 1033. Odilo pursued the building of Cluny to such an extent that his biographer

Jotsaldus [ed. F. Ermini, Studi medievali 1 (1928) 401–405] wrote that he had “renewed everything at Cluny except the walls of the church” (see CLUNIAC ART AND ARCHITECTURE). About 1042 the abbey was inhabited by about 75 religious.

His writings include Vita S. Maioli (Marrier-Duchesne, 279–290; Patrologia Latina 142:943–962), Epitaphium Adalheidae (Marrier-Duchesne, 353–369; Monumenta Germaniae Historica Scriptores 4:633–645), letters (Marrier-Duchesne, 349–354; Patrologia Latina 142: 939–944), sermons (Marrier-Duchesne, 371–408; Patrologia Latina 142: 991–1036), and Medicina spiritualis contra temptationem concupiscentiae carnalis (ed. G. Morin, Revue Bénédictine 16 [1899] 477–478). He wrote also a hymn in honor of St. Majolus, Maiolus pater inclitus (ed. G. Morin, Revue Bénédictine 38 [1926] 56). Other hymns are found in Patrologia Latina 142:961–964 and Analecta hymnica 50 (1907) 297–301; several fragments are in Patrologia Latina 142:1035–38.

Odilo died after one of his numerous trips to Italy, and was succeeded by HUGH OF CLUNY. He was canonized in 1063.

Feast: Jan. 1 (French Benedictines); April 29 (general).

Bibliography: Works. Bibliotheca cluniacensis, ed. M. MARRIER and A. DUCHESNE (Paris 1614; repr. Mâcon 1915). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90). A. BRUEL, ed., Recueil des chartes de l'abbaye de Cluny, 6 v. (Paris 1876–1903) 3:190–821; 4:1–174, 825–827. Literature. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–13), 2:138–142. B. BLIGNY, L'Église et les ordres religieux dans le royaume de Bourgogne aux XI<sup>e</sup> et XII<sup>e</sup> siècles (Grenoble 1960). J. HOURLIER, Saint Odilon, abbé de Cluny (Louvain 1964). P. CHAUDAGNE, Saint Odilon (Souvigny 1972).

[R. GRÉGOIRE]

ODIN, JOHN MARY

U.S. missionary bishop; b. Ambierle, France, Feb. 25, 1801; d. there, May 25, 1870. He was the seventh of ten children born of Jean and Claudine (Seyrol) Odin. After some preliminary schooling with a priest uncle in Nosilly, he pursued studies at the colleges of L'Argentière and Alix. While in the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Lyons, he heard of the need for priests in Louisiana from a missionary bishop, Louis William DUBOURG. At 22, as a subdeacon, he came to the Mississippi Valley, entered the seminary at the Barrens near St. Louis, Mo., and joined the Congregation of the Mission. Having completed his novitiate, he was ordained by Bishop Dubourg on May 4, 1823. The young priest engaged in missionary work in Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas. He also served as professor and president of the Barrens seminary, pastor at Cape Girardeau, and theologian at the Second Provincial Council of Baltimore. At 40, he was appointed vice prefect to Very Rev. John TIMON, CM, in Texas. Odin won the esteem of the Texans; during the first session of the fifth congress of the Texas Republic, the legislature requested him to act as chaplain of the senate. On April 16, 1841, he received a brief appointing him titular bishop of Claudiopolis and coadjutor-administrator of the American Northwest with see in Detroit. On the advice of Timon, he declined and returned the bulls to Rome. By briefs dated July 16, 1841, Gregory XVI raised Texas from prefecture to vicariate apostolic, confirmed Odin in the See of Claudiopolis, and named him vicar apostolic in Texas. Bishop Antoine Blanc consecrated him in St. Louis Cathedral, New Orleans. Following the Baltimore Council of 1846, the former Republic of Texas became a diocese with Galveston as the see city. Odin, the first bishop, consecrated St. Mary's Cathedral there on Nov. 26, 1848. In 1852 he reported that his diocese had 25 priests serving 30 churches and twice as many mission stations. Nine years later, before leaving for New Orleans, he showed on his inventory 46 churches and 46 priests, including the Oblates of Mary Immaculate whom he had brought to the diocese.

The Mexican War was fought while Odin was ordinary in Texas; the Civil War was raging when he arrived as archbishop in New Orleans (see NEW ORLEANS, ARCHDIOCESE OF). Despite war and Reconstruction, he managed to continue the work of his predecessor, Archbishop Blanc, and to expand it by inviting six communities of men and women to the archdiocese. He was particularly successful in recruiting clerics while he was on a trip to Europe during the height of the Civil War and, despite the blockade of New Orleans, personally escorted nearly 50 priests and seminarians who had volunteered to labor in Louisiana and Texas. Odin had chartered for their transportation a passenger ship, the Ste. Genevieve, which was nicknamed "the floating seminary," and which landed at New Orleans on Good Friday, April 3, 1863. Although considerate of his priests in both Texas and Louisiana, he was regarded as a strict disciplinarian. He held synods in the two dioceses over which he presided. From the content of these synodal regulations and from the tenor of his pastoral letters, it is evident that he countenanced no abuses of ecclesiastical discipline and dealt promptly with infractions. During the Civil War, Odin was the Holy Father's contact in the South, as Abp. John Hughes was intermediary in the North. Odin's problems following the war were aggravated by the attitude of priests and people toward African Americans, who, as slaves, had been admitted to churches and the Sacraments but who, once freed, were made to feel less than welcome at services. The archbishop promptly appealed to various religious communities to assign men and women religious for special ministrations to blacks and for the education of their children, but antipathy was so intense that none heeded his request until 1867 when St. Joseph's School in Convent, La., was opened under the auspices of the Religious of the Sacred Heart. Another aftermath of the war was the closing of the diocesan seminary in Faubourg Bouligny because of lack of funds.

Odin accepted the invitation of Pius IX to attend the 18th centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter in 1867 and in 1869–70 Vatican Council I. Prior to the latter event, the archbishop had asked for a coadjutor and on May 1, 1870, Napoleon Joseph Perché, his vicar-general, was consecrated in St. Louis Cathedral. Less than a month later, having left Rome because of the precarious condition of his health, Odin died.

Bibliography: J. D. G. SHEA, A History of the Catholic Church within the Limits of the United States, 4 v. (New York 1886–92) v.4. M. A. FITZMORRIS, Four Decades of Catholicism in Texas, 1820–1860 (Washington 1926).

[H. C. BEZOU]

ODO OF CAMBRAI, BL.

Also known as Odo of Tournai, bishop, philosopher, and theologian whose teaching at Toul and Tournai gave a new impetus to realism; b. Orléans, France, 1050; d. Abbey of Anchin, near Arras, June 19, 1113. He was chosen bishop of Cambrai in 1095. He introduced the CLUNIAN REFORM into his monastery of SAINT-MARTIN at Tournai. His principal work, De peccato originali, used an exaggerated realism to explain the transmission of original sin. Other extant writings, theological in nature, include a treatise on the Canon of the Mass, a dialogue with a Jew adducing philosophical reasons for Christ's coming, a short treatise on final impenitence, and a Gospel harmony.

Feast: June 19.

Bibliography: F. LABIS, "Le Bx. Odon, évêque de Cambrai . . .," Revue Catholique de Louvain 14 (1856) 445–460, 519–526, 574–585. M. DE WULF, Histoire de la philosophie en Belgique (Brussels 1910) 24–32. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 11.1:931–935. C. DEREINE, "O. de Tournai et la crise du cénobitisme au XI<sup>e</sup> siècle," Revue du moyen-âge latin 4 (1948) 137–154. T. GREGORY, "La Dottrina del peccato originale e il realismo platonico: O. di T.," Platonismo medievale: Studi e Ricerche (Rome 1958) 31–51.

[M. I. J. ROUSSEAU]

ODO (ODA) OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Archbishop of CANTERBURY; d. June 2, 958. Odo, called "the Good," was born of pagan Danish parents but brought up by a thane of King ALFRED. King Athelstan made him bishop of Ramsbury in 927 and employed him as ambassador to Hugh Capet, duke of the Franks. In 942 King Edmund offered him the See of Canterbury, which he accepted only after receiving the Benedictine habit from Fleury. As archbishop he restored Elmham as a separate bishopric for East Anglia, ordered his bishops to make annual visitations of their dioceses, and made the building of parish churches part of his church reform. He ordered ten chapters dealing with morals and ecclesiastical discipline to be drawn up. Although not enacted by a synod, "Odo's Chapters are the only 10th-century ordinances of the same category as synodal acts and related sources." The Chapters are drawn largely from the Legatine Councils of 786. Odo also encouraged Frithegode to write a metrical Life of St. Wilfrid of York. Odo's cult was observed at Canterbury, where his name appears in calendars of Christ Church (Henry Bradshaw Society 72: 175; 77:73).

Feast: July 4 (formerly June 2).

Bibliography: Sources. G. SCHOEBE, "The Chapters of Archbishop Oda (942/6) and the Canons of the Legatine Councils of 786," Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 35 (1962) 75–83. EADMER of CANTERBURY, Vita sancti Odonis, Patrologia Latina 133:933–944 (erroneously ascribed to Osbern of Canterbury). "Vita sancti Oswaldi" in The Historians of the Church of York and Its Archbishops, ed. J. RAINE (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores) 71.1:399–475. WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, Gesta pontificum anglorum, ed. N. E. S. A. HAMILTON (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores) 52:20–24, 30, 248. Literature. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 14:866–868. R. R. DARLINGTON, "Ecclesiastical Reform in the Late Old English Period," English Historical Review 51 (1936) 385–428. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 342, 352–353, 360–362, 431, 442. M. DEANESLY, The Pre-Conquest Church in England (New York 1961). R. W. SOUTH-ERN, Saint Anselm and His Biographer (New York 1963).

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

ODO OF CHÂTEAUROUX

French cardinal, known also as Odo de Castro Radulphi; b. Champagne c. 1208; d. Orvieto, Jan. 26, 1273. He studied at the University of Paris where he became a master in theology in 1230 and where he undoubtedly taught for some time. In 1234 he was a canon of Paris; in 1238 he was promoted to the chancellorship of the University, but resigned in order to enter the CISTERCIANS at Grandselve. Innocent IV named him to succeed JACQUES DE VITRY as cardinal bishop of Frascati in 1244, and in October 1245 he went to France as papal legate to preach the Sixth CRUSADE. While there he condemned John of Brescia's theses on light (Dec. 21, 1247) and the Talmud (May 15, 1248). He was a great friend of King LOUIS IX and during the Crusade (1248–54) accompanied him to Egypt and Palestine where Odo was able to pacify the quarrels of the Frankish lords. Back in Italy by 1254 he presided at Anagni (July 1255) over the commission examining the Liber introductorius in evangelium eternum written by Gerard de Borgo San Donnino, a work subsequently condemned by Alexander IV. He was sent as legate to Limoges in 1264 but lived most of the rest of his life in Italy. Many sermons and theological works are attributed to Odo. Although it is doubtful that he wrote either a commentary on Jeremiah or the Conciones et homiliae de tempore et de sanctis, he is credited with a letter written at Cyprus in 1249, which is a kind of journal of the Crusade. Odo's fame derives more from his active life than from his writings.

Bibliography: Sources. Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis 1:202–211. J. B. PITRA, Analecta novissima spicilegii Solesmensis, 2 v. (Paris 1885–88) 2:188–343. F. GRATIEN, "Sermons franciscains . . .," Études franciscaines 29 (1913) 171–195, 647–655. A. WALZ, "Odonis de Castro Radulphi . . . sermones sex . . .," Analecta Sacri Ordinis Praedicatorum 17 (1925–26) 174–223. M. M. DAVY, ed., Les Sermons universitaires . . . (Paris 1931). J. LECLERCQ, "Le Sermon sur la royauté . . .," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 18 (1943) 143–180. Literature. P. C. F. DAUNOU, Histoire littéraire de la France 19:228–232. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.1:935–936. P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle 1:304–311. M. M. LEBRETON, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 4.2:1675–78.

[É. BROUETTE]

ODO OF CLUNY, ST.

Second abbot of Cluny; b. Aquitaine, c. 879; d. Tours, Nov. 18, 942. He was the son of Ebbo I, Lord of Déols, who dedicated him to St. MARTIN OF TOURS. Odo received his early education at the court of Duke William of Aquitaine and then studied the liberal arts at Tours and at Paris under REMIGIUS OF AUXERRE. After having received the tonsure at 19, Odo lived an austere and industrious life as canon of St. Martin of Tours. Under the direction of Bl. BERNO, he became a monk at Baume, a Cluniac monastery, where he was a master at the age of 30. His humility won the confidence of Berno, first abbot of CLUNY, who had him ordained, and then in 927 elected as his successor as abbot of Cluny. While abbot, Odo received 188 deeds of donation. By March 931 Pope JOHN XI granted Cluny the privilege of exemption and authorized Odo to reform so many monasteries in Gaul and Italy that the medieval chronicler FLODOARD OF REIMS called Odo “the restorer of monasteries and of the Holy Rule.” Odo was the initiator of the Cluniac monastic observance, the ordo cluniacensis (see CLUNIAC REFORM). Struck by the deplorable state of the Church in his day, Odo insisted upon the value of the monastic life to the Church: the “apostolic life” of the monks was a continuation of the renewal and purification begun at Pentecost. Both LEO VII in 936 and 939, and STEPHEN VIII in 941, entrusted him with the peace negotiations in those Italian conflicts that involved the interest of the Roman Church. Odo fell sick in Rome and returned to Tours where he died, having already designated Aymard as his successor at Cluny. Odo’s relics are kept at l’Isle-Jourdain (Gers). His literary work includes the Moralia in Job, a résumé of the Moralia of Gregory I the Great [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878–90) 133:107–152]; Collationes, conferences or lectures where Odo’s patristic and humanistic culture is particularly apparent (Patrologia Latina 133:517–638); Occupatio, a poem in seven books, which is a meditation on sacred history (ed. A. Svoboda, Leipzig 1900); Vita s. Geraldi Auriliacensis comitis (Patrologia Latina 133:639–704); and the Vita Gregorii Turonensis episcopi (Patrologia Latina 133:513–516). He wrote 12 anthems and four hymns in honor of St. Martin, as well as the hymn De corpore Christi [Patrologia Latina 133:513–516, Analecta Hymnica 50 (Leipzig 1907) 265–270]. The musical works attributed to Odo (Patrologia Latina 133:755–816) are probably apocryphal.

Feast: Nov. 18 (French Benedictine Congregation), April 29 (Benedictine Order).

Bibliography: Sources. M. MARRIER and A. DUCHESNE, eds., Bibliotheca cluniacensis (Paris 1614; repr. 1915). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ (Paris 1878–90) 133:9–816. A. BRUEL, ed., Recueil des chartes de l’abbaye de Cluny, 6 v. (Paris 1876–1903) 1:278–530; 5:844–845. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi (Madrid 1949–61) v.4 6117–20. Literature. J. H. PIGNOT, Histoire de l’Ordre de Cluny, 3 v. (Autun 1868) v.1. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 2:20–27. J. LECLERCQ, “L’Idéal monastique de saint O. d’après ses oeuvres,” À Cluny: Congrès scientifique (Dijon 1950) 227–232. P. THOMAS, “Saint O. de Cluny et son oeuvre musicale,” ibid. 171–180. J. LAPORTE, “Saint O., disciple de saint Grégoire le Grand,” ibid. 138–143. JOHN OF SALERNO, St. O. of Cluny, tr. and ed. G. SITWELL (New York 1958). J. SEMMLER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7:1100–01. M. HUGLO, “Odo” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 13, ed. S. SADIE, 503 (New York 1980). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music 647 (Cambridge 1996). N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition 1329 (New York 1992).

[R. GRÉGOIRE]

Miniature of St. Odo of Cluny, 10th-century manuscript, Austrian National Library, Vienna (Cod. 51, fol. 45v.).

ODO RIGALDUS

Theologian; b. near Paris (date unknown); d. Rouen, July 2, 1275. He joined the Franciscan Order c. 1236, and studied at the University of Paris from 1240–41 to 1245; in this latter year on the death of John de la Rochelle he succeeded him as regent. Rigaldus commented on the Sentences of Peter Lombard and on at least 15 disputed theological questions. Only Books 1, 2, and 3 of the Commentary are authentic, Bruxelles Bibl. Roy. 1542 and Troyes Bibl. Comm. 1862 being spurious. As a student of theology he had collaborated with Alexander of Hales, John de la Rochelle, and Robert de la Basée on an exposition of the Franciscan Rule, which has become known as the Expositio Regulae Quatuor Magistrorum. His other writings remain substantially unedited.

Upon his election to the See of Rouen he was consecrated by Innocent IV at Lyons, April 26, 1248. He was a favorite of Louis, King of France, and was a collaborator on the Treaty with England in 1258. He worked actively with Bonaventure at the Council of Lyons (1274) for the return of the Greeks. An important document, the Regestrum visitationum, gives an account of his episcopal activity as metropolitan from July 17, 1248, to Dec. 15, 1269. His intellectual stature has become recognized recently as modern theologians rank him among the superior minds of the mid-13th century.

Bibliography: R. MÉNINDES, "Eudes Rigaud, Frère Mineur," Revue d'histoire Franciscaine 8 (1931) 157–178. P. ANDRIEU-GUITRANCOURT, L'Archevêque Eudes Rigaud et la vie de l'Église aux XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, d'après le Regestrum Visitationum (Paris 1938). F. M. HENGUINET, "Les Manuscrits et l'influence des écrits théologiques d'Eudes Rigaud, O.F.M.," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 11 (Louvain 1939) 324–350. K. F. LYNCH, "The Alleged Fourth Book of Odo Rigaud on the Sentences and Related Documents," Franciscan Studies 9 (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1949) 87–145. S. BROWN, "Note biographique sur Eudes Rigaud," Le moyen-âge 41 (1931) 167–194. The Register of Eudes of Rouen, tr. S. BROWN, ed. J. O'SULLIVAN (New York 1964). C. CHENEY, Episcopal Visitation (Philadelphia 1983). O. G. DARLINGTON, The Travels of Odo Rigaud (Philadelphia 1940). J. BOUVY, "Les questions sur la grace dans le Commentaire des Sentences d'Odon Rigaud," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 27 (Louvain 1960) 291–343; "La nécessité de la grace dans le Commentaire des Sentences d'Odon Rigaud," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 28 (Louvain 1961) 59–96. W. H. PRINCIPE, "O.R. as a Precursor of St. Bonaventure on the Holy Spirit as 'Effectus Formalis' in the Mutual Love of the Father and Son," Medieval Studies 39 (1977) 498–505. L. SILEO, Teoria della scienza teologica: Quaestio de scientia theologiae di Odo Rigaldi e altri testi inediti (1230–1250), 2 v. (Studia Antoniana 27; Rome 1984).

[K. F. LYNCH]

O'DONNELL, EDMUND

First Jesuit martyred by the English government; b. Limerick, Ireland, 1542; d. Cork, Oct. 25, 1572. He entered the Society of Jesus in Rome in 1561. After studies in Loreto and Florence, he was sent to Flanders for his health. He returned to Limerick in 1564 to teach in the school established by David Woulfe, SJ. The school was dispersed in 1568, and O'Donnell stayed with his family until January of 1570, when he left for Madrid to raise funds for Woulfe's release from prison. In 1570 he returned to Ireland with the money but left again for the Iberian Peninsula sometime later. Although his journeys were undertaken in behalf of Woulfe, there is some evidence that he must also have acted as courier in bringing to James Fitzmaurice the bull of Pius V excommunicating Elizabeth. On his last return to Ireland, he was arrested on the warrant of Thomas FitzJohn Arthur, a Catholic, and was tried, condemned, and then executed with great barbarity on Oct. 25, 1572. That O'Donnell was in minor orders at the time of his death is clear from the appeal of Arthur to Rome for absolution from the censure he had incurred. Arthur also stated that O'Donnell was unjustly condemned.

See Also: IRISH CONFESSORS AND MARTYRS.

Bibliography: Archives, Society of Jesus, Rome. E. HOGAN, Distinguished Irishmen of the 16th Century (Dublin 1896). D. MURPHY, Our Martyrs (Dublin 1896).

[F. FINEGAN]

O'DONNELL, HUGH ROE

Ruler of the autonomous Irish state of Tír Chonaill and principal ally of Hugh O'NEILL in the Catholic Confederates' War (1594–1603); b. Ballyshannon?, Donegal, Oct. 29, 1572; d. Simancas, Spain, Sept. 10, 1602. He was kidnapped in an English stratagem in October of 1587, but he escaped from Dublin Castle Jan. 5, 1592 and was inaugurated as "Ó Domhnaill" on April 23, 1592. He ejected the English from the Franciscan Abbey of Donegal and maintained almost continual warfare against Elizabeth I. O'Neill joined him openly in 1595. His expeditions into Connacht in 1596 and 1597 opened communications with Western chiefs for conjunction with the Ulster insurgents and facilitated their joint victory of the Yellow Ford on Aug. 14, 1598; this victory encouraged the Southern chiefs to join the Confederation. His victory of the Curlews on Aug. 15, 1599 contributed to the frustration of Lord Deputy Essex's campaign. He preceded O'Neill in marching (November 1601) to support the Spaniards besieged in Kinsale. After the Irish defeat there (December 1601), he sailed to Spain to petition Philip III for reinforcements. Disappointed, he sickened and died at Simancas. His death hastened the end of Irish military resistance; his brother Ruaidhrí submitted in December of 1602, O'Neill, on March 23, 1603. However, the lengthy war deferred general persecution of Irish Catholics and allowed time for reinforcements to their clergy from their new continental seminaries.

Bibliography: L. Ó CLÉRIGH, The Life of Aodh Ruadh Ó Domhnaill, transcribed by P. WALSH, 2 v. (Irish Texts Society 42, 45; Dublin 1948–57).

[J. HURLEY]

ODORIC OF PORDENONE, BL.

Franciscan missionary also known as Odericus; b. Pordenone, Italy, c. 1265; d. Udine, Italy, Jan. 14, 1311. He entered the FRANCISCAN order at Udine c. 1280 and was ordained a priest some ten years later. In 1296 he began his remarkable career as a world missionary, which lasted about 35 years. For more than a decade and a half he was engaged in missionary work with other Franciscans in the MONGOL Khanate of Kipchak in southern Russia and probably also on the Balkan Peninsula. For a short time he returned to Italy, but in 1314 he set sail from Venice for the Near East. During the next eight years he did missionary work in the three Franciscan custodies of Constantinople, Trebizond (Asia Minor, present-day Turkey), and Tabriz (Persia, present-day Iran). From Sultaniyeh in northern Persia he set out in 1322 with an Irish confrere, Friar James, for the Far East in order to join Archbishop JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO in Cathay (northern China). After traveling through southern Persia, northern Arabia, and Chaldea (Iraq), he sailed from Hormuz in the Persian Gulf. At Thana, near Bombay, he recovered the relics of THOMAS OF TOLENTINO and his three companions, who had been martyred there about two years earlier. After visiting both the Malabar and the Coromandel coasts of India, he set sail from Quilon and stopped at the islands of Sumatra, Java, and probably Borneo, but by way of Cochin China and Great Nicobar Island. He had to return to Ceylon to get a ship to take him to Guangzhou, China. After arriving there in the latter part of 1324, he traveled overland to the capital in the north. At Zaitun (present Quanzhou) he stayed for a while with Bishop Andrew of Perugia (fl. 1307–26) and his Franciscan confreres, who had two churches in the city. On the northward journey he visited Fuzhou, Hangzhou, Nanjing, and Yangzhou, finding at Yangzhou another Franciscan mission center. In 1325 he finally reached Khanbaliq, or Cambaluc, (modern-day Beijing), and for three years he assisted Archbishop John of Monte Corvino and the other Franciscans working in the capital. Shortly before the archbishop's death in 1328, Odoric was commissioned to go back to Europe to recruit new missionaries for China. He made the return journey overland through the vassal kingdom of Tenduk (present-day provinces Shanxi, Shaanxi, and Gansu), where he found a church at T'o-k'o-t'o, built by King George, a convert of Monte Corvino. Though he mentions Tibet, he did not visit that country but continued through Almalyk, near Kuldja (present-day Yining) in Xinjiang, the western gateway of China, where seven Franciscans later died (1339) as the first martyrs of China. Then traveling through Chinese Turkestan and central Asia, around the Caspian Sea, to Persia, Iraq, Syria, and probably Palestine, he reached Venice at the end of 1329 or beginning of 1330. He set out for Avignon to see Pope JOHN XXII, but he fell ill in Pisa and returned to Udine by way of Padua, where he dictated his famous journal in May of 1330. The journal was one of the most famous travel books of the Middle Ages, and it was plagiarized by the author of The Travels of Sir John Mandeville. The cult of Bl. Odoric was approved by BENEDICT XIV on July 2, 1775. Odoric is venerated as the patron of the Chinese missions and also of long-distance travelers. The best edition of his journal is that published by A. Van den Wyngaert, OFM, in Sinica Franciscana (Quaracchi 1929)

1:413–495, and the best account of his life is in the accompanying introduction and notes.

Feast: Jan. 14 (formerly 12) (Conventual Franciscans).

Bibliography: Sources. Eng. tr. of journal in Cathay and the Way Thither, ed. and tr. H. YULE, 2 v. (London 1866); Ital. tr. Relazione del viaggio in Oriente e in Cina, ed. Camera di commercio, industria, artigianato e agricoltura, (Pordenone 1982); Germ. tr. Der Bericht des Odoric da Pordenone über seine Reise nach Asien, tr. R. JANDESEK (Bamberg 1987); Fr. tr. Les merveilles de la terre d'outremer: traduction du XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle du récit de voyage d'Odoric de Pordenone, tr. J. DE VIGNAY, ed. D. A. TROTTER (Exeter, Eng. 1990). Literature. M. GNAUCK, Odorich von Pordenone, ein Orientreisender des 14. Jahrhunderts (Leisnig 1895). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901) 6303–6316. H. CORDIER, Les Voyages en Asie, au XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle, du bienheureux frère O. de Pordenone (Paris 1891). G. GOLUBOVICH, "Il B. Fr. Odorico da Pordenone, O.F.M.," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 10 (1917): 17–46. D. SCHILLING, "War der sel. Odorich von Pordenone in Japan?" ibid. 35 (1942): 153–176. G. PULLÉ, Viaggio del beato Odorico da Pordenone (Milan 1931). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:88–89. M. A. HABIG, In Journeyings Often (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1953) 80–108. A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:942–947.

[M. A. HÀBIG]

ODYSSEUS

Of all the characters created by Homer, Odysseus, or Ulysses, as he is called in the Latin tradition, has had the longest life and the most varied fortunes. From the 6th century B.C. the mental and moral flexibility of Odysseus was viewed unfavorably, and the tradition of Odysseus as a symbol of deceit was established. However, Stoic and Cynic emphasis on his manliness and resourcefulness in overcoming evil forces led to a restoration of his Homeric image and a recognition of his high moral qualities. Vergil reflects the first tradition (Aeneid, bk. 2); and Horace, the second (Epist. 1.2).

Early Christian writers were inclined to follow the second tradition, being impressed in particular, by the story of the meeting of Odysseus and the Phaeacian Princess Nausicaa and, above all, by that of his resistance to the temptations of the Sirens. The voyage of Odysseus became a symbol of the Christian's journey through life; the Sirens, the powers of evil to which he is exposed; his ship, the church; and its mast, the cross of Christ. In one of the stories of the medieval Gesta Romanorum [No. 156, De subversione Troiae, ed. H. Oesterley (Berlin 1872)], Paris represents the devil; Helen, the soul or all mankind held captive by the devil; Troy, hell; Ulysses, Christ; Achilles, the Holy Ghost. The temptation of Odysseus by the Sirens has been used as a theme also in Christian art.

Bibliography: W. B. STANFORD, The Ulysses Theme: A Study in the Adaptability of a Traditional Hero (Oxford 1954); "Studies in the Characterization of Ulysses IV: Ulysses in the Post-Classical Latin Tradition," Hermathena 77 (1951) 52–64. H. RAHNER, Greek Myths and Christian Mystery, tr. B. BATTERSHAW (New York 1963) esp. ch. VII, "Odysseus at the Mast," 328–386. E. WÜST, "Odysseus," Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft 17.2 (1937) 1905–96, esp. 1964–76.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

OECOLAMPADIUS, JOHANNES

Originally Husschyn, Hussgen, or Heussgen, theologian and reformer of Basel; b. Weinsberg in the Palatinate, 1482; d. Basel, Nov. 24, 1531. By 1515, when he first came to Basel after years of education in Bologna, Heidelberg, Stuttgart, and Tübingen, his philological erudition in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew was prodigious. As a proofreader for the publisher Froben, he worked on Erasmus' editions of the New Testament and St. Jerome, and throughout his life he prepared numerous editions and translations of the Greek fathers. In 1520, weary of his ecclesiastical labors, he abruptly entered a Briggitine monastery in Bavaria, only to withdraw just as abruptly two years later. In November of 1522 he returned to Basel and was appointed a professor at the university in 1523. Thereafter, he ceaselessly promoted the cause of reform in the city through extensive lectures and sermons, in the Minster as well as in St. Martin's Church. Elsewhere in Switzerland he promoted it through his publications, notably in the Eucharistic controversy, and his participation in theological disputations such as those in Baden (1526) and Bern (1528), and the Colloquium in Marburg (1529), where he defended the Eucharistic doctrine of his close friend, Huldrych ZWINGLI. After the city council on Feb. 8, 1529, ordered the removal of images and the abolition of the Mass, Oecolampadius directed and supervised the reform of the Basel church until his death, employing the monumental reforming ordinance of April 1, which he prepared.

Bibliography: K. R. HAGENBACH, Johann Oekolampad und Oswald Myconius (Leben und ausgewählte Schriften der Väter und Begründer der reformierten Kirche 2; Elberfeld 1859) 3–306. E. STAEHELIN, Das theologische Lebenswerk Johannes Oekolampads (Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformation-geschichte 21; Leipzig 1939); ed., Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oekolampads, 2 v. (ibid. 10, 19; 1927–34); Oekolampad-Bibliographie (Nieuwkoop, Neth. 1963). L. CRISTIANI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:947–951. H. R. GUGGISBERG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1567–68. E. ISERLOH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1125–26. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 976.

[C. GARSIDÉ, JR.]

OERTEL, JOHN JAMES MAXIMILIAN

Editor; b. Ansbach, Bavaria, Germany, April 27, 1811; d. Jamaica, N.Y., Aug. 21, 1882. He was educated at the University of Erlangen, Germany, before his ordination as a Lutheran minister. Immigrating to New York City in 1837, he led 95 Prussian immigrants to join the Saxon congregations (now Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod) in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1839. Denominational quarrels led to his conversion to Catholicism the following year. He served as an instructor in German at St. John's College, Fordham, New York, before going to Cincinnati, Ohio, as editor of the Wahrheitsfreund. The German-language newspaper Kirchenzeitung, which he founded in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1846, was moved to New York City in 1851 and became the most influential German paper in the U.S. In 1875 Oertel was made a Knight of St. Gregory by Pius IX.

[J. L. MORRISON]

OESTERREICHER, JOHN M.

Pioneer in Catholic-Jewish relations, author, and editor; b. Stadt-Liebau, Moravia, Feb. 2, 1904; d. New Jersey, April 18, 1993. Oesterreicher's parents, both Jewish, died in the Holocaust, as did the priest who baptized him in 1924. Oesterreicher was ordained a priest in 1927 and was named professor of religion by the University of Vienna in 1935. From 1934 to 1938, he edited a Catholic journal, Die Erfuellung ("Fulfillment"), the purpose of which was to denounce Nazi persecution of Jews. When the Germans entered Vienna, Oesterreicher was interrogated by the Gestapo. He fled in April 1939, reaching Paris that September. There, he published Racisme, Antisémisme, Antichristianisme (Paris 1939; New York 1943) and made weekly anti-Nazi radio broadcasts. He fled again in June 1940 across the border into Spain, and eventually arrived in the United States on the SS Exeter on November 12, 1940.

Along with parish work for the Archdiocese of New York, Oesterreicher taught at Manhattanville College from 1944 to 1953. Chief among his articles from that period is a study of the Good Friday prayer, "Pro perfidis Judaeis" [Theological Studies 8 (1947): 85–101], in which he suggested that the term perfidis be translated as "unbelieving" rather than the pejorative "perfidious." In 1948, the Sacred Congregation of Rites, under the signature of Pope Pius XII, mandated this change in translation [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 40:342]. In 1955 the same Congregation restored the rite of flectamus genua (kneeling) to the intercession for the Jewish people [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47:838–47], another change for which Oesterreicher had argued. In 1959, Pope John XXIII eliminated the term perfidis from the Good Friday prayer; following the Second Vatican Council, the prayer was completely revised.

Oesterreicher's book, Walls Are Crumbling: Seven Jewish Philosophers Discover Christ (New York and London 1952) was translated into Dutch (Haarlem 1954), French (Paris 1955), Spanish (Madrid 1961), and Japanese (1969).

On the feast of the Annunciation, March 25, 1953, Oesterreicher signed an agreement with Seton Hall University to establish an Institute of Judeo-Christian Studies, the first such at a major Catholic institution of higher learning. Five "yearbooks" of the Institute, titled The Bridge (New York 1955; 1956; 1958; 1962; 1970), chronicled Jewish-Christian relations before and after the Second Vatican Council.

In 1960, with fourteen other priests, Oesterreicher presented a petition to Augustin Cardinal Bea that the Second Vatican Council consider reconciliation with the Jewish people. In February 1961, he was appointed to the Subcommission for Jewish Questions, which drafted the text of what would become the Conciliar Declaration Nostra Aetate, "On the Church's Relationship to Non-Christian Religions" (Oct. 28, 1965). His "Introduction and Commentary" to the text in H. Vorgrimler, ed., Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II (New York 1969, vol. 3) is considered definitive.

Oesterreicher's prolific writings to 1978 are listed in the festschrift in his honor [A. Finkel and L. Frizzell, eds., Standing before God: Studies on Prayer in Scriptures and Tradition (New York 1981) 393-399] and updated to 1993 in Experiences and Expectations: The Fortieth Anniversary of the Institute of Judeo-Christian Studies (Seton Hall 1993). Major works since then include: Martin Buber and the Christian Way (New York 1986), The New Encounter between Christians and Jews (New York 1986), and God at Auschwitz? (Seton Hall 1993). He served for over two decades as advisor to the U.S. Bishops' Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs. He died on Yom ha-Shoah 5753, Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Bibliography: E. L. EHRlich, "In Memoriam John Oesterreicher (1904-1993)," Orientierung 10 (May 1993) 109-110. J. FILTEAU, "Msgr. Oesterreicher Dies: Pioneered Catholic-Jewish Relations," Catholic News Service (Washington, 20 April 1993) 12-13. L. FRIZZELL, ed., "Homilies and Tributes in Memory of Msgr. John M. Oesterreicher," Institute of Judeo-Christian Studies, Seton Hall University (South Orange 1993). "A Pioneer in Christian-Jewish Dialogue," The Tablet (London 1 May 1993) 557. E. WEINZIERL, "Beginnings of John M. Oesterreicher's Work," in A. FINKEL and L. FRIZZELL, eds., Standing before God (New York 1981) 13-19.

[E. J. FISHER]

OFFICE, ECCLESIASTICAL

According to Lumen gentium 5, the Church received from Jesus Christ the mission of announcing the kingdom of God and inaugurating it among all people. A variety of means exist by which the Church fulfills this mission; one fundamental means is through ecclesiastical office. Ecclesiastical office has existed from the beginning of the Church (see, e.g., von Campenhausen) but the concept has undergone a major transformation since the Second Vatican Council. This transformation, rooted in the theological, and particularly, ecclesiological, insights of Vatican II, allows for greater participation in the Church's mission by all the Christian faithful, ordained or lay.

Theology

The definition of ecclesiastical office as found in the Code of Canon Law (c.145.1) includes three elements: (1) a function—an ability or capacity to perform certain actions tending to a spiritual goal; (2) a stable determination of the range and limits of this function through divine or ecclesiastical ordinance; (3) a spiritual purpose.

First Element. That there must in the nature of things be found some distinction of activities in the Church follows from its constitution by Our Lord as a true society or people (see SOCIETY [THEOLOGY OF]). The Pauline description of the Church as Body of Christ was precisely invoked by him to justify functional differentiations found from the beginning within the community.

Now there are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit; and there are varieties of ministries, but the same Lord; and there are varieties of workings, but the same God, who works all things in all. Now the manifestation of the Spirit is given to everyone for profit. . . . For as the body is one and has many members, and all the members of the body, many as they are, form one body, so also is it with Christ. . . . For the body is not one member, but many. . . . Now if they were all one member, where would the body be? But as it is, there are indeed many members, yet but one body. . . . Now you are the body of Christ, member for member. And God indeed has placed some in the Church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers; after that miracles, then gifts of healing, services of help, power of administration, and the speaking of various tongues. (1 Cor 12.4-29; cf. Rom 12.4-8; Gal. 3.27-28; Eph 4.11-13)

Whether society or Body or vine and branches or kingdom or people or family or household, there must be distribution of activities for the good of the whole.

This division of functions is attested in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church promulgated by Vatican II, when the council states: “As all the members of the human body, though they are many, form one body, so also are the faithful in Christ (cfr. 1 Cor. 12, 12). So in the building up of Christ’s body a diversity of members and functions obtains. There is only one Spirit, who, according to His own richness and the needs of the ministries, gives His different gifts for the welfare of the Church (cfr. 1 Cor. 12, 1–11)” (7; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 [1965] 10).

Second Element. If the first element found in the definition of ecclesiastical office is well attested by appeal to reason and to the sources of revelation, it is not perhaps clear that the second element is necessarily attested: the stable determination of the range and limits of these functions by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance. Could it not be that Our Lord intended to bestow functions on a quite temporary basis through a transitory energizing of one or other within the community so that he who today speaks in tongues tomorrow interprets, and he who today prophesies tomorrow is endowed with no special function at all? To the Catholic mind this question is answered not so much by an appeal to the unlikelihood or unnaturalness of such a disposition in an enduring group, or to the confusion and disorder that would so easily result, but by an appeal to the evident intention of Christ in creating the original apostolate. The Catholic view has always been that Christ selected and separated, prepared and instructed the TWELVE to bear His Person and continue His salvific action, not only through their lifetime but until He should come again.

The history of the first age portrays a community in which the permanent apostolic function is of paramount significance. The same Paul who readily enough admits the divine provenance, the legitimacy, of CHARISMS peremptorily by reason of his apostolic mandate regulates and restrains charismatic functioning:

What then is to be done, brethren? When you come together each of you has a hymn, has an instruction, has a revelation, has a tongue, has an interpretation. Let all things be done unto edification. If anyone speaks in a tongue, let it be by twos or at most by threes, and let them speak in turn, and let one interpret. But if there is no interpreter let him keep silence in the church, and speak to himself and to God. Of the prophets, let two or three speak at a meeting, and let the rest act as judges. But if anything is revealed to another sitting by let the first keep silence. . . . Thus I likewise teach in all the churches of the saints. Let women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted them to speak, but let them be submissive, as the Law also says. . . . If anyone thinks that he is a prophet or spiritual, let him recognize that the things I am writing to you are the Lord’s commandments. If anyone ignores this, he shall be ignored. (1 Cor 14.26–38)

Paul at least is not unaware that over and above the ephemeral gifts for community sanctification there stands a stable mission entrusted to the Twelve and to him.

So when in the very early days of the community at Jerusalem there arose a practical problem, the APOSTLES did not wait for nor seem to expect any charismatic solution but proceeded without delay to set up an institutional arrangement. To meet the complaints of the Hellenist group that their widows were being slighted in the distribution of alms, the Apostles directed the community to present to them seven suitable candidates, “that we [the Apostles] may put them in charge of this work” (Acts 6.3). In the selection and investiture of the seven one can reasonably discern the beginning and the prototype of subordinate ministries with determined functions. Though some special or charismatic endowments may have been expected of those presented as candidates (“select from among you seven men of good reputation, full of the Spirit and of wisdom” [Acts 6.37]), there can be no question that the determination of the function was made by the Apostles as the established representatives and plenipotentiaries of Christ. In the Pauline Churches as time went on there was through prayer and the IMPOSITION OF HANDS designation of those who in a permanent way functioned as bishops or PRESBYTERS (Acts 14.25; 20.28; Phil 1.1; 1 Tm 3.1–7; 5.17–19) and DEACONS (Phil 1.1; 1 Tm 3.8–13) of the individual communities.

Third Element. The third and final element in an ecclesiastical office is that of its spiritual purpose. The determined function is not merely a service, an accommodation to the needs of others, a labor for the benefit of others, as would be the ministrations of a waiter, an usher, a clerk, an attendant, but a ministration that brings life or helps to maintain life, that directs in the way of God. So the one who holds an office does truly serve, does truly benefit others, but as the father or the guardian who stands in the place of the father serves the family. The basis and justification for all this goes back directly to the role of Christ Himself in the economy of salvation. He came not to be the object of ministrations, but as a minister, a servant, to give His life as a ransom for many, without in the least hesitating to accept the designation of Lord and Master (“You call me Master and Lord, and you say well, for so I am. If, therefore, I the Lord and Master have washed your feet, you also ought to wash the feet of one another”—Jn 13.13–14). In the Christian scheme of things, paradoxical though it may seem, there is no incompatibility between service and power: it is not to “lord it over them” (Mt 20.25) that some are vested with authority in the community, but that they may more effectively serve by standing in His place to whom “all authority in heaven and on earth has been given” (Mt 28.18). From the days of the Apostles and at the level of the apostolic commission given them, those who hold office in virtue of a power received from on high (Acts 1.8) are to exercise a function that connotes a corresponding obligation on the part of the other members to receive this ministration. There is at once power and lowliness, authority and humility, modesty and majesty in one who says in Christ’s name: “If I do not wash thee, thou shalt have no part with me” (Jn 13.8).

That offices in the Church connote at once power and service is the repeated teaching of Vatican Council II: “For those ministers, who are endowed with sacred power, serve their brethren in order that all who are of the people of God and therefore enjoy a true Christian dignity, working toward a common goal freely and in an orderly way, may arrive at salvation. . . . That function however which the Lord committed to the shepherds of His people is a true service, which in S. Scripture is significantly called ‘diakonia.’ or ministry. . . . Bishops govern the particular Churches . . . by their authority and sacred power, which they use only for the development of their flock in truth and holiness, remembering that he who is greater should become the lesser and he who is chief become as the servant. . . . A bishop . . . must keep before his eyes the example of the Good Shepherd, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister . . . and to lay down His life for His sheep (cfr. Io, 10, 11)” (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 18, 24, 27; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 [1965] 21–22, 29, 32–33).

Finally, the existence of offices so described implies no denial of the fact that there will always be room and welcome in the Church for those who without participating in the ordinary, institutional authority of the Church are mysteriously and charismatically called to providential tasks of reformation, renewal, aggiornamento. Of these charismatic gifts Vatican Council II remarks, “whether they be the more outstanding or the more simple and widely diffused, they are to be received with thanksgiving and consolation, for they are especially suited to and useful for the needs of the Church. . . . Judgment however as to their genuineness and proper use belongs to those who are leaders of the Church and to whom in particular it belongs not, indeed, to extinguish the Spirit but to test all things and hold fast to that which is good” (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 12; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 [1965] 16–17).

See Also: AUTHORITY, ECCLESIASTICAL; BISHOP (IN THE CHURCH); MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; PRIMACY OF THE POPE.

Bibliography: R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:1074–1105. H. ZELLER et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:451–457. M. SCHMAUS, ibid. 5:386–387. K. MÖRSDORF, ibid. 6:188–192. J. COLSON, Les Fonctions ecclésiastiques aux deux premiers siècles (Bruges 1956). H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1953). W. MICHAELIS, Das Ältestenamts der christlichen Gemeinde im Licht der Heiligen Schrift (Bern 1953). H. ASMUSSEN, Die Kirche und das Amt (Munich 1939). D. E. HEINTSCHEL, The Mediaeval Concept of an Ecclesiastical Office (Catholic University of America Canon Law Studies 363; Washington, D.C. 1956).

[S. E. DONLON/EDS.]

Canon Law

Current Comprehension. Canon 145, §1 offers the following succinct definition: “An ecclesiastical office is any function constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance to be exercised for a spiritual purpose.” Under the previous Code of Canon Law, an ecclesiastical office involved participation either in the power of governance (power of jurisdiction) or in the power of orders and, in as much as only clerics could receive these, clerics alone could hold an ecclesiastical office. Such participation in the power of governance or of orders is no longer required for all offices; as one consequence, therefore, lay men and women may acquire certain ecclesiastical offices for which they are capable.

The definition of office includes three elements: a function (munus, pl. munera), constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance and serving a spiritual purpose. First and fundamentally, an office is a function, a munus. A variety of functions exist in the Church and all the baptized, in virtue of that sacrament and through their exercise of these functions, participate in the Church’s mission. These functions have been understood in terms of the threefold munera (or functions) of Jesus Christ as priest, prophet, and ruler. Thus, an ecclesiastical office serves to fulfill the mission of the Church following the example of Jesus Christ in the exercise of the common and ministerial priesthoods; the proclamation of the Word of God; and in the governance of the People of God.

The second element concerns the recognition of a particular function as of particular importance or necessity for the Church: the function is constituted an office by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance. Church teaching has determined that certain offices derive from the intention of Jesus Christ—for example, the office of the bishop of Rome (the Petrine ministry), the college of bishops, and the office of diocesan bishop. Other offices are established by the competent Church authority—for example, the office of chancellor or finance officer in a diocese; the office of superior in an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life. Determination of “competent authority” derives from an examination of the law or of the decree that establishes the office. For example, the diocesan bishop appoints an individual chancellor of the diocese, an office established by the code itself (see cc. 470 and 482). The bishop may establish particular offices for his own diocese. The approved constitutions of an institute of consecrated life determine the appointment of superiors.

The “stability” of an office needs to be understood from two perspectives. First, the function that is designated an office implies that this is an ongoing task, useful for the Church not just for one particular occasion or purpose but also for the foreseeable future. The office will have an incumbent who will exercise its functions and who will be replaced, when necessary and according to the appropriate norms, by another incumbent. Second, in order for an individual to fulfill the task appropriately, the person needs some assurance of personal stability in the office to assure its proper exercise. This stability applies even when an individual is appointed at the prudent discretion of a competent Church authority; the latter needs a just cause to remove an individual from an office (see c. 194, §3.). Two further points: first, an office requires a “job description,” that is, a listing of the obligations and rights associated with that particular function. Second, an individual exercising an office does so not on personal initiative but rather in response to a request from some person or group in the Church (for example, a general chapter of an institute of consecrated life electing an individual as superior; a bishop appointing an individual finance officer for his diocese).

The third element is a spiritual purpose. Office as such aims at the service of the Christian faithful—the reason for its existence. Therefore, an individual accepts and exercises an office in the Church not for personal benefit but for service. The individual officeholder acts on behalf of the Church, participating in the mission that Jesus Christ entrusted to the Church.

Implications of Ecclesiastical Office. From the perspective of these constitutive elements of ecclesiastical office, specific implications need due emphasis. These implications reflect the importance of an office for the Church and for fulfilling her mission and are necessary for the valid exercise of the tasks associated with a specific office.

First, the competent ecclesiastical authority must provide for an office in writing—the individual does not simply assume the office acting alone. A variety of means exist for such provision—through free conferral by a competent authority; through installation by competent authority, when an individual or a group has a right to present a person for an office; through election—with confirmation by competent authority if necessary or through simple acceptance of the office if no confirmation is necessary (see cc. 146–156).

Second, an individual must be qualified for an office—fundamentally, the individual must be in communion with the Church (that is, at the minimum, the individual is a baptized Christian, not necessarily Catholic. Some commentators, however, hold that ‘communion’ here implies the individual is Catholic. See c. 205 which refers to “full communion”). In addition, the person must possess the qualities required for the specific office in question (see c.149). Certain offices entailing “the full care of souls” require that the incumbent have received priestly ordination (c. 150).

Third, an ecclesiastical office is lost through a variety of means: lapse of a specific period of time; reaching a specific age determined by law; resignation; transfer; removal; privation (see c. 184), and by death.

For the first two—term and age—the competent authority must communicate such loss of office to the incumbent in writing (c. 186). To resign an office an incumbent must be mentally competent as well as not subject to grave fear unjustly inflicted or as a result of malice, error, or simony. To effect a transfer, the competent authority must have the capacity to provide for both offices—the one being vacated and the one being assumed. If the incumbent is unwilling, the competent authority must have grave cause and follow proper procedure. The code provides one example of such a procedure in canons 1740–1752, which concern the transfer of pastors.

Privation refers to loss of office as a penalty; removal does not necessarily imply the incumbent has incurred a penalty.

Removal occurs either by decree of the competent authority or by the law itself. As already noted, the competent authority needs a just cause to replace an individual appointed at the authority’s prudent discretion. More serious reasons are needed to replace an individual appointed either for an indefinite or determined time. The law itself, in canon 194, §1, removes from office a person who has lost the clerical state; one who has “publicly defected from the Catholic faith or from the communion of the Church”; and a cleric who has attempted marriage.

For privation, the competent authority must follow the norms of law. These norms include “The Application of Penalties” in canons 1341–1353 and canons 1717–1728 of “The Penal Process.”

In order to maintain justice, the code requires that, in all these cases, competent authority must respect contractual obligations as well as to ensure the individual's decent support.

Bibliography: J. PROVOST, "Ecclesiastical Offices [cc. 145–196]," in New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, ed. J. BEAL, J. CORIDEN, and T. GREEN (New York/Mahwah 2000) 195–229. H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (Peabody, Mass. 1997).

[R. J. KASLYN]

OFFICE FOR FILM AND BROADCASTING

Office within the United States Catholic Conference of Bishops, successor to the National Catholic Office of Motion Pictures (NCOMP), originally the National Legion of Decency (founded 1934). In 1980, the office merged with the National Catholic Office for Radio and Television and together they formed the present Department of Communications within the Bishops' Conference, under whose auspices the Office for Film and Broadcasting operates. It is based in New York City.

In the 1930s and 1940s, the Legion of Decency claimed a membership of over 11 million Americans, about one moviegoer in twelve. Its influence on the motion picture industry was decidedly adversarial because so many of Hollywood's projects were seen as possessing loose moral content. Bishops often put pressure on the Catholic financiers who backed such films, particularly Bishop John T. Cantwell of Los Angeles. He persuaded Archbishop McNicholas of Cincinnati to form an Episcopal Committee for Motion Pictures, Radio, and Television within the conference of bishops, a committee that McNicholas chaired from 1933–1944. Together with people like Martin P. Quigley, a devout Catholic and publisher of the film industry's leading trade paper throughout the 1940s and 1950s, the Legion exerted pressure on Hollywood to produce quality entertainment. Gradually, however, the Legion and later the NCOMP's influence waned. Its powerful ability to rate a film's moral value was supplanted by an increasingly well-formed lay opinion on what was acceptable viewing.

However, the bishops have seen fit to continue to guide audiences in making decisions on what they watch through capsule reviews and a rating system that departs from the standard film industry's G, PG, PG-13, NC-17, R, and X ratings. In 1971, NCOMP and National Council of Churches' Broadcasting and Film Commission withdrew support from the film industry's rating system. Currently, there are four subdivisions to the "A" or "morally unobjectionable" category: A-I, for general patronage; A-II, for adults and adolescents; A-III, for adults; and A-IV, for adults, but with reservations. The classification O is given to films that are found to be totally incompatible with Christian moral values or standards of decency.

Since 1995 the Office for Film and Broadcasting has issued a weekly movie review of select films. Reviews of certain television programs began in 1975 and video releases in 1992 when it became apparent that the video cassette recorder was influencing how Americans were selecting their entertainment.

See Also: EROTIC LITERATURE.

Bibliography: There is a compilation of some 8,000 movie reviews of virtually every feature length film since 1966 in Our Sunday Visitor's Family Guide to Movies and Videos, H. HERX, ed. (Huntington, Ind. 1999). G. D. BLACK, The Catholic Crusade Against the Movies, 1940–1975 (New York 1997); Hollywood Censored: Morality Codes, Catholics, and the Movies (New York 1994). M. MCLAUGHLIN, A Study of the National Catholic Office for Motion Pictures (Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 1974). J. M. PHELAN, The National Catholic Office for Motion Pictures: An Investigation of the Policy and Practice of Film Classification (Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1968). J. M. SKINNER, The Cross and the Cinema: The Legion of Decency and the National Catholic Office for Motion Pictures, 1933–1970 (Westport, Conn. 1993). F. WALSH, Sin and Censorship: The Catholic Church and the Motion Picture Industry (New Haven 1996). Archival material for the National Catholic Office for Film and Broadcasting (1966–1990) and its predecessor, the Episcopal Committee on Motion Pictures (1933–1944), is housed at the Catholic University of America. The papers of Martin P. Quigley are archived at Georgetown University.

[P. J. HAYES]

OFFICE OF THE DEAD

One of the oldest special Offices in the DIVINE OFFICE. It goes back at least to the 7th century and may even antedate GREGORY THE GREAT (d. 604), for this Office is purely Roman in the arrangement of its Psalms and bears no trace of monastic and Gallican elements, such as introductory prayers and hymns. Its schema is similar to the Office of the last three days of HOLY WEEK and these are known to be very primitive. Its original form had only MATINS, LAUDS, and VESPERS. Pius X (d. 1914) added the LITTLE HOURS. During the Middle Ages this Office was frequently recited in addition to the Divine Office. Although Pius V (d. 1572) did away with all obligation in the matter, he did leave a twofold Office for the Feast of ALL SOULS. Pius X removed this duplication by making the Office of the Dead the sole Office for November 2. The 1960 Code of Rubrics deleted the Vespers of the Dead formerly added to All Saints' Vespers. In addition to its use on All Souls, the Office of the Dead is prayed in whole or in part in connection with the funeral services of clerics and religious. From the 1970s onward, the practice of praying a portion of the Office at wakes for lay people has grown.

In the revised LITURGY OF THE HOURS (1971), the Office of the Dead comprises: the Office of Readings, Morning Prayer, Daytime Prayer, Midmorning Prayer, Midday Prayer, and—a new departure from tradition—Night Prayer. The psalmody, antiphons included, for the Office of Readings, Morning Prayer, 1st and 2d Evening Prayer, is proper. The psalmody for Midmorning, Midday, and Midafternoon Prayer is taken from the Complementary Psalmody used during the year, but the antiphons are proper. The Night Prayer is taken from the office of Sunday. The revised Order of Christian Funerals includes an abbreviated Office of the Dead.

The liturgical reforms of Vatican II introduced notable changes in the themes and tone of the Office of the Dead. Throughout there is a greater emphasis on the victory and joy of the resurrection, rather than on the fears and sorrows of death and judgment. The spirit of Christian joy is manifested especially in the hymns, with their reference to Christ as the Lord of the Resurrection. The exultant alleluia rings through many of the hymns, and the doxology, “Glory be to the Father, etc.,” concludes each psalm rather than the austere and penitential “Eternal rest grant unto them, O Lord.”

Bibliography: L. EISENHOFER and J. LECHNER, The Liturgy of the Roman Rite, tr. A. J. and E. F. PEELER from the 6th German ed., ed. H. E. WINSTONE (New York 1961) 474–475. J. H. MILLER, Fundamentals of the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 344. M. RIGHETTI, Manuale di storia liturgica, 4 v. (Milan): v.2 (2d ed. 1955) 2:218–219. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 12.2:2006–09. C. CALLEWAERT, Sacris erudiri (Steenbrugge 1940) 169–177. The Liturgy of the Hours (New York 1976).

[G. E. SCHIDEL/P. F. MULHERN/EDS.]

O'FHELY, MAURICE

Also known as Mauritius de Portu Fildaeo, Scotist Franciscan Conventual; b. Baltimore or Clonfert, Ireland, c. 1460; d. Galway, March 25, 1513. O'Fihely studied at Oxford, became regent of studies at the Franciscan friary in Milan by 1488, and regent at the Padua friary in 1491. Shortly thereafter he held the chair of Scotistic theology in the university. Julius II consecrated him archbishop of Tuam, Ireland, on June 26, 1506. In 1513, having attended the first two sessions of the Fifth Lateran Council, he left Italy to take possession of his diocese, but died on the way. The leading Scotist of his day, he is still one of the best interpreters of John DUNS SCOTUS, many of whose works he edited. A number of his own theological and metaphysical works were included in the Wadding edition of Scotus's Opera omnia. To his contemporaries he was known as Flos mundi.

Bibliography: J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo (Rome 1906–36) 2:242–243. A. G. LITTLE, The Grey Friars in Oxford (Oxford 1892) 267–268. C. EUBEL, et al. Hieraarchia Catholica medii (et recentioris) aevi (Padua 1958) 3:340. E. LONGPRÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 10.1:404–405.

[P. FEHLNER]

OGILVIE, JOHN, ST.

Jesuit martyr; b. Scotland, 1579–80; d. Glasgow Cross, March 10 (N.S.), 1615. In a deposition (Oct. 15, 1614) after his capture, Ogilvie gave his father's name as “Walter Ogilvie of Drum.” As a Jesuit novice he described himself as “Strathilensis,” “of Strathisla.” His family may thus have been associated with Drum-na-Keith, in Strathisla, Banffshire. In the deposition he also noted his absence from Scotland for 22 years, i.e., from 1591–92. One of his name matriculated at Helmstedt on Aug. 19, 1592. Ogilvie was at the Scots College, Louvain (later established at Douai), in 1596; it was there that he, a Calvinist in his youth, became a Catholic. Because of the poverty of the college, he was sent (1598) to Regensburg; he moved to Olmutz while still a lay student. He finally became a Jesuit novice at Brno in 1599. He took his vows at the Jesuit College at Graz, Austria, Dec. 26, 1601. His five years there were later commemorated in a biography [in Undeni Graecenses Academici, by M. Bonbardi, SJ (Graz 1727)]. After an interval of teaching, he began theology at Olmutz. In 1610 he moved to Paris, where he was ordained.

Ogilvie was stationed at Rouen, but kept importuning the superior general to send him to Scotland. At last his request was granted, and in 1613 he began his short missionary career in Scotland, working mostly in Edinburgh, Renfrewshire, and Glasgow. He was betrayed in Glasgow, Oct. 14 (N. S.), 1614, and remained thereafter in captivity. His own account of his imprisonment was smuggled out of prison. He suffered extreme torture, but showed great courage and skill in defending the spiritual supremacy of the pope. He was ultimately sentenced to death, hanged at Glasgow Cross, and buried in the criminals' plot of an unidentified burial ground outside the city.

No relic of his body remains; however, centers of devotion exist at St. Thomas's, Keith, Banffshire; St. Aloysius's, Garnethill, Glasgow; Sacred Heart, Edinburgh; and Craighead House, Bothwell. His cause was introduced under the rules drawn up by URBAN VIII in 1625. The first process opened at Würzburg in May of 1628; the following January a similar process began in Rome. Nearly three centuries later, the Apostolic Process opened in Glasgow, July 12, 1927. The beatification, by PIUS XI, took place on Dec. 22, 1929, and the canonization, by Paul VI, on Oct. 17, 1976. There are two main portraits: the "Douai" portrait, now at the church of S. Gilles, Pecquincourt, Nord, France; and the "Roman" portrait, now at the Gesù, Rome. An illustration (unrelated to either) is given in Bonbardi's Undeni Graecenses Academici.

Feast: March 10; Oct. 14 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: W. E. BROWN, John Ogilvie . . . (London 1925). T. COLLINS, Martyr in Scotland . . . (London 1955). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATWATER (New York 1956) 1:552–556. L. MACFARLANE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:1121. G. G. SMITH, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 14:912–914. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 69 [1977] 305–311; L'Osservatore Romano English edition 1976, n. 43, 1–3. M. K. RICHARDSON, Father John Ogilvie (London 1976). B. A. MOORE, John Ogilvie (Melbourne 1977). D. HICKEY and G. SMITH, Miracle (London 1978). C. CARRELL and G. BOARDMAN, eds., St. John Ogilvie; An Illustrated History of His Life, Martyrdom, and Canonisation (Glasgow 1979).

[J. QUINN]

O'GORMAN, THOMAS

Bishop, educator; b. Boston, Mass., May 1, 1843; d. Sioux Falls, S. Dak., Sept. 18, 1921. He was the first of four children born to John and Margaret (O'Keefe) O'Gorman. The family moved west to Chicago, Ill. (1848); with John O'Gorman's childhood friend Richard Ireland and his family, among whom was the future Abp. John IRELAND, they resumed their westward trek to St. Paul, Minn. (1852). That same year Thomas O'Gorman and John Ireland enrolled among the first students of Bp. Joseph Cretin's Latin School on the upper floor of the frontier Cathedral of St. Paul—the first seminarians of the diocese. When O'Gorman was ten years old and Ireland 15, they were sent to the minor seminary of the Marists at Meximieux, France, and subsequently to the major seminary at Montbel. O'Gorman returned to St. Paul and was ordained by Bp. Thomas Grace on Nov. 5, 1865. He was first assigned to Rochester, Minn., where he built St. John's church and became known as a preacher and organizer. In 1877 he resigned to join the Society of St. Paul, continuing his preaching in the New York area and converting the financier Thomas Fortune Ryan to the Catholic Church. He was recalled (1882) to St. Paul by his friend, now Bp. John Ireland, and assigned to Faribault as pastor, and later (1885) as first rector of the newly established St. Paul Seminary and president of St. Thomas College there. After ten years he resigned to teach dogmatic theology, English, and French in the college. During these years he wrote several articles and deepened his knowledge of ecclesiastical history. In 1890 he was appointed professor of church history in The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., where he actively supported the liberal policies of the Americanists during the several controversies of the late 19th century in American Catholicism (see AMERICANISM). He wrote A History of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States (1895), a summary of the original research of John Gilmary SHEA.

On Jan. 24, 1896, O'Gorman was appointed bishop of Sioux Falls, a suffragan see of the Province of St. Paul, where his friend John Ireland was the first archbishop. The new bishop was consecrated by Abp. Francesco Sattoli, first Apostolic Delegate to the U.S., in St. Patrick's Church, Washington, D.C., on April 19, 1896, and installed in the pro-cathedral of his see on May 2, 1896. At that time the diocese had 51 diocesan and 14 regular clergy, 50 churches with resident priests, 61 missions with churches, 100 stations, ten chapels, 14 parochial schools, 61 Indian schools, two orphanages, and one hospital. There were three communities of religious men and six of women in the diocese; and the total Catholic population, both Indian and white, was estimated at 30,000.

O'Gorman, who began his active pastoral apostolate with energy, wrote to his friend Denis O'Connell from "Avignon": "I fear I must resign myself to being the routine Bishop of an unknown Western diocese, and I assure you I find enough work to do as such." New hospitals were opened at Yankton and Pierre (1897), Aberdeen (1901), Sioux Falls (1910), and Mitchell and Milbank (1921). The vast extent of the diocese and growth in population encouraged an east-west division in South Dakota in 1902 between Sioux Falls and Lead (changed to Rapid City in 1930). During his administration in Sioux Falls, O'Gorman continued his Roman contacts and visits and was appointed (1902), through the offices of Archbishop Ireland, to the Taft Commission to deal with Rome regarding the friars' land problem in the Philippine Islands. St. Joseph's Cathedral in Sioux Falls was completed in 1919, and Columbus College was begun in 1909, first in Chamberlain and after 1921 in Sioux Falls, and continued until it was closed in 1939 because of financial difficulties. At the close of O'Gorman's 26 years as bishop of Sioux Falls, the Catholic population had doubled to 69,164 and there were 127 diocesan and 13 religious priests serving 114 churches and 83 missions in his jurisdiction.

[C. BARRY]

O'HARA, EDWIN VINCENT

Bishop, sociologist; b. Lanesboro, Minn., Sept. 6, 1881; d. Milan, Italy, Sept. 11, 1956. His parents, Owen and Margaret (Nugent) O'Hara, sent him to public schools for his early education. Later he entered St. Thomas College and the Seminary of St. Paul, St. Paul, Minn. He was accepted for the Archdiocese of Oregon City (later Portland), Ore., and was ordained on June 10, 1905, in St. Paul. His first assignment by Archbishop Alexander Christie was as assistant at the cathedral in Portland. In 1907 he formed the Summer Institute for Teachers and the Catholic Education Association of Oregon. Following a period of ill health in 1910, he spent a year of advanced study at The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, Washington, D.C. Upon returning to Portland, he demonstrated a practical concern for social rights characteristic of the Progressive Movement of that period. His initial interest was in the struggle for minimum wages for women and a general minimum-wage law. Supported by the National Consumers League, he led a committee whose report was instrumental in the enactment in 1913 of the Oregon minimum-wage law, which was to be tested in the courts in the case of Settler v. O'Hara. O'Hara's role in the making of this legislation was indicated when Governor Oswald West named him chairman of the new State Industrial Welfare Commission.

Apart from such achievements, however, it was in the area of rural sociology that O'Hara was to attain his greatest reputation. After his return from service as chaplain with the U.S. Army in France in 1918, he began to promote Catholic education in rural districts. In 1920 at the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), he proposed the establishment of the Rural Life Bureau and became its first chairman. After obtaining a transfer to the rural parish of Eugene, Ore., he devoted himself to the problems of country life, publishing A Program of Catholic Rural Action (1922) and The Church and the Country Community (1927) and convening the first National Catholic Rural Life Conference in St. Louis, Mo., in 1923. O'Hara's interest in rural welfare was combined with concern for education. In 1922 he had organized the first Catholic Religious Vacation School and, when the Oregon School Bill requiring compulsory attendance at public schools was proposed, he led the fight against it with the aid of many noted jurists. As archdiocesan superintendent of schools, he conducted litigation in state courts and the U.S. Supreme Court that resulted in the Oregon law being declared unconstitutional. From 1929 to 1930 O'Hara was directly engaged in teaching, offering courses in parish sociology at The Catholic University of America and, during the summer, at the University of Notre Dame, Ind.

On Nov. 5, 1930, O'Hara was consecrated as bishop of Great Falls, Mont. From the start of his episcopacy he sought to advance the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine. After establishing the confraternity in his diocese on Dec. 17, 1930, he helped to form a Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast confraternity and to establish a national headquarters for the confraternity at The Catholic University of America. He secured the appointment of a committee of the hierarchy to study the question, and he was instrumental in obtaining a letter from the Congregation of the Council on Jan. 12, 1933, requiring the establishment of the confraternity in each diocese. Thereafter a national center for the confraternity was located at NCWC headquarters in Washington, D.C., and on Oct. 31, 1935, the first congress of the confraternity was held in Rochester, N.Y. Catechetical reform and biblical translation also received attention from Bishop O'Hara. He headed a committee of bishops who prepared a revision of the Baltimore Catechism, which had not been changed since its adoption by the Third Plenary Council in 1884. The revision was published on June 21, 1941, under the auspices of the confraternity. In January of 1936, O'Hara organized a committee of theologians and Scripture scholars to discuss a revised English translation of the Scriptures. Subsequently, the Catholic Biblical Association of America was formed on Oct. 3, 1936, and the Catholic Biblical Quarterly began publication in 1938. In 1952, the anniversary of the invention of printing and of the publication of the Gutenberg Bible, the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine published its first volume of the revised version of the Old Testament, containing eight historical books. At this time O'Hara received a special letter of commendation from Pius XII.

On April 16, 1939, O'Hara was appointed to the See of Kansas City, Mo. (changed on August 29, 1956, to Kansas City-St. Joseph). There he earned the title of "the building Bishop," adding, within 10 years, 42 churches, 14 convents, 16 grade schools, 6 high schools, and 2 colleges. In September of 1954 O'Hara was made personal archbishop. He died while on his way to the International Congress of the Restored Liturgy in Assisi, Italy.

Bibliography: J. G. SHAW, Edwin Vincent O'Hara, American Prelate (New York 1957). T. M. DOLAN, Some Seed Fell on Good Ground (Washington, D.C. 1992).

[T. T. MCAVOY]

O'HARA, JOHN FRANCIS

Cardinal; b. Ann Arbor, Mich., May 1, 1888; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 28, 1960. As the son of John and Eleanor (Thornton) O'Hara, he received his early education in the parochial grade school and public high school of Peru, Ind., where his father was a practicing lawyer. Later he studied at the Collegio de Sagrada Corazon in Montevideo, Uruguay, where his father served as American consul. On returning to the U.S., he entered the University of Notre Dame, Ind., where he taught Spanish while earning his bachelor of philosophy degree. He entered the novitiate of the Congregation of Holy Cross, Aug. 15, 1912, made his first profession Sept. 14, 1914, and was ordained in Indianapolis, Ind., on Sept. 9, 1916, by Bp. Joseph Chartrand. He spent the first year of his priesthood in historical studies at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., followed by a summer at the Wharton School of Commerce at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. In September 1917 he returned to Notre Dame University and established a department of commerce in response to the increased enrollment of prospective businessmen in the university. With O'Hara as dean, this became the College of Commerce in 1920.

In his priestly activities, O'Hara began to manifest the same zeal in administering the Sacraments that he had shown as a builder of the business school. While acting as a counselor to the students, he urged them to take advantage of the possibility of frequent and even daily Holy Communion, which had been revived by the decrees of Pius X. He was made prefect of religion and gave up his deanship to devote his time to this work and to teaching some classes in religion. Despite the increasing enrollment in the university after World War I, he literally became acquainted with nearly every one of the 2,000 or more students. To reach them, he began to post and later to distribute a one-page religious bulletin in which he combined criticism of student weaknesses with strong inspiration. In 1933, when Rev. Charles O'Donnell, CSC, President of Notre Dame University, became fatally ill, O'Hara was appointed acting president. He was elected president the following year. His presidency was signalized by the increase and advancement of the faculty, the erection of new buildings, and the expansion of undergraduate work. On Dec. 11, 1939, Pius XII named him titular bishop of Milasa and military delegate to Abp. (later Cardinal) Francis Spellman of New York, Military Vicar of the Armed Forces of the U.S. O'Hara was consecrated Jan. 15, 1940, at Notre Dame by Spellman; he established headquarters in New York, where he was joined by Bp. William T. McCarty, CSSR.

Because of the draft law and the expansion of the army and navy after World War II began in Europe, the office of military delegate acquired a great importance that was increased when the U.S. entered the war in December 1941. O'Hara not only administered the central office in New York, but visited personally the camps and offices of the chaplains, administering the Sacrament of Confirmation and looking into the spiritual welfare of soldiers and sailors. He reorganized the military ordinariate, setting up eight military vicar delegates, and during the war he supervised nearly 5,000 priests who attended to the religious needs of Catholics in the Armed Forces.

On March 10, 1945, O'Hara was transferred to the See of Buffalo, N.Y., where he was installed by Spellman on May 8, 1945. During his episcopate, he renovated the cathedral church, established new parishes, introduced new religious communities, and held a National Eucharistic Congress in 1947. O'Hara was appointed to the See of Philadelphia, vacated by the death of Cardinal Dennis Dougherty on Dec. 28, 1951, and he was installed by Abp. Amleto Cicognani, Apostolic Delegate, on Jan. 9, 1952. O'Hara brought to his new position the same zeal for Catholic education and for frequent reception of the Sacraments that had characterized his work as chaplain at Notre Dame University, as military delegate, and as bishop of Buffalo. He established 55 new parishes and 14 new Catholic high schools, and reorganized the administration of the archdiocesan charities. He continued his efforts to have personal contact with both clergy and laity. John XXIII made him a member of the College of Cardinals Dec. 15, 1958. Already his active career as priest and administrator had begun to weaken his health. Although frequently hampered by arthritis and other infirmities, the cardinal endeavored to meet all his commitments. He died in Philadelphia, and his body was returned to Sacred Heart Church at Notre Dame for burial.

Bibliography: Articles by T. T. MCAVOY et al., in Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia 64.1 (1953) 3-56.

[T. T. MCAVOY]

O'HELY, PATRICK, BL.

Irish bishop of Mayo, martyr; b. west Ireland, probably Connacht (formerly Connaught), date unknown; d. Kilmallock, County Limerick, 1579. Little is known with certainty of his early career beyond his education in Spain and Italy by the Franciscans, his ordination, and his consecration as bishop of Mayo c. 1576. In this period of Irish history the Celtic clergy, and especially the hierarchy on the continent, were barred from relieving Irish Catholics at home of their shortage of priests and the Tudor government kept a constant vigil on all Irish harbors to prevent European-ordained clerics from returning. But Bishop O'Hely, with a number of clerical companions, slipped into Ireland by following a roundabout course through Dingle Bay into Kerry not far from Tralee. Although he eluded the royal guards who were assigned to search ships, he was turned over to the royal authorities by an informer a few weeks after his arrival. Following his arrest he was summoned before Sir William Drury, the king's representative at Kilmallock in County Limerick. O'Hely refused to deny his faith or recognize Queen Elizabeth I as head of the church. He and his close companion Father Cornelius O'Rorke (O'Rourke) were tortured, placed on the rack, their legs and arms broken with hammers, and sharp instruments wedged into the nails of their fingers and toes. After several days of torment both were hanged and their bodies suspended on the gallows for more than two weeks. O'Hely was beatified on Sept. 27, 1992.

Bibliography: W. M. BRADY, The Episcopal Succession in England, Scotland, and Ireland, A. D. 1400 to 1875, 3 v. (Rome 1876–77). J. S. CRONE, Concise Dictionary of Irish Biography (rev. ed. Dublin 1937). M. W. P. O'REILLY, Memorials of Those Who Suffered for the Faith in Ireland (London 1868). A. J. WEBB, Compendium of Irish Biography (Dublin 1878). A. F. POLLARD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 14:959.

[E. J. MURRAY]

OHIO, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The first state formed from the Northwest Territory, Ohio was admitted into the Union in 1803. Its prehistoric inhabitants were the Hopewell, also known as the Mound Builders because of their earthen mounds used for burial and, perhaps, ritual practices. There are many of these burial grounds and other unusual earthworks still preserved in the state, the most noteworthy being the Great Serpent Mound near Hillsboro, Ohio. The Seneca from Canada, Michigan, and New York also constituted a strong presence in Ohio as they followed the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers on long hunting forays in the winter months. The Miami and Wyandotte were also significant tribes within the geographical boundaries of the state.

Catholicism came to the territory with French explorers and missionaries who entered Ohio through Lake Erie and the Ohio River, but the first permanent settlement in Ohio was not established until 1788 at Marietta. From there the state grew rapidly. By 1800 the population exceeded 45,000, most of these coming from the eastern seaboard and Kentucky. Ethnically and religiously they were Protestant Ulster Irish accompanied later by a significant German immigration from Pennsylvania. Few of these early settlers were Catholic, but there was a settlement of French Catholics in Gallia County who founded

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Cincinnati	1850
Diocese of Cleveland	1847
Diocese of Columbus	1868
Diocese of Steubenville	1944
Diocese of Toledo	1910
Diocese of Youngstown	1943

the city of Gallipolis, on the Ohio River, in the southeastern region of the state. Father Peter Joseph Didier, O.S.B., worked among these Catholics as early as 1791, but seems to have left in discouragement after a few years of hardship and failure.

Until 1785, the entire region was included in the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Quebec. There were several missionary journeys in the old territory and early missions were founded by French Jesuits. However, none of these became permanent, and Ohio remained mission territory into the 19th century. In 1789 the Diocese of Baltimore was established in the new republic, and Ohio became part of the first U.S. see.

About 1802 a small group of settlers from near the Maryland-Pennsylvania border moved into Somerset, Pennsylvania, and then went on to found a small community of Catholics called Somerset in southeastern Ohio. Mostly of Alsatian extraction and led by a devout Catholic, Jacob Dittoe, they petitioned Bishop John Carroll for priests to serve this new settlement. Jacob Dittoe, in fact, had written to Carroll twice, in 1805 and 1808, requesting priests for the isolated Catholic settlements of Ohio. It was not until 1818, after the founding of the Diocese of Bardstown in 1810 and the establishment of the Dominican Friars near Springfield, Kentucky, by Edward Fenwick, O.P. (1768–1832), that the first permanent parish in Ohio was founded. Fenwick and his nephew, Nicholas Young, O.P., came across the village of Somerset on one of their many missionary travels and authorized the construction of a church for the settlement. According to local lore, Father Fenwick heard an ax being wielded in the forest and veered from his route in order to discover the source of the sound. He found Dittoe at work clearing land. Eventually, the Dominicans were given 320 acres of cleared farmland, and Somerset became an important center for the friars. In 1830, the Dominican Sisters from Washington County, Kentucky, opened a girls' academy in Somerset. St. Joseph in Somerset remained an education and formation center for the eastern province of the Dominican Fathers until 1968. The priory remained standing until 1976. The Dominican Sisters moved to St. Mary of the Springs in Columbus in 1868, after struggling with the consequences of a disastrous fire in 1866, and have maintained the old St. Mary of the Springs College and Academy as Ohio Dominican College.

On June 19, 1824, Pope Pius VII responded to the expanding Catholic population in Ohio and created the Diocese of Cincinnati with Edward Fenwick as its first bishop. The bishop of Bardstown, Benedict Flaget, consecrated Fenwick in St. Rose Church, Washington County, Kentucky, on Jan. 14, 1822. Fenwick had immediate problems when he transferred his residence from the outskirts of Cincinnati to a location in the city on Sycamore Street. The laity challenged the merging of diocesan and Dominican property and brought the dispute before the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The congregation ordered a separation of diocesan and Dominican property, and in 1828 established the policy that diocesan property was to be held by Fenwick in the name of the diocese and willed to his successor in the See of Cincinnati. This arrangement spread throughout the Northwest Territory and is credited with keeping trusteeism from becoming a major problem for the Church in these states.

Fenwick was not only a residential bishop but also an active missionary. He traveled extensively throughout Ohio. Fenwick was born of a large landholding family in Maryland and had joined the English province of the Dominicans in Belgium. He returned to Europe on fund raising missions and was aided by Pope Leo XIII's support in collecting significant funds in Belgium, Holland and England. During his absence, from 1823 to 1825, a new episcopal residence was constructed and a cathedral completed and dedicated on Dec. 17, 1826. Fenwick opened a theological seminary, St. Aloysius, in May 1829. Fenwick's intense labors and travels left him in poor health. He petitioned for a coadjutor but died on a missionary journey in Wooster, Ohio, on Sept. 26, 1832, before one was appointed. On May 12, 1833, Pope Gregory XVI named John Baptist PURCELL (1800–83) as the second bishop of Cincinnati. He had completed his studies for the priesthood at St. Sulpice in Paris and was ordained by the archbishop of Paris before returning as professor and president of Mt. St. Mary's in Emmitsburg, Maryland. He was consecrated in Baltimore on Oct. 13, 1833. Purcell's half century in office as bishop and later archbishop of Cincinnati was a period of enormous growth and expansion of the Church in the state of Ohio. He was a learned and expansive man with a flair for the dramatic.

During the early years of Purcell's reign, there was a significant social change underway in Cincinnati. The Catholic population was transformed from an Irish Catholic community into a predominantly German Catholic Church with a minimum of ethnic tensions. Purcell, in contrast to the situation in many other urban areas of the country, was able to manage the transition with a minimum of ethnic tension and conflict. This was unique in the American Church where newer ethnic groups often clashed with the increasingly numerous Irish American hierarchy.

Purcell's European experience gave him inroads into the Church in Europe where he received both financial assistance and personnel for his rapidly growing missionary diocese. A participant in the first VATICAN COUNCIL, he initially opposed the definition of papal infallibility for ecumenical reasons. He had clearly and articulately defended his position in a series of public debates in Ohio with Alexander CAMPBELL, founder of the Disciples of Christ, in 1836. Nevertheless, he accepted the conciliar definition and, while remaining seemingly intellectually unconvinced, offered his obedience to the Church and, personally, to Pope Pius IX. Edward FITZGERALD, a priest of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati who became bishop of Little Rock in 1867, actually voted against the definition at the council, though he too publicly acquiesced.

Purcell allowed great freedom to the German congregations in Cincinnati and accepted a moderate form of trusteeism for the German parishes. Because of the earlier arrangement between the Irish Catholics and Bishop Fenwick, the actual ownership of the German parishes remained in the hands of the local bishop. The extreme forms of trusteeism, therefore, were not realized in Cincinnati. Purcell, however, was careful not to extend this form of local government to the Irish congregations of Cincinnati. He accepted the assistance of the Tirolean province of the Franciscan Fathers, centered in Innsbruck, Austria, to work with the German population in the city of Cincinnati. He also secured the services of the Precious Blood Fathers and Brothers, under the leadership of Father Francis de Sales Brunner, to serve the rural German population of northwestern Ohio. Both of these religious communities became separate provinces centered in the diocese, the Franciscans in Cincinnati and the Precious Blood Fathers in Carthage, Ohio.

In 1850, Pope Pius IX raised Cincinnati, along with New York and New Orleans, to the status of an archdiocese, and Purcell became the first archbishop of the new province of Ohio. One of his goals was to open a seminary to provide the necessary education for those called to the priesthood. After several attempts, he undertook the construction of a facility west of the city, on Price Hill. The new seminary opened in 1851 as Mt. St. Mary's of the West. The name was reminiscent of his days as rector of Mt. St. Mary's in Maryland. In 1924 the seminary was moved to Norwood, Ohio, and in the early 1980s to its present location on the eastside of Cincinnati. Religious sisters also came to serve the expanding Catholic population of the state. St. Elizabeth Ann Seton's Sisters of Charity had arrived from Emmitsburg in 1829 and undertook educational and charitable works throughout the diocese. When their congregation affiliated with the French Daughters of Charity, the sisters in Cincinnati chose to become a separate canonical community known as the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati. In 1920 they established their College of Mt. St. Joseph's on the Ohio. Among the many notable women of the congregation, Sister Blandina Segale has a special place in the folklore of the American West as friend and teacher of Billy the Kid. In 1830, when Bishop Fenwick brought four Dominican Sisters from Kentucky to open a school in Somerset, they included Sister Benven Sansbury, the sister of Sister Angela Sansbury, the first Dominican Sister professed in the United States. In 1839, Bishop Purcell obtained the services of the Sisters of Notre Dame, while visiting their motherhouse in Namur, Belgium, and in 1840, eight Notre Dame Sisters opened a school for girls at St. Xavier's Parish in Cincinnati, and in 1865, a school for Holy Cross and St. Patrick's parishes in Columbus.

The remarkable growth of the numbers of religious communities of women in the 19th century worked to the great benefit of the Church in Ohio. By mid-century the Sisters of Mercy from Kinsale, Ireland, the Franciscan Sisters of Stella Niagara, New York, the Ursulines, the Sisters of the Holy Humility of Mary, Sisters of Saint Joseph, the Good Shepherd Sisters, and many other congregations had come to serve the expanding Catholic population of the state. They worked not only in Cincinnati and the other early Catholic settlements, but also among the Catholics moving into the Ohio River valley, the industrially developing cities of Youngstown, Cleveland, Steubenville, and Toledo, and the German farmlands of northwest Ohio. The Sisters of the Precious Blood were an important part of the rural German communities of northwestern Ohio. Along with the Precious Blood Fathers, they were the most significant religious presence throughout that part of the state. Purcell's reign ended, sadly, in scandal and personal tragedy. His brother and chancellor, Father Edward Purcell, had tried to provide a safe banking service for the Catholics of Cincinnati and was successful during some of the financial crises of the mid-19th century. During the Panic of 1877–78, however, there was a run on Purcell's financial holdings and the funds to respond to the demands were simply not available. In fact, there were only a third of the funds demanded available. The legal battles were not finally resolved until 1905 when investors received a settlement based on their initial investments.

Archbishop Purcell publicly acknowledged the terrible situation and offered his resignation to Pope Leo XIII. The pope allowed Purcell to retain the title of archbishop, but he retired, with his brother, to the Ursuline convent in St. Martin, Ohio. He died there, after suffering a series of strokes, on July 4, 1883. He was succeeded by the bishop of Natchez, Mississippi, William Henry Elder, who faced the task of managing a financially shattered archdiocese while at the same time attempting to maintain the growth and strength of the Catholic Church in the aftermath of disillusionment, anger, and loss of faith. The situation was so widely known and so severe that Bishops Edward Fitzgerald of Little Rock and Bernard McQuaid of Rochester had both refused the appointment to Cincinnati. Elder turned out to be an excellent choice. He was learned and cultured and a good reconciler of divergent opinions and conflicting movements. He held the position for 24 years and died Oct. 31, 1904. The courts dealt with the Purcell financial scandal during Elder's entire time as archbishop.

In addition to the strong European immigrant communities, there were also African American Catholics in Ohio in the 19th century. Daniel Rudd (1854–1903), who had been born a slave in Bardstown, Kentucky, published a black Catholic weekly newspaper, American Catholic Tribune, beginning in the late 1880s. Beginning in Springfield, Ohio, where he had migrated in order to attend high school, he eventually published the newspaper in Cincinnati, and then in Detroit, until the late 1890s. He was confident that the Catholic Church possessed the means, through its teaching and its structure, to overcome all forms of racism in the nation. Rudd was a principal organizer of the five black Catholic lay congresses, whose delegates were elected by parishes across the country, that were held between 1889 and 1894, including one in Cincinnati (1890). There was a continuing attraction for American blacks to convert to Catholicism through the mid-20th century. In several small southern Ohio cities, blacks were not welcome to pursue high school education in the public schools, and so many converted to Catholicism in order to attend Catholic high schools. Chillicothe, Ohio, the state's first capital, experienced this phenomenon, and families such as the Meneffes, Mitchells, and Hairstons remain an important part of the black Catholic population of southern Ohio.

Cincinnati's jurisdiction had been divided twice during the reign of Archbishop Purcell. In 1847, Pope Pius IX created the Diocese of Cleveland, comprising the entire northern section of Ohio. The first bishop, Louis Amadeus Rappe, had come to America with three other French priests, John Baptist Lamy, Joseph Machebeuf and Louis de Groesbriand, all of whom had been recruited for the American missions by Archbishop Purcell. Lamy first went to Danville, Ohio, then known as Sapp Settlement, and served as a missionary priest in central Ohio, founding St. Vincent parish in Mt. Vernon, Ohio, and St. Francis de Sales in Newark, Ohio, before being named the archbishop of Santa Fe. He remains a significant figure in American literature as the archbishop in Willa Cather's Death Comes for the Archbishop. Groesbriand went on to become the bishop of Burlington, Vermont, and Machebeuf the bishop of the Diocese of Epiphany, later known as Denver.

Rappe had only one permanent church in his new diocese, St. Mary on the Flats. Within five years, Rappe had built a new cathedral dedicated to St. John the Evangelist. The Catholic population grew rapidly, and several synods were held to help guide the growing Church. Rappe faced great ethnic tensions when waves of immigration broke over the new diocese. The results were less fortuitous for Rappe in Cleveland than for Purcell in Cincinnati. Various ethnic groups in the new diocese were in great conflict with each other and the bishop. Rappe became increasingly disheartened by the intense conflict, and when he submitted his resignation to Pope Pius IX in 1870 while attending the Vatican Council, his enemies in Cleveland used the occasion to accuse him of scandalous behavior. The local newspaper, The Leader, took up the story, and Rappe was vilified throughout the city. No truth was ever ascertained concerning the charges of confessional solicitation, but Rappe happily took up missionary work in the Diocese of Burlington among the French-speaking population of northern New York and Vermont. He died on Grand Island in Lake Champlain in 1877, and was buried in the cathedral at Cleveland. On March 3, 1868, Cincinnati was further divided by the creation of the Diocese of Columbus. Sylvester Rosecrans, brother of the Civil War General William Rosecrans and auxiliary bishop of Cincinnati, was appointed the first bishop of Columbus. Rosecrans was converted to Catholicism while a student at Kenyon College in Gambier, Ohio. As a consequence of his conversion he had to withdraw from Kenyon, then an Episcopalian men's college founded by the Protestant Episcopal Bishop Philander Chase in 1824. By the time Rosecrans became bishop, Columbus had some 40,000 Catholics. Somerset, Ohio, site of the first permanent Catholic church in the state, was in the new diocese and remained under the Dominicans who had been there since 1818, and who still remained responsible for the church in Somerset into the year 2001. Rosecrans built a new cathedral for Columbus, neither wishing to choose the Irish church, St. Patrick's, nor the German church, Holy Cross (formerly St. Remigius parish), for his cathedral. He dedicated the new St. Joseph Cathedral on Oct. 20, 1878, and died the following day. He was succeeded by John Watterson, president of Mt. St. Mary's in Emmitsburg, Maryland.

Watterson paid off the cathedral debt but by expanding the number of parishes and schools, left the diocese heavily in debt. There was some consideration of suppressing the new diocese for financial reasons, but Watterson's death and the arrival of the financially adept former Cincinnati chancellor, Henry Moeller, ensured the continued existence of the Columbus diocese. In 1904, James J. Hartley was appointed bishop of Columbus. He reigned until 1944 and continued the expansion and building of the institutions which spread and supported the faith. In 1923 he opened a local seminary dedicated to St. Charles Borromeo, which remained in operation until 1969. It is now the only Catholic boys' high school in Columbus.

During the early 20th century, the industrial cities of Ohio grew so rapidly that new dioceses had to be created. In 1910 Toledo became a diocese. The first three bishops of Toledo were to move on to other sees: Joseph Schrembs to Cleveland, Samuel Stritch to Chicago, and Karl Alter to Cincinnati. The Toledo Cathedral of the Queen of the Most Holy Rosary was planned by Bishop Schrembs, begun by Bishop Stritch, and completed in 1940 by Bishop Alter. It is the finest example of Spanish Plateresque architecture in the country. Toledo, like the other Ohio industrial cities, was challenged to care for the great waves of immigrants pouring in from eastern and southern Europe. During the Second World War, the wartime economy with its demand for steel and other materials needed for the war effort provided ample opportunity for numerous Catholic immigrants to find work in the Ohio industrial belt. Two new dioceses were erected during these years of rapid wartime expansion: Youngstown, with James McFadden as bishop (1943–52), in 1943, and Steubenville, with John King Mussio as bishop (1945–77), in 1944. Schools, hospitals, colleges, and charitable institutions proliferated throughout the state. The sacrifice and hard work of religious sisters maintained most of these institutions.

Ohio became a center for Catholic higher education. Major colleges and universities were founded and sustained by religious congregations of men and women. The University of Dayton was founded in 1850 by the Marianist Fathers and Brothers who still provide the leadership of the university. Ohio's largest Catholic university, it draws students from across the United States and abroad. The Marian Institute of the university has the largest Marian library in the world and grants pontifical degrees in Marian theology through its affiliation with the Marianum University in Rome.

Xavier University in Cincinnati and John Carroll University in Cleveland were founded by the Society of Jesus, in 1831 and 1886 respectively. These Jesuit universities have provided the Catholic population of Ohio with the Jesuit educational tradition for well over a century and a half. Today they face the same Catholic identity issues that most Catholic colleges and universities face, but still maintain a significant number of priests and scholastics in administration and on the teaching faculty.

The Ursuline Sisters of Toledo and Cleveland were leaders in Catholic higher education for women in northern Ohio, as were the Sisters of Mercy in Toledo and the Holy Humility of Mary Sisters in Cleveland. The College of Mt. St. Joseph on the Ohio, founded by the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati, has been a mainstay of Catholic women's education in the Archdiocese of Cincinnati. The funds for the establishment and development of these institutions and other institutions owned and operated by communities of women religious throughout the state and the country were acquired through the ability and skill of the sisters themselves, giving further testimony to the extraordinary ability and resourcefulness of American women religious. Few women in American society during the 19th and early part of the 20th centuries had such opportunities to develop and use their education and natural abilities in such public and professional ways. As the decline in vocations to the religious life accelerated and the costs of operation increased greatly, many of the smaller Catholic colleges merged, closed or secularized. Nevertheless many remained and continue to provide educational opportunities for the people of Ohio and across the country.

A unique phenomenon in Catholic higher education in Ohio is the Franciscan University of Steubenville. Founded in 1946 as the College of Steubenville by the Sacred Heart Province of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis with the cooperation of Bishop John King Musso, the university floundered for many years until Father Michael Scanlan, T.O.R., was elected president in 1974. He led the university into the Charismatic movement and beyond. By the time Scanlan retired as president in 2000, after 26 years of service, the university had gained a national reputation by placing a strong emphasis on orthodoxy and youthful enthusiasm, and had won recognition as a source of church renewal and youth retreats.

Ohio is also the home of the Pontifical College Josephinum, a seminary that offers undergraduate, pre-theology and theology degree programs. Founded originally as St. Joseph's Orphan Home in Pomeroy, Ohio, by German born Father Joseph J. Jessing, the institution became incorporated as a seminary in Columbus in 1888. Jessing sought to provide free seminary education for poor German boys to serve the needs of the German immigrant population of the United States, and at the founder's initiative, the seminary came under pontifical jurisdiction in 1892. With the Apostolic Nuncio to the United States as the Chancellor and also the Ordinary of the Josephinum, the seminary holds the unusual position of being the only such institution for the education of students for the priesthood outside of Italy. The state is also home to three diocesan seminaries, Mt. St. Mary's of the West in Cincinnati, as well as Borromeo and St. Mary Seminaries in Cleveland.

The hierarchy of Ohio has played a major role in the life of the Church of the United States. Cardinal Joseph Bernardin, as general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), was instrumental in founding the United States Catholic Conference and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB). He served there as general secretary and president. In 1972, he was named archbishop of Cincinnati and remained there until 1982, when he was transferred to the Archdiocese of Chicago. Bishop James Malone, bishop of Youngstown from 1966 to 1995, was also active in the NCWC and the NCCB, serving as its president from 1984 to 1986. Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk of Cincinnati and Bishop Anthony Pilla of Cleveland have also served as presidents of the Conference, from 1990 to 1992, and from 1996 to 1998, respectively.

In addition to Cardinal Bernardin, Bishop Samuel Stritch of Toledo (1921–30) also became cardinal archbishop of Chicago. Bishop John J. Carberry of Columbus (1965–68) went on to become the cardinal archbishop of St. Louis. Bishop James Hickey of Cleveland (1974–80) became the cardinal archbishop of Washington and Auxiliary Bishop John Krol of Cleveland (1953–61) became the cardinal archbishop of Philadelphia. Other Ohio bishops have also had a significant impact on the life of the national Church. Most notable among these were Archbishops John T. McNicholas of Cincinnati (1925–50) and Karl J. Alter, also of Cincinnati (1950–69). Joseph Schrembs, Bishop of Cleveland (1921–45) and Edward F. Hoban, Bishop of Cleveland (1945–66) were both awarded the personal title of archbishop in recognition of their leadership roles within the Church in the United States.

The bishops of Ohio collaborate in the work of the Church in the state through the Ohio Catholic Conference. Founded in 1945 under the presidency of Archbishop McNicholas, it was known as the Ohio Catholic Welfare Conference. In 1967, in conformity with the change in the National Catholic Welfare Conference, it changed its name to the Ohio Catholic Conference. Meetings are usually held twice a year in Columbus under the presidency of the archbishop of Cincinnati. The conference identifies itself as "the official representative of the Catholic Church in public matters affecting the Church and the general welfare of the citizens of Ohio." It focuses on educational and health issues as well as social concerns, and it lobbies the state legislature on issues pertaining to Catholic interests and those of the general well-being of the citizens of the state.

The Catholic Church in Ohio rests on the institutions, leadership, and labor of earlier leaders; clerical, religious, and lay. From Jacob Dittoe of Somerset to the German trustees of Cincinnati to the newer forms of public presence, the faithful have built and sustained a strong community of believers. The Church in Ohio has positioned itself well to face the challenges of its next century.

Bibliography: The story is recorded by R. BRENNAN, O.P., in Cradle of the Faith in Ohio, published in 1968. F. F. BROWN, A History of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Steubenville, Vol. I: The Mussio Years 1945–1977 (Lewiston/Queenston/Lampeter 1994). J. J. HARTLEY, ed., A History of the Diocese of Columbus, 2 v. (Columbus, Ohio 1918–43). Also see The Catholic Record Society, 197 East Gay St. Columbus, Ohio 43215. M. E. HUSSEY, A History of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati (Strasbourg, France 2000). M. J. HYNES, History of the Diocese of Cleveland: Origin and Growth (1847–1952) (Cleveland 1953). L. A. MOSSING, History of the Diocese of Toledo, 9 v. (Fremont, Ohio 1983).

[F. P. LANE]

O'HURLEY, DERMOT, BL.

Archbishop, listed among Irish martyrs proposed for canonization; b. Lycadon, Limerick, 1519; d. Dublin, June 30, 1584. After graduating at Louvain in 1551, he taught philosophy there and subsequently canon and civil law at Reims. He was consecrated in Rome in 1581, and appointed archbishop of Cashel September 11, receiving the pallium November 27. Landing near Dublin in September 1583, he escaped capture in Drogheda and Slane and proceeded to his own province. Because of the government's threats to his host in Slane, he surrendered at Carrick-on-Suir and was imprisoned in Dublin Castle October 7. He was examined repeatedly by lord justices Loftus and Wallop and, on instructions of Elizabeth's secretary Walsingham, was tortured. Denying charges of treason but refusing religious conformity, he was, on Elizabeth's mandate, hanged after being condemned by martial law, there being no evidence for conviction by civil courts. According to tradition, he was buried in St. Kevin's churchyard, Dublin. O'Hurley was beatified on Sept. 27, 1992.

Bibliography: S. Ó MURTHUILE, A Martyred Archbishop of Cashel (Dublin 1935).

[J. HURLEY]

OKEGHEM, JAN VAN

Great Renaissance composer of the Flemish school (also Ockeghem, Okenghem); b. Hainaut?, Flanders, c.

1420; d. Tours, France, c. 1495. He began his musical career as a member of the polyphonic section of the Antwerp cathedral choir. In 1446 he joined the chapel of the Duke of Bourbon and seven years later transferred to the Royal Chapel, where he successively served as chaplain and composer to three French Kings, Charles VII, Louis XI, and Charles VIII. He was appointed treasurer of the Abbey of St. Martin, of which French monarchs were titular abbots. Fellow musicians wrote motets in his honor during his lifetime and elegies at his death. His stature and influence during the later 15th century were considerable, for his style both links and separates the era of DUFAY and that of DESPREZ.

Although he wrote some secular music, Okeghem's church music forms by far the larger and more important part of his output. Plainsong is used either as a cantus firmus or by way of paraphrase in several of his motets, which include magnificent settings of the antiphons Ave Maria, Salve Regina, and Alma Redemptoris Mater. The responsory for Vespers of the Purification, Gaude Maria, is also a work of impressive proportions and noble polyphonic textures. Of his Masses, 11 survive in complete form. He was one of many composers who successfully transmuted the secular character of the L'homme armé melody into a contrapuntal mosaic of intensely religious fervor, and (like Dufay and J. OBRECHT) he employed the flowing final melisma of a Maundy Thursday antiphon in a notable Missa Caput. In the Missa Fors seulement he draws upon a rondeau of his own composition for highly diversified melodic material. Of his four-part Masses, the Missa Mi-Mi (so called for its bass voice motto) provides ready proof of his ability to write a straightforward and classical style. Both the Missa Cuiusvis toni and the Missa Prolationum are feats of almost unrivaled musical technique, the latter providing a veritable "art of canon" comparable to J. S. BACH's great Art of Fugue. The impressive Requiem qualifies as the earliest extant polyphonic setting of the Missa pro Defunctis.

Bibliography: Collected Works, ed. D. PLAMENAC (2d ed. Philadelphia 1959–). D. PLAMENAC, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 9: 1826–38. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959) F. FITCH, Johannes Ockeghem: Masses and Models (Paris 1997). A. MAGRO, "Premièrement ma baronie de Chasteauneuf: Jean de Ockeghem, Treasurer of St. Martin's in Tours" Early Music History 18: Studies in Medieval and Early Modern Music, ed. I. FENLON (Cambridge 1997) 165–258. M. J. RALEY, "Johannes Ockeghem and the Motet Gaude Maria Virgo," Anuario Musical 46 (1991), 27–55. E. SCHREURS, "Ockeghem in Tours herdacht," Musica Antiqua 14 (1997), 77–78. R. STEWART, ". . . Ita desiderat anima mea ad te, Deus (Ps. 42:1), Johannes Ockeghem, a Most Medieval Composer," Tidschrift van de Koninklijke Vereniging voor Nederlandse Muziekgeschiedenis 47 (1997), 163–200. J. VAN BENTHEM, "'Prennez sur moy vostre exemple': Signae, Text and Cadences in Ockeghem's Prennez sur moy and Missa Cuiusvis toni," Tidschrift van de Koninklijke Vereniging voor Nederlandse Muziekgeschiedenis

47 (1997), 99–118. D. VAN OVERSTRAETEN, “Le lieu de naissance de Jean Ockeghem (ca 1420–1497), une énigme élucidée,” Revue Belge de Musicologie 46 (1992), 23–32.

[D. STEVENS]

OKLAHOMA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the southwestern United States, Oklahoma was admitted to the Union in 1907 as the 46th state. It is bounded on the north by Kansas and Colorado, on the east by Missouri and Arkansas, on the south by the Red River and Texas, and on the west by New Mexico and the Texas Panhandle.

History. The area, traversed by Coronado in the 16th century and explored by the Spanish and French in the 17th and 18th centuries, became the property of the United States by the Louisiana Purchase of 1803. Federal policy very early designated it as a permanent home for the resettlement of various Native American tribes, and the Five Civilized Tribes of the southeastern United States were moved there (1830–45). Virtually the whole area was originally apportioned to these groups, but their tribal districts were later reduced, in part because of their support for the Confederacy during the Civil War. Many other tribes were then relocated within what became known as Indian Territory. One unassigned portion near the center, which became known as the Oklahoma Territory, was opened to white settlement by the famous run of April 22, 1889. Meanwhile the U.S. government directed the native peoples to give up tribal title to their reservation lands and to take allotments as individuals. The resulting “surplus” lands were opened to whites between 1891 and 1906. This made it possible for the Twin Territories to be granted statehood on Nov. 16, 1907.

In Oklahoma, a traditional stronghold of white Protestant culture, residents of foreign birth were few before 20th century. The Southern Baptists constitute the most numerous church group; the Methodists, Presbyterians, Church of Christ, and Disciples of Christ have sizable memberships. Numerous evangelical sects are very active, but the Jewish and Muslim populations are minimal. In the 2001 state population of 3,724,000, Catholics numbered 160,898, or about four percent of the total population of the state.

Missionary Activity. Although friars and priests had accompanied the Coronado and DeSoto expeditions when they passed through the region in 1541 and 1542, no Catholic missionary activity was seen again until 1830, when the Jesuit Charles Van Quickenborne offered Mass at three sites in the northeast portion of the present state. Nominally under the bishop of St. Louis, Missouri, from 1826 to 1843, this vast country was visited occasionally by Jesuits from the Osage Mission in St. Paul, Kansas, who ministered to the army camps and native tribes. When the Diocese of Little Rock, Arkansas, was erected in 1843, Oklahoma was included within its original boundaries. Priests from Fort Smith, Arkansas, made regular missionary tours through the western extension of the diocese.

Of the many tribes in the Oklahoma territory during the 19th century, only two were predominantly Catholic, the Osage and Potawatomi. The first Catholic church in Indian Territory was built in 1872 at Atoka, Choctaw Nation, by Rev. Michael Smyth of Ft. Smith, but he attended it irregularly. Permanent missionary activity began in 1875 with the arrival of French Benedictines from the Abbey of Pierre-que-Vire. Dom Isidore ROBOT, briefly taking up residence in Atoka, was appointed the first prefect apostolic of the Indian Territory in 1876. (This was the only prefecture apostolic ever established in a region that was then part of the United States.) Among the Potawatomi, Robot founded Sacred Heart Mission, termed “the cradle of Catholicity in Oklahoma,” and built boarding schools for boys and girls, the latter in the care of Sisters of Mercy from Lacon, Illinois. He was named an abbot honoris causa by Pope Leo XIII in 1879.

The Benedictine prefecture under Robot and his successor, Ignatius Jean, continued until 1891, when the first bishop, Theophile Meerschaert, a Belgian-born priest working in Mississippi, took over the administration of the Twin Territories. Although Meerschaert’s title at first was Vicar Apostolic of the Indian Territory (1891–1905), in fact the Church was too late on the scene to do much effective evangelization of Native Americans, who were too disheartened and disorganized to respond to the white man’s religion. Growth of the Church in Oklahoma would come with the arrival of Irish railroad workers, Italian and Polish coal miners, and German farmers.

The seat of the vicariate was located at Guthrie, the territorial capital following the land run of 1889, but in 1905 when the vicariate was elevated to diocesan rank and, styled the Diocese of Oklahoma, Bishop Meerschaert moved the see city to Oklahoma City, which was shortly to become the state capital. Counting his time as vicar apostolic, Bishop Meerschaert served in Oklahoma for almost 33 years (1891–1924). Under Meerschaert there was a rapid growth in the number of churches and missions, and a large increase in priests and sisters. An incident that occurred during his episcopate was to have lasting significance on the national scene. In 1917 the state legislature passed the so-called Bone-Dry Law, which forbade the import of alcoholic spirits into Oklahoma. (Manufacture of wine and liquor within the state boundaries was already forbidden by the Oklahoma constitution.) The diocese went to court, charging infringement of religion, and the state supreme court upheld the complaint in 1918. Ironically, this paved the way for national Prohibition, once the precedent for an exception on religious grounds was established in the Oklahoma case.

When Meerschaert died in 1924, he was succeeded by Francis Clement Kelley (1924–1948). Bishop Kelley, recognizing the growing importance of Tulsa to the life the state and the Church in Oklahoma, took steps to have the diocese redesignated as Diocese of Oklahoma and Tulsa in 1930. Kelley's successor was his close friend, Bishop Eugene J. McGuinness (1948–1957), who had served as coadjutor with right of succession since 1944. McGuinness in turn was succeeded by an Oklahoman, the pastor of the co-cathedral in Tulsa, Victor J. Reed (1958–1971). Shortly before his sudden death Bishop Reed had initiated discussions about dividing the diocese. Bishop John R. Quinn, his successor, carried the effort forward. In December 1972, Rome created a new ecclesiastical province. The metropolitan see was to be the Archdiocese of Oklahoma City, with Quinn as the first archbishop (1972–1977). The suffragan sees were to be Diocese of Tulsa with Msgr. Bernard J. Ganter, chancellor of the Galveston-Houston diocese, as the first bishop (1972–1977), and the Diocese of Little Rock, Arkansas, which was transferred from the Province of New Orleans.

See Also: OKLAHOMA CITY, ARCHDIOCESE OF; TULSA, DIOCESE OF.

Bibliography: M. U. THOMAS, The Catholic Church on the Oklahoma Frontier, 1824–1907 (St. Louis 1938). T. E. BROWN, Bible-belt Catholicism: A History of the Roman Catholic Church in Oklahoma, 1905–1904, vol. 33. (New York 1977). J. D. WHITE, Diary of a Frontier Bishop: The Journals of Theophile Meerschaert (Tulsa 1994). J. D. WHITE, Getting Sense: The Osages and their Missionaries (Tulsa 1997); This Far by Faith: 125 Years of Catholic Life in Oklahoma, 1875–2000 (Strasbourg, France 2001). G. FOREMAN, A History of Oklahoma (Norman, Okla. 1942). R. GITTINGER, The Formation of the State of Oklahoma, 1803–1906 (Norman, Okla. 1939). E. C. MCREYNOLDS, A History of the Sooner State (Norman, Okla. 1954). Oklahoma Statutes, 1961, 3 v. (St. Paul 1961). Oklahoma Digest, 1890 to Date (St. Paul 1934- ).

[J. F. MURPHY/W.C. GARTHOEFFNER/J.D. WHITE]

OKLAHOMA CITY, ARCHDIOCESE OF

By reason of a bull of Pope Paul VI (Dec. 13, 1972), the Diocese of Oklahoma City and Tulsa was divided and Oklahoma City (Oklahomapolitana) was designated the metropolitan see (Feb. 6, 1973). The state of Oklahoma had been established as a vicariate apostolic in 1891 and as a diocese in 1905 with Oklahoma City as the diocesan seat. In 1930 the see was redesignated the Diocese of Oklahoma City and Tulsa. At the time that the Archdiocese of Oklahoma City was established (February 1971), Tulsa was made a diocese, and it together with the Diocese of Little Rock, AR, became suffragans of the new archdiocese. At the time when the Archdiocese of Oklahoma City was first established there were about 65,000 Catholics in a total population of 1.5 million; in 2001 the population of the area increased to 2.2 million and the number of Catholics to 98,000.

When the Diocese of Little Rock, AR was erected (1843) it included the Indian Territory (now Oklahoma). Priests from Fort Smith, AR made regular missionary tours through the western extension of the diocese. In 1872, through the efforts of Father Michael Smyth, the first Catholic Church in Oklahoma was built at Atoka, then the terminus of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas railroad. Three years later, Bp. Edward Fitzgerald of Little Rock assigned the whole Indian Territory to the Benedictine Isidore ROBOT, the first priest to take up permanent residence in Oklahoma. On July 9, 1876, Pius IX established the Territory as a prefecture apostolic and named Robot first prefect. When he resigned in 1886, he was succeeded by another Benedictine, Ignatius Jean (1886–1890).

Diocesan Development. After the opening of a large portion of the area to white settlers in 1889, the Holy See, on May 29, 1891, raised Oklahoma to the status of a vicariate apostolic and appointed Theophile Meerschaert, then vicar general of the Diocese of Natchez, MS, vicar apostolic with episcopal rank.

Forty-four years old at the time of his appointment, Meerschaert would serve in Oklahoma for 32 years. It was a period of rapid growth in the number of churches and missions and a large increase in the ranks of the clergy and religious. Originally his seat was at Guthrie, the territorial capital following the Land Run, but on Aug. 17, 1905, the Diocese of Oklahoma was erected and the bishop's headquarters was moved to the rapidly growing town of Oklahoma City—which would become the state capital in 1910, three years after Oklahoma achieved statehood.

Bishop Meerschaert died in 1924 and was succeeded by Monsignor Francis Clement Kelley, founder and president of the Catholic Church Extension Society. One of the most illustrious churchmen to work in Oklahoma, he was the author of 17 books on a wide variety of subjects. As bishop he managed the Church's transition from a predominately rural population to an urban one, opening parishes in Oklahoma City and Tulsa, and suppressing several dozen marginal country parishes across the state.

He recognized the growing importance of Tulsa to the Church's life. Early in his episcopate he considered moving the episcopal seat there, but in 1930 he settled for a redesignation: the Diocese of Oklahoma City and Tulsa, naming the Church of the Holy Family (built in 1914) in Tulsa as the co-cathedral.

During the Depression, Kelley managed to keep the diocese financially solvent through publishing and by giving retreats and lectures around the country. (He was jokingly known as the bishop from Oklahoma.) Although his first years were marked by energetic efforts at expansion, the economic crisis of the 1930s made further initiatives inadvisable. Meerschaert had despaired of attracting American vocations, choosing instead to bring in priests and seminarians from Europe, particularly his native Belgium. Kelley ordained the first two Oklahoma-born diocesan priests in 1928. Relatively few ordinations followed in succeeding years, although Kelley promoted postgraduate studies in Rome and Louvain, and this led to several innovations, such as street preaching, and the introduction of the Young Christian Worker and Christian Family movements, begun in Belgium under Joseph Cardijn. (The first American unit of the Young Christian Workers was at Ponca City, OK).

In 1942 Kelley suffered a series of strokes and was a semi-invalid until his death in 1948. In 1944 Rome appointed as apostolic administrator, Bishop Eugene J. McGuinness, until then the bishop of Raleigh, NC. McGuinness led the Oklahoma church during the expansive postwar years, opening many new hospitals, parishes, and schools. He also campaigned forcefully for vocations. "You have given me your money," he would tell parishioners, "now give me your blood!" The result was an astounding increase among seminarians and religious women. Kelley had begun a junior seminary in 1928, but by the time it was ready to open, he had no funds to operate it. McGuinness established a temporary institution near Oklahoma City, then made plans for a permanent complex, which opened in 1958, a few months after his death. When the bishop began his episcopate in Oklahoma, there were 11 seminarians. Within a few years of the new seminary's inauguration, it had an enrollment of 128. Ordination ceremonies for 10 or 11 priests were common during the McGuinness years.

On Dec. 5, 1957, Monsignor Victor J. Reed, rector of Holy Family Co-Cathedral in Tulsa, was appointed auxiliary bishop of the diocese. Soon afterward, on December 27, Bishop McGuinness suffered a fatal heart attack. The Holy See appointed Reed to succeed him and he was consecrated as the fourth diocesan ordinary on March 5, 1958.

The defining issues for his episcopate were the Second Vatican Council and the war in Vietnam. Bishop Kelley had bequeathed a rich intellectual heritage, and one result was that Catholics in Oklahoma were better prepared for the changes that ensued from the Council. In 1966, St. Gregory's in Shawnee was the scene of the first diocesan council held in the United States after Vatican II. At the same time, Bishop Reed was assailed from two fronts within the diocese. On the one hand were those enraged by what they viewed as the Church's betrayal of its traditions, while on the other there were priests and sisters who became disenchanted with the bishop because they were looking for change beyond what he could authorize. A sudden drop in vocations obliged him to close McGuinness's seminary after only ten years in operation. The manifold pressures may have contributed to his sudden death on Sept. 8, 1971, at the age of 65.

At the time he died, Reed had already begun meetings with a view to dividing the diocese. His successor, Bishop John R. Quinn, the former auxiliary of San Diego, CA, carried this effort forward, with the result that on Dec. 19, 1972, Rome announced the creation of the Archdiocese of Oklahoma City, the establishment of the Diocese of Tulsa, and the combining of these two with the Diocese of Little Rock to form a new ecclesiastical province. Quinn was named the first archbishop.

Even before the diocese was divided, Quinn had to resolve a difficult situation involving "experimental parishes" in Oklahoma City and Tulsa. He requested an evaluation from the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate (CARA), Washington, DC. Informed that the two parishes were not serving the purposes for which they were formed, he terminated both communities. Another of his accomplishments was in 1974 to resurrect the diocesan newspaper that had been discontinued, as The Sooner Catholic. Subsequently, it went on to receive many awards for excellence from the Catholic Press Association.

When Archbishop Quinn was named archbishop of San Francisco early in 1977, he was replaced in Oklahoma by Archbishop Charles A. Salatka, the former bishop of Marquette, MI. Consecrated as auxiliary bishop of Grand Rapids in 1962, Salatka was among the youngest bishops at Vatican II. At his retirement 30 years later, he was the eldest surviving bishop who had seen service at the council. In his 15 years in Oklahoma City, he consolidated the archdiocese's fiscal holdings and developed its outreach to an expanding Hispanic population. Bishop Eusebius J. Beltran, who had served as bishop of the Tulsa diocese since 1978, was named to succeed Archbishop Salatka when he retired in 1992. Archbishop Beltran took office on Jan. 22, 1993. Since then he has continued the initiatives of his predecessor toward Hispanics, while extending the archdiocese's outreach toward youth.

Bibliography: M. U. THOMAS, The Catholic Church on the Oklahoma Frontier, 1824–1907 (St. Louis 1938; Univ. microfilms 1940). J. D. WHITE, This Far by Faith: 125 Years of Catholic Life in Oklahoma, 1875–2000. (Strasbourg 2001).

[W. C. GARTHOEFFNER/J. D. WHITE]

OLAF I TRYGGVESSØN, KING OF NORWAY

Reigned 995 to September 9 (or 10), 1000; b. c. 968; d. Swold. Olaf (Tryggvasøn) was brought up in Novgorod and spent his youth as a Viking. From c. 991 he lived in the British Isles, where he was baptized. Only in 995 did he return to Norway, which he had left with his mother soon after his birth. He was the great-grandson of Harold Finehair, and thus the chieftains recognized him as the sovereign ruler of Norway without any serious opposition. Olaf was an ardent Christian who was determined to introduce Christianity throughout his country, and this led to minor struggles with the strong pagan chieftains. Christianity was legally introduced in Iceland c. 1000 at the instigation of Olaf. His methods of conversion were hardhanded and not very subtle. He is remembered as the apostle of Norway and Iceland, and he is the hero of several sagas of a hagiographic cast. He died in the naval battle of Swold, where he was fighting against an alliance of the Danish and Swedish kings and an exiled Norwegian chieftain.

Bibliography: B. ADALBJARNARSON, Om de norske kongers sagaer (Oslo 1937), with bibliog. S. UNDSSET, Saga of Saints, tr. E. C. RAMSDEN (New York 1934). H. KOHT, Norsk biografisk leksikon (Oslo 1921–) 10:413–419. G. TURVILLE-PETRE, The Heroic Age of Scandinavia (London 1951) 130–139. H. HOLZAPFEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1138.

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

OLAF II, KING OF NORWAY, ST.

Reigned 1015 to July 29, 1030; b. Oplandet, Norway, 995; d. Stiklestad, Norway. His father was a chieftain descended from Harold Finehair. Olaf Haraldsson's early career is not known in detail, but it seems that he was a Viking from his 12th year, the events of his youth being recorded in scaldic verse. Having been baptized in Rouen in 1014, he returned to Norway in 1015 to assert his royal claims. His rebellion against Danish and Swedish overlords in Norway had a strong popular appeal. Olaf was an ardent Christian and tried by every means to uproot the last traces of paganism in Norway; in this he was quite successful. When King Canute the Great was proclaimed king of all Norway in 1028, Olaf fled the country and went into exile in Russia. In the spring of 1030 he returned to Norway, leaving his illegitimate son, the future King Magnus the Good, at the Russian court. He met his opponents in the battle of Stiklestad, where he was killed. Very soon after his death even his enemies came to recognize that they had killed a saint; his intercession was invoked and miracles were recorded. His body was moved to Trondheim, which became the center of the Olaf cult. He was the patron saint of Norway and was venerated also in England, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, and Iceland. He was the subject of medieval Scandinavian iconography, and his life is recorded in several legends, or sagas, both in Latin and in the vernacular.

Feast: July 29.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 2:6322–26; Suppl. 240. O. WIDDING et al., “The Lives of the Saints in Old Norse Prose: A Handlist,” Mediaeval Studies 25 (1963) 294–337, esp. 327–328. S. UNDSSET, Saga of Saints, tr. E. C. RAMSDEN (New York 1934); Sankt Olav, tr. M. NEUHAUSER (Vienna 1947). A. W. BRØGGER, Norsk biografisk leksikon (Oslo 1923–) 10:374–390. G. TURVILLE-PETRE, The Heroic Age of Scandinavia (New York 1951) 140–164. C. E. GIBSON, The Two Olafs of Norway (London 1968). V. HENRIKSEN, Sverdet; Hellig Olav i Borg (Oslo 1974); Hellig Olav (Oslo 1985). M. BLINDHEIM et al., Olav, konge og helgen, myte og symbol (Oslo 1981). E. LUTHEN, I pilgrimenes fotspor til Nidaos (Oslo 1992). Gokstadhøvdingen og hans tid, ed. T. FROST (Sandefjord 1997). Helgonet i Nidaros: Olavskult och kristnande i Norden, ed. L. RUMAR (Sweden 1997). M. KOLLANDSRUD, Pilegrimsleden til Nidaros (Oslo 1997). G. AXEL-NILSSON, “Sankt Olavs hjälm och sporrar”: helgonreliker eller vapengarnityr? (Göteborg 1998).

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

OLÁH, MIKLÓS (OLAHUS)

Archbishop of Gran (Esztergom), Primate of Hungary, humanist; b. Hermanstadt (Nagyszében), Hungary, Jan. 10, 1493; d. Pressburg, Hungary (now Bratislava, Czechoslovakia), Jan. 14, 1568. Oláh, of Wallachian descent, was educated at the Chapter School of Varad and as a page at the court of Vladislav II. After ordination in 1516, he served as secretary to George Szatmáry, chancellor, and later archbishop, of Gran. He was also secretary to King Louis II and continued in this position after Louis's death at the battle of Mohács (1526), serving Queen Mary of Hungary. When Mary was appointed regent of the Netherlands by Charles V, Oláh accompanied her (1531) and engaged in diplomatic missions and humanistic studies until 1542, when he returned to Hungary. Oláh also won the friendship of Erasmus. As an official at the court of Ferdinand I, he became royal chancellor and bishop of Agram (1544), bishop of Erlau (1548), and eventually, archbishop of Gran (1553). Oláh, as primate of Hungary, vigorously encouraged Church reform and opposed Protestant encroachments in Hungary. By frequent visitations, provincial synods, and administrative decrees, Catholicism was strengthened and advanced. Catholic schools and the Jesuits, invited into Hungary (1561), were the principal means of inculcating Catholic beliefs. The decrees of Trent were also employed to revive devotion and zeal. An author of several theological and historical works, including the Ordo et Ritus Ecclesiae Strigoniensis (1560) and Hungaria et Attila (1562), Oláh combined religious conviction and humanist teachings.

Olaf II, King of Norway, standing third from left. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: T. VON BOGYAY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1137–38. D. SINOR, History of Hungary (New York 1959).

[P. S. MCGARRY]

OLAVIDE Y JAUREGUI, PABLO DE

Peruvian scholar and Catholic apologist; b. Lima, 1725; d. Baeza, Spain, 1803. He was a symbol of the century of the Enlightenment, a leader in the movement against traditionalism, and one of those who prepared Spain to adjust to the modern world and come closer to the European intellectual current. In 1752 he went to Spain, occupying there a high position, owing to his intellectual compatibility with the Enlightened ministers of Charles III. Between 1757 and 1764 he spent long periods of time in France and Italy. In 1767 he was unexpectedly appointed chief officer of justice of Seville, intendant of Andalucía, and later superintendent of the colonization of Sierra Morena, an ambitious project for the conversion of vast desert areas into arable lands inhabited by a model rural society. In those positions Olavide's work had two facets: (1) the reform of the cultural regulations of the University of Seville through changing its scholastic orientation and secularizing the teaching system; and (2) the reform of the economic order through agrarian reform. These ideas aroused great opposition. In 1776 he became involved in an inquisitorial trial because of his imprudence in religious matters. In 1780 he escaped to France, where he remained for 18 years.

As a friend of the Encyclopedists (he translated various dramatic works, among them, Voltaire's Zayre), he was well received there, especially by Marmontel and by Diderot, who wrote a biographical sketch of him. While in exile he recovered his lost faith and piety after having survived Jacobine imprisonment. He became an apologist of the Catholic faith against the secular Enlightenment. He returned to Spain (1798) and remained there until his death. His most important work is El evangelio en triunfo o historia de un filósofo desengañado (1798). Autobiographical in nature, it reports the psychological drama in the conversion of an unbeliever and defends the divinity of Jesus and the authenticity of the sacred books. According to Menéndez y Pelayo, it was a precursor of Le génie du christianisme of Chateaubriand.

Bibliography: M. DEFURNEAUX, Pablo de Olavide ou l'Afrancesado (Paris 1959).

[G. LOHMANN VILLENA]

OLD CATHOLICS

A loosely associated group of autonomous communities brought together in the Union of Utrecht (1889) under the presidency of the archbishop of Utrecht. The term Old Catholic implies that VATICAN COUNCIL I introduced into the Roman Catholic Church innovations that left Old Catholicism as the repository of traditional Catholic beliefs. The Old Catholic Church has been colored by many Protestant influences, but it is not a Protestant body. All Old Catholic Churches are strongly influenced by 19th-century nationalism; but none of them is an established state church.

History. The Schism of UTRECHT, which began early in the 18th century, anteceded the Old Catholic movement, which it later joined. Its following was very small by 1870 when a considerable number of Catholic priests and laymen in Germany refused to accept the definitions of Vatican Council I on papal infallibility and primacy. FEBRONIANISM and JOSEPHINISM, particularly as it was expounded by Ignaz von WESSENBURG, greatly influenced the thinking of these men. Ignaz von DÖLLINGER, Johann FRIEDRICH, Franz REUSCH, Johann von Schulte, and other scholars who opposed the Vatican Council's decrees on the papacy exerted still greater influence. Many laymen in these groups belonged to the upper middle class and were also strongly influenced by secularism and nationalism.

In September 1871 at Munich, 300 representatives met to organize the Old Catholic movement; a similar congress gathered in Cologne in 1872. Episcopal leadership was lacking because the entire Catholic hierarchy subscribed to the Vatican Council's decrees. To obtain a validly consecrated bishop, the Old Catholics chose Joseph Reinkens as bishop (June 1873). He was then consecrated by Bp. Heykamp of Deventer in the Netherlands, who belonged to the Little Church of Utrecht (OBC). Döllinger, whose relations with the Old Catholics were always ambiguous, refused to become involved in organized schism and eventually broke completely with the movement because of its innovations. The leaders of the KULTURKAMPF supported the Old Catholics. In Prussia and Baden the government granted them a subsidy and a share of Catholic Church property. In Switzerland the schismatics called themselves Christ katholiken; they were more influenced by secularism and theological liberalism than their associates in Germany, but they failed to gain a wide following. Austria likewise produced an inconsiderable number of Old Catholics.

Polish nationalism gave rise to the POLISH NATIONAL CATHOLIC CHURCH, which admits intercommunion with Old Catholics and Anglicans and subscribes to the Declaration of Utrecht. Inability to accommodate to a non-Polish priesthood and quarrels over education and the administration of church property led in 1897 to the establishment of a breakaway church in Scranton, Pa., that absorbed earlier Polish dissident groups and created a diocese under the jurisdiction of Francis Hodur. Hodur was consecrated bishop in 1907 by bishops of the OBC.

In Poland the mystical sect of MARIAVITES began in 1906 and spread rapidly. At the Old Catholic Congress in Vienna (1909), General Kiréev, a Russian religious enthusiast, presented three Mariavite priests. One of them, John Kowalski, was consecrated bishop in Utrecht by Old Catholic bishops.

Doctrine and Discipline. The autonomous episcopates constituting the Old Catholic community have as a common doctrinal basis the Declaration of Utrecht (1889). However, the Polish National Church and the Swiss Christkatholisch Church maintain beliefs out of harmony with this declaration. In accordance with this document Old Catholics accept the decrees of the first eight ecumenical councils. (Until 1889 some Old Catholics considered themselves bound by the Tridentine decrees.) They admit Sacred Scripture and tradition as sources of revelation; but their notion of tradition differs from the Roman Catholic one. The bishop of Rome is recognized as having merely a primacy of honor, but not a primacy of jurisdiction or infallibility as defined in Vatican Council I. On the one hand, Old Catholics reject both the dogmas of papal infallibility and the Immaculate Conception. On the other hand, they admit seven sacraments, acknowledge the Real Presence in the Eucharist, and recognize the apostolic succession. Auricular confession is optional; sins may be confessed before the congregation or a priest. Clerical celibacy has been abolished. The liturgy resembles the Roman one and is celebrated in the vernacular. Liturgical vestments are the same as the Roman ones.

Each bishopric is autonomous and is governed by a bishop, who in turn must abide by the canons enacted by clerical and lay members of synods, the highest authority. Synods also elect bishops. Since 1889 the Old Catholic archbishop of Utrecht has been president of the International Old Catholic Congress. As a result of an agreement reached in Bonn (1931), intercommunion with the Anglicans has since existed. Each group recognizes the catholicity and independence of the other and admits members of the other communion to participate in its sacraments.

Bibliography: C. B. MOSS, The Old Catholic Movement: Its Origins and History (2d ed. London 1964), by an Anglican. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Der Altkatholizismus (Giessen 1887), by an Old Catholic. J. TROXLER, Die neuere Entwicklung des Altkatholizismus (Cologne 1908). V. CONZEMIUS, "Aspects ecclésiologiques de l'évolution de Döllinger et du vieux Catholicisme," Revue des sciences religieuses 34 (1960) 247–279. P. GSCHWIND, Geschichte der Entstehung der christkatholischen Kirche der Schweiz, 2 v. (Bern 1904–10). W. H. DE VOIL and H. D. WYNNE-BENNETT, Old Catholic Eucharistic Worship (New York 1936). P. ANSON, Bishops at Large (London 1964). K. PRUTER, A History of the Old Catholic Church (Scottsdale, Ariz. 1973). K. PRUTER and J. G. MELTON, The Old Catholic Sourcebook (New York 1983)

[S. J. TONSOR/EDS.]

OLD CHAPTER

A body of the English clergy; it was originated by William BISHOP, bishop of Chalcedon, who in 1623, as part of his plan to reorganize the missionary Church in England, instituted a chapter consisting of a dean and canons. Its functions, as he conceived them, were threefold: to act as an advisory body to the bishop; to preserve continuity of jurisdiction sede vacante; and when the bishop died, to submit to Rome nominations for his successor. Its author took this step, however, without prior reference to Rome, which refused to accord the chapter any official recognition, maintaining that Bishop had acted beyond his jurisdiction. Nevertheless, Rome refrained from any act of censure, chiefly, it seems, from fear of creating scandal. After the death of Richard SMITH, bishop of Chalcedon in 1655, the chapter made a somewhat exaggerated claim that it had the unofficial approval of both Innocent X and Alexander VII for assuming jurisdiction over the Church in England and issuing faculties sede vacante. Rome eventually decided to appoint another bishop, insisting that the chapter should cease to attempt to exercise jurisdiction: both Philip Howard, who was to have been appointed in 1672 if political circumstances had not prevented it, and John Leyburn, who was appointed in 1685, were made to promise to enforce this. Though after 1685 it never again tried to exercise jurisdiction, the chapter continued to claim canonical status and to perpetuate itself until the hierarchy was restored in 1850; its members then disbanded and reformed themselves into the Old Brotherhood of the Secular Clergy.

Bibliography: Archives of the Old Brotherhood, partly catalogued in 1876 (HMC. 5th Report. Appendix: 463–470.). Many documents were removed to Westminster Cathedral Archives (ser. A, v.17ff.; ser. B, v.25ff.). The rest remain with the Old Brotherhood. H. TOOTELL, Dodd's Church History of England, ed. M. A. TIERNEY, 5 v. (London 1839–43). E. H. BURTON, Life and Times of Bishop Challoner, 1691–1781, 2 v. (London 1909). B. HEMPHILL (pseud. for B. WHELAN), The Early Vicars Apostolic of England, 1685–1750 (London 1954) passim. J. SERGEANT, An Account of the Chapter . . . ed. W. TURNBULL (London 1853), based on Ward's MS history in the Old Brotherhood Archives. J. A. WILLIAMS, "The Old Chapter and the Secular Clergy," Catholic Recusancy in Wiltshire (London 1968). G. V. ANSTRUTHER, Cardinal of Norfolk (in progress), ch. 4, 5. T. A. BIRRELL, "English Catholics without a Bishop," Recusant History 4.4 (1957–58). A. F. ALLISON, "Richard Smith, Richelieu and the French Marriage," ibid. 7.4 (1963–64).

[A. F. ALLISON]

OLD DELUDER SATAN ACT

The name given to the Massachusetts school ordinance of 1647, derived from its preamble, which begins, "It being one of the chief projects of that old deluder Satan to keep men from the knowledge of the Scriptures." The legislation proper required that townships of 50 families or more appoint a common schoolmaster to teach reading and writing, his wages to be paid by either the parents or the town. Townships of 100 families were to establish a grammar school to prepare students for the university. Townships failing to comply with these demands were to pay a yearly fine of £5 to the nearest school until the order be carried out.

This ordinance is often quoted both as a measure to restrict Anglican and Catholic influence through the imposition of Puritan belief, and as the first Colonial legislative approval of the Calvinist principle of union of church and state in education with the latter given the authority to promote education as a public service. The preamble, however, seems rather an expression of religious belief offered as motivation to fulfill an obligation that had educational, social, and religious ramifications: the training of citizens who would be of service to church and state rather than a charge upon the community.

Although schools had been established by free initiative before the 1647 ordinance, they were few and not widely effective. The ordinance of 1642, the first Massachusetts educational legislation, had placed the responsibility for the literacy of children and indentured servants upon the heads of families. Since this legislation had proved insufficient, the 1647 ordinance required the establishment of an educational system and offered religious motivation and monetary sanctions to ensure its organization.

Bibliography: S. E. MORISON, The Intellectual Life of Colonial New England (New York 1956).

[F. F. BURCH]

OLD ROMAN CHANT

The chant of Rome exists in two versions: Gregorian, found especially in musical manuscripts copied in Carolingian domains beginning in the late 9th century, and Old Roman, known from a small group of musical manuscripts—three graduals, two antiphoners, and an orational—written in Rome between 1071 and c. 1250.

Comparison of Old Roman and Gregorian. Comparison of the two reveals essentially the same Mass and Office structure, calendar, and texts, though with minor differences, e.g., in the Old Roman, the absence of a Mass for the Fourth Sunday of Advent, a special Vespers for Easter week, the lack of hymns, the use of only eight responsories in Matins, and a “double” Matins Office for certain feasts. More striking are the musical differences, showing two distinct yet cognate melodic traditions. In general, one finds similar melodic shapes, confirming the common origin of both melodic repertoires, but independent stylistic development, the Old Roman presenting a more ornate version of the repertory as the brief excerpt illustrates.

Many theories have been proposed to explain which is the older or original melodic version; to what the melodic and liturgical differences can be ascribed; when, how, and why the “split” into two traditions occurred; and why the Gregorian is not found in Rome before c. 1250 (the manuscript evidence suggests only the Old Roman was known in Rome before this time). Mocquereau focused attention on the Old Roman chant (which he called “Vatican”) as early as 1891, concluding from a study of three of the sources that the Old Roman melodies constituted a post-Gregorian transformation. Andoyer’s slightly later studies revealed a more ancient liturgical practice in the Old Roman and the absence of feasts known to have been added to the Gregorian after c. 800; he therefore classified the repertory as pre-Gregorian. A summary of more recent thinking follows.

Recent Theories. On the basis of historical-liturgical evidence [M. Andrieu, Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge, 5 v. 3 (Louvain 1951) 211–227], Bruno Stäblein believes that both chants are of Roman origin and that the Old Roman version is earlier, revised into the Gregorian in the late 7th century. Joseph Smits van Waesberghe points to certain veiled references in the Liber Pontificalis to a struggle for liturgical primacy between Roman monks and clergy in the 7th century as further testimony that two chants may have existed in Rome at this time, one for each group. Other such evidence has attracted still other scholars to this view. Nevertheless, caution must be exercised here for the historical testimony has been shown to be sometimes totally unreliable and often ambiguous. However probable this theory may seem, no unequivocal evidence for it has yet been found.

Other research has sought answers primarily from the music itself. Helmut Hucke, for example, comparing the gradual chants of both repertoires, concludes that the more direct, less ornate Gregorian melodies are later transformations of the Old Roman, made not in Rome but in a different stylistic climate with different aesthetic preferences—in Carolingian France. Walther Lipphardt, however, sees the Old Roman as the later version, produced not by revision but as the result of a presumed oral tradition in Rome. Taking into account the appearance of Gregorian-chant manuscripts in the Carolingian empire beginning around the end of the 9th century, but the total lack of any musical manuscripts in Rome before 1071, he suggests the chant that accompanied the Roman liturgy into France in the 9th century was the Gregorian, known orally in Rome but written down and fixed in France. The Old Roman is the result of two more centuries of oral transmission of those same melodies in Rome. Hence, Lipphardt proposes that we have the Roman chant in two stages of development: in the 9th-century form as recorded in France, and in the 11th-century form as recorded in Rome.

The Old Roman manuscript evidence seems, at least for the present, to complicate rather than clarify the situation. The paucity of musical sources—only six—could be explained by presuming the Old Roman remained an orally transmitted tradition up to its demise in the second half of the 13th century. These few manuscripts, then, may have served primarily to help ensure conformity in the oral tradition, or to help aid memory, or even just to preserve this unique melodic repertory. Moreover, in certain places, e.g., the antiphons of the Psalter and the Office for the Dead, melodic divergencies among the sources containing these melodies are so great as to suggest manuscript redaction directly from oral tradition. Most often, however, the sources reveal virtual identity for pieces in common, indicating a uniform and well-established written tradition. Possibly, then, some interplay between oral and written forms of the Old Roman chant may have existed.

In any case, all theories advanced so far should be considered inconclusive. The historical-liturgical evidence is of doubtful value; the meaning of the manuscript evidence is unclear; and the musical studies are incomplete. At present, we are still unable to determine whether the melodic differences between Old Roman and Gregorian can be attributed to evolution in an oral tradition, to different stylistic developments, or to deliberate reform; or whether the general assumption, valid in other disciplines, that the more ornate version of something is necessarily later applies here. What is needed most now is a systematic, exhaustive musical comparison of the two melodic repertoires. Perhaps then it will be possible to describe more exactly their relationship and to trace more clearly the development of each.

Bibliography: W. APEL, "The Central Problem of Gregorian Chant," Journal of the American Musicological Society 9 (1956) 118-127. P. F. CUTTER, "The Question of the 'Old-Roman' Chant: A Reappraisal," Acta Musicologica 39 (1967) 2-20. S. J. P. VAN DIJK, "The Urban and Papal Rites in Seventh- and Eighth-Century Rome," Sacris erudiri, xii (1961), 411-87; "The Old Roman Rite," Studia patristica, v (1962), 185-205; "Recent Developments in the Study of the Old-Roman Rite," Studia patristica, 8 (1966), 299-319. P. PEACOCK "The Problem of the Old Roman Chant," Essays Presented to Egon Wellesz, ed. J. WESTRUP (Oxford 1966), 43-7. P. F. CUTTER, "The Old-Roman Chant Tradition: Oral or Written?," Journal of the American Musicological Society, 20 (1967), 167-89. T. CONNOLLY, "Introits and Archetypes: Some Archaisms of the Old Roman Chant," Journal of the American Musicological Society 25 (1972), 157-74. P. F. CUTTER, "Oral Transmission of the Old-Roman Responsories?," Musical Quarterly, 62 (1976), 182-94. H. HUCKE, "Toward a New Historical View of Gregorian Chant," Journal of the American Musicological Society 33 (1980), 437-67. J. DYER, "Latin Psalters, Old Roman and Gregorian Chants," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 67 (1984), 11-30. P. BERNARD, "Sur un aspect controversé de la réforme carolingienne: 'vieux-romain' et 'grégorien'," Ecclesia orans, vii (1990), 163-89. T. KARP, "Interrelationships between Old Roman and Gregorian Chant," Cantus Planus IV: Pécs 1990, 187-203. M. BEZUIDENHOUT, "The Old and New Historical Views of Gregorian Chant: Papal and Franciscan Plainchant in Thirteenth-Century Rome," International Musicological Society: Congress Report v. 15 (Madrid 1992). D. HILEY, Western Plainchant: A Handbook (Oxford 1993), 530-40. J. DYER, "Prolegomena to a History of Music and Liturgy at Rome during the Middle Ages," Essays on Medieval Music in Honor of David G. Hughes, ed. G. M. BOONE (Cambridge, Mass. 1995), 87-115. P. BERNARD, Du chant romain au chant grégorien (Paris 1996).

[P. CUTTER/EDS.]

OLDEGAR, ST.

Political counselor, crusader, and re-founder of Tarragona metropolitanate; b. Barcelona, 1060; d. Barcelona, March 1, 1137. A child canon of Barcelona where he became deacon (1089), dean (1094), and priest, Oldegar (or Oleguer) retired to Saint-Adrian in Provence where he became prior (1099), then to its motherhouse, Saint-Ruf in Avignon, where he became abbot (1113). In 1116 he was elected bishop of Barcelona, at that time the central see for the autonomous Count of Barcelona-Provence. In 1118 the pope and the count made him metropolitan in exile as well, with the task of restoring the metropolitanate of Tarragona, a step psychologically important to crusading Catalonia. Oldegar traveled to Rome and Palestine, to reform councils at Toulouse (1119) and REIMS (1119), to the first LATERAN COUNCIL (1123), and to Clermont (1130). As crusade legate in SPAIN, especially during the Tortosa and Lérida campaigns, Oldegar—in his position of peacemaker—helped remove Castilian armies from Aragon, thus preparing the way for the later union of Aragon and Catalonia.

Feast: March 6.

Bibliography: H. FLÓREZ et al., España sagrada (Madrid 1747-1957) 29:472-499, biog. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:503-504. F. SOLDEVILA, Història de Catalunya, 3 v. (Barcelona 1962). For additional bibliog., see BARCELONA.

[R. I. BURNS]

OLDMEADOW, ERNEST JAMES

Journalist and novelist; b. Chester, England, Oct. 31, 1867; d. London, Sept. 11, 1949. He was the son of Wesleyan parents and he embarked on the ministry in Nova Scotia. He was converted to Catholicism in 1897 and shortly after was appointed editor of the London Musical Times. Cardinal Francis BOURNE offered him the editorship of the Tablet on the death of James Milburn (1860-1923) who had served the paper for many years, the last three as editor. Oldmeadow accepted and was, from Bourne's point of view, a good choice: they agreed that the journal's primary purpose was to defend the Church against the Church of England. In his 13 years as editor Oldmeadow conducted the controversy with unremitting zest; he had a vigorous, pugnacious style, which he kept fresh, he said, by writing standing up and wearing a hat. After World War I, however, there was not the same public for the old controversy in the old way. Bourne expected to draw, as his predecessors had done, a substantial income for the archdiocese from two-thirds of the profits of the paper; the other portion went to Cardinal Herbert Vaughan's foundation for the MILL HILL MISSIONARIES. When the paper's circulation fell to less than 3,000, Cardinal Arthur HINSLEY, Bourne's successor, soon sold it and thus Oldmeadow's editorship was terminated (1936) in a manner he resented. But the paper had never absorbed all his interests. He had founded a wine business (1912) under the name Francis Downman, and had made some mark as a novelist of the romantic Edwardian school. He was versatile and warmly convivial, and his apparently belligerent manner did him less than justice. In 1933 Bourne made him, together with H. Belloc and G. K. Chesterton, a Knight Commander of St. Gregory. Oldmeadow remained vigorous until he was more than 80, but after leaving the Tablet he took little part in Catholic life beyond writing the two-volume Francis Cardinal Bourne (1940–44), and novels, among them Susan (1907), The Scoundrel: A Romance (1907), and Antonio (1909), the best-known of a long list that began with Lady Lohengrin in 1896. He wrote also studies of Schumann, Chopin, and Mozart.

[D. WOODRUFF]

O'LEARY, HENRY JOSEPH

Second archbishop of Edmonton, Alberta, Canada; b. Richibucto, New Brunswick, Canada, March 13, 1879; d. Victoria, British Columbia, Canada, March 5, 1938. He was ordained Sept. 1, 1901, and after a brief period of parish and chancery work, he was named bishop of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and consecrated at Bathurst, New Brunswick, May 22, 1913. Zealous in promoting priestly and religious vocations, the young bishop proved himself also a capable administrator, undertaking a vast program of church and school development. On Sept. 7, 1920, he was transferred to the Edmonton archdiocese, where he continued his pastoral efforts, particularly in the field of education. Schools, churches, and hospitals were the special object of his solicitude. In spite of illness in his later years, O'Leary indefatigably strove to pave the way for the sound future development of the Edmonton archdiocese.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of Edmonton.

[C. DOZOIS]

OLGA, ST.

Also known as Helga, princess of Kiev; b. Pskov, Russia, c. 890; d. Kiev, Russia, July 11, 969. Probably of Slavic descent, Olga married Igor, the Varangian prince of Kiev in 903, and after his death on campaign in 945 she acted as regent for their son Svyatoslav (d.

972). Her revenge against the Drevlians for her husband's death is described at length by Nestor in the Primary Chronicle, and the monastic historian has high praise for her courage and ability as a ruler. She instituted administrative and fiscal reforms throughout the realm and hastened its recovery from the destructive wars of Igor. Late in 957 she visited Constantinople; and although the Russian sources describe her baptism there, it appears from a careful reading of the Greek accounts that Olga had already been a Christian for several years when she visited the court of Emperor CONSTANTINE PORPHYROGENITUS. Although she might well have been received into the Latin rite in Kiev c. 955, the princess, in an effort to gain autonomy for the Russian church, was prepared to enter into relations with either Rome or Byzantium, and her visit to Constantine was followed by a letter to OTTO I, asking that missionaries be sent to her people. Her baptism was not followed by the conversion of the whole nation, for the pagan party rallied around her son Svyatoslav, who resisted all efforts of his mother to instruct him in the faith. After her son had come of age in 964, Olga again served as regent in Kiev while he was engaged in wars against the Bulgars, and on her death he gave her a Christian burial in that city. Olga was early recognized as a saint and is honored in the Russian and Ukrainian Churches, along with her grandson VLADIMIR, who effected the Christianization of his people c. 988.

Feast: July 11.

Bibliography: The Russian Primary Chronicle, ed. and tr. S. H. CROSS and O. P. SHERBOWITZ-WETZOR (Cambridge, Mass. 1953) 64–87, 111. CONSTANTINE, PORPHYROGENITUS, De cerimoniis . . ., bk. 2, ch. 15 in Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 112:1107–12. E. GOLUBINSKY, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi (2d ed. Moscow 1900–01) 1.1:74–104, 241–242. G. LAEHR, Die Anfänge des russischen Reiches (Berlin 1930) 103–106. G. VERNADSKY, Kievan Russia (New Haven 1948) 32–47. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:72. B. DEL COLLE, Olga e Gorbaciov: 1000 anni di cristianesimo in Russia (2d ed. Turin 1988). Kniaginia Kievskaja Olga (Moscow 2000) anonymous author. A. S. KOROLEV, Istoriia mezhdunkniazheskikh otoshenii na Rusi (Moscow 2000).

[B. J. COMASKEY]

OLIER, JEAN JACQUES

Founder of the Seminary and the Society of Saint-Sulpice; b. Paris, Sept. 20, 1608; d. Issy, April 2, 1657. Olier was baptized in the church of St. Paul, Paris, on the day of his birth; he spent his childhood in Lyons, where his father had been assigned as administrator of justice. There he completed his classical education with the Jesuits. He made his philosophical studies at the College of Harcourt, Paris. After studying theology at the Sorbonne, he undertook further Hebrew study in Rome. Returning to France in 1631 on the occasion of his father's death, Olier placed himself under the spiritual direction of (St.) VINCENT DE PAUL and was subsequently ordained on May 21, 1633, by Bp. Étienne Puget, auxiliary bishop of Metz.

Although he remained a lifelong friend of (St.) Vincent, Olier came under the guidance of Père Charles de CONDREN, the superior of the Oratory, who had dedicated himself to the renovation of priestly life in France. When Olier was offered a bishopric, which his family urged him to accept, it was De Condren who prevailed upon him to refuse it. Before he died (Jan. 7, 1641), De Condren divulged his plans for implementing the Tridentine decrees concerning the preparation of candidates for the priesthood.

On Dec. 29, 1642, Olier and two priests rented a small house in Vaugirard, a suburb of Paris, not to initiate a religious community, but to establish a favorable environment for the training of priests. The experiment attracted attention, and soon six priests and eight seminarians shared a common schedule of work and prayer. On Aug. 10, 1642, Olier assumed charge of the parish church of Saint-Sulpice, Paris, and the community of Vaugirard joined him there. In 1643 Olier requested the government's approval for his society of priests. In November 1645, this petition was granted. In 1652 Olier relinquished his pastoral charge of the parish of Saint-Sulpice and devoted the rest of his life primarily to seminary work. He had the happiness of assigning priests of his community to four other seminaries: Nantes (1649), Viviers (1650), Le Puy (1652), and Clement (1653).

The last five years of his life were marked by great suffering and physical hardship caused by his intense labors. Olier is a leader of the "French School of Spirituality," and his writings have had a worldwide influence into the 20th century. Although he did not produce a systematic or scientific corpus of ascetical theology, his works show him to be a master of the spiritual life (see SULPICIANUS).

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857). E. M. FAILLON, Vie de M. Olier, 2 v. (4th ed. Paris 1873). P. POURRAT, Father Olier, Founder of St. Sulpice, tr. W. S. REILLY (Baltimore 1932). P. BOISARD, La Compagnie de St. Sulpice, trois siècles d'histoire, 2 v. (multigraphed; Paris 1962). E. A. WALSH, The Priesthood in the Writings of the French School: Berulle, De Condren, Olier (Washington 1949). F. MONIER, Vie de Jean Jacques Olier, curé de la paroisse et fondateur du séminaire de Saint-Sulpice (Paris 1914). E. LEVESQUE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:963–982.

[C. J. NOONAN]

OLIGER, LIVARIUS

Franciscan historian; b. Schorbach (Diocese of Metz), France (Germany), Feb. 17, 1875; d. Rome, Jan. 29, 1951. He entered the FRANCISCAN order in 1892, was ordained in 1900, and from 1906 to 1950 held the chair of Franciscan history at the Antonianum in Rome. From 1911 to 1915 he also served as associate editor of the Archivum Franciscanum historicum at Quaracchi (near Florence) and during World War I (1915–18) returned to Germany, where he taught at St. Anna in Munich. Olier held the post of professor of hagiography (from 1931) and historical method (from 1941) at the University of the Lateran and was cofounder of the Franciscan journal Antonianum (Rome 1926–). His writings—including critical editions and commentaries; pioneer work on the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS, FRATICELLI, and Brethren of the Free Spirit; mission history; biography; and hagiographical studies—were crowned by his Expositio quattuor magistrorum super regulam fratrum minorum, 1241–1242 (Rome 1950).

Bibliography: Miscellanea historica p. L. Olier . . . oblata Antonianum 20 (Rome 1945) with bibliog. L. SPÄTLING, Franziskanische Studien 32 (1950) 362–381, with bibliog. since 1945. Antonianum 26 (1951) 210–214.

[O. J. BLUM]

OLIVA, ABBEY OF

Cistercian monastery near Danzig, founded in 1174 by Subislaus I, a prince of Pomerania, colonized in 1186 from the abbey of Kolbatz. It became the center of the CISTERCIAN mission in Prussia. In 1224 pagan Prussians demolished the monastery, and it was after this that a three-aisled Romanesque basilica, based on the second plan of CLAIRVAUX (see CISTERCIAN ART AND ARCHITECTURE), was built. When this church was destroyed by fire in 1350, it was rebuilt in its present dimensions (more than 300 feet long) with the addition of a polygonal gallery choir. The star vaulting, built from 1577 to 1582, was patterned on English models. In the 18th century the church was remodeled along extravagant baroque lines; among other innovations, a famous organ with three manuals and 83 stops was installed. The abbey was secularized in 1831; the abbey church, converted into a parish church in 1835, became the cathedral of the newly established Diocese of Danzig in 1925. Since 1945 Oliva has been a Polish Cistercian priory.

Bibliography: Die Ältere Chronik und die Schrifttafeln von Oliva, ed. T. HIRSCH in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 5 v. (Leipzig 1861–74) v. 1. Fontes Olivenses, ed. W. KETRZYŃSKI in Monumenta Poloniae historica, 6 v. (Cracow 1864–93) 6:257–382. Annales Olivenses aetate posteriores (Thorn 1916–18). T. HIRSCH, Das

Kloster Oliva (Danzig 1850). H. J. SLEUMER, Die Ursprüngliche Gestalt der Zisterzienser Abteikirche Oliva (Heidelberg 1909). F. J. WOTHE, "Die Kirchen der Diözese Danzig," Festgabe für Bischof Carl M. Splett (Hildesheim 1963) 14–22.

[A. SCHNEIDER]

OLIVAIN, PIERRE

Jesuit priest; b. Paris, Feb. 22, 1816; d. there, May 26, 1871. After studies at the Collège Charlemagne and the École normale, Olivaint gained an agrégé in history, taught in Paris and Grenoble, and then tutored the son of the Duc de Rochefoucauld-Liancourt. Although religiously indifferent as a youth, he entered the JESUITS (1845). After ordination (1850), he taught history (1852–57) in the newly opened Collège de Vaugirard in Paris. During his term there as rector (1857–65), the college became the leading private school in the capital. Olivaint was then named superior of the Jesuit Parisian residence at rue de Sèvres (1865–71). He was absorbed in retreat and sodality work until the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War (1870). When his residence was designated an auxiliary hospital during the war, he showed an equal devotion to the wounded.

When the Commune revolted against Versailles, he sent his community from Paris but remained there himself with a priest and two brothers. He and Father Caubert were arrested (April 4, 1871), and sent to the Conciergerie prison where they found three other Jesuit priests, Ducoudray, Clerc, and de Bengy. Next day the Commune declared the prisoners "hostages of the people of Paris." By April 13 more than 200 hostages had been gathered in the prison of Mazas. When the government reoccupied all Paris except the 11th arrondissement, the Commune ordered their execution, and had them transferred to the Rouquette prison. Six hostages, including two Jesuits, were shot on May 24. Two days later, 47 prisoners, including Olivaint and his fellow religious, were ordered to leave the Rouquette. Guarded by communards, they walked to Belleville through jeering crowds until, at 83 rue Haxo, the mob massacred them and threw their bodies into a cesspool. After the fall of the Commune (May 28), the remains of Olivaint and his Jesuit companions were returned to the rue de Sèvres. Their beatification process was introduced in Rome in 1937.

Bibliography: A. DE PONLEVOY, Actes de la captivité et de la mort des RR. PP. P. Olivaint . . . (Paris 1871; 17th ed. 1907). C. CLAIR, Pierre Olivaint (Paris 1878). É. LECANUET, L'Église de France sous la Troisième République 1: 99–126. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon 1324–25.

[R. J. SEALY]

OLIVÉTAN, PIERRE ROBERT

Reformer and biblical scholar; b. Noyon, c. 1506; d. Ferrara, 1538. Olivétan was a relative of John Calvin, with whom he was associated at the University of Paris and in the publication of his French version of the Bible. A reformer, he fled from Paris to Orléans and in May of 1528 was studying Greek and Hebrew in Strassburg. He may have preceded Guillaume FAREL in teaching Reform doctrines in Geneva, but he was soon expelled (1532). At Neuchâtel he was employed by the sect of the WALDENSES in the Piedmont valley, for whom he prepared a French translation of the Bible. The work La Bible qui est toute la Saint Esriture appeared at Neuchâtel in June of 1535, with a preface by Calvin and a notable introduction by "the humble little translator," who lays the book at the feet of Christ's body, the Church. Calvin credits Olivétan with a lively and penetrating mind; E. Doumergue calls him for his eloquence and humor "un Rabelais évangélique"; H. Kunze pronounces him "a rationalist philologist." He used Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples's earlier translation with scholarly discretion.

Bibliography: É. DOUMERGUE, Jean Calvin, 7 v. (Lausanne 1899–1927) 1:117–125. H. KUNZE, Die Bibelübersetzungen von Lefèvre d'Étaples und von P. R. Olivétan (Leipzig 1935). J. COURVOISIER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1627.

[J. T. MCNEILL]

OLLÉ-LAPRUNE, LÉON

French philosopher, b. Paris, July 25, 1839; d. there, Dec. 13, 1898. He came of a deeply Christian family. Ollé-Laprune studied at the Lycée Condorcet and the École Normale (1858). He was honored with the degree agrégé des lettres (1861), and taught successively at the lycées of Nice (1861), Douai (1864), Versailles (1868), and Henry IV in Paris (1871). From 1875 to his death he lectured at the École Normale.

Ollé-Laprune was a fervent Catholic; the example of his life as well as the sublimity of his thought had great influence on his students, especially at the École Normale. The essential characteristic of his teaching was the inauguration of a living philosophy whose duty it was to seek concrete certitude, at once solidly moral and intellectual. The true philosopher, he would say, thinks with his whole being, and is always "attached to God as principle, support, light and rule of all thought." Some of his many works are La Philosophie de Malebranche (1870), De la Certitude morale (1880), Le Prix de la vie (1894), La Vitalité chrétienne (1901), and La Raison et le rationalisme (1906). Ollé-Laprune's greatest contribution was the inspiration he gave to a brilliant disciple, M. BLONDEL. In his thesis on L'Action (1893), the pupil undertook to develop in a systematic manner the message of his master—a message calling for the establishment of an “integral realism” in thought, in action, and in being.

Bibliography: R. CRIPPA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1010–13.

[R. JOLIVET]

OLMOS, ANDRÉS DE

Franciscan missionary and linguist, early investigator of Native American lore in New Spain; b. near Oña, Burgos, Spain, c. 1491; d. Tampico, New Spain, buried there, August of 1570 (not Oct. 8, 1571, as some sources state). He spent some years in Olmos, near Valladolid, whence came the name he used. He studied at the University of Valladolid and at age 20 entered the Franciscan Order at Abrojo. When his superior, Juan de ZUMÁRRA-GA, was named bishop of Mexico, he took Andrés de Olmos to New Spain with him in 1528. According to the chronicler Vázquez, he was in Guatemala from 1529 to the middle of 1530, but it is probable that he was there after 1543. He spent some time in Tecamachalco, where he was superior in 1543; in Tlalmanalco; in Cuernavaca; and in Tlaxcala. In 1544 he tried to go to Florida and was at least instrumental in getting the expedition under way. He was chiefly responsible for spreading Christianity among the Huastec, Totonac, Tepehua, and Chichimec tribes, often with great sacrifice. From Hueytlalpan he evangelized the surrounding area and in the process learned Totonac and Tepehua. There, to assist in the work of conversion, he wrote his Arte de la lengua mexicana (1547) and prepared grammars in Totonac and Huastec. In 1557, or shortly thereafter, he penetrated the interior north of Tamaholipa and sought help in colonizing the area of the three rivers of Palmas (today Soto la Marina), Bravo, and Achiuse (today the Mississippi).

[J. MEADE]

OLSSON, ERIK (OLAI)

Theologian, historian; b. Sweden, c. 1422; d. Uppsala, Sweden, Dec. 24, 1486. Educated in Rostock, where he was magister artium in 1452, he became a canon in Uppsala as indicated by a document of 1459, and was a magister in sacra theologia of Siena in 1475. From 1477 to his death he was professor of theology at the University of Uppsala (founded 1477). Though he was a learned theologian and a writer of hymns, he is principally remembered as “the father of Swedish historiography.”

His chief work, Chronica regni Gothorum (Chronica Erici Olai), is a chronicle with a fine patriotic spirit and a somewhat strong feeling of hatred toward Denmark. It was written probably in the late 1460s and the early 1470s, and compiled from a vast collection of sources, both in Latin and in the vernacular, among them the rhymed chronicles.

Bibliography: Chronica Erici Olai in Scriptores rerum Svecicarum medii aevi, 3 v. (Uppsala 1818–76) 2:1–165. H. ÖSTLUND in Svenska män och kvinnor, v. 2 (Stockholm 1944) 438–439. E. NYGREN, in Svenskt biografiskt lexikon, v. 14 (Stockholm 1953) 216–242, with bibliog.; Kulturhistorisk leksikon för nordisk medeltider, v. 2 (Copenhagen 1957) 603–604. H. JÄGERSTAD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:992–993.

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

OLYMPIAS, ST.

Early Christian widow, deaconess, and devoted friend of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM; b. Constantinople, c. 361; d. Nicomedia, July 25, 408. Heiress to a fabulous fortune, Olympias was reared by her uncle, Procopius, an intimate friend of GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS. For her marriage to Nebridius, prefect of Constantinople (384), Gregory composed a poem, the earliest Christian Mirror for Women (Patrologia Graeca 37: 1541–50). After two unhappy years of marriage she was left a childless widow and devoted herself to God's service and a life of charity. She refused offers of remarriage and rejected a kinsman of Emperor Theodosius, who curtailed her association with ecclesiastics and impounded her property for five years. She devoted her time and wealth to charitable works and encouraged GREGORY OF NYSSA in his Scripture commentaries; and Bishop Nectarius made her a deaconess. When John Chrysostom succeeded Nectarius as patriarch in 398, she placed herself under his spiritual direction and founded a convent adjoining the cathedral. During the tragic events that led to Chrysostom's illegal deposition, she stood by him and refused to enter into communion with his unlawful successor. This led to her own persecution and exile, during which Chrysostom exhorted and consoled her in 17 letters (404–7). Under JUSTINIAN I her body was returned to Constantinople and buried in the convent that she had founded and that the emperor had rebuilt.

Feast: Dec. 17 (Roman MARTYROLOGY); July 24, 25, and 26 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: Analecta Bollandiana 15 (1896) 400–423; 16 (1897) 44–51, Vita. S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles 11:416–440, 629–631. E. VENABLES, Dictionary of Christian Biography 4:73–75. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de

Father Edward Flanagan in Germany. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

liturgie 12.2:2064–71. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, Lettres à Olympias, ed. and tr. A. M. MALINGREY (Sources Chrétiennes 13; 1947, 2d ed. Paris 1968); Lettre d'exil à Olympias et à tous les fidèles, ed. and tr. A. M. MALINGREY (Paris 1964). C. BUTLER, ed., The Lausiac History of Palladius, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1898–1904) ch. 56. E. A. CLARK, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Friends (2d ed. New York 1982).

[P. W. HARKINS]

OMAHA, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Erected as the vicariate apostolic of Nebraska on Jan. 9, 1857; it was designated the Diocese of Omaha (Omahensis) on Oct. 2, 1885, and an archdiocese on Aug. 7, 1945, with suffragan sees at Grand Island and Lincoln, NE. In 2001 there were about 214,046 Catholics in a total population estimated at 830,522.

Early History. A Catholic settlement, made at St. John's City in Dakota County in 1856 by Rev. Jeremiah

F. TRECY of Dubuque, IA, was cut short by a destructive tornado after four years. When the first vicar apostolic, James M. O'Gorman, prior of the Trappist monastery at New Melleray, IA, arrived in Nebraska on June 3, 1859, he found several hundred Catholic families, principally in Omaha and along the Missouri River. O'Gorman brought the Sisters of Mercy (1864) and the Benedictine Sisters (1865), laying the foundations for a continuous history of Catholic education. He built a modest cathedral with money collected in the East and from workers constructing the Union Pacific and Burlington railroads. When he died in 1874, in addition to the Benedictines who had been laboring in southeastern Nebraska, O'Gorman had admitted approximately 30 secular priests, of whom about 18 continued to serve with some degree of permanence in the vicariate.

Two years later James O'Connor of Pittsburgh, PA was appointed second vicar apostolic and was consecrated on Aug. 20, 1876. He continued O'Gorman's work, launching the Sisters of Mercy on a program of secondary education and entrusting Creighton College (later University), built with a gift from the estate of Edward CREIGHTON to the Jesuits. The bishop also introduced the Poor Clares to Omaha, where, with financial assistance from John A. Creighton, they built their first permanent foundation in the U.S.; invited the Religious of the Sacred Heart to establish an academy, the now-defunct Duchesne College; and requested the Poor Sisters of St. Francis Seraph to inaugurate their extensive system of hospitals. Moreover, O'Connor personally supervised extensive Catholic colonization in the state, notably the Irish in Greeley County in the 1880s. He showed his solicitude for other national groups, which were similarly attracted by cheap farmland or railroad employment, by bringing the Franciscans and a group of Jesuits from Central Europe into the vicariate to work among the Bohemians and Poles. In addition, he directed the proliferation of parishes and schools that followed the heavy immigration.

Diocese. When the Diocese of Omaha, consisting of the states of Nebraska and Wyoming, was erected in 1885, O'Connor was appointed its first bishop. Among O'Connor's achievements was his spiritual direction of St. Katharine DREXEL, foundress of the Sisters of the BLESSED SACRAMENT. In Thurston County, NE in 1908, she founded St. Augustine's Indian School in Winnebago, a ministry which endured into the 21st century.

In 1887 the Omaha diocese was further reduced when all of Nebraska south of the Platte River was established as the Diocese of Lincoln. Wyoming, with its see at Cheyenne, became a distinct diocese. Under the watch of O'Connor and his immediate successors, the diocese, and especially the city of Omaha, welcomed Italian, Polish, Hungarian, and Ukrainian immigrants. O'Connor died in 1890 and was succeeded by Bp. Richard Scannell, who was transferred to Omaha from Concordia, KS on Jan. 30, 1891.

By temperament a scholarly recluse, Scannell, nevertheless, carried forward the work of building new churches and schools. The House of the Good Shepherd opened a home for girls in Omaha. In 1907, following Scannell's decision to raze the old cathedral, the cornerstone was laid for a new edifice in Spanish Renaissance style, which took more than 50 years to complete. St. Cecilia's Cathedral was consecrated in 1959; it contains an array of liturgical art including Albin Polasek's bronze Crucifixus on the high altar, his bronze stations of the cross, and wood sculptures. It was renovated extensively in 2000, in part to reflect Kimball's original designs for the ceiling. In 1912 the central and western counties of the state lying north of the Platte River were erected into a distinct diocese; the see, originally at Kearney, was transferred in 1917 to Grand Island following the annexation of four populous western counties from the Omaha diocese.

After Bishop Scannell's death in 1916, Jeremiah J. HARTY of St. Louis, MO, former archbishop of Manila, Philippine Islands, succeeded to the See of Omaha. Ill health marked the greater part of his 11 years there, preventing Harty from accomplishing any aggressive programs. Nevertheless, he did introduce new organization, diocesan in scope, and it was during his administration and with his encouragement that the world renowned institution of Boys' Town, a community founded to assist homeless and abandoned youth, was started by Rev. Edward FLANAGAN in 1917. Boys' Town, renamed Girls' and Boys' Town in 2000 to reflect the growing female population, continues to attract large numbers of visitors to its campus in West Omaha.

On May 29, 1928, Joseph Rummel, a New York priest, was consecrated to succeed Harty, who died on Oct. 29, 1927, but the Depression thwarted many of Rummel's plans. Circumstances forced him to divert funds from a successful campaign in 1930 to finance diocesan expansion for relief work among the faithful. During Rummel's episcopate, Omaha hosted the Sixth National Eucharistic Congress in September 1930. When Rummel was transferred to the Archdiocese of New Orleans, LA in 1935, Bp. James Hugh RYAN, rector of The Catholic University of America in Washington, DC, took his place. World War II similarly neutralized many of Ryan's efforts.

Archdiocese. Under Bishop Ryan, the growth of the Church in Nebraska was recognized when, in 1945, Omaha was raised to an archdiocese. Ryan died in 1947 and his place was taken by Gerald T. Bergan of Des Moines, IA, under whom the archdiocese experienced phenomenal development. By 1963 more than $60 million had been spent on construction, including that of a home for the aged and a now-defunct minor seminary. Twenty-three religious orders of women with a total of 805 sisters, assisted by 562 lay teachers, were engaged in elementary and secondary teaching. Between 1950 and 1960, the number enrolled in Catholic elementary schools almost doubled, and the number enrolled in secondary schools grew by approximately 50 percent.

Bergan's auxiliary, Daniel Sheehan, was named the archbishop of Omaha in 1969, and endeavored to sustain the diocesan commitment to education in the years following the Second Vatican Council until his retirement in 1993. His successor, Elden Curtiss, focused on maintaining Omaha's relatively high number of archdiocesan seminarians, averaging seven ordinations to the priesthood per year throughout the 1990s.

In the 1990s, agribusiness, communication industries, and suburban expansion, led to the growth of megaparishes, which emerged on the southern and western sides of the metropolitan area. Hispanic immigrants, attracted by jobs in the meatpacking and other industries, created a new ministerial need. Ministries to Vietnamese, Hmong, and Sudanese refugee populations also grew at the close of the 20th century.

Jesuits, who direct Creighton University and Creighton Preparatory School in Omaha; Benedictines, who serve Mount Michael High School near Elkhorn; and the Columban Fathers, whose national headquarters are in Bellevue, are among the significant communities of men religious represented in the archdiocese. The Sisters of Mercy, who founded the College of St. Mary for women in Omaha in 1923; the Servants of Mary; the Poor Clares; the Notre Dame Sisters; and the Society of the Sacred Heart, who operated Duchesne College prior to its closing and maintain Duchesne High School, are among the women religious serving northeast Nebraska.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of Omaha. H. W. CASPER, History of the Catholic Church in Nebraska, 3 v. (Milwaukee 1960–1966). W. E. RAMSEY and B. DINEEN SHRIER, A Gentle Shepherd: The Life and Times of Archbishop Daniel E. Sheehan (Omaha, NE 1999). SISTER LORETTA, C.P.P.S., History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Lincoln, Nebraska, 1887–1987 (Lincoln, NE 1986). S. SZMRECSANYI, History of the Catholic Church in Northeast Nebraska (Omaha, NE 1983).

[H. W. CASPER/S. A. WEIDNER]

OMAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Sultanate of Oman (‘Umân wa-Musqat in Arabic) comprises the Arabian peninsula of Musandam. It is bound on the north by the United Arab Emirates and the Gulf of Oman, on the east by the Gulf of Oman and the Arabian Sea, on the south by the Arabian Sea and on the west by Yemen, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates. A long, steep, semicircular mountain range protects the region’s fertile coastal plain, while the western region becomes increasingly arid near its boundary with the “empty quarter,” as the Rub ’al-Khali desert is known. Natural resources include petroleum, natural gas, copper, marble, asbestos, limestone, gypsum and chromium, while dates, limes, bananas and alfalfa are the predominant agricultural products.

Oman’s economy is based on petroleum and natural gas exports, although the nation is not a member of OPEC; the country also benefits from its strategic position as a transit point for international crude oil trade. Other economic sectors include the sea trade and the export of dates, for which the region has been renowned

Capital: Musqat.

Size: 120,000 sq. miles.

Population: 2,533,388 in 2000.

Languages: Arabic; English, Baluchi, Urdu, and Indian dialects are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 63,300 Catholics (2.5%), 49,698 Protestants (2%), 2,052,940 Muslims (81%), 367,450 Hindus (14.5%).

Apostolic vicariate: Abu Dhabi, Arabia.

since ancient times; vines are cultivated in the more fertile mountain regions. Eighty percent of the population is literate.

Oman was established by Arabs in the first century as a trading outpost of Mesopotamia. Conquered by Muslims in the 7th century, it was ruled by independent IMĀMS, or emirs subservient to the caliphate of Abbasside at Baghdad. The region became a Portuguese possession in 1506, but the Portuguese withdrew by 1650 due to repeated attacks by Ottoman Turks, who reestablished their trading empire. A century later, in 1754, Ahmad ibn Said, a descendant of the imam of Yemen, claimed the region and his dynasty remained in power in 2000. Oman became a sultanate in 1793, and relations with Great Britain were established in 1798. Although Oman was the most powerful nation in Arabia in 1800, with control of Zanzibar and the coast of Iran and Pakistan, it suffered economic and political decline during the later 19th century, in part because of tribal warfare. Oman fell under British protection in 1913, its relationship strengthened by a series of treaties. Britain proved to be a benevolent ally to the sultanate: through British intervention, revolts against the repressive sultan Said bin Taimur were suppressed in 1953 and 1965, and in 1967 Great Britain ceded the Kuria Muria Islands to Oman. The discovery of oil in the region in 1964 boosted the country’s economy, although it sparked a political upheaval that was resolved after the sultan was deposed by his British-educated son, Sultan Qaboos bin Said, during a bloodless palace coup in July of 1970. Taimur fled to England and ended his life in exile at a hotel in London. A revolution staged by a guerrilla group called the Popular Front for the Liberation of Oman was put down in 1975, as Qaboos began his ambitious program of controlled modernization. He also maintained good relationships with Great Britain and Oman’s mideast neighbors. By the close of the 20th century, the sultan exhibited signs of increasing liberalization, permitting women to run for election and legalizing political parties within Oman, as well as undertaking efforts to privatize the country’s oil industry. On Nov. 6, 1996, Qaboos issued the Basic Charter, a decree granting basic civil liberties to all Omani citizens, including freedom of religion. In somewhat of a contrast, however, suffrage remained restricted to 50,000 voters in the 1997 election.

By 2000 Oman had four parishes tended by one secular and six religious priests. Catholic missions existed at Shar and Salalah, and two churches were built on government-provided land in Muscat. As a religious minority in a predominately Muslim country, Catholics respected the tenets of shari'a (ISLAMIC LAW) by refraining from evangelization activities among Oman's Muslim population. All children of Omani citizens were required to receive education in Islam, although non-citizens were not required to follow suit. While publication of Catholic materials was not permitted in Oman, no prohibition was placed against their import. The government encouraged ecumenical dialogue. Most Omani were Ibadi Muslims, although a Shia Muslim population resided in Muscat.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde (Paris 1964) 2:602. B. THOMAS, Arab Rule under the Al Bu Sa'id Dynasty of Oman, 1741-1937 (London 1938). Annuario Pontificio has data on all diocese.

[A. JAMME/EDS.]

OMER OF THÉROUANNE, ST.

Bishop; b. Orval (Aurea Vallis), near Coutances, France; d. Thérouanne, Sept. 1, c. 670. Omer (or Otmar, whence the Latin, Audomarus) and his father Friulph, who were perhaps of Saxon origin, entered the Columban Abbey of LUXEUIL after the death of Omer's mother, Domitta. When named bishop of Thérouanne (c. 635-40), Omer took the suggestion of St. ACHARIUS OF NOYON and sent for three other Luxeuil monks, SS. Momelinus, BERTINUS, and Ebertramus, to help him in his work of completing the conversion of the peoples of his diocese. Momelinus governed the original abbey they built near Sithiu until 660, when he was elevated to the episcopacy of Noyon-Tournai. Then Bertinus succeeded as abbot. Having received several properties from a certain Adroald, Omer gave Bertinus the island of Sithiu in the River Aa, as a new site for the abbey (later SAINT-BERTIN) and also the church of Sainte-Marie, which he had built on a neighboring hill. Omer was buried in this church, after granting Sithiu a privilege of immunity. The city of Saint-Omer was later built on the slopes of the hill between these two shrines.

Feast: Sept. 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 3:384-417. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826- ) 5:729-764. O. BLED, "Les Reliques . . . de St. Omer," Mémoires de la Société des Antiquaires de la Morinie 32 (1914-20) 1-112. G. COOLEN, "Saint Colomban et Saint Omer," Mélanges colombaniens (Paris 1950) 361-375. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:516-517.

[G. COOLEN]

OMISSION

The nonperformance of some action; it is of concern to the moralist only when a person could and should do what he leaves undone. The omission of an act when its performance is impossible or is in no way a matter of obligation is of no moral significance. Similarly, if a person fails to do something through inculpable ignorance or inadvertence to his obligation to act, the omission is not morally imputable, because if he is unconscious of an obligation to act, it cannot be said that he should, or ought to, act. When there is an obligation to act, the failure to perform the required act can be due either to simple non-choice or to deliberate choice. It is due to nonchoice, and is negatively or indirectly voluntary, when a person, though conscious of an obligation to act, simply does not act or occupies himself with something incompatible with the fulfillment of his duty, but without reaching a positive decision not to do what he should. It is due to deliberate choice when a person reaches an explicit decision to omit what he should do (THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 71.5).

In all cases of voluntary omission, whether due to nonchoice or deliberate choice, one is responsible for his failure to act, and the morality of the omission is determined in accord with the same norms that are applied to a positive choice to do something. If there is advertence to the obligation to do something, the omission of the performance of the act is equatable with a positive sinful choice, and the result is a grave or venial sin as the gravity of the obligation and the circumstances of the case demand. It is to be noted, however, that choices of nonperformance are qualified by the same influences that affect choices to act. Accordingly, such subjective elements as fear and passion can, under certain conditions, lessen personal imputability.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 6.3. D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH (Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 1:360. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis (Paris 1949) 1:60. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, rev. A. SCHMITT and G. HEINZEL (Innsbruck 1961–62) 1:92, 292–293.

[A. BURROUGHS]

OMNI DIE DIC MARIAE

The second section of a lengthy Marian hymn, or Mariale, whose first section begins with Ut jucundaservas undas. The Omni die, shortest of all the parts, has 19 stanzas whose verse form is alternate acatalectic and catalectic trochaic dimeter with internal rhyme in the first and third verses (aa/b,cc/b). The meter and rhyme scheme are so intricate that their competent use in a lengthy poem demanded talent in Latin verse composition. It has been ascribed variously to BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (d. 1153), ANSELM OF CANTERBURY (d. 1109), CASIMIR of Poland (d. 1484), and others. But it is ascribed also to BERNARD OF CLUNY (fl. 1150), who in his De contemptu mundi, a 3,000-line poem of similar difficulty, proved his ability to use such a meter. And since no manuscript yet discovered precedes his time, the weight of greater probability leads Julian and others to name him as the author. The text, together with a number of other stanzas found in various MSS, is given in Analecta hymnica 50:423–482.

Bibliography: U. CHEVALIER, Repertorium hymnologicum (Louvain-Brussels 1892–1921) 2:14070. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1200–02. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XIIIe siècle (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2:223–226. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 318–319.

[G. E. CONWAY]

OMNIBONUS (OMNEBENE)

Bishop and canonist; d. Verona, Oct. 22, 1185. Little is known of Omnibonus's early life other than that he was a student of Gratian. He taught Canon Law at Bologna during the pontificate of Pope Eugene III and also later at Verona. In 1157 he became bishop of Verona, a post he held until his death. As a canonist, he was one of the early members of the group later known as the DECRETISTS (i.e., those whose main concern was to comment on the Decretum of GRATIAN). He is very likely the author of the Abbreviatio Decreti, a reordered version of Gratian's Decretum. Omnibonus's Abbreviatio is divided into two parts, 26 distinctions and 37 causae. It was glossed upon by later canonists, but it does not appear to have played a very important role in the history of Canon Law. He is also most likely the same person as Omnibonus, the author of a theological treatise from about the same period. The theological treatise of Omnibonus shows the influence of the school of Abelard, Hugh of Saint-Victor, Roland, and, of course, Gratian.

Bibliography: A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I, v. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928–); v.1, Prolegomena (2d ed 1945) 1:441–442. R. CHABANNE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:1111–12.

[J. M. BUCKLEY]

OMNIPOTENCE

Omnipotence is derived from the Latin omnis (all) and potens (capable of making or producing). Divine omnipotence is a divine operative attribute, an active POTENCY, or power, for acting ad extra. As an active potency it is distinguished from a passive potency, or capacity for receiving ACT, which would be opposed to God's perfection. By this power God has dominion over all things outside Himself, which He has brought into existence and which He holds in existence.

Omnipotence extends, however, only to beings that have the inherent possibility of existence—that is, that do not include a contradiction. Thus, God cannot make a square circle or an infinite created being since the essential notes here cancel each other out. (For this reason it is impossible for God to commit a sin—that is, act in a way contrary to His own intrinsic goodness.) These hypothetical beings lie beyond God’s power, not because God’s power is limited, but because of the inherent limitation in the idea of the thing itself.

Similarly, God’s power cannot reverse His own eternal decrees, for this implies change of intention or new knowledge, both of which are impossible in a perfect God.

Some actions are called impossible for God even though they themselves can exist, yet cannot coexist with God’s other decrees. Thus, it is true to say that man’s immortal soul could be destroyed by God’s power, if one considers His power in itself. Yet granting God’s design in making man’s soul immortal by nature, it is not possible that He act against His own plan. Thus one may say that destroying man’s soul is beyond God’s ordered power (potentia ordinata—considering His power in conjunction with His divine decrees), but not beyond His absolute power (potentia absoluta—considering in itself His power over man’s soul). The usefulness, however, and even the validity, of this distinction is generally called into question.

Omnipotence has been considered the attribute most proper to a deity by men of all times and places. The Bible in particular voices continually the theme of God’s power in comparison with the limited power of alien gods or of temporal rulers of Egypt or Babylonia. God is always able to save His people from these enemies. If at times He chooses not to, it is only because His people have not observed His laws.

Most of the Biblical names of God imply power to act or make, though the exact meaning of these terms is often under dispute. Abraham worships ’el šaddai (God the Almighty) in Gn 17.1 and ’el ’elyōn (Most High God or God Eternal) in Gn 14.18; ’el [see EL (GOD) Gn 46.3], and as found in ’ēlōhīm (see ELOHIM) throughout the Old Testament, means the Strong God. God is also called “the Mighty One of Jacob” (Gn 4, 9.24), “the creator of the heavens. . . the designer and maker of the earth” (Is 45.18), and “the Lord of the whole earth” (Jos 3.11, 13). This notion of omnipotent Lordship is intimately linked with Jesus’ divinity throughout the Gospel of St. Mark.

Somewhat mysterious in meaning is the most proper name of God, Yahweh (see YAHWEH), probably originally meaning “He who causes all things to be,” rather than the later, more common, rendering, “I am who am” (Ex 3.14).

In addition, many metaphors refer to Yahweh’s hand or arm as symbolic of God’s power to rule or guide or punish (cf. Jos 4.24; Ezr 7.28; Ex 15.16).

Omnipotence is not of merely speculative interest to Israel, for this attribute fosters faith’s vision of the mirabilia Dei: the salvation acts of God for His people [cf. Dt 3.24; Ps 105(106).2]. It invites the believer to prayer of gratitude or petition; it is one of the motives held out to Israel to sanctify itself.

The doctrine that all things depend upon God appears in the opening chapters of Genesis, where God unfolds His plan of creation. (For treatment of the question whether or not creation out of nothing is to be found here, see CREATION.) By God’s simple utterance things came to be, and as He wants them to be. Moon and sun, often worshiped by pagans, are here merely creatures. In Exodus, God’s power is made manifest publicly before Egypt and its Pharaoh (cf. also Is 19.1). In such a way God has power over all nations (Nm 21.3; 1 Sm 14.12). The more marvelous is the work of God’s omnipotence in that He selects an unworthy nation for His favors. Even evil is fitted into God’s plan; Israel is often purified by it.

The culmination of God’s power is found in the incarnation (cf. Rom 1.4). Jesus redeems man and even the physical world by becoming man, performing miracles, dying, and rising again. In the last times He will return, the Son of Man (Dn ch. 7), coming to judge all things as Lord and master.

These Biblical teachings have been interpreted by the magisterium of the Church (see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, Index syst. Blbc).

Scholastic theology considers a number of questions in this area. Omnipotence follows upon God’s essence as PURE ACT, having within Himself His own fullness of actuality. Since one thing is able to cause another insofar as it is itself in act, God alone is capable of giving existence to created things. Of course, God’s omnipotence is in reality completely identified with His essence, distinguished only by a virtual minor distinction. Other problems dealt with in systematic theology are God’s freedom in creating (ibid. 3002) and man’s freedom under God’s causality (see OMNISCIENCE; PREDESTINATION).

See Also: GOD, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 1:975–993. C. SPICQ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 1:353–355. T. AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 1a, 25; C. gent. 2.7. F. SUÁREZ, De Deo 3.9. J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The One God, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis 1943). P. HEINISCH, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. W. G. HEIDT (Collegeville, Minn. 1950).

[G. ROXBURGH]

OMNIPRESENCE

The infinite and omnipotent God is in all things everywhere. Such, briefly, is the teaching of Scripture and tradition. Omnipresence is an attribute of God, the infinite and first cause of all, who is actually present in all existing places and things. This presence is not to be interpreted as dimensional or spatial, since God is utterly simple and infinite and thus free of all spatial limitations. Rather He is present as an agent to His effects. So God is everywhere, for He is the source of the being and action in all places and things. Moreover, since in God power and action are one, He is substantially present in all existing things through His power and operation.

God's omnipresence has a relationship to divine immensity of actuality to aptitude. For immensity is the infinite plenitude of subsistent being that is free from all spatial limitations and, thus, is able to be present in all things. Immensity implies the power to be everywhere. Omnipresence is the actual exercise of the power to be everywhere. Whereas immensity is an essential, absolute, and eternal attribute in God, omnipresence is relative to created being.

Omnipresence is implicit in those scriptural texts that speak of God's immensity. But Scripture is explicit also. In earlier books the notion of omnipresence remains undefined, although God's presence is known not to be confined to one place (Gn 12.4–9; 14.20). Later, the idea of God's omnipresence is more definitely expressed: God is everywhere by His nature, for He transcends and permeates all things (Dt 4.39; Wis 8.1) and sees them as they are [Ps 112(113).5–9; 101(102).20–21; Prv 5.21; 15.3]; no one can escape His presence [Ps 138(139).7–12; Am 9.2; Is 43.2]. Christ calls attention to the presence of the "Father, who sees in secret" (Mt 6.6) and who is present in heaven and on earth (Mt 6.9–13; 5.35). God is everywhere, as St. Paul explains to the Athenians (Acts 17.24–28; cf. Eph. 4.6).

Patristic teaching distinguishes God's omnipresence from His immensity (e.g., St. Cyril of Alex., In Jn. 1.9) and explicitly states that God is everywhere and wholly everywhere (e.g., St. Hilary, De Trin. 2.6). Theologians maintain this patristic doctrine and commonly distinguish how God is present in all things: He is present to them by His essence and power, and all things are open to His knowledge; while in the just, God is present in a special way through His grace (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 8.3). The immensity of God is a defined dogma (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3001).

See Also: INDWELLING, DIVINE; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 4.1:948–1023. X. LE BACHELET, ibid. 1023–1152. M. CHOSSAT, ibid. 1152–1243. J. M. DALMAU, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain, 4 v. (Madrid), v. 1 (1962), v. 2 (1958), v. 3 (1961), v. 4 (1962); Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945) 2.1:126–134. Y. M. J. CONGAR, The Mystery of the Temple, tr. R. F. TREVETT (Westminster, Md. 1962). J. DANÉLOU, The Presence of God, tr. W. ROBERTS (Baltimore 1960). L. REYPPENS, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. Paris (1932) 3:883–929.

[M. F. MORRY]

OMNISCIENCE

The term divine science might also be used here. It brings into focus the heated, lengthy, and continuing theological controversy on the relationship between the certitude of God's knowledge and human freedom. Taken from this standpoint, the attribution of divine science to God signifies that He possesses infinitely perfect science or certain knowledge of Himself. He also knows perfectly all that has existed, exists, or will exist in both the physical and moral order. This divine science extends to every free act, but this foreknowledge implies no necessity. The Catholic Church defined at the First Vatican Council that God is infinite in all His perfections and possessed of intellect and will (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3001). The council also stated that this knowledge whereby "all things are naked and open to his eyes" (Heb 4.13) is the foundation of the providential governance of all things, "even the future free actions of creatures" (Enchiridion symbolorum 3003; see FREE WILL AND PROVIDENCE).

Historical Considerations. Viewing historically man's understanding of God's omniscience is a useful prelude to the systematic treatment.

Old Testament. In Biblical theology the existence of knowledge in God is a necessary consequence of the fact that for Biblical revelation God is a personal God. In general, therefore, this divine knowledge as personal is at heart a knowledge of God's people (see PEOPLE OF GOD). And, frequently, God's knowledge designates acts of care, help, and succor [see Jb 31.6; Ps 1.6; 72 (73).11; 102(103).14; 143(144).3]. It is also this highly personalist note that gives to the Biblical affirmations of the divine knowledge their strongly religious character. There is no shadow of doubt in the Old Testament (OT) that God knows all things, but the fundamental note is that He knows all that takes place on earth. All human existence is lived out in His sight and is known to Him. It is this fact that gives dramatic perspective to Job's sorrow (Jb 28.24). God knows the just and the unjust to the very roots of their being [Ps 10(11).4; 32(33).15; Prv 15.11; 16.2]. Knowing men, God knows their thoughts, their intentions, their most secret actions [Ps 93(94).1–2; Ps 138(139)]. It is this conviction that informs the moral dimension of the religious activity of God's people.

It is, moreover, the conviction of God's perfect knowledge of all things that engenders Israel's confidence in God's providential designs. The deeply personal character of God's knowledge is also emphasized by the fact that it is concrete and experiential. God knows His people as the husband his wife. All things that exist are the work of His hand. The Psalmist proclaims that God knows all that He has created and that He who made the eye does indeed see [Ps 93(94).9].

While this personal note is characteristic of the Biblical affirmation, there is another note that is peculiarly proper to the teaching on divine knowledge. For what gives to the OT teaching on God's knowledge an originality beyond merely natural theology is the note of wisdom. Not only does God know but He understands all these things. What is clear in the OT development is that the sapiential authors move from the idea of wisdom as a largely practical thing to the idea of wisdom being a kind of subsistent reality in God. It finally becomes a personal characteristic of such cosmic status that it is personified as the agent of God's creation and providential ordering of the universe (e.g., Prv 8.22–31).

It is also from this standpoint of wisdom that the OT conception of God's knowledge has some areas of equivalence to the scholastic concept of divine science; for it is something beyond all human knowing and quite proper to God (e.g., Is 28.29; 40.13). To the sages of Israel God's wisdom in terms of the knowledge of good and evil is far beyond man's—God alone is truly wise (Jb 28.12–28; Is 40.13). It is this approach that makes of wisdom “an aura of the might of God and a pure effusion of the glory of the Almighty” (Wis 7.25). What is of note in the whole sapiential approach in the OT is that only by implication does it involve itself with the great prophetic themes of covenant, election, and salvation [see WISDOM (IN THE BIBLE)].

New Testament. It is in the New Testament (NT) that the whole notion of God's knowledge and wisdom is synthesized with His saving work. The personal character of wisdom is revealed in Christ to correspond to a Person distinct from the Father—the WORD (Jn ch. 1). It is this transcendent and creative wisdom that is incarnated in Jesus Christ (Col 1.15–20). In Jesus Christ, the only Son of the Father, is revealed God's love for the world (Jn 3.16). Wisdom as divine understanding is seen to subsist in the Son: “. . . no one knows the Son except the Father; nor does anyone know the Father except the Son, and him to whom the Son chooses to reveal him” (Mt 11.27). It is the knowledge that God has of Himself that the Son reveals: “No one has at any time seen God. The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has revealed him” (Jn 1.18). St. Paul, writing to the Corinthians, tells them that the deep things of God known only by the Spirit (1 Cor 2.11–12) are the wisdom that is manifested in Christ: “From him you are in Christ Jesus, who has become for us God-given wisdom, and justice, and sanctification, and redemption” (1 Cor 1.30). The concern of the NT, like that of the OT, is not a natural theology but God's saving activity. Accordingly the divine knowledge to which they testify is essentially that which looks to SALVATION. Yet all these affirmations suppose and rest upon the fact: God truly knows.

Patristic Teaching. When one turns to the actual teaching of the gospel, he finds a new dimension with a radically new note not found in the Biblical affirmations. This dimension arises from the rational tradition that is so much a part of the Greco-Roman culture. Hence, from the beginning, the Greek Christian writers were called upon to make use of a variety of philosophical sources and elements in order to explain and defend the Christian revelation (see THEOLOGY, INFLUENCE OF GREEK PHILOSOPHY ON). Thus, along with an extensive use of symbolism to explain the meaning of Christian revelation there is a consistent effort to establish a Christian philosophical notion of God and His actions. It is therefore in this context that the patristic teaching on God's knowledge must be set. For these Christian writers sought to establish and safeguard the spiritual nature, the holiness, and, above all, the supremacy of God through concepts appropriate to men trained in the schools of Greek philosophy.

The first note stressed in this teaching, which in turn forms the foundation for the divine knowledge, is what might be called the total supernaturality of God. G. L. Prestige thinks that “philosophically, this idea was expressed by the [Greek] word ὑπεροχή, which may fairly be translated transcendence” [God in Patristic Thought (London 1952) 25]. He points out that the word occurs in Irenaeus (Adversus. haereses 5.2.3; Patrologia Graeca 7:1127) but that its use is best illustrated in the Clementine Homilies: “He who would worship God ought before all else to know what is peculiar to the nature of God alone, which cannot pertain to another . . . . This is peculiar to God, that He alone is, as the maker of all, so also the best of all. That which makes is indeed superior in power to that which is made; that which is boundless is superior in magnitude to that which is bounded; in respect of beauty, that which is comeliest; in respect of happiness, that which is most blessed; in respect of understanding, that which is most perfect. And in like manner in other respects He incomparably possesses transcendence” (Hom. clem. 10.9; cf. Prestige, 25–26). This serves to illustrate the fundamental emphasis on the transcendent character of God’s understanding and affirms the incomparable superiority of God over all that He has made.

The other general note in Greek Christian thought directly related to God’s knowledge is the very heavy emphasis on His providence. For, while insisting on the divine transcendence, revelation also makes it clear that God is not remote from man but enters personally into his history. His nature, however, is revealed through His works and His providence (e.g., see Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autol. 1.5; Patrologia Graeca, 6:1030–31). In the explanation of this providential ordering there is strong emphasis on the notion of planning or designing. It is in this connection that the Greek word οἰκονομία (economy) plays a somewhat striking role. It undergoes in the Christian writers a gradual transformation from the simple meaning of administering or overseeing to planning or designing (cf. Prestige, 57–62). Thus God economizes the affairs of the world, so that the man who realizes that God’s providence rules the world knows that events come out for the best under the economy of the ruler (cf. Hom. clem. 2.36, Patrologia Graeca, 2:102; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 3.17; Patrologia Graeca, 8:1205–08). In general, God’s providence or economy involves His action in the world of nature, of human history, of salvation (see ECONOMY, DIVINE). It finds its supreme expression in the INCARNATION, “for which, the word ‘oekonomia,’ without any verbal qualification, is the regular patristic term from the third century onwards” (Prestige, 67). Here can be seen how closely the notion of God’s knowledge corresponds to the NT teaching.

Specifically, with regard to the divine knowledge, the basic Biblical teaching is constantly affirmed. God knows all that is and will be, and the whole measure and order of things is disposed in accord with His wisdom (see, e.g., Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 2.26.3, Patrologia Graeca, 7:801–802; 2.30.9, Patrologia Graeca, 7:821–823; Origen, Contra Celsum 2.30, Patrologia Graeca, 11:850–851; Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechism 4.5, Patrologia Graeca, 33:459). However, in so affirming this, the Christian teachers were faced almost from the beginning by a problematic raised by the Gnostics. Some of the Gnostics would maintain that men are divided into different categories so that by their nature the spiritual will necessarily be saved, the earthly will necessarily be reprobated, and the psychic, who alone are unnecessary, are alone free. Marcion, who wrote within the Christian framework itself, maintained that the God of the OT was distinct from the God revealed in the NT. On this basis Marcion held that the God of the Mosaic dispensation was arbitrary and unjust in His treatment of men, taking no account of their merits. Celsus, whose thought is the object of a major work by Origen, taught that if God has certain knowledge of man’s future acts, then human freedom is not possible (cf. H. D. Simonin, OP, “La Prédestination d’après les pères grecs,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 12.2:2815–32).

In the face of the issues raised by these heretical positions, there is found in the Fathers a constant defense both of God’s foreknowledge of all human activity and of human freedom. Irenaeus sums up the basic problem: “But that which He said, ‘how often have I desired to gather your sons and you would not,’ demonstrates the ancient law of liberty, because God made man free from the beginning, having his own power even as his own soul to accept God’s commands freely and not by compulsion” (Adversus haereses 4.37.1; Patrologia Graeca 7:1099). Scriptural texts in particular are interpreted to bring out this point. For example, Eusebius of Caesarea insists that the fact that God foreknew Judas would be a traitor does not force him to be such (Praep. evang. 6.11; Patrologia Graeca 21:491). John Chrysostom, interpreting the texts from Mt 18.7 and Lk 17.1 that it is necessary that scandals come, goes on to say that this does not take away free choice or liberty or subject life to necessity. For the fact that scandal is predicted is not what causes it to occur (see In Matt. hom. 59.1; Patrologia Graeca 58:573–575). Augustine, dealing with predestination when he is writing against the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, is forced to take up this point on a number of occasions. He affirms in general as well as in specific cases that what God foresees will be the future does not force that particular action to be done (Lib. arb. 3.4.11; Patrologia Latina 32:1276). In the case of Adam and Eve the cause of their fall is not the divine foreknowledge but their evil will (General ad literature 11.9.12; Patrologia Latina 34:434). God foresees, too, what is in our wills, but He does not take away free choice (Civ. 5.10.2; Patrologia Latina 41:153).

Carolingian Era. The whole question raised by Augustine comes to a head in the Carolingian era with the issues raised by Gottschalk (cf. É. Amman, L’Époque carolingienne, Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours 6:320–344). In an age when Augustine is the teacher par excellence, Gottschalk takes his ideas on predestination and presents them without their author’s nuances or flexibility. It is also true that the Augustinian conceptions have already begun to be harshened under the influence of Isidore of Seville, but they now become the focus of a major conflict in the Carolingian world [cf. H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 170–179]. For Gottschalk simply it is a fact that God predestines some to eternal life and they will not perish, and those not predestined to eternal life will perish; no question of merit or demerit or liberty appears to enter into his position.

In the controversy that follows upon this, all the great names of Carolingian theology are involved—Hincmar, Rabanus Maurus, John Scotus Erigena, Florus of Lyons, and many others. Two councils are held, one under Hincmar at the royal residence at Quiercy and the other at Valence. The statements of these councils on the issue have a large role in the theological tradition that develops after them; in fact, for a good many modern theologians they have been looked upon as normative. One statement from the Council of Valence is particularly notable. It is largely a quotation from Florus of Lyons: “[We faithfully hold that] God foresees and has foreseen eternally both the good works that the good would do and the evil works that the evil would do . . . He has foreseen that the good would be good entirely through His grace and would receive their reward through that grace, so also that the evil would be evil by their own malice and would be condemned by His justice to eternal punishment. . . . But the foreknowledge of God has not placed on any evildoer a necessity whereby he could not be otherwise, but he was going to be by his own will just as God . . . has foreseen in His omnipotent and unchangeable majesty” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 626–627; cf. B. Lavaud, “La controverse sur la prédestination au XII<sup>e</sup> siècle,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 12.2: 2901–35). This statement may be taken as summing up the patristic response to the problematic that is so central to the whole matter of God’s knowledge.

Systematic Theology. Revelation clearly affirms the fact that God knows. The task of systematic theology is to determine as far as it can what is to be understood by this revealed fact. It does this by bringing to bear on the revealed affirmation the psychological resources of a man who himself is able to know. It also employs the philosophic intelligence of the Church, since any treatment of knowledge and understanding implies a philosophic position. In the matter of divine knowledge, it should also be noted that the task is complex. For theology must show that God truly knows, but, in using man’s knowledge as a resource in understanding, theology must not blur the explanation by excessive anthropomorphism [see ANTHROPOMORPHISM (IN THEOLOGY)]. Ultimately the act of divine knowledge must be reducible to the pure act of being.

Man’s Knowing. Beginning with man’s own experience of knowing, what stands out is the fact that in some way man as knower enters into a special relationship with objects other than himself. For the fact is that the KNOWLEDGE of an object is the presence of the object in thought. The act of knowing appears to grasp the very nature of the object without modifying that object in its own actuality. Yet, in comprehending the object thought does not cease to be thought. Intelligence grasps the idea of a tree or a stone but does not itself become a tree or stone in actuality. Moreover, while the object known and the concept and judgments about it determine the content of knowledge, they are not the only element of knowledge. For there are operations of the central reality that is intelligence itself in action. Thus there is the reflexive consciousness of this knowledge, whereby the knower understands that it is knowledge and is conscious of this central operation of understanding; hence the capacity to reflect upon what he knows and relate it to the rest of what he knows. Finally, this act of knowledge is immanent in the one knowing since it takes place only in the subject, for the act by which the object exists in his thought is the very act by which he knows—the understanding in act is the intelligible in act.

The root of this capacity to know is immateriality. In material things the coming of a new form means the disappearance of the previous form. It is the very possibility of this kind of change that is called matter, since change here means a loss of integrity. To know, on the other hand, means to be another in some way, yet retain integrity of being. St. Thomas, as the general scholastic tradition, explains this capacity by the use of the term species, which has been translated modernly as “knowledge-likeness” [cf. Summa Theologiae, v.4, Knowledge in God, tr. T. Gornall, SJ (New York 1964) 17]. This means that the object is present in thought “intentionally,” that is, by reason of its form (that which makes it to be what it is) and with nothing of materiality. To know, therefore, means that the object known exists intentionally (as in contradistinction to actually) in the mind of the knower, or in an intelligible mode of existence. This is possible because intelligibility is present in all things; in the common Christian philosophical and theological tradition this follows from the very fact of creation. Because God has created all things, then the universe in its every part is a participation in God the supreme intelligible.

God’s Knowing. It is in the light of this conception of knowledge that the general Catholic theological tradition stemming from St. Thomas has treated of the divine knowledge. It recognizes that in the created way in which man is knower and knows there is the knower not only in act but also in potency. It is also evident that the thing known is in potency as well as in act. Yet, it is maintained that this distinction arises not from the nature of knowing but because the act of knowing takes place in a creature, man. Knowing of itself is essentially act or perfection, and potency is not necessary to knowing. The more perfectly actualized, therefore, the more perfectly intelligible. The more potency is negated, the more closely identified are understanding and the thing understood. In God, as totally perfect and pure actuality, there is no potency; hence essence, intellect, understanding are all one and the same. “Since, therefore, God has no potentiality but is pure actuality, in Him intellect and what is known must be identical in every way” (Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.2). Further, since there is no form in God distinct from His existence, then it follows that His essence is the very way in which God knows. Necessarily, then, God’s act of knowing is His essence and His very being (“ipsum eius intelligere sit eius essentia et eius esse”—Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.4). In sum, what is argued is that God is an infinite, eternal, and substantial act of understanding [cf. B. Lonergan, SJ, “The Concept of Verbum in the Writings of St. Thomas Aquinas,” Theological Studies 10 (1949) 359–393].

Objects of Divine Knowledge. What traditionally have been called the secondary objects of divine knowledge may now be considered. By reason of the fact that God knows Himself perfectly (since His very being is His act of knowledge), then He knows His own power perfectly. This divine power, in turn, extends to other things by the very fact that it is the first efficient cause of all things. God, accordingly, knows things other than Himself, and He knows them immediately and specifically, not successively and generically. God also knows evil. While evil is a privation, an absence of good, yet because God knows all goods perfectly He knows that some of them will suffer corruption because of evils. So, through the very fact of knowing good, God also knows evil. God also knows individuals, and this again stems from His causality. For God’s knowledge is coextensive with His causality. “He knows other things through His essence insofar as [His essence] is the likeness of all things as their productive principle; therefore, his essence must be the sufficient principle for knowing all things made through it not only in their universal nature but in their individuality” (Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.11). Finally God can know not only those things that actually exist or have existed but all that can be produced either by Himself or by creatures. Traditionally this is called the science of simple intelligence (scientia simplicis intelligentiae), i.e., the certain knowledge of all possible participations of the divine essence. Once again this is a consequence of the proposition that the divine essence, through which the divine intellect knows, is the adequate likeness of everything that is or can be, both with regard to common principles and what is proper to each individual.

Divine Knowledge of the Future. A distinct place has been given to this matter of God’s knowledge of the future because of the extensive theological controversy that has centered on it since the 16th century. As was seen above, the Christian Fathers were quite conscious of the problem of God’s knowledge of the future, predestination, and human liberty. By way of a solution, basically, they had simply insisted that there was no incompatibility. In the 16th century, however, as a result of the Calvinist preaching, the question of predestination and God’s foreknowledge becomes a central issue. For what is involved is man’s free participation in God’s salutary activity. This Calvinist preaching is made particularly acute by the teaching of BAIUS (cf. H. Rondet, 287–293). The polemical exigencies, in the end, make inescapable the Catholic theological controversy. Any study of this Catholic controversy makes it clear that there is no question that God knows all future events. What is in question is the mode of knowing future contingents, and, in particular, future contingents that are dependent on the exercise of free choice by man. As the controversy originates, both sides rest their case on the interpretation of St. Thomas. The basic article (Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.13) looks to showing that the divine knowledge of the future contingents is quite different from man’s. Man can only foresee these conjecturally because he only knows them in their causes. God, on the other hand, knows these future contingents not only in their causes but in their existence. Hence, while contingents come into existence for men successively, God, who transcends time, knows them at once because His knowledge is measured by eternity. “All things that are in time are eternally present to God . . . because He eternally surveys all things as they are in their presence to Him” (Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.13).

The problematic of the divine knowledge of the future as it came to the fore in the 16th century was in part the necessary consequence of a more immediate problem. The actual issue, as raised by the reformed preaching (and given immediacy by the teaching of Baius), was the relationship of divine GRACE and human liberty. Faced with this issue, the Dominican tradition had tended to respond by giving primacy to the omnipotence of the divine will. Contrariwise, directly confronted with the Calvinist preachers and the followers of Baius, the Jesuits had tended to stress human liberty.

It is these two basically related emphases that are brought into controversial confrontation by the ascendancy of Domingo Báñez to the leadership of the Dominican tradition at Salamanca in 1577. Basically, and at the risk of oversimplification, one may say that Báñez and the Thomistic tradition he gives rise to understand St. Thomas as teaching that God knows all future contingents in their causes inasmuch as they are determined by Himself, the first cause [cf. D. Báñez, Scholastica commentaria in primam partem Summae Theologiae s. Thomae (Madrid 1934) 351]. It is in the light of this principle that the subsequent Bañezian interpretation would seek to interpret the key statement of St. Thomas: “The divine knowledge must be regarded as the cause of things when taken in conjunction with His will” (Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.8). In this statement Bañezians would see St. Thomas as maintaining that the divine will must intervene if the purely possible is, in any sense, to become a future. So viewed, there can be no science of vision, no knowledge of what will be or might be unless the divine will decrees it to be. This decree cannot be a mere matter of execution; it must be a matter of determination—i.e., a predetermining decree (see PREDETERMINATION). Only in this way can the merely possible become the future in any sense. In this framework liberty is preserved by making it have its source in man’s judgment—the choice of means. The actuality or the efficacy of the act, however, must come from God; this is the physical PREMOTION. In this view, the unchangeable design of God does not bear on man’s judgment and so does not destroy his liberty (see BÁÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM).

This basic position as formulated by Báñez very quickly was brought into direct confrontation with the Jesuit teaching in Spain. The first confrontation was at a public disputation in Valladolid in 1582. From this point on debates took place all over Spain. Louvain was involved, the Inquisition in both Portugal and Spain was called on, and finally the controversy was brought to Rome (cf. E. Vansteenbergh, “Molinisme,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 10.2: 2094–2101; 2154–66). In the midst of this theological turmoil the Concordia of Luis de MOLINA appeared after much opposition, particularly by Báñez. As a result, it contained an extensive appendix defending the author’s work against the critique of Báñez.

Molina had been assigned to comment on the first part of St. Thomas’s Summa. In this task he had concentrated on the endeavor to reconcile human liberty, divine foreknowledge, providence, and predestination. The key to his whole conception is what he calls middle science (SCIENTIA MEDIA). As does every Catholic theologian, Molina accepts as indisputable the fact that the FUTURIBLE (the hypothetical future) is an object of the divine knowledge. In the Bañezian conception these futuribles are a highly secondary issue to the future contingent. Molina, however, makes them a central element in his solution of the question since they are the object of the middle science. The question is: how are such hypothetical futures to be known by God? Molina is convinced that if these futuribles and future free contingents depend from a divine decree then human liberty is inconceivable. Consequently, he looks for another way, and this way is precisely signified by the term middle science. For Molina and those who follow him the divine knowledge of future contingents has, as it were, three stages, or moments. First, by natural science, or the science of simple intelligence, God knows all possibles. So He knows all that a given free agent placed in any possible condition will do. Second, by middle science God knows what any free agent would do if set in such and such a situation with such and such assistance, in a determined set of circumstances. These are the futuribles, the hypothetical futures. Finally, God decides to actualize a particular order of things. In this order are verified the circumstances and conditions already foreseen through the middle science. And so since God knows what this free agent would do, if placed in these circumstances, and then by a simple executive decree He actualizes a particular order, He knows infallibly what the free agent will do. This is free knowledge, or the science of vision. It is the contention of those who uphold this basic position that it preserves God’s causal primacy since nothing in fact exists until God decrees it. Yet liberty is also safeguarded since the decree does not bear on man’s free determination but only on the realization of a particular order and circumstances (see MOLINISM).

The length of this article allows only for a bare statement of each position. It forbids any lengthy discussion of the very rigorous criticism that has been leveled by each side in the controversy, as well as the vigorous, if sometimes violent, defenses that have been undertaken by the proponents of the positions. For a bibliography one may consult E. Vansteenbergh’s article on Molinism noted above. To be noted also is the fact that within the general Bañezian and Molinistic positions there are divergences and many carefully nuanced variations. So, for example, Suárez does not accept a number of the conclusions put forth by Molina. Accepting the middle science, Suárez nonetheless differs very strongly on the presentiality of future contingents. He also demands much more of determination with regard to the future contingents than Molina allows and is sharply critical of Molina in this regard (cf. Opuscula 2.7.3). Within the Bañezian tradition divergences can also be found, as well as efforts, in the general Thomistic tradition, to reconcile—in such theologians as L. Billot and J. Van der Meersch in their tracts on the one God [J. Van der Meersch, De Deo uno et trino (2d ed. Bruges 1928); L. Billot, De Deo uno et trino (7th ed. Rome 1926)].

Contemporarily there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction with the focus of the controversy and its results.

There is a tendency to judge the elements of the controversy as sifting down from too rigid an approach and the controversy itself as having been conducted on too narrow and too unhistoric a level. The genetic study of the thought of St. Thomas set in its actual historical context has given rise to a critical reevaluation of both the issues and the answers traditionally formulated. And so, B. Lonergan, SJ, believes that the Bañezian system runs counter to a whole body of doctrine and texts in St. Thomas [cf. "St. Thomas's Theory of Operation," Theological Studies 3 (1942) 387-389; "St. Thomas's Thought on Gratia operans," ibid. 565]. Lonergan would also maintain that the synthesis of St. Thomas himself demands instrumental cooperation rather than predetermination. He argues ". . . the Molinist lacks the speculative acumen to make his grace leave the will instrumentally subordinate to divine activity. But the Bañezian has exactly the same speculative blind-spot: because he cannot grasp that the will is truly an instrument by the mere fact that God causes the will of the end . . ." (ibid. 577). As Lonergan sees it, there is a failure on both sides to understand properly the position of St. Thomas on the divine transcendence (cf. ibid. 578). It is criticisms such as this that have inclined a number of others to restudy the whole question and to reduce its proportionate importance in the theological study of the divine nature [e.g., J. Farrelly, OSB, Predestination, Grace and Free Will (Westminster MD 1964); W. G. Most, Novum tentamen ad solutionem de gratia et praedestinatione (Rome 1963)].

For the believing Christian divine knowledge also implies Trinitarian doctrine and theology. Only through revelation is it possible to see that while much of the fact of God's knowledge can be formulated in the natural light of reason, some understanding of the full meaning and depth of this knowledge requires a knowledge of the Trinity. Here, it is affirmed that while God is an eternal subsistent act of understanding and each of the Divine Persons is the same act of understanding, yet only the Father understands as uttering the Word, His only begotten Son (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a, 34.1 ad 3; 34.2 ad 4).

See Also: CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS; FREE WILL; FREE WILL AND GRACE; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; GRACE, CONTROVERSIES ON; PROVIDENCE OF GOD (THEOLOGY OF); WILL OF GOD.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 14.2:1598-1620. O. SEMMELROTH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 1:356-358. P. DESCOQS, Praelectiones theologiae naturalis, 2 v. (Paris 1932-38). W. F. DEWAN, The One God (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1963). P. DUMONT, Liberté humaine concours divin d'après Suárez (Paris 1936). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, The One God, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis 1943); Providence, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis 1937); Predestination, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis 1939). F. GENUYT, Le Mystère de Dieu (Paris 1963). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus theologicus II (Quebec 1948) 419-684. R. JOLIVET, The God of Reason, tr. M. PONTIFEX (New York 1958). B. G. MURCHLAND, ed. and tr., God Among Men (Notre Dame, IN 1960).

[E. M. BURKE]

ONAHAN, WILLIAM JAMES

Catholic lay leader; b. Leighlin Bridge, County Carlow, Ireland, Nov. 24, 1836; d. Chicago, Ill., Jan. 12, 1919. As the son of John and Johanna Onahan, he lived for a time in Liverpool, England, immigrated to New York in 1851, and joined his family in Chicago in 1854. From office boy and shipping clerk he rose through a flour commission brokerage to high status in the business and political life of Chicago. Onahan was actively interested in political affairs and supported Stephen A. Douglas's presidential aspirations. After marrying Margaret Duffy in 1860, he served during the Civil War as civilian secretary of the Irish Brigade, recruited for the Union Army, and subsequently supported the peace movement and engaged in Democratic ward politics. Business and politics did not preclude Church activities, and he performed countless services for Bp. James Duggan of Chicago, aided the Jesuits in purchasing real estate, assisted several sisters' orders, and engaged in debating at the Catholic Institute and Catholic Lyceum. He was a director of the Catholic Asylum and Reformatory, organized the St. Patrick's Society, and served Abp. John Ireland in promoting Irish Catholic colonization projects in Minnesota and Nebraska. Personal advancement came with his appointment as a member of the Chicago Board of Education in 1863, reform work as city collector, and service as city comptroller and as president of the public library and the Home Savings Bank. In opposing Chicago's socialists, arbitrating strikes, campaigning for temperance, and resisting immigration restrictionists, Onahan performed many civic and religious tasks; for these he received the Laetare medal from the University of Notre Dame, Ind., and was made honorary private chamberlain by Leo XIII in 1895.

Onahan was Chicago correspondent of the New York Freeman's Journal and author of articles in the Catholic World, Illinois Catholic Historical Review, American Catholic Historical Researches, and other journals. He also published in 1895 some of his lectures on the Jesuits, having previously (1891) published The Religious Crisis in France, Our Rights and Duties as Catholics and Citizens, Our Faith and Our Flag, and The Influence of the Catholic Layman. He was for four decades a corresponding member of the Chicago Historical Society and ended his career as president of the Illinois

Catholic Historical Society and honorary vice president of the Illinois State Historical Society. Onahan was considered by many the outstanding layman of the late 19th century, and was chosen to organize the Catholic Lay Congress in Baltimore, MD, in 1889. He proposed an international lay congress in Chicago in conjunction with the World's Fair, and also served as organizing chairman of the Columbian Catholic Congress, which met with the Parliament of Religions in 1893.

Bibliography: M. S. PAHOREZKI, The Social and Political Activities of William James Onahan (Washington 1942).

[J. R. BETTS]

ONANISM

In common usage often taken to mean improperly completed intercourse or even masturbation. The word is taken from the story of Onan in the Book of Genesis (38.1–10). Onan was commanded by his father, Judah, to take Tamar, the widow of his brother, Her, who had been slain by the Lord, and to perform his duty as brother-in-law and raise up descendants for his brother. This was in accordance with the custom of LEVIRATE MARRIAGE. Onan, however, to avoid raising up descendants for his brother, “wasted his seed upon the ground” whenever he had relations with Tamar. Because what he did was evil in the sight of the Lord, Onan was slain. Popular usage of the term onanism is based on the assumption that the evil for which the Lord took Onan's life was his unchastity. This, however, is by no means clear from the text, in which his refusal to conform to the prescribed marriage custom can be seen as the wickedness that brought vengeance upon him. Consequently, no certain argument can be based upon this text to prove the sinful character of either improperly completed intercourse or MASTURBATION. Evidence for this must be sought elsewhere.

See Also: CONTRACEPTION.

Bibliography: D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (12th ed. Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 3:699–704.

[J. D. FEARON]

O'NEILL, SARA BENEDICTA

Lay apostle; b. Chicago, Ill., March 17, 1869; d. Chicago, Jan. 11, 1954. She studied romance languages at Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., and, much later, library science at the University of Chicago. She taught for 35 years at Tilden Public High School in Chicago. Through her friendship with Ellen Gates Starr, a convert and a coworker of Jane Addams of Hull House, she acquired an admiration for the Benedictines and the contributions they had made through their libraries. During her life she made five trips to the Benedictine monastery of Monte Cassino in Italy and also visited the monasteries of Maria Laach and Beuron in Germany.

She was professed as an oblate of St. Benedict at Monte Cassino on Aug. 4, 1902. At that time she conceived the idea of a library that would serve the cultural, religious, and intellectual interests of people in the Loop of Chicago. She spent the next 25 years interesting her friends and associates in the project. The St. Benedict Library, finally established on Oct. 30, 1931, became a rendezvous for writers and intellectuals and afforded them an opportunity to meet informally. She was also known as an apostle of the liturgical movement when the phrase was hardly known to most lay Catholics.

[E. V. CARDINAL]

ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT

The phrase “ontological argument” is generally understood by historians of philosophy to refer to an argument for the existence of GOD. The term ontological was used by Immanuel KANT to describe Descartes's version of the argument. Later historians, however, have applied the term to every form of the argument, but especially to that formulated by St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY in his Monologion and Proslogion. The effect of such diversity of usage has tended to obscure essential differences in the assumptions on which various forms of the argument rest, as well as to ignore the different purposes for which the argument was employed.

St. Anselm and Descartes. The ontological argument has been used in both theological and philosophical contexts. The texts of St. Anselm and DESCARTES are the primary examples of these two uses. According to St. Anselm, the purpose of the argument is to help to understand “in some degree Thy truth which my heart believes and loves.” In contrast, Descartes's philosophical use of the argument is concerned with establishing an intellectual sanction for true judgments concerning “the essence of material things.”

The direct consequence of locating the argument for the existence of God within a theological context is to see the argument as unique and applicable in only one instance. But Descartes, in formulating his version of the argument, says that he intends to show that the existence of God “would pass with me for a truth at least as certain as I ever judged any truth of mathematics to be . . .” (Meditation 5). For him, mathematical proofs are the paradigms for all proofs concerned with material things. Consequently he regards the ontological argument as a most general and paradigmatic kind of proof.

The failure to distinguish between the ontological argument as a model for other arguments and as a unique argument has had unfortunate consequences in evaluating the argument, especially the version of St. Anselm. Post-Kantian and contemporary criticism have generally relied on criteria of proof that are indeed relevant to any argument serving as a paradigm for other proofs, but irrelevant to an argument intended to hold in only one instance. A summary of St. Anselm's arguments supports this notion.

Argument in the Monologion. St. Anselm describes the Monologion as a soliloquy, i.e., as "a meditation on the grounds of faith." He cautions the reader first to "read diligently Augustine's books on the Trinity, and then judge my treatise in the light of those" (Monologion, pref.). The subject of the meditation is the "essence of divinity" and includes the many things that we "necessarily believe regarding God and his creatures" (ch. 1). The stated purpose of the argument is to show by reason alone how far one can come toward an understanding of the truths of belief, even if one does not believe. St. Anselm adds one most important condition regarding the strength of his argument: The conclusions drawn should be understood as having a qualified, or quasi, necessity and not an absolute NECESSITY.

The term necessity, as St. Anselm uses it, means "always either compulsion or restraint" (Cur Deus Homo, ch. 17). Moreover, necessity refers to the actions and operations of creatures, but is not predicable of the divine nature itself. For "when we say with regard to God that anything is necessary or not necessary, we do not mean that, as far as He is concerned, there is any necessity either coercive or prohibitory, but we mean that there is a necessity in everything else, restraining or driving them in a particular way" (ibid.).

Premises and Conclusion. Since the meditation is about God and His creation, St. Anselm proceeds from assumptions that he regards as most evident regarding creatures. All men seek to enjoy only those things that they consider GOOD. It is clear that every man sometime reflects on the cause of that phenomenon. St. Anselm's meditation on this resulted in the following argument, which he says has quasi-necessity: Every object of desire is regarded or conceived as good, where good is understood as either a useful or a noble object. Sense experience and intellectual reflection show that there are innumerable objects that vary in goodness and intensity of desirability. This multiplicity demands a single unifying PRINCIPLE OF EXPLANATION, which also serves as the principle of order among the degrees of goodness. Such a principle cannot have the same generic characteristics as do other objects of desire. Consequently, the good that is to be the principle of all goods that admit of a variation in degree of goodness must itself not admit of any variation in degree. Hence, the principle of order and explanation of the multiplicity of goods must be a supreme good. For any good that can be thought or perceived to vary in degree can be neither self-ordering nor self-explanatory.

The notion of a supreme good means that it is good in itself rather than by PARTICIPATION in or by comparison with any other good. Since all other goods are good because of the supreme good, the supreme good must also be the most noble or mighty good (see GOOD, THE SUPREME).

The objects of desire have natures that themselves vary in degree of worth or dignity. Hence, the supreme good too must have a nature or essence that is supreme. It follows that the supreme nature is the ordering principle of all other essences or natures. But the supreme nature, being the principle of all other natures, cannot itself have an ordering principle. Hence, the supreme nature is unqualifiedly autonomous or self-subsistent. As a corollary it follows that all other natures or essences proceed from the supreme nature. St. Anselm observes finally that the meaning of self-subsistence can be expressed only analogically, or more properly, through figurative speech, but this in no way vitiates the truth of what is understood.

Summary of the Reasoning. The argument of the Monologion can be reduced to four propositions: (1) Men desire objects they think to be good—objects that vary in degree of goodness. (2) Because the variance in degree is intelligible, there must exist an invariable principle of order, i.e., a supreme good that is the source of all goodness. (3) The objects of desire have natures that vary in worth and dignity. (St. Anselm says that whoever doubts this cannot be called a man.) (4) Because the worth of natures varies in degree there must exist a supreme nature that is invariable and does not admit of comparison, i.e., a self-subsistent nature that is the originative principle of all variable natures.

Argument in the Proslogion. Most commentators do not usually regard the argument of the Monologion as a version of the ontological argument, reserving that title to the proof in the Proslogion. One commonly held reason for making such a distinction is that the argument of the Monologion assumes causal principles and is analogous to the "fourth way" of St. Thomas (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF). St. Anselm, however, seems to see the difference between the two to be in the number of arguments rather than in method or procedure. Whereas in his preface to the Proslogion he describes the Monologion as bound together by a number of arguments, he aspires in the Proslogion to formulate a single argument that would prove the existence of God.

Difference in Intent. A possible explanation for the difference in the number of arguments may be found in the difference in aspect and intention between the two works. The Monologion treats of God and His creation, while the Proslogion reflects on God and His attributes. The Monologion begins with assumptions concerning the actions and nature of creatures that are evidently multiple, but the Proslogion begins with a single assumption about the meaning of the term God. Moreover, St. Anselm states that the Proslogion differs from the Monologion in being a discourse rather than a soliloquy; yet it is a discourse of the soul with itself, rather than a dialogue or scientific treatise on THEOLOGY. In the Proslogion, St. Anselm advises the reader to “Enter the inner chamber of thy mind; shut out all thoughts save that of God, and such as can aid thee in seeking Him; close thy door and seek Him” (ch. 1). The Proslogion is a matter of “faith seeking understanding.”

The argument of the Proslogion has two distinct concerns. St. Anselm says: “And so, Lord, do Thou, who dost give understanding to faith, give me, so far as Thou knowest it to be profitable, to understand that Thou art as we believe; and that Thou art that which we believe” (ch. 2). The argument for the existence of God is restricted to the first of these concerns, i.e., understanding “that Thou art as we believe.”

St. Anselm takes on faith that God is “a being than which nothing greater can be conceived” (ibid.). This verbal formula of the belief, he says, is understood by everyone who hears the words. But what is at issue is not that one understand the words, but that what the words signify does exist apart from the understanding of the hearer. St. Anselm argues that there is a difference between something existing both in fact and in the understanding, and something existing in the understanding only. He adds that to exist in both ways “is greater” than to exist in the understanding only. Consequently, he concludes that by understanding the meaning of the term God, one must also understand that God exists apart from the understanding. The corollary to the argument is that it is impossible both to understand the meaning of the term God and to conceive that God does not exist apart from the understanding. St. Anselm does say it is, of course, possible to articulate sentences that assert the nonexistence of God, for understanding in no way coerces the use of language. But this understanding does prohibit one from conceiving as true the assertion that God does not exist, even if one is unwilling to believe that God does exist.

Synopsis of the Argument. A paraphrase of the argument shows the extent of its claim and implicitly reveals the grounds of the continuing controversy about its validity. In effect St. Anselm says; (1) I hold on faith that God exists. (2) I hold on faith that He is “that than which nothing greater can be conceived.” (3) I rationally examine the content of the concepts given by faith. (4) It is impossible that the understanding of those concepts totally encompasses, comprehends, or contains the meaning of “that than which nothing greater can be conceived.” (5) Hence, the understanding can now truly affirm what was already held on faith, i.e., that God exists extramentally, and is that that we believe. (6) Given the meaning of God on faith, it is impossible for reason to conceive that He does not exist.

Evaluations of the Argument. St. Anselm’s argument was first challenged by a monk named Gaunilon, whose first critical objection was that St. Anselm had begged the question by assuming the definition of God, and then constructing a proof based on the hypothetical character of the definition. St. Anselm in reply calls “on [his] faith and conscience” to deny the arbitrariness of the definition (Anselm, Apologetic, ch. 1). The second objection of Gaunilon was that St. Anselm’s argument is invalid because it moves without warrant from ideas to realities; he cites as an example the concept of a perfect island, and argues that on St. Anselm’s grounds such an island ought to exist. The charge is denied by asserting that the argument holds only in the case of God, and, hence, is incapable of refutation by a counter-example that does not depend on a movement from faith to reason, but only on REASONING.

Later scholastics are divided on the merits of the argument. St. THOMAS AQUINAS and RICHARD OF MIDDLETON reject the argument. St. Thomas’s rejection of the argument invariably turns on the question, “Whether the existence of God is self-evident?” His reply is that St. Anselm’s argument does not succeed in showing that the existence of God is self-evident to us (Summa theologiae 1a, 2.1. ad 2). Other scholastics such as ALEXANDER OF HALES, St. BONAVENTURE and DUNS SCOTUS accepted St. Anselm’s argument with modification. Scotus was concerned to show that there is no contradiction in asserting that an infinite being is comprehensible to a finite mind. As part of his proof, Scotus says he will “touch up” St. Anselm’s argument: “His description must be understood thus: ‘God is a being than which’—when thought of without a contradiction—‘a greater cannot be thought of’ without a contradiction.” The effect of that qualification is reflected in the conclusion Scotus draws: “It follows that there exists in reality such a highest thinkable as mentioned, through which God is described” (De primo principio, concl. 9).

After Descartes's use of the ontological argument for strictly philosophical purposes, new criteria of evaluation were introduced. Admitting his indebtedness to Duns Scotus and distinguishing between a priori and a posteriori proofs, LEIBNIZ argued that if God is possible, He exists. A version of the argument was used also by SPINOZA to show that God necessarily exists, while LOCKE rejected the argument for roughly the same reasons as those of St. Thomas. Kant's famous dictum that existence is not a predicate led him to attack Descartes's version of the argument—a rejection that was seconded by HEGEL, but only on the ground that St. Anselm's statement was faulty in form.

Recent discussion of the argument has been led by Norman Malcolm, who construes one form of St. Anselm's argument to conclude that God has necessary existence, a conclusion that Malcolm asserts follows from a valid argument. Critics of Malcolm's position have either found his use of the term necessity ambiguous, or have argued on formal logical grounds that the argument as presented is invalid.

The preponderance of contemporary secular scholarly opinion regards both the Anselmian and the Cartesian view of the ontological argument as logically invalid and metaphysically suspect. There is no consensus among Christian scholars about the proper interpretation and evaluation of St. Anselm's argument. Interpretations vary from seeing the argument as rigorously demonstrative to finding in it an adequate mystical theology, or regarding it as a rough but solid beginning of a systematic natural theology. Judgments concerning the validity of the argument are as varied as are the interpretations.

The position taken here is that the ontological argument of St. Anselm has nothing significant in common with the later versions of Descartes, et al. Because St. Anselm's argument is absolutely unique, it cannot be evaluated in the light of later criteria nor can it be criticized for its failure to accomplish purposes for which it was not intended. St. Anselm did not intend to make a formal proof for the existence of God. He was not concerned with making a scientific demonstration for the existence of a necessary being, or for the possibility of a necessary being, or for the non-contradictoriness of the existence of a necessary being. Instead, St. Anselm intended his argument to exemplify a method through which the understanding can find an expression for the certitude of FAITH or through which reason can find a way to articulate the "reasonable solidity of Truth." From this perspective the argument can be regarded as valid.

Bibliography: ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, Proslogium; Monologium; An Appendix in Behalf of the Foot by Gaunilon; and Cur Deus Homo, tr. S. N. DEAN (La Salle, IL 1954); Opera Omnia, ed. F. S. SCHMITT, 6 v. (Edinburgh 1946–) critical text. N. MALCOLM, "Anselm's Ontological Arguments," Philosophical Review 69 (1960) 41–62; articles in reply, Philosophical Review 70 (1961) 56–111. A. DANIELS, "Quellen, Beiträge und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Gottesbeweise im Dreizehnten Jahrhundert," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 8.1–2 (1909). M. CAPPUYNS, "L'Argument de saint Anselme," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 6 (1934) 313–330. K. BARTH, La Preuve de l'existence de Dieu d'après Anselme de Cantorbéry, tr. J. CARRÈRE (Neuchâtel 1958). R. G. MILLER, "The Ontological Argument in St. Anselm and Descartes," The Modern Schoolman 32 (1955) 341–349; 33 (1955) 31–38. C. HARTSHORNE, "Logic of the Ontological Argument," Journal of Philosophy 58 (1961) 471–473.

[A. NEMETZ]

ONTOLOGISM

Essentially the affirmation that the idea of BEING, which is immediately and intuitively present to the human intellect, is God Himself. This description will be borne out and will serve as a general guide in the following historical, theological, and philosophical examination of ontologism.

Ontologism Viewed Historically. The word "ontologism" as a term generally used to describe a philosophic system is of nineteenth-century origin. It indicates one element of the basic tenet of the teaching in question, namely, that man has being (ὄν ὄντος, being) as the object of his intellect. From this fact, which ontologists take as axiomatic, another essential element of their theory is deduced: the being that is the object of the intellect is Being, God Himself. The principal defenders of this proposition in the nineteenth century were V. GIOBERTI in Italy, G. Ubaghs in Belgium, and, to a lesser extent, O. BROWNSON in the United States. Brownson, for example, castigates "the Christian peripatetics" for not admitting "that the universal, the necessary, the eternal, the immutable without the intuition of which the contingent and the particular are inconceivable, and no syllogism is possible, are identically the divine being, the ens necessarium et reale, or God himself" [Boston Quarterly Review, 2d New York series (Oct. 1860) 436]. A. ROSMINI-SERBATI, although often called an ontologist, states explicitly: "That which is shown to our mind when it sees being and nothing else is not the living and acting God, and consequently cannot receive in any way the personal denomination of God" [Del divino nella natura, v. 4 of Teosofia (5 v. Turin 1859–74) 11].

Although ontologism was formulated under a specific title only in the nineteenth century, the theory had been favored centuries earlier. In France its great master was N. MALEBRANCHE, ably expounded by H. Gerdil, who quotes also from Thomassin and Marcilio Ficino with approval. "Only He [God] can throw light upon the [human] spirit by His own substance. . . it is He who rules over our spirit, according to St. Augustine, without the mediation of any creature. . . . One cannot conceive that the infinite can be represented by anything created. . . it must be said that one knows God through Himself, although the knowledge one has of Him in this life is very imperfect" [Gerdil (quoting Malebranche), 170]. In other words, the knowledge one has of God, even on a natural plane, is dependent upon an immediate, although obscure, intuition of Him.

Malebranche's appeal to St. Augustine indicates sufficiently that the upholders of ontologistic teaching did not consider their theory as new. For them, its roots were deep in history, and, consequently, it drew its nourishment from the instinctive movement of the human spirit as expressed in the great minds of the ages. On a historical piano they appealed to Plato, to St. Augustine, and to St. Thomas Aquinas.

For St. Augustine "the forms—now ideas in the divine mind—yield their eternal truth to the mind in the light of a divine illumination in the mind. This is an exact replica of Plato's image of the sun: for Augustine, too, God is to the mind what the sun is to the things visible to the eye" [A. H. Armstrong and R. H. Markus, Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy (London 1960)]. From considerations of this kind, whose truth cannot be denied, ontologists went on to conclude that their teaching was based on that of the masters of antiquity. They found further support in St. Thomas Aquinas: ". . . we are said to see all things in God and to make our judgments according to Him, insofar as through a participation of His light we know and judge all things; for the natural light itself of reason is a certain participation of the divine light" (Summa Theologiae 1a, 12.11 ad 3). Although St. Thomas himself explicitly denies that the purely natural man sees God, ontologists maintain that this cannot follow from his dicta about man's participation in the divine light. According to them, being seen by the mind is either the Creator or a creature. If it is the divine light, it cannot be a creature. Therefore, it must be the Creator [cf. V. Gioberti, Degli errori di Antonio Rosmini (Brussels 1841) 37–38].

Ontologism Viewed Theologically. Among the propositions condemned by the Holy Office in 1861 as unsafe for teaching (tuto tradi non possunt) was the statement: "At least an habitual, immediate knowledge of God is essential to the human intellect in such a way that, without it, it cannot know anything: for it is the intellectual light itself" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 2841). From a theological point of view, this condemnation was the culmination of a controvery that had raged during the previous years between "traditionalists" who maintained in various ways that even a purely natural man has an essential need of revelation, and the extremists among those who upheld the natural autonomy of human reason. Although the particular reasons for the dangers inherent in ontologism were not expressed in the condemnatory decree, they may fairly be summarized under two headings of Catholic doctrine: the distinction between the Creator and the creature, and the distinction between nature and grace.

If, as Gioberti maintains, ideas are the real things themselves, there would seem to be no place for a distinction between God and His creatures. Basically, Gioberti's principle leaves no room for a distinction between act and potency or, consequently, between essence and existence. It follows that the essence of all beings is to exist. The way is thus open for the final step to pantheism: If the essence of all beings is to exist, there must be only one Being that embraces all existence.

There is an equal danger of confusing the natural with the SUPERNATURAL in the ontologistic way of regarding the nature of the object of man's natural intellect. If by nature, without reference to supernature, man is granted a direct, even if obscure, glimpse of God's reality, it is difficult to see how any grace given to him can differ in kind from the light of reason he receives in his natural creation. Moreover, if his human nature essentially demands the vision of God it would seem that the notion of grace as an altogether gratuitous gift of God to man is to be rejected. Brownson, for example, while avoiding the Scylla of pantheism, seems to be in danger from the Charybdis of naturalism. "Nothing remains [in order to avoid pantheism] but to admit that the soul has, by one and the same act, an intuition of God and itself. . . the Creator presents himself, in the act of creation, to the created spirit as the object of its activity" [Boston Quarterly Review (Jan. 1860) 49].

Ontologism Viewed Philosophically. Philosophically, ontologism takes its stand upon a fact open to observation, that is, the knowledge of being in general is that alone which enables man to know particular beings. Ontologists accept wholeheartedly St. Thomas's ens communissimum as the first thing known to the intellect. In order to say "the thing is something" (e.g., "the table is large"), one must first know what "is" means. Then they add: but "is" is the name of God. Therefore, one must know God to affirm anything of anything.

It is implicit in this argument that the fundamental knowledge of the human intellect cannot be abstracted from knowledge of material things or spring from the human spirit. It cannot be abstracted from material things because it is the prerequisite by which they are known, and also because being as such is not to be found in them. They are only the effects of being. Just as God precedes the creation, so knowledge of God precedes knowledge of His creatures.

It cannot spring from the human spirit because the spirit itself is created and cannot produce the infinite. According to the ontologists, consideration of material things and of the human spirit can only lead to the conclusion that the knowledge of Being, God Himself, is given to the spirit by the Creator at the first moment of its existence.

Ontologists saw their system as the only answer to the sensism of Locke and the subjectivism common to Kant and Descartes. Malebranche, by showing that the light of reason cannot itself come from the senses, intended to oppose the materialistic interpretation imparted by Locke to the adage: “Nihil est in intellectu quod non prius fuerit in sensu”; Gioberti, by upholding the reality of the object given to the spirit from outside itself, set himself against German idealism and French psychologism, both of which are essentially subjective.

Philosophical objections to ontologism are not hard to find. The chief difficulty springs from observation. While it is true that one must know being in general as a condition for knowing anything at all (for of anything known it must at least be said: “it is something”), experience shows that this being is not Being (God, the infinite reality). If it were, what need would there be to know any finite reality?

The key to the right understanding of the relationship between the limitless being known by man’s intellect and the infinite reality is best found in St. Thomas’s illustration, not in the ontologistic explanation. Just as one can see the light of the sun without seeing the sun itself, so the light of reason, which is immutable truth, can be seen by the intellect without its seeing God Himself (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a, 12.11; C. gent. 3.47). Ignoring this distinction means opting for ontologism.

See Also: BEATIFIC VISION; GOD, INTUITION OF; ILLUMINISM; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; LIGHT OF GLORY.

Bibliography: Sources. N. MALEBRANCHE, De la recherche de la verité, 2 v. (Paris 1674). H. S. GERDIL, Défense du sentiment du P. Malebranche . . . (Turin 1748). G. C. UBAGHS, Du Problème ontologique des universaux (Liège 1845). V. GIOBERTI, Introduzione allo studio della filosofia (Brussels 1844). Studies. A. FONCK, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:1000–61, the most complete study available. L. LATOUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1967–65) 7:1161–64. P. BURGELIN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1635–36. L. FOUCHER, La Philosophie catholique en France au XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle . . . (Paris 1955). J. HENRY, Le Traditionalisme et l’ontologisme à l’université de Louvain (1835–65) (Louvain 1922). L. STEFANINI, Gioberti (Milan 1947).

[D. CLEARY]

ONTOLOGY

From the Greek ontos and logos, ontology refers to the investigation of being as such, or to the science of being as being. It may also consider what it means to be, what sorts of entities are countenanced, and what kinds of ultimate presuppositions or principles are held or obtained. The term “ontology” is usually traced to the early 17th century, but its significance for modern philosophical reflection is rooted in both ancient and medieval speculation about metaphysics. In the 17th century ontology was initially identified as a part of metaphysics, but today “metaphysics” and “ontology” are often used in popular speech as synonyms. This article traces the origin and development of the term from its inception in Aristotle’s Metaphysics, its solidification as a single science in the Middle Ages, and its separation from metaphysics proper, under the influence of Wolff, during the modern period. The Wolffian tradition survives in modern philosophical usage and serves to explain the order of many scholastic manuals in which ontology is placed after logic and before tracts on special metaphysics.

Ancient and Medieval Origins. In a series of writings, later classified by Andronicus of Rhodes (c. 50 B.C.) as “the books after the physical ones” (ta biblia meta ta physika), Aristotle discusses a science of being simply as being and not as some particular class of beings or part of being. Though he acknowledges in the fourth book of the Metaphysics (1003a–1003b19) various senses of “being”, he claims that there is one primary sense or character by virtue of which these many senses are understood, and that there is some primary science or first philosophy. In the sixth book (1026a16–32), Aristotle refers to a first philosophy that is concerned with being as being, but in contrast to physics and mathematics, precisely as the speculative science of what is separate from matter and motion. First philosophy in this context is labeled “theology” inasmuch as the divine would only be present in something of this nature, i.e., some immutable being (ousia akinetos). Aristotle adds further that this theology would be universal by virtue of the fact that it is first philosophy, i.e., by virtue of its consideration of being in the primary sense.

These references in Aristotle’s Metaphysics to a science of being as being and to divine science, to “first philosophy” and to “theology,” are not unambiguous, as subsequent thinkers repeatedly recognized. Is Aristotle referring to two distinct sciences or is he employing more than one name for the same science? If the latter, how can both being in general and a particular being be the subject of the same science?

In the 13th century, appropriating Aristotle's three-fold division of the speculative sciences (physics, mathematics, and what Aquinas variously calls "first philosophy" or "metaphysics" or "theology"), Aquinas argues that primary being and being in general are the subject of the same science (eadem enim est scientia primi entis et entis communis) inasmuch as primary being(s) are principles of the others (nam prima entia sunt principia aliorum; cf. Aquinas' In Boeth. de Trin. 5.1, In 10 meta. 6 and 11, and the Proemium to the latter). Nevertheless, given the potential for ambiguity in Aristotle's writings themselves, medieval philosophers before and after Aquinas debated the subject matter of metaphysics, as evidenced in the first of the questions raised by Duns Scotus regarding Aristotle's Metaphysics, viz., "Whether the subject of metaphysics is being insofar as it is being, as Avicenna posited being, or God and the Intelligences, as posited by the commentator Averroes?" In the 17th century what may be viewed as the equivalent to Avicenna's interpretation of the subject matter of Aristotle's Metaphysics is dubbed "ontology."

Modern Period. R. Göckel in his Lexicon philosophicum (1613) continues the Aristotelian tradition of distinguishing three progressively abstract "contemplative sciences." However, after physics and mathematics, Göckel accepts a further distinction, urged by Pererius, between divine science and the science of being. The former Göckel labels the transnatural science of God and angels, the latter "ontology," i.e., the science of being and transcendence. In another 17th century Lexicon philosophicum, authored by Micraelius and first published in 1653, a general metaphysics, apparently identified with ontology and concerned with being in the most abstract sense, is distinguished from a particular metaphysics which considers the types of beings separate from matter, viz., God, angels, and the departed souls. Also identifying ontology (or "ontosophy") as the study of ens in genere, although in a fashion much closer to Aristotle's descriptions of "first philosophy," is Clauberg in his Elementa philosophiae sive Ontosophia (1647) and in the Prolegomena to his Metaphysica (1656). In Du Hamel's Philosophie vetus et nova (1678) "ontology" is identified as the first or primary sort of metaphysics, the "scientia generalis" concerned with the nature of being itself, its principles, properties, and types. The two kinds of specialized metaphysics, derivative of this ontology, are the study of the causes of physical things (physicae contemplationis caput) and natural theology.

What these various 17th century thinkers commonly illustrate is a tendency to distinguish ontology from theology—a marked departure from the medieval view of metaphysics as a single science. Representing an even more radical departure within this context is Leibniz's tentative classification of ontology within the scientia generalis he outlines in his Introductio ad Encyclopediam arcanam; sive initia et specimina scientiae generalis (1679). Scientia generalis, "the science of the knowable in the universe inasmuch as it is such," is said to include, in addition to logic, gnoseology, and various other arts, "perhaps also ontology or the science of something and nothing, of being and not-being, of a thing and the mode of a thing, of substance and accident" (forte etiam Ontologiam seu scientiam de Aliquo et Nihilo, Ente et Non Ente, Re et modo rei, Substantia et Accidente). More influential than Leibniz for the modern use of the term "ontology" in general is the work of the systematizer of a Leibnizian metaphysics, Christian Wolff. According to Wolff's Philosophia prima sive ontologia (1729), "Ontology or first philosophy is the science of being in general or insofar as it is being" (Ontologia seu Philosophia prima est scientia entis in genere, seu quatenus ens est), a metaphysica generalis in contrast to the secondary metaphysicis specialibus: rational psychology, cosmology, and rational theology.

With Wolff, then, the dismemberment of what Aristotle apparently and Aquinas quite clearly construed as a single science (first philosophy, theology, metaphysics) is complete. For Wolff first philosophy is ontology, the study of being as being, and not to be confused with the particular metaphysical discipline of rational theology.

Enlightenment Era. Although sharply critical of Wolff's "dogmatic" metaphysics, Kant expressed appreciation for the "incontestable service" rendered by the clarity of Wolff's delineation of ontology. In the prize essay, "What is the actual progress made by metaphysics since the time of Leibniz and Wolff?" (1791) Kant in fact identifies ontology with transcendental philosophy [see also "The Architectonic of Pure Reason" at the end of the Critique of Pure Reason (1781; 1787)]. Ontology in this sense can be considered a propaedeutic to metaphysics and in that sense even a part of metaphysics, where "metaphysics" is precisely understood as the science of progressing from knowledge of the sensible to that of the supersensible.

Ontology is that very science (as part of metaphysics) which constitutes a system of all concepts of understanding and fundamental principles, yet only insofar as the latter concern objects which can be given to the senses and thus can be corroborated by experience.

Wolff's conception of ontology as a science of being as being, apart from particular beings, resembles, at least formally, one of the meanings of “first philosophy” articulated in Aristotle’s Metaphysics. By contrast, in Kant’s transformation of ontology into a system of categories and principles of sensible, verifiable objects, the echo of the Aristotelian heritage may seem fainter, yet it is no less discernible. Kant’s ontology is precisely that system of concepts and principles by virtue of which alone a sensible object can be judged to be. (Also resembling Aristotle’s approach to “first philosophy” as well as Aquinas’ account of the same, Kant ties this ontology to that which can be said to be in a primary sense, viz., the mode of being sensibly given.)

Not unlike Kant, Hegel employs a Wolffian notion of “ontology” in connection with his own discussion of categories in his “objective logic,” constituted by the first half, i.e., the first two books of the Science of Logic. The objective logic is supposed to take the place of ontology in the traditional, i.e., Wolffian metaphysics, “the part of that metaphysics that is supposed to investigate the nature of Ens in general” (cf. the General Division of the Logic in the Introduction to Hegel’s Science of Logic).

Scholastic Tradition. Towards the end of the 19th century and even up to the middle of the 20th century several authors in the scholastic tradition continue to determine the subject matter of ontology in terms of (sometimes critically refined) medieval and Aristotelian accounts of the degrees of abstraction. These writers also generally employ Wolff’s terminological identification of “metaphysica generalis” and “ontology.” See, for example, the opening page of Carolo Frick’s Ontologia sive Metaphysica Generalis (1894): “Metaphysica generalis seu ontologia definitur: scientia rerum, prouti sub rationibus maxime abstractis et hinc communibus exhibentur” or VAN STEENBERGHEN’S Ontology (1946). The aim of Cardinal Mercier’s Metaphysique generale ou ontologie (1910) is a demonstration of the sort of interpretation of metaphysics found in Aquinas. “We will show . . . why the science which has the divine being for its object does not differ formally from that which treats of being in general.”

Contemporary Phenomenology. In Husserl’s Ideas for a Pure Phenomenology and Phenomenological Philosophy (1913) he argues that every factual science has theoretical foundations in pure sciences of essential being. Husserl labels these sciences of essences “ontologies” and distinguishes formal ontologies concerned with the essence of objectivity in general from regional or material ontologies concerned with regional essences, those ultimate and concrete (in the sense of self-sustaining) generic unities in a hierarchy of essences, such as nature, human being, history. Formal ontology here corresponds to what Husserl in his Logical Investigations (1901), following Meinong, called “a pure (apriori) theory of objects as such,” the study of formal, objective categories (e.g., whole and part, genus and species), the correlates of categories of meaning (e.g., proposition, truth). In Formal and Transcendental Logic (1929) formal ontology is described as “a science of possible objects purely as possible” and thus as a theory of science by way of contrast with the correlative, thematic concern of formal logic for judgments alone. Although the aims and specifications are quite distinct, Husserl’s “formal ontology” as the pure science of essences in the sense of possible objectivities bears a certain (and acknowledged) affinity to Kant’s conception of ontology.

Perhaps the thinker most identified with ontology in the 20th century was Martin Heidegger (17:284b) who claimed indeed that “phenomenology, taken in terms of its content, is the science of the being of the particular being (Sein des Seienden)—ontology” and that “ontology is only possible as phenomenology.” This identification of ontology and phenomenology proposed by Heidegger in Being and Time (1927) departs at once from Husserl’s pure science of essences as well as from traditional ontologies in the history of Western philosophy. Precisely because they are rooted in largely unquestioned, pre-ontological modes of human existence, traditional interpretations of what it means to be take their bearings from theoretical inquiries into particular beings, thereby conflating quite distinctive ways of being (for example, the diverse modes of being proper to things, tools, theoretical objects, humans) and reducing being (or, literally, the sense of ‘to be’) to some particular sort of being. In Heidegger’s telling if dramatic expression, traditional ontology betrays the forgottenness of being (Seinsvergessenheit). Posing the question of being at all accordingly requires the destruction of the traditional content of ontology by way of a fundamental ontology, that is, an interpretation of the fundamental structures of human existence as regards its own most intimate and everyday ways of being; in short, its being-in-the-world as such. The question of being remains the aim of this fundamental ontology, but precisely by way of opening up the horizon “in which something such as being in general becomes understandable,” i.e., “the clarification of the possibility of the understanding of being in general, which belongs to the constitution of the particular being we call the human existent or being-there (Dasein).” Within this horizon time (though not the derivative, putatively endless time of clocks and measurement) discloses itself as the meaning of being.

Following World War II Heidegger began to turn from this phenomenological project of a fundamental ontology with its apparent pretensions to a scientific interpretation of what it means to be. Without denying the necessity of having gone down that path, Heidegger sought to bring into play a kind of thinking, more rigorous than science, in which what it means to be announces itself. In Heidegger's later thinking, then, "ontology" (and its synonyms in his early writings "phenomenology," "hermeneutics") was no longer part of his vocabulary for posing the question of being—nor, in his estimation, can it. "The question of the essence of being dies away, if it does not give up the language of metaphysics, since the metaphysical representing prevents it from thinking the question of the essence of being" (On the Question of Being 1955).

Linguistic Analysts. For other philosophers of the 20th century, especially those concerned with the development of logical languages and the foundations of the sciences, "ontology" signified a confused or at best irrelevant consideration. Thus, in "Logic without Ontology" (1944) Ernest Nagel urged a purely operational or contextual account of the role of logico-mathematical disciplines in inquiry, thereby effectively dismissing as "gratuitous and irrelevant" interpretations of their "ultimate meaning" or calls for the necessity of some "a priori insight into the most pervasive structure of things." So also in "Empiricism, Semantics, and Ontology" (1950) Rudolf Carnap distinguished questions of existence internal to a linguistic framework and thus answerable by logical or empirical methods from external questions "concerning the existence or reality of the system of entities as a whole." The latter sorts of questions of existence cannot be answered because they are framed in the wrong way, that is to say, they are incapable of theoretical resolution because they lie outside the theoretical framework itself. The question as to what sort of things a language will refer to is not a theoretical, but a practical question.

For those who want to develop or use semantical methods, the decisive question is not the alleged ontological question of the existence of abstract entities but rather the question whether the use of abstract linguistic forms or, in technical terms, the use of variables beyond those for things (or phenomenal data) is expedient and fruitful for the purposes for which semantical analyses are made, viz., the analysis, interpretation, clarification, or construction of languages of communication, especially languages of science.

(An albeit strained, but nonetheless quite interesting parallel to Heidegger's criticism of the putatively theoretical approach of traditional ontology is patent, the difference is, of course, that Heidegger did not reduce non-theoretical questioning to matters of belief or pragmatic choice.)

Carnap's influential essay grapples with the problem that even highly formal languages, like those of mathematics and the physical sciences, seem unable to avoid referring to abstract entities such as properties, classes, relations, numbers, and propositions. Accordingly, in addition to the pejorative use just noted, "ontology" has come to designate the sorts of entities or theories about the sorts of entities countenanced by a linguistic system. Questions about the implications of a theory of reference or a semantics are ontological questions. Thus, in Word and Object (1960) Quine spoke of the philosopher's task of "clearing ontological slums." Ontology's job is precisely to scrutinize the uncritical acceptance of such realms as those of physical objects or of classes. By criticizing the tendency on the part of Carnap and others to embrace a sharp boundary between questions of meaning and questions of fact, Quine extended Carnap's own pragmatic approach to ontology (Word and Object was dedicated to Carnap), but in a manner that also called into question his distinction between the internal and external (ontological) questions.

Twentieth-Century Ontologies. Among U.S. and British philosophers during the 20th century there were attempts by thinkers such as Bradley and McTaggart, Whitehead (although he called his epic Process and Reality [1929] "an essay in cosmology"), and Hartshorne to construct ontologies in the tradition of speculative metaphysicians. Perhaps the most sustained such effort is to be found in the works of Paul Weiss. Beginning with Reality in 1938, followed by Modes of Being (1958), Beyond All Appearances (1974), First Considerations (1977), and Privacy (1983), Weiss developed a novel, pluralistic ontology or "study of realities," as he called it. These realities are the actualities (Weiss' "substitute for 'substances' with their supposed adventitious accidents"), finalities ("a plurality of subordinating and subordinated, but ultimately real conditions and sources of contexts which enable particulars to be together"), and the dunamis (an inexhaustible, creative ground, "an indeterminate maw out of which the actualities originate and into which they return").

See Also: PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF; METAPHYSICS.

[D. O. DAHLSTROM]

OPERATIONALISM

A method of defining concepts, mainly those of modern science, in terms of the measuring techniques and other operations associated with their use. It refers as well to the doctrine that the meaning of a statement or symbol is synonymous with a set of operations that enable an observer to decide whether or not the statement is true or the symbol is correctly applied. Where no such set of operations can be specified, the statement or symbol in question is said to be meaningless.

Basic notions. Operationalism was first enunciated by the American physicist P. W. Bridgman and in its subsequent development it is sometimes called operationism. It is a variation of POSITIVISM, which received its earliest systematic expression in the Cours de philosophie positive (Paris 1830–42) of Auguste COMTE. The key thesis of positivism, then as now, is that natural science should limit its concern to what is given in sense experience. Thus, definitions and theories in science should avoid reference to entities or causes whose existence is not experimentally verifiable. Bridgman, in broad agreement with this rule and with the later positivist principle that the meaning of a statement is expressed in the method by which it is verified, attempted a further analysis of verification procedures in terms of particular kinds of operation (see LOGICAL POSITIVISM, VERIFICATION).

As a proposal to purify the language of science, operationalism recommends that the terms used in natural science be defined by reference to the human actions associated with their use. For example, an operational definition of length in the context of measuring a straight metal bar might read: “the number obtained by placing one end of a yardstick at one end of the bar and then reading the numeral at the point where the yardstick meets the other end.” In the field of thermodynamics Bridgman is celebrated for his efforts to define operationally such concepts as heat and temperature.

Critique. Many theorists in the social and behavioral sciences maintain that operational definitions give precision to their terminologies. However, considered as a blanket proposal for restyling all definitions in science, operationalism has met with criticism. One objection concerns the inclusiveness of the concept of operation. If operation includes everything done with deliberation in the furtherance of scientific inquiries, the term applies to such behavior as waiting for a chemical reaction to complete itself, looking for indications of handwork on a piece of flint, and keeping records of the various strata from which prehistoric relics are excavated. Since such behavior is closely interwoven with the uses of scientific terms, and is in fact learned along with those uses, the wholesale adoption of operational definitions would amount in most cases to spelling out what is already known to scientists and is inseparable from sound scientific practice. Related to this is the criticism that operationalism would multiply rather than clarify scientific concepts by requiring a different symbol for each set of operations associated with a concept. Distance, for example, would splinter into as many separate concepts as there are techniques for measuring distances in optics, astronomy, geodesy, and so on.

It is possible to advocate the use of operational definitions in science without accepting the narrowed conception of meaning woven into Bridgman’s discussions. There he sets limits to significant discourse by requiring that the operations needed for verifying a statement be specifiable; otherwise, the statement must be counted meaningless. Objections of two types have dogged Bridgman’s position from the start. The first points out that the declared synonymy between “knowing the meaning of a statement S” and “knowing what operations would lead to the verification of S” is stipulated by Bridgman himself, and does not sum up what the term meaning conveys in the language from which he borrowed it. Those who appreciate the force of this objection take a relaxed view of the apparent threat posed by operationalism against the meaningfulness of ethical and metaphysical statements. A second objection proceeds in large part from critics who, though in sympathy with Bridgman’s EMPIRICISM, argue that his criterion of meaningfulness needlessly puts in question a number of useful and trouble-free types of scientific proposition, such as contrary-to-fact conditional statements and those dealing with the remote past.

See Also: SEMANTICS.

Bibliography: P. W. BRIDGMAN, The Logic of Modern Physics (New York 1927); The Nature of Some of Our Physical Concepts (New York 1952). C. C. PRATT, The Logic of Modern Psychology (New York 1939; reprint 1948). R. B. LINDSAY, “A Critique of Operationalism in Physics,” Philosophy of Science 4 (1937) 456–470. C. G. HEMPEL, “A Logical Appraisal of Operationism,” The Validation of Scientific Theories, ed. P. FRANK (Boston, Mass. 1956) 52–58.

[H. A. NIELSEN]

OPINION

A state of mind that assents to a JUDGMENT, while realizing that the opposite, or another point of view, may be true. It is opposite is CERTITUDE, an objectively well-founded and firm assent. Opinion, including in it the possibility of gradations of truth, may vary from mere surmise to the settled conviction of a prudential judgment, a range commonly experienced while conducting the practical affairs of life. In this sense opinion is equivalent to a practical certitude that is conscious of the possibility of error. Since opinion involves making a judgment, however sure, it differs from DOUBT, defined as the suspension of judgment.

Kinds of Opinion. While differences between kinds of opinion are not too marked, one can distinguish various degrees. Suspicion or surmise means an opinion that is held on very low probability, since there is little evidence to rely upon. Hypothesis is a conjecture or tentative explanation of a fact or situation that is used as a norm in making observations and experiments. Not purely arbitrary, it is a reasonably entertained general opinion, often of an expert in the field, proposed with the expectation of its being later proved true or false, adequate or inadequate, by testing the predictions derived from the hypothesis.

Theory. The term THEORY has many meanings, but all of them include a lack of certitude, so it is classed as opinion. In one sense, it can mean any hypothesis, unverified or verified to a degree. In another, it can be limited to those hypotheses that have been somewhat confirmed and are thereby generally accepted, such as electromagnetic theory. In this sense, a theory is the educated opinion of a learned man. In a given area, such as psychology, there may be, and often are, rival theories—depending on the selection of initial principles of explanation.

Public Opinion. This is collective judgment rendered by a given society relative to some fact or tenet. The term, coined at the end of the 18th century, is reminiscent of the vox populi of the Romans. Public opinion may assent to something false, such as polytheism in a pagan society, or to something true, such as monotheism, or to a given side of a proposition that is only probable. Some members—even a majority—may have certitude about the view expressed; others may not. In a democracy this can give rise to crucial questions on the freedom of expression in morality, religion, politics, and education.

Opinion and Knowledge. Despite varying views on the nature and object of KNOWLEDGE, philosophers have generally maintained a distinction between knowledge and opinion. For them the opposite of true knowledge is ERROR and so is untenable; whereas the opposite of an opinion may reasonably be held. Thus, for PLATO, the objects of knowledge are the immutable and intelligible forms; for ARISTOTLE, the essential and the necessary; for HUME, the relations between ideas that can be proved; for KANT, sensible presentations informed by the categories; for HEGEL, all of reality as one with Absolute Spirit. On the other hand, for Plato, the objects of opinion are sensible things that are always becoming and never truly are; for Aristotle, the accidental and contingent; for Hume, matters of fact; for Kant, the nonsensible, such as human freedom or the existence of God.

In each case the basic distinction is consistent with the view points of Plato and Aristotle: the man who knows not only asserts something to be true, but has adequate reasons for doing so; but the man who has opinion, even if it should happen to be true, cannot explain his stand, and so is insecure. Furthermore, in knowledge, the object itself compels the mind to assent; in opinion, some factor other than the object does this, for example, the will (Pascal, Thomas Aquinas, Hobbes), or sentiment or instinct (Hume).

Opinion and Dialectical Inquiry. In the Topics, Aristotle clearly distinguishes between DEMONSTRATION, which results in scientific knowledge, and dialectical reasoning, which results in opinion and probability. The dialectical process proceeds by way of drawing conclusions, “certain things being laid down” (Topica 100a 25). In this sense, from the opinions of experts, in science or philosophy, one draws conclusions. It may also proceed by INDUCTION, “a passage from individuals to universals” (Topica 105a 13). In either case one arrives only at probability. So, as viewed by Aristotle, this sort of reasoning serves as a source only for new opinions, and it is midway between RHETORIC and demonstration. DIALECTICS, at first meaning the art of dialogue or discussion, has taken on many usages from Zeno to the present day; it is most closely linked with opinion in the Aristotelian usage.

See Also: DIALECTICS; CERTITUDE, EPISTEMOLOGY; METHODOLOGY (PHILOSOPHY).

Bibliography: L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology (New York 1959); L'Opinion selon Aristote (Ottawa 1935). J. OESTERLE, Logic (new ed., New York 1963). F. M. CORNFORD, tr., Plato's Theory of Knowledge: The "Theaetetus" and the "Sophist" (New York 1952).

[R. F. O'NEILL]

OPPENHEIM, PHILIPP

Liturgical scholar; b. at Olpe-Sauerland, Germany, Jan. 7, 1899; d. at Gerleve, Aug. 8, 1949. He became a Benedictine at Gerleve in 1919 and received his doctorate in theology at Breslau in 1928, having studied under F. J. Dölger (1879–1940). He lived in Rome from 1928, lecturing in patrology and liturgy at San Anselmo and was named professor of liturgy there in 1932. He became professor of liturgy at the Lateran University in 1945 and at the Propaganda in 1946. In 1942 he became censor for the Pontifical Academy of Liturgy and in 1947 was named consultor on the Congregation of Rites and a member of its Liturgical Commission. His most famous works are Symbolik und religiöse Wertung des Mönchskleides im christlichen Altertum (Münster 1932); Die Consecratio Virginitatis als geistesgeschichtliches Problem: Eine Studie zu ihrem Aufbau, ihrem Wert und ihrer Geschichte (Rome 1943); and the Institutiones Systematicae-Historicae in Sacram Liturgiam (Rome 1937).

Bibliography: H. ENGBERDING, Ephemerides liturgicae 64 (1950) 81–82.

[A. ROTH]

OPPOSITION

The formal relations between pairs of propositions having the same subjects and predicates, but varying in quality or quantity are called species of opposition. The four propositions so constituted are: the universal affirmative, called A; the particular affirmative, called I; the universal negative, called E; and the particular negative, called O. Of these, A and O are evidently contradictories, for A, affirming a predicate of everything subsumed under a subject, and O, denying the predicate of at least one instance of that subject, cannot both be true and cannot both be false. So also I, affirming the predicate of some instance of the subject, and E, denying it of everything the subject denotes, are contradictories. These relations hold, regardless of the existential import ascribed to categorical propositions.

Subalternation and Superalternation. Respecting existential import, one school understands particular propositions as asserting the EXISTENCE of what their subjects signify, and understands universals as leaving the question of existence open. On this interpretation, there are no other relations between these propositions: A and E, A and I, E and O, are independent of each other. Another school, however, interprets the affirmatives as existential, so that they are false whenever nothing corresponding to their subjects exists, their contradictories being therefore true. With this interpretation, another relation between these propositions comes to light: universals imply particulars of like quality. This relation, commonly called subalternation, is really twofold; unlike contradiction, it is not symmetrical. The truth of either contradictory implies the falsity of the other. By contrast, the truth of the universal implies the truth of the particular, but not vice versa. For precision's sake, therefore, it is well to call the relation of the universal to the particular, superalternation; that of the particular to the universal, subalternation. The universal is the superaltern; the particular, the subaltern.

Contrariety and Subcontrariety. Logicians have long employed the so-called "square of opposition" to illustrate these relations and others derived from them. At the upper corners of this square are the symbols for the universals, at the lower corners, those for the particulars. Each is connected by a diagonal with its contradictory. From the relations described, two others are deduced. Since A implies the falsity of O, and the falsity of O implies that of E, by the principle that implication is transitive, one infers that A implies that E is false, that is, that either A or E is false. The falsity of A, however, implies nothing about E, nor does the falsity of E imply anything about A. For from the falsity of A nothing follows but the truth of O, which implies nothing with regard to E; and the falsity of E implies only the truth of I, which implies nothing about A. This relation, represented by the upper horizontal line, according to which either A or E or both are false, is called contrariety.

The relation between particulars is shown in a similar manner. The falsity of I implies the truth of E, which implies that of O. Again, since implication is transitive, one concludes that either I or O is true. But the truth of I implies only that E is false, from which fact nothing follows as regards O; and O implies nothing but the falsity of A, which determines nothing about I. Thus particulars may be both true, or one may be true while the other is false, but they cannot both be false. This relation, represented by the lower horizontal line, is called subcontrariety.

Implied Relationships. On the interpretation of categorical propositions first mentioned, there is no square of opposition for propositions of this kind, but only a "cross of contradiction," representing the relations of A and O, and of I and E. Nevertheless, the square is not without significance in illustrating the relationships between propositions of any kind; the principles of contradiction and of implication, which are its basis, are of universal validity. For example, if a proposition, p, implying another, q, replaces A, while q, not-p, and not-q, replace I, O, and E, respectively, the following conclusions result: not-q implies not-p; p and not-q are contraries; and q and not-p are subcontraries. Similar relations could be deduced on the supposition that p and q were contraries, or that they were subcontraries. Aristotle's discussion of the contraries, "Socrates is well" and "Socrates is ill," may be illustrated by this device (Cat. 13b 26–35). The square shows that "Socrates is well" implies its obverse, as does "Socrates is ill," but that neither is implied by its obverse; and that either "Socrates is not well" or "Socrates is not ill" must be true.

See Also: PROPOSITION; LOGIC.

Bibliography: M. GHIO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1055–56. J. A. OESTERLE, Logic: The Art of Defining and Reasoning (2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1963). E. D. SIMMONS, The Scientific Art of Logic (Milwaukee 1961). V. E. SMITH, The Elements of Logic (Milwaukee 1957). J. J. DOYLE, "The Square of Opposition in Action," The New Scholasticism 35 (1961) 41–75.

[J. J. DOYLE]

OPTATUS OF MILEVIS, ST.

Bishop and polemicist; d. c. 400. Optatus is known primarily as the author of a document written c. 363 to 376 against Parmenian, the Donatist bishop of Carthage.

The original title is lost and the work is now known as Contra Parmenianum Donatistam. The MS tradition indicates changes and additions in the original document to which Optatus added an incomplete seventh book in 385. Optatus sets himself to ease the return of the Donatists to the Catholic Church by a conciliatory presentation of the causes of the schism, which he shows to be no longer consequential in the actual problems under dispute. He calls the Donatists schismatics, not heretics (1:11–12), and refutes the objections of Parmenian with doctrinal and historical considerations, giving the history of the schism wherein the Donatists alone are responsible (b. 1); the Catholic Church is the only true Church of Christ in unity with the Cathedra Petri and spread throughout the world (b. 2). He contends that the Donatists are wrong in proclaiming themselves a martyr church and in accusing Catholics as persecutors. The Catholics did not enlist the civil power, which, however, Optatus defends as just (b. 3). He rejects the Donatist use of Isaiah 66.3 and Psalms 140.5 against Catholics and their Sacraments (b. 4), and condemns the Donatist rebaptism since the Sacraments are valid independently of the instrument (b. 5). He objects to the cruelty of the Donatists, and particularly the Circumcellions, against the Catholics (b. 6), and finally tries to judge the traditores of the Diocletian persecution as mildly as possible (b. 7).

For his historical argumentation, Optatus used a collection of acts that had been assembled as early as 330 and 347 in defense of Bishops Caecilianus and Felix. This collection is represented by a ten-piece appendix preserved in only one MS tradition, but it is generally recognized as authentic. G. Morin and A. Wilmart also credit him with five sermons of which only the Christmas sermon is genuine.

The theological doctrine of Optatus is particularly weighty, and AUGUSTINE, after 400, used much of it for his teaching on the Church and the Sacraments. Optatus distinguishes between person and office. The Sacraments are of themselves sanctifying agents, since the confectors are not the masters but the servants of the Sacraments (5.4, 7). Salvation brings with it faith and the Trinity (5.1). The unity of the visible Church is guaranteed by the bishop's office and the Sacraments; and the Cathedra Petri in Rome is the link of unity for the worldwide Church (2.2–4).

In contradistinction to the Donatists, Optatus is outspokenly friendly to the emperor and defends the imperial Church system prevailing since CONSTANTINE I. The Church can live securely in the Roman Empire and not among the barbarians. Above the emperor there is only God, hence loyalty is due to him particularly as a Christian ruler (3.3, with proof adduced from 1 Tm 2.2).

Feast: June 4.

Bibliography: Libri VII (Contra Parmenianum) and Acta, ed. C. ZIWSA (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 26; 1893); Sermones Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90), Suppl. 1:288–300. The Work of Saint Optatus against the Donatists, ed. and tr. O. R. VASSALL-PHILLIPS (London 1917). Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d ed. Streenbrugge 1961), 244–249. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), 11.1:1077–84. P. MONCEAUX, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, 7 v. (Paris 1901–23), 5:241–306. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913–32), 3:491–495. E. DINKLER, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 18.1 (1939) 765–771. A. C. DE VEER, “À propos de l'authenticité du livre VII d'Optat de Milev,” Revue des études augustiniennes 7 (1961) 389–391. T. ŠAGI-BUNIĆ, “Controversia de Baptismate,” Laurentianum 3 (1962) 167–209. E. L. GRASMÜCK, Coercitio: Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit (Bonn 1964). C. MAZZUCCO, Ottato di Milevi in un secolo di studi: problemi e prospettive (Bologna 1993).

[A. STUIBER]

OPTIMISM

Optimism may be understood either as a general feeling and attitude of mind or as a philosophical system. The former is a habitual tendency to see the world, and all that happens in it, from the bright side and to look hopefully to the future. The latter teaches that the present world is essentially good and in practice assumes two forms, one absolute, the other relative. Absolute optimism holds that this is the best possible world, that it is either absolutely perfect or as perfect as it can be. Relative optimism admits that the world could be better, but maintains that the good it contains is of such value that its existence is preferable to its non-existence.

The term optimism is often taken in a broader sense, as in evolutionary optimism or sociological optimism, or as in its cognate, meliorism. Evolutionary optimism affirms that there is a slow but constant progress in the evolution of the universe (J. G. FICHTE, P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN); sociological optimism expects a solution to the social question sometime in the future; and meliorism asserts that life possesses a real value, which man can increase by his personal efforts.

Forms of Optimism. All great religions are optimistic. They assure man that the evil that makes him suffer in the present life has no absolute power over him. Even BUDDHISM presents its faithful with a method by which they can escape the sorrows of life and the deceptive illusions of existence. Zoroastrianism similarly assures man that the malignant divinity responsible for evil in the world will be finally defeated by the supreme Good Principle (see ZOROASTER). MANICHAISM, a synthesis of Zoroastrian, Gnostic, and Christian notions, maintains that man's final salvation can be easily accomplished by belief in Mani as the prophesied Paraclete and by leading an ascetic life. The Gnostics promise their faithful a happy immortality, provided that they adopt the teaching of psychic intermediaries (aeons) between God and man, and cultivate their spiritual and intuitive powers.

Greek philosophy is decidedly optimistic. For PLATO, the world is a product of God's providence, and therefore it is the most beautiful and the best (Tim. 30A). According to Aristotle, nature as well as God does nothing in vain; it foresees the future and implants in all things something divine (cf. Cael. 271a 33; Eth. Nic. 1153b 32). The fundamental principle of Stoic philosophy is that man can be happy regardless of his position in the world, for happiness is within and is obtained by mastering one's appetites and passions. According to PLOTINUS, the objects of intellectual knowledge are the Ideas in the Nous, and its climax is a mystical union with the One, itself the ultimate good.

Such thought exercised a notable influence on philosophers in the Middle Ages and in the Renaissance; in fact, the absolute optimism of NICHOLAS OF CUSA and Giordano BRUNO is clearly dependent upon Plotinus, as is the later optimism of B. SPINOZA. Pantheistic optimism, such as Spinoza's, starts from a gratuitously asserted identity of God with the world and terminates in a negation of evil in the world that is itself untenable.

More interesting and authentic is the optimism of G. W. LEIBNIZ. [In fact, the term optimism, used for the first time by the Jesuits (1737), designated Leibniz's theory that the world created by God is the best possible (Lat. optimus, best). The term was popularized by Voltaire in his novel Candide ou l'Optimisme (1759).] Attacking the Manichaean dualism of P. BAYLE, Leibniz strove to demonstrate his thesis. He argued that if the slightest evil that exists in the world were missing, it would no longer be this world, because, taking all things into consideration, this was judged best by the Creator who chose it. As there is an infinity of possible worlds in the divine ideas, and since only one can exist, there must be a sufficient reason for God's choice. This reason can only be found in the degrees of perfection these worlds contain, since each possibility can claim existence only in the measure of the perfection it possesses (cf. Monadologie, ch. 53–54).

Absolute optimism was taught also by N. MALEBRANCHE, who had some influence on Leibniz. "God, discovering in the infinite treasures of His Wisdom an infinity of possible worlds," he writes, "decided to create the one which could come to be and maintain itself in existence by the simplest laws." Such a world bears "to the highest degree the marks, the stamp, of His attributes," and glorifies Him best (Traité de la nature et de la grâce, 1.13).

Evaluation. Some maintain that optimism entails the negation of God's OMNIPOTENCE, and consequently of God Himself, because if the present world is the best of all possible worlds, God cannot produce anything better. This argument is of doubtful value. Just as no one can make a square circle, so no one (not even God) can create something better than the best.

Again, the notion of the best possible world is fictitious. It applies to a world whose perfection cannot be surpassed by any other world; consequently, a world that constitutes the last term in the series of possible worlds. Yet the series of possible worlds is infinite, and the last term in such a series is as unintelligible as, for example, a square circle. Moreover, no matter how perfect one imagines a world to be, its perfection will always be finite. Consequently an infinite chasm will always exist between it and absolute perfection. And so it will always be possible to interpolate other worlds that are more and more perfect.

Absolute Optimism. According to optimists such as Leibniz and Malebranche, the best world means a world that manifests the divine perfections to a degree that no other world could equal. How does one know that it is precisely this present world that manifests God's perfections in this way? Certainly not by experience. Here the optimists appeal to a priori considerations. Malebranche says that God "acts exactly according to what He is, and according to all He is" (Entretiens 9, ch. 11). Now in doing so, how could He fail to give all possible perfection to the world? Malebranche here confounds the divine action in its source with the divine action in its term. The former, being identical with God's essence, is the most perfect. But the latter essentially depends upon the free will of God, and for this very reason can be limited in different ways.

According to Leibniz, God's will always chooses the greatest good. Any theory that would claim the contrary, "would clash with the supreme principle of sufficient reason" (Théodicée 2, ch. 175). If one admits this reasoning, one must say that God's action is subject to necessity, that the present world emerged from competition with all possible worlds. Such absolute optimism, under pretension of exalting God, degrades Him. It is incompatible with true Christian belief.

Relative Optimism. For the Christian, the present world cannot be essentially evil. But the Catholic can go further and maintain, with the Fathers of the Church, scholastic philosophers, and many other thinkers, a moderate or relative optimism. Two features are discernible in the present world: (1) the beings that actually exist in it and (2) the relations that unite these beings to each other and produce in this way the admirable order existing in nature. Hypothetically, the present world could contain more perfect things than it does because God could create more perfect things, e.g., new species of living beings. But this would be a different world, not the present world, and thus the hypothesis involves a hidden contradiction. To the objection that things could be better ordered, it suffices to note that the order of this world is not the effect of CHANCE or of external NECESSITY. It is founded on the laws of NATURE, and the laws of nature have their basis in the natures of things. It must therefore be concluded that the present world cannot be better ordered; and, to this extent, it gives reason for entertaining a moderate or relative optimism.

See Also: PESSIMISM; UNIVERSE, ORDER OF; GOOD; EVIL.

Bibliography: P. FAGGIOTTO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1094–96. É. H. GILSON, The Spirit of Medieval Philosophy, tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1940) 108–27. L. STEFANINI, “Ottimismo tomistico e pessimismo esistenzialistico,” Sapientia Aquinatis, Congressus Thomisticus Internationalis, 4th (Bibliotheca Pontificiae Academiae Romanae S. Thom. Aquinatis 1; Rome 1955) 562–72. L. NUTRIMENTO, La definizione del bene in relazione al problema dell’ottimismo (Padua 1936). P. SIWEK, The Philosophy of Evil (New York 1950).

[P. SIWEK]

OPTIMISM (THEOLOGICAL ASPECT)

The Christian message supposes the existence, but also the contingency, of EVIL in the world: evil is present, but it would not be (at least in its actual extent) without mankind’s free choice. Therefore, one can speak of an OPTIMISM in theology only in the sense that evil is not total (the various beings remain essentially good) and does not take the upper hand over good (evil will not only be subordinate to good, but has even now a function in the triumph of good).

Revelation shows the value not only of the spirit but also of matter (cosmological optimism). Christian faith is not compatible with that absolute dualism that makes matter the principle of evil (Plotinism, Gnosticism, Manichaeism, Catharism). The good God has created the whole world and found it good (Gn ch. 1–2): the world is the work of the divine wisdom (Prv ch. 8) and reflects the perfection of its author (Wis ch. 13; Romans ch. 1). This teaching was developed by Irenaeus against Gnosticism, by Tertullian against Marcion, and by Augustine against the Manichaeans. The goodness of the material world was also reaffirmed by the magisterium of the Church against Priscillianism (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 199, 207, 456, 458, 462) and against medieval Catharism (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 790, 800, 1333, 1336).

In opposition to the exaggerated optimism of the Pelagians, the Church teaches that man by ORIGINAL SIN was changed for the worse in body and soul (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 371, 1511). He cannot on his own observe the natural law for long (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 1541, 1572). To be converted he needs the assistance gratuitously given by God (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 374, 376, 1525, 1553). At the beginning, however, he was not in this state, and the corruption introduced by sin does not totally destroy his natural goodness (anthropological optimism). By means of human reason man can arrive at the knowledge of God, the principle and end of the world (Wis ch. 13; Rom 1.20; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 3004, 3026). The human will is capable of good acts, even without any supernatural help, and, above all, maintains its liberty, with which it can consent to the invitation of grace (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 1521, 1555). This is denied to no one, not even to the infidel (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 2305, 2426, 2439). Sacred Scripture in fact invites sinners to be converted and holds them responsible for not being converted (Mt 23.37; Rom 10.16; Acts 7.51–53).

Although there are individual creatures irremediably hostile to God who ensnare men (the fallen angels), these are not such by their nature, but, having been created good, they became evil through their free individual choice. This doctrine (which has a Biblical foundation in 2 Pt 2.4; Jude 6) was inculcated by Irenaeus, Justin, Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Cyprian, etc. against the various kinds of absolute dualism and was defined by the Fourth Lateran Council (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symboliorum, 800). Not even the snares of the fallen angels constitute a completely negative aspect of the universe: diabolical temptation can never overcome the resistance of man assisted by grace (1 Cor 10.13) and is useful for the good of the elect (Rom 8.28). The end of time will mark the definite defeat of the rebel angels (Rv 20.9) and of those who have freely chosen to imitate them (angelological optimism).

See Also: HAPPINESS; JUSTICE OF MEN; MAN; PROGRESS; TEMPORAL VALUES, THEOLOGY OF; WELTANSCHAUUNG.

Bibliography: On the problem of evil. C. JOURNET, The Meaning of Evil, tr. M. BARRY (New York 1963). J. MARITAIN, Saint Thomas and the Problem of Evil, tr. M. L. ANDISON (Milwaukee 1942). A. G. SERTILLANGES, Le Problème du mal, 2 v. (Paris 1948–51). On the world. S. PÉTREMENT, Le Dualisme chez Platon, les gnostiques et les manichéens (Paris 1947). J. H. WRIGHT, The Order of the Universe in the Theology of St. Thomas Aquinas (Rome 1957). Il mondo nelle prospettive cosmologica, assiologica, religiosa (Atti del XIV convegno di studi filosofici cristiani di Gallarate 1959; Brescia 1960). On man. J. MOUROUX, The Meaning of Man, tr. A. H. G. DOWNES (New York 1948). M. FLICK and Z. AL-

SZEGHY, Il vangelo della grazia (Florence 1964). On eschatology. T. F. GLASSON, The Second Advent (London 1945). R. W. GLEASON, The World to Come (New York 1958). E. C. RUST, The Christian Understanding of History (London 1947). J. H. WRIGHT, "The Consummation of the Universe in Christ," Gregorianum 39 (1958) 285–294. On angelology. J. D. COLLINS, The Thomistic Philosophy of the Angels (Washington 1947). media>

[Z. ALSZEGHY]

OPTION FOR THE POOR

The meaning and intent of the phrase "option for the poor" is found in Octogesimo adveniens (1971), an apostolic letter of Pope Paul VI, which stated, "In teaching us charity, the gospel instructs us in the preferential respect due to the poor and the special situation they have in society: the more fortunate should renounce some of their rights so as to place their goods more generously at the service of others" (n. 23; cf. n. 42). The voluntary commitment to the cause of the socially deprived and solidarity with them in their problems and struggles was first given formal expression by the Latin American bishops at Medellin (1968), and was reaffirmed at their Conference in Puebla (Mexico), attended by Pope John Paul II in 1979.

In the Latin American framework the "preferential option for the poor" is inextricably associated with themes of liberation theology, and the struggle against oppression of every kind. During the period between Medellin and Puebla, considerable controversy surrounded the struggle for social justice that Medellin had affirmed and accelerated. As base communities began to organize and contend for the rights of the poor, individuals and groups with vested interests in the establishment used repressive methods to defend their power bases and privileges. Advocates of a new, more just social order were subjected to torture, imprisonment, murder and exile.

The document published by the Latin American bishops at the close of the Puebla meeting contains a chapter titled, "A Preferential Option for the Poor" (nn. 1134–1165). Although the document does not present a systematic analysis of the phrase, it clearly describes what is involved.

. . . we are going to take up once again the position of . . . Medellin, which adopted a clear and prophetic option expressing preference for, and solidarity with, the poor. . . . We affirm the need for conversion on the part of the whole Church to a preferential option for the poor, an option aimed at their integral liberation (n. 1134).

This option, demanded by the scandalous reality of economic imbalances in Latin America, should lead us to establish a dignified, fraternal way of life together as human beings and to construct a just and free society (n. 1154).

Sudanese girl (center), close to death from starvation, lying with her mother (right) and brother inside a compound run by Doctors without Borders (MSF), Ajiep, Sudan, 1998. (Associated Press/AP)

We will make every effort to understand and denounce the mechanisms that generate this poverty (n. 1160).

The Puebla Document (DP) identifies the poor as the indigenous peoples (DP 34), the peasants (DP 35), the workers (DP 29, 36), the marginalized urban dwellers (DP 38), the underemployed and the unemployed (DP 37, 50, 576, 838), children (DP 32) and the elderly (DP 39). It concerned the bishops that the marginalized were looked upon as second-class citizens whose rights could be crushed underfoot with impunity (DP 1291, DP 18). In a "Message to the Peoples of Latin America" the Puebla Conference stated very clearly that to opt for the poor means to take up their cause (n. 3).

Although Pope John Paul II in his address to the bishops at Puebla did not use the phrase "option for the poor," he expressed a similar idea when he stated, the Church "is prompted by an authentically evangelical commitment which, like that of Christ, is primarily (sobre todo) a commitment to those most in need." On other occasions during his visit to Mexico he expressed a preferential, though, he took pains to make it clear, not an exclusive love for the poor.

The option for the poor has been adopted as a formal principle by the Canadian and U.S. bishops in recent statements on the economies of their respective nations. This is an important acknowledgment by these hierarchies that the program of social reform that this axiom implies is relevant also in first-world contexts. The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops in its statement on the socioeconomic order mentioned “the preferential option for the poor,” and then added:

In a given economic order, the needs of the poor take priority over the wants of the rich. This does not, in turn, simply mean more handouts for the poor. It calls, instead, for an equitable redistribution of wealth and power among peoples and regions.

The U.S. bishops in their pastoral message Economic Justice for All (1986) do not speak of a preferential, but of a fundamental option for the poor.

This “option for the poor” does not mean pitting one group against another, but rather, strengthening the whole community by assisting those who are most vulnerable. As Christians, we are called to respond to the needs of all our brothers and sisters, but those with the greatest needs require the greatest response (n. 16).

The American bishops introduce their reflection on the option for the poor with the assertion, “the justice of a society is tested by the treatment of the poor.”

In his encyclical Sollicitudo rei socialis (On Social Concern, 1987) Pope John Paul II spoke of the “option or love of preference for the poor” and explained, “This is an option, or special form of primacy in the exercise of Christian charity, to which the whole tradition of the Church bears witness” (SRS 42). The pope goes on to emphasize the global dimensions of the social question and says:

this love of preference for the poor, and the decisions which it inspires in us, cannot but embrace the immense multitudes of the hungry, the needy, the homeless, those without medical care and, above all, those without hope of a better future. It is impossible not to take account of these realities (SRS 42).

This same terminology, “a preferential love” for people oppressed by poverty, appears in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (2448). The CCC also quotes the Vatican II decree Apostolicam actuositatem, which makes the point that “the demands of justice” requires that we share our goods with the poor, and “that which is already due in justice is not to be offered as an act of charity” (2446). The Catechism, like Sollicitudo rei socialis, calls for structural reform at all levels to redress the inequitable distribution of the world’s goods and the international economic imbalance.

In the years since the axiom was first formulated, the preferential option for the victims of social injustice has come to represent a short-hand description for a new kind of program aiming at integral liberation of all powerless, marginalized, economically deprived, despised and out-cast persons. The elimination of starvation, disease, unemployment, unjust wages, homelessness, illiteracy, impoverishment, in brief, all manifestations of institutionalized violence or social sin is seen as a prophetic challenge to all people who yearn for peace founded on justice. And this agenda which uses a variety of descriptions to illustrate a sociology of oppression is seen as an inescapable consequence of fidelity to the gospel message which, according to the pastoral statements of bishops across several continents, itself gives priority to service of the poor and disadvantaged.

Bibliography: R. ANTONCICH, Christians in the Face of Injustice. A Latin American Reading of Catholic Social Teaching (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1987). G. BAUM, The Priority of Labor: A Commentary on Laborem exercens Encyclical Letter of Pope John Paul II (New York 1982). G. BAUM and D. CAMERON, Ethics and Economics: Canada’s Catholic Bishops on the Economic Crisis (Toronto 1984). L. BOFF and V. ELIZONDO, eds., Option for the Poor: Challenge to the Rich Countries (Edinburgh 1986). L. BOFF, Cry of the Earth, Cry of the Poor (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1997). M. BYERS, ed., Justice in the Marketplace: Collected Statements of the Vatican the United States Catholic Bishops on Economic Policy, 1891–1984 (Wash., D.C. 1985). D. DORR, Option for the Poor: A Hundred Years of Vatican Social Teaching, rev. ed. (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1992). I. ELLACURIA and J. SOBRINO, eds., Mysterium Liberationis: Fundamental Concepts of Liberation Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993). J. EAGLESON and P. SCHARPER, eds., Puebla and Beyond: Documentation and Commentary (New York 1979). G. GUTIERREZ, The Power of the Poor in History (New York 1983). NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS, Economic Justice for All: Pastoral Letter on Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy (Wash., D.C. 1986).

[P. SURLIS]

OPUS DEI

The Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei is a personal prelature of the Roman Catholic Church, with its central offices located in Rome. The Second Vatican Council made provisions for the juridical format of personal prelatures to facilitate the carrying out of “specific apostolic tasks.” Prelatures form part of the pastoral and hierarchical structure of the Church. They are dependent on the Congregation for Bishops.

The aim of the prelature of Opus Dei is to promote among Christians an awareness that all are called to seek holiness and to contribute to the evangelization of every sphere of society. The prelature provides for the pastoral and spiritual care of its members, extending this help to many other people, in accord with each one’s situation and profession (cf. Statutes of Opus Dei, 2:1). The faithful of the prelature strive to put into practice the teachings of the Gospel by exercising the Christian virtues and sanctifying their ordinary work (cf. Statutes of Opus Dei, 2).

The tomb of Opus Dei founder, Josemaría Escrivá, in the Vatican. (©Vittoriano Rastelli/CORBIS)

Msgr. Josemaría ESCRIVÁ founded Opus Dei on Oct. 2, 1928. On Feb. 14, 1930, Blessed Josemaría understood by God's grace that Opus Dei was meant to develop its apostolate among women as well. From 1946 on, he resided in Rome. He died on June 26, 1975 and was beatified on June 26, 1992. From Rome he oversaw Opus Dei's apostolic expansion throughout the world, beginning with Portugal, England, Italy, France, Ireland, the United States, and Mexico. From the outset, he relied on the encouragement and stimulus of the episcopal hierarchy. From 1943, Opus Dei received all of the necessary approvals from the Holy See, culminating in its establishment as a personal prelate by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 28, 1982.

The prelate of Opus Dei spread throughout every continent, comprises the prelate, currently Bishop Javier Echevarría, 1,700 priests, and 90,000 laity who, with a divine vocation, are freely incorporated into the prelate. The clergy incardinated in the prelate come from among the laymen. "The laity incorporated in the Prelature do not alter their personal situation, either canonically or theologically. They continue to be ordinary lay faithful, and act accordingly in everything they do, specifically in their apostolate (Congregation for Bishops, Declaration concerning Opus Dei, Aug. 23, 1982, 2b).

The lay faithful of the prelate enjoy the same freedom as other Catholic citizens, their equals, in all professional, family, social, political, and financial activities. These activities do not fall under the prelate's jurisdiction, which extends only to the ascetical and apostolic commitments that each one freely assumes by means of a contractual bond. The prelate's lay faithful remain under the diocesan bishop's jurisdiction in everything established by common Church law for the Catholic faithful.

The Priestly Society of the Holy Cross, inseparably united to the Prelature of Opus Dei, is governed by the prelate of Opus Dei as its president general. The prelature's priests belong to the Priestly Society of the Holy Cross. In addition, diocesan priests who wish to seek holiness in the exercise of their ministry may be associated as well. Their tie to the priestly society in no way compromises their loyalty to their own bishop, who continues to be their only superior. The prelature of Opus Dei also relies on cooperators, some of whom are non-Catholics or even non-Christians. Although not incorporated into the prelature, cooperators collaborate in its apostolate by their prayer, work, and alms.

The prelature of Opus Dei directs the Pontifical University of the Holy Cross in Rome, as well as the University of Navarre in Spain. Other apostolic undertakings, including universities in Latin America, Italy, and the Philippines, student residences, cultural centers, technical and agricultural institutes, medical clinics, and a variety of centers for the development of disadvantaged areas, have the pastoral assistance of the prelature which takes on responsibility for their Christian orientation.

Opus Dei's most important contribution to the Church's mission, however, is not its corporate apostolates but rather the effort of each member to sanctify his or her ordinary, daily work and to bring those around them closer to God. The process for beatification is underway for several members of Opus Dei, among them the Argentine engineer Isidoro Zorzano (1902–1943) and the young Spanish woman Montserrat Grases (1941–1959).

Bibliography: P. BERGLAR, Opus Dei. Life and Work of its Founder Josemaría Escrivá (Princeton 1993). A. FUENMAYOR, F. OCARIZ, and J. L. ILLANES, The Canonical Path of Opus Dei (Princeton and Chicago 1994). J. L. ILLANES, On the Theology of Work (Dublin 1982). A. DEL PORTILLO, Immersed in God: Blessed Josemaría Escrivá, Founder of Opus Dei (Princeton 1996). P. RODRIGUEZ, Particular Churches and Personal Prelatures (Dublin 1986). P. RODRIGUEZ, F. OCARIZ, and J. L. ILLANES, Opus Dei in the Church: An Ecclesiological Study of the Life and Apostolate of Opus Dei (Dublin and Princeton 1994).

[R. PELLITERO]

ORACLE

In addition to that of Delphi, the most famous of Greek oracles (see DELPHI, ORACLE OF), a number of other oracles, especially those of Zeus and Apollo, enjoyed a wide reputation in the Greek world.

Oracles of Zeus. At Dodona, Zeus replaced a pre-Greek divinity. The priests, who followed an archaic manner of life, employed as oracular devices the rustling of ancient oaks and the murmurs of a spring in the sacred grove; a device attested for the 4th century, B.C. was a noise made by a brazen kettle when it was struck by a little chain hanging beside it, after it had been set in motion by a wind blowing in the proper direction. The oracle was at its zenith in the age of Pindar (518–438 B.C.), but had practically ceased to function by the beginning of the Christian Era.

The oracle of Zeus at the oasis of Siwa was really an oracle of the Egyptian god Ammon. It was already consulted by Greek statesmen in the 5th century B.C., but its reputation was enhanced by the visit of Alexander the Great, who was greeted by the priest of the shrine as the son of Ammon. Just how the oracle was delivered to Alexander is unknown. Ordinarily, the responses of Zeus Ammon were given in the Egyptian manner, i.e., by the manipulation of a statue of Ammon carried in procession. At Olympia, the cult of Zeus probably took the place of the earlier cult of the goddess Gea. The location of the oracle was a large altar, which was formed from the ashes of the sacrificed animals and was sprinkled with water from the river Alpheus. The response of Zeus was sought by means of haruspicy and empyromancy.

Oracles of Apollo. The most important oracle after Delphi, and probably the oldest, was that of Didyma near Miletus. A pre-Greek divinity of the place was gradually equated with Apollo. For a long period the oracle was under the control of the priestly family of the Branchidae. It possessed the right of asylum, and this right was reconfirmed by the Roman Emperor Tiberius. The responses were given by a priestess after preparation by fasting and prayer and after taking a foot bath in the spring, which bubbled beside the temple. The priestess sat on a tripod, and like the priestess of Delphi, she was probably in a state of ecstasy (Iamblichus, De myst. 3.2). The oracle lost its importance in the 2d century A.D. One of its last responses was heavy in consequences, for it led Diocletian to decide on his persecution of the Christians (Lactantius, De morte pers. 10).

The oracle of Apollo at Claros, near Colophon, was hardly less famous, and likewise possessed the right of asylum. The consultants assembled in a waiting-room and gave their names. The oracle chamber may originally have been a grotto in the mountainside, but later it was situated nearer the valley. The priest descended into the grotto, drank from the water of a spring, and then, without relying on orally expressed questions, but on telepathy, he gave his responses in verse (Tacitus, Ann. 2.54). From the 1st century A. D., questions could be presented also in writing. Even "speaking" statues of the god, which were sent into various regions, could be questioned directly. There is evidence that in the later imperial age, questions were presented at the oracle itself from places as far distant as northern Britain.

The island of Delos, the reputed birthplace of Apollo, also had an oracle. The voice of the god sounded from the fissures in Mt. Cynthus (Vergil, Aen. 3.90). In the age of the Seleucids, an oracle of Apollo, that of Daphne, was established near Antioch, and its procedure was modeled probably on that of Delphi.

Other Oracles. Oracles were often given through temple incubation. The healing hero-god Asclepius played a role in this kind of divination at his chief center, Epidaurus, and also in his temples at Athens, Rome, and elsewhere. Healing hero-gods, like Trophonius, delivered their oracles in the manner of oracles at Delphi or Claros. NECROMANCY was practiced for the sake of obtaining oracles, especially in those places that were regarded as entrances into the lower world—grottoes or subterranean passages, from which in many cases poisonous vapors were emitted. Such places and their vapors were thought of as means for receiving oracles. Among the best-known sites of this kind were Phigalia in Arcadia, and especially Cumae near Naples, the seat of the Cumaean sibyl, the most famous of all the sibyls.

Bibliography: J. E. FONTENROSE, Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. M. CARY et al. (Oxford 1949) 624, with cross ref. and bibliog. K. LATTE, "Orakel," Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893) 18.1 (1942) 829–866. P. MONCEAUX, "Oraculum," C. DAREMBERG and E. SAGLIO, Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines d'après les textes et les monuments, 5 v. in 9 (Paris 1877–1919) 4:214–223. A. BOUCHÉ-LECLERCQ, Histoire de la divination dans l'Antiquité, 3 v. (Paris 1879–82) old, but still basic.

[K. PRÜMM]

ORACLE (IN THE BIBLE)

The Israelites, like other ancient peoples, asked (Heb. šā'al: Nm 27.21; Jgs 1.1; 20.22; 1 Sm 10.22; 23.2; 30.8; 2 Sm 2.1; 5.19; or dāraš: Gn 25.22–23; 1 Sm 9.9; 1 Kgs 22.8, 14–23; 2 Kgs 22.18–19) their God for information about imminent matters of personal or national importance or about future events. Yahweh answered in most cases through officially recognized persons (priests, seers, prophets, etc.) and in different oracular ways that were dignified and worthy of His nature and revelation. He condemned practices that were too base or humanistic, or that placed Him as one among equals or even as the chief one of many gods.

One of the principal functions of the priests was to utter oracles (Dt 33.8), and this type of oracle was called tōrāh, "instruction law" (Jer 18.18). Thus, Moses was often approached to inquire of God for the people and make known His decisions (Ex 18.15–16; 33.7–11). The high priest through the URIM AND THUMMIM (Ex 28.30;

The Mouth of Truth in Santa Maria in Cosmedin, Italy. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

Lv 8.8) or the ephod (1 Sm 23.6–12; 30.7–8) gave divine answers. The Levite priest of Micah was consulted by the Danites for a divine decision (Jgs 18.5–6). Levitical priests were to try difficult cases at God's chosen sanctuary, and disobedience to their decisions carried the death penalty (Dr 17.8–12). There was also a common custom of casting lots, and this was regarded at times as indicating the divine will (1 Sm 14.38–42; Acts 1.26).

The seer (Heb. rō'eh) and the prophet (Heb. nābî') also were consulted for divine decisions; e.g., the seer Samuel (1 Sm 9.9; 11.18–20), and the Prophets Nathan (2 Sm 7.17), Elijah (1 Kgs 18.36–39), Elisha (2 Kgs 8.7–15), Isaiah (Is 38.1–6), and Micaiah, son of Imlah (1 Kgs 22.7–28). Even without its being requested, their pronouncements and writings were regarded as words or oracles of Yahweh. The technical term for an oracle of a prophet is ne'ūm yhwēh, literally "pronouncement of Yahweh." It occurs 361 times in the Hebrew OT, mostly in the books of the "writing" Prophets, where it generally stands at the end of a short oracle given in Yahweh's name, traditionally rendered in English as "Thus says the Lord." It serves as a sort of signature guaranteeing the authenticity of the oracle.

Bibliography: A. BARUCQ, Dictionnaire de la Bible supplement, ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:775–787.

[J. E. STEINMUELLER]

ORANGE, COUNCILS OF

Two synods (441 and 529) held at ORANGE (Arausio), in what is now southern France (Dept. Vaucluse).

HILARY OF ARLES presided over the first, which 16 bishops attended. There 30 canons were enacted dealing with disciplinary matters.

Orange II was held under the presidency of CAESARIUS OF ARLES. AUGUSTINE's theology of grace, though wholeheartedly adopted by Rome, was held in suspicion by LÉRINS, a great intellectual and monastic center near Marseilles. Profoundly influenced by John CASSIAN, Lérins was also Semi-Pelagian. Cassian taught that there was some natural sanctity in man before baptism; he distinguished two modes of action in grace: salvific and tutelary. In the latter mode God only seconds and crowns man's efforts. VINCENT OF LÉRINS distorted Augustine, quoting him out of context to discredit him. PROSPER OF AQUITAINE emerged as Augustine's indefatigable champion, and Rome itself defended the memory of the illustrious theologian (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 237). FAUSTUS OF RIEZ (abbot of Lérins, 433–462; bishop of Riez, 462–485?), one of the greatest ecclesiastical figures of 5th-century Gaul, in his struggle against Lucidus, a predestinarian, wrote a treatise on grace which, while it categorically rejected Pelagianism, offered no satisfactory metaphysical alternative, thus emphasizing the fact that Augustinian metaphysics on the topic were hard to replace.

In the meantime Caesarius of Arles, a splendid example of the second generation of Lérins (490–497?), was consecrated bishop of Arles (503). In the continuing struggle against Semi-Pelagianism, Caesarius was the champion of pure Augustinian doctrine in regard to “prevenient and liberating grace as an absolute condition of the reintegration of the human will in its supernatural faculties and ends” (A. Fliche and V. Martin, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu' à nos jours 4:416). Nineteen capitula to this effect were submitted by him to Rome (c. 528) but were rejected as too subtle. Maxims gathered by Prosper of Aquitaine from Augustine's writings were substituted by Felix IV. On July 3, 529, at the dedication in Orange of a church built by Liberius, the praetorian prefect, Caesarius submitted to 13 bishops a declaration on grace and free will, which all signed and sent to Rome. Boniface II, successor to Felix IV, approved them on Jan. 25, 531 (H. Denzinger, 398–400).

The statement of Caesarius has three parts: (1) prooemium (H. Denzinger, 370); (2) 25 canons, eight on original sin (H. Denzinger, 371–372) and grace (H. Denzinger, 373–378) and 17 capitula taken from Prosper's digest of Augustine (H. Denzinger, 379–395); and (3) the conclusion of Caesarius of Arles, which is really the heart of the declaration. In it he corrects the erroneous theories of Cassian and Faustus, emphasizes the need for grace, and condemns predestination to evil. Baptism restores man and strengthens the will. The declaration at Orange, a model of charity, condemns theories not persons. Orange II enjoyed great prestige; its canons, together with those of CARTHAGE (418), contributed to the theology of grace and were used by the Council of Trent. Orange II ended the Semi-Pelagian controversy in southern Gaul.

See Also: SEMI-PELAGIANISM; GRACE, CONTROVERSIES ON; FAITH, BEGINNING OF; FREE WILL AND GRACE; GRACE, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Sources. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence-Venice 1757–98) 6:433–452; 8:711–724. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 51:723–730. Literature. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERQ (Paris 1907–38) 2.1:430–454; 2.2:1085–1110. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1925). F. H. WOODS, ed. and tr., Canons of the Second Council of Orange (Oxford 1882). M. CAPPUYNS, “L'Origine des Capitula d'Orange 529,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 6 (Louvain 1934) 121–142. G. DE PLINVAL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART, et al. (Paris 1912—) 12:186–196. G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:1087–1103. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu' à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 4:397–419. P. FRANSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1188–89.

[C. M. AHERNE]

ORANGE, MARTYRS OF

The Martyrs of Orange is a group of 32 beatified religious women martyred at Orange, France, during the FRENCH REVOLUTION between July 6 and July 26, 1794. Two were CISTERCIAN nuns from Avignon; the others were from Bollène, near Avignon, and included 16 URSULINES, 13 SACRAMENTINE nuns, and one Benedictine nun. For refusing to take the oath Liberté Égalité, the nuns of Bollène were expelled from their convents (Oct. 13, 1793), arrested, and held in La Cure prison in Orange. There these and other nuns formed a kind of religious community, chose a superior, and spent several hours daily in prayer and pious exercises until condemned for fanaticism and superstition. The first to die by guillotine was the Benedictine Suzanne Deloye (July 6). On July 7 Marie Suzanne de Gaillard, a Sacramentine, followed.

The Ursulines Marie Anne de Guilhermier, Marie Anne de Rocher, Marie Gertrude de Ripert d'Alauzier, and Sylvie Agnès de Romillon died on July 9 and 10; and on July 11, three Sacramentines, Rosalie Clotilde Bès, Marie Elisabeth Péliissier, and Marie Claire Blanc, who were joined at the guillotine by Marie Marguerite d'Albarède, an Ursuline. Two more Sacramentines, Madeleine Talieu and Marie Cluse, died on July 12 with Marguerite de Justamond, a Cistercian, and Jeanne de Romillon, an Ursuline. The Ursulines Marie Anastasie de Roquard, Marie Anne Lambert, and Marie Anne Depeyre and the Sacramentines Elisabeth Verchière, Thérèse Faurie, and Anne Minutte suffered on July 13. On July 16 the guillotine claimed Marie Rose de Gordon, Marguerite Charransol, and Marie Anne Beguin-Royal, Sacramentines; Marie Anne Doux, Marie Rose Laye, and Dorothee de Justamont, Ursulines; and the Cistercian Madeleine de Justamont. On July 26 Marie-Madeleine de Justamont, Anne Cartier, Marie Claire du Bac, and Elisabeth Consolin, Ursulines, and Marie Marguerite Bonnet, a Sacramentine, died. The 32 were beatified on May 10, 1925.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Les Martyrs, 15 v. (Paris 1902–27) v. 12. J. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56); v. 13, suppl. and table générales (1959) 7:209–215.

[M. LAWLOR]

ORANS

The figure of a person with arms extended and the palms of the hands open in a prayerful attitude prevalent in ancient pagan and early Christian art. This motif is found in bas-reliefs and sculpture in pagan cemeteries and on coins with the legend pietas, particularly of the Roman imperial period. It is seen in funerary monuments such as the late Egyptian stele representing the deceased. In the primitive Christian catacombs the earliest orantes are purely representational figures; but in the 2d century, they depict individuals marked with names or richly clothed, with or without an imprecatory legend, e.g., Zoë in pace; In Deo vivas. The 3d-century orantes are accompanied by petitions for the beholder, e.g., In pace et pete pro nobis. That they were considered related to the future life is seen in depictions with the Good Shepherd or with animals and plants being vivified by the Water of Life. In the 2d century OT figures such as Abraham, Noe, Isaac, and Susanna were likewise depicted as orantes and later, martyrs such as Mennas, Januarius, Thecla, Cecilia, and Agnes. In early Byzantine art Mary is pictured as an orans; this mode continued in the East, but the tradition disappeared in the West with the catacombs.

Considerable study has been devoted to deciphering the exact significance of the orans from G. B. de ROSSI'S conjecture of the Ecclesia Militans to Styger's symbol of heavenly glory and WILPERT'S prayer for those still on earth. The gesture is still used by clergy in the celebration of the Mass and other liturgical celebrations. In many places, the custom of the faithful praying the Lord's Prayer at Mass in the ancient orans posture has been revived in the wake of Vatican II.

Bibliography: T. KLAUSER, Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum 2 (1959) 115–145; 3 (1960) 112–133. J. K. LEONARD and N.D. MITCHELL, The Postures of the Assembly during the Eucharistic Prayer (Chicago, 1994).

[J. BEAUDRY/EDS.]

ORATIO SUPER POPULUM

The presider's prayer of blessing over the assembly before the dismissal at the end of Mass. It is introduced by the words "Bow your heads and pray for God's blessing." (In Latin, "Humiliate capita vestra Deo"). The Sacramentary of Verona (Leonine Sacramentary) testifies to the Oratio super populum as a blessing given at the close of every Mass. It is evident from the contents of many of these prayers that this was primarily a blessing given to all. Little by little it was restricted until St. Gregory I confined it to the ferial days of Lent. In the Middle Ages, the Oratio super populum was supplanted (outside of Lent) by a general blessing at the end of Mass. The liturgical reforms initiated by Vatican II brought about a revival of this practice. The revised Sacramentary and other liturgical books provide a wide range of options for use on solemnities, feasts, and Sundays.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (rev. ed. New York 1959) 531–535. A. G. MARTINMORT, ed., L'Église en prière (Tournai 1961) 431–432.

[W. J. O'SHEA/EDS.]

ORATORIANS

The Confederation of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri (CO) was founded in 1575 at Rome, Italy, by Philip NERI; it was approved by the Holy See in 1612 and confederated and reapproved in 1942. The members live in common without vows and seek their own sanctification by following the evangelical counsels, community life, prayer, and the priestly and lay ministry.

General Organization. Each congregation of the Oratory, composed of priests and lay brothers, is completely autonomous. There is no central government in the Oratory, although in 1942, when the constitutions were reapproved, all Oratories were confederated into "The Institute of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri," with a procurator-general at Rome. His duty is to represent the individual congregations of the Oratory to the Holy See and to assist them when requested. He may also vindicate the rights of Oratories, revive defunct congregations, and aid those in crisis. In 1958 the Holy See provided a new office in the institute, that of visitor of the Oratory, also known as delegate of the Apostolic See. This visitor represents the Holy See to the individual congregations. There also exists in the institute the office of postulator general. Every six years delegates of the individual congregations assemble in Rome at the tomb of St. Philip to hold a congress. This is not ordinarily a legislative group; the continuance of its business is handled between congresses by a board of elected permanent deputies from the various national groups of the confederation.

It is, however, the individual congregations that constitute the confederation, and their form of life is unique in the Church. These congregations are composed of priests and brothers who freely practice the evangelical counsels. Oaths, vows, or promises that would bind one to the congregation are forbidden by the constitution. No congregation may have a second house or assume the task of ruling another congregation. The spirit of the Oratory is democratic and adapted to secular priests living in common. Besides novices there are two categories of priests: triennial members, who have only a consultative vote, and the sexennial members, who have a decisive vote. The superior of the Oratory, who is called provost, is elected triennially by the six-year members who have been admitted to active vote. This superior may be re-elected every third year according to an ancient privilege and he is a major superior. He is assisted in the government of the congregation by four elected deputies. Without the consent of these deputies he may not make appointments or changes of officials. The provost and the deputies constitute the deputy congregation, which meets regularly to decide community affairs.

The general congregation is composed of all the members who have at least attained triennial status, and without the consent of this congregation no general law or regulation binding all the members may be made, nor may any business be initiated with the Holy See. The constitutions provide many checks and balances on the authority of its superiors and officials. Each congregation is commonly known by the name of the city wherein it is located. It is forbidden for two congregations to be located in the same city. The constitution admits of exceptions on this point for large modern cities. The lay brothers are supported by the congregation. The priests also are supported by the congregation but contribute to the congregation their earnings from ministries. The system of support for the members and for the congregation varies in each house in view of the circumstances of the times and the place in which a particular congregation is located. The principle is that Oratorians should, as much as possible, serve at their own expense and abstain from community funds.

Admission and Status. New congregations may come into existence either by being established from already existing Oratories, or, more commonly, by the invitation of ordinaries who wish a congregation in their diocese. A newly established Oratory must remain a diocesan congregation until all the elements required by the constitutions are fulfilled. At that time it is admitted by the Holy See to the Institute of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri as a congregation of pontifical right; only then does it become a genuine congregation of the Oratory. The autonomy of each congregation is complete, embracing apostolate, form of life, community exercises, finances, and education of its students. The constitutions and general statutes are observed by all congregations, but their nonpreceptive directives are left to further determination by particular statutes of the individual congregations and to decisions or decrees of the deputy or general congregations. There is no superior general or anyone, other than the Holy See, who may issue directives or rules for the autonomous houses.

The clerical members of each Oratory are ordained by their proper ordinary. The dimissorial letters permitting ordination are issued by the provost of the congregation. The Oratorians are incardinated into their own congregation with the reception of diaconate. In this case a priest may not depart from the congregation until he has found a bishop to receive him. The congregations of the Oratory are closely and fraternally linked to the clergy of their diocese. They are subject to the local ordinary except in those matters that are expressly excluded by force of law, i.e., in matters pertaining to their own institute and its constitutions and general statutes, internal government and discipline, economic administration, and episcopal visitation. Their close union with, and cooperation in, the program of the local ordinary flows from the nature of the congregation as a society of priests of the secular clergy. They cooperate in the bishop's labors and work for souls in their field, according to the command and program of the local ordinary. They do not enjoy the privilege of exemption from the jurisdiction of the local ordinary except in the four above-mentioned areas.

Foundations. Congregations of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri exist in the U.S. in Rock Hill, South Carolina; Monterey, California; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.; Pharr, Texas; Brooklyn, New York; Metuchen, New Jersey; and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Three congregations exist in England: Birmingham, established by John Henry Cardinal NEWMAN; London, established by Frederick William FABER; and Oxford. There are congregations in Italy, France, Spain, Poland, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Mexico, Colombia, Costa Rica, Chile, Brazil, Canada, and South Africa.

The individual congregations of the institute of the Oratory are bound to each other by a bond of fraternal charity and by common constitutions and general statutes. They give to one another needed assistance, advice, labor, and materials and even lend members or transfer them when possible and necessary, although one's vocation is always to a specific congregation. They receive one another with fraternal hospitality into their houses and exchange information among houses. Beyond this they have a strong affection and respect for the autonomy of each house.

Bibliography: L. PONNELLE and L. BORDET, St. Philip Neri and the Roman Society of His Times, tr. R. F. KERR (New York 1933). A. CAPECELATRO, The Life of Saint Philip Neri, tr. T. A. POPE (new ed. New York 1926). V. J. MATTHEWS, St. Philip Neri (London 1934). M. JOUHANDEAU, St. Philip Neri, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1960). P. TURKS, Philip Neri: The Fire of Joy, tr. D. UTRECHT (New York 1995).

[E. V. WAHL]

ORBIS BOOKS

Orbis Books is the publishing arm of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, popularly known as the MARYKNOLL FATHERS AND BROTHERS. Established in 1970, Orbis continues a tradition of book publishing initiated with the founding of the Society in 1911 by James A. WALSH (1867–1936) and Thomas F. PRICE (1860–1911). Editorial offices are located at the Society's headquarters at Maryknoll, N.Y., near Ossining, N.Y., 35 miles north of New York City.

Historically, the books published by the Maryknoll Society have focused on educating the public about missions and missionaries. Cofounder James A. Walsh, himself the author of the first three books published by Maryknoll, formulated the policy clearly: "Our book department has developed considerably. . . . Our principle, however, in the scale of mission literature, is to seek little or no direct profit. Our aim is to find readers. Substantial interest usually follows" (Field Afar, April 1921, p. 119). Orbis has consistently operated on the principle that "Maryknoll has never been afraid to publish a book that may not turn a profit, as long as that book has the potential to heal or enlighten or enoble" (Maryknoll, June 2000, p. 46).

Early Maryknoll books were popular accounts of people around the world and the work of missionaries among them. In the post-World War II period an increasing number of books focused on the deeper issues confronting peoples, their societies, and their churches. Directors of Maryknoll publishing at that time were Frs. John J. Considine and Albert J. Nevins, whose own works significantly advanced knowledge about the missionary world. Many of these books were contracted out to commercial publishers—Scribners, Longmans, Kennedy, and others—to assure a wide distribution.

The aftermath of the Second Vatican Council saw a rich production of theological and pastoral writing in Europe and North America. New voices soon emerged in Latin America, then in Asia and Africa. In 1970 the director of social communications for Maryknoll, Fr. Miguel d'Escoto, recently returned from service in Latin America, and Mr. Philip Scharper, the experienced former editor of Sheed and Ward, proposed that Maryknoll commit its efforts in the coming years to enabling these voices to be heard in English, thus to challenge and inspire as wide a world audience as possible. The Society endorsed the project under the new "Orbis" logo. Titles would carry the note: "Through Orbis Books, Maryknoll aims to foster the international dialogue that is essential to mission. The books published, however, reflect the opinions of their authors and are not meant to represent the official position of the society."

Among the earliest titles was A Theology of Liberation (1973) by Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutierrez, later signaled by Time magazine as one of the most important books of the decade. Other authors included Juan Luis Segundo, Leonard BOFF, Jon Sobrino, from Latin America; C.S. Song, Kosuke Koyama, Michael Amaladoss and Aloysius Pieris from Asia; and Jean-Marc Ela, Lamin Sanneh, and Allan Boesak from Africa. Orbis soon became the leading publisher in English of the liberation theologies. There followed reflective studies in black and native American theology, and works by Hispanic and feminist authors. Scripture studies were abundant. A pioneering methodological study appeared with Robert Schreiter's Constructing Local Theologies (1985). The publication of David Bosch's Transforming Mission (1991) provided a comprehensive summary of the evolution of missiology and paradigm shifts in mission. Interreligious dialogue was served in studies by Jacques Dupuis and others. Historical studies have increased in recent years, including G. Gutierrez' Las Casas (1993) and the monumental History of Vatican II, five volumes, edited by Giuseppe Alberigo and Joseph Komonchak (1995 ff.). Recent lists likewise reflect the current search for a deepened contemporary spirituality. Finally, Orbis has made available collections of key papal teachings, bishops' documents, and international synods along with the critical commentary of scholars. In all its publications, Orbis seeks "to examine the global dimensions of Christian faith, to invite dialogue with diverse cultures and religious traditions, and to serve the cause of reconciliation and peace."

Bibliography: G. G. HIGGINS, "Orbis Leads Its Chosen Field," Maryknoll (April 1981) 55–57. M. LEACH, "Impossible Dream Comes True," Maryknoll (June 2000) 42–46.

[W. D. MCCARTHY]

ORCHARD LAKE SCHOOLS

The Orchard Lake Schools is the general name for a complex of schools, centers, archives, museums and an art gallery located in Orchard Lake, Michigan, 35 miles northwest of downtown Detroit. The schools are: SS. Cyril and Methodius Seminary, Saint Mary's College of Ave Maria University and Saint Mary's Preparatory High School. Each school has its own Board of Trustees and its own head. The overall administration of buildings and grounds and the centers, archives, museums and art gallery as well as the coordination of the work of the three schools is vested in a Chancellor and a Board of Regents.

The Orchard Lake Schools were founded in 1885 by Father Jozef Dabrowski in Detroit in the center of the first Polish immigrant settlement. Father Dabrowski was born in Russian Poland in 1842. While a university student he became involved in revolutionary activity and was forced to flee abroad after the failure of the 1863–64 uprising. Ordained a priest in Rome in 1869, he took an assignment to serve Polish immigrants in rural Wisconsin. In 1874 he brought the Sisters of the Congregation of St. Felix of Cantalice to his parish, thus becoming their founder in the United States. He served as their chaplain until his death in 1903. The Felician Sisters moved their headquarters to Detroit in 1882. He transferred with them to the city and there began the Polish Seminary.

The Polish Seminary was born of the realization in the late 1870s that the growing Polish settlements in the United States were not attracting enough priests and educated laity from Europe to serve their needs. Father Leopold Moczygemba, a priest who had been serving Polish immigrants for more than two decades, went to Rome to petition the Pope for permission to raise funds for a school and seminary to educate immigrants and their sons for service to their community. His petition to Pope Leo XIII was approved on Jan. 14, 1879. The Pope wrote at the bottom of his letter: "Annuiamus in omnibus juxta petita. Leo P.M. XIII," (We agree to everything according to your petition. Pope Leo XIII). Unable to implement the plan himself, the aged Father Moczygemba turned the papal permission over to Father Dabrowski. Father Dabrowski, who had been one of the leading proponents of the idea of the new educational institution, had already established a reputation in the new Polish community as a leading supporter of education at all levels. He is regarded as the Father of the Polish American parochial school system.

When Father Dabrowski chose Detroit as a suitable central location for the institution, the original idea of a site in rural Nebraska was abandoned. It was clear by the 1880s that the Poles would not follow the Germans and Czechs into prairie farming, but they would become workers in the new industrial heartland. The school, after beginning with three students in 1885, rapidly developed into a five-year classics program and a five-year seminary curriculum. From the outset, instruction was in Polish, English and Latin. It ordained its first priests on March 9, 1890. By the early 20th century it had over 300 students.

Administratively the school and its property were under the jurisdiction of the Ordinary of Detroit. In practice, the Bishops of Detroit allowed the school's administration wide latitude in managing its own affairs. In turn, the administration and clerical faculty strongly supported the authority of the hierarchy in its struggles with independentist tendencies in Polish American parishes before 1914. The schools were, from the beginning, also staffed by lay faculty including several distinguished scholars such as Professor Thomas Siemiradzki, the translator of Kant into Polish. Although begun for Polish immigrants, Father Dabrowski also opened the programs to students from other ethnic groups including Lithuanians, Ruthenians, Ukrainians, Czech and Slovaks. The school had a Lithuanian department and had plans for a "Bohemian" department at the time of Father Dabrowski's death. After World War I, when the lines of national identity were drawn more sharply, the number of non-Poles dwindled and the schools became more exclusively Polish American.

The growth in all the Seminary departments coincided with the growth of the Polish immigrant community in Detroit. By 1909, Father Witold Buchaczowski, the second rector, unable to find property for expansion, purchased the campus of the recently closed Michigan Military Academy on the northeastern shore of Orchard Lake. The hundred-acre site, expanded to 120 acres by a later purchase, has remained the home of the schools since 1909.

Between 1927 and 1929, the Polish Seminary was reorganized into three schools on the basis of American models: a major theological seminary, now designated clearly as SS. Cyril and Methodius Seminary, a four-year college seminary named Saint Mary's and a four-year residential high school also called Saint Mary's. When the institution was founded it was dedicated to SS. Cyril and Methodius (1885 marked the millennial anniversary of their mission to the Slavs) and simultaneously to the Immaculate Conception. The reform divided these patrons, leaving the high school and college dedicated to the Virgin and the seminary to the Apostles to the Slavs. The college and high school in 1929 were incorporated together in the State of Michigan and received a charter to offer secondary and collegiate level courses without restriction. The seminary was added to the college and high school charter in 1941.

In 1941, the Archbishop of Detroit transferred the ownership of the Orchard Lake Schools to an independent lay and clerical Board of Trustees to avoid seizure of the property by creditors. The Archdiocese, as a result of the Depression, was on the verge of bankruptcy. In 1977, each of the schools received a separate administrative head and in 1983 the structure was reorganized to give each school a separate Board of Trustees. The Archbishop of Detroit was designated as the Chair of Seminary Board of Trustees.

For the half century after the reorganization, Saint Mary's High School prepared a significant percentage of the lay leaders of the Polish American community in Detroit and in the United States. Its graduates went on to major universities and professional schools, especially medical, dental and law schools. With the decline in interest in residential high schools and the wider opportunities available for third and later generations of Polish Americans, the enrollment showed a marked decline. A reform begun in 1989 ended mandatory residency, widened the academic curriculum and introduced a vigorous new sports program. It revitalized the high school as a major regional Catholic boys preparatory school serving the northwestern suburbs of Detroit. Its academic ratings and the success of its graduates have given it standing as one of the best preparatory schools in the Detroit area. Twenty percent of its students, including many from abroad, primarily the Far East, continue to reside on campus. In the 2000/2001 school year it enrolled 425 students, the highest total in its history.

Saint Mary's College remained largely a college seminary until 1965, although the majority of its students did not go on to a major seminary. It admitted laymen in 1965 and women in 1970 and broadened its educational program. By 1980 it had evolved into a regular Catholic liberal arts college. During the 1970s and early '80s, the college became a resource to third and fourth generation Polish Americans seeking to understand their Polish Catholic experience in America and the homeland of their ancestors. It also hosted the Polish-Jewish dialogue in the United States and the Black Polish Alliance of Detroit.

After the fall of the Soviet bloc, Saint Mary's College returned with renewed interest to its mission to serve as a bridge between Poland and east-central Europe and the United States. It sponsors biannual conferences on Polish affairs, publishes an annual Periphery, devoted to political and cultural topics, and recruits students from the region in large numbers. It has established ties with four Polish universities and has its own program in Kraków. In addition, faculty members with an academic specialty in Polish studies grew to ten. In 2000 there were more than 170 international students at the college with more than half from Poland. The expansion of Polish studies coincided with a similar effort in Polish American studies, as the college became the home of the Polish American Historical Association.

The end of the century also saw a concerted effort to reassert a strong Catholic identity. This thrust, as well as the new effort in Polish studies, was aided by an affiliation that brought new resources to the school. In 2000, the Orchard Lake Schools created Ave Maria University under its charter and made Saint Mary's College its first campus. The Board of Ave Maria College in Ypsilanti, Michigan then joined the new corporation of the Orchard Lake Schools as a second sponsor of the university. As of June 2000 Saint Mary's College is governed by a new Board chosen by the two affiliating sponsors: Ave Maria College and the Orchard Lake Schools. The enrollment of Saint Mary's College for 2000 was 492 students, the highest total in its history.

SS. Cyril and Methodius Seminary remains an interdiocesan seminary staffed by a faculty clergy from several United States dioceses and from Poland, as well as religious and laity. Most of its seminarians are recruited from minor seminaries in Poland. After a two-year course in English language and American culture, the seminarians embark on a four-year program of priestly formation and theological studies. During their seminary training they affiliate with a United States diocese and upon completion they are ordained for that diocese. The seminary offers masters degrees in divinity, theology and pastoral Ministry. In addition to the Priestly Formation program the seminary enrolls laymen and women seeking graduate training. At the fall 2000 registration the seminary enrolled 28 seminarians and 55 lay students. Over the course of its history the Orchard Lake Schools have educated 18,000 students and ordained over 2,600 priests for the American church. The seminary includes John Cardinal Król and Adam Cardinal Maida among its former students.

The Orchard Lake Schools are known widely for the Central Archive of Polonia which houses one of the largest collections of materials on the Polish Catholic experience in the United States and archival materials on the Polish Army in World War II. The College and Seminary Library has a valuable collection of Polish books including rare imprints published in the United States. A complex of museums documents the Polish World War II experience on all fronts. The Polish American Liturgical Center publishes a Polish-language missalette used in celebrating mass in Polish in North America and several other countries. The Art Gallery has the largest collection of Polish art in the United States in addition to fine examples of religious and secular paintings from elsewhere in Europe.

For its entire 116-year history, the Orchard Lake Schools have been supported by contributions primarily from Polish Americans throughout the United States.

Bibliography: J. SWASTEK, "The Formative Years of the Polish Seminary in the United States," in Sacrum Poloniae Millenium 6 (1959), 39–149, reprinted by the Center for Polish Studies and Culture of the Orchard Lake Schools in 1985. F. MOCHA, ed., "Polish American Institutions of Higher Learning," in Poles in America: Bicentennial Essays (Stevens Point, Wis. 1978), 461–496.

[T. RADZILOWSKI]

ORDEAL

A method of determining the guilt or innocence of a suspected or accused person by subjecting him to dangerous physical tests, the results of which are regarded as manifestations of divine judgment. It is essentially a form of divination. The practice is very old and has almost a universal distribution. It was widespread among the ancient Semitic and Indo-European peoples, especially among the Germans and the Slavs, and is found also in India, China, the Pacific islands, Australia, and Africa. While attested for the Americas, the practice is confined largely to Chile and Mexico.

Forms of the Ordeal. Among the numerous forms of the ordeal, several main types may be distinguished: ordeals by poison, by water, by hot iron, by fire, and by combat.

The poison ordeal is found principally among the peoples of West Africa. The accused must drink a concoction that produces vomiting or narcotic effects. If immediate vomiting results, and the accused suffers no ill effects, he is judged to be innocent. On the other hand, if he becomes dizzy and loses control of his faculties, he is thought to be guilty. Witch doctors play an important role in the poison ordeal, and the accused person often betrays his guilt through a fear that is heightened by the superstitious beliefs of his environment.

Ordeal by water is already mentioned in the Code of Hammurabi (Num 2, 132), and was widely practiced among the peoples of Europe. The accused person—often a woman accused of adultery—was required to plunge into deep water, preferably running water. If the person sank at once and did not rise immediately to the surface, he was adjudged to be innocent. If, however, he did not sink at once, or arose quickly to the surface and floated, it was thought that the water rejected him and that he was therefore guilty. Boiling water and boiling oil also were used in ordeals. The accused was required to plunge his hand and forearm into the hot liquid and his guilt or innocence was determined at once, or after three days, according to the greater or less degree of injury suffered by his hand or arm.

The hot iron ordeal was common among the ancient peoples of Europe and Asia and is still found in certain primitive cultures. The accused was required to grasp a heated ploughshare or to carry a piece of heated iron a prescribed number of steps. He was judged guilty or innocent either immediately, or after three days, according to the extent of injury suffered in this trial. An Irish ordeal requiring an accused woman to run her tongue across a red-hot adze is mentioned, but this practice does not seem to have been common.

The fire ordeal is found to have been practiced especially in Asia among the Hindus and other peoples within the orbit of their influence. The accused person was required to walk over burning charcoal or other material and, if unharmed, was judged to be innocent on the ground that the fire, a living force, refrained from injuring him.

Bibliography: A. E. CRAWLEY et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:507–33, a comprehensive world survey. L. LEITMAYER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1130–32. R. THURSWALD, "Gottesurteil," Reallexikon der Assyriologie, ed. E. EBELING and B. MEISSNER (Berlin 1928–) 4.2:441–48.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

In the Bible. The bitter-water ordeal of Numbers 5.11–31 is the only clear example of an ordeal in the Bible. The text appears to be a conflation of two separate but complementary forms of the ordeal ritual: that of the execratory oath [see OATHS (IN THE BIBLE)] and that of the drinking of the "bitter water." The results of both were interpreted as judgments of God. Although the latter aspect smacked somewhat of magic, its purpose was sacred: to appeal to God for a decision on the guilt or innocence of the accused. A woman accused of adultery, holding in her hand a cereal offering (without oil or frankincense), was presented to a priest. He then sprinkled some dust from the floor of the tent over a vessel of water and had her take an oath of execration (Num 5.21). After washing down the solution of ink in which the accompanying curses were written, the priest poured it into the now "bitter water," then waved a part of the cereal offering before the Lord, and had the woman drink the mixture. If the woman was innocent, no harm befell her and she remained fruitful. If she was guilty, the dreaded consequences of the curse took place, usually in the form of frequent miscarriages. If guilty, a woman would apparently prefer to confess and take her chances on a lesser punishment than to suffer the dire consequences of the oath. Even if the bitter-water ritual is ultimately traceable to pagan practices and betrays magical overtones, the Biblical writer has deliberately placed it into a sacral context by attributing its effectiveness to the powerful hand of God (Num 5.21). It is at least more humane than the corresponding prescription in the Code of Hammurabi.

One aspect of the golden calf episode in Exodus 32.1–24 also reflects the bitter-water ordeal; the idolatrous image is ground into powder and given to the Israelites to be drunk (20).

The ordeal was present to some extent also in the custom of seeking decisions by lot, as when Achan's offense was discovered (Jos 7.13–26) and Jonathan's breach of the hērem (1 Sam 14.36–45) was revealed. For this reason the high priest's breastplate containing the deciding lots URIM AND THUMMIM was called the "breastplate of judgment" (Exodus 28.15). Memory of the ordeal may also have influenced the Prophets to speak of "poisoned waters" of sinfulness contaminating the people of Israel (Jeremiah 8.14; 9.15; 23.14; Ez 23.31–34).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek (1676). E. KUTSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1808–09. R. PRESS, "Das Ordeal im alten Israel," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 51 (1933) 121–40. P. VAN IMSCHOOTT, Théologie d' l'Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56) 2:263–65.

[E. J. CIUBA]

The Medieval Ordeal. The ordeal in medieval Europe was a form of judicial trial whereby the innocence or guilt of accused persons was made to depend upon some feat of physical endurance. The result was regarded as definitive proof and as a judgment of God. Most forms of ordeal had the favor of the Church until 1215, and were preceded by certain religious acts.

Kinds of Ordeal. In general, medieval ordeals were bilateral or unilateral. In the former, the contending parties to a duel or single combat might be represented on occasion by proxies, for example, by one or more "champions." Thus in 1179, when the people of Rosny claimed not to be serfs of the Abbey of Sainte-Geneviève in Paris, the case was decided "forever" in favor of the abbey by a judicial duel ordered by King Louis VII in which, on the day appointed, the men of Rosny failed in fact to accept the "repeated challenge" of the Abbot, Stephan of Tournai [A. Luchaire, Études sur les Actes de Louis VII (Paris 1885) 2:323]. The unilateral ordeal, on the other hand, tested an accused person as such, who, to prove his innocence, was required to carry a ball of hot iron in his hand for a certain distance, to plunge his arm to the wrist or elbow in a caldron of boiling water, to be submerged in cold water, to walk blindfolded between red-hot ploughshares, or to walk barefoot on glowing coals.

Church Attitudes. The attitude of secular and ecclesiastical authorities to ordeals varied. Although Constantine successfully prohibited gladiatorial combats (Corpus iuris civilis (Berlin): v.2 Codex Iustinianus, ed. P. Krueger 11.44.1), King Liutprand in 731 complained that he was powerless to abolish duels since they were part of Lombard tradition. And whereas popes Gregory the Great (590–604) and Martin I (649–53) confirmed for the monastery of Saint Peter at Rouen the right of holding "secular trials of cold water and the like" (Browe 2:3–4), Pope Nicholas I (858–67), in the famous case of King LOTHAIR II and Queen Theutberga, averred that a duel at least had "no divine sanction whatsoever" (Corpus iuris canonici, ed. E. Friedberg C.2 q.5 c.22); but in the same context, Hincmar of Reims defended hot and cold water ordeals. A celebrated precedent was set by Pope Stephan V (886–89) when, in reply to a query whether parents whose children had been smothered while sleeping with them should be made to prove by ordeal that death was accidental, he declared that ordeals of hot iron and cold water "had no canonical basis" (Corpus iuris canonici C.2 q.5 c.20; Browe 1:14).

On the whole the canonists were hostile to the idea, from IVO OF CHARTRES (1099) and GRATIAN (c. 1140) to HUGUCCIO (c. 1190), who regarded the practice as utterly unjustifiable and a form of "tempting God"; the aforementioned canonist-theologian Stephan of Tournai was somewhat confused; SICARDUS OF CREMONA (c. 1180) would allow it in cases involving the lower classes (Browe 2:88–104). With the notable exception of PETER CANTOR (d. c. 1196), who attacked it resoundingly, theologians of the period generally refrained from discussing it. However, possibly as a result of the opposition of Huguccio and Peter Cantor, the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL in 1215 under Innocent III (who personally had allowed ordeals in civil though not ecclesiastical trials: Browe 1:30–36) prohibited the clergy from blessing or consecrating trials by ordeal (c.18; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decrta 220; Corpus iuris canonici X 3.50.9). Although it did not specifically disallow the use of ordeals in administering secular justice, this canon was a turning point in the disappearance of these customary practices (purgationes vulgares, as the canonists called them) from European law. England, Normandy, and Denmark at once followed the Council's lead, and justices in eyre were instructed in England in January 1219 to adopt other evidentiary procedures in the future. Trial by ordeal was further nullified by the development of merchant law, of inquest in ecclesiastical and secular law, and of juries in English law. That ordeals, particularly judicial duels, did not go out of vogue completely is evidenced by repeated papal prohibitions (Browe 1:38–47) and by writers such as Raymond of Peñafort, Thomas Aquinas, Dante, Suárez, and De Liguori. A celebrated survival of bilateral ordeal by fire was the proposal by a Franciscan that it be used by SAVONAROLA to test his prophecies. Savonarola rejected the proposal.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:1139–52. P. BROWE, ed., De ordaliis, 2 v. (Rome 1932–33). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 12.2:2377–90. C. LEITMAIER, Die Kirche und die Gottesurteile (Vienna 1953). H. NOTTARP, Gottesurteilstudien (Munich 1956). J. W. BALDWIN, "The Intellectual Preparation for the Canon of 1215 against Ordeals," Speculum. A Journal of Mediaeval Studies 36 (1961) 613–36.

[L. E. BOYLE]

ORDER

Few notions have both so rich a heritage of meaning and so clear an application to all fields of knowledge as does order. There are many myths of cosmic order and its polar opposite, chaos, and there is no great religion without some PRINCIPLE of order. If men do not worship the transcendent God of Genesis, who imposes arrangement, then they have an immanent principle of law and of right relation of THING to thing and PERSON to person (ṛta in Sanskrit, dharmā in Pali, tao in Chinese, as well as the more familiar Greek notions associated with κόσμος, δίκη, μοῖρα, θέμις, and νόμος). Until comparatively recent times order is not only always regularly associated with deity ("Order is Heaven's first law," A. Pope, Essay on Man, Ep. 4.49) but also always a virtue in man (according to W. Jaeger, cosmos "originally signifies right order in a state or other community"). As preserved in the expression "law and order," the orderly is the right way to behave, the disorderly is the wrong way. Order applies, then, not only to the lawful universe but to right action of man; order is also regularly associated with intelligibility. To order may mean to act regularly, or with system, i.e., to arrange acts by method. In the last meaning, to order is to strive toward a goal, and those things that serve to achieve a goal are said to be ordered to it. Aristotle's favorite example of an order is an army, but St. THOMAS AQUINAS uses an example of another kind of order, a heap of stones. Stones can scarcely be said to be led, or to be under a leader; nevertheless, even when placed by chance, there is a gradation from the top-most to the lowermost (In 5 meta. 13.939). Order, then, has many senses, and things ordered in one way may yet not be ordered in another.

Formal Analysis. Exact definition of order seems only to have been achieved by scholastic philosophy, and the recent elaboration by symbolic logic, largely in the 20th century, has served to reduce the ambiguity of the term (see LOGIC, SYMBOLIC). The primitive notion, itself indefinable, is RELATION. Since relation is between things (in the most general sense, including terms of thought), order presupposes a plurality of things. A theorem common to both St. Thomas and such moderns as J. ROYCE, A. N. WHITEHEAD, and B. RUSSELL is that one thing cannot be ordered. The most general definition of order is to be related in some definite way. One definite way in which things are related is a series; that is, one thing is prior to another. In spite of the many senses in which "this" may be prior to "that," it follows immediately that "that" is posterior to "this." Logicians say of two symbols that they are well ordered when it makes a difference which is to the right of the other. "Before" and "after" are of this type. St. Thomas's defining statement is:

The terms "before" and "after" are attributed according to the relation of some principle. Now order includes some mode of the "before" and "after." Hence, wherever there is a principle, it is necessary that there be also an order of some kind. [Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 26.1]

Order, then, is not meant absolutely, but always in some respect, or as Whitehead put it: "'Order' is a mere generic term: there can only be some definite specific 'order,' not merely 'order' in the vague" [Process and Reality (New York 1929) 128].

St. Thomas seems first to have made explicit what is shared by all serial orders and what differentiates one from another:

. . .the notion of order includes the notion of the prior and the posterior. Thus there can be said to be an order of things according to all those modes, spatial, temporal and all like others, according to which a thing can be said to be before another. [In one sent. 20.1.3.1]

The modern way of expressing such a relation is to call it asymmetrical. That is, if A is larger than B, then

$B$  cannot be larger than  $A$ , etc. In a familiar symbol, if  $A > B$ , then immediately it follows,  $B < A$  (in the example  $B$  is smaller than  $A$ ). There are also symmetrical relations, in which the relation,  $r$ , is such that  $ArB$  implies  $BrA$ . The most obvious example of a symmetrical relation is equality. It makes no difference whether it is said that  $A = B$  or  $B = A$ , for one follows necessarily from the other.

“The notion of order includes the notion of the prior and the posterior,” said St. Thomas. The modern says that asymmetry is necessary to an ordering relationship, but that it is not sufficient. For in a series, say the stones piled one atop the other, there is the same relation “on top of” holding between the top and the middle, and between the middle and the bottom stone. The relationship is called transitive when there are three things so related that when  $ArB$  and  $BrC$ , then  $ArC$ . This is certainly the case for “earlier than in time,” or “to the right of in space,” or “larger than in quantity,” etc. Now although, as has been seen, serial relations are transitive and asymmetrical, there are also relations that are transitive and symmetrical. To use the former example of equality, it is obvious that when  $A = B$  and  $B = C$ , then it must follow that  $A = C$ . The common notion of Euclid is that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other. Those who have developed the theory of order here being expounded consider the principle of ordering relations no less fundamental in human thought. Consider such a relation as “heavier than,” says William JAMES, and symbolizing the relation  $>$ , when  $a > b > c > d$ , then  $a > d$ . Evidently three terms are the minimal number for transitivity, and since there can be no maximum number of terms, the formal types of order are infinite.

The principle of mediate comparison is only one form of a law which holds in many series of homogeneously related terms, the law that skipping intermediary terms leaves relations the same. This axiom of skipped intermediates or of transferred relations occurs, as we soon shall see, in logic as the fundamental principle of inference, in arithmetic as the fundamental property of the number-series, in geometry as that of the straight line, the plane and the parallel. It seems to be on the whole the broadest and deepest law of man's thought. [James, Principles of Psychology (New York 1890, 1950) 2:646]

Asymmetry and transitivity are not sufficient to define serial order. A third important factor to be made explicit, whether in the case of St. Thomas's rocks one atop another or James's objects of different weights, is that if any two are chosen, there is the relation “above” or the relation “heavier than,” and either it or its opposite holds. Since by virtue of this property one can form a single system of the items, it is called connexity. It is found in the case of musical notes, where, because of the relation “higher than in pitch,” one can construct scales. The beauty of this is obvious to anyone who reflects upon how he uses numbers, whether whole numbers or fractions. Of any two (different numbers, not equal one to the other), one is greater than the other, and occupies a unique place in the series called the order of magnitude.

The foregoing analyzes a common intuitive concept of order that is learned in the nursery: a place for everything and everything in its place. It would be false to argue that this is the only formal definition of order. One might, for example, define order as a relation that is alio-relative (or nonreflexive, i.e., not related to itself but to another), transitive, and connected, and deduce asymmetry. [A. N. Whitehead, “Mathematics,” Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed.; also in Essays in Science and Philosophy (London and New York 1948) 197]. It would be false to argue also that this definition fits all kinds of order. It applies only to series that are open, i.e., in which the same term does not recur. There are not only asymmetrical relations that are called orderly, but also all symmetrical relations, such as the many forms of balance in which an axis divides matching or balanced sides.

Historical Survey. The concrete kinds of order (as distinguished from the formal types of order) may best be sketched in terms of their exemplification in the history of thought.

To a great extent the Egyptians viewed their kingdom as an expression of an eternal and unchanging order. For the Babylonians there was a struggle to maintain order in the universe and in human affairs, and an element of risk. One way of reading history as reflected in men's concepts is to regard SOCIETY itself, and man's arts and sciences, as efforts to overcome confusion, to respond to the threat of chaos. Since contemporary human society lives in a period of vast uncertainty, it tends to smile at the complacency of the Egyptians and to feel sympathetically the anxiety of the Babylonians. The facts seem to be that there are periods when questioning the eternal order, or its goodness, rises to prominence. In contrast to the serenity of ARISTOTLE is the restlessness of St. AUGUSTINE (in the Confessions). In contrast to the serenity of St. Thomas and DANTE is the uncertainty of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM and his followers. Some of the Elizabethans express confidence in the hierarchical ordering, somewhat as conceived by St. Augustine in The City of God (Civ. 19.13), but the rise of mechanical science in the early 17th century is associated with the unrest of John DONNE (“‘Tis all in peeces, all cohaerance gone”). Yet the mechanical order became itself the ground of confidence:

All nature is but art unknown to thee; All chance direction, which thou canst not see; All discord, harmony not understood; All partial evil, universal good. [A. Pope, Essay on Man, Ep. 1.10]

In contrast to the serenity of the post-Newtonian men of the Enlightenment is the emphasis on the arbitrary and willful ways of individual genius in the Romantic period. Man is most recently being deeply affected by the existentialists—S. A. KIERKEGAARD, F. W. NIETZSCHE, F. M. DOSTOEVSKIĪ, and their followers—who tend not only to question any knowledge of a divine order but also to belittle knowledge of an order of nature, to scoff at the law of human institutions, even to exalt chaos above order.

To trace the history of order is to go to the heart of Greco-Roman, medieval, and modern thought. It is also to discover those experiments that, in both their successes and failures, are most valuable in framing an adequate philosophy.

Greek Thought. The Greek achievement is fourfold. To the pre-Socratics man is indebted for the discovery that he inhabits a cosmos. The Ionian naturalists tend to stress mechanical order; particularly DEMOCRITUS (and later EPICURUS and LUCRETIUS) would account for all qualitative differences by changes in spatial order (τόξις). ANAXAGORAS counts this a failure to explain the “why” of order: the “how” alone lacks the purpose of intelligence (νοῦς). PYTHAGORAS and the Pythagoreans stress an intelligible order of forms to account for the sensuous harmony, especially as musical instruments produce sounds by simple proportions of the lengths of strings or vibrating columns of air. PLATO and Aristotle, however differing in their theories of form, both account for the GOOD and the beautiful as illustrations of order (see BEAUTY). Thus is born the concept of good order (εὐτοξία) that the Stoics stress, and a problem is set for St. Augustine: if everything that is has an order, and some things are bad, how can there be bad order? (See EVIL.) Plato and Aristotle achieve concepts of the ordering of men in society and of the succession of the orders of constitutions.

Medieval Thought. The Christian achievement of a philosophy of order is best studied by St. Augustine, particularly in his brilliant dialogue De ordine. The plurality of orders is illustrated in nature, in the arts, in language, and above all in the moral life, seen in the light of divine providence. Christian philosophy surpasses its pagan predecessors in richness; problems of great depth are explored and solved, and without these achievements the modern world cannot be imagined. One is the conception of all peoples as part of an evolving pattern in time. History is a succession of orders: a concept developed centuries later by G. VICO and, most recently, by E. Voegelin’s Order and History (Baton Rouge, LA 1956–). The second problem is that of the ultimate good of man. Salvation belongs to what is commonly called “the order of grace,” and Christian philosophies of order stress a sharp break between the methods by which one knows the natural order and the supernatural order. No modern philosopher of order has stated this better than B. PASCAL in his fragmentary Pensées, which are worth reading on the three orders, any one irreducible to any other (history is neither nature, nor supernature, and is studied in a unique fashion).

Modern Thought. A great modern achievement is the understanding of the world of nature as a unitary order. How the new science was made possible by the medieval theological framework, which itself grew out of the ancient movements, is shown by Whitehead in Science and the Modern World (New York 1925): “There can be no living science unless there is a widespread instinctive conviction in the existence of an Order of Things, and, in particular, of an Order of Nature” (5). The world ruled by power that is all-extensive, down to the least detail, yet in principle intelligible, is the living faith of Christianity. This was lacking, Whitehead argues, in those regions where science did not arise. Order is coupled by the founders of modern philosophy with method, that is, regular procedure in investigating nature. A crucial question, particularly for modern empiricists (D. HUME and his followers), is whether science can proceed without knowledge of an order of things and whether method is sufficient without metaphysical grounding. Modern metaphysics of order have been most various; doctrines of two orders (“order dualism”), an order of knowing and an order of being (R. DESCARTES); or reduction of all orders to one logical order (“order monism” of B. SPINOZA). There are other forms of “order monism”: one mechanical order (T. HOBBS); one divine order (N. MALEBRANCHE); one order of the mind, without a real material order (G. BERKELEY). There is also the view of mind imposing categorial order on otherwise chaotic sensations (I. KANT), which might be called “order subjectivism.” The later phases have stressed a recognition of change in species and CHANCE as a factor in their development (C. R. DARWIN). Thus, as argued by A. O. Lovejoy in The Great Chain of Being (Cambridge, MA 1936), the hierarchical order persisting from the ancients into the schemes of the Enlightenment has been displaced, and a temporal and dynamic ordering prevails.

The present crisis was prepared by H. BERGSON and the pragmatists, such as James. Bergson denied any real chaos: disorder was merely frustration in not finding the order one had expected (Creative Evolution, tr. A. Mitchell, New York 1911). James came to doubt any real order: the world has any order one chooses to recognize in it: it is as beans spilled on the table: a person can see whatever patterns are of interest to him (Varieties of Religious Experience, New York 1902, 1963, etc.).

Contemporary Thought. Contemporary philosophies of order—not only pragmatist but also existentialist, positivist, and Marxist—are all reacting against HEGELIANISM. The phrase that expresses “order-monism” in Royce is “one true Order of things” (The World and the Individual, New York 1900). Contemporary protests often take the form of extreme “order-dualism” or “order-pluralism.” Philosophers who voice such protests assert confidently that there is no one final and eternal order; this ideal of one final order is mocked by L. WITTGENSTEIN as the search for a “crystal palace.” The existentialists, following Dostoevskii, who protested against cosmic order in the name of radical human freedom, tend toward acosmism: they tend to say that man alone is the only principle of order, and each individual man from moment to moment as his interests and tasks shift.

The great hope of some contemporaries (G. G. Grisez, I. Jenkins, and P. G. Kuntz, all somewhat close to Paul Weiss, Modes of Being, Carbondale, IL 1958) is that a new systematic understanding can be developed. The errors of the past have been the fallacious reduction of the cosmos to one mode of being or, on the other hand, the overstress on the discontinuity of orders. Stated positively, there are several modes of order. If the hope of these new systems is fulfilled, the universe can be understood as many orders together.

See Also: UNIVERSE, ORDER OF; RELATION.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v.2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World, see index. G. GIANNINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1062–67. Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA, et al. 18.1 (1931) 930–936. J. ROYCE, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:533–540. American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 17 (1941) 1–52. E. CASSIRER, Logos, Dike, Kosmos in der Entwicklung der griechischen Philosophie (Göteborg 1941). W. W. JAEGER, Paideia: The Ideals of Greek Culture, tr. G. HIGHET, v.1 (2d ed. New York 1945). H. KRINGS, Ordo: Philosophische-historische Grundlegung einer abendländischen Idee (Halle 1941). AUGUSTINE, Ordine, ed. and tr. R. P. RUSSELL as Divine Providence and the Problem of Evil (New York 1942), also in Writings of St. Augustine (The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation, ed. R. J. DEFERRARI 1; 1948) 239–332. L. R. WARD, God and World Order (St. Louis 1961). J. M. RAMIREZ, De ordine Placita quaedam Thomistica (Salamanca 1963). H. MEYER, Thomas von Aquinas: Sein System und seine geistesgeschichtliche Stellung (2d ed. Paderborn 1961). B. COFFEY, “The Notion of Order according to St. Thomas Aquinas,” The Modern Schoolman 27 (1949) 1–18. E. A. PACE, “The Concept of Order in the Philosophy of St. Thomas,” The New Scholasticism 2 (1928) 51–72. H. A. ROMMEN, The Natural Law: A Study in Legal and Social History, tr. T. A. HANLEY (St. Louis 1947). C. I. LEWIS, Mind and the World Order

(New York 1929; pa. 1956). W. D. OLIVER, Theory of Order (Yellow Springs, OH 1951). J. D. WILD, Human Freedom and Social Order: An Essay in Christian Philosophy (Durham, NC 1959). C. J. SCHNEER, The Search for Order (New York 1960). A. D. RITCHIE, Studies in the History and Methods of the Sciences (Edinburgh 1958). E. HEIMANN, Freedom and Order (New York 1947). H. KUHN, “Le Concept de l’ordre,” Greg 43 (1962) 254–267. G. G. GRISEZ, “Sketch of a Future Metaphysics,” The New Scholasticism 37 (1964) 310–340. I. JENKINS, “The Matrix of Positive Law,” Natural Law Forum 6 (1961) 1–50. P. G. KUNTZ, “Modes of Order,” Review of Metaphysics 16 (1962–63) 316–345; “Mythical, Cosmic, and Personal Order,” ibid. 718–748; “Order in Language, Phenomena, and Reality: Notes on Linguistic Analysis, Phenomenology, and Metaphysics,” Monist 49 (1965) 107–136.

[P. G. KUNTZ]

ORDER OF CHRIST

A military order established March 14, 1319, by John XXII, at the request of King Diniz of Portugal. The order received all the Portuguese properties of the suppressed Order of the TEMPLARS. Its chief seat was originally at Castro Marim, and later at THOMAR. The Order of Christ was bound to the observance of the customs of the Castilian Order of CALATRAVA and was subject to the visitation of the Cistercian abbot of Alcobaça. The pope appointed the first master, requiring him and his successors to take an oath of loyalty to the Holy See. In the future the abbot of Alcobaça was to preside at the election of the master. The Cistercian general chapter of 1320 consented to these arrangements and the first chapter of the Order of Christ was held at Lisbon in 1321. Until the 15th century the order was governed by a succession of masters; afterward princes of the royal family administered it. The most famous of these, Henry the Navigator (d. 1460), reformed the order and secured for it spiritual jurisdiction in the Atlantic islands and African regions, which were explored and colonized through his efforts. In 1542 Paul III revoked the right of the abbot of Alcobaça to visit the order. Nine years later Julius III annexed the mastership to the crown in perpetuity.

Bibliography: Definições e estatutos dos cavaleiros e freires da Ordem de Nosso Senhor Jesu Christo (Lisbon 1628, 1671, 1717, 1746). J. VIEIRA DA SILVA GUIMARÃES, A Ordem de Christo (Lisbon 1901). A. JANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 2:1183.

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

ORDER OF THE SWAN

The Order of the Swan was a sodality whose goal was to further devotion to the Virgin Mary and to promote charity; originally membership was confined to princes, knights, and noble personages. Founded by Elector Frederick II of Brandenburg on Sept. 29, 1440, the order had its seat at Sankt Marien monastery on the Harlunger Berg, near Brandenburg, Germany. The brothers of the Order of the Swan vowed to say seven Our Fathers and seven Hail Marys daily—or to give seven pennies to the poor instead. Furthermore, they pledged to fast on the vigils of all feasts of the Virgin and to celebrate the feasts themselves with the greatest possible dignity. No adulterer, fornicator, traitor, robber, or drunkard could belong to the brotherhood. Members were obligated to make considerable contributions to the order, in return for which they gained all the spiritual benefits it earned. Membership in the order carried considerable prestige, not only in Germany, but elsewhere in Europe; it was originally restricted to 30 men (who had to furnish proofs of nobility) and seven women. The Elector Frederick II changed the statutes on Aug. 25, 1452, admitting commoners to the sodality. The badge of the order consisted of a gold or silver collar (called “The Society”), from which was suspended a medallion showing the Virgin and Child supported by a crescent bearing the motto of the order, Ave Mundi Domina. Hanging from this medallion was an image of a swan, the proper titular of the order. The Reformation spelled the end of the order. It was, however, revived by King Frederick William IV of Prussia on Dec. 24, 1843, as a free association of men and women of all social classes, whose purpose was social welfare.

Bibliography: R. M. B. VON STILLFRIED-RATTONITZ, Der Schwanenorden (Halle 1845). S. HÄNLE, Urkunden und Nachweise zur Geschichte des Schwanen-Ordens (Ansbach 1876). R. M. B. VON STILLFRIED-RATTONITZ and S. HÄNLE, Das Buch vom Schwanenorden (Berlin 1881). C. MEYER, Schwanenordens-Ritterkapelle (Ansbach 1909). E. A. PRINZ ZUR LIPPE, Orden und Auszeichnungen in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Heidelberg–Munich 1958) 158.

[G. GROSSCHMID]

ORDERICUS VITALIS

Benedictine, the leading historian of France in the 12th century; b. Attingham, England, Feb. 16, 1075; d. Saint-Evroult, Normandy, Feb. 3, 1142. In 1085 he became an oblate in the abbey of SAINT-EVROULT-D'OUICHE in Normandy, where he received an excellent liberal education under John of Reims. He was ordained in 1108. In 1109 he adapted and enlarged the Gesta Normannorum ducum of William of Jumièges. In 1123, at the request of his abbot, Roger du Sap, he began his most important work, the Historia ecclesiastica in 13 books, completed in 1141. An especially important source for the period from 1125 to 1140, the Historia was originally planned as a history of his monastery. It soon grew into a universal history of the period, treating of persons and trends in the history of the Church; giving lists of popes, abbots, and rectors of churches; and recounting the history of the NORMANS in England, Southern Italy, Normandy, and the CRUSADER STATES. As an enthusiastic chronicler of the CRUSADES, Ordericus represents the best tradition of monastic HISTORIOGRAPHY, interested in events both religious and profane. Ordericus, little known in the Middle Ages, is appreciated today for his broad interest and accuracy in detail. His principal sources, carefully noted by him, were mainly oral. Among his informants were those who happened through the monastic guest-house: clerics, monks, pilgrims, knights, jongleurs, and merchants. Among earlier historians known to Ordericus were Pompeius Trogus, GREGORY OF TOURS, and BEDE. He also consulted monastic archives and the contemporary chronicles of Dudo of Saint-Quentin, William of Jumièges, and FULCHER OF CHARTRES.

Bibliography: Editions. Historia ecclesiastica, ed. A. LE PRÉVOST, 5 v. (Paris 1838–55); Patrologia Latina 188; The Ecclesiastical History of England and Normandy, tr. T. FORESTER, 4 v. (London 1853–56). Literature. Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:441–448, 522–528. H. WOLTER, Ordericus Vitalis: Ein Beitrag zur kluniazensischen Geschichtsschreibung (Wiesbaden 1955).

[B. LACROIX]

ORDINALS, ROMAN

In Latin, Ordines Romani (singular: Ordo Romanus). Medieval service books that described the customary (consuetudines) ordering (Ordines, ordinarium), or sequence of liturgical ceremonies.

Purpose. In the ancient Church, each minister performed only his part of the function. In fact, for each minister there was usually a special book containing only those texts pertaining to his role (see LITURGICAL BOOKS OF ROMAN RITE). To coordinate the activities of the various ministers and to ensure a smoothly organized service, someone comparable to a MASTER OF CEREMONIES was required. He had his own book, the ordinal. The first ordinals were very likely succinct personal notes of such a master, compiled by himself or the sacristan for local use. Written ordinals and their wide distribution filled a historical need; namely, that which arose when a local liturgy moved outside its own confines or when strangers replaced a native minister. There are also special official rubrical collections: the Ordo (see ORDO, ROMAN), designating the liturgical texts to be used for each day of the year, and the CEREMONIAL OF BISHOPS (Caeremoniale Episcoporum), containing all the rubrics concerning episcopal functions.

History. The emergence of Carolingian Europe from chaos is in large part due to a program of borrowings from Rome (in organization and institutions, in culture and religion) which was in progress under Charlemagne. Having borrowed sacramentaries, lectionaries, graduals, etc., he needed also Roman ordinals. Members of monastic scriptoria copied prodigious numbers of MSS. Pure Roman manuscripts quickly acquired local elements, unintentional misreadings by copyists, or deliberate modifications by liturgical editors. Not only were collections of pure and altered ordinals amassed as reference works for libraries, but other collections, meant to supply actual norms for the living liturgy, were kept up to date and continuously developed. Still other ordinals were joined to didactic material for the theological training of the clerics. Key monastic centers throughout the Continent and the islands assured the survival of the ordinals.

Editions. Many had edited ordinals, for instance, Morin, Martène, Hittorp, Tommasi, De Rossi, Duchesne, and especially Mabillon, but none had worked on them critically until Michel ANDRIEU. Andrieu offers a highly scientific edition, and in texts that he has in common with other scholars, Andrieu must have preference. His lifetime work made available the pure Roman ordinals and their Gallican offspring. Andrieu culled 50 such ordinals from the manuscript libraries of Europe; by tedious line-by-line comparisons of myriad manuscripts, he retraced the genealogy of varied copies to their family homes, carefully dated them, and in the process revealed the slow evolution of the rites of Rome with the admixture of Gallican modifications that was to end in the 10th-century Romano-German pontifical. The liturgy embodied in this new ordinal entered Rome with Otto I (912–973), spread anew from the Lateran, and ultimately dominated the Western world.

In volume 1 Andrieu lists individually the titles of ordinals and under each gives reference to available editions and the known manuscripts in which they are found. Following this is a description of each manuscript consulted. A third section gives a history, and a valuable index ends the 631-page volume. Volume 2, after an introduction, takes up the text of the first 13 ordinals, each preceded by a chapter on the manuscript traditions, date and place of origin, and brilliant essays commenting on the text. A critical text with copious notes closes Andrieu's plan of work. Volume 3 covers ordinals 14–34; volume 4 ordinals 35–49; volume 5, the famed ordinal 50, covers Hittorp's Ordo Romanus Antiquus. This last tome is the work of Andrieu, but his untimely death left to A. van Roey and A. H. Thomas the task of preparing it for the press. In general ordinals 1–10 deal with the Mass; 12–19, the office; 20–33, principal functions of the liturgical year; 34–40, ordinations in their ember day setting; 41–44, dedication of churches and honors paid to relics; 45–48, the crowning of the emperor; 49, obsequies; and 50 deals with the liturgy of the whole liturgical year in 55 chapters. Along with these 50 ordinals, Andrieu points out the original Roman practice.

Roman Ordinal XVII, 9th-century manuscript page describing recital of monastic office (Bib. Vat. Cod. Pal. Lat. 574, fol. 152v).

Bibliography: M. ANDRIEU, Les ordines romani du haut moyen âge (Louvain 1951). L. LARSON-MILLER, Medieval liturgy: a book of essays (New York 1997). E. PALAZZO, A history of liturgical books from the beginning to the thirteenth century (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[R. T. CALLAHAN/EDS.]

ORDINARIES, ECCLESIASTICAL

“Ordinary” in Church law denotes those clerics listed in c. 134 of the Code of Canon Law. Ordinary jurisdiction is that power to govern which flows automatically from an office that a person holds (Codex iuris canonici c. 131 §1). This is distinguished from delegated jurisdiction, which is received by direct grant of one having authority without any essential relationship with an ecclesiastical office (Codex iuris canonici c. 131 §2).

Canon law does not define the term ordinary but simply enumerates those who are to be considered such. The Code of Canon Law in c. 134 lists the following as ordinaries: (1) the Roman pontiff; (2) diocesan bishops; (3) others who are placed over some particular church or community equivalent to a particular church according to c. 368 (e.g., abbots nullius and prelates nullius); (4) the vicars general and episcopal vicars of those enumerated in (2) and (3); (5) for their own members, major superiors in clerical religious institutes of pontifical right and clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right who at least possess ordinary executive power. The code designates the following as major superiors: the supreme moderator of a religious institute or society of apostolic life; the provincial superior; the superior of an autonomous house; and the vicars of all those above mentioned (Codex iuris canonici cc. 620, 734).

Canon 134 makes the distinction between local ordinaries (those in groups 1 to 4 above) and other ordinaries (major superiors of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right and clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right who at least possess ordinary executive power). The local ordinary's jurisdiction extends over all those who are in the territory that he governs, whereas the jurisdiction of the religious ordinary is restricted to his own subjects.

In the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, the legislation on hierarchs is substantially the same as the Latin legislation on ordinaries (cf. Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 984).

Bibliography: U. BESTE, Introductio in codicem (5th ed., Naples 1961) 212–216, 312. M. J. KEENE, Religious Ordinaries and Canon 198 (Catholic University of America CLS 135; Washington 1942).

[M. J. KEENE]

ORDINATIONS IN THE ROMAN RITE

The object of this entry is to discuss the particular form the Sacrament of Holy Orders has taken in the Roman rite. In order to do this it will be necessary to discuss the meaning of terms and then to investigate the historical evolution of each ordination ritual.

Meaning of Terms

Like many of the words used in the Roman liturgical books, ordinato and ordo have a civil origin, going back even to pre-Christian times.

Ordinatio. This was the technical term used at imperial Rome for the act of appointing civil functionaries to office. It was natural enough that the Roman Christians should borrow a familiar word to signify the appointment of ecclesiastical functionaries, of which the highest and most important are those involved in liturgical functions. So in time the word was limited to describe the rite of consecration to liturgical office or the sacred ministry.

“Ordination” is used by St. Jerome at the beginning of the 5th century as the Latin synonym for the Greek cheirotomia, the laying on of hands (Commentarium in Isaiam 16.58.10; Patrologia Latina 24:569); in time the word came to embrace all ordinations. Nowadays, the term simply means to ordain or promote to any order. Ordinatio became the term referring to the consecration of bishops as well as the promotion to priesthood and deaconship; the Roman Martyrology still speaks of “Ordinatio Sti Ambrosii Episcopi” for example. The Pontifical has substituted Consecratio for ordinatio in this case, but since the episcopate is the summit of Holy Orders and its source, we must include episcopal consecration in this study.

Ordo. Order is likewise a term that originally belonged to the Roman civil vocabulary, where it was used to designate a definite social body distinct from the plebs, or people—such as the Senate (ordo clarissimus), or the knights (ordo equestrianus), or the group that made up the governing body in any city (ordo civicus). Since the word had no pagan religious associations, Christians did not hesitate to adopt it to express the special place the clergy had within the people of God. Thus Tertullian uses it to describe the body of the clergy as set apart from the people (De exhortatione castitatis 7; Patrologia Latina 2:9222); the Theodosian code made it official by speaking of the ordo ecclesiasticus (Cod. Theodosianus 16.5.26).

The first step in the adaptation of the word to ecclesiastical use was to make it designate the whole body of the clergy. From that to using it to designate the different degrees into which the clergy was divided was a natural step. So we have the ordo presbyterii and the ordo episcoporum.

It is important that the word always had a collective sense in the usage of the ancient Church; a man did not so much receive an order as he was received into it and entered into it, as we say today that a man enters into the Society of Jesus, or is received into the Franciscan Order.

History of Ritual

In studying ordinations in the Roman rite different approaches are possible. The best seems to be to trace the historical origin and development and see how it took the form it has today, for the modern rite is the product of a long development in which a multiplicity of rites and formulas have accumulated around the original simple liturgical action. To look into the history of this development is to make the meaning of the essential rite stand out in higher relief.

New priests receive the Eucharist during their ordination at St. Vitus cathedral, Prague. (©Liba Taylor/CORBIS)

The modern ritual for the conferring of the Sacrament of Holy Orders is contained in the Pontificale Romanum (see PONTIFICAL, ROMAN). Until the 9th century the prayers and formulas to be used in conferring Holy Orders were found in the Sacramentaries, which contained the celebrant's prayers for Mass and other Sacraments and sacred rites. The ceremonies or actions that together with the words made up the sacred rites were contained in another book called the Ordinal. During the 9th and 10th centuries someone conceived the idea of putting both prayers and actions together in the one volume for greater convenience. The first compilation of this kind, or at any rate the most successful, originated at Mainz between 950 and 982. It became known as the Pontificalis ordinis liber, because of its content, and the Roman-Germanic Pontifical, because of its origin. This book, with an ordination ritual already more developed than that in the Sacramentaries that preceded it, was accepted at Rome in the 11th century, where it was adapted to the use of the Roman court during the following centuries. William DURANTI the Elder (d. 1296), a civil lawyer who had become bishop of Mende, recast it and adapted it still more for his own use. This Pontifical was revised and approved for use at Rome in 1486; after further revision it was imposed on the Latin Church in 1596. The Roman Rite of Ordination emerged from the one in Duranti's Pontifical.

Consecration of a bishop. Since the episcopate is the fullness of the priesthood, we begin with it; then treat the other major orders—priesthood and diaconate, as well as a brief look at the now suppressed subdiaconate and other minor orders.

Ancient Roman Ritual: 3d to 5th Century. One of the oldest rites of episcopal consecration in existence is described in the Apostolic Tradition drawn up about the 3rd or 4th centuries (2–4; B. Botte, La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution 4–16). The rite is simplicity itself. The neighboring bishops assemble with the local clergy and people on a Sunday. With the consent of those present these bishops impose their hands on the elect, while all pray silently, invoking the Holy Spirit. Then one of the bishops is asked to place his hands on the head of the elect and recite the consecratory prayer. These are, therefore, two distinct IMPOSITIONS OF HANDS: one in silence and once accompanied by the consecratory prayer. The prayer calls down the Holy Spirit upon the elect that he may shepherd the flock and fulfill the office of priesthood (sacerdotium) in a blameless manner, offering sacrifice, and forgiving sins. After the prayer all exchange the kiss of peace with him and “salute him who has been made worthy.” The deacons then place the offerings upon the altar and the newly ordained bishop celebrates the Eucharist at once.

The ritual described in the Apostolic Tradition has been maintained in the East with slight modifications; but at Rome it fell into disuse, and another more elaborate form was adopted perhaps as early as the middle of the 5th century. At any rate we encounter the main prayers of the present rite in slightly modified form in the LEONINE SACRAMENTARY (Veronese) (946, 947; Mohlberg 199).

Consecration at Rome: 6th to 9th Centuries. Two forms of episcopal consecration are described by the Roman Ordinal, and they differ considerably from one another. One is the form for the consecration of the bishop of Rome, the pope, by the bishops of the neighboring sees, the other is that conferred by the pope himself upon those chosen for these neighboring sees. The man chosen to be bishop of Rome in these early centuries was often not a bishop at the time of his election. He was therefore consecrated at St. Peter’s, and his ordination was the joint action of the suburbicarian bishops; the bishop of Albano says the first prayer (the Collect Adesto), the bishop of Porto the second (Propitiare). Then the deacons hold the open book of Gospels on his head while the bishop of Ostia says the prayer of consecration. The archdeacon places the pallium upon the new bishop, who then ascends his throne, gives the kiss of peace to the priests, and intones the Gloria (Ord. Romanus 40A and 40B; M. Andrieu Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge 4:297, 307–308).

However, when the pope consecrated bishops for one of the dioceses of central Italy, he conferred the episcopate without the assistance of coconsecrators. The reason for this seems to be that the pope as chief bishop is considered to embody the ordo episcopalis, which in ordinary consecrations is symbolized by the presence of three bishops.

On the eve of his consecration the candidate for the episcopal office is examined by the pope in the presence of all the clergy. The consecration itself takes place on Sunday. During the Gradual of the Mass the elect goes to the sacristy, where he is vested in dalmatic, chasuble, and sandals by the archdeacon, the acolytes, and subdeacons. They then escort him back to the church, where the pope presents him to the people and invites all to join in a prayer for the elect. The Litany of the Saints is sung while the pope, the bishop-elect, and clergy lie prostrate before the altar. “When the Litany is completed,” Ordo 34 says, “let them arise and let him [the pope] bless him” (40; M. Andrieu, Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge 4:613). The blessing consists of the pope placing his hands on the elect and reciting the prayer of consecration given in the Sacramentaries. This prayer is already much longer than the one given in the Apostolic Tradition and completely different from it. Then the consecrator gives the kiss of peace to the new bishop, who in turn gives it to the other bishops and to the priests. When that is over, the pope seats him in the first rank of the bishops. At the Communion of the Mass he receives the manual of episcopal functions from the consecrator. The new bishop communicates by receiving a portion of the consecrated bread and at the same time sets aside enough for 40 days so that he may receive Communion during the time from the bread consecrated during the ordination Mass. By order of the pope he then gives Communion to the people.

Romano-Gallican Ritual: 9th to 15th Centuries. Between the ancient Roman rite of episcopal ordination, even in the somewhat developed form just described, and the modern episcopal consecration there is a vast difference. This is the result of the elaboration made by the Romano-Gallican ritual, an elaboration made by the Romano-Gallican ritual, an elaboration completed by the innovations of Duranti (M. Andrieu, Le Pontifical Romain au moyen-âge 3:311–320). The ritual of consecration underwent considerable development and addition both in the formularies used and in the individual rites that go to make up the whole. First of all the name was changed from ordinatio episcopi to consecratio electi in episcopatum. It is beyond doubt that in time this contributed to thinking of the ordination of a bishop as in another class from that of a priest, instead of what it really is, the crowning and culmination of Holy Orders. An examination of the bishop-elect was introduced into the rite after the Collect and the ancient Roman consecration prayer expanded. In fact, the Romano-Germanic Pontifical transforms the ancient ordination prayer of the Roman rite into a consecratory Preface after the model of the Preface of the Mass, even to the dialogue at the beginning (ibid. 1:147).

The most striking innovation made in the Romano-Gallican ritual was the introduction of the anointings. While the old Roman rite was content to ask that God sanctify the elect with the dew of heaven by anointing, the new rite from beyond the Alps has the consecrator interrupt the prayer at this point to pour sacred chrism on the head of the elect, with the formula, “ungetur et consecretur caput tuum. . . .” This was obviously an attempt in true Gallican style to give visible expression to the words of the prayer (it was probably influenced by the contemporary practice of anointing the head of the king at his coronation). After the preface the new ritual also added the anointing of the thumbs; the 13th century papal Pontifical extended this to the whole hand (ibid 2:361). At first this anointing of the hands was done only when a man went directly from the diaconate to the episcopate; it was not repeated if the candidate was already a priest.

According to the ancient Roman tradition, the bishop-elect presented himself for ordination already invested in the insignia of his office. But outside of Rome the procedure was different; Isidore of Seville (d. 636) attests to the practice of giving the new bishop his ring and staff as symbols of his jurisdiction and his spiritual powers during the ceremony (De ecclesiasticis officiis 2.5.12; Patrologia Latina 83:783–784). The 12th-century papal Pontifical introduced the custom of handling the Gospel Book with the admonition to go and preach to the people committed to his care (Le Pontifical Romain au moyen-âge 1:150).

Duranti in his turn added the words Accipe Spiritum Sanctum to the imposition of hands, the singing of the Veni Sancte Spiritus during the anointing of the hands, enthronement of the bishop, and finally the singing of the Te Deum at the end of the rite (ibid. 3:382, 383, 389–391).

The ceremony of the placing of the opened Gospel Book upon the head of the bishop-elect makes its appearance for the first time in a 6th-century Ordinal (Ordo Rom. 40 A. 5; Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge 4:297). At first this was confined to the episcopal consecration of the pope, but in the Gallican lands it was extended to all consecrations. The custom itself is quite ancient; it came from the East, where it is mentioned in the ritual of the 4th century Apostolic Constitutions (8.4.6; F. X. Funk, ed., Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum 1:473).

Ordination of priests and deacons. The essential part of this ceremony, the imposition of hands accompanied by a variable but appropriate consecratory formula, has been a liturgical constant throughout history. However, the surrounding ceremony has passed through three stages of development just as the ritual for the consecration of bishops.

First Stage: The Primitive Roman Ritual. This is also contained in the Apostolic Tradition (7–8; La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte 20–26). The ordination takes place in the presence of the presbyterium and the assembly of the faithful during the Sunday celebration of the Eucharist. It follows the Prayer of the Faithful. For both priests and deacons ordination consists of two elements: (1) the laying on of hands, and (2) the prayer of consecration.

The bishop and all the priests present lay hands on the man who is to be ordained to the priesthood. The bishop prays that God may impart the Holy Spirit to him so that he may help and govern God’s people with a pure heart. Only the bishop lays hands on the candidates for deaconship because, as the Apostolic Tradition says, he is ordained not for the priestly office but to assist the bishop in a special way. The prayer said over the ordinand asks that God will give him the Holy Spirit “of grace, solicitude and industry” so that he may serve the Church and minister at the altar in such a way that he may deserve to be promoted to a higher rank, the priesthood. The bishop is still allowed considerable freedom in the formulas to be used. He may extemporize a formula using the given text as a model, “so long as the prayer is correct and orthodox.”

Second Stage: 6th to 9th Centuries: The rite described in the 7th century Sacramentaries and Ordinals took form during the 6th century. The sources for this second stage are the earlier Sacramentaries and the Ordo Romanus 34 (M. ANDRIEU Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge 3:601–613).

First of all came the election of the ordinands by the clergy and the ratification of this choice by the people. Then on Monday in the Ember Week of December those to be ordained were called together by the pope; in his presence they swore an oath that they had not committed any of the crimes that would exclude them from ordination. On Wednesday they attended the pope’s Mass. During the Mass a lector read the names of the candidates for priesthood and deaconship and then said the words still found substantially in the Roman Pontifical at the beginning of the ordination, only today they are spoken by the ordaining prelate: “If anyone has anything against these men, let him speak up” (Ordo Rom. 36.9; Les ‘Ordines Romani’ du haut moyen-âge 4:196). The same proclamation was made again on Friday.

The ordination began Saturday afternoon at St. Peter’s. After the Gradual the pope called the ordinands to his throne and designated the church each priest and deacon was ready to serve. Then those to be ordained deacons, already dressed in the dalmatic, the sign of their future rank, stood with bowed heads before the pope; he invited all to prayer, and while the Litany of the Saints was sung, the ordinands prostrated on the floor. When the litany was finished, the pope placed his hands on the head of each one and blessed him (Ordo Rom. 36:18; Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge 4:198). This blessing included the prayer Exaudi Domine and the consecratory prayer Deus honorum dator. Then he vested the ordinands with the chasuble over the dalmatic and gave them the kiss of peace, which they in turn gave the others and then took their place beside him.

The ordination to the priesthood followed the same pattern except that the ordinands already wore the chasuble. The blessing was of course proper to the ordination to priesthood. When the pope ordained he alone imposed hands; if any other bishops ordained, the other priests present came forth and imposed hands after him. The new priests took their places in the first rank of the priests. At Communion they received the Eucharist first and, like the new bishops, had to set aside enough for 40 days' Communion.

What is immediately striking here is the extreme simplicity of the ancient Roman rite of ordinations, even though there has been some development over that recorded in the Apostolic Tradition. There is a minimum of signs (action and words), and those are extremely clear and well defined.

The Roman-Gallican Ordination Rite: 9th to 15th Centuries. The third and final stage represents a complete transformation from the ancient simplicity to an extreme complexity. This transformation was the result of the fusing of the Roman ritual with that of the Gallican ritual of ordination, a fusion reached in the 10th-century Mainz Romano-Germanic Pontifical. This new composite rite reached Rome about the year 1000 and in the course of the 13th century was further modified by the additions of Duranti. What we have today is therefore the Romano-Gallican ritual as amended by Duranti.

In the new ritual for the ordination of priests the bishop first enquired about the fitness of the candidate and tested his willingness to receive the priesthood and remain in it and obey the bishop. After the prayer of consecration, Emitte quaesumus, the new priest was clothed in priestly vestments (stole and chasuble) with appropriate formulas. The prayer Deus sanctificationum was added to the ancient Roman prayers. Some scholars believe that this added prayer was the essential formula of the older Gallican ritual before it was fused with the Roman rite. The new priest's hands were anointed with holy oil and he was presented with the chalice and paten containing the wine and the bread. The words Accipe potestatem accompanied this traditio instrumentorum. The ordination concluded with the special blessing Ut sitis benedicti in ordine sacerdotali now given at the end of Mass.

There is a different emphasis in this new rite. While the ancient Roman ordination prayer emphasized the fact that the newly ordained entered the presbyterium and became the coworker of the bishop, the new addition underscored the doctrine of the sacrificing priesthood and saw the priest primarily as celebrant of the Mass. While something could be said in favor of these innovations taken singly, the general effect in the eyes of discriminating people was to burden heavily a rite that had already departed considerably from the simplicity and sobriety of the ancient Roman ritual.

All these additions had entered into the Frankish service books in the course of the 9th century from various sources. The anointing of the hands, for example, appeared for the first time in the Missale Francorum (6th–7th century) that originated in Poitiers (8.33; Mohlberg 10). At first chrism was used for this anointing, but by the 13th century the oil of the catechumens had replaced the chrism, at least in Rome. The present custom was definitely fixed by Duranti. The presentation of chalice and paten containing unconsecrated bread and wine, which caused so much discussion among theologians in later times, arose during the 9th century in Gallican lands. It was accepted by the Mainz Pontifical in 950 and from that passed into all subsequent Roman books.

From Duranti come most of the rites added at the end of the present ordination Mass: the antiphon Jam non dico vos, the recitation of the Apostles' Creed, the final imposition of hands with Accipe Spiritum Sanctum; quorum peccata retinueris . . ., the unfolding of the chasuble, the promise of reverence and obedience, and the final admonition Quia res quam tracturi estis. Concelebration by the newly ordained with the bishop comes from the 13th century. Although Duranti spoke only of a silent optional concelebration, the present practice was already established in the 13th-century Pontifical of the Roman Curia.

The ordination to the diaconate underwent a parallel development to that of the priesthood in the medieval Romano-Gallican ritual. Like the priests, deacons were clothed in the vestments of their office after the prayer of consecration; they received the book of the Gospels as the symbol of their office as heralds of the Gospel. The ordination ended with the prayer Domine sancte spei fidei . . ., which is found originally in the Missale Francorum (7.26; Mohlberg 7); it may have been the consecration prayer of the old Gallican ordination rite.

In the modern ritual of ordination of diaconship is found once again the influence of Duranti. He added to what was in the Romano-Gallican ritual, modified it, and changed it in many details. He added the opening instruction on the duties of deacon. He made the already existing prayer of consecration into a preface like the Preface at Mass, with introductory dialogue and Vere dignum. Moreover, he introduced the formula Accipe spiritum sanctum.

Subdiaconate. Here again we have a rite that from original simplicity reached great elaborateness, until its suppression by Pope Paul VI in 1972. Until the later part of the 12th century, in fact, the subdiaconate was considered a minor order, and so the ritual for the ordination of subdeacons was almost like that for minor orders. Thus, according to the Apostolic Tradition (13; La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution 32) he received no imposition of hands but was simply nominated to assist the deacon. In the 6th century we find that there was a ritual for his ordination consisting of the delivery of an empty chalice (John the Deacon, Epist. ad Senarium 10; Patrologia Latina 59:405). Then the 8th-century Roman Ordinal 34 says that he first took an oath that he had not committed any crime that would bar him from orders. Upon this he received the chalice and the same blessing that was given to the acolytes (Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge 3:604).

Like the other ordination rituals, that for subdeacons was more fully developed in the Gallican lands. There the 6th-century apocryphal document known as the Statutua Ecclesiae Antiqua inspired the Frankish Sacramentaries and their ordination rituals. We find that in the Gallican rite the archdeacon presents the subdeacon with a cruets of water and towel, in addition to the chalice presented by the bishop. The Missale Francorum (6.17; Mohlberg 5) is the first to provide a formula to go with the giving of the chalice; it is much longer than the modern form, though it begins with the same words Vide cuius ministerium tibi traditur . . . . The Romano-Germanic Pontifical has a developed rite similar to that for the ordination to minor orders.

The changes in the rite made during the 13th century had as their obvious purpose to give more dignity to the subdiaconate. Again most of these changes were the work of Duranti, who either invented or popularized the investiture with amice, tunic, and maniple; composed the instruction about the liturgical duties of the subdeacon; and inserted the delivery of the Epistle book. What is more, he advanced the singing of the Litany of the Saints so that it would include the candidates for subdeaconship as well as for deaconship and priesthood.

The effect of all this was to make the ordination of the subdeacon superficially similar to the ordination of priests and deacons. But a closer look at the rite reveals the absence of the imposition of hands and the consecratory preface, which, of course, is what really makes the difference. Strangely enough, Duranti did not include the admonition to observe celibacy. This was added only in the 15th-century Roman Pontifical, long after his time.

Minor orders. The ordination ritual for each of the historical minor orders, before Pope Paul VI suppressed them in 1972, was very simple in comparison with that of the major orders: (1) an admonition concerning the duties of that office, (2) the presentation of the instruments proper to each order together with a formula indicating the power thus conferred, and (3) a concluding prayer begging God's blessing. Nevertheless this ceremonial is a development of the original rite.

While the third prayer of the ancient form of the Solemn Prayers on Good Friday gives the full list of minor orders (with the addition of subdeaconship, which was considered a minor order until the 12th century), the medieval Roman Ordinals speak only of the ordination of lectors, acolytes, and subdeacons—an indication that the other minor orders had fallen into disuse by the middle ages.

Lectors were usually young boys. If a father wanted to offer one of his sons to be a lector, he had to instruct the lad in reading and then propose him to the pope as a candidate. On a prearranged day he was tested by being made to read a selection at the night vigil. If he passed the test he was then and there ordained a lector by what is surely the shortest ordination formula on record. The pope blessed him with the words "With Blessed Peter the Apostle the Blessed Paul the chosen vessel interceding for you, may the Lord save and protect you and bestow a learned tongue upon you" (Ordo Rom. 35.4; Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge 4.33).

Acolytes were ordained during Mass while bishops and priests were distributing Communion to the people. Since their principal function was to carry the Eucharist to the absent and present the consecrated bread to the priests for the fraction of the Host during Mass, the presentation of the sacculum, or little bag to carry the Eucharist, was an important part of the ordination rite. The candidate was first vested in chasuble and stole, then presented to the pope who gave him the sacculum. He received this in his hands, which were covered with the folds of the chasuble. Then he prostrated before the pope, who said the blessing over him (Ordo Rom. 35.8; Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge 4:34).

This ritual for the minor orders was much developed by the Romano-Germanic Pontifical, which also revived the other minor orders that had fallen into disuse, porter and exorcist. Already there was a tradition in the Frankish lands of such ordinations as in the Missale Francorum (2–5; Mohlberg 4). This Gallican ritual was in turn derived ultimately from the famous apocryphal work the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua (Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge 3:615–619), which originated in southern France at the beginning of the 6th century. These Gallican practices found their way into the Romano-Germanic Pontifical and from that into the Roman Pontificals of the Middle Ages. Duranti's only contribution was to enlarge the admonition given at the beginning of the ordination to each order.

Impact of Vatican II. The main impetus for the current reform of ordination rites for bishop, priest, and deacon, as well as the new rites for the institution of readers and acolytes was given by Vatican II. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Dec. 4, 1963, stated (par. 76): "Both the ceremonies and texts of the ordination rites are to be revised." This revision deals with reform of the Roman Pontifical of Pope Clement VIII (d. 1605), promulgated in 1596. As far as ordinations are concerned, this Pontifical remained basically unchanged until the recent reforms.

Prior to the more complete reform of the ordination rites in 1968 there were several intermediate steps. A revised Pontifical was issued by Pope John XXIII on Feb. 28, 1962, in which there were no significant changes. The next was the translation of the liturgical texts into the vernacular, approved by the U.S. National Conference of Catholic Bishops on Aug. 27, 1965, and confirmed by the Apostolic See on July 14, 1967. The vernacular rites of ordination and episcopal consecration were issued by the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, Sept. 12, 1967, in accord with the above authorization. This was simply a translation of the existing rites contained in the then current Pontifical. This edition also included several appendixes containing excerpts from the Ritus Servandus in Celebratione Missae (March 7, 1965), giving the rubrics for concelebration: a shortened Litany of the Saints, translations of the Veni, Creator Spiritus and Te Deum, and two additional Hanc Igitur for episcopal consecration in English translation.

On June 18, 1968, in the Apostolic Constitution Pontificalis Romani Recognitio, Pope Paul VI approved the new rites of ordination for bishop, priest, and deacon and decreed that these rites supercede the ordination rites in the Roman Pontifical. In this decree, Pope Paul stated that "the greatest attention must be paid to the important teaching on the nature and effects of the sacrament of Order which was proclaimed by the Council." The Council document stated that the liturgy should express this doctrine in its own way: ". . . the texts and rites should be drawn up so that they express more clearly the holy things which they signify; the Christian people, so far as possible, should be enabled to understand them with ease and to take part in them fully, actively, and as befits a community" (Const. on Sacred Liturg. 21).

The accomplishment of this aim is evident in the introductory instructions for the ordination rites. In each instance, it is emphasized that the ordination should always take place at a time and place when a large number of the faithful can be present and participate, e.g., a Sunday or holyday. It is also suggested that the sanctuary be so arranged that the faithful may have a clear view of the liturgical rite and participate more fully.

The communal nature of the ordination rite is also highlighted by full participation by all in the exercise of their respective Order. All bishops and assisting priests are encouraged to concelebrate with the principal consecrator, and when a bishop is ordained in his own church the principal consecrator may invite the bishop-elect to preside over the Eucharistic liturgy. In the ordination of priests, the ordinandi are to concelebrate their ordination Mass with the bishop; deacons are also directed to exercise their office in the rite. In all instances, the people are encouraged to participate fully.

Ordination of a bishop. The Mass begins with the traditional procession into the church. The bishop-elect is vested in all the priestly vestments as well as pectoral cross and dalmatic. There is no administration of the oath of allegiance to the Holy See. After the Gospel, the bishop-elect is presented to the principal consecrator by one of the priests. The latter reads the Apostolic Mandate. At the conclusion of the reading, the assembly gives its consent according to local custom (usually applause). The principal consecrator then addresses an instruction to the people, clergy, and finally the bishop-elect. He may use the instruction in the rite or one of his own composition. This instruction, although similar to that found in the Pontificale Romano-Germanicum, is a new redaction reflecting the theology of Orders of Vatican II. Emphasis is given the Church as the people of God, as well as the hierarchal and collegial aspects of its nature. The bishop is to preach the word; form his flock in holiness; lead as one who serves; pray and offer sacrifice for his people; love as a father and brother the priests and deacons, his partners in the ministry, the poor and infirm, the strangers and aliens.

The examination of the bishop-elect is more radically altered. Greater emphasis is placed on the ancient practice of the bishop-elect being examined in the presence of the people. Much of the duplication is eliminated; its content is more scriptural than formerly. There is also greater emphasis upon collegiality and cooperation with the people and the presbyterate.

The litany is preceded by an invitation to prayer in bidding-prayer form. The shorter form of the revised litany is used and it is not interrupted for the special blessing of the bishop-elect formerly inserted in the litany. The litany is concluded with a collect of Gelasian origin.

The rite is further clarified by the introduction of the imposition of hands independently of the imposition of the book of Gospels. The principal consecrator and all the consecrating bishops impose their hands in silence. Only then is the book placed upon the head of the bishop-elect, where it is held by two deacons until the prayer of consecration is completed.

At this point the most radical of the changes takes place. The former prayer of consecration which is of Gallican origin gives way to the ancient prayer found in the Apostolic Tradition. This restores the most ancient of the known consecration prayers in the Church, one which has been maintained continuously in Coptic and West Syrian liturgies. As a result, a more primitive concept of the office of bishop emerges, placing greater emphasis on his role as shepherd-leader among his people.

Another feature of the reform of the consecratory prayer has to do with clarity and emphasis. No longer is there an introductory dialogue and preface; but, more importantly, there is no interruption of the consecratory prayer for the anointing of the head of the bishop-elect. The anointing is delayed until the prayer is concluded. The anointing of the hands of the bishop-elect is omitted entirely, and there is a considerable simplification of the presentation of the episcopal insignia.

After the newly ordained bishop is seated (in a considerably modified ceremony), the concelebration of Mass continues with the liturgy of the Eucharist at which the new bishop, if he be the ordinary, may be invited to preside. There is the traditional blessing of the assembly by the new bishop, a final blessing in the form of a solemn prayer over the people, and the procession from the church.

Ordination of a presbyter. The rationale for the reform of this rite is well stated in the decree Pontificalis Romani Recognitio: “. . . it seemed necessary to restore the entire rite, . . . to greater unity and to express in sharper light the central part of the ordination . . . the imposition of hands and the consecratory prayer.”

The reformed rite is not unlike the ordination of a bishop through the liturgy of the word. The ordination per se begins, after the Gospel has been proclaimed, with the call and presentation of the candidates and the consent of the people.

The first change is found in the instruction to the people and candidates, and the examination of the candidates. Although both have structural origins in the Pontificalis Romano-Germanicum and the Pontificalis Durandi, they are updated to reflect the theology of the presbyterate enunciated at Vatican II. Clear emphasis is given to the unity of the presbyterate with Christ as teacher, priest, and king in the building up of the Church as the people of God, the body of Christ, and the temple of the Holy Spirit. Emphasis is also given to the office to preach the Gospel, to shepherd the faithful, and to celebrate the worship of God as priests of the New Testament. A new element is inserted at this point requiring the examination of the candidate and exacting a promise of obedience. Both have their origin in the Pontificalis Romano-Germanicum and the Pontificalis Durandi.

The reformed litany is introduced and concluded with a type of bidding prayer and collect from the Gelasian and the Verona Sacramentaries. The imposition of hands by the ordaining bishop and the presbyters is done in silence and is followed by a revised prayer of consecration, also of Gelasian origin. Only the words of the conferral of the “dignity of the presbyterate” remain the same. Again, the dialogue and preface are omitted.

Following the consecratory prayer there is considerable simplification: investiture in stole and chasuble does not involve the ordaining bishop; the anointing of the hands is simplified and introduces a new prayer for the anointing, of Gallican origin; and there is no transmission of instruments.

The ordination Mass continues with the liturgy of the Eucharist. Other elements deleted from the reformed rite include the formal profession of faith, the ceremony extending the power to forgive, and the final admonition.

Ordination of a deacon. “In the lower grade of the hierarchy are deacons on whom hands are imposed ‘not for the priesthood, but for the ministry’ [Constitution of the Church of Egypt, 3.2]. Strengthened by sacramental grace, they serve the People of God in the diaconia of liturgy, word, and charity, in communion with the bishop and his presbytery” [Lumen gentium par. 29].

Few changes were made in the ordination rite for deacons. The format follows the changes noted in the rites for bishop and presbyter. Following the proclamation of the Gospel, there is the usual call and election followed by the instruction. This instruction is adapted from that of the Pontificalis Durandi and incorporates elements from Vatican II documents. The examination of the candidates and the promise of obedience are new and quite similar to those found in the ordination of presbyters.

As in the other rites the litany is introduced and concluded with similar prayers of Gelasian origin. The laying on of hands is done in silence and separately from the consecratory prayer; apart from a few deletions, it remains practically the same as the former rite.

The investiture with the stole and dalmatic is simplified and done without accompanying prayers. Only the presentation of the book of Gospels retains a ceremonial action, but with a new prayer from the Pontificale Romano-Germanicum.

The ordination Mass is concluded with the liturgy of the Eucharist, the new deacons fulfilling their Order by assisting the ordaining bishop.

See Also: ACOLYTE; BISHOP (SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY OF); DEACON; DEACONESS; LECTOR; PORTER; PRIESTHOOD; SUBDEACON; TONSURE.

Bibliography: M. ANDRIEU, "Les Ordres mineurs dans l'ancien rit romain," Revue des sciences religieuses 5 (1925) 232–274. B. KLEINHEYER, Die Priestweihe im römischen Ritus (Trier 1962). G. ELLARD, Ordination Anointings in the Western Church before 1000 A.D. (Cambridge, Mass. 1933). W. M. ABBOTT, ed., The Documents of Vatican II (New York 1966), Dogmatic Constitution on the Church Lumen Gentium pp. 14–96; Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy Sacrosanctum Concilium pp. 137–178. J. DESHUSSES, ed., Le Sacramentaire Gregorien, "Spicilegium Friburgense" v. 16 (Fribourg 1971); J. DESHUSSES, Ephemerides liturgicae v. 83 (1969) 3–98; Maison-Dieu 98 (1969) 63–142; 102 (1970). H. LIETZMANN, ed., Das Sacramentarium Gregorianum, Liturgiewissenschaftliche Quellen und Forschungen, heft. 3 (Münster 1921). L. C. MOHLBERG, ed., Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Ecclesiae Ordinis Anni Circuit, Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, series major, fontes 4 (Rome 1960); Missale Francorum, Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, series maior, fontes 2 (Rome 1957). National Conference of Catholic Bishops, The Rites of Ordination and Episcopal Consecration (Washington, D.C. 1967); The Ordination of Deacons, Priests, and Bishops, provisional text (Washington, D.C. 1973). PAUL VI, "Constitution Apostolique 'Pontificalis Romani,'" Maison-Dieu 94 (1968) 179–189; "Ad Pascendum," Pope Speaks 17 (1972) 234–240; "Ministeria Quaedam," Pope Speaks 17 (1972) 257–261. H. B. PORTER, The Ordination Prayers of the Ancient Western Churches, Alcuin Club Collections, no. 49 (London 1967). D. N. POWER, Ministers of Christ and His Church (London 1969). A. M. ROUGET, "Les nouveaux rituel d'ordination," Maison-Dieu 94 (1968) 63–142. P. F. BRADSHAW, Ordination Rites of the Ancient Churches of East and West (New York 1990). J. F. PUGLISI, The Process of Admission to Ordained Ministry: A Comparative Study, 2 vols. (Collegeville, Minn. 1996–99).

[W. J. O'SHEA/J. D. SHAUGHNESSY/EDS.]

ORDINES JUDICIARII

A type of legal literature that flourished from the 12th to the 16th century. The ordines were treatises that described procedure in courts. Although some dealt exclusively with procedure in ecclesiastical courts, it was more common, at least from the 13th century, for them to treat also of civil procedure, according to Roman law and Canon Law. The similarities between the two procedures were more significant than the differences.

Purpose. The ordines were practical in purpose and design. They described, sometimes in extraordinary detail, judicial procedure step by step, from initial citation to final sentence and appeal. Some ordines treated only specific parts of judicial procedure (e.g., the examination of witnesses). The medieval ordines varied considerably in length, from just a single folio to a large folio volume. The distinction between the ordines and other similar works, namely formularies and consuetudines, was not precise. Generally speaking, formularies were collections of forms of instruments used in a legal action. Yet many formularies arranged the forms according to the steps followed in court and, in addition, introduced the forms with rubrics; this made them not wholly unlike many ordines which contained examples of forms. The formularies, however, were of greatest utility to notaries; the ordines, to practicing lawyers. The consuetudines described the procedural practice actually in use in a specific court without references to laws, canons, and authors; the ordines, on the other hand, stated general procedural principles with the usual references, besides including frequent references to regional and local laws and customs.

Important Examples. The earliest extant ordo is probably the very short Excerpta legum edita a Bulgarino causidico, composed before 1140. The Anglo-Norman school of canonists in their notable production of canonical works of great variety during the 12th century was responsible for many ordines (e.g., Ulpianus, Otto of Paris). An anonymous ordo called Ordo iudiciarius Causa II, quaestio I was completed in 1171, probably at Amiens or Reims; and before the end of the same century there appeared the Ordo iudiciarius Bambergensis (c. 1182–85), the Rhetorica ecclesiastica (c. 1190), and other ordines by such canonists as Peter Blois, William Longchamp, Peter de Cadorna, Eilbertus of Bremen, and Ricardus Anglicus. The treatise Actor et reus, a procedural dialogue, was composed in England in the early years of Innocent III's pontificate. Another important and popular ordo was that of TANCRED (c. 1214–16). It underwent many redactions, was translated into French and German, and became the model for subsequent ordines.

Those ordines composed after 1234 took account of the procedural titles in the Decretals of GREGORY IX. Among the extant treatises from this period are those by Gratia of Arezzo (after 1234), Peter Pernerchio (Scientiam, c. 1235–40), WILLIAM OF DROGHEDA (Summa aurea, 1239), Master Arnulph (Summa minorum, c. 1250–54), and the lay canonist GILES OF FOSCARARI (c. 1263–66).

This type of canonical treatise reached its highest peak with the Speculum iudiciale of William DURANTI THE ELDER, in 1272, which underwent redactions, acquired additions, and became the standard procedural treatise for the late Middle Ages. It exercised a commanding influence on the treatises written by John Ur-bach and John Berberius in the 15th century and by Ulrich Tenggler in the early 16th century.

Bibliography: Tractatus universi juris duce et auspice Gregorio XIII, 18 v. (Venice 1584–86). L. WAHRMUND, ed., Quellen zur Geschichte des römisch-kanonischen Processes im Mittelalter, 5 v. (Innsbruck-Heidelberg 1905–31). H. KANTOROWICZ and W. W. BUCKLAND, Studies in the Glossators of the Roman Law (Cambridge, Eng. 1938). S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937). S. KUTTNER and E. RATHBONE, “Anglo-Norman Canonists of the 12th Century,” Traditio 7 (1949–51) 279–358. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Olliteratur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80). A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici, v. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928—), v.1. A. M. STICKLER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:1132–43.

[F. D. LOGAN]

ORDO, ROMAN

Basically a calendar needed for the daily celebration of the proper Mass and Office in use throughout the Roman rite. In a ready, abbreviated format, it not only regulates the annual interplay of the temporal and sanctoral cycles, the fixed and moveable feasts, but it also notes any peculiar rubrics and gives seasonal pastoral reminders as needed. Because of special liturgical offices, local churches and monastic groups may vary from the Roman Ordo. The modern Ordo is but the development of local calendars and priests' rubrical and pastoral directories; it became a necessity after Trent decreed a uniform liturgy.

[R. T. CALLAHAN/EDS.]

ORÉ, LUIS GERÓNIMO DE

Franciscan linguist and bishop; b. Ayacucho, Peru, 1554; d. Concepción, Chile, Jan. 30, 1630. Oré was one of 11 children (four of the boys became Franciscan priests, five of the girls became Poor Clares, and one boy became a diocesan priest), who were educated at home with special instruction in music, both instrumental and vocal. He grew up speaking Spanish, Quechua, and Aymará. After being ordained in Lima on Dec. 31, 1582, Oré first labored in Lima, preaching on Sundays and holydays to the Amerindians gathered in the plaza before the cathedral. He also helped to translate into Quechua the catechism of the Third Council of Lima.

He spent the years 1584 to 1598 as a missionary among the Collaguas people of southern Peru. This experience enabled him to write Símbolo católico indiano (Lima 1598), a synthesis of the material taught to the Collaguas together with many hymns translated or composed by Oré, many of which are still sung today. In 1598 he was appointed vicar of the convent of Lima, and he taught courses in the native languages Quechua and Aymará. This work was interrupted by an invitation from Antonio de Raya, Bishop of Cuzco, to supervise the instruction of the native people in his diocese. Other bishops soon gave him similar powers in Arequipa, La Paz, and Charcas.

In 1604 he went to Rome to present the ad limina report of Bishop Raya to the pope. While in Rome he printed in Latin Conciones per annum (1606), a work that he had prepared earlier in Quechua and Aymará but had not received royal permission to print in those languages. He also published Tratado de indulgentiis (1606) and, perhaps his greatest work, Rituale seu manuale peruanum (Naples 1607). This was intended primarily for the missionary in Peru with a special catechism for confession and Communion. It was printed in Latin, Spanish, Quechua, Aymará, Mochica, Puquina, Guaraní, and Brazilian. The Puquina sections are probably the largest fragments of that language still extant.

Preparing to return home from Spain, Oré received news of the death of Francis Solano (1610) and was charged with the task of collecting information in Spain for his cause. By 1613 the task was finished and published as Relación de la vida y milagros del Venerable P. Fray Francisco Solano (Madrid 1614). It remains the best source on the life of Francis before he left Spain.

In 1614 Oré led a group of Franciscan missionaries to Florida to inspect the Franciscan missions there and in Cuba. He organized the Franciscan province of Florida and moved the provincial's residence and the novitiate from St. Augustine to Havana. This novitiate was probably the first institution of its kind within the present limits of the United States. On his return to Spain in 1618, Oré published Relación de los mártires de la Florida. Shortly thereafter the king named him bishop of Concepción (formerly La Imperial), Chile. He was consecrated in Lima in 1621, and arrived in his see the next year. His diocese was in a deplorable condition since it had been vacant for 14 years, and native rebels had dominated the region of Osorno and Valdivia for 20 years, cutting communications between the northern and southern parts of the diocese. Oré visited his diocese three times, began a seminary, and energetically promoted the conversion of the indigenous tribes while protecting their rights through laws drawn up in a diocesan synod. He willed his fine library to the Franciscan friary in Concepción.

Bibliography: L. G. DE ORÉ, The Martyrs of Florida, 513–1616, ed. and tr. J. M. GEIGER (New York 1937), also in Franciscan Studies 18 (1936), whole issue.

[A. S. TIBESAR]

Dedication of St. Mary's Church, Mount Angel, Oregon c. 1912.
(©CORBIS)

OREGON, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Oregon lies on the shores of the Pacific Ocean, surrounded by Washington, Idaho, Nevada, and California. Originally part of the Oregon Country, Oregon became a territory in 1849 and a state in 1859. Salem is the capital, and Portland the most populous city. Ecclesiastically, the state is divided, with the Archdiocese of PORTLAND (until 1928, Oregon City) in the western part of the state, covering 29,717 square miles, and the Diocese of Baker (until 1952 Diocese of Baker City) on the eastern side, covering 66,826 square miles.

Early History. Jointly occupied by Great Britain and the U.S. between 1818 and 1846, Oregon was the home of explorers and fur traders, most of whom were in the service of the Hudson's Bay Company. The Catholic French-Canadians, former employees of the company, who during the 1820s and 1830s settled in the Willamette Valley, south of the Columbia River in the area called French Prairie, desired priests to serve them. At the suggestion of Dr. John McLoughlin, company director at Fort Vancouver, they petitioned Msgr. Joseph PROVENCHER, Vicar Apostolic of the Red River country in Canada, for Catholic missionaries, and on Feb. 28, 1836, the Holy See placed the Oregon Country under his care. Unable to accept, he forwarded the petition to the bishop of Quebec, and on April 17, 1838, Francis Norbert BLANCHET was named vicar-general to the ordinary of Quebec with jurisdiction over the vast Oregon territory. At the same time, another young priest of Quebec, Modeste Demers, was appointed to assist Blanchet.

The two priests arrived at Fort Vancouver on Nov. 24, 1838, and began their missionary activities among the French-Canadians and Native Americans. Pioneers at French Prairie had already constructed a small log church in 1836, in which Blanchet celebrated the first Mass on Jan. 6, 1839, after blessing it under the title of St. Paul the Apostle. This mission was Blanchet's most important one, and served as his headquarters during the formative years. Other missions established by Blanchet and Demers were Fort Vancouver, Cowlitz, Oregon City, and Fort Nesqually. In 1842 the missionaries were joined by two priests from Quebec, Anthony Langlois and John Bolduc, who labored for several years in Oregon.

Almost simultaneous with these beginnings was the activity of Pierre J. DE SMET, SJ, among the Native Americans in the Rocky Mountain area and the far eastern part of the Oregon Country. After his initial appearance there in 1840, he returned to St. Louis, Mo., to obtain help for the western missions. He then set out again for Oregon and arrived at Fort Vancouver on June 8, 1842, where he was welcomed by Blanchet and Demers. During De Smet's short stay at Vancouver, the three priests carefully surveyed the entire mission situation of the Pacific Northwest and decided that great possibilities existed, but that many coworkers, supplies, and finances were necessary. They further resolved to petition the bishops of Quebec, St. Louis, and Baltimore for the establishment of the hierarchy in the Oregon Country. De Smet, chosen to go East and then to Europe to procure all the help possible, departed June 30, 1842.

Beginning in 1842, a tide of American immigration flowed toward Oregon from the eastern states, increasing the population so rapidly between 1843 and 1845 that McLoughlin (who had become a Catholic in 1842) petitioned the bishop of Quebec to obtain English-speaking and American priests for Oregon. When a shortage of American priests prohibited this, it was left to European missionaries to care for Oregon. Meanwhile, De Smet reached Europe, recruited a small band of priests and nuns, and returned to Fort Vancouver in August of 1844 with five Jesuits and six Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur.

St. Francis Xavier Mission was established as Jesuit headquarters near the Willamette River adjacent to St. Paul, and the sisters opened schools at St. Paul and Oregon City.

First Ordinary, 1846–80. When the entire Oregon Country was erected a vicariate apostolic on Dec. 1, 1843, Blanchet was named vicar, but word did not reach him until November of 1844. The bishop-elect then departed for Montreal, where he was consecrated on July 25, 1845. Hoping to obtain more missionary help for Oregon, Blanchet spent the next years in Europe, seeking personnel and funds. During this time, he persuaded the Holy See to erect his vicariate into an ecclesiastical province, and on July 24, 1846, the Archdiocese of Oregon City and two suffragan sees, Walla Walla and Vancouver Island, were established. The creation of the U.S.'s second ecclesiastical province at this time and place was considered in some quarters to have been premature and unwise.

The new archbishop returned to his see in August of 1847 with the funds collected in Europe and with 21 missionaries, including eight priests and seven sisters. The future was promising, for the Native American missions were prospering and heavy American immigration to the area had prompted expansion of facilities at St. Paul, Oregon City, and other missions. During the next decades, however, governmental interference in the Native American missions, incessant wars with the tribes, and unfounded accusations against Catholic missionaries, practically ruined the mission work among the natives. Moreover, the discovery of gold in California prompted a mass exodus southward, including a majority of the Catholics at St. Paul and Oregon City. French Prairie almost became a ghost parish and the Jesuits and the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur terminated their diocesan endeavors and went south, where the need was greater. The clergy dwindled to seven, arriving Americans were largely non-Catholic, and debts left from the building expansion remained to cripple the see for several years.

In the mid-1850s the situation improved somewhat when the archbishop's personal tour of South America for financial help aided in reducing the debt. The Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary arrived in 1859 from Montreal and reestablished Catholic education; European volunteers increased the ranks of the clergy; and the city of Portland began to grow. The American Catholics strengthened the parish of the Immaculate Conception, founded by Rev. James Croke in 1851, and it became the center of the struggling archdiocese. In 1862 Blanchet transferred his episcopal residence from Oregon City to Portland. Immaculate Conception became the pro-cathedral, remaining such until 1928, when it became the actual cathedral with the change in seat of the archdiocese. John F. Fierens succeeded Croke as rector, and Portland's Catholicity made noteworthy progress during his 30-year pastorate. The diocesan newspaper Catholic Sentinel was begun in 1869; more Catholic schools were opened and several Catholic societies were founded in the 1870s; and St. Vincent Hospital was established in 1875.

The size of the archdiocese was reduced considerably on March 3, 1868, when the Holy See created the Vicariate of Idaho, making the eastern boundary of Oregon the boundary of the archdiocese. In 1878 increasing disability led Blanchet to accept a coadjutor, Bp. Charles SEGHERS of Vancouver Island; in 1880 the archbishop resigned, and three years later died in Portland, after 64 years in the priesthood.

Seghers and Gross. Seghers succeeded to the see on Dec. 20, 1880, but directed its affairs for only a short time, resigning in 1884 to return to Vancouver Island. In his brief term, however, he had made many missionary journeys in Oregon and helped the Benedictines establish an abbey at Mount Angel. On Feb. 1, 1885, Bp. William GROSS, CSSR, of Savannah, Ga., succeeded Archbishop Seghers.

In his 13 years as metropolitan, Gross directed many efforts of Catholic expansion, especially in education. In 1886 he founded the Sisters of St. Mary for teaching in diocesan schools. Before his death on Nov. 4, 1898, he had succeeded in bringing to the archdiocese additional religious help, including the Christian Brothers, Dominican Sisters, Sisters of Mercy, and Sisters of the Good Shepherd. He directed the relocation in 1898 of St. Mary's Pro-cathedral from the business section of Portland to a site in a residential area.

Twentieth-Century Developments. Alexander Christie, of Vancouver Island, was appointed Feb. 12, 1899, as fourth archbishop of Oregon City. His 25-year episcopate coincided with a revival of commerce and immigration in Oregon, and he met the challenge of increased population by establishing new parishes, churches, schools, and other institutions. Significant among these was Columbia University, later renamed the University of Portland, which opened in 1901. Another boundary change of the archdiocese came in 1903 when the Diocese of Baker City was erected with jurisdiction over Oregon territory east of the Cascade Mountains. Christie's last years were marked by the controversy over the so-called OREGON SCHOOL CASE involving a state law of 1922 designed to force all children up to 16 to attend public schools. The archbishop died on April 6, 1925, the same year that the U.S. Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional.

On April 30, 1926, Bp. Edward D. Howard, auxiliary bishop in Davenport, Iowa, was appointed to succeed Christie. Since parishes, population, and religious and educational institutions had increased greatly during the period from 1875 to 1925, the new archbishop dedicated himself to organization and consolidation of diocesan functions. Although Bp. Blanchet had moved the episcopal residence to Portland in 1962, the diocese was still known officially as the Archdiocese of Oregon City. It was during the time of Archbishop Howard that it became officially designated as the Archdiocese of Portland. He supervised the erection of chancery offices, established new parishes, promoted the liturgical movement, centralized the school system under a superintendent's office, created the Catholic Charities organization to coordinate all social and charitable works, established new schools, notably Central Catholic High School in Portland, developed the catechetical ministry through the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, and made a concerted effort to encourage vocations to the priesthood. Howard's administration was marked by a threefold increase in the Catholic population from 61,036 in 1926 to 186,560 in 1963, with the number of clergy increasing from 174 to 430, and the addition of 23 parishes.

In 1966 at the age of 89 Archbishop Howard retired (he died at the age of 105). Howard had attended all the sessions of the Second Vatican Council but it was the task of his successors to implement it. Some of the resistance that they encountered in the Archdiocese of Portland was also felt in the diocese of Baker. The two dioceses collaborated in a number of endeavors, and in the 1970s they formed the Oregon Catholic Conference as a Catholic public policy organization for the state.

Education. Catholic education in Oregon had its beginnings at St. Joseph's College, an elementary school for boys, in St. Paul on Oct. 17, 1843. The next year the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur started a girls' school in St. Paul and later in Oregon City. Loss of population and teachers during the Gold Rush forced the discontinuance of all Catholic schools by 1853. Archbishop Blanchet personally went to Quebec in 1859 to recruit 12 volunteers from the Sisters of the Holy Names. With the advent of new religious groups in Portland during the Gross, Christie, and Howard administrations, both elementary and secondary schools increased. Catholic education developed more slowly and differently in the Baker because of the vast area and scattered population. The Baker diocese relies more on parish religious education programs rather than on a Catholic schools, in the years after Vatican II the number of schools declined in both dioceses.

Catholic higher education began when Gross convinced the Benedictine Monks to open Mount Angel College in 1887 and a seminary in 1889. The college was discontinued in 1946, but Mount Angel Seminary continued to serve dioceses and religious communities. The Holy Names school, St. Mary's Academy and College in Portland, empowered to grant degrees in 1893, became the first Northwest liberal arts college for women. In 1910 the school moved near Lake Oswego and in 1930 was renamed Marylhurst College. Closed in 1974, the college re-opened that fall as a private, nontraditional, co-educational college for adults, becoming a university in 1998. Columbia University opened in 1901 as a boys' prep school, and in 1902 the Holy Cross priests bought the campus. Fully collegiate in 1927, the institution became the University of Portland in 1935. The school became coeducational in 1951.

Although Catholics are the largest single religious group in Oregon, they are a distinct minority. In 2001 Catholics numbered 324,020, about 10 percent of the state's population of 3.2 million.

Bibliography: L. M. LYONS, Francis Norbert Blanchet and the Founding of the Oregon Missions, 1838-1848, Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History 31, 1940. E. V. O'HARA, Pioneer Catholic History of Oregon, 4th ed. (Paterson 1939). W. B. BAUMAN, Catholic Contributions to Oregon History (Mt. Angel, Ore. 1959). C. B. BAGLEY, ed., Early Catholic Missions in Old Oregon, 2 v. (Seattle 1932).

[F. M. CAMPBELL/P. BRANDT]

OREGON SCHOOL CASE

The Oregon School case (Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510), handed down in 1925 by the U.S. Supreme Court, upheld the right of parents to control the education of their children when it declared unconstitutional a law that would have made attendance at public schools mandatory.

Background of the Oregon law. The attempt to divest parents of their right to control the education of their children grew out of the May 1920 resolution of the Masons of the Scottish rite of the southern jurisdiction advocating “. . . the free and compulsory education of the children of our nation in public primary schools. . . .” The procedural plan adopted by the proponents of this move bypassed legislative action. It was decided to have a direct vote of the people on the measure through use of the initiative procedure. Accordingly, in a spectacular one-day campaign under the direction of the Scottish-rite Masons of Oregon, sufficient signatures were obtained to place on the ballot for the general election in November of 1922 an initiative measure to compel children between the ages of eight and 16 to attend the public schools of Oregon.

Any doubt concerning the sponsorship of the initiative measure was dispelled by an advertisement in Oregon newspapers by P. S. Malcolm, Inspector General of Oregon Scottish-rite Masons, stating that the anti-private school measure was sponsored by the supreme council, Scottish rite for the southern jurisdiction of the U.S., the grand lodge of Oregon, and the imperial council of the nobles of the mystic shrine (Catholic Sentinel, Aug. 3, 1922).

Arguments against passage of the initiative measure were filed with the secretary of state by Catholic organizations, Seventh-day Adventists, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Presbyterians, principals of private schools, and a citizen taxpayer association. The lone argument in behalf of the measure was filed by the Scottish-rite Masons.

Those opposing the measure argued that: (1) The title was deceptive to the extent that the measure is described as a compulsory education law. Compulsory education was already a part of the law of the state together with the regulation of private schools. (2) The proposal would deprive the schools and teachers of their property rights under the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. (3) Parents would be deprived of religious liberty, that is, the right to rear and educate their children in accordance with the dictates of conscience.

The Masonic argument was based on the following propositions: (1) "Our nation supports the public school for the sole purpose of self-preservation." (2) "The assimilation and education of our foreign-born citizens in the principles of our government, the hopes and inspiration of our people, are best secured by and through attendance of all children in our public schools." (3) "We must now halt those coming to our country from forming groups, establishing schools, and thereby bringing up their children in an environment, often antagonistic to the principles of our government." (4) "Mix the children of the foreign-born with the native-born, and the rich with the poor. Mix those with prejudices in the public school melting pot for a few years while their minds are plastic, and finally bring out the finished product—a true American." (5) "The permanency of this nation rests in the education of its youth in our public schools, where they will be correctly instructed in the history of our country and the aims of our government, and in those fundamental principles of freedom and democracy, reverence and righteousness, where all shall stand upon one common level." (6) "When every parent in our land has a child in our public schools, then and only then will there be united interest in the growth and higher efficiency of our public schools." (7) "Our children must not under any pretext, be it based upon money, creed or social status, be divided into antagonistic groups, there to absorb the narrow views of life as they are taught. If they are so divided, we will find our citizenship composed and made up of cliques, cults and factions each striving, not for the good of the whole, but for the supremacy of themselves. A divided school can no more succeed than a divided nation."

This attack on private schools was not limited to the state of Oregon. Similar legislation was pending in Michigan and California and threatened in Washington, Indiana, Nebraska, and several other states. Throughout the country, newspaper editorials alerted the people to the widespread nature of the proposed legislation.

In Oregon a bitter campaign ensued. Newspaper headlines shouted the divided and bitter feelings of the people. The New York Post underscored an important element in this controversy, namely, that the KU KLUX KLAN was actively supporting the initiative measure.

The combination of forces opposed to parochial schools was sufficient to give the proposal a 15,000 plurality and it became law. By its terms it would become operative in 1926.

Struggle in the courts. Opponents of compulsory attendance in public schools turned to the courts for redress. At this juncture the bishops of the U.S. entered the contest through the recently formed National Catholic Welfare Conference. The St. Louis Progress reported that the Bishops' Committee met in Chicago and the "outstanding result of the gathering was the unanimous decision to get behind a test of the Oregon school law in both State and Federal Courts with all of the moral, spiritual and financial aid necessary, and to use every legitimate means to secure the law's repeal" (Jan. 25, 1923).

In addition to financial aid, the NCWC, through its press department, gave wide coverage to all aspects of the Oregon law and created a national awareness of its implications. The education department and other departments of the NCWC prepared a series of pamphlets on the law, the rights of parents in the education of their children, and the traditional understanding of the Constitution. This material not only aroused the country but, in the words of Father John Burke, General Secretary of the NCWC, "intelligently guided it."

In 1923 legal action was initiated in the Federal District Court to test the constitutionality of the Oregon law. In the same year the Supreme Court rendered a decision in the case of Meyer v. Nebraska (262 U.S. 390), which had a very important bearing on the Oregon school law litigation. The Meyer case was an important precedent for the decision in the Pierce case.

Meyer v. Nebraska precedent. The Nebraska statute provided that no foreign language could be taught in the nonpublic schools of the state. It was enacted in an atmosphere of hostility to private schools—the same legislature having come within one vote of adopting a law that would have forced all children to attend public schools. The Supreme Court of Nebraska upheld the constitutionality of the law, and an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the U.S.

In the course of the oral argument an interesting colloquy took place between Mr. Arthur Mullen, attorney for the plaintiff, and Mr. Justice McReynolds. Mr. Mullen argued very forcefully that the Nebraska legislation involved more than a denial of the property right of the teachers. He indicated that in the last analysis the legislation was directed at the right of the parents to send their children to private schools. At this point Mr. Justice McReynolds interposed, saying: “How did they abolish private schools? Did the State prohibit private schools?” Replying, Mr. Mullen observed: “I say, your Honor, that they could no more abolish private schools than they could—” Mr. Justice McReynolds broke in: “I just wanted to see what you claim. What about the power of the State to require the children to attend the public schools? . . . You will admit that, will you not?” Mr. Mullen’s reply was clear and definitive: “I do not admit that. I deny that a State can, by a majority of the legislature, require me to send my child to the public schools.”

He then proceeded to develop the proposition that the parental right is within the liberty guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. In conjunction with this argument, Mr. Mullen observed that there was a close connection between the exercise of the parental right and freedom of religion. In a colloquy with Chief Justice Taft, he argued that the liberty that is guaranteed by the 14th Amendment includes religious freedom. Mr. Mullen, in taking this position, laid the basis for the eventual argument that the right to send children to a parochial school rests not only on parental right but also upon religious freedom.

Paradoxically, the justice who intimated that the state had a right to ban all private schools wrote the opinion for the court invalidating the Nebraska statute. In the course of his opinion, he stated: “[Plaintiff’s] right . . . to teach and the right of parents to engage him so to instruct their children, we think, are within the liberty of the [14th] Amendment.”

He observed collaterally that, among other rights, the 14th Amendment includes the right to the free exercise of one’s religion. Admittedly, this was not the primary basis for the decision. It rested on the property right of the teacher and the right of parents whose children attended the schools in question. Nevertheless, this was the first time in the history of the Supreme Court that the parental right to educate was even obliquely associated with religious freedom. It was a decision that broke new ground and provided a fertile field for the growth of principles establishing the right to educate.

The Court’s recognition of the parental right and its association of religious liberty with this right represented a tremendous victory, for at the time of this decision private education had its back to the wall. Many states had adopted legislation similar to the Nebraska law. Others were considering or, as in the case of Oregon, had passed laws banning all private schools, and these laws were not originating in legislatures. Through initiatives and referendums the people themselves were waging a war against private schools. The decision of the Supreme Court in the Nebraska case was the beginning of the end of this movement. The Nebraska case had an immediate impact on the Oregon School case by establishing persuasive precedents for the legal arguments of the plaintiffs.

The Federal District Court. Judge John Kavanaugh, appearing for the Sisters of the Holy Names, called the Federal District Court’s attention to the Nebraska case and said: “It leaves nothing, your Honors, to be said upon the question. They have recognized the private school, they have upheld its rights.” In addition to developing the institution’s rights, Judge Kavanaugh commented extensively on the parental right. For example, in his oral argument to the Court, he stated:

Now people in this country have certain natural and inherent rights. Those rights existed before constitutions were made, and those rights will exist after constitutions are dissolved. They are not created by the constitution, but they are secured by the constitution; and among these rights are the inherent and the natural right of a parent to direct the education of his own child in a private school that conforms to all of the regulations of the state.

The attorney who appeared as the representative of the Scottish-rite bodies, and Governor Walter M. Pierce, argued that the Oregon law was well within the police power of the state, since the state had the right to control education. He also contended that the corporations that brought the action could not rely on asserted rights of parents.

The Federal District Court ruled that the Oregon law was unconstitutional. In so holding it declared: “The absolute right of these schools to teach in the grammar grades, . . . and the right of the parents to engage them to instruct their children, we think, is within the liberty of the Fourteenth Amendment.” And on the institutional right the court asserted:

Compulsory education being the paramount policy of the state, can it be said, with reason and justice, that the right and privilege of parochial and private schools to teach in the common school grades is inimical or detrimental to, or destructive of, that policy? Such schools and their patrons have the same interest in fostering primary education as the state, and appropriate regulation will place them under supervision of school authorities.

Governor Pierce of Oregon announced that the state would appeal the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court. The issue thereupon became a national one.

The U.S. Supreme Court. In order to ensure the best possible representation before the court the services of William Guthrie were retained. Associated with him in the defense of the parochial and private school interests were Judge Kavanaugh of Portland, Ore., and Garret McEnerney of San Francisco, Calif. In addition to the briefs filed by these attorneys, briefs amicus curiae were filed by the Episcopal Church, the Seventh-day Adventists, and the American Jewish Committee, all of whom argued that the Oregon law was unconstitutional. The general tenor of these briefs is reflected in the following excerpt from the brief of the Seventh-day Adventists: "These natural rights [of parents] have been protected by every Bill of Rights declared in any government at any time and are always spoken of as existing, but never as bestowed by government."

The brief of Mr. Guthrie effectively demonstrated that the issues at stake were the maintenance of religious liberty, the inviolability of the parental right against state encroachment, and the institutional right to the protection of its property. A strong brief emphasizing the property rights of private schools was filed by Mr. John C. Veatch on behalf of the Hill Military Academy, one of the plaintiffs in the action.

The attorneys for the state showed a keen appreciation of the arguments predicated on the parental right. An attempt was made to demonstrate that the rights of parents were not violated but that the law merely represented a harmonization of the respective interests of the state and parents. However, in the conclusion of the state's brief, its basic position was stated in the following words: "The necessity for any other kind of school than that provided by the state has ceased to exist. The public school is everywhere recognized as being an institution vital to the welfare of the individual citizen, and to that of the state and nation" (Oregon School Cases, Complete Record, p. 200).

At the outset of the oral argument before the Court, Justice McReynolds put the main issue in focus when he stated to the Attorney General, Mr. Willis S. Moore: "You understand that the sharp issue presented here is whether the State can require a child to go to the public school." Mr. Moore agreed that this was the critical question and then proceeded to argue that the people have the right, in the exercise of the police power, to enact laws requiring all children to attend public schools and that the "limitations of the power are primarily with the people." At this point the Chief Justice suggested that this power is subject to the limitations of the Constitution. The attorney general replied that, since education was a power reserved to the states under the 10th Amendment, the limits of law rest primarily with the people.

Guthrie, in his oral argument, stated that of all the interests invaded, "First and foremost, the law involves the sacred right of parents in the discharge of their duty to educate their children." He then proceeded to point out that manner in which rights of the children, the teachers, and the institutions were violated. All these issues, he stated, involved the maintenance of basic liberties to such an extent that if these rights were denied, the day would come when men would no longer be able to enjoy those "sacred rights which free men cherish and free governments are established to maintain and secure."

Judge Kavanaugh, in the concluding argument, demonstrated that the private schools had complied with all state regulations and that this law was not in the nature of regulation but of destruction. He emphasized that it deprived the institutions of valuable property rights without due process of law.

Within three months the Supreme Court rendered its decision, unanimously holding that the Oregon law was unconstitutional. Justice McReynolds, writing for the court, stated on June 1, 1925:

Under the doctrine of Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, we think it entirely plain that the act of 1922 unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control. As often heretofore pointed out, rights guaranteed by the Constitution may not be abridged by legislation which has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the state. The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the state to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only. The child is not the mere creature of the state; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations. [268 U.S. 534]

Continuing, he pointed out that the schools had been deprived of their property without due process of law. In this connection, Justice McReynolds observed that the appellee corporations “. . . have business and property for which they claim protection. These are threatened with destruction through the unwarranted compulsion which appellants are exercising over present and prospective patrons of their schools. And this Court has gone very far to protect against loss threatened by such action” (268 U.S. 535).

It is significant to observe that the Supreme Court's decision rested not merely on the property right of the plaintiff corporations. The most important aspect of this decision is the recognition and application of the right of parents to control the education of their children. From the beginning of the controversy to the final decision, this was the predominant argument of those opposing the Oregon school law. From the first arguments filed with the secretary of the state of Oregon challenging the initiative measure, up to and including the final oral argument, reference was constantly made to the proposition that the fundamental freedom at stake was the inalienable right of parents to oversee their children's education.

Reaction and influence. Within a few days, 490 major editorials were published in 44 states commenting favorably on the decision. Nor was this attitude sectional. The attitude of the press in the South, where the Klan had its origin and where Masonry was strong, was uniformly laudatory.

The articulation of the principle of the parental right in education has had a strong influence on the growth of the nonpublic school system in this country and has been cited in many countries throughout the world in defense of educational freedom. Pius XI in the encyclical Christian Education of Youth gave explicit approval to the Supreme Court's decision. It had more than a little influence on the formulation of Article 26(3) of the United Nations' Declaration of Human Rights providing that: "Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children."

Bibliography: Oregon School Cases: Complete Record (Baltimore 1925). N. G. MCCLUSKEY, Catholic Viewpoint on Education (Garden City 1959). J. T. TINNELLY, "The Right to Educate: The Role of Parents, Church, State," National Catholic Education Association Bulletin 55 (1958) 35-46. L. PFEFFER, Church, State and Freedom (Boston 1953) 510-519. P. G. KAUPER, Civil Liberties and the Constitution (Ann Arbor 1962). J. C. BRUNNER A Critical Analysis of the Development of Arguments Against Nonpublic Schools from the Oregon School Case to 1960 (Washington 1960). C. F. ZOLLMANN, American Church Law (St. Paul 1933).

[G. E. REED]

O'REILLY, BERNARD

Second bishop of Hartford, Conn.; b. Columkille, County Longford, Ireland, 1803; d. at sea, Jan. 23, 1856.

He studied at Grand Seminaire, Montreal, Canada, and St. Mary's College, Baltimore, Md., before his ordination in October of 1831. He did parish work in Brooklyn and Rochester, N.Y., until 1847, when he became vicar-general of the new Diocese of Buffalo, N.Y. In 1850 he was named to succeed William Tyler as bishop of Hartford. After his consecration at Rochester on November 10, the new bishop concentrated his efforts on obtaining more clergy for a territory served by only seven priests and five churches. In 1851 he brought the Sisters of Mercy into his diocese and courageously protected them from attack by a Know-Nothing mob. He went to Dublin, Ireland, the following year and brought back a number of priests. During his episcopate, he provided the diocese with 34 new churches, 14 new schools, three orphan asylums, and St. Mary's Seminary, Providence, R.I., which he founded in 1851. It was on a trip to Europe to seek the help of the Brothers of the Christian Schools that O'Reilly was drowned, when his ship, the Pacific, sank with all aboard.

[J. L. MORRISON]

O'REILLY, EDMUND

Archbishop of Armagh; b. Dublin, 1606; d. Saumur, France, March 1669. O'Reilly was educated and ordained (1629) in Dublin, where he also did parish work. In 1633 he went to the Louvain, where he studied under the Jesuits and Franciscans before his appointment as prefect of Irish secular priests and seminarians resident at the Louvain. O'Reilly returned to Ireland in 1641. He supported the Irish rebellion, serving as governor of Wicklow (1642). Archbishop Thomas Fleming of Dublin appointed him vicar-general and apostolic administrator (1642-48) while Fleming was at Kilkenny, seat of the Catholic Confederation. O'Reilly's sympathies were with the independence faction of the rebels, and he opposed any truce with the royalist James Butler, Marquis of Ormond, who sought Irish aid against the English parliamentary forces. Fleming replaced O'Reilly as vicar-general in 1649 but restored him in 1650. In 1653 O'Reilly was arrested, imprisoned, and charged with a murder that had occurred while he was governor of Wicklow. He was tried (Sept. 6-7, 1654), found guilty, and pardoned; finally, he left Ireland. O'Reilly fled to Lille, where he received his appointment as archbishop of Armagh, although he did not receive the pallium until 1657. He attempted to return to Ireland by way of London, but fearing possible arrest in England, O'Reilly returned to France. It was not until 1659 that he reached Ireland, where he remained until the Stuart restoration (1661). The Spanish ambassador in London accused O'Reilly of anti-Stuart activities, and for this Pope Alexander VII recalled the primate to Rome (1661–65), where he appears to have vindicated himself. In 1665 O'Reilly visited Ireland and attended the national synod held in Dublin (1666). His opposition to the pro-English activities and remonstrance of Father Peter WALSH angered Ormond, who imprisoned the primate for three months. O'Reilly, exiled once again, went to France, where he died.

Bibliography: A. F. POLLARD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 14:1140–41. R. BELLINGS, History of the Irish Confederation and the War in Ireland, 1641–1649, ed. J. T. GILBERT, 7 v. (Dublin 1882–91). E. CURTIS, A History of Ireland (6th ed. New York 1951). R. BAGWELL Ireland under the Stuarts, 3 v. (London 1909–16).

[P. S. MCGARRY]

OREMUS

Latin for “Let us pray.” In the Roman rite it is commonly used by the officiating minister to invite the attention of the faithful to certain prayers of the Eucharist and the Liturgy of the Hours (e.g., the Collect, the Lord’s Prayer), and other liturgical functions. Ordinarily in the Roman rite, the prayer of the officiating minister follows immediately upon the Oremus; and this rule is prescribed by the earlier Roman ordinals, such as the Ordo Romanus I (ed. M. Andrieu, no.53). Traditionally on Good Friday, the celebrant adds to the Oremus a clause specifying the intention for which he invites prayer. The Oremus was followed by Flectamus genua (Let us kneel) and a period of silent prayer. Levate (Rise) was then pronounced, and the celebrant recited his prayer in the name of all.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 1:366–370. A. FORTESCUE, The Mass (New York 1912) 247–248.

[E. J. GRATSCHE/EDS.]

ORGAN, LITURGICAL USE OF

While ancient writers clearly indicate that the organ played an important part in the ceremonial life of the people of the ancient world, little is known about the early form of the organ prior to the instrument known as the hydraulus, generally attributed to the Greek engineer Ctesibius, active in Alexandria c. 250 B.C. The organ pipe itself and a primitive form of wind-chest, in which the flow of air from the common supply to the pipes was controlled by a system of wooden slides, was known much earlier; the unique feature of the hydraulus was the system of maintaining steady wind through the use of hydraulic pressure. For its time the hydraulus was an ingenious and almost perfect device. Complete details of its construction are given by Vitruvius (A.D. 60) and Hero of Alexandria (A.D. 120). Although the organ continued to increase in size during the first few centuries of the Christian era, we know very little else about the organ of this period except that its outstanding feature seems to have been its loudness. St. Jerome (400) mentions an organ in Jerusalem so loud that it could be heard nearly a mile away at the Mt. of Olives. By the 4th century, wind was being supplied by bellows. In 951 a very large organ was built for Bishop Elphege in the cathedral at Winchester. With its 400 pipes of bronze, 26 bellows, and two sets of 20 keys, each key controlling ten pipes, it is reputed to have taken 70 men to maintain the wind supply and two organists to play it.

“Salve Regina,” 1512, organ music from “Tabularuren etlicher Lobgesang,” by Arnolt Schlick.

Although it is not known exactly when the organ was first used for religious purposes, the writings of St. Julian of Toledo, a Spanish bishop, indicate that it was in common use in the churches of Spain by the year 450. We know that in the 7th century Pope St. Vitalian (666) introduced the organ in Rome in order to improve the singing of the congregation. As an aid to the introduction of Roman Rite into the churches of France, Pepin (714–768), the father of Charlemagne, ordered an organ from the Byzantine emperor Constantine Copronymus and had it installed in the church of St. Corneille at Compiègne (757). Charlemagne also received a similar instrument from the Eastern Emperor in the year 812, and a copy of the instrument at Compiègne placed at Aix-la-Chapelle c. 811 is reputed to have been the first organ in Germany. Apparently the art of making and using organs developed rapidly in Germany in the latter half of the 9th century, for in the year 880 Pope John VIII requested Anno, Bishop of Friesingen, to send him a good organ and, along with it, a competent player to instruct Romans in the art.

Although the organ has never been prescribed for use in the Roman Catholic Church by canon law, it has apparently been used in the Church consistently since the 9th century. By the 13th century the organ was certainly in general use throughout the Latin Church and thus was deeply involved in the development of the musical and liturgical tradition of the Church. Many of the important liturgical books refer to the organ frequently, and the fact that, though never specifically prescribed, it is assumed to be present and an important aid to the liturgy is seen by the frequent instructions of the Church that direct that it shall be played at specific times. The high esteem in which the Church holds the organ is perhaps best summarized in the following excerpt from Vatican Council II: "The pipe organ adds a wonderful splendor to the Church's ceremonies, and powerfully lifts up men's mind to God and to higher things."

Bibliography: M. PRAETORIUS, Syntagma musicum, 3 v. (v.1 Wittenberg 1614–15; v.2, 3 Wolfenbüttel 1619), fac. ed. by W. Gurlitt (Kassel 1959– ). M. MERSENNE, Harmonie universelle, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1636–37), Eng. tr. R. E. CHAPMAN (The Hague 1957) v.3. F. BÉDOS DE CELLES, L'Art du facteur d'orgues, 4 pts. in 2 v. (Paris 1766–78) fac. ed. by C. MAHRENHOLZ, 4 v. (Kassel 1934–36). W. ELLERHORST, Handbuch der Orgelkunde (Einsiedeln 1936). W. L. SUMMER, The Organ: Its Evolution, Principles of Construction and Use (3d ed. London 1962). W. H. BARNES, The Contemporary American Organ (7th ed. Glen Rock, N.J. 1959). C. SACHS The History of Musical Instruments (New York 1940). D. J. TARRANT et al., eds., Proceedings: Symposium Liturgy and Architecture (Clarke College, Dubuque, Iowa 1964). J. E. BLANTON, The Organ in Church Design (Albany, Tex. 1957). B. SONNAILLON, King of Instruments: A History of the Organ (New York 1985). P. WILLIAMS, The Organ in Western Culture, 750–1250 (Cambridge 1993).

[L. I. PHELPS/EDS.]

ORGANICISM

In general, organicism refers to the theory that everything is essentially organic, vital, dynamic, or processlike in character. More specifically, in medicine, organicism suggests that each bodily organ has its own dynamic unity, and consequently every disease is associated with a structural lesion of the organ. In biology, organicism states that the individual dynamic system running through the entire organ is equivalent to the life principle. The organicistic theory is meant to serve as a mediator between vitalism on one hand and MECHANISM on the other. Defenders of organicism insist that LIFE in general and all the specific life processes are manifestations of a basic function or operation made possible only because of the autonomous organization of the whole system. Negatively expressed, the individual components of the living system cannot explain life.

In social thought, organicism suggests that it is most fruitful to interpret societies, large and small, as individual, living, grouplike entities. Again the most significant feature of these organic groups is their dynamic, vital, processlike structure. A social group must be viewed as an intermingling process of ideas, beliefs, goals, drives, and wants. Like every other living being, a society goes through the processes of birth, growth, death, and decay. Each social entity has its own peculiar moods, patterns, likes, dislikes, passions, and attitudes.

Concerning theological matters, the organicists argue that all religious truths and beliefs must be seen as living, changing, and relative to the problems of the time. That is, while religious convictions grow and change, the more important ideas remain only relatively stable and of greater or lesser importance depending on the needs of the people and the entire social situation.

In contemporary philosophy, the theory of organicism has undergone rigid development and detailed application in the writings of A. N. WHITEHEAD. The impact of this concept on Whitehead's thinking can be seen in the fact that the word process plays a key role in the title and the development of his work Process and Reality, in which he sets out to explain the "philosophy of organicism." Many of the basic terms in his philosophy, such as experience, creativity, actual entity, concrescence, prehension, event, and ingression are indicative of the importance that the concept of organic process has in his philosophy.

Whitehead argues that an organicistic interpretation will give a clearer understanding of God, man, and the universe in general and will aid in repudiating some of the more serious contemporary philosophic inadequacies. Specifically, a philosophy of organicism will rekindle trust in speculative philosophy, help question the belief that language is an adequate expression of thought, enable man to see the errors in faculty psychology, encourage criticism of the subject–predicate form of expression, and aid in repudiating sensationalism as well as the Kantian idea that the world is a construct.

Bibliography: A. N. WHITEHEAD, Process and Reality (New York 1929).

[M. J. FAIRBANKS]

ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM

A distinction must be made between the life and teachings of Origen himself and the teachings, in part not strictly his, ascribed to him by later followers and opponents. Hence the first part of this article deals with Origen himself and the second with the influence of his teachings and of doctrines ascribed to him in the centuries following his death.

Origen

Surnamed Adamantius (man of steel or diamond), Origen was the principal theologian of the early Greek Church; b. probably Alexandria, 184 or 185; d. probably Tyre, 253 or 254.

Life. The main details of Origen's life are preserved in a panegyric by St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, in Eusebius of Caesarea (Hist. eccl. 6), and in several writings of St. Jerome. Of a Christian family, the oldest of seven children, Origen was taught profane and sacred literature by his father, LEONIDES, and may have been a student under CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. Under Septimius Severus in 202 Leonides was decapitated as a martyr, but Origen, despite his desire for martyrdom, continued his studies; at 18 he opened a school of grammar to support his family. Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, entrusted him with the instruction of catechumens, and he courageously assisted many of his students who were martyred. He gave up his grammar school to concentrate on CATECHESIS and devoted himself to an austere life. With more zeal than wisdom he took Mt 19.12 literally and mutilated himself.

Entrusting his colleague Heraclas with the catechumens, Origen gradually gave his main attention to the Christian formation of the more advanced group; and in order to answer the objections of learned pagans and heretics, as well as for direction in the study of the Scriptures, he followed courses in philosophy given by Ammonius Saccas, the father of NEOPLATONISM. Porphyry witnesses this in his Contra Christianos, cited by Eusebius. But there is still some doubt whether it is the Christian Origen whom Porphyry calls a disciple of Ammonius Saccas in his Life of Plotinus and whom Proclus cites.

Origen did acquire a considerable philosophical education, which he utilized in his teaching. He began to write between 215 and 220, aided by a rich convert named Ambrose, who furnished him with secretaries and copyists; the Peri Archon was one of his first books. He also journeyed to Rome and to Arabia (Jordan) at the invitation of the governor. He left Alexandria in 215 during the reprisals visited on the city by Emperor Caracalla and apparently spent two years in hiding at CAESAREA IN CAP-

Origen. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

PADOCIA, living at the expense of the virgin Juliana (Palladius, Hist. Laus. 64); he then visited Palestine, where Bps. Theoctistus of Caesarea and Alexander of Jerusalem invited him to preach, though he was still a layman. This action elicited the protest of his own bishop, Demetrius of Alexandria. Mammaea, the mother of the Emperor, had him sojourn in Antioch c. 224 to inform her about the Christian religion. Called to Greece in 230 for a discussion with heretics, he passed through Palestine and was ordained a priest by Bishop Theoctistus. On his return to Alexandria he was banished by Bishop Demetrius, who called two synods to censure his ordination as illicit.

Leaving his catechetical school to Heraclas, Origen began to teach at the school of CAESAREA IN PALESTINE (231 to 233), where one of his disciples was GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, who spent five years with him and wrote a panegyric (On Gratitude to Origen) in which he described Origen's program and pedagogical method. Origen preached frequently, and only toward the end of his life were his homilies, with his permission, taken down by stenographers and published. He also composed commentaries on the Scriptures and wrote his Contra Celsum. He journeyed to Arabia to bring Bp. BERYLLUS OF BOSTRA back to orthodoxy and to combat the Thne-topsychites, the sect that proclaimed the mortality of the soul before the Resurrection. It was probably there that he engaged in a dialogue with Heraclides, who was accused of MODALISM, the verbatim report of which was discovered in Egypt in 1941. He spent some time in Cappadocia with his disciple FIRMILIAN OF CAESAREA, stopped at Nicomedia and wrote a Response to JULIUS AFRICANUS, and was in Athens for several months in 240. The persecution of DECIUS put an end to his multifarious activities in 250, when he was imprisoned and tortured; but he confessed the faith with fortitude. He was cruelly kept alive in the hope that he could be forced to apostatize, but on the death of the Emperor he was set free. His health was broken, however, and he died at 69. His grave was still visible in the cathedral of Tyre during the 13th century.

Writings. A man of virtue and genius with prodigious capacity for work, Origen left a large corpus of writings of which only part has been preserved in Greek or in the Latin versions by RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, JEROME, and others. The question of the exactitude of the translations, the authenticity of numerous fragments preserved in exegetical CATENAE, and citations in later writers have given rise to many literary problems. The most trustworthy quotations are preserved in the Apologia of PAMPHILUS of Caesarea and the Philocalia of Origen, the latter a selection of his thoughts published by SS. BASIL and GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS.

Scriptural Exegesis. Origen's ambition was to be an interpreter of the Scriptures. The majority of his works are exegetical, and the Bible holds a principal place in all his writings. To furnish Christians with a valid text of the Scriptures in their discussions with the Jews, he constructed his Hexapla of the Old Testament, a work composed in six columns containing the Hebrew text both in Hebrew and in Greek characters and the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the SEPTUAGINT, and Theodotion, in which he uses diacritical marks to indicate divergences in readings. For certain OT books he added three further translations and, in his Tetrapla, probably edited four versions without the Hebrew. Only fragments of this gigantic labor remain. In his letter to Julius Africanus he discusses the canonicity of the story of Susanna.

Kinds of Exegetical Works. Origen's exegetical works are of three kinds. (1) Scientific commentaries, of which four have been partially preserved: on John (in Greek), Matthew (in Greek and an anonymous Latin version), the Song of Songs, and the Epistle to the Romans (in Latin by Rufinus). Numerous fragments of his on Genesis, the Psalms, Lamentations, the Major and Minor Prophets, and the Pauline Epistles also have survived. (2) His homilies preached at Caesarea, Jerusalem, Athens, and elsewhere include those on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges, and 1 Samuel (in the Latin version by Rufinus); on the Song of Songs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and St. Luke (in Jerome's translation); a homily in Greek on the Pythoness of Endor; 20 homilies in Greek on Jeremiah, the majority translated by Jerome; and numerous fragments. (3) Finally, the scholia, or short exegetical notes, now lost in the mass of fragments. The most complete list of his works, without being exhaustive, however, was made by Jerome in his Letter to Paula (Epist. 33), which was omitted in many manuscripts and was unknown to earlier editors of Jerome's letters. It was rediscovered c. 1845.

Method of Exegesis. Origen's literary, critical, grammatical, and historical explanations of scriptural passages are innumerable, but the literal sense of a text is the basis for his spiritual interpretation; he believed in the historicity of a pericope even when he gave it an allegorical interpretation. Sometimes, however, he admitted that a "corporeal" meaning was nonexistent. At times Origen dealt with figurative or anthropomorphic passages and referred to the "materiality" of a metaphor as the literal meaning, in contradistinction to the modern practice of considering the literal meaning to be the sense intended by the original author. Sometimes he dealt with passages that were incoherent in the Greek text or that posed difficult exegetical problems of which he was fully aware but did not always have the means of resolving. Occasionally, he failed to consider the literal, literary, psychological, or historical context or displayed an exaggerated subtlety; but these instances are rare in relation to the whole of his works.

The literal sense, according to Origen, was not the reason for which the Holy Spirit had given the Scriptures to the Christians. The juridical and ceremonial prescriptions of the Law had been abolished by Christ, and the historical narratives in themselves are worthless for the spiritual director and pastor. The true sense willed by the Holy Spirit is the spiritual sense, which Origen found in the New Testament and earlier tradition and of which he is the great proponent.

Christ is the center of history. The Old Testament is revelation only insofar as it is a prophecy related to Christ. In each of the OT characters, narratives, and prescriptions, the interpreter will find the image of Christ or of the Church, the realities of the New Covenant, and particularly the Sacraments. The first coming of Christ still retains its prophetic character; it brought about an eschatological accomplishment that is as yet only incompletely possessed, "as in a mirror or an enigma," but the desire to possess it completely is felt by the Christian. The "gospel in time" is identical in substance (hypostasis) with the "eternal gospel" of beatitude; it only differs by reason of epinoia, or the imperfect manner in which men contemplate and possess it.

It is thus that Origen expresses the essential fact of Christian sacramentalism. The spiritual sense, then, foreshadows future blessings and determines for the faithful their comportment in the interval between the two parousiai, or comings, of Christ and brings them celestial gifts according to the measure of their spiritual ascension or development. In this vision of the world on two planes—that of symbol and that of mystery, which he borrowed from Platonism—Origen describes the sacramentalism of the New Covenant and the symbolism essential to any true knowledge of God.

Hardly understood by historians between the Renaissance and modern times, this type of exegesis is, except for certain bizarre developments and doubtful procedures, an essential element of Christian teaching. But Origen, along with the majority of Fathers, may be criticized on two points. Although they were correct in concluding that the Holy Spirit is the author of Scripture, they did not pay sufficient attention to the human author; accordingly, they could not resolve the difficulties arising on this score, although Origen himself was fully aware of them. In his opinion it did not become the Divine Dignity to have dictated even one useless word; hence under the most insignificant detail or pleonasm some intention of the Holy Spirit had to be discovered. It is thus that the artificiality of certain particular interpretations arose, despite the profundity or beauty of a commentary as a whole. They are frequently introduced by an etymology or an arithmetic symbolism, a procedure that is Biblical as well as Hellenic in origin. Origen's spiritual exegesis forms a complex whole; but from the schema outlined above, one can see that other influences—rabbinical, apocalyptic, Philonian, Hellenic, and Gnostic—were operative.

Spirituality. Origen's spiritual teaching, everywhere present in his exegesis, makes him the creator of a spiritual theology. Mystical theology occupies a large place in his commentaries on John and on the Song of Songs; but in his later works, written as a priest, he was more attentive to the practical aspects of the Christian life than he was in those written in Alexandria. The Exhortation to Martyrdom, addressed to Ambrosius during the persecution of Emperor Maximinus the Thracian, betrays one of the constants in the life of Origen, the spirituality of martyrdom. The Treatise on Prayer, which is preserved in Greek, contains, among other things, the first methodical explanation of the Our Father.

The moral and ascetical doctrine of Origen is worthy of careful study, for it can render service in the attempt to clarify the origins of MONASTICISM. A thesis regarding spiritual combat pervades his ANTHROPOLOGY and his ANGELOLOGY: the soul, the seat of free will and of the personality, is fought over by the spirit (pneuma, spiritus, including grace and participation of the Holy Spirit) and the flesh. The soul is divided into a superior part, the organ of contemplation and virtue, which is called intelligence (nous, mens) or the dominant faculty (hēgemonikon, principale cordis), and an inferior part, which corresponds in a certain measure to concupiscence. In this battle man is solicited by both good and evil angels to follow Christ or Satan.

On many points Origen possessed an integral doctrine, which is not outlined in systematic fashion but is dispersed at the hazard of his exegesis: on martyrdom, virginity and chastity, mortification, etc. Virtues are the names (epinoiai) given to Christ and identified with him as pertaining to His very substance. He who possesses them participates in the divine nature. But human beings only receive them through the humanity of Christ, which is His "Shadow"; here below man has only the "shadows" of virtue.

Mysticism and Mystery. Many of the great themes of mystical literature go back to Origen. In his commentary on the Song of Songs; instead of the traditional, ecclesial interpretation given to this allegory, he sees the soul of the Christian as the spouse of Christ and closely relates the individual with the collectivity of Christ's body, the Church. The Ascent of the Mountain prefigures a spiritual ascension through prayer and virtue: as on Mt. Tabor the divinity of Christ appeared more and more in His transfigured humanity.

In order for the Incarnation to produce its effects in an individual, Jesus has to be born in him by Baptism and grow there, as He will if the subject gives Him the opportunity by leading a virtuous life. Among those making progress five spiritual senses develop: sight, which uncovers divine realities; hearing, which lets the words of God be heard when He reveals the meaning of the Scriptures interiorly to the soul; touch, which allows one to examine the flesh of the Word; smell and taste, which express the delicacies of knowledge—a connaturality that increases with the ascension of a soul dedicated to perfecting its immediate knowledge of the divine. Such is the object of the charism of Wisdom, of which one effect is spiritual DISCERNMENT. The source of this connaturality is in the creation of the soul according to the IMAGE OF GOD, who is the Word; only the similar can know the similar.

The object of this knowledge is Mystery: the mysteries of visible and invisible realities, or of the relations in the Trinity, all of which are recapitulated in the person of the Son, the Image of the Father, containing the intelligible world, insofar as wisdom is concerned, the ideas and reasons for all things. Perceived in this light, which the divine Persons freely communicate, mystery is a nourishment, transforming the soul to the true nature of mystery, which is supernatural; it is a wine rejoicing in a "sober drunkenness," which exalts conscience and liberty. For understanding, which is an encounter of two liberties, includes at once passivity and activity: divine grace does not lay hold to man despite himself, in an ecstasy that would be a kind of divine folly; inconscience or lack of understanding is a sign of diabolic possession.

Knowledge is given in meditation on Scripture and requires the renouncement of sin and the world, as well as purity of heart. Faith is its necessary principle; but with faith the object becomes present; it is seen and touched without an intermediary: to comprehend and to love are confounded in union. The "esotericism" with which Origen is often reproached is common to all the mystics: it is not necessary to give someone something he can comprehend; otherwise revelation will be useless to him and could even prove to be an evil. To accuse him of spiritual snobbishness, one would have to ignore the continual exhortations contained in his homilies urging all Christians to make progress in their spiritual knowledge. It is necessary to call attention likewise to the profoundly affective devotion Origen has for the person of Christ, which is so similar to that of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. Evidence of his own personal mystical experience is rare, for Origen speaks little of himself; but it is sufficiently explicit.

Speculative Theology. Origen's speculation, like his spiritual doctrine, is inseparable from his exegesis. He ignores distinctions into branches or categories in the knowledge of God. For this his commentaries and homilies are the sources, particularly his masterpiece, the Commentary on John; then the tract On the Resurrection, and the Stromateis, of which we have but fragments; the Treatise on First Principles (Peri Archon); and finally his last work, which is entirely preserved in Greek, the Contra Celsum, a vast, apologetic tract that refutes step by step the True Discourse of the philosopher Celsus. This discourse of Celsus was the most serious attack in the intellectual realm that Christianity had ever experienced; it was considered still pertinent by the freethinkers of the 19th century who discovered in it so many of their anti-Christian arguments. In Origen's rebuttal the essential proof for the divinity of Christianity is the profundity and multitude of the moral conversions it brought about.

Fidelity. The fidelity of Origen to the rule of faith as known in his day cannot be doubted; and if he is occasionally mistaken in his pursuits, it is on points that were clarified only later. But his work gives a handle to incomprehensions or obtuseness, for it is scarcely systematic, not even in the Peri Archon. Docile most frequently to the scriptural text on which he is commenting, he tries to attain the unknowable mystery by many different approaches, some of them antithetic. This is why he should not be studied except in the totality of his work; one cannot draw a definite conclusion from a text isolated from the rest of his writings. His is a theology of research, modestly making use of hypotheses, suppositions, attempted explanations; and one is not fair to Origen if he transforms these into affirmations of dogmas of the faith.

Origen can be explained by the heresies he combats. Facing the Marcionites he sustains both the goodness of God the Creator, who is one with the Father of Jesus, and the agreement of the two Testaments, as well as the value of the Old Testament. Against the Valentinians he defends FREE WILL and personal responsibility, the refusal of recognition of a PREDESTINATION by nature. Against the Modalists he defends the personality of the LOGOS; and against the Adoptionists, His eternal GENERATION. Against the Docetists, he defends the true humanity of Christ as a condition for the Redemption. Against anthropomorphic tendencies, CHILIASM, and the literalists in the Church he defends the spirituality of God, the soul, and final beatitude, as well as the abolition of the Jewish law by Christ. One cannot reproach him for not having foreseen later heresies, as his detractors try to do; or for employing with an orthodox intention—as can be proved from other passages in his works—formulas that later came to have a heterodox sense.

The philosophy of Origen underlying his doctrines and his vocabulary is Middle PLATONISM, a mystical Platonism mixed with much STOICISM and some ARISTOTELIANISM. He makes use of it as a theologian, using it largely with a Christian end in view. Its defects have often been exaggerated in unconscious imitation of Protestant tendencies or a too scholastic mentality.

Origen's Theology. Theology, in almost all its divisions, made considerable progress with Origen, even if the results were not always perfect. His conception of the Trinity sought to safeguard the divine "monarchy" and to avoid modalist and adoptionist solutions. Thus in God he insists on a hierarchy of origin and speaks of the Father, because He is Father, as the source of divinity; hence He is the source of the divine nature that He shares with the other two Persons without diminution.

Origen refuses to consider the probolē (prolatio) of the Valentinians, who suppose a division of the divine substance similar to the process of human and animal generation; the Son and the Holy Spirit do not come forth from the bosom of the Father. The Trinitarian vocabulary was as yet not precise, and Origen did not always clearly distinguish the hierarchy of origin from the hierarchy of power; thence arose a SUBORDINATIONISM that betrays a theological insufficiency and not a dogmatic position.

The Son. Engendered from all eternity, mediator between God and the world, the Son possesses multiple epinoiai or names: His diverse scriptural titles that the Valentinians dissected into different Eons but that connote for Origen the relations of the Son with the world and with men. They have a real foundation in the simplicity of His hypostasis. The principal of these is Wisdom, who embraces the intelligible world of the principles of all beings (and here, Platonic “forms” are confounded with Stoic “reasons”), and is the model for creation. Then comes the Word (Logos), who gives expression to this Wisdom and is the agent of Creation; then a great number of others, viz, virtues and diverse functions of the Son in the Redemption and in man’s spiritual progress.

The union of the Son with human nature is anterior to the Incarnation. According to the Origenian hypothesis, His soul had been created with the preexistent intelligences. Finding itself “under the form of God” by its union with the Word, His soul was the spouse of the pre-existent Church, that is to say, of the collectivity of intelligent being. It alone escaped the cosmic fall. The Son, agent of the theophanies of the Old Testament, appears in His soul, which has retained its primitive angelico-human state; thus He is an angel among angels, a man among men. For love of his fallen spouse, the soul of Christ took flesh in Mary, and the Word followed it in the KENOSIS, remaining mysteriously in the bosom of the Father, His proper “place.” He revealed the divine to man, expressing it in a human being.

On the cross Christ was delivered to diabolic powers as a ransom according to the scriptural image of the Redemption that Origen exploits with many other images. He descended into hell to deliver the captive souls whom He carried with Him in the Ascension. The lack of a precise concept of person saves this doctrine from NESTORIANISM, for in many of his other passages Origen affirms the equivalent of the HYPOSTATIC UNION and the COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS. Against the Gnostics, Origen defended the reality of the flesh of Jesus, who, according to quite clear statements, “subsists in glory.”

The Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son, who communicates to Him His epinoiai. He is the Sanctifier and constitutes the “material” of the charisms which corresponds to our “actual graces.” But His role as inspirer of Scripture is not clearly distinguished from that of the Son.

Spirits and Man. Origen’s angelology and demonology are strongly developed: good and evil angels are guardians of nations, provinces, dioceses, individuals; they are appointed to diverse parts of nature, to virtues or to vices. The stars, animated and intelligent, are not agents of man’s destiny, which depends on grace and free will, but constitute the signs that the angels alone can read. The heavens are the Bible of the angels.

Man, like the angels, has been created according to the image of God, the Word. This participation in the existence and divinity of the Father and in the filiation and rationality of the Son, understood in a supernatural (sanctifying grace) rather than in a natural sense, to employ modern distinctions, is not destroyed by sin but obscured by diabolic and bestial images that the Redeemer alone can remove.

Origen often speculates on the nature of the risen body according to 1 Cor 15.35–44; a material substance, always fluent, cannot determine the identity of the body, made stable by a corporeal form (Platonism) or a seminal reason (Stoicism), the latter, present in the earthly body, germinating to endow the body with glory.

Mary, the Church, and the Sacraments. Describing Mary as the THEOTOKOS, according to the testimony of Socrates (Hist. eccl. 7.32), Origen is the first theologian to affirm clearly her perpetual virginity. Even though he did not believe her to be without fault, he sees in her a great spiritual type. He is very attentive to the mystical aspects of the Church rather than to its visible aspects, without, however, losing sight of them. He possessed a doctrine for Baptism, the Eucharist, Penance, Orders, and Matrimony. His Platonic and realistic notion of symbolism expresses very well the identity in substance between the “temporal” gospel and the “eternal gospel” mentioned above. But the essential “sacrament” for him is Scripture, an incarnation of the Logos in the written word, analogous to the flesh, preparing or announcing the unique Incarnation.

Origenism

The current of thought called Origenism is far from representing the complete heritage of the master: it comes from certain of his speculations separated from the whole, deprived of their hypothetical and antithetical character, and made into a system by posterity. The substance of Origen’s theology nourished the Fathers of the 4th century and has become through them the anonymous common good of Christian thought.

The Peri Archon. These speculations are found particularly in the Peri Archon, or Treatise on the First Principles, one of his earliest works, written at Alexandria, and the cause of his posthumous difficulties. This book seems to be composed of two tracts placed end to end, following the same plan: Trinity, rational creatures, and the world; then, of an appendix on Scripture and a résumé. He desires to oppose to the “principles” of MARCION those of the Church. It seems to have originated in the oral teaching of Origen, which Gregory Thaumaturgus describes as following the Socratic manner: a discussion of opposing opinions and manners of research rather than a summa theologica. It is difficult to gauge how far Origen is involved in the opinions he discusses, which are in themselves at times contradictory.

The preface sets out the various matters that form part of the rule of faith; beyond them, the author engages in research with its risks and perils, making use of Scripture, reason, and his philosophic erudition. Of this work the only sections now available in Greek are the chapters on free will and on Scripture that are published in the Philocalia. The whole treatise is preserved in a Latin version made by Rufinus; but his adaptations are the subject of diverse judgments on the part of critics who consider them according to their evaluation of Origen. A number of Greek and Latin fragments are available, coming for the most part from decided adversaries of Origen, such as Jerome and Justinian. P. Koetschau, in his edition for the Berlin Corpus (Die griechischen Christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte), has added to the confusion by inserting in the text of Rufinus, as if he had consciously omitted them, the Testimonia that were collected in relation to Origenism or to the heresies that have no indisputable connection with Origen. Thus this edition must be used with caution.

The Preexistence of Souls. The preexistence of souls, including that of Christ, is a favorite hypothesis of Origen: in the beginning God created pure intelligences (noes), all equal, which were vested with ethereal bodies, since the Trinity alone is incorporeal; these spent their being in contemplation of God. All except that of Christ grew cold in their fervor and became souls (psychē, or soul; the word is derived by Origen from psychos, cold). The degree of their fall differentiated them into angels, men, and demons, categories that do not seem to be separated by impassable limits. God then created the sensible world and the grosser bodies to furnish men with a means for redemption. This Platonic doctrine offered Origen too easy a means of answering the Valentinian theory concerning the nature of souls and the Marcionite accusation of injustice on the part of the Creator by attributing the diversity of conditions among angels, men, and devils to free will and an original choice.

The Apocatastasis. It is not possible to prove that Origen's doctrine concerning the APOCATASTASIS or universal restoration at the end of time is heretical. It was drawn from Pauline texts and is not pantheistic. It does not entail the destruction of individual personalities, as the reproaches made by Origen to the Stoic final conflagration demonstrate. No precise text of his holds the salvation of the devil; in fact he expressly protested against this idea in a letter to friends in Alexandria that is mentioned by both Jerome and Rufinus; and his speculations are susceptible of two interpretations. He certainly preferred to speak of purgatory, of a baptism of eschatological fire, of which he is one of the earliest proponents, rather than of the eternity of punishment. His reserve manifested a certain constraint, but one can affirm no more, and the rule of faith at the time did not yet have defined limits.

A categorical assertion of Origen regarding the apocatastasis would contradict his hypothesis of the perpetual return of things, which at times he presupposes, even when he criticizes the idea among the Stoics. It is certainly irreconcilable with one of his master ideas, namely, free will. It was no more than a great hope on his part.

Other Errors. Other errors imputed to Origen are contradicted by indisputable citations of his authentic works. His speculations concerning the divine henad have been exaggerated in a pantheistic sense, being unmindful of the Christian context that modifies them. Jerome thought he discovered in the Peri Archon the final disappearance of the "risen" bodies that were absorbed in this henad or unity. But this notion is not in the Greek texts or in Rufinus's translations; nor is it attested by METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS, who read this book and described Origen's conception of the glorious bodies, which he attacked vehemently.

According to Epiphanius of Constantia, Origen said that the Son does not see the Father; and this would underline His inferiority in the Godhead. Actually, Origen was intent on affirming merely His incorporeality; and there are any number of citations that affirm that the Son knows the Father. Methodius mentions a text from the Peri Archon according to which God is the creator from all eternity; but the text is not concerned with the creation of intelligent being, in spite of Methodius, for Origen shows that these have had their beginning. He has reference to Platonic ideas or Stoic "reasons," which are the principles of being, created in the eternal generation of the Word or Wisdom that contains them.

JEROME and JUSTINIAN I attribute to Origen the notion of METEMPSYCHOSIS, which certain Greek texts treat as absurdity, foreign to the thought of the Church. According to Jerome, again Origen held that in heaven there would be a renewal of the sacrifice of Christ for the demons; but in his Commentary on John (1.35) Origen affirms the unicity of Christ's sacrifice. Jerome did not comprehend Origen's insistence on the universal effect of the drama of the cross.

Certain misunderstandings come as a result of a later particularization of the Christian vocabulary. Origen seems to have made the Word and the Spirit creatures, because following Prv 8.22 and Col 1.15 he speaks of the first as ktisma (the created), reserving for the word poiēma (something made) the meaning of a creature; in this he is followed by Pope DIONYSIUS and he treats of both as genētoi, not distinguishing, as was later done, between this word in the sense of created and gennētoi (begotten).

Justinian said Origen thought the risen bodies were spherical in shape. The probable source of this absurdity is in the tract On Prayer (31.3), where Origen means the stars and not risen bodies when he speaks of “celestial bodies.” Origen certainly uses expressions that are depreciatory in relation to the earthly body in keeping with his Platonic ideas and for an ascetical purpose; but the opposite is not lacking; and the whole complex of his ideas taken together show great equilibrium.

In brief, although statements that have given rise to Origenism are to be found in the works of Origen, all the arguments which serve for the refutation of Origenism can likewise be found there.

Later Origenism. The Kephalaia gnostica of EVAGRIUS PONTICUS (345–399), of which an unexpurgated Syrian version has recently been discovered, and a letter of Evagrius to MELANIA THE ELDER give us information regarding the opinions of a group of monks in Egypt and Palestine, admirers of Origen in the second half of the 4th century: Evagrius, Isidore of Pelusium, Palladius, Ammonius, and the three other TALL BROTHERS. Melania, Rufinus, and DIDYMUS THE BLIND were in relation with them. The ocean of Origenistic ideas, tumultuous, ever in flux and reflux, had become a river flowing down through banks that had been wisely reinforced. The different theses described above were developed in a grandiose system, cleared of all that was contradictory. While the master’s synthesis, purified from its too bold speculations by theological progress and the experience of heresies, was anonymously preserved in the orthodox tradition, the heterodox character of these speculations, separated from their counterparts, was accentuated in this system.

Evagrius, who is above all a great spiritual author, underwent a systematization similar to the spiritual doctrine of Origen, an increasing of the Platonic and Gnostic elements and a taking of them over into a monastic context of pure contemplation; but in so doing he did not run counter to orthodoxy.

This doctrine brought about the first Origenistic crisis at the end of the 4th century. Origen was criticized; but he was read only one-sidedly, in accordance with the interpretation provided by his so-called disciples. The crisis passed, and it was Evagrius who was read rather than Origen.

The Origenist monks of the 6th century, whose turbulence provoked the second Origenistic quarrel, were divided into two factions. The moderates desired to preserve in Christ as man, distinguished from the Word, a certain superiority over other intelligent beings; but they thus brought the whole system into question. These were the Proctocists, called such because they saw in Christ as man the first created. Their adversaries accused them of introducing a fourth person into the Trinity, whence their nickname of Tetradites.

On the contrary, the Isochristes, faithful to Evagrius it would seem, made of Christ an intelligent being like others, whose sole superiority was temporary and consisted in having remained united to the Word when all the others fell; but in the end they too will become the “equals of Christ” in the reconstituted henad or unity.

If the “impious” Origen was spurned by the Syrians—and none of his works are preserved in that language—they paradoxically attested a great admiration for the “holy father” Evagrius, whom they knew through expurgated texts, such as the first Syrian version of the Kephalaia gnostica. But the second version, which was discovered recently, shows that the real Evagrius was not completely unknown. His thought has been found, reinforced with Gnostic influences, in STEPHEN BAR-SŪDHAILĒ, who was in Palestine during the second Origenistic quarrel. In the Book of Hierotheus, which is attributed to Stephen, this thought of Evagrius, mixed with PSEUDO-DIONYSIAN ideas, takes on a pantheistic aspect that Evagrius had wanted to avoid.

Origenistic Controversies. During his lifetime, Origen experienced contradictions. It is not certain that doctrinal difficulties were involved in his troubles with Bishop Demetrius, but it is not improbable (Comm. in Jn 5; Epist. ad Fabianum.). But he had the reputation of a defender of the faith, as his Dialogue with Heraclides indicates. During 150 years his admirers prevailed over his detractors. At the time of his death many of his disciples and friends occupied important episcopal sees and safeguarded his memory: Dionysius the Great at Alexandria, Theoctistus, then Theotecnus at Caesarea in Palestine, Firmilian in Caesarea of Cappadocia, Gregory Thaumaturgus, and his brother Athenodorus in Pontus. The processes against PAUL OF SAMOSATA, Bishop of Antioch, were in good part their doing.

Supporters. The schools of ALEXANDRIA (with Theognostus and Pierius) and of CAESAREA remained faithful to the doctrine of the master. In the latter, Pamphilus, aided by Eusebius, composed an Apology for Ori- gen, refuting his accusers by citing his texts. His opponents were, above all: METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS, who, although dependent on Origen, fought against his ideas on the glorious bodies and the creation ab aeterno; PETER OF ALEXANDRIA, on subordinationism, preexistence, and the glorious bodies; and EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, on the interpretation of the Pythoness of Endor.

The opposition between the Antiochians and Alexandrians in scriptural exegesis continued. But the great doctors of the 4th century read his works assiduously, and their own writings attest to this fact. They had reservations about his ideas but still considered him as “the stone which sharpens all of us” (Gregory of Nazianzus) and “the second master of the Church after the Apostle” (Didymus the Blind, followed by Jerome).

ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA used his Trinitarian texts in the Arian controversy; Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus composed the Philocalia of Origen; GREGORY OF NYSSA is the most representative inheritor of his mysticism and accepted his apocatastasis; Eusebius of Caesarea gave him a most important place in his Ecclesiastical History; and Didymus wrote a commentary on the Peri Archon.

AMBROSE of Milan and other Latin Fathers used him constantly; EUSEBIUS OF VERCELLI and HILARY OF POITIERS translated some of his writings and were imitated by Rufinus of Aquileia and Jerome, still full of enthusiasm for him. Having an intimate knowledge of his writings, which would be much less read subsequently in the Orient, these 4th-century Fathers were capable of judging his boldnesses in relation to the whole of his thought.

Opponents. The Arians, however, took refuge behind him, and his Egyptian disciples compromised him. Epiphanius of Constantia denounced him in his Ancoratus and Panarion (ch. 64) and attacked JOHN OF JERUSALEM in 392 as a protector of the Origenists. He won over Jerome, who started a pamphlet war against his old friend Rufinus because the latter remained true to his master; their subsequent quarrel scandalized Augustine. Rufinus defended Origen and asserted that the Peri Archon had been interpolated by heretics (De adult. librorum Origenis). THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA, who had read Origen, changed camps in the interest of his patriarchal politics, chased Isidore and the Tall Brothers from Egypt, and was able to depose JOHN CHRYSOSTOM from the Patriarchate of Constantinople for having sheltered them. He condemned Origen in a synodal letter (400) and in three paschal letters (401, 402, 404), which were immediately translated into Latin by Jerome; and Pope ANASTASIUS I confirmed the condemnation in letters to Simplicianus and Venerius of Milan.

This was the first Origenistic crisis; it came to a close in 402 with the silence of Rufinus, whose death in 411 did not disarm his adversary, St. Jerome. (The questions that were raised in the course of the controversy have been discussed above.) He was reproached with having allegorized the scriptural narratives of Creation and of paradise. To the interpretations made by contemporary Origenists, Jerome and Theophilus did not hesitate to add their own conclusions. Epiphanius in particular, making use of a suppositious apostasy of Origen, widely spread unbelievable gossip, which weighed long and heavily on his reputation (see H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale 1:257–274).

6th Century. In the first half of the 6th century Origenistic monks provoked trouble in the Great Laura of St. SABAS and in the New Laura near Jerusalem. In 543 an edict of Justinian I appeared, which had been provoked by the papal apocrisiarius Pelagius (later pope), in the form of the Liber adv. Origenem or the Letter to Mennas, the patriarch of Constantinople [J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98) 9:487–534]. It was approved apparently by the Pope and the four patriarchs. The text of this decree does not manifest a direct knowledge of Origen’s writings; the accusation that he placed the image of God in the body of man confounds Origen with the Anthropomorphites, his constant adversaries, and directly contradicts all his teaching. The citations and the fragments of the Peri Archon that accompany it come from a dossier sent to Pelagius by the anti-Origenists of Palestine. The ten anathemas adjoined (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum, ed. A. Schönem [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 203–211) are aimed at Origen and reproduce the complaints raised in the first controversy, concerning subordinationism and “the spherical-shaped glorious bodies.”

But these troubles did not cease. On the death of their leader, Nonnus, the Origenists divided into two camps, and the Protocists allied themselves with the anti-Origenists. The complicated history of the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II in its relation to Origenism has been narrated by F. Diekamp. The council had been retarded by the resistance of Pope VIGILIUS, and during the interval Justinian had addressed a letter to the bishops (preserved by Georgius Monachus and by Cedrenus; Mansi 9:533–538) to which correspond the 15 anathemas, discovered by P. Lambeck in 1679, but which do not appear in the official acts of the council. They expressly concern the Origenistic monks. A. Guillaumont has shown that they reproduce the Christology of Evagrius.

Justinian opened the council without the agreement of Vigilius; and in its discussions little attention was paid to Origen, except to put his name in the list of heretics condemned in canon 11. He was not mentioned in the Emperor's opening discourse, which is the source of the council's anathemas, nor in the letter of Vigilius approving the council after the fact (Mansi 9:413–420). But later councils have repeated the condemnation. Following ordinary norms of interpretation, however, there is no question of holding that Origen was a formal heretic—the bishops were persuaded that he was a heretic through the belief of Epiphanius; nor is it necessary to admit that the errors with which he was charged are really his. Unfortunately, this condemnation occasioned the loss of the greater part of his works in their original language.

Present. The West continued to read Origen and to appreciate him as exegete and spiritual director until the end of the 12th century (Bernard of Clairvaux, William of St.-Thierry); but the rise of Aristotelianism caused his star to recede. Brought back to honor during the Renaissance (Pico de la Mirandola, Erasmus), he has been a sign of contradiction among his numerous historians ever since. At the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th century he was considered more a Greek philosopher than a Christian theologian: he was accused of having preached Plato all during his life thinking he was preaching Christ. But in 1931 W. Völker raised his spiritual doctrine to its proper honor, and in 1950 H. de Lubac rediscovered the technique for understanding his exegesis. Despite variations in appreciation, modern critics can no longer ignore these two aspects of his teaching.

Bibliography: Works. Patrologia Graeca v.11–17, with Hexapla, ed. P. L. B. DRACH, v.15–16; Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (1899–1955); Entretien avec Héraclide, ed. J. SCHERER (Cairo 1949; 2d ed. Sources Chrétiennes 67; 1960); Commentary on St. John's Gospel, ed. A. E. BROOKE, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1896); Hexapla, ed. F. FIELD, 2 v. (Oxford 1867–75); Philocalia, ed. J. A. ROBINSON (Cambridge, Eng. 1893), Eng. tr. G. LEWIS (Edinburgh 1911); Prayer, Exhortation to Martyrdom, tr. J. J. O'MEARA (Ancient Christian Writers 19; 1954); The Song of Songs, tr. R. P. LAWSON (ibid. 26; 1957); Origen on First Principles, tr. G. W. BUTTERWORTH (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1936), Eng. tr. of De Principiis; Contra Celsum, tr. H. CHADWICK (Cambridge, Eng. 1953); Selections from the Commentaries and Homilies, tr. R. B. TOLLINGTON (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1929). J. E. L. QULTON and H. CHADWICK, eds. and trs., Alexandrian Christianity (Philadelphia 1954), includes selections from Origen. Literature. R. CADIOU, Origen: His Life at Alexandria, tr. J. A. SOUTHWELL (St. Louis 1944). J. DANIELOU, Origen, tr. W. MITCHELL (New York 1955). E. DE FAYE, Origen and His Work, tr. F. ROTHWELL (London 1926). W. VÖLKER, Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes (Tübingen 1931). R. GÖGLER, Zur Theologie des biblischen Wortes bei Origenes (Düsseldorf 1963). R. M. GRANT, The Earliest Lives of Jesus (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1961). R. P. C. HANSON, Allegory and Event (Richmond, Va. 1959); Origen's Doctrine of Tradition (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1954). H. DE LUBAC, Histoire et esprit (Paris 1950); Exégèse médiévale, 2 v. in 4 (Paris 1959–64) v. 1. M. F. WILES, The Spiritual Gospel (Cambridge, Eng.

1960). F. BERTRAND, Mystique de Jésus chez Origène (Paris 1951). S. BETTENCOURT, Doctrina ascetica Origenis (St Anselm 16; 1945). H. CROUZEL, Théologie de l'image de Dieu chez Origène (Paris 1956); Origène et la "connaissance mystique" (Paris 1961); Origène et la philosophie (Paris 1962); Virginité et mariage selon Origène (Bruges 1963). G. GRUBER, Zöe. Wesen, Stufen, und Mitteilung des wahren Lebens bei Origenes (Munich 1962). M. MARTINEZ, Teologia de la luz en Origenes (Comillas 1963). G. TEICHTWEIER, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes (Regensburg 1958). H. T. KERR, The First Systematic Theologian: Origen of Alexandria (Princeton 1958). P. NEMESHEGYI, La Paternité de Dieu chez Origène (Paris 1960). F. DIEKAMP, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im 6. Jahrhundert (Münster 1899). G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. ed. A. VACANT et al (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1565–88. A. GUILLAUMONT, Les "Kephalala gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique (Paris 1963). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md.) 2:37–101.

[H. CROUZEL]

ORIGINAL JUSTICE

In the present study, two questions will be posed. The first and more important asks what the faith is that Catholics profess relative to original justice. The second is not dogmatic in the strict sense. It is theological, and inquires how and in what way this truth—like other mysteries—can be understood by man after divine revelation.

Dogmatic. It may be of assistance to present in diagram form what is under consideration here (see accompanying table). If one were to attempt to plot out on a time line the various states that form the religious-moral history of humanity in relation to God, the first, for Catholicism, would be innocence, or original justice. The dividing line DBE is that of ORIGINAL SIN. The period or duration signified by the segment AB is discussed subsequently. [Dogmatically it is possible that points B and A coincide with the first moment of humanity's conscious life.]

There is another way to consider the same phenomenon. In the life of the Christian on earth (falling into the segment BC above), there are two stages. The segment A'B' (see accompanying table) is his original religious-moral condition as he enters the world. This is designated as original sin and means the individual is debilitated with regard to leading a life that is worthy of a human being, let alone a son of God. Although this weakness affects his mind and will, he did not personally cause it. Baptism for the child (together with personal conversion in the adult) effects a transformation known as justification.

Christ's merits renew in fallen man the image of his Maker. That renewal, the result of divine initiative, involves at least a partial restoration of the individual to mankind's original condition or state. In a true sense, the justified man today relives, or recapitulates, in himself the religious-moral history of the race—only in reverse order, as the diagrams indicate. All of this has further implications.

The first thing one must keep in mind is this. The justified man by God's GRACE through Christ is internally proportioned to living out a life as a son of God. He is not thus constituted when he first comes into the world. Even then, however, he is still absolutely called to do so despite his condition of personal inability to respond without Christ's assistance, which is from the first moment divinely assured him in view of his need and God's goodness. His state at birth or conception is that of Adam in ch. 3 of Genesis rather than that of Adam in ch. 1 or 2—fallen, but with divinely inspired hope of salvation already begun and already affecting him. The justified man, however, is in many, if by no means all, respects like humanity itself in its primordial religious-moral condition. Positive scientific method may not disclose a difference between the baptized and unbaptized, the justified and unjustified. This does not, however, exclude the fact that a difference is there, one perceptible only through divine revelation and its acceptance in faith. Similarly it may be that neither science nor secular history finds any traces of a change in humanity, now in a fallen state although once in a condition of original justice. That change, or difference, is no less real and impresses itself on man only as a result of God's interpretation of human religious history.

Even in divine revelation, however, the state of original justice is not in itself an object of direct, extended consideration. This does not imply that it is without foundation in the written word of God. It is there, but somewhat in the background. Even in the Old Testament, Genesis ch. 2 does not seem to have been written to spell out in detail what man was like before and without the sin and injustice only too evident to Israel beholding itself and other peoples. Together with the third chapter, it forms a divinely inspired account of the origin of evil—tracing it to man and not to God, whose works are just, who made all things good, and who walked in peace, harmony, and friendship with man. Still it is the fact that man caused the central disharmony and injustice in the world that makes him unlike what he was before or what he would have been had he acted otherwise.

A pivotal theme of the New Testament is that God has called sinful man to sonship through Jesus Christ in Baptism. Through the latter, man is restored, renewed, and reformed in the image of his Maker (Eph 4.23–24; Col 3.10; Ti 3 4–5). The life that was once in the world before sin and death gained entrance is restored to men through Jesus Christ, the second Adam (Rom 5.10–21; 1 Cor 15.21–22). The precondition for this is man's existence in a similar state at one point of his religious-moral history.

The same phenomenon manifests itself in the teaching of the Church. It is not as if the Church were directly concerned with Adam's original condition. Its real mission to preach and teach is directed to fallen and redeemed man. Humanity in its state of innocence is relevant as a factor required for a less inadequate grasp of what Jesus Christ has done for historical, guilty man. To restore is to give back what was lost; to restore justice and holiness implies man's possession of both at one time.

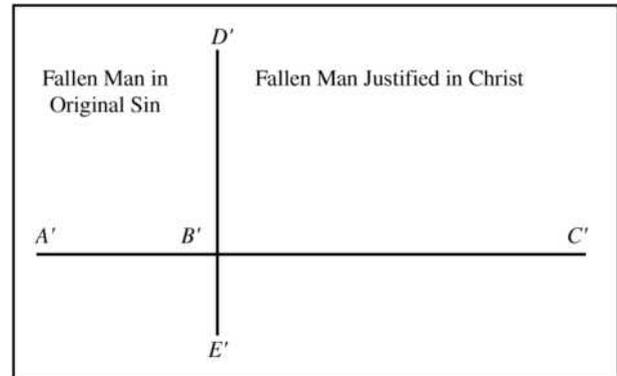

In view of this, it is not surprising that the teaching Church prescinded from defining certain questions regarding original justice. One of these was whether man was created immediately in this condition or in one where by divine assistance he was to dispose himself for the latter. Another was whether man in justice and holiness possessed sanctifying grace prior to the Fall. It is dogmatically tenable as well to hold that man was faced with a choice in the first moment of his existence (his response being negative—original sin). In this way original justice is a real, historical divine offer, one with definite effects in man, effects proposed immediately for man's acceptance or rejection. Even in this conception of things, it is still a gratuitous gesture on the part of a loving God, whose generosity does not leave humanity unaffected. Implied is an irrevocable invitation to a rational creature to share in the fellowship or life of the Trinity. Acceptance would have signified man's willingness to be thus transformed, elevated, supernaturalized—in a word, deified, but without losing his human condition. However, there were other gifts as well. One was immortality, the promise of life with immunity from the necessity of undergoing the death man now experiences. Another was integrity; effective commitment to the truly good was not to be accompanied by the difficulty man now feels because of internal conflict within himself.

The Church taught, especially at the Council of Trent (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1511), that Adam was constituted by God in holiness and justice. The latter signified a condition in which man was destined for personal union with God in the BEATIFIC VISION. This included provision of whatever man needs to live a life ordered to such a union. It is interesting to note that the Biblical expression with which St. Paul described the Christian was applied in retrospect to man in his original condition as related to God.

In reference to the above state, the term historical is rightly taken to mean real, factual, but not necessarily verifiable or detectable by positive scientific method. Consequently the prehistorian's inability to discover evidence from such a period in no way stands at odds with Catholic dogma. Catholic theologians can maintain that the condition, state, or period in question was momentary and no more. Thus the lack of any traces left behind would not be unintelligible, especially since science would find it even more difficult to deal with this religious-moral condition of primitive man than with many other factors of greater permanence in his existence. Why then has there been such insistence on such a state or condition?

The reason is that the Church considers it necessary to make faith in the redemptive act of Jesus Christ more integral (and, hence, also more intelligible). It fills in important details, gives nuances to what is otherwise a blunt fact. There is much to the Redemption-justification of man that transcends his power to understand. Only God could attest—since only He can make just—that the death of Jesus Christ, His Son, is redemptive for the latter's brothers and sisters. Only He could relate to man precisely to what extent humanity needed to be saved and redeemed, what the salvation brought by His Son entailed in terms of restoration. The Church, especially by reading and reflecting on His word, came under the inspiration of the Spirit to understand Redemption-justification as restoration to a prior state, at least under certain aspects; hence original justice in its profession of faith.

Theological. Further questions have arisen in the course of time regarding the intelligibility of this dogmatic truth. One of the foremost is the extent to which the details of Genesis ch. 2 are to be taken as a description of factual conditions realized in the state of original justice. Recognition that the history there related is of a very special type—accompanied by and embellished with many symbols—has helped considerably. Thus the degree of cultural attainment realized in Adam of Genesis appears less as a direct object of scriptural affirmation than as antithesis to the assertion that man's present state of ignorance, strife, etc., is humanly caused, consequent upon a misuse of freedom. The world is different for man in Genesis ch. 2 and 3; many theologians are beginning to regard this as a way of asserting that man's change for the worse in relation to God sets him in disaccord with the rest of nature as well. Such an interpretation has the obvious advantage of posing fewer difficulties in a confrontation with positive science, which finds only a primitive degree of development in men in their earliest states.

There was once a type of speculation current in Catholic theology that was often introduced with the question: What if Adam had not sinned? The exact, concrete details of a universe with man abiding in a state of original justice were not directly revealed by God. The fact—however long or short a period was entailed—is one thing; all the implications are another. The first is necessary to grasp the meaning of Christ's redemptive act. The latter is not. A fortiori one can only conjecture about the concrete mode of realization of what might have been. More and more Catholic theologians have come to wonder whether such a line of inquiry is likely to be conducive to further insights and truth. The proper and direct object of theology is the divinely revealed word of what the Triune God has done, does, and will do for man in salvation history—not the even more abstruse area of concrete detail in the realm of what He might have done.

This is not to say what might have been is always irrelevant to what is or has been. The scriptural description of original justice involves an intimacy between God and man surpassing, but not destroying that of Creator-creature. The dogmatic way of putting this is that in its original state humanity was deified, or endowed with gifts belonging properly to God alone or Divine Persons. Because of this, it is necessary to conclude that God could have produced man without this relation of sonship and merely with that of creaturehood. In this case, the "what might have been" is quite relevant to the gratuity of "what is." However, "what might have been" had original justice been preserved casts little light on what has been through divine intervention in Jesus Christ for restoration.

A final question that deals with the relation between sanctifying grace and original justice has also concerned Catholic theologians. In terms of causal theory, it has been asked whether the former acts as formal or efficient cause of the latter.

See Also: CONCUPISCENCE; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN; JUSTICE OF MEN; MAN; OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY; PRETERNATURAL; SUPERNATURAL; SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903—50) 8.2:2038—42. K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957—65) 8:72. A. M. DUBARLE, The Biblical Doctrine of Original Sin, tr. E. M. STEWART (New York 1965). M. FLICK and Z. ALSZEGHY, Il creatore: L'inizio della salvezza (2d ed. Florence 1961). J. DE FRAINE, The Bible and the Origin of Man (New York 1962), tr. from Dutch (Antwerp 1956). J. B. KORS, La Justice primitive et le péché originel d'après s. Thomas (Le Saulchoir, Kain 1922). H. DE LUBAC, Le Mystère du surnaturel (Paris 1965). S. LYONNET, De peccato originali (Rome 1960). H. RENCKENS, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. NAPIER (New York 1964). W. A. VAN ROO, Grace and Original Justice according to St. Thomas (Analecta Gregoriana 75; Rome 1955). H. U. VON BALTHASAR and E. GUTWENGER, "Der Begriff der Natur in der Theologie," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 75 (1953) 452—464. J. BITTREMIEUX, "La Distinction entre justice originelle et la grâce sanctifiante d'après s. Thomas d'Aquin," Revue thomiste 26 (1921) 121—150. P. J. DONNELLY, "The Gratuity of the Beatific Vision and the Possibility of a Natural Destiny," Theological Studies 11 (1950) 374—404. C. J. PETER, "The Position of Karl Rahner regarding the Supernatural: A Comparative Study of Nature and Grace," Catholic Theological Society 20 (1965). L. RENWART, "La Nature pure à la lumière de l'encyclique Humani generis," Nouvelle revue théologique 74 (1952) 337—354. A. HULSBOSCH, God in Creation and Evolution, tr. M. VERSFELD (New York 1965). P. SCHOONENBERG, Man and Sin, tr. from the Dutch J. DONCEEL (Notre Dame, Ind. 1965). R. FRANCOEUR, Perspectives in Evolution (Baltimore 1965).

[C. J. PETER]

ORIGINAL SIN

The hereditary sin incurred at conception by every human being as a result of the original sinful choice of the first man, ADAM. Before treating theologically of original sin, this article considers the Biblical data.

IN THE BIBLE

First the possible evidence for original sin in the Old Testament is considered, then the New Testament teaching.

Possible Evidence in the Old Testament. The Old Testament makes no explicit or formal statement regarding the transmission of hereditary guilt from the first man to the entire human race; but such a doctrine harmonizes with the general atmosphere of the Old Testament and is hinted at in some passages. Thus, the story of the fall of man in Genesis ch. 3 explains the human condition, and this is marked by a universal tendency toward sin. Chapter 4 of Genesis (from the YAHWIST tradition, like ch. 3) illustrates, by a series of anecdotes, how sin has invaded mankind. Chapter 5 (of the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS) may show the same thing through its reduction of life spans (see also Gn 11.10—26, also of the priestly tradition), even though this would be a more subtle method. In Gn 6.5 a strong indictment is presented against man's universal inclination to sin, and the "justice" of Noe (Noah) is qualified by 8.21—a kind of divine resignation to man's sinfulness. Solomon's prayer (1 Kgs 8.46) implies the same, and Ecclesiastes is aware of some evil having entered into mankind (Eccl 7.20). The words of Ps 50(51) 7 may be no more than a personal outcry, but many good scholars have seen a universal condition reflected in its words. Of dubious value is Jb 14.4 in the Masoretic Text, even if the Vulgate, perhaps through Christian influence, is most expressive. However, Wis 2.24 is significant: "By the envy of the devil death entered into the world." In strict exegesis one may not call the doctrine of original sin, as defined by the Council of Trent, a teaching of the Old Testament; but the foundations for it are there, strong and undeniable.

Teaching of the New Testament. It should be remarked that the New Testament seldom, if ever, formulates theological definitions such as are currently used. Its doctrine is set forth mostly in a descriptive manner. While one may gather, here and there in the New Testament, hints at the universality of sin, it is only St. Paul, in Eph 2.3 ("We were by nature children of wrath even as the rest") and especially in Rom 5.12—19, who forcefully brings out the doctrine. Through an extended series of contrasts Paul's doctrine gains great power: sin and death have entered into all men (Rom 5.12); in the transgression of the one, the rest died (5.15); consequent upon the judgment passed on one man, all men were condemned (5.18); and through the disobedience of one man the rest were constituted sinners (5.19). Only one inclined to quibble could deny Paul's general thought. Still it is true that Paul does not explicitly say all that will be said by the Council of Trent. This, of course, is quite a normal phenomenon in the development of doctrine. Paul lays a strong foundation from which details may be drawn harmoniously and legitimately.

Bibliography: J. BLINZLIBR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957—65) 3:965—967. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1677—78. A. M. DUBARLE, Le Péché originel dans l'écriture (Paris 1958). T. BARROSSE, “Death and Sin in St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 15 (1953) 438–458. S. LYONNET, “Le Péché originel en Rom 5,12: L’Exégèse des pères grecs et les décrets du concile de Trente,” Biblica 41 (1960) 325–355; “Le Péché originel et l’exégèse de Rom 5,12–14,” Revue des Sciences Religieuses 44 (1956) 63–84; “Le Sens de ἐφῶ en Rein 5,12 . . .,” Biblica 36 (1955) 436–456. A. HULSBOSCH, God in Creation and Evolution, tr. M. VERSFELD (New York 1965) ch.2. A. VANNESTE, “La Préhistoire du décret du Concile de Trente sur le Péché originel,” Nouvelle revue théologique 86 (1964) 355–368, 490–510.

“Adam and Eve in Paradise,” 13th-century Norwegian painting. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

[I. HUNT]

IN CATHOLIC FAITH AND THEOLOGY

The term original sin designates a number of things. One is a condition of GUILT, weakness, or debility found in human beings historically (or in which they are personally situated), prior to their own free option for good or evil (peccatum originale originatum). This is a state of being rather than a human act or its consequence. The other meaning has to deal with the origin of that state: its cause or source (peccatum originale origibzans). In what follows, both meanings will be treated from a dogmatic and from a strictly theological point of view.

Dogmatic: Sin of Adam. It is first of all imperative to understand the motivation behind the Church’s concern with this issue. The Church saw it closely connected with something very central to the Christian’s profession of faith: that the Father has sent His Son Jesus as Savior. This was present in the earliest apostolic preaching and creeds (Acts 2.38–40; 3.26; 4.12; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 1, 3, 4, 40, 42). Similarities notwithstanding, it was not just another human confrontation with the problem of evil or a purely philosophical stand relative to the same issue. Faith in Jesus as redeemer implied that God had offered a solution of His own. If man was in a state of real need, it was one his Creator took into account and sought to remedy. To the adults who heard Peter on Pentecost, the need of salvation was not one that required a great deal of elaboration. They might inquire about ways and means, but they accepted the fact itself without undue question (Acts 2.36–41). Then and later the preaching-believing Church radiated the conviction that through divine condescension in Christ, man could reach God's own interpretation-solution of the evil present in the human situation.

Illustration of large apple lifted to reveal Redeemer, Pennsylvania German fraktur, 19th century.

It is not surprising, however, that questions soon arose concerning the further implications of that evil. These had a significance at once soteriological and sacramental. To what extent is Christ really the savior of all men—only after their personal sins, or even before? To what degree is Baptism conducive to the forgiveness of sins—only for those who have offended God on their own initiative?

These questions led to an explication of the Church's faith and understanding of man's need for Christ in terms of sin and death. A scriptural basis for such a development existed (Eph 2.10; Rom 5.12–21; 1 Cor 15.22). It is quite another matter, however, to ask whether the Church in this matter proceeded from the Bible by making use of purely scientific, positive criteria to determine its meaning. There is no indication that it did; the Church relied on the Spirit of Truth who guides its faith throughout the ages (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum 1514 relative to Rom 5.12). This is not to say that its interpretations, authentically formulated, have been contrary to sound exegetical determination of the literal sense. It is only to assert that the believer contends the Church had other aids as well in expressing the latent significance of God's written word.

Question of Origins. One of the Church's earliest confrontations with problems of this nature dealt with the question of origins. The Marcionists and Manichaeans tended to see in human history a struggle between the good God—father of Jesus Christ and author of the New Testament—and the evil god, who manifested his severity and justice in the Old. Equivalently the question was, when did God begin to save. The Church asserted the strict unity of the redeeming God, the maker of all things who directs all to man's salvation from the earliest beginnings to culmination in His Son, Jesus.

This is an element that is often overlooked, though it is of considerable significance in the NICENE CREED. There Jesus the Savior in time is said to have preexisted in the realm of invisible realities before becoming incarnate. He is begotten but not made; this by the Father, who is, however, the maker of all other realities, visible and invisible (Enchiridion symbolorum 125–126). This distinction between the Son as invisible though not made and other invisible realities that are made by the Father through the same Son has soteriological as well as strictly Christological import. As Son and Savior, He stands related to the Father in a manner different from that of other invisible realities, which are made. Although the Holy Spirit was not directly taken into account in this context at Nicaea I, the twofold distinction just enumerated was expanded at the First Council of Constantinople and later (Enchiridion symbolorum 75, 150, 800, 1300). As proceeding, the Holy Spirit is neither Father nor Son; as Lord and life-giver, He shares their creative-salvific work. God three-in-one is thus presented as distinct from all other realities, both visible and invisible.

Satan and Adam. The same invisible world became again the object of concern in the Middle Ages at the instance of the Albigenses. What was at issue was not philosophical dualism as such or even a mere denial of universal divine providence, or government, of human affairs. Again the question was intimately related to a central Christian truth, though the technical terms in which it was answered might at first seem to indicate otherwise.

The Jewish people had once asked themselves: When did Yahweh begin His saving action in history—at the Exodus or before, with the Patriarchs or earlier? The Christian, who professed belief in the same saving God, had a similar difficulty. The God who so commended His love for man in the work of His only Son Jesus, how much did He love? How strong was His love? St. Paul had written that neither death nor life nor any creature could separate the Christian from the love of God in Jesus Christ (Rein 8.31–39). What then of the principle hostile to man's salvation?

In the Fourth Lateran Council, the Church proclaimed more than the universal origin of all realities from the same good God. It went further and pronounced that the principle opposed to man in working out his salvation is not only dependent on that God but was originally created good and chose evil personally. It was at his instigation that man gave sin and death admission to the world (Enchiridion symbolorum 800). Thus the origin of the evil situation in which the world is found came not from God but from man himself at the instigation of a created, invisible power. Dualism in salvation history is therefore different from the philosophical dualism encountered elsewhere. For an interpretation that makes the decree Firmiter of this Council at once more symbolic and philosophical, see Peter Schoonenberg, God's World in the Making (Duquesne Studies, Theological Series 2; Pittsburgh 1964) 8–9.

Monogenism. Even though it is treated in a separate encyclopedia article, mention must be made of MONOGENISM in this context. In Hurnani gertefts Pills XII. warned:

For Christ's faithful cannot embrace that opinion which maintains either that after Adam there existed on this earth true men who did not take their origin through natural generation from him as from the first parent of all, or that Adam represents a certain number of first parents; since it is in no way apparent how such an opinion can be reconciled with that which the sources of revealed truth and the documents of the teaching authority of the Church propose with regard to original sin, which proceeds from a sin actually committed by an individual Adam and which through generation is passed on to all and is in everyone as his own. [Enchiridion symbolorum 3897.]

It is well to note the intentional precision with which this was expressed. Monogenism is not described as an article of faith or even unequivocally as a theological conclusion following necessarily from the dogma of Adam's sin. Still the question of polygenism, at least in certain forms, is proposed as one affecting original sin as the faith of the Church professes it. According to the document carefully interpreted, certain polygenistic hypotheses appear to offer insoluble difficulties with regard to the dogma of original sin as proceeding from one Adam, but this does not rule out the possibility that the incompatibility may be seen in the future to have been only apparent. It must be added that Humani generis does not offer positive justification for the hope of any who may think this will be the case. For a further discussion of the question, e.g., from the point of view of the possibility of preadamites, see K. Rahner, Theological Investigations, v.1, tr. C. Ernst (Baltimore 1961) 231–239.

Fact. The precise nature of the sin of Adam in Genesis ch. 3, as well as the time and circumstances of its commission, have not been the objects of explicit definition by the Church. As is the case with original justice, it is more the fact than the details surrounding it that has concerned the Church in teaching (Enchiridion symbolorum 3514, 3862–64).

Dogmatic: Consequences in Progeny. First of all the Church professes belief that Adam of Genesis by his sin brought about a change of religious-moral condition in relation to God not only for himself (see ORIGINAL JUSTICE) but also for subsequent men. This the Catholic episcopate expressed most clearly in the Council of Trent. The change in question is there described as involving loss of justice and holiness, incurrance of divine wrath, death of soul as well as of body (Enchiridion symbolorum 1512). Men may and do imitate Adam in his sin; they may personally set up obstacles to a state of FRIENDSHIP WITH GOD. Even prior to so doing, however, they are, for the reason that they are human beings descended historically from him, affected by the sin and guilt he brought into the world—a condition or state at least in its most extended ramifications their more immediate ancestors may have aggravated or helped to perpetuate through personal sins (Enchiridion symbolorum 1513). Exaggerated humanism at the time of the Renaissance had particular difficulty in accepting the fact that one's religious-moral state could be so affected by something prior to his own free choice. A similar tendency at the time of Pelagius and St. Augustine had occasioned a much earlier determination of Adam's influence on his progeny (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum 222–224, 231, 237, 239, 371–372, 398–400). In both instances the Church reacted by seeing in the assertion of man's autonomy in self-determination, both for good and for evil, a direct challenge to the saviorship of Jesus Christ.

Capacity for Good. If, on the one hand, there has been insistence that man in his religious-moral life depends on Christ, that without Christ he has no religious-moral significance (cf. Council of Orange; Enchiridion symbolorum 392), still another truth has been present in the Church's teaching as well. Affected though he is by the sin of Adam, man is nevertheless a being possessed of the capacity for good; he has free will. This does not mean that he will ever exercise that power without Christ, or even that his possession of it to begin with is without Christ, in whom all things are created. This simply means that historical man, affected by Adam's sin, is not so corrupted as to be without a radical power for choosing good (Enchiridion symbolorum 1555).

At this point it may be well to note the fact that insistence on a humanity that remains truly human though affected by original sin is by no means out of accord with the Scriptures. The New Testament speaks of the community of Christ and other men, His brothers, in humanity despite humanity's sinfulness in them and sinlessness in Him (Heb 4.15; 7.26–27). An observation similar to this has been made by Karl Barth (Kirchliche Dogmatik 4.1:480–481).

Role of Christ. The Church has forcefully asserted Adam's evil influence on his progeny and has simultaneously taught that Christ exerts a contrary and superior influence for good. To speak solely and exclusively of man as under the sway of sin and evil caused by the first human sin is therefore to make use of an abstraction. It is a useful one and corresponds to a portion of a complex reality. Man in his relations with God is historically subjected to the most varied influences. From the start he is created in Jesus Christ, called to God through the latter, and aided in attaining such union; but he is affected also by the evil introduced into the world by the first Adam. An age that has come to recognize the major influence of heredity and environment on man may not find it difficult to understand that man, even from a religious-moral point of view, can be affected both adversely by human evil that he did not perpetrate and favorably by good for which he was not ultimately responsible. The Church itself has tried to make clear that for all its insistence on the reality of the adverse moral condition that man is born into because of Adam, still it is not the same as a situation of personal sin (recall the distinction made in this regard at the Councils of Lyons II and Florence, and in later ecclesiastical documents; Enchiridion symbolorum 858, 1306, 1946–48, 2003).

Specifically, Catholic faith includes the assertion that because of man's first offense against God, human beings now enter this world in special need of the redeeming assistance-grace of Jesus Christ. Called to live as a son of God, man cannot do so without special reliance on the natural Son—this due to the original ingratitude of the first human beings to whom adopted sonship was offered. As to death, this much is likewise certain from the teaching of the Church: the death that man now dies he undergoes because of the sin of Adam. [For disputed interpretations of the implications this has, see further M. Flick and Z. Alszeghy, Il Creatore: L'Inizio della salvezza (2d ed. Florence 1961) 319; R. Troisfontaines, I Do Not Die, tr. F. E. Albert (New York 1963); K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death, tr. C. H. Henkey (Quaestiones Disputatae 2; New York 1962) 54–57.] What is more, the difficulty man now experiences in applying himself effectively to accomplishing real, religious good is there because of Adam historically. For all the natural character of CONCUPISCENCE, it is not what God intended or what He offered man in his original religious-moral condition. As a result, according to Catholic teaching, the lack of justice-holiness, immortality, and integrity in historical man is a real privation and not a mere absence. The reasoning leading to this is that because their restoration through Jesus Christ (at least in its state of consummation) is a real deification of sinful man, it follows that justice-holiness, etc., were a deification in relation to innocent man as well, there by divine offer and intent but absent subsequently (save through Jesus Christ), because of human sin, which sets man in discord with himself, the world, and God.

Theological. In what follows, it is proposed to give special attention to the theological hypotheses proposed to understand, within the limits open to man after revelation, the mystery involved in peccatum originale originatum. There can be no question that the nexus between a personal sin of a remote ancestor and a condition of guilt in a descendant has received different nuances of understanding in the history of Christian thought. St. Augustine was hesitant when it came to deciding whether parents passed on merely a body or a body and soul both directly affected by Adam's sin (C. Iulian. 5.4.17; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 44:794). Nevertheless, the connection between original sin in offspring and concupiscence in parents is something he asserted as well (C. Iulian. op. imperf. 2.45, Patrologia Latina 45:1161; cf. Nupt. et concup. 1.24.27, Patrologia Latina 44:429). One can hold with Trent for transmission “generatione, non imitatione” without being constrained to accept such a view of marital relations. The assertion that the sin of Adam affects man before his own personal sin is by no means coincident with stating that he contracts it by a sin his parents commit at his generation or by some result of sin present therein though his parents may not actually be guilty.

Theories concerning Transmission. In this precise area a number of theories have been put forward by Catholic theologians. They attempt to explain how a truly guilty condition can affect man historically prior to his own choice and due to a misuse of liberty on the part of previously deceased humanity. One of these theories accords Adam a type of moral or juridical headship over the human race. In this conception of the matter, God by an inscrutable decree established Adam of Genesis as the legal representative of all Humanity, which would descend from him. His exercise of free choice would be taken as theirs; he would act in their name, for better or worse. The consequence of his conduct would affect all. As a matter of fact he rejected God's offer of friendship and passed on to his descendants a heritage of enmity with God. All men can be said to have acted in him and through him because of the fact that he was their head, so constituted not by them but by their Creator in His good pleasure. This theory has at least the advantage of appealing directly to the free choice of God. Cardinal Juan de Lugo (1583–1660) expounded it at some length; for this reason it is often associated with his name (see De poenitentia 7.7; De incarnatione 7.3–4). What remains extremely difficult to understand in the explanation is the analogy made between the sinfulness of a state in subsequent men and an act of choice in Adam. Still it has proponents, at least in its mitigated form, among Catholic theologians today (see J. F. Sagues, De Deo creante et elevante, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain 2.2).

Since the theory of Adam's moral headship involves the problem of understanding how each man's will can be presumed (even by God) to have coincided with that of Adam, certain Catholics proposed an alternative theory according to which Adam is to be considered as the physical, not the moral, head of the human race. This was the position, for example of Cardinal L. Billot [De peccato originali (Rome 1912)].

Their assumption is that Adam could pass on his humanity only as he possessed it. Having rejected divine friendship, he found that humanity affected by sin in himself, and he generated children similarly disposed. His descendants come from him in this condition: they are deprived of the wherewithal to live out their ineradicable call to divine sonship, save through Jesus as head in a redemptive as well as a creative order.

One major difficulty with this theory is that it has often in the past looked as if man received from Adam a humanity that in its own line was fully intact. One must try to see this in comparison with the tradition that man was, if not corrupted, nevertheless really wounded even in his humanity. When original justice and the gifts it involved are conceived as an accident affecting human nature, it is only too simple to imagine its loss with the nature remaining not only intact but in equilibrium in its own right. Still the Church maintains that man historically without Christ (a state he never totally experiences but one that merits consideration to see the primacy and necessity of Christ) is incapable of living an entire life worthy of a human being and much less of a son of God. How is it that because of Adam, even if he does pass on a humanity that is deprived of the wherewithal to live as son, man cannot even live as long as befits a human being? How can the lack of what in themselves were gifts cause anything even approximating a condition of sin or guilt, particularly in those whose wills have not yet ratified the act that caused the loss?

Other attempts to formulate theories have been made with questions such as these in mind. An aspect of physical headship has been retained: Adam as progenitor did pass on his humanity as he possessed it after his sin, that is, in a truly weakened condition. How? The divine offer of friendship entailed as well a possibility of living without the difficulty injected into life by concupiscence. With concupiscence, selfishness is an obstacle to leading a truly human life. To do so requires at times a recognition and acceptance of the fact that sacrifice of personal convenience and preference is required for the glory of God and the good of man. To love God above all else and to love all creatures as He loves them are imperative for man; selflessness often is required to achieve this. Whatever there is to be said for the possibility of other orders in which man might have been, there is no reason to hold or even think tenable that man in this present order can make that option other than through Jesus Christ. His aid is always at least remotely ordered to man's living as a son and not as a mere human being. And even so, the value found in the old theological distinction between gratia sanans and elevans may still be recognized. To pass on a humanity subject to concupiscence, in an order where purely natural aids against concupiscence are not offered, is to pass on a humanity that is in a weakened condition morally even before it acts. Prior to its option for good or evil, it is so disposed that without aid in the order of humanity itself it is going to fall freely. But to avoid failure requires divine assistance, an assistance that is given only in ultimate relation to living a life worthy of a son of God. For an extended treatment of this opinion, see M. Flick and Z. Alszeghy, 455–470.

Related Questions. There are many other questions that are raised by the dogma of original sin. Some of these are connected with a particular conception of the state from which Adam fell. Some presuppose more than divine revelation has offered in telling man about that state and what would have been had it lasted or been initially accepted by Adam. Others are peculiarly modern and ask, for example, just what the implications are for the doctrine of original sin in the evolutionist assumption that the present human race did have more than one pair of ultimate ancestors in the remote past.

Whatever answer is offered to such a question, the defectibility that follows necessarily as a consequence of creaturehood is not sufficient to explain the present evil in the human situation. Philosophy might well conclude with probability to the opposite; empirical sciences similarly. The Church, starting with its experience of Christ as redeemer and revealer, has concluded that He offered gifts that were at once a restoration and a deification. As a restoration, they were at least really available to man previously through God's goodness; as a deification, their loss involved more than the exercise of liberty that is present and a necessary condition of defectibility in every creature that is human. One cannot, in the light of revelation, start with the assumption that original sin has been satisfactorily accounted for if an explanation is given of how each of a number of remote ancestors sinned as men. That would indeed explain evil, but not the evil God Himself has indicated to be present in the world. Misuse of human liberty is one thing; it is involved in original sin. But the misuse revealed is one that brings with it a privation of godliness, which is not identical with defective creaturehood. A truly superhuman, or God-like, condition was present in humanity originally, at least by divine offer; it was lost, possibly in the first moment of truly human existence, only to be reoffered in restoration to all men by Christ.

Recent Church Teaching. The documents of Vatican II made scant reference to the first sin. The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et spes, 13) briefly asserted that humanity (homo), made by God in a condition of righteousness (iustitia), violated its freedom "at the outset of history" (ab exordio historiae), and thereby fell into a state of both internal and external disorder, and of susceptibility to death (Gaudium et spes 18). Paul VI, however, cited Trent and recalled Rom 5:12, the seminal text in the tradition, when in his Credo of the People of God (1968) he stated that "all have sinned in Adam," such that now all suffer the consequences of that man's sin (originalem culpam ab illo commissam). Because of this sin, the nature passed on to us by our protoparents (protoparentibus nostris) is destitute of grace and wounded in its natural powers. Also instructive was the revision in 1969, under the direction of a papal commission established by Paul VI, of the discussion of original sin in the Dutch Catechism of 1966 (Het Nieuwe Katechismus) so that it would accord more closely with the Tridentine teaching of an inherited nature injured by sin. John Paul II spoke of the death introduced into the world by "the disobedience of Adam" (Evangelium vitae, n. 36), and he made awareness of the effect the first sin has had on the human condition an important part of his analysis of the moral life in Veritatis splendor.

The most thorough statement of the Church's continued view on original sin is that found in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992). The Catechism expressly affirms each of the elements that have belonged to the doctrine in the west since the time of Augustine's commentaries on St. Paul: that the physical, psychological, and spiritual condition of each human being, the relation of human beings to one another, their relation to visible creation, and even the state of the physical world itself, have been fragmented by virtue of an act committed by man (variously referred to as "Adam" or "Adam and Eve" or "our first parents") at the beginning of human history despite his (or their) having been created by God in holiness. In consequence, we are burdened with a nature inclined to sin (concupiscence) and destined for death. The one element not explicitly referred to is the idea that all share in the guilt (reatus, to use Trent's term) of that first act. Instead, the Catechism speaks of the passing on to us of "Adam's sin" which, in the words of Trent, is the "death of the soul," and because of which even infants are baptized "for the remission of sins" (n. 403). The Catechism maintains, with a sharpness lacking perhaps in the documents of Vatican II, the event character of the first sin as a personal act that affected the whole of history and each person within it. Even more significantly, however, it situates this sin within what it claims is a more fundamental event, the event that has defined history from its beginning, namely the event of Christ's atoning Incarnation (nn. 385–89, 402). Hence, the Catechism provides the doctrine of original sin with a Christological setting that is absent in the decree of Trent, but which one may find in the work of Vatican II, and which reflects the Christological focus that characterized the entire twentieth century.

Developments in Theology. The twentieth-century writer who exerted the greatest influence on the theology of original sin was Pierre Teilhard de Chardin. Teilhard's abiding concern was to reconcile the teaching on original sin with the evidence of science, and thereby demonstrate the credibility of the faith to an educated, contemporary audience. The majority of theologians over the last 40 years have adopted at least the broad outline of his approach, which is to place the history of human sin within the evolutionary progress of the world. Whether one views the sin of a first individual or first group in the earliest human period as having lost for all of us the grace of God (Rahner) or, as Teilhard himself believed and which has become more common, one regards sin as the necessary failure of a species that is still in the process of maturing, lying at the heart of this approach is the picture of Christ as active in the world since the moment of creation, unifying, integrating, and ultimately drawing all into the presence of the Father (Segundo, Duffy, Mooney, Korsmeyer). The difficulty is that this amounts to a denial of the Fall, the teaching that, as Trent put it, a first human decision changed the human condition “for the worse” (in deterius). Physical death (or for Rahner, our experience of it) and suffering, the inclination to self and hence our alienation from ourselves, each other and from God, are said to be natural to us as finite and physical, even though they are certain to be overcome, by virtue of the grace of Christ, in the eschaton. It was out of concern for this trend that the Catechism warned against taking sin “as merely a developmental flaw, a psychological weakness, a mistake, or the necessary consequence of an inadequate social structure, etc.” (Catechism of the Catholic Church 387). For their part, however, theologians have been frustrated by what they regard as a blind insistence on taking biblical “myth” as historical fact (Daly). Yet to a great extent, Church authorities and theologians seem to have been talking past each other. The latter consider the doctrine of original sin as addressing the same questions about human origins as do the natural sciences, e.g., how and why did the species arise, under what circumstances, whether from a single couple, a single group, or a variety of groups in a variety of locations, etc. Church teaching, on the other hand, has proposed the doctrine as an explanation, based on revelation, of the human person as free and self-transcendent, belonging to a single community generated from the mutuality of man and woman, the subject of a divine vocation which nevertheless required purchase in the blood of Christ (John Paul II, “Message to the Pontifical Academy of Sciences,” 1996). If this doctrine establishes a standard against which may be measured certain empirical extrapolations that refer to the nature of the person, it nonetheless does not propose a kind of rival natural history. The task presently facing theology is the investigation of ways that will lead beyond the impasse, which requires a reconsideration of the doctrine on its own terms. Meriting fuller notice is the suggestion by D. Keefe that the first sin be understood as lying neither before nor beyond our history, nor as still another event lying within the flow of history, but as an exercise of human freedom that is constitutive of history.

See Also: DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; MAN; NATURAL ORDER; OPTIMISM (THEOLOGICAL ASPECT); MONOGENISM AND POLYGENISM; PRETERNATURAL; SALVATION; SUPERNATURAL; SUPERNATURAL ORDER.

Bibliography: A. GAUDEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:275–606. J. BLINZLER et al., Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:965–973. S. LYONNET, Dictionnaire de la Bible supplement ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 7:481–567; De peccato originali (Rome 1960). A. M. DUBARLE, The Biblical Doctrine of Original Sin, tr. E. M. STEWART (New York

1965). J. DE FRAINE, The Bible and the Origin of Man (New York 1962), tr. from Dutch. V. J. PETER, The Doctrine of Ruard Tapper Regarding Original Sin and Justification (Rome 1965). H. RENCKENS, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. NAPIER (New York 1964). M. SECKLER, Instinkt und Glaubenswille nach Thomas von Aquino (Mainz 1961). M. FLICK, “Lo stato di peccato originale,” Gregorianum 38 (1957) 299–309; “Problemi teologici sull’ ‘ominazione,’” ibid. 44 (1963) 62–70. R. J. PENDERGAST, “The Supernatural Existential, Human Generation, and Original Sin,” Downside Review 82 (1964) 1–24. C. J. PETER, “The Position of Karl Rahner regarding the Supernatural: A Comparative Study of Nature and Grace,” Catholic Theological Society of America Proceedings 20 (1965). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, “L’Instinct de la foi selon s. Thomas d’Aquin,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 48 (1964) 377–408. J. DE FRAINE, Adam and the Family of Man, tr. D. RAIBLE (New York 1965). A. HULSBOSCH, God in Creation and Evolution, tr. M. VERSFELD (New York 1965). H. DE LUBAC, La Pensée religieuse du Père Teilhard de Chardin (Paris 1962). P. SMULDERS, La Vision de Teilhard de Chardin, tr. from the Dutch C. D’ARMAGNAC (Paris 1964). P. SCHOONENBERG, Man and Sin (Notre Dame, Indiana 1965). PAUL VI, “Original Sin and Modern Science,” The Pope Speaks 11 (1966) 229–235. JOHN PAUL II, “Address to Pontifical Academy of Sciences,” The Pope Speaks 42 (1997) 118–121. U. BAUMANN, Erbsünde? Ihr traditionelles Verständnis in der Krise heutiger Theologie (Freiburg 1970). C. BAUMGARTNER, Le péché originel (Paris 1969). P. BURKE, “Man Without Christ: An Approach to Hereditary Sin,” Theological Studies 29 (1968) 4–18. J. L. CONNOR, “Original Sin: Contemporary Approaches,” Theological Studies 29 (1968) 215–240. G. A. DALY, Creation and Redemption (Wilmington 1989); “Original Sin,” in Commentary on the Catechism of the Catholic Church, ed. M. J. WALSH (Collegeville, Minnesota 1994), 97–111. S. J. DUFFY, “Our Hearts of Darkness: Original Sin Revisited,” Theological Studies 89 (1988) 597–622. M. FLICK and Z. ALSZEGHY, Il peccato originale (Brescia 1972). P. GRELOT, Péché originel et la rédemption, à partir de l’épître aux Romains (Paris 1973). H. HAAG, “The Original Sin Discussion, 1966–1971,” Journal of Ecumenical Studies 10 (1973) 259–289. D. J. KEEFE, Covenantal Theology: The Eucharistic Order of History, 2 v. (Lanham 1991). J. D. KORSMEYER, Evolution and Eden: Balancing Original Sin and Contemporary Science (New York 1998). P. LENGSELD, Adam et le Christ: La typologie Adam-Christ dans le Nouveau Testament et son utilisation dogmatique par M. J. Scheeben et K. Barth (Paris 1970). S. MACISAAC, Freud and Original Sin (New York 1974). G. MARTELET, Libre réponse à un scandale: La faute originelle, la souffrance et la mort (Paris 1986). B. MCDERMOTT, “The Theology of Original Sin: Recent Developments,” Theological Studies 38 (1977) 478–512. C. F. MOONEY, “Theology and Science: A New Commitment to Dialogue,” Studia Theologica 52 (1991) 289–329. K. RAHNER, “Evolution and Original Sin,” Concilium 26 (New York 1967); “Monogenism,” Sacramentum Mundi 4:105–107; “Original Sin,” ibid. 4:328–334; “Erbsünde und Monogenismus” in K.-H. WEGER, Theologie der Erbsünde (Freiburg 1970); “The Sin of Adam,” Theological Investigations 11 (New York 1974) 247–262; “Natural Science and Reasonable Faith,” Theological Investigations 21 (1988) 16–55. P. RICOEUR, The Symbolism of Evil (Boston 1969); “Guilt, Ethics and Religion” in The Conflict of Interpretations (Evanston 1974) 425–439; “Original Sin’: A Study in Meaning,” ibid. 269–286. H. RONDET, Original Sin: The Patristic and Theological Background (Staten Island 1972). L. SABOURIN, “Original Sin Reappraised,” Biblical Theology Bulletin 3 (1973) 41–81. A. SCHMIED, “Konvergenzen in der Diskussion um die Erbsünde,” Theologie der Gegenwart 17 (1974) 144–156. K. SCHMITZ-MOORMANN, Die Erbsünde: Überholte Vorstellungsbilder

Glaube (Freiburg 1969). J. SEGUNDO, Evolution and Guilt (Maryknoll, New York 1974). M. J. SUCHOCKI, The Fall to Violence: Original Sin in Relational Theology (New York 1994). P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Phenomenon of Man (New York 1959); Christianity and Evolution (New York 1971). G. VANDERVELDE, Original Sin: Two Contemporary Roman Catholic Approaches (Amsterdam 1975). A. VANNESTE, The Dogma of Original Sin (Brussels 1975).

[C. J. PETER/K. MCMAHON]

ORIOLO, JOSEPH, ST.

Miracle-worker; b. Vich (Barcelona), Spain, Nov. 23, 1650; d. Barcelona, March 23, 1702. Oriolo's father died when he was a child and his mother worked hard to bring up her family. With the help of friends, he was able to reach ordination and obtain a doctorate in theology. He lived humbly, did penance, and adhered strictly to the demands of his priestly life. He was not an extraordinary preacher, but his evangelical simplicity inspired his hearers. Impelled by a strong desire to go to the foreign missions, he journeyed to Rome, but fell ill, and Our Lady, in a vision, directed him to return to Barcelona. He predicted the day and hour of his death, and distributed his few possessions to the poor without revealing the reason. He was beatified in 1806 and canonized by PIUS X on May 20, 1909.

Feast: March 23.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1 (1909) 605–621. J. BALLESTER DE CLARAMUNT, Vida de San José Oriolo (Barcelona 1909). Enciclopedia de la Religión Católica, 7 v. (Barcelona 1951–56) 4.2: 838–840. T. VERGÈS I FORNS, Sant Josep Oriolo i l'Església del Pi (Barcelona 1975), art.

[S. A. JANTO]

ORIONE, LUIGI, BL.

Founder of the Congregation of the Piccola Opera della Divina Provvidenza (Little Work of Divine Providence); b. June 23, 1872, Pontecurone (Alessandria), Italy; d. March 12, 1940, San Remo (Imperia), Italy. Orione joined the Franciscans at Voghera at an early age but left because of poor health. St. John BOSCO accepted him into the Salesian Oratory in Turin (1886). In 1890 Orione entered the seminary in Tortona in his native diocese and began what was to be his main work in life by caring for poor boys.

After ordination (April 13, 1895) he opened a lodging house for needy seminarians. As the work expanded he accepted orphans and elderly and needy persons. His Little Work of Divine Providence, a network of laity and religious dedicated to charitable works and prayer, was modeled on the foundation of St. Giuseppe COTTOLENGO. To attain the goals of the Piccola Opera, Don Orione founded a number of religious congregations: the SONS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE; the LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY; the Hermits of Divine Providence; the Brothers of Divine Providence, who wear lay dress, but follow a common rule of life; and the blind Sacramentine Sisters, who dedicate themselves to prayer. By 2000 Orione's disciples in these related institutes had spread to 30 countries and were found on five continents. One hundred sixteen volumes of his writings, as well as voice recordings, are preserved in the Archives of the Piccola Opera della Divina Provvidenza in Rome.

Worn out from his labors, he died. His remains repose in Tortona. The Decretum super scripta in his beatification cause was issued in 1956. Pope John Paul II declared Orione blessed on Oct. 26, 1980, presenting him to the Church as a "marvelous and genial expression of Christian charity." The pope described him as "having the character and heart of the Apostle Paul, tender and sensitive, indefatigable and courageous, tenacious, and dynamic."

Feast: March 12.

Bibliography: A Priceless Treasure Don Orione. Letters & Writings, 2 v. (London 1995). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 72 (1981): 477–480. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 44 (1980). G. BARRA, Don Orione (Turin 1970). E. A. CUONO, Don Orione (Victoria, Argentina 1967). Don Orione. L'apostolo tortonese a 100 anni dalla nascita (Turin 1972). A. GEMMA, Don Orione: un cuore senza confini (Gorle, Italy 1989); I fioretti di Don Orione (Rome 1994). A. GEMMA, ed., La scelta dei poveri più poveri: scritti spirituali (Rome 1979). The Restless Apostle. From the Writings of Don Orione (London 1981). D. A. HYDE, God's Bandit, The Story of Don Orione, "Father of the Poor" (Westminster, MD 1957). G. PAPASOGLI, Vita di don Orione, fourth ed. (Turin 1994). G. PICCININI, Luce dai colli (Boston 1958).

[T. F. CASEY]

ORLÉANS-LONGUEVILLE, ANTOINETTE D'

Foundress of the Benedictines of Notre-Dame du Calvaire; b. Trie, near Rouen, 1572; d. Poitiers, April 25, 1618. Having been married in 1588 and widowed in 1596, she entered the Feuillantines of Toulouse in 1599 and became prioress in 1604. In 1605 her aunt Éléonore de Bourbon, abbess of FONTEVRAULT, used papal and royal influence to bring the unwilling Antoinette to be her vicar for reform of the abbey and its priories. The pope first allowed her to remain a Feuillantine in this post, but in 1607 he made her assume the habit and rule of Fontevault. Meeting constant resistance to her reforms, she sought, and in 1609 obtained, permission to resign; this she did in 1611 after her aunt's death. Guided always by Father Joseph LE CLERC DU TREMBLAY, she went to Lencloître, a priory of the order, and successfully reformed it, but interference by the jealous new abbess of Fontevault led her to get permission in 1617 to found the independent community of Notre-Dame du Calvaire. For this Antoinette established primitive Benedictine observance in a new monastery in Poitiers, where she died. Papal approbation in 1622 assured the future of the still-flourishing congregation.

Bibliography: La Fondatrice de la Congrégation des Bénédictines de Notre-Dame du Calvaire, Madame Antoinette d'Orléans-Longueville, by a nun of Notre-Dame du Calvaire (Poitiers 1932). T. CIVRAYS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 3:826–829. J. CHAUSSEY, Catholicisme 1:674–675.

[W. H. PRINCIPE]

ORONA MADRIGAL, JUSTINO, ST.

Martyr, pastor, b. April 14, 1877, Atoyac, Jalisco, Diocese of Ciudad Guzmán, Mexico; d. July 1, 1928, Guadalajara. Justino was the son of an extremely poor family. He completed his initial studies at Zapotlán, then entered Guadalajara's seminary (1894). After his ordination (1904), he served as a parish priest at Poncitlán, Encarnación, Jalisco, and Cuquío. Despite an atmosphere of anticlericalism and religious indifference, he was an exemplary priest. While he was pastor of Cuquío (Archdiocese of Guadalajara), he founded the Congregation of Claretian Brothers of the Sacred Heart to care for orphans and poor children. When the persecution intensified, he and his pastor, (St.) Atilano CRUZ, decided to remain with their flock despite the danger, but hid themselves on the nearby ranch of Las Cruces with Justino's brother José María and Toribio Ayala (June 28, 1928). Federal forces arrived there at dawn with the mayor of Cuquío. Justino opened the door, shouted "Viva Cristo Rey!," and was shot. His body was deposited in the Cuquío's town square. His mortal remains were moved to San Felipe Church in Cuquío. Fr. Orona was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (Mexico, D.F. 1979).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

OROSIUS

Ancient Church historian; b. Spain, c. 390; d. after 418, place unknown. Paul Orosius first appeared in history at Hippo, Africa, in 414 as a young priest consulting AUGUSTINE about a book on the origin of the human soul, Commonitorium de errore Priscillianistarum et Origenistarum. Augustine gave him his written opinion in 415; but meanwhile he had instructed Orosius about the new and dangerous heresy of Pelagianism and sent him to the Holy Land, where Pelagius himself was residing (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM). Orosius and Pelagius met in Jerusalem in July of 415, before a synod of the bishops of Palestine. After listening to both sides, Bishop JOHN OF JERUSALEM referred the matter to Rome and insinuated that Orosius's teaching was not entirely orthodox. In his Liber apologeticus Orosius indignantly refuted this accusation and explained why the bishops should have condemned Pelagius. Upon Orosius's return to Hippo in 416, Augustine requested him to write a book proving that greater calamities had occurred in pagan than in Christian times. This would serve as a historical supplement to his own monumental City of God.

Orosius completed this task in two years (418) and disappeared from history. He had divided the history of mankind from the creation to his own day into seven distinct periods. His work, called Historiarum adversus paganos libri VII, is dependent for its information on previous writers, except for the events from 377 to 417 about which he provides contemporary information. Orosius proved conclusively what Augustine had asked him to do, and DANTE therefore called him "the advocate of the Christian centuries" (Paradiso 10.119).

This first history of the world by a Christian writer enjoyed an immense prestige for many centuries, and over 200 MSS have been found in the medieval libraries. BOSSUET in his Universal History is indebted to Orosius. Modern historians regard it as one-sided and superficial; but even they admire the author's literary style, his appreciation of what Romania—his favorite word for Roman culture—meant to the world, his hope of a better civilization from a commingling of the Roman and Germanic people, and his sublime faith that a wise, omnipotent, and merciful God governs the affairs of men.

Bibliography: OROSIUS, Historiarum adversus paganos libri VII, ed. C. ZANGEMEISTER (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 5; 1882), Eng. Seven Books of History Against the Pagans, tr. and ed. I. W. RAYMOND (New York 1936). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 11.2:1602–11. P. GUILDAY, ed., Church Historians (New York 1926). G. DE PLINVAL, A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 4:96–97. J. MARTIN, Lexikon für Theologie und

Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1238–39.

[S. J. MCKENNA]

OROZCO, ALFONSO DE, BL.

Augustinian ascetical writer; b. Oropesa (Toledo), October 17, 1500; d. Madrid, Sept. 19, 1591. He studied first at home, then in Salamanca, and followed the lead of his elder brother Francis by entering the Augustinians in 1521. From 1530 to 1554 he was superior, successively, at Soria, Medina, Seville, Granada, and Valladolid. He was appointed court preacher and counselor to Charles V in 1554. Later he was adviser to Philip II, son of Charles. His intense apostolate merited him the good will of all. King and people alike were edified by his zeal, penitential life, and works of charity. He was beatified by Leo XIII on Oct. 1, 1881. Orozco wrote and edited many spiritual and apologetical works. His first and most important work was Vergel de oración y monte de contemplación (Seville 1544). He wrote also Desposorio espiritual (Seville 1551); Regimiento del alma (Valladolid 1551); Las siete palabras de la Virgen (Valladolid 1556); Victoria de mundo (Valladolid 1565); Arte de amar a Dios y al prójimo (Valladolid 1568); De la suavidad de Dios (Valladolid 1588); Bonum certamen (Valladolid 1562); and Regalis institutio (Alcalá 1565).

Bibliography: LEO XIII, "Quod Paulus Apostolus aiebat" (Apostolic letter, October 1, 1881) Leonis XIII Acta, 23 v. (Rome 1881–1905) 2:374–384. M. DEL PRADO GONZALEZ, "Teología de la cruz en el beato Alfonso de Orozco," Nova et Vetera 19 (1994) 327–344. L. RUBIO CALZON, El beato Alonso de Orozco hombre de letras: Índice de sus escritos y su significación como autor (Madrid 1992). F. LANG, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed., M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932) 1:392–395.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

OROZCO Y JIMÉNEZ, FRANCISCO

Mexican archbishop and educator; b. Zamora, Michoacán, Nov. 19, 1864; d. Guadalajara, Feb. 18, 1936. After entering the seminary in Mexico, he was sent to the South American College in Rome, an institution for which he had great affection and whose benefactor he remained all his life. He studied in the Gregorian University, from which he received the licentiate in theology and the doctorate in philosophy. Years later he earned another doctorate in the newly restored Pontifical University in Mexico. On his return from Rome he became professor and then vice rector of the College of Arts in Zamora, held the same post in the Clerical College of Tacuba, and again in the Seminary of Mexico. Consecrated bishop of Chiapas (1902), he devoted himself to caring for the hitherto neglected flock. Among his achievements in the diocese were the following: he founded five schools for girls and one for boys staffed with professors trained in Europe; he brought electricity to San Cristóbal de las Casas; and he helped to pacify the warring Chamulas and to lead them to a peaceful Christian existence. He became archbishop of Guadalajara in 1913, just as the years of persecution and social and political upheaval were beginning in Mexico. By 1914 he had to go into hiding, living disguised for many months, as he again had to do under President Calles in 1925. Three times he was forced into exile because of the desperate conditions. Nevertheless, Archbishop Orozco managed to increase the number of schools and bring about social improvements among his flock. Orozco y Jiménez was a great admirer of the Society of Jesus and helped it in many ways, even with financial aid during the years of persecution and exile. To him the Jesuits owed the construction of the Colegio of Ysleta where their novices and scholastics were trained from 1925 to 1951. The archbishop favored giving the Jesuits charge of the projected Montezuma Seminary. He was responsible for the publishing of various collections of documents on the history of the Church in Chiapas and Guadalajara and even paid personally for the publication of important historical works.

Bibliography: J. I. DÁVILA GARIBI, Serie cronológica de los preladados que a través de cuatro siglos ha tenido la antigua diócesis, hoy arquidiócesis de Guadalajara, 1548–1948 (Mexico City 1948); Labor científica y literaria del Excmo y Rvo. Sr. Dr. y Mtr. D. Francisco Orozco y Jiménez (Guadalajara 1937). E. VALVERDE TÉLLEZ, Bio-bibliografía eclesíástica mexicana, 1821–1943, 3 v. (Mexico City 1949).

[D. OLMEDO]

ORPHAN (IN THE EARLY CHURCH)

In the primitive Church, the local Christian community took into its care any child who had lost one or both parents. This attitude set the Church clearly apart from the pagan world, which was "without affection." Actually, except in Athens, where the law said that the state must educate the children of citizens killed in war until age 18, orphans among the pagans could count on no other assistance except that of their near relatives or the rare individual who was moved by their misery.

From the Jews of the OT the Christians inherited the conviction that God is the Father of orphans (Ps 67.6) and that the surplus of the harvests granted by God accrue by right to the orphan (Dt 24.21). But it was chiefly their "faith which works through charity" (Gal 5.6) that provided Christians with the bases and motives for their attitude toward orphans.

At Rome in the 2d century JUSTIN MARTYR declared explicitly that every Sunday, at the end of the apostolic assembly, “those who have in abundance . . . give freely, each as he wills, and what is collected is given over to him who presides, and he aids the orphans and widows” (Apol. 67). In 197 at Carthage, Tertullian wrote in the same vein and said that Christians had a common treasury into which each placed his contribution freely according to his means “to aid the boys and girls who have neither fortune nor parents” (Apol. 39). In the more important communities the deacons kept up-to-date books of the persons assisted, and the Christian orphans were officially inscribed in these. Even though the non-Christian orphans were not listed here, they were not discriminated against in the distribution of alms. The Church especially urged the faithful to adopt orphans or to give the girls dowries so that they could marry and to set the boys up as apprentices (Const. Apost. 4.1–2).

Only after the official recognition of the Church (c. 313), when the emperor aided charitable institutions by according them legal protection and financial assistance, did the Church inaugurate a new form of aid to orphans by founding, especially in the East and later in the West, homes for orphans, called orphanotrophia. St. Ephrem, St. Basil, and St. John Chrysostom distinguished themselves especially by such foundations. These houses were built not only in the shadow of the cathedrals together with other hospices, but also close to monasteries when they began to spread. Steps were taken simultaneously to educate and instruct orphan children and to use their talents for chant and liturgical ceremonies, bringing about an identification of the orphanotrophion and the schola cantorum; in some cases priests and monks were recruited from among them. About the end of the 6th century such recruitment gave rise in Rome to a type of junior seminary that provided the Church in the 7th century with four popes: Deusdedit, Leo II, Benedict II, and Sergius II.

Bibliography: L. LALLEMAND, Histoire des enfants abandonnés (Paris 1885); Histoire de la charité, 4 v. in 5 (Paris 1902–12). R. HERRMANN, La Charité de l'Église (Mulhouse 1961) 19–53. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:1301–06.

[J. BEAUDRY]

ORPHISM

A modern term for the complex of beliefs and religious practices associated with the name of Orpheus, the legendary “sweet singer” of Thrace. Contemporary scholarship is by no means in accord on the content and nature of Orphism, or even, in any meaningful sense, on its existence. Some scholars admit as evidence virtually all that is atypical of Greek religion (such as the “Orphic” grave tablets and the Pindaric passages on metempsychosis); others reject whatever is not specifically designated as Orphic.

Classical Greece recognized Orpheus as not only a poet, but also the culture hero who first instituted Greek mystery cults and rites (τελεταί). Any and all mysteries, therefore, including the Eleusinian, might be called “Orphic.” In addition, Athens in the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. knew of sectarian groups who called themselves Orphics, regarded Orpheus as their “lord,” revered sacred books, and lived an “Orphic life,” in which vegetarianism and a taboo on the use of wool were conspicuous features. There were also Orphic practitioners who preyed on men’s superstitious fears of the afterlife, professed the ability to perform salutary rites of purification, and even dabbled in magic. There is little archeological or literary evidence to suggest that these groups represented a stable and continuing movement.

In support of the claim that Orphism was possessed of a lofty spiritual content, it is customary to cite the myth of the Titans, who dismembered the infant Dionysus and were then blasted by the thunderbolt of Zeus. From their ashes or soot man was created. Thus, in the alleged Orphic interpretation, man’s nature is primarily Titanic and evil, but also, since the Titans had tasted the god’s flesh, it contains a divine element. The corollary is that man should so live as to free his divine soul from the “tomb” or “prison” of the body, and so realize his potential immortality.

The primary purpose of the myth was evidently to account for the σπαράγμος, the rending ritual of the Dionysiac cult; it enjoyed a certain currency, and, with or without the sequel of man’s creation, appears in several variant forms. Some of these may have been “Orphic,” in the sense that speculative theological writings were often sealed with his name. Yet if this was the “cardinal myth” of historic Orphism, it is strange that the inference as to man’s divine nature was explicitly drawn only once, by the late Neoplatonist, Olympiodorus (fl. sixth century. A.D.). Pending proof that the doctrine was specifically Orphic and early, the precise nature and influence of Orphism must remain problematical.

Bibliography: M. P. NILSSON, Geschichte der griechischen Religion (Munich 1955–61) 1:678–699; 2:246–431. W. K. C. GUTHRIE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1703–05, with bibliog. K. PRÜMM, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:55–86; “Die Orphik im Spiegel der neueren Forschung,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 78 (1956) 1–40.

[F. R. WALTON]

ORSI, GIUSEPPE AGOSTINO

Dominican theologian and cardinal; b. Florence, Italy, May 9, 1692; d. Rome, Italy, June 12, 1761. He taught philosophy and theology first in the convent of San Marco, FLORENCE, where he was also prior, and then after 1732 at the Casanatense Library in Rome. In 1738 he was appointed secretary to the Congregation of the INDEX; in 1749, master of the Sacred Palace; and in 1759, cardinal priest with the title of San Sisto. A man of wide learning and deep piety, he was a controversialist, theologian, and historian of high merit. His chief work is the Istoria ecclesiastica in 21 volumes (Rome 1749–62, the last volume, posthumously), which he wrote to counteract the obvious tendencies toward GALLICANISM in Claude FLEURY's Histoire ecclésiastique (Paris 1691–1723). His work goes only as far as the end of the seventh century, but it was continued to 1529 by Filippo Becchetti, OP, and republished several times. One of the best editions is that of Venice in 1822, which with its continuation runs to 42 volumes. Noteworthy among his other numerous works is the De irreformabili Romani pontificis in definiendis fidei controversiis iudicio (Rome 1739) in three volumes, written in defense of the papacy against Gallican theories.

Bibliography: G. G. BOTTARI, who edited the posthumous ed. of v. 21 of the Istoria, wrote a life of Orsi as an introd. to be found in all eds. of the work. A. FABRONI, Vitae Italarum doctrina excellentium, 18 v. (Pisa 1778–99) 11:6–36. M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 11.2:1612–19. G. MORONI, Dizionario de erudizione storico-ecclesiastica, 103 v. in 53 (Venice 1840–61) 49:144–145.

[S. OLIVIERI]

ORSINI

Important noble family of Rome, leader of the Guelfs, the supporters of the papacy in the long struggle against the empire and the Ghibellines from the twelfth to the sixteenth century. The Orsini, Colonna, SAVELLI, and Conti were among the oldest Roman families. These four families had the greatest prestige in the centuries after 1100; the Orsini and Colonna gradually became the leaders and outlived the Savelli and Conti. All depended on legends and tradition to some extent for their early history. One Orsini legend told of a widow in Flanders whose son was nursed by a domestic bear; this boy, Orso (bear), who gave the family its name, arrived in Rome c. 425 and was given land in Umbria. The Orsini claimed relationship with two medieval popes, STEPHEN II and ST. PAUL I, and with 17 other saints and blessed persons who lived between 222 and 1330, among them the brothers SS. JOHN and Paul, martyred in 362, St. BENEDICT, and his sister St. Scholastica.

B1. John Orsini, b. Rome, 1032; d. Trogir (Yugoslavia), 1110–11 (feast, Nov. 14). Before 1073 he was sent with others by Pope Alexander II to prevent a schism in Trogir. Orsini became bishop there in 1100 and kept the see united with Rome. His interest in both the spiritual and civic welfare of the city was recognized by his being declared its patron.

Anti-Ghibelline Activity. The years from c. 1100 to 1562 were of high importance for the papacy-Orsini alliance. Pitted against them were the empire and the COLONNA. Often the cries resounded in Rome: “Orsi and Holy Church,” “The People and Colonna” (see GUELFS AND GIBELLINES). From 1144 to 1280 the prestige of the Orsini increased and was higher than that of the Colonna. The first of the Orsini cardinals became Pope CELESTINE III (1191–98), and he rewarded the family with fiefs for their assistance in defeating the Colonna. From a few villages the possessions of both families had grown to a dozen or more in the thirteenth century, requiring the maintenance of more retainers. Then in 1241 Senator Matteo Rosso Orsini (d. 1246) inflicted a severe defeat on the Colonna. Their houses were destroyed and their fortified mausoleum of Augustus was captured, and Matteo remained powerful in Rome (1241–43). One of his sons, Giovanni Gaetano, became cardinal and later Pope NICHOLAS III (1277–80). But between 1288 and 1431 the Orsini during three periods were forced to play a secondary role while their rivals dominated the city. First, Pope NICHOLAS IV (1288–92), who had been bishop of Palestrina, the principal Colonna possession, favored the Colonna. They exercised great influence over him; then having become bolder, they dared to challenge Pope BONIFACE VIII. The Orsini assisted Boniface in capturing Palestrina, and several Colonna fled to France; but the triumph of the Orsini lasted only until 1303, when Sciarra and Stefano Colonna returned to Rome and were powers there for about 25 years. They made a truce with the Orsini in 1306, but fighting broke out again, and the Orsini achieved no important gains except for a brief interval after Sciarra left Rome in 1328. However, the family did not lose prestige. During the AVIGNON PAPACY and the WESTERN SCHISM (1305–1417) eight members were created cardinals. In the fourteenth century the Orsini added to their holdings Bracciano, a most valued possession for 300 years and the seat of the major branch of the family until it became extinct. With the election of a Colonna as Pope MARTIN V (1417–31), the Colonna family again became powerful. Alarmed by the position of their rival, the Orsini persuaded Martin's successor, Pope EUGENE IV, to curb the Colonna and helped to destroy Palestrina. Again in the pontificate of SIXTUS IV, the Orsini family assisted papal troops in defeating the Colonna (1481–84). There were other evidences of the importance of the Orsini:

they contracted marriages in 1444 and 1487 with two future kings of Naples, Ferdinand of Aragon and Frederick of Aragon; in 1469, with Lorenzo de' MEDICI; and in 1488, with his son Piero. During these years the Orsini built the great castle at Bracciano.

Cesare BORGIA's defeat of the Colonna seemed a victory for the Orsini; then he turned on them, and they too lost possessions. Pope JULIUS II (1503–13) restored properties to both families and brought about a brief reconciliation between them. There were times between 1523 and 1557 when the Orsini were overshadowed or defeated by the Colonna, and the Guelf cause seemed lost. The Ghibellines did not succeed, however, in overthrowing or limiting the temporal power of the papacy. The Orsini and other Guelfs were on the winning side, and they were rewarded for their support. In 1560 Pius IV promoted the Bracciano branch to the rank of duke and bestowed the honor of being one of the two princes in attendance at the papal throne. The Colonna was the other. Another service of the Orsini to the Church was the governing of the STATES OF THE CHURCH, Orsini bishops and laymen performing the required duties.

Orsini Cardinals. A study of the Orsini cardinals is another way of measuring the importance of the family to the Church. It was natural for the popes to reward their allies; accordingly, the Orsini had more cardinals than the Colonna did during the centuries of conflict; between 1144 and 1562, there were 22 Orsini and only 11 Colonna cardinals. Several times there were two or three Orsini in the college of cardinals at the same time; only twice were there two Colonna. The Orsini had a pope and three cardinals before the first Colonna was created cardinal in 1192 or 1193, and even then the Colonna had to share his honor with an Orsini simultaneously created cardinal. During the Avignon papacy and the Western Schism, eight Orsini and only four Colonna became cardinals. None of the Orsini cardinals was ever so independent as Cardinals Giacomo and Pietro Colonna in Pope Boniface VIII's pontificate, or so aggressive as Cardinal Pompeo Colonna in Pope Clement VII's pontificate. There were two Orsini popes before a Colonna was elected pope, and Martin V proved to be the only Colonna ever to achieve that honor. After the Guelf-Ghibelline conflict became passé c. 1562 and before 1789, another Orsini became Pope BENEDICT XIII; twelve Colonna but only five Orsini became cardinals. The Orsini cardinals (the first date indicates appointment) included Giacinto, 1144, who later became Pope Celestine III; Giordano, 1145 (d. 1165); Pietro, 1181 (d. 1181); Bobone, 1182 (d. 1189); perhaps another Bobone, 1192 or 1193; Giovanni Gaetano, 1244, later Pope Nicholas III; Matteo Rosso, 1261–63? (d. 1305); Giordano, 1278 (d. 1287), brother of Nicholas III; Latino Frangipane Malabranca, 1278 (d. 1294), nephew of Nicholas

Virginio Orsini, one of the commanders of the papal army of Pope Sixtus IV, in a detail of the "Crossing of the Red Sea" fresco in the Sistine Chapel, Vatican.

III; Napoleone, 1288 (d. 1342), another nephew of Nicholas III. Matteo Rosso was the grandson of Senator Matteo Rosso; he participated in 13 election conclaves, including the one that elected his uncle, Pope Nicholas III. He supported Pope Boniface VIII and opposed the French influence that lured the papacy to Avignon. Latino was a student in Paris and prior of the Dominican friary in Rome. Popes Martin IV, Honorius IV, and Nicholas IV consulted him on important questions; Dominican writers call him blessed. Napoleone also studied in Paris. He restored Orvieto and Gubbio to papal obedience under Boniface VIII. In contrast with his cousin Cardinal Matteo Rosso, he worked for the election of Pope CLEMENT V, the first pope in Avignon. Philip IV of France gave him a pension.

The fourteenth century numbered other Orsini cardinals, including Francesco, 1295 (d. 1312); Gian Gaetano, or Giovanni, 1316 (d. 1335), a legate in several provinces, opposed the Ghibellines who invited Emperor Louis IV the Bavarian to Rome, withdrew from Rome, and then brought Rome back to papal obedience after Louis's departure—Pope JOHN XXII did not approve of the cardinal's war against the Colonna and ordered him to return to Tuscany. Matteo, 1327 (d. 1340), a nephew of Cardinal Gian Gaetano, a Dominican who taught in Florence, Rome, and Paris (Dominicans call him blessed); Rinaldo, 1350 (d. 1374); Giacomo, or Jacopo, 1371 (d. 1379); Poncello, 1378 (d. 1395); Tommaso, 1379? (d. 1390); and Raimondello, 1381, marked the latter half of the turbulent century. Giordano, 1405 (d. 1438), attended the councils of PISA and CONSTANTINE; served as legate in France, England, Hungary-Bohemia for Pope Martin V; visited churches and religious houses in Rome to reform abuses; and as legate at BASEL supported Pope Eugene IV. Latino, 1448 (d. 1477), was pious and well educated in law; in 1472 he commanded the fleet against the Turks; during an illness Pope Sixtus IV and the college of cardinals visited him; he established a library that was destroyed in the sacking of Rome, 1527. Giambattista, 1483 (d. 1503); Franciotto, 1517 (d. 1533?); and Flavio, 1565 (d. 1581), spanned the sixteenth century. Alessandro, 1615 (d. 1626), spent his youth in Florence at the court of Ferdinand I, his maternal grandfather; served as legate in Ravenna, where he relieved distress during a time of poor harvests and paid peasants for their losses during the delay of court procedures; in Rome he was the patron of G. GALILEI, engaged in many charitable works, and led an ascetical life. Virginio, 1641 (d. 1676), who gave up his right of inheritance as the firstborn son in order to be a religious, became a KNIGHT OF MALTA and won renown in war against the Turks. Vincenzo Maria (his name in the Dominican Order), 1672, later became Pope Benedict XIII. Domenico, 1743 (d. 1789), a great nephew of Benedict XIII, was made a grandee of Spain by Charles III and served as Ferdinand IV's ambassador from Naples to Rome.

Conclusion. A present-day map of Rome reflects the importance of the family in four place names, three of them streets. One of the streets refers to a palace on Monte Giordano, the site of the Taverna palace today. A few years after the Savelli family became extinct, the Orsini purchased their palace (1717) at the theater of Marcellus. Later it was sold, but it is still called the Orsini palace. In 1834 Pope Gregory XVI confirmed the honor of being princes in attendance at papal functions as the exclusive right of the Orsini and Colonna families. (Special circumstances have on occasion modified this declaration.) It has been exercised by both families into the twentieth century.

Bibliography: P. LITTA et al., Famiglie celebri italiane, 14 v. (Milan 1819–1923) v. 10. G. MORONI, Dizionario de erudizione storico-ecclesiastica, 103 v. in 53 (Venice 1840–61) 27:147; 49:145–172; 55:233–243. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 1:293–297; 4:379–384; 5:247–248; 6:125–127, 218; 9:275–276. L. CÀLLARI, I palazzi di Roma (3d ed. Rome 1944). G. B.

COLONNA, Gli Orsini (Milan 1955). F. BOCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1241–44.

[M. L. SHAY]

ORTEGA Y GASSET, JOSÉ

Spanish philosopher; b. Madrid, May 9, 1883, d. there, Oct. 18, 1955. Ortega obtained his doctorate in philosophy and letters at the Central University, Madrid (1904), and subsequently attended the universities of Leipzig, Berlin, and Marburg. From 1910 to 1936 he was professor of metaphysics at the University of Madrid. He was a prolific writer; his complete works, including those published posthumously, fill nine volumes.

From his first writings, Ortega preferred the vitalistic philosophy of the turn of the century to the IDEALISM of his professors at Marburg, and he focused his attention on the individual within a concrete "circumstance." The influence of F. W. NIETZSCHE and W. DILTHEY is apparent in Ortega's writings, although he defends the originality and superiority of his philosophy over the empiricist thought of Dilthey. Several of his themes on human existence are also found in M. Heidegger, but Ortega is careful to point out the priority of his own publications.

In interpreting Ortega's thought, the chronology of his works (especially those published posthumously) must be kept in mind. The main ideas of his "metaphysics" and epistemology, substantially unchanged since about 1932, are the following. The radical reality is life, "my life." All other realities are rooted, in the sense that they must appear in one way or another, in my life. Life can be described as what "I" do with the "circumstance," or as the effort for "my" realization within a given "circumstance." The "I" or the ego is a project, a program. "Circumstance" means everything else, including my body and soul. Independently of my interpretations, the circumstance (i.e., things) consists in mere facilities and difficulties.

The "instrument" by which one can capture radical reality is the vital reason that, in the last analysis, is identical with life itself. My life, a continuous making and not something already made, must constantly consider and weigh the facilities and difficulties of the situation; it must choose—"we are necessarily free"—between the different possibilities or alternatives, and it must reason. This is the meaning of vital reason, and since life is essentially time or history, vital reason is also historical reason. Its method is narration. It does not use Eleatic, universal, and identical concepts, but concrete and "occasional" concepts of variable content.

Since every individual is a project, the circumstance or the facilities and difficulties each one faces are different. Hence each man has a different point of view vis-à-vis the universe. What one sees, another cannot see; what is true for one may not be true for another. All points of view are necessary for seeing the whole truth. The truth of ideas, as distinct from truth as authenticity, consists in their correspondence with one's idea of reality; it is "a matter of internal policy."

In spite of his perspectivism and his definition of truth, Ortega rejects RELATIVISM in the traditional sense of the term. A few texts in Ortega's earlier writings explicitly affirm the existence of a transcendent, absolute reality, whereas later expressions seem to preclude its truly transcendent and absolute character. The later position, which can hardly be interpreted from a purely phenomenological point of view, seems more in harmony with his final philosophy. Ortega wrote also, with genial insights, on philosophy of history, psychology, literature, art, sports, technology, and above all on social and political philosophy.

Ortega contributed immensely to the philosophical awakening of his countrymen; his writings, encompassing in masterful style all realms of culture, and the Revista de Occidente, which he founded and edited, introduced their readers to the whole of European and world thought. His own philosophy has influenced, in greater or less degree, contemporary Spanish laymen and thinkers in other lands. The deficiencies of his philosophy stem from his de-essentialized ideas concerning the "I" and life; his idealistic and, in spite of his protests, relativistic concept of truth; the inability of his vitalistic conception to reach transcendence; his radical historicism; and the exclusion of universal moral norms.

See Also: LIFE PHILOSOPHIES.

Bibliography: Obras completas, 9 v. (4th ed. Madrid 1957–63). J. MARÍAS, AGUILERA, Ortega y la idea de la razón vital (2d ed. Madrid 1948); La escuela de Madrid (Buenos Aires 1959). J. FERRATER MORA, Ortega y Gasset: An Outline of His Philosophy (New Haven 1957). S. M. RAMÍREZ, La filosofía de Ortega y Gasset (Barcelona 1958). F. ALLUNTIS, "The Vital and Historical Reason of José Ortega y Gasset," Franciscan Studies 15 (1955): 60–78.

[F. ALLUNTIS]

ORTHODOX AND ORIENTAL ORTHODOX CHURCHES

The word Orthodox is derived from the Greek words ὀρθός (right) and δόξα (belief).

Orthodox Churches

The term "Orthodox Churches" in its conventional historical sense designates those Churches of the Christian East that: (a) accepted and have maintained the teachings of the Council of Chalcedon, (b) hold on to the historic ecclesial and liturgical traditions of Byzantium, and (c) are in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople. The Orthodox Churches comprise three categories: (1) autocephalous churches that are self-governing, but in communion with each other and with the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople, (2) autonomous churches that have internal autonomy but remain dependent on an autocephalous church; and (3) dependent churches. A fourth category exists, comprising those churches that hold on to (a) and (b), but are separated from communion because of political exigencies (e.g., Russian Church Abroad) or theological controversies (e.g., Old Believers and Old Calendarists), are presently not in communion with Constantinople or Moscow. These churches are:

Autocephalous Churches (in order of precedence and honor):

Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople
 Patriarchate of Alexandria
 Patriarchate of Antioch
 Patriarchate of Jerusalem
 Orthodox Church of Russia
 Orthodox Church of Serbia
 Orthodox Church of Romania
 Orthodox Church of Bulgaria
 Orthodox Church of Georgia
 Orthodox Church of Cyprus
 Orthodox Church of Greece
 Orthodox Church of Poland
 Orthodox Church of Albania
 Orthodox Church in the Czech and Slovak Republics Orthodox Church in America**—The autocephaly status of the Orthodox Church in America is recognized by all other autocephalous Orthodox Churches except the Ecumenical Patriarchate, which insists that the Moscow Patriarchate has no right to grant autocephaly without its agreement.

Autonomous Churches:

Orthodox Church of Mount Sinai
 Orthodox Church of Finland
 Orthodox Church of Japan
 Orthodox Church of China
 Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church

Churches Dependent on the Ecumenical Patriarchate:

American Carpatho-Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church
 Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the USA and Diaspora
 Russian Orthodox Archdiocese in Western Europe
 Albanian Orthodox Diocese of America

Patriarch Filaret, giving sacraments to child, Ukrainian Orthodox church, Kiev, Ukraine. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Belarusan Council of Orthodox Churches in North America

Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Canada

Orthodox Churches of Irregular Status:

Old Believers (Old Ritualists)

Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia

Ukrainian Orthodox Church Kiev Patriarchate

Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church

Macedonian Orthodox Church

Old Calendar Orthodox Churches

Characteristic Features of the Orthodox Churches. Centralization of Church government was never developed in the East as was the case in the Latin West; therefore the stress has been on the autonomous action of each local bishop in his diocese, guided by the concerted actions of a Holy Synod or collegiality type of government. In all the Orthodox Churches, the bishop of the capital city, whether he is a patriarch, metropolitan, or archbishop, is considered the chief among all the other bishops of that given nation, but he has no jurisdiction in the strict sense over other bishops. All Church decisions are made by the episcopal council or synod at which the chief prelate presides, but as an equal among equals. Not only is there a supreme synod gathered around the chief prelate, but there are also lesser synods and councils for each diocese and parish. Ordinarily there are two such councils: one, an ecclesiastical tribunal, passes judgments on marriage cases, dispensations, and the granting of divorces; the other deals with the financial administration of ecclesiastical property. Orthodox Churches hold Sacred Scripture and tradition as the two founts of Christian revelation. These two sources are presented to the faithful mainly in a setting of strongly liturgical emphasis. Orthodox fidelity to tradition is revealed in its scrupulous fidelity to the teachings of the first seven ecumenical councils and the writings of the early Fathers.

Oriental Orthodox Churches

The term “Oriental Orthodox Churches” refers to those six Churches that are identified by their non-reception of the Council of Chalcedon (451), and are not in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarch. In the past, these churches were called Monophysite Churches by their opponents, although the reality was far more complex and nuanced. The term “Oriental Orthodox” is preferred, as none of these churches ever held on to the strict monophysite position of Eutychus and Dioscorus. Through ecumenical dialogues and joint statements that have emerged since the 1970s, the dispute over Chalcedon has been acknowledged as essentially one of semantics and terminology rather than substantial theology, viz., the Oriental Orthodox Churches hold on to the same christological understanding as the Orthodox and Catholic Churches. The six Oriental Orthodox Churches are:

- Armenian Apostolic Church
- Coptic Orthodox Church
- Ethiopian Orthodox Church
- Syrian Orthodox Church
- Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church
- Eritrean Orthodox Church

For further information about these churches, see under their separate headings in this encyclopedia.

Strictly speaking, the Assyrian Church of the East (erroneously known as the “Nestorian Church”) is neither Orthodox nor Oriental Orthodox, as a result of its unique christological tradition.

See Also: ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST.

Bibliography: A. ATIYA, A History of Eastern Christianity (London 1968). S. BULGAKOV, The Orthodox Church (Crestwood, NY 1988). D. CONSTANTELOS, Understanding the Greek Orthodox Church: Its Faith, History and Practice (New York 1982). N. DAVIS, A Long Walk to Church: A Contemporary History of Russian Orthodoxy (Boulder, Co. 1995). M. EFTHIMIOU and G. CHRISTOPOULOS, A History of the Greek Orthodox Church in America (New York 1984). J. ELLIS, The Russian Orthodox Church: A Contemporary History (London 1986). D. GEANAKOPOLOS, A Short History of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople (330-1990) (Brookline, Mass. 1990). P. GREGORIOS, W. LAZARETH, and N. NISIOTIS, eds., Does Chalcedon Divide or Unite? Towards Convergence in Orthodox Christology (Geneva 1981). H. HILL, ed, Light from the East: A Symposium on the Oriental Orthodox and Assyrian Churches (Toronto 1988). J. MEYENDORFF, The Orthodox Church (Crestwood, NY 1981). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999). K. WARE, The Orthodox Church, rev. ed. (New York 1997).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

ORTHODOX CHURCH IN AMERICA (OCA)

The Orthodox Church in America is an autocephalous church of the Eastern Orthodox communion, formerly known as “The Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of America,” or “the Metropolia.” Its “autocephaly” was officially granted on April 10, 1970, by the patriarch of Moscow. The Orthodox Church in America was proclaimed an autocephalous Church on Oct. 19, 1970, during the All-American Council meeting at St. Tikhon’s Monastery in South Canaan, Pa. The Metropolia adopted a new name—“Orthodox Church in America” (OCA). The OCA is a member of the World Council of Churches and the National Council of Churches in the U.S.A. Governed by a council of bishops, clergy, and laity, the OCA includes over 650 parishes and other institutions. English is the primary language of worship. Twenty Orthodox monasteries (eight female, twelve male) have been established throughout the United States and Canada under OCA jurisdiction. St. Vladimir’s Seminary, in Crestwood, N.Y., is OCA’s seminary and school of theology, while St. Tikhon Monastery in South Canaan, Pa., offers seminary studies. There is also a seminary for the training of indigenous clergy in Kodiak, Alaska. Various Orthodox groups in the United States such as Albanian, Bulgarian, Rumanian, Russian, Serbian, Ukrainian, etc., have parishes that are part of the OCA.

The first official Orthodox mission to America was launched on Dec. 21, 1793, when a group of volunteers from the monasteries Valaam and Konevitsa (located on the Russo-Finnish border) left St. Petersburg for Alaska, then a Russian territory. This missionary group included one Archimandrite; three priest-monks; one deacon-monk; one lay monk, Herman (d. 1837, canonized as Saint in 1970), famous for his ascetic life and efforts to defend Alaskan natives from ruthless Russian traders; and several staff members. Guided by Shelikov, a Russian businessman, the group traveled for 293 days and a distance of 7,300 miles before arriving at its destination.

The arrival of the first official Orthodox missionary to Kodiak on Sept. 24, 1794, occurred almost a century after the first Russian-Siberian entrepreneurs had permanently settled in Alaska. The Orthodox faith in North America is believed to have had been brought first by Orthodox laity, primarily men who baptized their indigenous wives, offspring and servants. Mass baptisms took place only after the first official Orthodox mission arrived; Juvenal, one of the missionary priest-monks, is reported as baptizing several thousand natives. Despite its relatively sensitive approach to the pre-Christian spirituality of the Aleuts (in which Orthodox Christianity was presented not as the abolition, but as the fulfillment, of the Aleut’s ancient religious heritage), the Alaskan mission had several martyrs. One of them was Juvenal himself, killed by indigenous people in 1796. After the sale of Alaska to the United States (1867), the Orthodox mission spread to other parts of the North American continent.

The permanent establishment of the North American mission owes much to the person of John Veniaminov, a priest (d. 1879 as Metropolitan Innocent of Moscow, canonized by the Russian Orthodox Church in 1977 as a Saint, “Enlightener of the Aleuts, Apostle to America and Siberia”) who arrived in Unalaska in 1824 with his family. By translating the Gospel of St. Matthew into the Unangan Aleut vernacular, then inaugurating a parish school in Unalaska in 1828, Veniaminov opened a new chapter in the story of the Alaskan Mission. Years later, when he was consecrated a bishop, Veniaminov appointed Jacob Netsvetov, a priest of Aleut and Russian ancestry who graduated from Irkutsk Seminary, (canonized by the OCA on Oct. 15 and 16, 1994 as “St Jacob, Enlightener of the Peoples of Alaska”), to conduct missionary work in the Yukon River delta. Netsvetov preached Christianity for almost 20 years among the Yup’ik Eskimo and Athabascan Native tribes, baptizing hundreds of their people in the Innoko River. Netsvetov’s headquarters was at Ikogmiut (a village known today as “Russian Mission”).

By 1867, when Alaska became an American territory, the Alaskan mission, demonstrating extraordinary linguistic adaptability and cultural sensitivity, had grown to nine Orthodox parishes having 12,000 indigenous Christians organized into 35 chapels with 17 schools and 3 orphanages. The sale of Alaska to the United States, however, altered the Orthodox church’s situation. In its effort to “Americanize” Orthodox native peoples, the new territorial authorities preferred to cooperate with proselytizing Protestant missionary groups. Under Protestant influence, Orthodox prayers, icons, and native languages were forbidden in Alaska’s American schools. This development caused the Russian Holy Synod to elevate, in 1870, the Alaskan mission to become a diocese “of the Aleutian Islands and Alaska.” The new diocesan bishop (John Mitropolsky, 1870–1876) decided to relocate to San Francisco. Mitropolsky saw San Francisco as both a city from which the Alaskan mission could best be defended and as a base for the mission’s expansion in the continental United States. In subsequent years, the diocese was transferred two times: first in 1872, when it was moved from Sitka, Alaska, to San Francisco after becoming the diocese “of the Aleutian Islands and North America” (1900); then in 1905, after incorporating a large number of “Uniate” immigrant parishes from Galicia and Carpatho-Russia, the diocesan headquarters was transferred to New York. The intention of the missionary diocese was to extend its ministry to the entire North American continent and to establish a united, culturally and linguistically pluralistic Orthodox Church in America while providing each of the Orthodox communities with a bishop of its respective nationality.

Tikhon (Belavin) (d. 1925, canonized Oct. 9, 1989) was appointed bishop of Alaska in 1898. A future patriarch of Moscow (1918), he became Archbishop of the American diocese of the Russian Orthodox Church of North America, residing in New York City from 1905 to 1907. In 1905, in keeping with the initial plan of the mission, Tikhon submitted a proposal for an autocephalous church in America to the Russian Synod of St. Petersburg. Foreseeing the inevitable Americanization of his flock, Tikhon believed that only an autonomous ecclesiastical structure, governed in America, would best reflect and help to accommodate the ethnic pluralism of its membership. From 1905 to 1907, Tikhon decentralized ecclesiastical control, adapting Russian ecclesiastical structure and worship to the local cultural environment. Tikhon encouraged services in English and published the necessary liturgical books containing translations of the liturgy into English.

Extremely rapid expansion of the missionary diocese in North America encouraged Tikhon to establish several Russian Orthodox theological schools, among them a seminary and women’s college. Such establishment allowed the missionary diocese to grow into a multi-ethnic American diocese, becoming the foundation for a new autonomous immigrant Church. By 1917, the Orthodox mission in North America included more than 350 parishes and chapels, with monasteries, orphanages, fraternal societies, and schools. It was also publishing its own printed materials.

The Russian Revolution (1917) and subsequent anti-ecclesiastical legislation in the new Soviet state hampered Tikhon’s project of establishing an autonomous American Orthodox Church. During 1918 and 1919 when The Third “All-American Council” took place, the missionary diocese attempted to defend its canonical jurisdiction over the Orthodox community in North America, but it was unsuccessful. Unable to maintain canonical unity in an increasingly polarized ethnic situation, the missionary diocese lost a substantial number of its Carpatho-Russian parishes. In 1922, these formed their own national jurisdiction. Neither could the American diocese react effectively to the establishment of a “Greek Archdiocese of North and South America” by the ecumenical patriarch, Meletios IV Metaxakis, in 1921. Intended to bring together numerous immigrant (600,000 Greek immigrants came to the United States between 1890 and 1920) Greek independent “trustee” parishes, the new Greek archdiocese became the largest Orthodox body in America; yet it was politically divided until 1931. In the same period the American missionary diocese began to decline. In 1924, after refusing to offer a statement of loyalty to the Soviet atheist government, the diocese proclaimed its self-government in cooperation (until 1926) with “the Synod in Exile,” also known as “the Karlovtsy Synod,” now known as the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad or the Russian Orthodox Church outside Russia. Due to internal divisions, the American diocese lost much of its influence as a multi-ethnic American diocese, increasingly becoming more a Russian “Metropolia,” the name by which it eventually became known. The older, typically multi-ethnic parish that had previously characterized the missionary diocese fragmented into smaller, ethnic parishes that sought to change the church’s jurisdiction. The appearance of the Greek Orthodox diocese in America plus the lack of regular canonical status for the old missionary archdiocese (metropolia) caused new non-Russian groups of immigrants to affiliate with their mother churches abroad by inviting priests directly from those countries. This process contributed to continuing division of the Orthodox community in America into a number of national dioceses and archdioceses, each of which was designated by its ethnic origin. Since the early 1920s, the majority of Orthodox parishioners in America have belonged to the denominational family of “ethnic churches” rather than to one “missionary Orthodox immigrant church.”

Currently, the Orthodox in North America remain divided into 32 distinct administrative “jurisdictions,” divisions based principally on ethnic origin. However, OCA’s proclamation of autocephaly in 1970 opened a new chapter for Orthodox Americans, who have begun to emphasize anew the unity of Orthodoxy in America, regardless of ethnic origin and independent of foreign interests. OCA, in its call to all Orthodox Christians in America, including bishops, clergy, and laity, extended an invitation to every Orthodox body in America to unite so as to constitute visibly one Church. This remains the official position of the Orthodox Church in America, although OCA’s autocephaly has not been recognized by the Ecumenical Patriarchate which, being “first among equals,” claims that it alone among Orthodox Churches has the authority to grant autocephaly. Recent meetings between the Ecumenical Patriarch and the primate of the Orthodox Church in America, Metropolitan Theodosius, and more specifically the Ecumenical Patriarch’s historic visit to St. Nicholas OCA’s Cathedral in Washington, D.C., on July 4, 1990, indicate the concerns of both churches for unity of the Orthodox Church and for Orthodoxy in America. Relations between OCA and the Greek archdiocese, previously strained at times, improved during the 1990s.

The OCA appears to be the principal church claiming a direct continuation of efforts begun by the first Orthodox missionaries to North America in 1794. The OCA has about 1,000,000 members of Russian, Ukrainian, Bulgarian, Macedonian, Serbian, Romanian, Mexican, and Albanian backgrounds, who represent half of an almost 2,000,000 American population identifying itself as Orthodox Christian. These numbers are based on independent national religious surveys from 1970 to 1993 and on U.S. Census data from 1990, as quoted by OCA’s sources.

Bibliography: BISHOP GREGORY (AFONSKY), History of the Orthodox Church in Alaska, 1774–1914 (Kodiak, AK 1977). P. GARRETT, St. Innocent: Apostle to America (Crestwood, NY 1979). M. OLEKSA, Alaskan Missionary Spirituality (Crestwood, NY 1992). Orthodox America 1794–1976: Development of the Orthodox Church in America, C. J. TARASAR and J. H. ERICKSON, eds. (Syosset, NY 1975). R. PIERCE, The Russian Orthodox Religious Mission in America, 1794–1837 (Kingston, ONT 1978). W. SPERRY, Religion in America, Orthodox Christians in North America, 1794–1994 (Orthodox Christian Publications Center 1995). M. STOKOE, in collaboration with L. KISHKOVSKY, Orthodox Christians in North America 1794–1994 (Oyster Bay Cove, NY 1994). Historical Dictionary of the Orthodox Church, M. PROKURAT, A. GOLITZIN, & M. D. PETERSON, eds. (Lanham, MD 1996).

[M. YOUROUKOV/R. B. MILLER]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF BULGARIA

An autocephalous Orthodox Church and national church of Bulgaria that is in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE.

Early history. In 679, the Bulgars, led by Asparukh [or Ispерikh (643–701)] had defeated a Byzantine army led by Emperor CONSTANTINE IV, forcing Byzantium to accept a peace treaty in 681. Moving south, the Bulgarians settled in territories where Christianity had been flourishing for several centuries. The Church Council of Serdica (modern-day Sofia) in 342 A.D. gave evidence of Christianity’s popularity and the importance of that territory for its development in the early fourth century. Contacts between Bulgarians and Christians increased, especially after rapid expansion of the Bulgarian state during the reign of Krum (802–814), but it was not until 865, under Khan (Tsar) BORIS (852–889) that Christianity became the official religion in Bulgaria. The peace treaty of 863 between Byzantium and Bulgaria required, among other things, that Boris permit Byzantine missionary activity in Bulgaria.

Boris’ baptism in 865, followed by mass baptisms of Bulgarians, opened the door to the establishment of Orthodox Christianity in Bulgaria. But in 866, when PHOTIUS, the patriarch of Constantinople rejected Boris’ request to establish a national hierarchy, Boris switched his allegiance to Pope NICHOLAS I. That same year, Boris sent emissaries to Rome, requesting Latin missionaries, Latin liturgical books, and a civil code to replace those of the Byzantine missionaries. Encouraged by Pope Nicholas I's positive response in his famous letter to the Bulgarians, by which the pope revealed his intention for the institution of a Bulgarian hierarchy, Boris gave his full support to the work of Latin missionaries. The Bulgarian drift toward Rome was evidenced by intensive Latin missionary activity, and by the preaching and celebration of Latin liturgy. In 868 Boris wrote to Pope ADRIAN II, reminding him of his predecessor's (Pope Nicholas I) support for a Bulgarian autocephalous church. However, he was frustrated by Rome's slowness to his request, and disappointed when the pope refused to name Marinus (whom Boris favored) as head of the Bulgarian hierarchy. Expressing his displeasure with the pope's replacement of Formosus (a bishop of Porto and a head of the Latin mission to Bulgaria) by the subdeacon Sylvester, Boris seized the opportunity to turn, once again, toward Constantinople.

The issue of the jurisdiction of the Bulgarian Church became a contentious point between Rome and Constantinople at the Fourth Council of Constantinople (870). Over the protests of the Roman legates, the Byzantines, with the approval of Ignatius, Patriarch of Constantinople, sent an archbishop and several bishops to Bulgaria. Despite Byzantine attempts to reintroduce their rite into Bulgaria, neither Byzantine nor Latin rites succeeded. Rather, the newly introduced Byzantine-Slav rite appeared more suitable for the needs of the Slavs. Institution of the Slav rite resulted from efforts of SS. Cyril and Methodius and their disciples, who developed the Slavic alphabet and translated the Holy Scriptures and Byzantine liturgical books into Slavic (a language contemporarily known as Old Bulgarian or Old Church Slavonic). This new rite accelerated the Christianizing of Bulgaria. The arrival in Bulgaria in 886 of Clement, Naum, Angelar, and other disciples of Methodius, who had been expelled from Moravia after Pope Stephen V's prohibition of Slavic liturgy there, constituted an event of signal importance for efforts to Christianize Bulgarians and Slavs.

In Bulgaria, Cyril's and Methodius' disciples undertook translations of church books and the training of priests. St. Clement and St. Naum established influential church and educational centers in Pliska, Preslav, and Ohrid (on the shores of Lake Ohrid, in Macedonian territory today), where more than 3,000 priests were educated to conduct religious services in Old Bulgarian (Slavonic). During the next two decades, Christianity in Bulgaria developed into a full-scale national Church headed by an archbishop approved by Constantinople, the first of whom was Joseph, appointed on March 4, 870. Consequently, Boris' waverings between Rome and Constantinople eventually resulted in the establishment of an autonomous Bulgarian church. But it was not until 893 that Christianity was proclaimed as the state religion by the national assembly, after which the Slavic language was officially adopted and Byzantine books were replaced by Slavic texts.

An important political dimension of the Bulgarian conversion to Christianity was the centralization of authority, as evidenced during the reign of Boris' younger son, Simeon (893–927). To further his efforts at reorganizing the ecclesiastical hierarchy and replacing Greek bishops with bishops of Slavic origin, Simeon appointed two new bishops. Clement was consecrated bishop of Velika and Dragovitya (today's Macedonia), while Constantine was named bishop of Preslav. Simeon's dream of Bulgaria having a national hierarchy, indigenous clergy, a unique liturgy and religious practices of its own was for a time fulfilled. John Exarch became the first Bulgarian archbishop appointed to the town of Preslav (904). Ecclesiastical development progressed even further when the National Synod of Preslav (918) proclaimed Leontius, the archbishop there, "Patriarch of Bulgaria," thereby establishing the Bulgarian Patriarchate. But it was not until the last year of Simeon's reign (927), when Damian, successor of Leontius, was formally recognized as patriarch by both Rome and Constantinople. By the end of Simeon's reign, the Bulgarian Patriarchate (by then relocated to Dorostol—today the town of Silistra) had as many as forty dioceses and metropolitans under its jurisdiction.

Under Simeon's successors, Byzantium invaded and gained control of Bulgaria. In 1018 Bulgaria and the Bulgarian Church completely lost their independence, remaining under the control of Byzantium until 1185. The Greek hierarchy took control of the Patriarchate of Ohrid in an attempt to replace the Bulgarian Slavic rites with liturgy in the Greek language. The archbishop of Ohrid was a Greek, appointed by Constantinople, as were all the bishops under his jurisdiction. The See of Ohrid, which had arisen as a most important center of Slavic Christianization, after 1018 became a bastion for the Hellenization of Bulgaria. It was from Ohrid in 1054, that Bulgaria became mired in the Schism between Rome and Constantinople (the archbishop of Ohrid, Leo was a supporter of Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople). For the Bulgarian church, the century and a half of Hellenic domination had been devastating. The resultant lack of communication between a Greek hierarchy imposed by Constantinople and the church's lower clergy, most of whom were of Bulgarian origin, permitted resurgence of the PAULICIAN and BOGOMIL sects.

During the reign of Ivan's and Peter's brother and successor Kaloyan (1197–1207), primacy of Rome in Bulgarian church affairs was reasserted. Pope INNOCENT III granted Kaloyan the title of king. He also reaffirmed Archbishop Basil of Bulgaria as primate of the Bulgarian Church (1204), encouraging the latter to retain the church's well-established Slavic rites. But the fall of Constantinople under the crusaders on April 13, 1204, accompanied with an extreme cruelty with which the crusaders treated the local population, some of Bulgarian descent, seemed to have cooled Kaloyan's feelings toward Rome. Unwilling to surrender to the crusaders, who had already been looking for Bulgaria's submission, Kaloyan sought Pope Innocent III's intercession for a peaceful outcome, but to no avail. Alienated, Bulgaria returned to the Byzantine sphere of influence, especially after Byzantium's new recognition of the Bulgarian church's independence. But the final break with Rome did not come officially until 1235, when the Bulgaro-Byzantine Council of Blasherna proclaimed autonomy of the Bulgarian Church, in communion with Nicaea, while reaffirming the title of patriarch for the head of the Bulgarian church in the capital of Turnovo.

Bulgaria under the Turks. The period from 1396 to 1878 witnessed the end of the Bulgarian kingdom and the beginning of five centuries of Turkish political domination in Bulgaria. For the Bulgarian church, this was a period of Greek ecclesiastical domination which came into effect in 1416. Proclaimed by the Ottomans to be the Father of all Christians (or the "Roman nation," Rum millet), the Patriarchate of Constantinople was established in Phanar as a vehicle for mediation between the Sublime Portal (Turkish government) and the Christian population dwelling in the Ottoman empire. Greeks gradually replaced Bulgarian bishops while the Greek language was substituted for Bulgarian in churches. This led to a forceful Hellenization of the Slavic population and ecclesiastical domination of the Bulgarian church, which actually ceased to exist for almost five hundred years. The archbishops of Ochrid were the only exceptions, as they temporarily retained the titles of primates or patriarchs of Bulgaria. This situation remained until 1767, when the archbishop of Ochrid became a subject of Constantinople. The liturgy was celebrated in Bulgarian only in monasteries hidden among remote mountains.

In 1870 Makaripolski succeeded in creating an Orthodox exarchate recognized by the Turkish Sublime Portal, which issued a decree establishing an autocephalous Bulgarian church. Headed by an EXARCH with jurisdiction over the 15 dioceses of Bulgaria and Macedonia, the church again became a moving force in Bulgarian life. The exarchate represented Bulgarian interests to the Sublime Portal and sponsored subsequent expansion of Bulgarian churches and schools. The national synod of the Bulgarian exarchate in Constantinople approved the first ecclesiastical constitution in 1871, although the Greek patriarch based there refused to recognize this independent church and subsequently excommunicated its adherents (1872). But the exarchate reorganized and consolidated after the Russian-Turkish war (1878), when Bulgaria achieved a measure of political independence.

The Church Stands against Jewish Deportation.

After election of Ferdinand Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, a grandson of Louis-Philippe of France, as a prince of Bulgaria by the Grand National Assembly in July of 1887, Bulgaria officially became a monarchy. Boosted by the 19th century national revival which was reflected in church life, education, and monasticism, the Church nevertheless began showing some signs of decline by the mid-20th century. The period between the two world wars was difficult for Bulgarians. In an effort to maintain a de facto neutrality, positioned as it was between Hitler's Germany and Stalin's USSR, Bulgaria allied with Germany and adhered to Hitler's treaty of 1939 promising not to invade the Soviet Union. Bulgaria's alliance with Germany brought the most difficult modern challenge to the Bulgarian nation and church: how to boycott Nazi plans for deporting Bulgarian Jews to Poland for eventual extermination in concentration camps. The official reaction of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church against state-sustained anti-Semitism opened a chapter of Bulgarian modern church history known as "the rescue of the Bulgarian Jews in 1943." Bulgarian church resistance to anti-Jewish legislation began as soon as the government announced a project to establish a "Law for a Defense of the Nation (1940)." In his memorandum dated Nov. 15, 1940, Archbishop Neofit of Vidin countered that any persecution of individuals belonging to ethnic or religious minorities would impede the Church's divine mission of salvation.

In 1943 the Bulgarian Orthodox Church then initiated its rescue effort. Two metropolitans played a significant role in defending Jews: Stefan, archbishop of Sofia, and Kiril, archbishop of Plovdiv (and future patriarch of Bulgaria). Kiril became noteworthy for his successful effort to release 1,500 Plovdiv Jews who had been arrested and prepared for deportation. Kiril sent a telegram to King Boris and the Bulgarian government informing them of the church's intention to stop, "by any means," the anti-Jewish action. He declared that he would lie down on the rails in front of the train transporting the Jews rather than allow this to happen. The success of his campaign became evident on March 10, when orders were issued to release imprisoned Jews in Plovdiv. Some members of the Bulgarian National Assembly supported Kiril's action, and Peshev, a congressman, together with 42 members belonging to the majority of the assembly, on March 17 signed a letter of protest to the prime minister against Jewish deportations.

In later stages of the Jewish deportation campaign, the church harbored many Jews, hiding them from the police. Dr. Hananel, the chief rabbi in Bulgaria, found temporary refuge in Archbishop Stefan's house on May 24, 1943. Stefan assured the rabbi that the Holy Synod of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church would do everything possible to halt Jewish deportations. In correspondence with the king and top government officials, Stefan warned that he would open the doors of all Bulgarian churches and turn them "into fortresses in defense of . . . the Jews" if anti-Jewish persecutions continued. King Boris himself resisted Nazi imposition of the deportation campaign. By this solid resistance of the Bulgarian Church, the king and some members of the National Assembly, many Jews from Bulgaria (around 50,000) were saved.

The Church under Communism. The new communist regime which came into power at the end of World War II showed an anti-religious orientation almost immediately after its establishment. Between 1944 and 1947, several influential events involving the Bulgarian Orthodox Church took place. First, Metropolitan of Sofia Stefan was elected exarch of Bulgaria on Jan. 21, 1945. On February 22 of the same year, the schism imposed on the Bulgarian Orthodox Church by Constantinople in 1872 was lifted. Under the new regime, the Church lost not only its international connections but also its relevance to Bulgarian society. Overall reduction of the Church's role in Bulgarian society had a predictably negative impact on Orthodox clergy. Despite the Holy Synod's decision of Dec. 14, 1945, to organize parish schools in all parishes, the process of decline in religious education proved irreversible. Eventually, Orthodox Christian seminaries in Plovdiv and Sofia were closed down, at first under pretext of accommodating Soviet troops. New legislation that came into effect on June 27, 1947, authorized the expropriation of two-thirds of the Church's extensive property holdings.

As head of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, Exarch Stefan attempted to adapt to the new political regime, but he resisted efforts of the Bulgarian Communist Party to control church affairs directly. Such resistance was futile, and many Bulgarian Orthodox bishops and clergy, together with their Catholic and Protestant counterparts, were executed or imprisoned during the persecutions that followed. In its effort to dominate church affairs, the communist government fomented internal dissension in the Bulgarian Orthodox Church by establishing a priests' union, which challenged the church's constitution. Stefan resigned his office, allegedly under pressure, and retired to a monastery on Sept. 6, 1948. Legislation adopted on Feb. 24, 1949, subjected all religious denominations to strict state supervision. Kiril, Stefan's successor, did not offer effective resistance as the new state restrictions on religious associations brought church activities under complete state control.

The reestablishment of the Bulgarian patriarchate in 1953, without approval of the Patriarchate in Constantinople (this approval did not come until 1961 under the Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras), completed the process of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church's consolidation under the communist regime (1944–1987). Kiril, Metropolitan of Plovdiv, was elected as new patriarch of Bulgaria.

The situation of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church did not significantly change after Kiril's death, which was followed by Maximus' election as the new patriarch of Bulgaria in 1971. The church remained under state restrictions and continued its decline in numbers of clergy, religious, and laity. It was during this period when many worship places fell into disuse for lack of priests and monastic vocation, while a few smaller monasteries were quietly taken over by the state and converted into medical facilities and other state establishments. Isolated from society and from Bulgarian youth, who were then engaged in forceful participation in the Young Communists League (komsomol), the Church barely managed to survive.

The situation did not change significantly until the late 1980s, when reforms launched by Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev began to have some impact in Bulgaria. Among various dissident groups organized in Bulgaria, one named the "Committee for Defense of the Religious Rights, Freedom of the Conscience and Spiritual Values" was led by Christophor Sabev, an Orthodox hieromonk residing in Veliko Tarnovo. Founded on Dec. 15, 1988, the group had several objectives: primarily liberation of the hierarchy of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church from communist influence; reestablishment of religious education in state schools; and guaranteeing freedom to conduct religious rites and ceremonies in public places. The organization also demanded changes to previous denominational law and abrogation of restrictions applying to religious publications.

The movement conducted its campaign by organizing peaceful candlelight processions of icons (called litias) in which several hundred people participated. The organization was persecuted and its leader, Christophor Sabev, was arrested and briefly jailed. Under pressure from the regime, on March 28, 1989, the Church's Holy Synod denounced Christophor Sabev's movement, claiming that such establishment contradicted canons of the Orthodox Church and its Constitution. But the eventual fall of communism in Bulgaria, following Zhivkov's resignation on Nov. 10, 1989, marked the beginning of a post-communist era, when Christophor Sabev's movement became a central element of the democratic opposition to the old regime.

The Post-Communist Era Schism. After elections in the autumn of 1991, Sabev became a member of the opposition in Parliament, then led by the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF). With UDF's help, Sabev decided to launch a campaign for purging the Bulgarian Orthodox Church of communist element and influences. The process of church "decommunization" was intended to begin with the head of Bulgarian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Maxim. Primarily this was because Maxim's election had taken place under communist rule and he had the support of the communist regime. Furthermore, Maxim and his synod were not widely believed to have reacted effectively on issues of human rights and religious freedom during the communist regime. In an effort to purge the Bulgarian Orthodox Church and compel Patriarch Maxim to resign, Sabev and his allies applied political pressure, which apparently had a negative effect on the Bulgarian Orthodox Church's ecclesiastical life. Sabev's subsequent struggle for the Church's decommunization, in which other members of its hierarchy were involved, precipitated a major ecclesiastical crisis by publicly challenging both the Church's integrity and its moral authority.

The process of decommunization began when four metropolitans influenced by Sabev's political power (among them Pankratiy and Kalinik, who had occupied two of the most important administrative positions during the communist period: those of the Church's internal and external affairs) decided to abandon Maxim and the synod over which he presided. The group established an alternative synod (May 19, 1992) under the presidency of Metropolitan Pimen, who was afterward elected as the alternative patriarch of Bulgaria. Intended to be a promoter of renewal within the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, the alternative synod was envisioned as lasting until a subsequent national church council provided conditions for new elections. Sabev's incorporation into the new ecclesiastical structure and his elevation to the episcopate was intended to be the most significant symbol of church renovation.

Fulfillment of the plan began with Sabev's direct intervention into the Council of Ministers, through the Department of Religious Denominations that had been created by the communist regime to control all religious institutions from one centralized political entity. The same department then declared illegal Maxim's position as patriarch, an office he had occupied for twenty-two years. Metody Spasov, at that time head of the Religious Denominations Department, announced the decision on the basis of the Council of Minister's edict #92 from May 25, 1992. One day after the Council of Ministers announced Maxim's deposal, Sabev was consecrated as a bishop by the metropolitans Pankratiy, Kalinik, and Stefan in the presence of bishops Antony and Galaction.

Regarding this announcement as political interference in church affairs, the majority of Bulgarian Orthodox Church's metropolitans and bishops who had supported Maxim decided to file an official protest against the decision. But with government approval Sabev and his supporters occupied the office building of the Holy Synod on May 31, 1992, paralyzing the operation of Maxim's synod. Maxim lodged a criminal complaint "for breaking in" against Sabev, Pimen, and their supporters, but without any effect. Instead, instructions came from the prosecutor's office of the Republic of Bulgaria on July 10, 1992, confirming the government's support for Pimen and his new synod. Maxim, in turn, convoked a National Archbishop Council, which on July 22, 1992, condemned the new schism and what the council called "the illegal consecration of Sabev" into the episcopacy. The council unfrocked the four participating metropolitans as well as the bishops who had joined them.

There were efforts from the side of the Bulgarian society and Bulgarian Orthodox Church's lower clergy to reconcile the two rival groups within the church. On Sept. 3, 1992, an alternative clerical organization called the Movement for Reunion of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church met with Prime Minister Philip Dimitrov and other representatives of his government in an effort to solve the problem, but they met with no evident success. A Bulgarian High Court decree on Nov. 5, 1992 confirmed the Council of Ministers Department of Religious Denominations' decision, thereby sanctioning the alternative Holy Synod with Metropolitan Pimen as its recognized presiding bishop. The UDF's government supported the High Court's decision.

Events occurring between May 19 and Nov. 5, 1992 denoted a process of gradual separation (schism) that took place first within Bulgarian Orthodox Church's hierarchy and clergy, then within the laity. Both sides of the divided synod claimed to be the ruling body within the Church. The majority of parishes and parish priests within the Church, as well as two-thirds of the metropolitans and bishops, defended Patriarch Maxim and his synod while some leaders of the Priest Union, and UDF's government headed by Philip Dimitrov, seemed to support Pimen's side. Ongoing government intervention in the Bulgarian Orthodox Church's affairs apparently contributed to subsequent widening of the schism, resulting in further deterioration of ecclesiastical life and an increase in civil disorder.

After he became a bishop, Sabev gradually separated from the group which had consecrated him. He gave as his reason Pankratiy's and Kalinik's participation in ecumenical services, of which the more conservative Sabev disapproved. Not seeing "signs of repentance" from the side of metropolitans Kalinik and Pankratiy, Sabev separated from them and founded a new archbishopric in Ternovo. Subsequently, he lost much of his personal political influence; the ecclesiastical body he founded exists today, but with diminished influence. Several attempts at reuniting the two synods have not succeeded. Most notable among these was an attempt in 1988, when the Panorthodox Council was convoked in Sofia. Orthodox patriarchs and archbishops from all over the world gathered in Sofia to try and resolve the schism within the Bulgarian Orthodox Church. The council recognized all of the consecrations effected by the alternative synod, invited all of the bishops to join Maxim's synod and declared the schism to be over. Metropolitans Pancratiy and Kalinik repented and returned to the earlier synod under Maxim, but Pimen remained in the schism until his death in 1999. Pimen's alternative synod continues to exist, although only a small group of clergy remain involved. After decisions of the State High Court, currently two different bodies under the name of Bulgarian Orthodox Church exist juridically. A third ecclesiastical body, known as "The Bulgarian Orthodox Church of the Old Calendar" also exists, but it is not in communion with either of the other two recognized church bodies.

Bibliography: I. BOICHEV, "Varkovniat sud osadi tzerkovnite dela kaktó Pilat xristovite," Duma 158 (June 3, 1992). I. BORISLAVOV, "Archiereisky sabor smukna rasoto na Sabev I go otlachi ot tzerkvata," Duma 175 (July 23, 1992). C. BOYADJUEFF, Saving the Bulgarian Jews in World War II (Ottawa 1989). P. DIMOV, "Zashto ne varviat rabotite v Tzerkvata," Democrazia 215 (791) (Sept. 9, 1992). I. DUIYCHEV, Balgarsko Srednovkovie. Prouchvaniya Varhu Politicheskata I Kuturna Istoriya (Sofia 1972). C. B. FREDERICK, The Bulgarian Jews and the Final Solution 1940–1944, (Pittsburgh 1972). D. KALKANDZIEVA, Balgarskata Pravoslavna Tsarkva I Darzhava 1944–1953 (Sofia 1977). N. MAKOV, "Ot tzerkovnia spor gubiat mirianite," Democrazia 211 (787) (Sept. 4, 1992). C. SABEV, Svetlina za Bulgaria (Veliko Tarnovo 1994). T. SABEV, et al., "Church Life and Ecumenical Relations under the Communist Rule," History of the Ecumenical Movement (World Council of Churches, 2002). T. SABEV, Samostoyna Narodnostna Tsarkva v Srednovkovna Balgaria (Sofia 1987). I. SNEGAROV, 1100 godini ot Pokrastyvaneto na Balgarskiya narod (Sofia 1966). V. N. ZLATARSKI, Istoriya na Balgarskata Darzhava Prez Srednite Vekove (Sofia /v tri Toma 1970–1972).

[M. YOUROUKOV]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF CYPRUS

This church received its status as an autocephalous church in the Council of EPHESUS (431) with an archbishop as its head. It is ruled today by the constitution of 1914 and other synodal rulings made in 1917–18. Supreme authority belongs to its Holy Synod, which includes the archbishop and three metropolitans who make up the entire hierarchy of the four eparchies. The archbishop resides in Nicosia, and, according to the Orthodox precedence, holds fifth place among the Orthodox leaders; but this is disputed by the Russian Orthodox Patriarch.

Bibliography: R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999).

[G.A. MALONEY/EDS.]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GEORGIA

The Republic of Georgia, called in early times Iberia, is located in the region commonly known as Central Asia. A part of the Soviet empire for much of the 20th century, it gained its independence in the aftermath of the collapse of Soviet communism. This entry treats of the Orthodox Church of Georgia. For the historical development of the Georgian Church, see GEORGIA, CHURCH IN ANCIENT.

Organization. The Georgian Orthodox Church came under the Russian Moscow patriarchate when Czar Alexander annexed Georgia in 1801. The Georgian catholicos was forced to resign and was replaced by a Russian exarch nominated by the Holy Synod of Saint Petersburg. From that time until the Russian revolution of 1917 the Georgian Church was under the domination of the Russian Orthodox Church, which sought at every turn to suppress all native elements in the Georgian hierarchy and liturgy, making both conform to the centralization of Moscow. But when the Russian czar fell and along with him the Russian Orthodox Church as the state religion, the Georgian Church seized the opportunity to establish once again under a native catholicos. The Communists annexed Georgia as a republic of the Soviet Union in 1921, but the Georgian Church clung to its autocephalous status, and was finally recognized as independent of the Moscow patriarchate by Patriarch Sergius on Oct. 31, 1943.

The supreme head of the Georgian Church is the catholicos-patriarch, elected and consecrated by the assembly of bishops. The country is divided into eparchies (dioceses). Traditional Georgian law granted the catholicos-patriarch the same power as that of a king. In exceptional cases, the kings intervened in the affairs of the Church. On the other hand, by tradition the clergy participated in the life of the state. Thus the highest representatives of the Church sat at the Council of State (Darbazi) next to high officials and representatives of the country.

In the hierarchy of the state, the second rank (prime minister) was reserved to a bishop, who at the same time retained the episcopal See of Tshkondidi (Chqondidi); so the prime minister was also called Tshkondideli (of Tshkondidi). Thus Church and State were in accord.

Liturgy. Archbishop John, the original head of the Georgian Church, introduced the Greek liturgy and performed the ceremonies in Greek, which was subsequently replaced by the Georgian language. The first version of the liturgy in the Georgian tongue was that of Saint James. Translated in the Georgian convent of Jerusalem, it remained in use until the 10th or 11th century. The manuscripts of this version are preserved in the Library of Mount Sinai, at Gaza, at the Vatican, and at Tiflis (Tbilissi). In the 10th or 11th century, following a translation by Euthime and George of Mthatsminda, the liturgy of Saint Basil and Saint Chrysostom replaced the previous one. In the 12th century, the "Typicon" of Saint Saba was translated and widely used. The liturgy, as revised by Philatoes (XIV), was celebrated in Georgia from the 18th century on. At the same time, Catholicos-Patriarch Antony I made it correspond more closely with Slavic texts.

The Georgian Euchlogion is divided into "Kondaki," or various liturgical texts, used in the liturgy and Divine Office and "kurthkhevani," or various benedictions for stated occasions.

Mass was always accompanied by chants. Nine collections of liturgical hymns are known: five are in Georgia, three at Mount Sinai and one at Mount Athos. The most ancient chant is dated about the 8th century. The more important ones were composed by Michael Modrekili, a monk composer, and were accompanied by musical notes that remained undecipherable because they resembled no existing sign. The enigma was finally solved in 1962 by the Georgian scholar Paul Ingorokva.

Like the notes, the Georgian ecclesiastical chants also are of Georgian origin. They were based on a very old form; only the words were changed. Even when translation was necessary, care was taken to adapt them to the Georgian form and style.

Monastic Life. Because the life of the Georgian people was often agitated within the country, their monastic life found its expansion on foreign soil. The first Georgian convent was founded in Jerusalem by Peter the Iberian; it was later restored by Emperor Justinian. This was the Convent of the Cross, at present possessed by the Greeks. In Palestine the Georgians possessed other convents: Saint Nicholas, Saint Saba, Saint John, the Grotto of Bethlehem, Saint Abraham, and Saint Basil. To these should be added the convents of Saint Samuel in the basin of the Jordan, of Kranie, of Saints Cosmas and Damian, of the cavern near Antioch, of Mount Sinai, of Ezra and of Kastana on Mount Black. All these monasteries and others were founded between the 5th and the 9th century.

The second period of monastic life abroad coincided with the foundation of the famous convent of Iviron on Mount Athos in Greece, now (1965) possessed by the Greeks. This monastery was founded in the 10th century, by John, a former officer of King David the Couropalate, who embraced the monastic life. His example was followed by his only son, Euthime, who became a famous Doctor of the Church, a new Chrysostom, as he was called. He had worthy successors, the most important of whom was George of Mthatsminda.

In the 11th century, another Georgian lord, this time the great domesticos of the Byzantine Empire, Gregorii Bakouriani, founded a monastery at Batchkovo (Bulgaria). He endowed it with an extraordinary amount of goods and presented it with a typicon whose original Georgian version and Latin translation were published by Father Tarchnichvili at Louvain in 1954. From the beginning of the 12th century, this convent was governed by the great Doctor of the Church, John Petritzi, who later became rector of the academy of Guelathi.

In all these convents, the Georgian monks conducted cultural activity on a large scale. In order to provide Georgian churches with necessary books, they produced manuscripts, many of which have universal value.

In Georgia itself, monastic life began a little later. However, by the 5th century some convents had been already erected, and in the 6th century the Syrian Fathers established a great number of them. The first ones were founded by John at Zedazeni and by David at Garedja; Shio, called the Troglodite, chose a grotto where he established his residence. Others followed their example. At the same time (6th century) were built the episcopal church of Mtskhetha, the cathedral of Sion at Tiflis, the monasteries of Ananouri and Alaverdi, and others.

Famous was the monastic movement in Tao-Klardjethie, from the 8th to the 10th century, initiated by the celebrated Gregory of Khandztha. The 12 better-known monasteries were Daba, Opiza, Mere, Parekhi, Khandztha, Shatberdi, Miznazoni, Tskarosthavi, Baratheltha, Bertha, Djmerki, and Doliskana. They were subsequently followed by the famous churches of Koutaisi and Ateni and by the monasteries of Zazma, Safara, Khakhouli, and others.

Consequently, the 10th century was a time of splendor for Georgian Christian literature. Three great centers rivaled one another: that of Syria and Palestine, of the Balkans, and of Tao-Klardjethie. In addition to literature, these centers formed the leaders of the Georgian Church. It was they who directed Georgia's academies, which in turn formed the leaders of the state.

Thus Christianity embraced the whole life of the Georgian people. Among the great personages, first place belongs to Peter of Iberia, son of a Georgian king and bishop of Gaza, who became one of the most celebrated heads of Christianity in the East. He had been educated at the court of Byzantium for a career of state, but became a cleric instead. He was believed to be the author of the Areopagitic books. Among the great Doctors of the Church, Gregory of Khandztha (9th century), John and Euthime (10th century), George of Mthatsminda, George Khoutsés-Monazoni, Ephrem the Minor (11th century), and philosophers Petritzi and Arsen of Ikaltho (12th century) deserve mention.

Holy Books. Holy Books were translated in Georgia from the very beginning of Christianity. Some fragments of the Bible, translated in the 5th century, have been preserved. However, according to all indications, translation had already begun at the end of the 4th century. First to be translated were the "Epistles of the Apostles," which have been preserved in a manuscript of the 9th century and which report the date of their translation as 397 to 398.

Later followed the translation of the New Testament, from Greek and Syrian, and perhaps even from Hebrew. Translations, as well as original works of the 7th and 8th centuries, were numerous. Most of the texts have been preserved in several translations, since, for the purpose of improvement, they were translated a second and even a third time. The last edition of the Bible, in its definitive form, was elaborated by the Monastery of Iviron in the 10th and 11th centuries. It has been used until the present time.

In 1709 King Vakhtang established a printing press, and the New Testament was the first book to be published. However, the entire Bible was printed for the first time in Moscow in 1743 by order of the Royal Princess of Georgia. The last edition, a partial one, completed for scientific purposes, and with very limited printing, was published after World War II.

Bibliography: M. F. BROSSET, comp. and tr. Histoire de Géorgie: Depuis l'antiquité jusqu'au XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle, 5 v. (Leningrad 1849–58), containing chronicles and hist. annals of Georgia. G. D. DZHAVAKHISHVIL, Kharthelvi eris istoria, v.1 (Tiflis 1960). W. E. D. ALLEN, A History of the Georgian People (London 1932). A. MANVELICHVILI, Histoire de Géorgie (Paris 1951). P. PEETERS, "Les débuts du Christianisme en Géorgie d'après les sources hagiographiques," Analecta Bollandiana 50 (1932) 5–58. M. TARCHNISHVILI, "Sources arméno géorgiennes de l'histoire ancienne de l'Église de Géorgie," Le Muséon 60 (1947) 29–50. R. P. BLACKIE, "Georgian Theological Literature," Journal of Theologi- cal Studies 26 (1924–25) 50–64. J. VON ASSFLAG, "Zum Kirchenjahr und zur neuesten Geschichte der georgischen Kirche," Bedi Kharthlisa: Revue de Kharthvélologie no. 34–35 (1960). P. INGOROKVA, Giorgi merchule (Tiflis 1954), the monumental work on the Georgian monastic life and Christian literature of the 8th to 10th centuries. R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey (6th ed. Rome 1999).

[A. S. MANVEL/EDS.]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GREECE

The Orthodox Church in Greece considered itself liberated from the yoke of the Turks only when it had obtained both its political freedom and its status as an autocephalous church. The patriarchate of Constantinople recognized it as an autocephalous church in 1850. Today it forms the only Orthodox church that is officially the accepted church of the nation. A synodal type of ecclesiastical administration was accepted. The Permanent Synod comprises 13 bishops, including the leader of the Greek Church, the Archbishop of Athens and All Greece.

See Also: GREECE, THE CHURCH IN, 2. THE MODERN CHURCH; ORTHODOX AND ORIENTAL CHURCHES.

Bibliography: D. CONSTANTELOS, Understanding the Greek Orthodox Church: Its Faith, History and Practice (New York 1982). F. LITSAS, ed. A Companion to the Greek Orthodox Church (New York 1984). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF ROMANIA

Romanians represent the residue of the Thracio-Daco-Bessian peoples from the Balko-Danubian provinces of the Roman Empire. Their language is Romance, having been formed from the rustic Latin spoken by the populations of those provinces under Roman control. Nevertheless, a considerable Slavic influence is found in their lexicon and phonetics, owing to their intermingling with Slav populations that had moved there in the 6th and 7th centuries. They always called themselves Rumâni, but non-Roman peoples (Germans, Slavs) called them Walachians, that is, Romans or Latins (Volcae, Welsch, Volochi). Although Romanians are a Latin people, most of them belong to the autocephalous Romanian Orthodox Church.

The beginnings of Christianity are not clear in Romanian history, but it seems that in the early centuries the first work of evangelization was done by Latin missionaries. The form that Christianity took was linked intimately with political developments and divisions. From the 2d to the 4th century, the three civil districts of Illyricum, Dacia, and Macedonia belonged to the praetorian prefecture of Illyricum, located at Sirmium. The other two provinces of Moesia Inferior and Scythia Minor (Dobrodgea) belonged to the civil district of Thracia, that is, to the praetorian prefecture of the East, located at Heraclea. Thus Christian evangelization of the Balko-Danubian provinces came from the East and the West. In 389 Gratian, Emperor of the West, ceded to his brother Theodosius I, Emperor of the East, Dacia and Macedonia, now called Oriental Illyricum. In 421 Theodosius I made the provinces of Oriental Illyricum subject to the tribunal appeal of the bishop of Constantinople. Notwithstanding the strong protest of Pope Boniface II in 438, the decree of Theodosius was inserted into the Code of imperial laws. In 424 or 437, under Theodosius II, Western Illyricum was annexed to the Byzantine Empire. Thus the patriarch of Constantinople had jurisdiction of all the Illyrian provinces. He sent his missionaries and bishops into the area establishing the Orthodox Church and the canonical discipline of Byzantium.

When the Bulgars embraced Christianity from Byzantium, they also brought to the Rumâni the Byzantine liturgy in the Old Slavonic language. Instrumental in introducing the Byzantine-Slav rite into the kingdom of Great Moravia, which bordered on Bulgaria, were the Greek brothers Saints CYRIL and Methodius. With their activity in Moravia (863–85) and that of their disciples in Bulgaria the Slav-Bulgarian liturgical usages were introduced among the Walacho-Romanians, who, with their dukedoms of Banat and Transylvania, were subject to the first Bulgarian Empire.

After the withdrawal of the Tartars in the 13th century, the first Walacho-Romanian state, called Walachia, was formed in 1330. Moldavia was formed shortly after, in 1363. The rulers of Walachia and Moldavia petitioned the Patriarch of Constantinople to erect a metropolis in their kingdoms. A metropolitan was appointed in 1359 for Walachia with residence in Arges; and another, for Moldavia in 1393 with residence at Suceava, later changed to Jassy. Transylvania was under the Hungarian Empire from 1004. Thus through the centuries these three principalities of Walachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania existed separately one from another. Finally in 1881 Romania was united into a single kingdom of Walachia and Moldavia, whose religion was Byzantine Orthodoxy.

Organization of the Orthodox Romanian Church.

The Orthodox Church in the independent provinces of modern Romania began to unify into one church in the 19th century. The two assemblies of the independent principalities of Walachia and Moldavia elected Colonial Alexander Ion Cuza (1859–66) as prince for both principalities. This union was recognized by Turkey and the other great powers in 1861 when the two united principalities were called Romania for the first time. The new Prince enacted laws concerning the Church that were in contrast with its traditional spirit. He made civil marriage compulsory, allowed divorce, and secularized the large estates of monasteries. He organized the church in an autocephalous way with a central synod answerable to the state.

After a jurisdictional quarrel with the Patriarch of Constantinople, the autocephaly of the Romanian Church was acknowledged in 1885. On Feb. 4, 1925, the Holy Synod decreed the primate of the Romanian Church (the archbishop of Bucharest) to be Patriarch. The decision was approved by the state and recognized by both the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople and the other Orthodox Churches of the Near East and Europe. Thus was formed the Orthodox Church of Romania.

[L. TAUTU/R. ROBERSON/EDS.]

Romanian Orthodox Church in the Communist and Post-Communist Years

The declaration of a Communist People's Democracy in Romania on Dec. 30, 1947, was followed on May 24, 1948, by the election of Justinian Marina (Feb. 22, 1901 to Mar. 26, 1977) as patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church. Justinian had well-known socialist political views and was said to be a personal friend of the newly-installed first secretary of the Romanian Communist Party, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej. Thus, he was well placed during his 29 years in office to guide the church through an initial period of vicious Stalinist persecution (including the nationalization of church property, the imprisonment of thousands of clergy, and a reduction of the numbers of monks and nuns in the monasteries from over 7,000 in 1956 to 2,200 by 1975), and later to establish with the regime a modus vivendi known as "The Romanian Solution."

Patriarch Justinian essentially accepted the narrow boundaries drawn around his church by the state in return for the government's toleration of a certain level of ecclesial activity. The patriarch was able to oversee an improvement in the level of education of the clergy, a notable monastic reform, and the restoration of many important historic churches, monasteries, and other monuments. Under Nicolae Ceaușescu it became possible for Justinian to guide the church toward an accommodation with the regime because it was adopting a nationalist form of Communism that envisaged a certain role for the church in the life of the nation. Many Communist officials considered themselves Orthodox Christians.

Justin Moiescu was elected fourth patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church in June 1977. More an academic than politician, Justin had to deal with criticism for not sufficiently resisting the government's decision to demolish some 24 churches and three monasteries in central Bucharest and for his handling of the defrocking and imprisonment of certain Orthodox priests opposed to the regime. The most well known of these was Gheorghe Calciu Dumitreasa, who was sentenced to ten years in prison in 1978 for preaching a series of Lenten sermons at the Bucharest seminary in which he characterized atheism as a philosophy of despair. He was released and sent into exile in the United States in 1984.

Even so, by 1985 the Romanian Orthodox was the most vigorous church in Eastern Europe. Church sources stated that there were about 17,000,000 faithful (80 percent of the population), 8,165 parishes served by 8,545 priests, and 1,500 nuns and 1,000 monks living in 122 monasteries. There were six seminaries and two theological institutes, one in Bucharest and one in Sibiu. High quality theological journals were published, including three by the patriarchate itself and one by each of the five metropolitanates. In addition, the patriarchate was able to make use of limited resources to carry out an ambitious publication program that brought to light six more volumes in a series of Romanian translations of the Philokalia, more than 30 in a projected series of 90 volumes of translations of patristic writings, and an assortment of Bibles and other liturgical and theological works. In addition, the church was able to publish the theological contribution of Dumitru Stăniloae (1903–93), one of the most prominent Orthodox theologians of the century.

Justin died on July 31, 1986. On November 9, the metropolitan of Iași, Teoctist Arăpașu, was elected patriarch. He also had to contend with the destruction of more churches in Bucharest and even the government's rumored desire (later confirmed) to demolish the patriarchal complex in the capital and transfer the see to Iași. Teoctist was able to direct the republication of the 1688 Bucharest Bible, an event that illustrated the central role the church played in the standardization of the Romanian language and the evolution of Romanian culture. The patriarch was also able to take several trips abroad. He visited Ecumenical Patriarch Dimitrios I in Istanbul in May 1987, and became the first Romanian patriarch in history to visit a Roman pontiff when he met John Paul II in Rome on Jan. 5, 1989. It was later revealed that Teoctist had acted against the wishes of the government in meeting with the pope.

End of Ceaușescu Regime. The downfall of the Ceaușescu regime on Dec. 22, 1989, triggered a crisis in the Romanian Orthodox Church, which was strongly criticized for having publicly supported the Communist government. The Holy Synod met on Jan. 10, 1990, apologized for those "who did not always have the courage of the martyrs," and expressed regret that it had been "necessary to pay the tribute of obligatory and artificial praises addressed to the dictator" to ensure certain liberties. It also annulled all the ecclesiastical sanctions that it had been compelled to impose on members of the clergy for political reasons. In the face of harsh criticism for alleged collaboration with the Communist regime, Patriarch Teoctist resigned his office on Jan. 18, 1990. However, in early April Teoctist resumed his duties as patriarch by unanimous decision of the Holy Synod. Although this move was criticized in Romanian intellectual circles, the Synod decided that it was more important to maintain continuity in the face of political change, and to acknowledge the views of the other Orthodox churches, which had continued to re-cognize Teoctist as patriarch.

A few days after the fall of the Ceaușescu regime, a "Reflection Group for the Renewal of the Church" was established in Bucharest. Its seven clerical and lay members set out to interpret what they perceived to be the growing desire among the Orthodox faithful for change and renewal in the life of the church, and to initiate a dialogue with the church leadership to help it overcome the current "spiritual impasse."

On June 7, 1990, a member of this group, the 38-year-old auxiliary bishop of Timișoara, Daniel Ciobotea, was elected metropolitan archbishop of Iași, the second-ranking post in the Romanian Orthodox hierarchy. Ciobotea had studied in the West and had taught from 1981 to 1988 at the Ecumenical Institute of the World Council of Churches at Bossey, Switzerland. His election to the see from which all previous Romanian patriarchs had been taken was part of an effort to reform the church and provide it with new and more vigorous leadership.

In September 1990 the Holy Synod approved important modifications to the basic statutes of the Patriarchate. It removed those sections providing for state interference in the church's affairs and declared the full autonomy of the church from the state.

On June 21, 1992 the Holy Synod declared canonizations for the second time in its history. Nineteen new Romanian saints were proclaimed, and the "Sunday of the Romanian Saints" was inserted into the liturgical calendar on the second Sunday after Pentecost.

At a meeting in January 1993 the Holy Synod re-established two jurisdictions in areas that were part of Romania in the interwar period: in northern Bukovina (now in Ukraine) and in Bessarabia, most of which is in the independent republic of Moldova. This move sparked a confrontation with the Moscow patriarchate to which the Orthodox dioceses in those regions had belonged since World War II. Most Orthodox in those areas remained in newly established autonomous jurisdictions associated with the Russian Orthodox Church.

A census carried out by the Romanian government in January 1992 revealed that 87 percent of the population (19.8 million) considered itself to belong to the Romanian Orthodox Church. It is interesting to note that after four decades of antireligious propaganda, the census uncovered only 11,000 atheists and 25,000 who said they were not affiliated with any faith community.

By early 1993 the number of Orthodox seminaries in the country had risen to 18 with a total of 2,811 students. The two higher-level theological institutes that had been allowed to function in Bucharest and Sibiu were re-integrated into the university faculties they had belonged to before the advent of the Communist regime, and ten other theology faculties were set up at universities in Iași, Cluj-Napoca, Craiova, Arad, Oradea, Pitești, Alba Iulia, Baia Mare, Constanța, and Tîrgoviște. The students in these numbered 2,890, including significant numbers of laypeople and nuns. Monastic life thrived, with 192 monasteries (111 female and 81 male) and 75 sketes (63 female and 12 male) with a total of 5,179 monks and nuns in 1992. At that time there was a total of 8,452 priests and 12,397 places of worship. There was also a proliferation of theological journals (9), periodicals (10) and newspapers (5). For the first time since 1948 the church also began to engage in organized charitable activity, such as administering orphanages, hospitals, and retirement homes.

Another important development was the reactivation of Orthodox lay movements, all of which had been banned by the Communists. By the end of 1992 there were eight such organizations, the most important being the Oastea Domnului (The Army of the Lord). Founded by Josif Trifa in 1923, this renewal movement emphasized evangelization, personal morality, an experiential relationship with God, and Bible study. It grew quickly, and in the 1930s was absorbed into the structures of the Orthodox Church. During the Communist years the movement maintained a secret membership of perhaps as many as 500,000. The organization resurfaced after December 1989 and again received the blessing of the Orthodox Church. However, some of its members have connections with Protestant evangelical groups and are ambivalent about these links to institutional church structures.

In spite of the problems it now faces, the Romanian Orthodox Church has emerged from several decades of Communist persecution having preserved the close links that have long existed between it and the great majority of the Romanian people. Although its activity has been hindered by the catastrophic economic conditions that followed the fall of Ceaușescu, the new freedoms it has enjoyed since December 1989 have allowed it to begin to reassert its prominent role in the country and to explore the kind of relationship with the state and other churches that is appropriate for a postcommunist and increasingly westernized society.

Romanian Orthodox Christians in the United States. Historically, the Romanian Orthodox diaspora in the United States the Romanian Orthodox are divided into three different jurisdictions. The Romanian Orthodox Church and the Canonical Episcopate of America, in communion with the Orthodox Church of Romania has its see in Detroit. The Romania Orthodox Episcopate of America, with its see at Detroit, Michigan, is under the jurisdiction of the Orthodox Church in America. In 1993, these two groups agreed to establish full ties, ending the hostile atmosphere between them. The third, and smallest group is the Romanian Orthodox Episcopate of Eastern Hemisphere, under the jurisdiction of the Russian Synodal Church in Exile. Its see is also in Detroit.

Bibliography: M. PACURARIU, Istoria Bisericii Ortodoxe Române, 3 v. (Bucharest 1980–1981). A. SCARFE, “The Romanian Orthodox Church,” in P. RAMET, ed., Eastern Christianity and Politics in the Twentieth Century (Durham, N.C. 1988) 208–31. M. PACURARIU, Geschichte der Rumänischen Orthodoxen Kirche (Erlangen 1994). I. BRIA, Romania: Orthodox Identity at a Crossroads of Europe (Geneva 1995). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Catholic Churches: A Brief Survey (6th ed. Rome 1999).

[R. ROBERSON]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF RUSSIA

The Russians are an East Slavic people whose ancestors moved into the vast plain between the Baltic and Black Seas in the sixth century. Initially the East Slavic tribes formed a large number of warring city-states, but in the ninth century political power began to consolidate first at Novgorod and later at Kiev (882). Christianity became the official religion under the Grand Prince Vladimir I (d. 1015) who married Anna, sister of Byzantine Emperor Basil II. Prince Vladimir was baptized along with many of his followers in the waters of the Dnieper river in 988 A.D. according to the Greek rite. Thus, Byzantine Christianity became the faith of the three peoples who trace their origins to Rus' of Kiev: the Ukrainians, Belarussians, and Russians.

The Russian Church became semi-autonomous in 1037 when the patriarch of Constantinople consecrated

St. Basil's on Red Square, Moscow. Photograph by Susan D. Rock. (Reproduced by permission.)

Theopemptus metropolitan of Kiev. When the city was destroyed during the Mongol invasions (1237–40), large numbers of people moved northward. By the fourteenth century a new center grew up around the principality of Moscow, and the metropolitans of Kiev took up residence there. In 1448 Metropolitan Isidore was deposed for having accepted, on behalf of his Church, the union with Rome that had been ratified at the Council of Florence. His successor changed the primatial title to metropolitan of Moscow.

Third Rome. About the time that Constantinople fell to the Turks in 1453, Russia was throwing off Mongol rule and becoming an independent state. Because the old Rome was said to have fallen into heresy, and the New Rome, Constantinople, had fallen under control of the Turks, some Russians began to speak of Moscow as the “Third Rome” that would carry on the traditions of Orthodoxy and Roman civilization. The czar (caesar) was now the champion and protector of Orthodoxy just as the Byzantine emperor once had been. The Russian Church had already begun to develop its own style of iconography and church architecture and its own theological and spiritual traditions.

A Russian Orthodox patriarchate was officially established by Constantinople in 1589, but it was abolished by Peter the Great in 1721. The Church was then administered by a HOLY SYNOD under regulations that brought the Church under close state supervision. During this period, especially in the nineteenth century, a great revival of Russian Orthodox theology, spirituality, and monasticism took place.

In August 1917, after the abdication of the czar but before the Bolshevik Revolution, a synod of the Russian Orthodox Church began in Moscow. It reestablished the Russian patriarchate and elected Metropolitan Tikhon of Moscow to that office. But before the synod ended, it was learned that the metropolitan of Kiev had been murdered and that persecutions had begun. Patriarch Tikhon was outspoken in his criticism of the Communists in his early years as patriarch, but moderated his public position after a year in prison.

Patriarch Tikhon and his successor Patriarch Sergius worked out a modus vivendi with the government that set the tone of church-state relations under Communism. In 1927 Patriarch Sergius declared loyalty to the Soviet government and promised the support of the Russian Orthodox Church on all issues. In return, the state allowed the Church a very restricted sphere of activity, limited in practice to liturgical worship. Persecution and repression of religion in the U.S.S.R. took different forms in different periods: virtually all the theologians and leaders of the Orthodox Church were either exiled in the 1920s or executed in the 1930s. Conditions improved somewhat during World War II and in Stalin's later years, but Khrushchev, intent on "abolishing" religion by 1980, began to intensify the persecutions in 1959.

Many churches were closed after the revolution, and another massive wave of church closings took place under Khrushchev in 1959 to 1962. In 1914, 54,457 churches were registered, but in the late 1970s there were only about 6,800. The number of functioning monasteries (1,498 in 1914) was down to 12, and the 57 theological seminaries operating in 1914 had been reduced to three in Moscow, Leningrad (Saint Petersburg), and Odessa, with theological academies of higher studies in the first two cities.

Perestroika and Glasnost. With the rise of Mikhail Gorbachev to power in 1985 the situation of the Russian Orthodox Church began to improve dramatically. His policies of perestroika ("restructuring") and glasnost ("openness") gave the Church greater freedom and recognition. Early in 1988 Gorbachev received the leaders of the Orthodox Church in the Kremlin on the eve of the millennium celebrations commemorating the baptism of Prince Vladimir in 988. Patriarch Pimen of Moscow and All Russia presided over the Divine Liturgy, surrounded by members of the Russian Orthodox hierarchy and witnessed by Agostino Cardinal Casaroli, Vatican secretary of state who represented Pope John Paul II, Robert Runcie, the archbishop of Canterbury, and representatives of other Christian bodies. When aged and ailing Patriarch Pimen died May 3, 1990, the Church moved rapidly to name his successor. A council composed of bishops and elected priests and laity, using secret ballots for the first time since 1918, selected the 61-year-old metropolitan of Leningrad and Novgorod as Patriarch Aleksy II of Moscow and All Russia.

In October 1992 the Saint Tikhon of Moscow Theological Institute opened in Moscow for training Orthodox laity. The students, more or less evenly divided between women and men, numbered some 650 in the first year. On Feb. 24, 1993, the Russian Orthodox Church established Saint John the Theologian University in Moscow to continue the Russian humanist educational tradition and to offer an in-depth study of the theological disciplines as well. In 1994, Patriarch Aleksy II stated that there were 15,985 churches in the territory of the former Soviet Union, served by 12,841 priests and 1,402 deacons. His Church now had three theological academies (Moscow, Saint Petersburg, and Kiev), 14 seminaries, and a total of 47 schools with about 4,000 students. Two hundred eighty-one monastic communities existed or were being formed.

The membership of the Orthodox Church of Russia is estimated at 60 million. In December 1993, the University of Chicago's National Opinion Research Center released the results of a poll that documented an extraordinary growth of religious faith in Russia. It showed that between one half and three quarters of the Russian people believed in God, depending on how the question was worded. Although 11 percent said they were Orthodox when growing up, 28 percent reported themselves as Orthodox now, indicating that the Russian Orthodox Church had more than doubled its membership. The trend towards theism was strongest in the 17 to 24 age group, where 30 percent had converted from atheism to belief in God. An astonishing 75 percent of those surveyed reported having "a great deal of confidence in the Church." But another survey conducted by the All-Russian Center of Public Opinion Studies in August 1994 revealed that while 52 percent of those surveyed considered themselves believers, only 2 percent attended Church services at least once a week.

New Freedom, New Challenges. The Russian Church is struggling to adapt to the rapid changes taking place in Russian society. The Church has strictly enforced a ban on the participation of clergy in politics and seems to be developing a closer relationship with the Russian military. The patriarchate has vigorously opposed proselytizing activities of other religious groups in the country and supported a bill passed by the parliament but unsigned by President Yeltsin restricting the activity of such groups. In the fall of 1994 the Russian government agreed to help finance the reconstruction of the Cathedral of Christ the Savior, a massive nineteenth-century structure leveled by Stalin in 1931 that once dominated the Moscow skyline. Patriarch Aleksy laid the new cornerstone on Jan. 7, 1995.

An assembly of the entire Russian Orthodox episcopate took place in Moscow from Nov. 29 to Dec. 2, 1994. Patriarch Aleksy told the bishops that the Church had gone through a very difficult period since their last meeting in 1992, having had to deal with problems relating to liturgical practice, proper theological and pastoral formation, and ecclesial service to society. The assembly turned down a call from conservative elements for the Moscow patriarchate to withdraw from all ecumenical organizations, but it condemned the missionary activity being carried out in Russia by American Methodist, Evangelical, and Presbyterian groups and by certain South Korean Protestants. The bishops sanctioned the beginning of a vast effort to catechize and evangelize the Russian population and set up a special commission to review liturgical practice and texts to make the liturgy more easily understood by the faithful.

The gradual disintegration of the Communist system and the Soviet Union created centrifugal forces that threatened the unity of the Moscow patriarchate. In January 1990, when conditions were already changing, the Bishops' Council of the Russian Orthodox Church met in Moscow and decided to grant a certain measure of autonomy to the Orthodox Churches in Ukraine and Byelorussia (now Belarus). Each of these were made exarchates of the Moscow patriarchate, with the optional names "The Ukrainian Orthodox Church" and "The Byelorussian (now Belarussian) Orthodox Church." Following the dissolution of the Soviet Union on Dec. 25, 1991, and the independence of the various successor states, the patriarchate granted similar autonomous status to the Orthodox Churches in Estonia, Latvia, and Moldova.

But because the Orthodox Church in Ukraine was demanding greater freedom, on Oct. 27, 1990, another session of the Bishops' Council granted "independence and self-government" to the Ukrainian Orthodox Church and abolished the title "Ukrainian Exarchate." The Church remained autonomous, with the metropolitan of Kiev still a member of the Holy Synod of the Moscow Patriarchate. After Ukraine declared its independence on Aug. 24, 1991, Metropolitan Filaret of Kiev began to seek complete separation of his Church from the Moscow patriarchate. This, however, was refused at a meeting of the Russian Orthodox Bishop's Council in April 1992. Matters came to a head in May 1992 when the Moscow patriarchate deposed Filaret and appointed Metropolitan Vladimir (Volodymyr) (Sabodan) of Rostov as new metropolitan of Kiev. Subsequently, Filaret joined the non-canonical Ukrainian Autocephalous Church.

Another problem arose in the newly-independent ex-Soviet republic of Moldova. Before 1812 and again from 1918 to 1944, Moldova (then known as Bessarabia) had been part of Romania. In spite of the fact that the Moscow patriarchate had granted autonomous status to its Moldovan diocese, the Holy Synod of the Romanian Orthodox Church decided in December 1992 to reconstitute its own metropolitanate of Bessarabia in the same territory. Thus, the Orthodox in Moldova split between the two rival jurisdictions, but the great majority of parishes remain loyal to the jurisdiction linked to the Moscow patriarchate.

In Estonia, an autonomous Orthodox Church under the patriarchate of Constantinople existed from 1923 until it was absorbed into the Moscow patriarchate in 1945 after the country was annexed by the Soviet Union. In the wake of Estonian independence in 1991, there were calls for the reestablishment of this Church, which had maintained its headquarters in Stockholm in exile. Later the Estonian government officially recognized it as the legal continuation of the Estonian Orthodox Church that existed in the interwar period. But on Oct. 5, 1994, the Holy Synod of the Moscow patriarchate expressed support for its autonomous Estonian diocese and protested that it was in danger of losing ownership of its parish churches and the large Piukhtitsy Convent of the Assumption. Altogether there are eighty Orthodox parishes with about 40,000 faithful in the country, half of them Estonian-language, eight bilingual, and the rest Russian-language. Fifty of the parishes support the reestablishment of the autonomous church under Constantinople. In February 1995 a delegation from the patriarchate of Constantinople visited both Estonia and the Moscow patriarchate in an effort to facilitate a solution to the problem.

Bibliography: N. DAVIS, A Long Walk to Church: A Contemporary History of Russian Orthodoxy (Boulder, Colorado 1995). J. ELLIS, The Russian Orthodox Church: A Contemporary History (London 1986). D. POSPIELOVSKY, The Russian Church Under the Soviet Regime 1917-1982, 2 v. (Crestwood, New York 1984). R. G. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches (revised 6th ed. Rome 1999).

[R. G. ROBERSON]

ORTHODOX CHURCH OF SERBIA

The Serbs belong to the Southern Slavs. They have a common language with the Croats, from whom they were distinguished and separated even before both settled in the 7th century in the Balkan Peninsula. The territory settled by the Serbs belonged to various provinces of the Roman Empire.

Religious influences from the Western Church entered during the reign of Emperor Heraclius (610-641) through Dalmatia and Albania, but reached only the Slavs that were close to the cities along the coast. The Serbs in the center of the Balkan Peninsula, isolated by almost impassable mountains, were only sporadically affected. The dominance of the Byzantine culture, radiating from Salonika and Ohrid, had a more enduring effect, especially after the Slavic dialect was elevated by SS. Cyril and Methodius to a literary language. The sending out of missionaries by the Emperor Basil I the Macedonian (867–886) and the return of the disciples of the apostles of the Slavs to Macedonia and Bulgaria following their expulsion from Moravia (886), must have had consequences also among the Serbs, although information concerning the ecclesiastical situation before the time of St. Sava is scant. In a document of Stevan Nemanja, Sava's father, "his bishop" is mentioned, with the title of Rasa. According to a chrysobull of the Byzantine Emperor MICHAEL VIII Palaeologus this sole bishopric was erected in 950 as a suffragan of the autocephalous archiepiscopate of Ohrid.

The Serbian Archiepiscopate. The movements of the Crusades and the struggle for Constantinople brought the Balkan region into prominence. In the second half of the 12th century political independence from the Byzantine emperor was achieved (1183), and a strong Serbian state was formed by the Grand Župan Stevan Nemanja (1159–95). His youngest son, Rastko, as a monk named Sava, received his education in the monasteries of Mount Athos, where he had gone against the wishes of the father. The latter followed him, erected the monastery of Chilandar and took the habit under the name of Simeon (1196). Sava's elder brother, Stevan II Prvovenčani (First-Crowned), received in 1217 from Pope Honorius III the crown and recognition as king, which he had been unable to secure from Innocent III because of the opposition of the Hungarian King Emmerich. But the orientation toward the West was of short duration. Sava received from both the Byzantine Emperor and the Orthodox patriarch of Constantinople permission for the erection of an archiepiscopate, with the right to administer independently all internal affairs of the Serbian Church, especially the appointment of the archbishop and the bishops (1219). Sava was consecrated their first archbishop.

The nine dioceses established during St. Sava's government were situated in what today is the Macedonian Republic and the Autonomous Region of Kosovo-Metohija, and the southernmost part of Serbia proper. After having erected several monasteries with schools, and having established the Serbian Church on a solid hierarchical foundation, St. Sava resigned (1233), and went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On his return trip he died in Trnovo (Bulgaria) in 1236. While the political organization of the Serbs throughout history collapsed several times, his work, the Serbian Orthodox Church, survived the most adverse vicissitudes, and is still in existence.

Serbian Orthodox priest celebrates Mass in Gracanica monastery. The ceremony commemorates Serbian battles against Ottoman Turks, their subsequent defeat, and the foundation of Serbian nationalism. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Serbian Patriarchate. The zenith in the development of Serbia was reached under Stevan Dušan (1331–55). Taking advantage of the civil wars within the Byzantine Empire, he added to his domains Macedonia, Albania, Epirus, and Thessaly; his predecessors had already extended their rule toward the north, up to the Danube and Sava. In 1346 Dušan was crowned "Emperor of the Serbs and the Greeks" in Skopje, and, in imitation of the Byzantine model, the archbishop was elevated to the dignity of patriarch. The erection of the patriarchate, in the presence of the Bulgarian patriarch and the archbishop of Ohrid, was necessitated by other considerations too. Only a hierarch with this highest dignity could incorporate into the church of Dušan's empire the autocephalous Church of Ohrid and the dioceses of the Patriarchate of Constantinople in Macedonia, Epirus and Thessaly. The patriarch's residence was at Peć since Arsenije I, the successor of St. Sava. The dioceses were now distributed into metropolitan districts. The ecumenical patriarch protested and then excommunicated the new patriarchate, as well as the entire Serbian State and people (1352). However, the increased danger from the Turks after their victory at the Maritza (1371) forced Constantinople as well as the Serbs to seek friends, and the excommunication was retracted and the patriarchate recognized (1376).

Domination of the Turks. The arrival of the Turks had a far reaching influence on the destiny of the Serbian Church. The Orthodox patriarchs were recognized as supreme heads of their people even in civil matters, and the Turks ruled their Christian subjects not directly, but mediately through their religious superiors, the patriarchs and bishops.

As for the Serbian patriarch, it seems that the Turks did not recognize him as head of his nation, probably because they had no effective contacts with him, but regarded the autocephalous archbishop of Ohrid as responsible for the Serbs. No Serbian patriarch is mentioned after 1500 until the Serbian Patriarchate was reestablished in 1557 by the Grand Vizier Mehmed Sokolović, a Serb who had embraced Islam when as a child he was forcibly drafted into the Janizaries. A relative of the Grand Vizier, the monk Makarije, became the first patriarch. The Serbian Church, now an administrative part of the Turkish political organization, was expected to unite all the Slavs up to the Carpathian Mountains, bring them under Turkish control, and lure them away from the Christians in western Europe. The patriarch was spiritual and temporal head of all the Serbs and other Orthodox under his jurisdiction from the Adriatic to Rumania, and from the Carpathian Mountains to Macedonia, governing them through 22 bishops.

The ceaseless unrest caused by the wars of the Turks in the 17th and 18th centuries led to continued migrations of the Serbs toward the north and west. Their original region was settled by Albanians. The Serbs migrated in large numbers toward areas north of the Danube, into Syrmium, Bosnia and Hercegovina, Dalmatia, and into Croatia-Slavonia. The Hungarian King Mathias Corvinus (1458–90) conferred upon the Serbian leader Vuk Branković the title of despot, which was taken from the Byzantine administrative hierarchy, and acknowledged him as commander of the Serbs, whom Hungary needed for the protection of the southern boundaries against the advancing Turks. Whenever the Turks ceded a territory to the Austrian emperor, all citizens of the Islamic faith, although of Croatian or Serbian nationality and language, were obliged according to the tenets of Islam to leave the country of the Christian ruler. The vacant spaces were accordingly settled by the Serbs, who had thus over the centuries almost completely evacuated their original seats, and transferred their center to the Danube, Sava, and Drina Rivers. Especially memorable were the great treks of 1690 under Patriarch Arsenije III Crnojević, of 30,000 families, in response to the proclamation of Emperor Leopold I, by which he promised to grant them national and religious liberty under his scepter; and that of 1739 under Patriarch Arsenije IV Jovanović-šakabent, in flight from the vengeance of the Turks who had been angered by their support of Austria.

The chief bishop of the migrants established their final residence in Karlovci, a small town on the Danube, close to the numerous monasteries previously erected in the Fruška Gora, an isolated mountain range in Syrmium. The patriarchs continued to reside in Peć until the abolition of the patriarchate (1766). The archbishops of Karlovci were considered exarchs of the patriarchal throne of Peć. The jurisdiction of the migrating Serbian patriarchs was not affected by the move to the new regions, since they had, as true ethnarchs, considered and styled themselves as patriarchs of the people, "the Serbs," and not as of a certain city or country.

The Third Serbian Patriarchate. The collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy (1918) led to the establishment of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, later called Yugoslavia. The Serbs were again politically united for the first time since the Middle Ages. The sectional Churches were dissolved and the Serbian Patriarchate was reestablished (1920). In Yugoslavia between the two world wars, the Serbian Orthodox Church enjoyed a privileged position for several reasons: the Serbs, although not constituting a majority, were the numerically largest nationality in the state, and the chief beneficiary from the advantages accruing from a larger political unit. The reigning family was Serbian, and to be successful in the civil or military service it was advantageous to be of the Orthodox faith. Although so close a relationship between politics and Church had its corruptive effect upon a spiritual organization, the Serbian Orthodox Church made every effort to repair the wounds caused by the centuries of Islamic oppression and the continuous wars. This evolution was interrupted by World War II, which was fought in the Balkans by the various nationalities, split among themselves.

The coming of the Communist regime under Josip Broz Tito severed the bonds between the Serbian Church and the State, gravely damaged the Church by confiscations and curtailment of liberty, but involuntarily enhanced the prestige of the patriarch and the meaning of the Church for the Serbian nation. The collapse of communism in the Eastern European bloc paved the way for a renaissance of the Serbian Orthodox Church in public life.

Monastic Life. Monasteries, under Greek direction, existed in the territory of the Serbian Church before the time of St. Sava, some probably going back to that of the disciples of SS. Cyrillus and Methodius. They received a great increase under Sava's government. He reestablished in 1196 the former Greek monastery of Chilandar on the Holy Mount Athos, which remained the spiritual center of Serbian monasticism for centuries, along with the new convents of Žiča, Studenica, Visoki Dečani, Mileševo, Sopočani, and numerous others.

The medieval Serbian Church was one of monasteries, and the importance of the monks and nuns can be compared with that in the early Church of Scotland and Ireland. In the absence of cities as cultural centers, the monasteries were the residences of all the bishops, the only schools, centers of art, depositories of public and private documents, etc. The copying of books for the needs of the Serbian Church as well as that of other Slavic nations prospered in such close proximity to Greek sources. Monasteries sometimes contained up to 200 subjects. They were divided into classes: imperial lavras, subject solely to the monarch; archiepiscopal, and later stauropegial convents, under the direct authority of the patriarch; and eparchial monasteries, under the supervision of the diocesan bishops. The bishop's own residence was always a monastery of which he was the superior.

The Serbs established in the 15th century in the Fruška Gora in Syrmium a new, Serbian Holy Mountain, with several monasteries: Krušedol, Hopovo, Šišatovac, Vrdnik (Ravanica), Kuveždin, Beočin, Bešenovo, Grgetek, and Fenek. From the 17th century these convents performed a valuable service to the Serbian Church when the nation migrated to the north.

Church Art. Over the many centuries, the Serbian Orthodox Church developed a mixed architectural style, being at the point at which Italian influences from across the Adriatic meet the Byzantine influences from the South.

In respect to painting, particularly fresco, Serbia holds its own even if compared with the abundance of Italian monuments of art. Matejić, Nagoričino, Chilandar, Gračanica, Dečani (with more than 1,000 compositions), and numerous other convents and churches, dispersed all over the country, usually away from the main routes of communication, are a testimony that painting was nurtured in the Serbia of the kings and czars at a degree of excellence somewhat higher than that existing at the same time in western Europe. The loss of political independence under the Turks brought to a nearly complete and abrupt stop the further development of artistic manifestations.

The Serbian Orthodox Church Today. The Serbian Orthodox Church is headed by His Holiness, the Archbishop of Peé, Metropolitan of Beograd-Karlovci, and Serbian Patriarch. The patriarch is elected from the number of those Serbian bishops who have administered a diocese at least five years. The Council of the Bishops presents three candidates to the electoral assembly composed of all bishops, certain other secular and regular clergy, and lay representatives from the various eparchies.

The patriarch enjoys the privilege of performing the consecration of all bishops, either in person or through a delegate, of consecrating the Holy Myro (Chrism) for the entire Serbian Church, of wearing the white panakamilavka, a white veil that covers the cylindrical headgear and falls down upon the shoulders.

The Serbian Orthodox Church is administered by the patriarch with the assistance of two synods. The Holy Council of the Bishops, Sveti Arhijerejski Sabor, is composed of all diocesan bishops. It is the legislator and supreme authority of the Church, to be called together whenever the patriarch with the Holy Synod of Bishops decides, especially for the election of bishops. The Holy Synod of Bishops, Sveti Arhijejski Sinod, is the executive organ of the Council of Bishops. It is composed of the patriarch and four bishops. For all decisions of the patriarch the assent of a majority of the members of the Holy Synod of Bishops is required.

The High Tribunal of the Church is a court of appeal from diocesan tribunals, although the Synod and the Council of Bishops also have judicial power in major causes, especially those concerning transgressions of bishops and of the patriarch himself. The Patriarchal Council is entrusted with legislation and supervision in the sphere of temporal administration, and has a number of laymen among its members. Its executive organ is the Patriarchal Administrative Board, composed of the patriarch and six clerical and seven lay members.

The diocesan bishop is assisted by a vicar-general, arhijerejski zamenik, of his choice. The Eparchial Church Tribunal has a twofold competence: it is the diocesan administrative office (chancery), and also a court of first instance under the presidency of the bishop or his deputy, assisted by two other priests, secretaries-reporters, and other personnel. The Eparchial Council is in charge of the temporal management of the diocesan property, and supervises the same activity in the parishes. Its executive organ is the Eparchial Administrative Board.

The diocese, eparhija, is divided into districts, composed of a number of parishes, each headed by the episcopal vicar, arhijerejski namesnik. His official duty is to represent the bishop in his district, and to decide matters of lesser importance. Every parish has but one priest for 300 to 500 families, but several parishes can be centered in the same church. The Congregational Meeting is charged with the management of the temporal affairs of the parish or parishes. All the parishes of municipalities with up to 50,000 faithful are united in one Congregational Meeting. Its executive organ is the Congregational Committee. Membership in these bodies belongs to all priests of the parish or parishes and to lay members, elected by all parishioners. Their number varies with the number of the parishioners, varying from 24 to 60 in the Congregational Meeting, and six to twelve in the Congregational Committee.

Bishops are taken only from monks or from among widowed priests who have taken monastic vows. In addition, they are required to be graduates of a higher school of theology. Sometimes laymen with a higher education, e.g., lawyers, college teachers, join the rank of the regular clergy, having become widowers, and are, after theological preparation, advanced to the hierarchy.

Liturgical Worship. The liturgical rite of the Serbian Orthodox Church is that of Constantinople, called also BYZANTINE LITURGY. With the acceptance of the liturgical books from the Ukraine and Russia, where Patriarch NIKON (1652–67) had them reformed according to the usage of the Greeks, uniformity was established with the Common Byzantine Liturgy. The liturgical language of the Serbian Church is the Church Slavonic, originally the Slavic dialect from the surroundings of Saloniki, adapted to the use of the Church under the influence of the Serbian language. Liturgical books were printed in Srbulj, a form of the Church-Slavonic, as early as 1494, and in 1495 the Psaltir of Cetinje appeared. Under the Turks, and later because of the opposition of popes and Catholic bishops, it became increasingly difficult to continue the printing of liturgical books, whereas good editions, prepared in Kiev and Moscow, became available at the end of the 17th century. The acceptance of these books displaced the Serbian versions and introduced the Ukrainian form of the Church-Slavonic. Voices were raised repeatedly, advocating the return to the Srbulj, while others suggested the introduction of the modern Serbian language. English is now employed extensively in the U.S. and in Canada in the celebration of the Divine Liturgy and other services.

A peculiarity of the Serbians is the krsna slava of pre-Christian origin, a memorial rite to honor ancestors. Each family has a certain patron saint, or a certain feast of the liturgical calendar, on the day of which the krsna slava is to be celebrated. It is assumed that this day is identical either with the day when the ancestor accepted Christianity by baptism, or with the day of the patron saint adopted by the ancestor. The krsna slava is inherited in the male line. It is celebrated by an elaborate religious rite, often with the intervention of the priest, who visits the home to bless and cut the slavski kolač or cake.

Bibliography: D. SLIJEPCHEVIĆ, Istorija Srpske Pravoslavne crkve, v.1: Od pokršćavanja srba do kraja XVII veka (Munich 1962), contains a systematic survey and bibliog. of all previous histories of the Serbian Church. A. HUDAL, Die serbisch-orthodoxe Nationalkirche (Graz 1922). C. S. DRAŠKOVIĆ, "Die Lage der Orthodoxen Kirche in Jugoslawien," in F. POPAN and C. S. DRAŠKOVIĆ, Orthodoxie heute in Rumänien und Jugoslawien, ed. K. RUDOLF (Vienna 1960) 137–176. A. PRINETTO, L'organizzazione della Chiesa Serba Ortodossa in base alla nuova costituzione del 1931 e legge statale del 1929 (Dissertation unpublished. Pontificia U. Gregoriana, no. 913; Rome 1941). V. J. POSPISHIL, Der Patriarch im Rechte der Serbisch-Pravoslavischen Kirche (Diss. unpub. Pontificia U. Gregoriana; Rome 1949). "The Sixth Centenary of the Serbian Patriarch," (in Serbian) Glasnik, Srpske' Pravoslavne Crkve no. 9 (Belgrade, Sept. 1, 1946) 129–207. Oriente Cattolico: Cenni storici e statistiche (Vatican City 1962) 235–245. R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999).

[V. J. POSPISHIL/EDS.]

ORTHODOX SYMBOLIC BOOKS

The Orthodox Churches follow the Nicaean-Constantinopolitan Creed as the symbol or statement of their faith; but as they admit the ecumenicity of the decisions of only the first seven ecumenical councils [see COUNCILS, GENERAL (ECUMENICAL), THEOLOGY OF; COUNCILS, GENERAL (ECUMENICAL), HISTORY OF], they have been constrained in modern times to formulate their own statement of faith particularly in dealing with Catholicism and Protestantism. This has been done in a concise and definite form by a number of prelates and theologians in their Symbolic Books (symbolon or creed) whose statements and definitions, however, do not have an obligatory or infallible status as do the decisions of the ancient Church. They are authoritative, but depend for acceptance on the approbation of various authorities.

The principal confessions are: (1) The Confession of the Patriarch GENNADIUS II Scholarius of Constantinople, made after the fall of Constantinople in 1453 for the Sultan Mohammed II. It dealt primarily with the Trinity, the Incarnation, immortality, and the Resurrection. (2) The three answers given by the Patriarch Jeremiah II of Constantinople to the German Protestant theologians in 1576, 1579, and 1581. (3) The Confession of METROPHANES CRITOPoulos (1625), who became patriarch of Alexandria in 1636. This confession is orthodox in content, but of Protestant inspiration. (4) The Confession of Peter Moghila, Metropolitan of Kiev (1633–47), which was called the Great Catechism and was aimed at neutralizing the Protestant influence of the Confession of the Patriarch of Constantinople, Cyril Lukaris. The Great Catechism, written originally in Slavic and in Latin (before 1640), was then translated into Greek by Meletius Syrigus; it was approved, with some corrections, by the patriarch of Constantinople in 1643 as well as by the other Oriental patriarchs. It was published in Greek for the first time only in 1667, however. It went through numerous editions and translations into different languages. As is evident from his Small Catechism (1645), Moghila himself refused to approve the corrected translations, which had an anti-Catholic bias. (5) The Confession of the Patriarch Dositheus of Jerusalem, which was approved by the Synod of Jerusalem in 1672, and was composed with definite Catholic influence in an anti-Protestant sense. (6) The Catechism of the Metropolitan Philaret of Moscow, which in its third edition (1839) was modified in accord with the anti-Protestant reform of 1836. It went through many editions. (7) The Encyclical of the four Oriental Patriarchs, headed by the Patriarch Anthimus VI of Constantinople in 1848. This letter was a negative response to the invitation of Pope Pius IX for union with the Catholic Church. (8) The Encyclical of the Patriarch Anthimus VII of Constantinople (1895) in answer to a letter from Pope LEO XIII.

The authority of the Symbolic Books among the Orthodox varies. The Confession of Peter Moghila and that of Dositheus are accepted for the most part by the Greeks and Slavs, while the Catechism of Philaret is considered as a Symbolic Book only by the Russians and Slavs and is ignored by the Greeks. The significance of the Encyclical of 1848 was increased by Khomiakov who considered it as the foundation for his ecclesiology. In former times the Symbolic Books were greatly esteemed; during the last few decades, however, critical voices have been raised against them because of either the Catholic or the Protestant influences under which they were proposed. The Confession of Gennadius II was never accepted by all the Orthodox churches as an authentic expression of orthodoxy. The Confession of Metrophanes Critopoulos, even though a private work, enjoys considerable authority among many Greek Orthodox today. According to the Orthodox leaders it will be the obligation of a future pan-orthodox council to decide what kind of obligatory authority should be given to the Symbolic Books.

Bibliography: E. J. KIMMEL, Monumenta fidei Ecclesiae Orientalis, 2 v. (Jena 1843–50). J. MICHALCESCU, Die Bekenntnisse und die wichtigsten Glaubenszeugnisse der griechisch-orientalischen Kirche (Leipzig 1904). A. MALVY and M. VILLER, eds., La Confession orthodoxe de Pierre Moghila (Orientalia Christiana 39; Rome 1927). J. N. KARMIREs, Tā dogmatikā kai symbolikā mnēmēta tēs Orthodōxou Katholikῆs Ἐκκλησίας 2 v. (Athens 1952–53). A. PALMIERI, Theologia dogmatica orthodoxa, 2 v. (Florence 1911–13). M. JUGIE, Theologia dogmatica christianorum orientalium ab ecclesia catholica dissententium, 5 v. (Paris 1926–35) 1:671–682. S. ZANKOW, Das orthodoxe Christentum des Ostens (Berlin 1928). M. JUGIE, Échos d'Orient (Paris 1897–) 28 (1929) 423–430. M. GORDILLO, Compendium theologiae orientalis (3d ed. Rome 1950). H. MULERT, Konfessionskunde, ed. E. SCHOTT and K. ONASCH (3d ed. Berlin 1956) 72–153. K. ALGERMISSEN, Konfessionskunde (7th ed. Celle 1957) 465–469. B. SCHULTZE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 2:148–149.

[B. SCHULTZE]

ORTHODOXY

The word orthodoxy, derived from the Greek, means ὀρθός (right) and δόξα (belief). This word is primarily used in connection with those churches of the Christian East. The title itself is ancient and was not used by the Orthodox Churches to express their position in reference to Rome so much as to indicate their fidelity to the first seven ecumenical councils. Unlike the Oriental Orthodox Churches and the Assyrian Church of the East, the Orthodox Churches insist upon their orthodoxy by their reception of the christology of the Council of Chalcedon (451). In using the term “orthodoxy” to describe themselves, the Orthodox Churches speak of not only preserving true belief about God and Christ but also preserve right worship; they glorify God in the true way in the liturgy. This extension of the term orthodoxy to embrace not only right belief (ortho-dogma) but also right glory (ortho-doxa) indicates the importance of the Church as a worshiping community, revealing the deep liturgical foundations of the Christian East.

Bibliography: S. BULGAKOV, The Orthodox Church (Crestwood, NY 1988) v. LOSSKY, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (Cambridge 1957) J. MEYENDORFF, The Orthodox Church (Crestwood, NY 1981) A. SCHMEMANN, For the Life of the World: Sacraments and Orthodoxy (Crestwood, NY 1973). A. SCHMEMANN, The Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy (Crestwood, NY 1977). K. WARE, The Orthodox Church, rev. ed. (New York 1997)

[M. E. WILLIAMS/EDS.]

ORTIZ DE ZÁRATE, PEDRO, VEN.

Argentine martyr; b. Jujuy, 1622; d. in the Chaco, Oct. 27, 1683. He was the grandson of one of the founders of the early settlements in Jujuy and inherited a fortune in land and money. In 1644 he married Petronila de Ibarra, a member of another of the founding families; they had two sons. After the death of his wife in 1653, Ortiz de Zárate studied with the Jesuits; he was ordained in 1659. He was then appointed pastor in Jujuy. However, his great ambition was to convert the natives of the Chaco and to civilize them through preaching the gospel. He sought permission from the royal authorities and from the bishop of Tucumán to organize a missionary expedition into the region with two Jesuits. They left Jujuy on Oct. 18, 1682, with Ortiz de Zárate paying all the expenses of the expedition. Within the forests of the Chaco he founded two settlements: Santa María and San Rafael. The natives gave the appearance of being friendly but the next year they killed Ortiz de Zárate and the Jesuit Father Salinas. All the existing documents that refer to Ortiz de Zárate assert that he led a holy life of mortification. His reputation for saintliness has grown since his death. A bone from his arm is preserved in the House of the Good Shepherd in Jujuy.

Father Anatoly prays while believers listen during Orthodox Easter service at Orthodox church, Kiev, Ukraine. (AP/Wide World)

Bibliography: M. A. VERGARA, Estudios sobre historia eclesiástica de Jujuy (Tucumán, Argen. 1942).

[M. A. VERGARA]

ORTLIBARII

A strongly ascetic movement, known also as Ortliebenses, that owed its name to Ortlieb of Strasbourg (c. 1200). An example of lay protest against institutional religion, they are mentioned in 13th-century documents with the Cathari and WALDENSES, and lesser sects as well, thus underscoring the confusion about their teaching in the minds of their contemporaries. For example, a constitution issued by Emperor FREDERICK II on May 14, 1238, proscribed the Ortolevos with a number of other heresies (Monumenta Germanica Historica [Berlin 1826—] Leges 4: Const. 2:284–285). According to ALBERT THE GREAT's judgment of the heretics of the Swabian district of Ries (Diocese of Augsburg) c. 1270, the Ortlibarii had been condemned by Innocent III for holding "that man must abstain from externals and follow the spirit that is in him." They were reminiscent, on the one hand, of the pantheism of the AMALRICIANS centered in Paris (according to Jundt and Preger), and on the other, of the dualism of the widespread Gnostic-Manichaean stream (Haupt). However, significant differences set them apart from these movements as well as from the Waldenses with whom Müller was anxious to establish a relationship. The Ortlibarii espoused a cause that not only aimed to dissolve the visible Church but sought also to undermine essential tenets of the Christian tradition. The principal source for their teachings is the so-called Passau Anonymus (Pseudo-Rainer), begun c. 1260. The sect did not accept divine creation of the world, which they considered eternal. Its members reopened the Christological question with an attack on Trinitarian doctrine. Turning to the Sacraments, they rejected the Eucharist and adjudged infant Baptism useless since conscious adherence to their movement alone was efficacious. To the Catholic hierarchy they opposed their own Perfect Ones who, they claimed, could bind and loose. They recognized no obligation to pay TITHES, asserting that the clergy ought to earn its livelihood by manual labor. The papacy was identified with the harlot of the Apocalypse. Once the pope and emperor were converted to the sect, the Last Judgment would be imminent. Failure to be numbered among the sectaries merited damnation. Although they denied the resurrection of the body, they assumed the perfection of the spirit. Of particular interest to civil government was their rejection of oaths and capital punishment. While unlike the Cathari they countenanced marriage, they enjoined continence. The Ortlibarii did not survive the 13th century; presumably they were absorbed by the Brothers and Sisters of the Free Spirit of the 14th century.

Bibliography: S. M. DEUTSCH, J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds., Realenzyklopädie für protestantische Theologie, 24 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1896–1913) 14:498–501. W. PREGER, Geschichte der deutschen Mystik im Mittelalter, 3 v. (1874–93) 1:191–196. A. JUNDT, Histoire du panthéisme populaire au moyen âge et au seizième siècle (Strasburg 1875) 36–41. H. HAUPT, “Waldensia,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 10 (1888) 316–328. K. MÜLLER, Die Waldenser und ihre einzelnen Gruppen (Gotha 1886) 130–132, 169–171. H. GRUNDMANN, Religiöse Bewegungen im Mittelalter (2d ed. Hildesheim 1961). J. J. I. VON DÖLLINGER, Beiträge zur Sektengeschichte des Mittelalters, 2 v. in 1 (Munich 1890; repr. New York 1960) 2:299, 301, 317, 330, 400, 703.

[E. W. MCDONNELL]

ORTOLANA (HORTULANA), BL.

Wife and mother; d. before 1238. A descendant of the noble Fiumi family, she grew up to be a very devout young woman. She made several pilgrimages to Monte Gargano and to Rome, and c. 1192 she undertook the hazardous journey to the Holy Land. On her return she married Count Favarone di Offreduccio of Assisi. She was the mother of four children, including St. CLARE OF ASSISI and St. Agnes of Assisi. After the death of her husband, who had at first strongly opposed the religious vocation of their children, Ortolana joined the POOR CLARES at the convent of San Damiano at Monticelli near Florence, where her third daughter, Beatrice, was also a nun. She was buried close to her daughters in the church of St. Clare at Assisi, and she is honored by the FRANCISCANS with the title of blessed.

Feast: Jan. 2.

Bibliography: CIRO DA PESARO, La beata Ortolana d'Assisi (Rome 1904). Z. LAZZERI, “Il processo di canonizzazione di S. Chiara d'Assisi,” Archivum Franciscanum historicum 13 (1920) 403–507. A. FORTINI, “Nuove notizie intorno a S. Chiara di Assisi,” ibid. 46 (1953) 3–43. L. BRACALONI, S. Chiara d'Assisi (2d ed. Milan 1949), passim. O. ENGLEBERT, St. Francis of Assisi: A Biography, tr. E. M. COOPER, 2d augm. ed. by I. BRADY and R. BROWN.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

ORTON, WILLIAM AYLOTT

Philosopher, economist; b. Bromley, England, Feb. 9, 1889; d. Northampton, Mass., Aug. 13, 1952. He was the son of William Amor and Emma (Aylott) Orton. During World War I he served in the British army at Gallipoli, and in Egypt and France. He was wounded at the Battle of the Somme and later joined the intelligence staff of the British War Office. In 1917 he married Olmen Marlais Moment. Orton received the B.A. degree from Cambridge University, England, in 1919, and then entered the industrial relations department of the Ministry of Labour. Later, while studying at the University of London, he won the London Athenaeum's essay contest and published essays and articles in the Westminster Review and the New Age. After receiving the M.A. degree from Cambridge University, he went to the United States to join the faculty of Smith College, Northampton, Mass.; Bryn Mawr College, Bryn Mawr, Pa.; and the University of California at Berkeley. He was awarded honorary degrees by the University of London; Boston College, Boston, Mass.; and Georgetown University, Washington, D.C. He published articles in popular magazines and in the American Journal of Sociology, International Journal of Ethics, American Economic Review, and Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences. Among his books were America in Search of Culture (1933), Prelude to Economics (1933), The Economic Role of the State (1949), and The Liberal Tradition (1945). In his writings Orton often referred to Catholic history and to classic literature. In his public lectures he frequently urged the people of the United States to accept the role of leadership in the modern world. Although aware of the value of conservative philosophy, he believed that the liberal viewpoint alone assumed responsibility for the future and was based on the confident outlook of Christianity.

[J. R. BETTS]

ORVAL, ABBEY OF

A Cistercian abbey in Luxembourg province, Belgium, founded in 1070 by Count Arnulf II of Chiny for some Benedictine monks from Calabria. Orval (Aureavallis, Guldenthal) passed into the possession of the Clerks Regular in 1110 and eventually was taken over by Cistercians from the Abbey of TRE FONTANE in 1132. The first Cistercian abbot was Constantine (d. 1145), a disciple of St. Bernard of Clairvaux, who was noted for holiness. In 1251 or 1252 Orval was burned, and the monks dispersed. Under succeeding abbots it flourished and was well governed except during the decline following the Reformation in the Netherlands in the 16th century. Its spirit was restored by Abbot Bernard de Montgaillard (d. 1628), but the buildings were again destroyed by Huguenots in 1637. Abbot Carl von Benzeradt (d. 1707) drew up new statutes of strict observance for Orval. During the rule of Abbot E. Henrion (d. 1729), it was a focal point of Jansenism, but in 1750 those monks infected with the heresy were removed. Orval prospered and in 1750 it owned 300 towns, from which it derived a rich income. It fell victim to the French Revolutionists and was suppressed in 1796. In 1926 Trappists from the Abbey of SEPT-FONS built a priory upon its ruins.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2148–49. N. TILLIÈRE, Histoire de l'abbaye d'Orval (6th ed. Gembloux 1958). C. GRÉGOIRE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1258.

[E. D. MC SHANE]

OSBALDESTON, EDWARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1560 at Osbaldeston, Lancashire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, Nov. 16, 1594. Edward studied at Douai, then at Rheims, where he was ordained (Sept. 21, 1585). He worked on the Continent until he was sent to Yorkshire in April 1589. Betrayed by an apostate priest, he was apprehended on Sept. 30, 1594. Following his trial at York, Osbaldeston was convicted of high treason for being a priest. Challoner prints a portion of a still extant letter from Osbaldeston to his fellow-prisoners in York Castle, which reveals the martyr's humility and the serene trust in God with which he anticipated his death. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924), I, no. 106. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

OSBERN OF GLOUCESTER

Lexicographer, exegete; fl. c. 1150. Little is known about his life beyond the fact that he was born probably in the township of Pinnock in Gloucestershire, England, that he was a Benedictine at Gloucester under Abbot Hamelin (1148–79), and that he dedicated his commentary on Judges to Gilbert Foliot, who was then bishop of Hereford (1148–63). Although Osbern also wrote commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy, and Numbers and treatises on the Incarnation, Nativity, Passion, and Resurrection (none published), his most influential work remained his Liber derivationum (sometimes called Panormia), which is to be assigned to the third quarter of the 12th century when Osbern was an old man. Set in an allegorical framework and arranged alphabetically with two sections to each letter, this dictionary of derivations, well equipped with testimonia from both ancient and medieval writers, entered the main stream of European learning, appearing in Bavaria and Austria before the end of the 12th century and becoming the main source for the glossary of HUGUCCIO OF PISA (d. 1210).

Bibliography: Works. Liber derivationum, ed. A. MAI, in Classicorum auctorum e Vaticanis codicibus editorum, 10 v. (Rome 1828–38), v.8. G. LOEWE, Corpus Glossariorum latinorum, ed. G. GOETZ, 7 v. (Leipzig 1888–1923) 1:196–215, for description of work and reproduction of preface. Preface also in R. W. HUNT, "The 'Lost' Preface to the Liber derivationum of Osbern of Gloucester," Mediaeval and Renaissance Studies 4 (1958) 267–282. British Museum MS Bibl. Reg. 6DIX, for exegetical works. Biography. W. MEYER, "Ueber Mai's Thesaurus novus latinis," Rheinisches Museum für Philologie 29 (1874) 179–183, G. GOETZ, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der lateinischen Studien im Mittelalter," Berichte über die Verhandlungen der Königlich-Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig, Philologisch-Historische Klasse 55 (1903) 121–154. Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:187–190. É. PELLEGRI, "Un Manuscrit des Derivationes d'Osbern de Gloucester annoté par Pétrarque (Paris BN cod. lat. 7492)," Italia medioevale e umanistica 3 (1960) 263–266.

[R. B. PALMER]

OSIANDER, ANDREAS

Nuremberg reformer; b. Gunzenhausen in Frankish Brandenburg, Dec. 19, 1498; d. Königsberg, Oct. 17, 1552. Osiander was a classical student at Leipzig, Altenburg, and Ingolstadt, and became an accomplished linguist, but did not obtain a degree. He was ordained in 1520, taught Hebrew in the Augustinian Cloister at Nuremberg, and was later identified with Lazarus Spengler (1479–1534), Wenceslaus Linck (1483–1547), and Wilibald PIRKHEIMER as a Nuremberg reformer. In 1522 he published his Biblia sacra, a version of the Vulgate based on original texts. A Lutheran, he married in 1525.

Osiander opposed Zwingli's view of the Lord's Supper. He was invited to the Marburg Colloquy (1529) and to Augsburg (1530). He assisted in church visitations in lands of Markgrave George of Brandenburg-Ansbach and, with Johann BRENZ, drafted the Brandenburg-Nuremberg Church Ordinance (1532). He was a discussant at Schmalkalden (1537), Hagenau, Worms (1540), and Regensburg (1541), where his criticism of Melancthon brought about his recall.

Although he was unusually gifted, Osiander's haughty, overbearing, disputatious, and unrestrained manner irritated his enemies and alienated his friends. Although adept at pointing out error, he rarely contributed constructive solutions. He could not forego polemics. When asked by Rhäticus (Georg Joachim von Lauchen 1514–76) to edit and publish Copernicus's De revolutionibus orbium coelestium (1543), Osiander added his own preface in which he claimed the work was based on hypotheses. Although Copernicus's adherents were furious, the claim kept the book off the Index until the 17th century.

Although he was nominally Lutheran, Osiander's teachings, because of certain mystical assumptions, had a strange twist on sin, grace, and, particularly, justification, which he regarded not as a forensic act, as did Luther, but a gradual process resulting from Christ's indwelling in the sinner. He differed also with Luther's teaching on church discipline and private confession.

After his abrupt departure from Nuremberg (1548), Osiander remained in Königsberg in the service of Duke Albert of Prussia, first as pastor of the Altstädtische Kirche, and later, as professor primarius at Königsberg. His lack of academic degrees aroused the jealousy of older professors, and his dissident views caused friction with the orthodox younger men who had studied under Luther and Melancthon. Particularly divisive was Osiander's strange view of justification, an argument in which Melancthon and Flacius were eventually embroiled; but Duke Albert continued his confidence in Osiander and even elevated him in 1551 to president of the bishopric of Samland. At Osiander's death the duke honored him with a royal funeral.

Bibliography: W. MÖLLER, Andreas Osianders Leben und ausgewählte Schriften (Väter und Begründer der Lutherischen Kir- che 5; Elberfeld 1870); Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 24:473–483. W. MÖLLER and P. TSCHACKERT, J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds. Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie (Leipzig 1896–1913) 14: 501–509. E. BIZER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1730–31. P. MEINHOLD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:1261–63.

[E. G. SCHWIEBERT]

OSMUND OF SALISBURY, ST.

Bishop, chancellor; d. Dec. 3–4, 1099. Osmund, or Osmer, was a Norman noble who went to England with his uncle, WILLIAM I the Conqueror, for whom he served as chaplain and then chancellor (c. 1072–78). He was consecrated bishop of Salisbury in 1078. Prominent in civil as well as ecclesiastical affairs of the realm, he is believed to have directed a large portion of the Domesday survey. As bishop he completed the cathedral of Old Sarum (not the present cathedral of Salisbury) and established there a cathedral chapter of secular canons. Emulation of this example gradually brought the English cathedral system into conformity with Continental practice. He also organized the liturgical services for his diocese and the compilation provided the basis of the later "Sarum Use" that was widely adopted throughout the British Isles. He was canonized by Pope CALLISTUS III, Jan. 1, 1457, the last canonization of a saint from England until that of Sir Thomas MORE in 1935. On July 23, 1457, his remains were translated from Old Sarum to the Lady Chapel in Salisbury.

Feast: Dec. 4.

Bibliography: WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, Gesta pontificum Anglorum, ed. N. E. S. A. HAMILTON (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 52; 1870) 183–184, 424–431. The Register of S. Osmund, ed. W. H. R. JONES, 2 v. (ibid. 78; 1883–84). The Canonization of Saint Osmund, ed. A. R. MALDEN (Salisbury, Eng. 1901). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 14:1207–09. W. J. TORRANCE, The Story of Saint Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury (Salisbury, Wiltshire 1978).

[R. D. WARE]

OSRHOENE

Osrhoene is a region between the Euphrates and Tigris rivers whose capital was EDESSA. During the first two Christian centuries it was a small kingdom under the dynasty of Abgar. In 216 the Emperor Caracalla incorporated it into the Roman Empire as a province. Christianity had been introduced into Osrhoene early, most probably from Antioch by Jewish Christians. There is no historical foundation for the legends of ABGAR, King of Osrhoene, recorded by Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 1.12–13) to the effect that the king begged Jesus to come and heal his daughter. To this request Jesus was alleged to have sent a written reply saying that he was going to send his disciple, Thaddeus (Thaddai), to heal the girl and preach the Gospel. However, according to trustworthy sources, there were Christians in Osrhoene as early as the latter half of the 2nd century.

The Epitaph of ABERCIUS and information in Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 5.24) witness to the fact that counsel was sought from the Diocese of Osrhoene in the matter of the fixing of the date for Easter. At the beginning of the 3rd century JULIUS AFRICANUS found the heretic BARDESANES in the court of King Abgar IX. There is no conclusive evidence for A. von HARNACK'S contention that this king embraced Christianity and that Osrhoene was the first Christian kingdom. The Christians of Osrhoene wrote in Syriac; their greatest glory was St. EPHREM.

Bibliography: J. P. MARTIN, Les Origines de l'Église d'Édesse et des églises syriennes (Paris 1889). I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, "Le origini del cristianesimo in Edessa," Gregorianum, 15 (1934) 82–91.

[I. ORTIZ DE URBINA]

OSSÓ Y CERVELLÓ, ENRIQUE (HENRY) DE, ST.

Priest and founder of the Society of Saint Teresa of Jesus (Compañía de Santa Teresa de Jesús); b. Vinebre (village near Tarragona), Spain, Oct. 15 or 16, 1840; d. Gilet near Valencia, Spain, Jan. 27, 1896.

The youngest of the three children of Jaime de Ossó and his wife Micaela Cervelló, Enrique was apprenticed at age twelve to his uncle, a Barcelona merchant, when he fell gravely ill and was sent home. Upon his recovery he was apprenticed to a businessman in Reus, Don Ortal, but Enrique left everything behind following his mother's death (Sept. 15, 1854).

He began to study for the priesthood at Tortosa's seminary (1854–60), and then at Barcelona (1860–61, 1863–66), where he completed spiritual exercises for the subdiaconate (May 1866) under the direction of Saint Anthony Mary CLARET. He was still a seminarian when he returned to the Tortosa seminary to teach in 1862. There he was ordained in 1867. In June 1870, Enrique made a pilgrimage to Rome in the company of two other later saints, Claret and Emmanuel DOMINGO Y SOL. He began his catechetical work and offered popular missions in Tortosa in 1871, while continuing to teach mathematics in Tortosa's seminary until the bishop relieved him from his faculty duties.

Ossó y Cervelló founded several associations for lay people: the Association of the Immaculate Conception for farmers (1870); Association of the Daughters of Immaculate Mary and Saint Teresa of Jesus for youth (approved 1873); Brotherhood of Saint Joseph for men (1876); and Little Flock of the Child Jesus (Rebañito del Niño Jesús, 1876) for children.

The inspiration for his greatest work came during his prayer in April 1876, and was realized several months later (June 23) when eight young women committed to help him found the Society of Saint Teresa of Jesus for Christian education. In 1878 the cornerstone was laid in Tortosa for the first house and the following year the eight founders pronounced their vows in the chapel of St. Paul in Tarragona (Jan. 1, 1879). The foundation quickly spread to Portugal and Latin America, and, in 1885, to Algeria, but was not without difficulties.

Ossó used modern methods to communicate the Gospel message. The weekly El amigo del pueblo (The People's Friend, founded in 1871), which responded to the prevailing anticlerical attitudes, was censured. In October 1872, he published the first edition of the monthly magazine Santa Teresa de Jesús as well as his first book, Guía práctica del catequista (Practical Guide for Catechists). In 1874, he produced the first edition of El cuarto de hora de oración (Fifteen Minutes of Prayer). He also published Handbook of the Friends of Jesus, Treasure Chest for Children, Novena to Saint Joseph, The Spirit of Saint Teresa, Tribute to Saint Francis de Sales, Novena to the Holy Spirit, and Novena to the Immaculate Conception, as well as textbooks used by the sisters and many other publications.

On Jan. 2, 1896, Enrique retired to the Franciscan convent of Santo Espiritu at Gilet, where he suffered a stroke and died. Initially he was buried in Gilet; in July 1908 his body was translated to the chapel of the Company of Saint Teresa in Tortosa, Spain. Ossó's cause for beatification was introduced in 1923, but suspended from 1927 until 1957, when it was reintroduced. He was declared venerable in 1976. Pope John Paul II both beatified (Oct. 14, 1979) and canonized him (June 16, 1993, at Madrid, Spain).

Feast: Jan. 27 (Carmelites).

Bibliography: M. GONZÁLEZ MARTÍN, The Power of the Priesthood: A Life of Father Henry de Ossó, tr. by L. BONNECARRÈRE (Barcelona 1971). M. V. MOLINS, Así era Enrique de Ossó: biografía del fundador de la Compañía de Santa Teresa (Burgos 1993); Henry de Osso, priest and teacher, tr. O. DAIGLE, ed. J. ROXBOROUGH (Covington, La. 1993). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1982): 673–76. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 43 (1979): 13–14.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

OSSUARIES

Rectangular containers of limestone, baked clay, or wood, used to store the bones of bodies deposited in the loculi of tombs or caves, to make room there for new burials. Several hundred ossuaries, some plain, many decorated on one side with matching rosettes in a paneled framework, have been found near Jerusalem, Nablus, and other places in Palestine. Their size (20-to-32 by 12-to-20 by 10-to-16 inches) was dictated by the measurements of skull and femur bone. The lids, often fitted in grooves, were flat, rounded, or gabled. The chief interest of these caskets lies in the graffiti found on many of them; written, probably by the one who transferred the bones, in Aramaic, Greek, or both, they give, usually, only the name of the person whose bones the box contained. Many of the names are known from the Bible, Josephus, or the Murabba'at finds; some are new. The Aramaic inscription yhwš' br ywsp (Jesus son of Joseph) on a 1st-century ossuary has no bearing on the Resurrection; both names were very common among Jews of the period. Cross marks, not certainly of Christian origin, on the lids or sides of ossuaries, may have been inspired by Ez 9.4–6 or placed there to ward off demonic influence.

Bibliography: N. AVIGAD, "A Depository of Inscribed Ossuaries in the Kidron Valley," Israel Exploration Journal 12 (1962) 1–12. D. FISHWICK, "The Talpioth Ossuaries Again," New Testament Studies 10 (1963–64) 49–61. B. BAGATTI and J. MILIK, Gli Scavi del "Dominus Flevit," v.1 (Jerusalem 1958). C. H. KRAELING, "Christian Burial Urns?" The Biblical Archeologist 9 (1946) 16–20. E. M. MEYERS, Jewish Ossuaries: Reburial and Rebirth (Rome 1971). R. H. SMITH, "Cross Marks on Jewish Ossuaries," Palestine Exploration Quarterly 106 (1974) 53–66. J. P. KANE, "Ossuary Inscriptions of Jerusalem," Journal of Semitic Studies 23 (1978) 268–282. P. FIGUERAS, Decorated Jewish Ossuaries (Leiden 1983). P. FIGUERAS, "Jewish Ossuaries and Secondary Burial: Their Significance for Early Christianity," Immanuel 19 (1984–85) 41–57. B. R. MCCANE, "Bones of Contention: Ossuaries and Reliquaries in Early Judaism and Christianity," Second Century 8 (1991) 235–246.

[M. A. HOFER/EDS.]

OSTRACON

An inscribed potsherd. Since papyrus or leather often proved expensive for ordinary writing chores such as memoranda, letters, and receipts or even at times for official communications, the ancients resorted to potsherds as a writing material. Such material was readily available, required no preparation, and could be reused if necessary. The writing was sometimes scratched on the surface but was normally inscribed with pen and ink. Such a surface, however, was not practical for writing in cuneiform. Some inscribed potsherds (ostraca) have been found in Palestine and have thrown light on the biblical period.

St. Oswald and King Aidan seated at dinner, illumination from the "Berthold Missal" of the Abbey of Weingarten in Swabia, 1200–1232 (Morgan MS 710, folio 101v).

The most famous are the Lachis letters and the Samaritan ostraca.

See Also: EPIGRAPHY, HEBREW.

[T. H. WEBER]

OSWALD, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA, ST.

Martyr; b. 604; d. Aug. 5, 642. The son of King Aethelfrith, he lived in exile after his father's death in 616, and was brought up in the monastery of IONA. His cousin, King EDWIN OF NORTHUMBRIA, was slain in battle in 633 fighting against Penda, the heathen King of Mercia, and Cadwallon, Penda's British ally. A year later Oswald attacked Cadwallon at Heavenfield, near Hexham, and won a great victory. The wooden cross Oswald erected before the battle long enjoyed fame for its miraculous powers. After Edwin's death Northumbria had lapsed into heathenism, but Oswald, with the help of AIDAN OF LINDISFARNE, sent as bishop from Iona at his request, set about its reconversion. He often accompanied Aidan on evangelizing tours from his see in LINDISFARNE, sometimes acting as interpreter since Aidan spoke but little English. So Christianity, in its Celtic form, was restored.

BEDE recounted many tales about the king's humility and generosity. For some time he was overlord of all the English kingdoms, but in 642 he was killed fighting against Penda. His last words, "May God have mercy on their souls," a prayer for his soldiers, later became a proverb. Bede is the source for several stories about cures that took place on the spot where Oswald fell. His body was later discovered and brought by his niece, Queen Osthryth, to a monastery at Bardney in Mercia; but the brethren were unwilling to receive the bones of a former foe. At length the monks were convinced by a column of light above the bier that these were the relics of a saint and gladly received them. From then on the monastery doors were kept continually open. Oswald's head was placed in the coffin of St. CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE and is still in Durham. The arms, long incorrupt, were deposited at Bamborough. The body was translated to Gloucester when Bardney was destroyed in 909 by the Danes; later WILLIBRORD took some of the relics to Frisia, and many continental churches still claim them. He is venerated as a martyr, and churches were dedicated to him in France, Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, and northern Italy.

Feast: Aug. 9 (formerly 5).

Bibliography: BEDE, Historia ecclesiastica 2.5, 20; 3.1–3, 5, 6, 9, 11–13; 5.24. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:83–103. AELFRIC OF EYNSHAM, Lives of Three English Saints, ed. G. I. NEEDHAM (London 1966, rev. ed. Exeter 1976). W. HUNT, in The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; reprinted with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; supplement 1901– ) 14:1215–17. A. H. THOMPSON, ed., Bede, His Life, Times, and Writings (Oxford 1935) 217–220. J. OSWALD, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1296. R. BRÄUER, Das Problem des "Spielmännischen" aus der Sicht der St.-Oswald-Überlieferung (Berlin 1969), legends. Der Münchner Oswald: mit e. Anh., Die ostschwäbische Prosabearbeitung, ed. M. CURSCHMANN (Tübingen 1974). C. M. FANDREY, Das Oswald-Reliquiar im Hildesheimer Domschatz (Göppingen 1987).

[B. COLGRAVE]

OSWALD OF YORK, ST.

Archbishop; d. Worcester, Feb. 29, 992. As bishop of Worcester (961) and archbishop of York (972), Oswald shared with DUNSTAN and ETHELWOLD the glory of establishing the 10th-century Anglo-Saxon monastic revival. A Dane by birth, he was brought up by his uncle, Archbishop ODO OF CANTERBURY. Ordained deacon and priest at Fleury, he introduced its reformed practices into England, founding a small Benedictine monastery at Westbury (c. 962), an influential house at RAMSEY (c. 971), and communities at Winchcombe, Pershore, and perhaps Deerhurst, Ripon, and Evesham. Unlike Ethel-wold, Oswald avoided violent reform, monasticizing the See of WORCESTER gradually and by example (c. 974–977). With Dunstan, he helped to crown Kings EDGAR, EDWARD THE MARTYR, and Ethelred II. Sources about his life include the Vita sancti Oswaldi auctore anonymo (ed. J. RAINE, Historians . . . York, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores. [London 1858–96]), EADMER's Vita sancti Oswaldi, as well as the Chronicon abbatiae Ramesiensis, and the works of FLORENCE OF WORCESTER and WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY.

Feast: Feb. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:755–762. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 14:1217–19. J. A. ROBINSON, The Times of Saint Dunstan (Oxford 1923). E. S. DUCKETT, Saint Dunstan of Canterbury (New York 1955). E. JOHN, "St. Oswald and the Tenth Century Reformation," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History 9 (1958) 159–172. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (Cambridge, England 1962). St. Oswald of Worcester: Life and Influence, ed. N. BROOKS and C. CUBITT (London 1996).

[W. A. CHANEY]

OTEIZA SEGURA, FAUSTINO, BL.

Martyr, priest of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. Feb. 14, 1890, in Ayegui, Navarre, Spain; d. Aug. 9, 1936. Faustino was professed in 1907 and ordained in 1913. Thereafter he was assigned to Peralta where he taught in the elementary school and later served as novice master. He witnessed the martyrdoms of Dionisio PAMPLONA, Manuel SEGURA LÓPEZ, and Brother David MARRAÑÓN and chronicled them in a letter to the provincial written on Aug. 1, 1936. He lived piously in the prison house, sustained by his devotions to the Blessed Mother, until his execution with Florentín Felipe NAYA on a roadside near Peralta. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: "Decreto Super Martyrio," Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 651–656. La Documentation Catholique 2125 (Nov. 5, 1995): 924.

[L. GENDERNALIK/EDS.]

OTHLO OF SANKT EMMERAM

Benedictine scholar; b. near Freising, Germany c. 1010; d. Sankt Emmeram Abbey, Regensburg, Nov. 23, c. 1070. A precocious child, Othlo received his early education at TEGERNSEE and HERSFELD ABBEYS. Finding the secular clerical life unsatisfactory, he entered SANKT EMMERAM in 1032. A sensitive, gifted, and imaginative monk, Othlo experienced various spiritual trials and worried especially about his enthusiasm for classical literature. Such concern reveals the early influence of those CLUNIAC REFORM ideals that led him into serious patristic and scriptural studies. At Sankt Emmeram, where he taught WILLIAM OF HIRSAU, he was encouraged to write. His first major composition, the De doctrina spirituali, was a long poetic exhortation to virtue, with criticism of pagan classical studies. His Dialogus de tribus quaestionibus (c. 1053) expounds various theological themes: it rests on St. Augustine and attacks the new dialectical approach to theology.

Because of disagreements that he had with the bishop of Regensburg, Othlo left Sankt Emmeram and lived at FULDA (1062–66), where he composed a biography of St. BONIFACE and probably the life of St. WOLFGANG OF REGENSBURG, the Liber visionum, describing divine manifestations including some he himself received, and the Libellus manualis, a powerful harangue to clergy and laity to reform and return to proper respect for religion—a realistic commentary on the age. At Fulda he also began the Proverbia (ed. C. G. Korfmacher, Chicago 1936), an extensive collection of memorable sayings culled for pedagogical purposes from Christian and classical sources. Leaving Fulda, Othlo visited Amorbach Abbey, where he wrote the Quomodo legendum sit in rebus visibilibus, on Christian education. Having returned to Sankt Emmeram (c. 1068) and feeling the weight of years, Othlo composed the De cursu spirituali, a homiletic work using St. Paul's figure of speech. It displays a thorough familiarity with Scripture and skill in the allegorical method of exegesis. His final work, the Libellus de suis temptationibus, varia fortuna et scriptis, is autobiographical. Among Othlo's minor works, difficult to date, are lives of SS. ALTO, Nicholas, and Magnus, some religious poetry, sermons, and his puzzling Translatio s. Dionysii. He also produced counterfeit charters on behalf of Sankt Emmeram.

Bibliography: Works. Patrologia latina (Paris 1878–90) 146:9–434. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1926– ) 4:521–542; 11:376–393; 15.2:843–846; 30.2:823–837. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (ibid.) 53:111–217. Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2:565–597. Literature. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 2:83–103. G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie (3d ed. Bern 1949– ) 3.1:57–107. B. BISCHOFF, Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters 3:658–670; 5:831; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1298–99.

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

OTHMAR, ST.

Abbot; b. c. 689; d. Werd near Stein am Rhein, Switzerland, Nov. 16, 759. Othmar (Otmar, Audemar, Audomar) was educated for the priesthood at the imperial court. In 719 he was invited to assume the direction of a colony of monks who had settled near the grave of St. GALL. Othmar built them a monastery to be governed by the BENEDICTINE RULE. He also established the first house for lepers in Switzerland. In his defense of the autonomy of the Abbey of SANKT GALLEN, he suffered imprisonment and exile. In 769 his remains were returned to Sankt Gallen, and in 867 they were buried in the church named for him. He is represented in art as an abbot with a staff and sometimes with a small cask for the refreshment of pilgrims.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: J. DUFT, Sankt Otmar in Kult und Kunst (St. Gallen 1966). Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 2:41–47. J. DUFT, ed., St. Otmar: Die Quellen zu seinem Leben (Zurich 1959). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:1014–15. J. M. CLARK, The Abbey of St. Gall as a Centre of Literature and Art (Cambridge, Eng. 1926). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:312–315.

[B. D. HILL]

O'TOOLE, GEORGE BARRY

Educator, author, cofounder of the Catholic University of Beijing, China; b. Toledo, Ohio, Dec. 11, 1886; d. Washington, D.C., March 26, 1944. He studied at St. John's University, Toledo, and received doctorates in philosophy and theology from the Urban University, Rome. After ordination in Rome (Nov. 1, 1911), he served as secretary to Joseph Schrembs, Bishop of Toledo (1912–15); diocesan canonist (1913–15); pastor of St. Aloysius, Bowling Green, Ohio (1915–17); professor of philosophy, St. Vincent Seminary, Latrobe, Pa. (1917–18); U.S. Army chaplain (1918–19); professor of philosophy (1919–20) and dogmatic theology (1923–24) again at St. Vincent's; professor of animal biology, Seton Hill College, Greensburg, Pa. (1919–20, 1923–24); rector of the Catholic University of Peking (1925–33); professor and head of department of philosophy, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pa. (1934–37), professor of philosophy, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. (1937–44); and editor in chief of the China Monthly (1939–44). With Archabbot Aurelius Stehle, OSB, he established the Catholic (Fu Jen) University of Beijing (relocated at Taipei, Formosa, 1962); at the time of his departure from China in 1933, it included schools of arts, sciences, and education, with approximately 100 faculty members and 1,100 students. O'Toole was made a domestic prelate in 1934. A detailed list of his writings is included in D. D. Runes, ed., Who's Who in Philosophy (New York 1942) 348.

Bibliography: Archives, The Catholic University of America, unpub. biog. of Rt. Rev. Msgr. George Barry O'Toole. M. HOEHN, ed., Catholic Authors: Contemporary biographical sketches, 1930-47 (Newark 1948) 603-605.

[J. F. WIPPEL]

OTT, MICHAEL

Abbot; b. Neustad am Main, Bavaria, March 18, 1870; d. Crookston, Minn., Feb. 15, 1948. He pursued classical studies at St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn., and there joined the Benedictine Order in 1889. He was sent to the International College of Sant' Anselmo in Rome, where he received his doctorate in philosophy and was ordained on June 29, 1894. Upon returning to St. John's University, he taught commercial subjects and supervised the student publication, the library, and the print shop. He was secretary of the university's board of administration and subprior of the abbey when he was elected abbot of St. Peter's Abbey, Muenster, Saskatchewan, Canada. The abbatial blessing took place in St. Peter's Church at Muenster on Oct. 28, 1919. Two years later St. Peter's Abbey became an abbey nullius, subject directly to the Holy See, and Ott was designated as the first abbot ordinary. One of his first decisions after becoming abbot was to establish a secondary school at Muenster. In 1921 a new building was completed and classes began in St. Peter's College, which was soon recognized as a junior college affiliated with the University of Saskatchewan at Saskatoon. From 1931 until his death in 1948, he served as chaplain to the Benedictine convent in Crookston, Minn.

[J. WEBER]

OTTAVIANI, ALFREDO

Cardinal; b. in the Trastevere sector of Rome, Oct. 29, 1890; d. at the Vatican, Aug. 3, 1979. Ottaviani came from a poor family of six children. He was ordained a priest March 18, 1916, and studied at the Athaneum of St. Apollinaris (now the Pontifical Lateran University) where he completed doctorates in philosophy, theology, and canon and Roman law ("utriusque iuris"). He taught public ecclesiastical law there and, at the same time, philosophy at the Athaneum of the Sacred Congregation of the "Propaganda Fide" (now the Pontifical Urban University). He also worked in the same dicastery as a "minutante." While teaching at St. Apollinaris he collaborated with his colleagues (later Cardinals) Cicognani, Roberti and Larraona and founded the canon law journal "Apollinaris."

In 1926 Ottaviani became rector of the Pontifical Bohemian College (Nepomucene) and two years later he was appointed Under Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Extraordinary Affairs (currently the Council for Public Affairs of the Church). As Under Secretary he collaborated in the preparation of numerous concordats (e.g., with Romania and Poland) and the Lateran Treaty of 1929. When he became the "Sostituto" of the Secretariat of State in 1929, it was necessary to resign his teaching positions.

His work at the Supreme Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (now called the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith) began in 1935 when he was named Assessor. Later, he became Secretary of the Congregation and then its Prefect. Eventually, because of age, he became Prefect Emeritus, though he continued to participate in the work of the congregation and its commissions until his death. He was created a cardinal in the Consistory of Jan. 12, 1953, by Pope Pius XII. Almost ten years later he was nominated archbishop to the titular see of Berea and consecrated bishop on April 19, 1962. In his capacity as Secretary of the Holy Office, he was named President of the Preparatory and then Conciliar Commission for Theology at the Second Vatican Council. This commission was responsible for drafting the conciliar decrees on the church, Lumen gentium, and on divine revelation, Dei Verbum.

His writings include: Institutiones Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici (2 v.), used as a standard text for many years at the Pontifical Lateran Athaneum; Compendium Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici, used as a text for students of theology; Il Baluardo (1961), a collection of talks and writings; Arma Veritatis (1947), an introduction to an edition of the encyclicals "Immortale Dei" of Leo XIII and "Divini Redemptoris" of Pius XI; Luce di Roma Cristiana nel Diritto; Doveri dello Stato cattolico verso la Chiesa; and Un seminarista esemplare.

In his activities as a professor and member of the Roman Curia, Ottaviani never failed to maintain an active priestly ministry, especially for youth at the Oratorio San Pietro. In his daily ministry to these youths, "Don Alfredo" was always organizing a wide variety of activities in which he was an active participant. For these children each Sunday from 1928 to 1952, he was "l'ignorante" in a catechesis dramatically presented through the medium of comic theater with Cardinal Borgongini, who played the educated Catholic who responded to questions about the faith proposed by the “ignorant” Catholic. During WWII, there were always six to eight children whom he sheltered in his own home. The “Oasis of Saint Rita” in Frascati, near Rome, was founded by him as a home for orphans and abandoned children. He would visit them frequently, helping with schoolwork and enlisting the interest and active participation of his friends and associates.

[J. E. FOX]

OTTERBEIN, PHILIP WILLIAM

Cofounder and first bishop of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST; b. Dillenburg, Germany, June 3, 1726; d. Baltimore, Md., Nov. 17, 1813. He studied for the ministry at Herborn and was ordained (1749) a minister of the German Reformed Church. In 1753, Rev. Michael Schlatter encouraged him to immigrate to America. Otterbein was the pastor of Reformed churches in York and Lancaster, Pa., and Frederick, Md., before accepting a call to Baltimore in 1774. The origin of the Church of the United Brethren is traced to his meeting with the Mennonite preacher Martin BOEHM in 1767. Although Otterbein commissioned lay preachers and held the first conference of the Brethren in 1789, he continued to attend the Reformed synods until 1800. The consecration of Methodist Bishop Francis Asbury took place in 1785 in Otterbein’s Baltimore church, and he maintained close ties with other early Methodist leaders.

Bibliography: A. W. DRURY, The Life of Rev. Philip William Otterbein (Dayton 1894). F. ASBURY, Journal and Letters, ed. E. T. CLARK et al., 3 v. (Nashville 1958).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

OTTO, RUDOLF

Protestant theologian and scholar; b. Peine, Germany, Sept. 25, 1869; d. Marburg an der Lahn, March 6, 1937. He was a professor at Göttingen (1897–1914), at Breslau (1914–1917), and at Marburg (1917–1929). Otto was influenced especially by Kant, J. F. Fries, (1773–1843), and F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER, and became prominent as a philosopher of religion. As opposed to Neo-Kantian ideas, he developed his concept of “the Holy,” as a religious a priori, in his own independent attitude toward the good, the true, the beautiful. His book, Das Heilige (The Holy) appeared (Breslau 1917) at the so-called turning point in the philosophy of religion in Germany that is associated especially with the name of M. SCHELER (1874–1928). The latter was one of the first to recognize the importance of Otto’s work. In his analysis, which now has a permanent place in the science of religion, Otto defined the Holy as “the Numinous,” which expresses itself in feeling or consciousness as the “contrasting harmony” of the fascinans (the attracting element) and the tremendum (the awe-inspiring element). On the epistemological side, however, he was not able ultimately to win conviction for his position.

His chief works are Das Heilige (Breslau 1917; 35th ed. Munich 1963); English translation, The Idea of the Holy, tr. J. W. Harvey (New York 1958); Aufsätze, das Numinose betreffend (Stuttgart 1923; 4th ed. 1929); West-Oestliche Mystik (Gotha 1926); Die Gnadenreligion Indiens und das Christentum (Gotha 1930); and Das Gefühl des Ueberweltlichen (Munich 1932).

See Also: SACRED AND PROFANE.

Bibliography: G. WÜNSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 4:1749–50 with bibliog. J. HESSEN, Religionsphilosophie, 2 v. (2d ed. Munich 1955) 1:269–297. R. F. DAVIDSON, Rudolf Otto’s Interpretation of Religion (Princeton 1947). F. K. FEIGEL, Das Heilige: Kritische Abhandlung über Rudolf Ottos gleichnamiges Buch (2d ed. Tübingen 1948).

[A. HOLL]

OTTO I (THE GREAT), EMPEROR

Reigned as German king 936–973; emperor 962–973; b. 912; d. Memleben (buried in the cathedral at Magdeburg). Son of King Henry I and Queen Mathilda. Henry I appears to have designated his eldest son, Otto, as heir to the throne in 929 as part of his so-called Hausordnung. Around the same time (929–930), Otto married Edith, sister of King Athelstan of Wessex (England) and a descendent of St. Oswald. Otto’s status as heir apparent was confirmed during an assembly at Erfurt, in 935. Following King Henry’s death, the nobility elected, enthroned, and did homage to Otto at Aachen, where he was consecrated by Archbishop Hildebert of Mainz. Whether or not Henry was conscious of the implications, his designation of Otto as sole heir to the throne represented a significant departure from the Carolingian practice of dividing the realm among a king’s sons. From this point on, the German realm would be considered indivisible. Otto’s ecclesiastical consecration at Aachen, in contrast, represented a return to Carolingian practice and a departure from the model of his father’s succession. Henry I had rejected the offer of an ecclesiastical sacring, according to the common view, to indicate that he would not set himself above or try to dominate the German dukes, as his predecessor King Conrad I had done. In accepting an ecclesiastical consecration, Otto sent the opposite message. Subsequently, Otto would reject his father’s practice of entering into mutually obligatory agreements with magnates and make little effort to present himself as first among equals.

Otto I.

It is commonly asserted, though not unequivocally, that tension generated by the more limited options available to members of the royal house and by a new more autocratic style of kingship lay behind the revolts that marked the early years of Otto's reign. In any case, there is no question that these revolts arose when disaffected members of the aristocracy coalesced around equally disaffected members of the ruling house. Between 937 and 941, Otto's half-brother Thankmar and brother Henry, each aggrieved for somewhat different reasons, appeared at the center of uprisings. Thankmar's revolt ended with his own death, but Henry was reconciled and, in 947, was installed as duke of Bavaria with powers similar to those of a king. There was some thought that Henry had a valid claim to the throne, having been born while his father was actually king, and the unusual settlement may have constituted implicit recognition that his revolt was justified. In 953–954, another revolt crystalized around Duke Liudolf of Swabia, Otto's son by Edith and, at least initially, the monarch's designated successor. In this case, the chief source of disaffection appears to have been Otto's second marriage (to Adelheid), which appeared to threaten both Liudolf's position at court and his inheritance. Liudolf was soon joined by other magnates, most notably Duke Conrad of Lotharingia and Archbishop Frederick of Mainz. The revolt was initially successful, but effectively came to an end with the invasion of the Magyars (954), which caused all parties to close ranks around the king. Otto's victory over the Magyars at the Lechfeld (955), even if the threat from which it freed Christendom and the Reich was not as severe as some Ottonian sources suggest, clearly increased Otto's prestige and strengthened his hand against enemies and rivals. It may also have caused at least some of Otto's contemporaries to attribute to him a position comparable to that of an emperor.

The acquisition of the emperorship in 962, part of the titlature of German rulers until 1806, represents one of the most long lasting of Otto I's accomplishments. Otto made an initial effort to acquire the imperial crown during his first expedition to Italy in 951. This expedition was instigated by an appeal for help from the widowed queen of the LOMBARDS, Adelheid, who had fallen into the clutches of Berengar II of Ivrea. Marriage to Adelheid would convey a claim to the throne of the Lombards and this, presumably, figured among the German monarch's incentives. Otto succeeded in rescuing the queen and, after marrying her, celebrated his coronation at Pavia in October of 951. Tentative approaches to Pope AGAPETUS II regarding an imperial coronation met with refusal, however, probably because neither the popes nor the Roman aristocracy had any interest in acquiring an overlord. By 959, the situation had changed. As part of his settlement of the political situation in northern Italy, Otto had allowed Berengar II to rule as a sub-king under Ottonian hegemony. Nevertheless, after Otto's return to Germany, he was able to behave as if his rulership was independent and unchallenged. Faced with the threat of Berengar's power, Pope JOHN XII appealed to Otto to rescue the papacy. Before setting out for Italy, Otto secured the succession to the throne by having his son, OTTO II, elected and crowned at Aachen. On Feb. 2, 962, Otto was crowned by the pope in the basilica of St Peter. In return, Otto issued the privilege known as the Ottonianum which confirmed Carolingian donations to the papacy. Otto also secured for himself the right to a promise of fidelity from the pope prior to the latter's consecration. Later he extracted from the Romans an oath that they would never elect and consecrate a pope without Otto's permission. Acquisition of the imperial title also affected Otto's relations with Byzantium, since he now acquired an interest in southern Italy, a Byzantine sphere of influence. Tension between the two empires rose perceptibly during Otto's third Italian campaign (966–972), as Otto assumed a more active stance in that region. The result, after a period of warfare, was a compromise whereby Otto retained control of Benevento and Capua and had his imperial title recognized by the Constantinople. He also secured a Byzantine princess, Theophanu, as a bride for his son, Otto II.

Otto's ecclesiastical policies centered on his efforts to exploit the material and personal resources of the church in the interest of government. The result, sometimes referred to as the Imperial Church System, reflected a remarkable degree of cooperation between church and monarchy. In return for protection, immunity, and access to royal patronage, royal churches and monasteries were expected to contribute to military campaigns and offer hospitality to the king during his travels through the realm. Personnel recruited from these churches also staffed the royal chapel, the community of churchmen who tended to the liturgical needs of the royal court and performed a variety of administrative and diplomatic tasks.

Perhaps the most spectacular evidence of Otto's alliance with the church can be seen in his efforts to reorganize the ecclesiastical structure of the eastern frontier and further the Christianization of tributary populations among the Slavs. This process may have already begun with the foundation of the monastery of St. Maurice at Magdeburg (937), but certainly lay behind his efforts, from 955 on, to elevate that church to the status of an archbishopric. The foundation of bishoprics at Brandenburg, Havelburg, Merseburg, Meissen, and Zeitz as suffragans of Magdeburg, and of Oldenburg as suffragan of Hamburg-Bremen, figured in this plan as each incorporated a significant Slavic population.

Bibliography: K.J. LEYSER, Rule and Conflict in an Early Medieval Society: Ottonian Saxony (London 1979) passim. H. BEUMANN, Die Ottonen (2d ed. Stuttgart 1991) 42–44, 53–112. T. REUTER, Germany in the Early Middle Ages, 800–1056 (London 1991) 148–180. E. MUELLER-MERTENS, “The Ottonians as Kings and Emperors,” in The New Cambridge Medieval History, v.3., ed. T. REUTER (Cambridge 1999) 233–266.

[D.A. WARNER]

OTTO II, EMPEROR

Reign: German King 961–983, Emperor 967–983. d. Rome, Italy. Buried in the Basilica of St Peter. Son of Emperor OTTO I and Empress Adelheid. Husband of Theophanu. Otto was elected king at the age of six years in 961 and crowned at Aachen. Following his father's death in 973, he succeeded to the throne, barely eighteen years old and unopposed. He had already acquired the title of emperor some years earlier (967), having been crowned as his father's co-emperor by Pope John XIII. Through his marriage to Theophanu, a Byzantine princess, Otto II had also secured recognition of his title by the Byzantine court. Although his succession was uncontested, Otto II, like his father, encountered opposition soon afterwards. In the south of the realm, Otto's efforts to arrange the succession to the Duchy of Swabia instigated his cousin, Duke Henry “the Quarrelsome” of Bavaria to rebel. Henry's uprising (974–978) is noteworthy, among other things, because it attracted the support of Duke Boleslav II of Bohemia and Duke Mieszko I of Poland. Following his defeat, Duke Henry lost his duchy and was imprisoned at Utrecht. Otto used the occasion to reorganize the southern duchies, granting Bavaria to Duke Otto of Swabia and combining the formerly Bavarian region of Carinthia with the Italian marches to form an independent duchy of Carinthia.

Another conflict emerged in the west, where Otto's efforts to exert his influence over the Duchy of Lotharinga incited the west Frankish ruler, Lothar, who also had a claim to the area. In 977, Otto appointed Lothar's estranged brother, Charles, as duke in lower Lotharinga. Lothar responded with a surprise attack on Aachen in 978, nearly capturing the emperor himself. Otto's counter attack, on the city of Paris, yielded little in the way of concrete results, but presumably satisfied the emperor's honor. In 980, a meeting between the two monarchs resulted in the Frankish king's surrender of any claim to Lotharinga.

In Italy, Ottonian rule appeared secure, though in Rome itself aristocratic factions such as the Crescentii continued to struggle for power and for control of the papacy, the prize that power customarily bestowed. Otto II is generally thought to have pursued the claims of the imperial office with far greater intensity than his father had. From the beginning, he apparently aimed to conquer and actually rule in southern Italy, thereby bringing the entire peninsula under his authority. This plan was reflected in a new title, Imperator Romanorum augustus, that suggested his intent to rule over all of Italy and much more clearly set his claims against those of Byzantium. Such a policy clearly would have to encounter opposition not only from the Byzantines but also from the Saracens, each of which had not only claims but also possession of actual territory in the area. In 981, Otto launched a campaign in south Italy and was initially successful. Nevertheless, an encounter with a Saracen army on the Calabrian coast ended in a complete and disastrous defeat for Otto's forces (July 13, 982). Otto managed to escape. Thereafter, an assembly of German and north Italian magnates met at Verona (May 983) and agreed to send reinforcements and also to elect the emperor's three year old son Otto III king. Clearly, Otto had by no means given up his hopes for victory, but elsewhere, the empire was encountering even more serious challenges. In the summer of 983, as Otto made plans for a new expedition to the Italian south, the Slavic confederation of the Liutizi staged a massive uprising against German hegemony. It obliterated the results of several decades of missionary work and effectively ended German expansion in the east, at least for several generations. The emperor's death from malaria (Dec. 7, 983) brought his plans for Italy to an abrupt end and apparently left the empire's problems in the hands of his young son and his wife, the dowager empress Theophanu.

Otto III, the Holy Roman Emperor (at Charlemagne's Tomb), engraving. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: H. BEUMANN, Die Ottonen 2d. ed. (Stuttgart 1991) 113–126. T. REUTER, Germany in the Early Middle Ages, 800–1056 (London 1991) 174–180. E. MUELLER-MERTENS, "The Ottonians as Kings and Emperors," in The New Cambridge Medieval History vol. 3, ed. T. REUTER (Cambridge 1999) 233–266, at 254–257.

[D. A. WARNER]

OTTO III, EMPEROR

Reign: German King 983–1002, Emperor 996–1002. b. 980. d. Paterno, Italy. Buried St. Mary, Aachen. Otto III was the son of Emperor Otto II and Theophanu. Otto ascended the throne at the age of three and, though legally king, clearly required guidance in the business of government. Since the standards concerning rule by minors and the formation of regencies were as yet ill defined, the immediate result of the young king's succession was a battle for control among his relatives. Otto's uncle, Henry "the Quarrelsome" seized the young king and declared himself the boy's guardian. Henry had just been freed from captivity, his punishment for rebellion against Otto's father (Otto II). Since Henry was Otto's oldest male relative, he had a valid claim, and as Theophanu was still in Italy, he had the advantage of surprise. Initially, Henry gave the impression that his ambitions went no farther than the guardianship. Gradually, however, it became clear that he intended to exercise power in his own right or perhaps to rule alongside Otto as a dominant co-ruler, on the Byzantine model. Public opinion, divided to this point, now began to rally around Otto, who may have benefited from the fact that he had already been anointed and crowned. On June 29, 984, Duke Henry was forced to surrender the king to a regency that was dominated by the boy's mother, Theophanu, until her death in 991, and afterwards by Otto's grandmother Adelheid. The two women continued the patterns of government established by Otto I, especially the alliance with the church. In the west, Theophanu's skillful diplomacy ensured that Lotharingia remained within the boundaries of the Empire. In the East, campaigns continued to be launched against the trans-Elbian Slavs, though without reversing the results of the great uprising of 983. In Italy, the support of powerful magnates and the presence of Adelheid, erstwhile queen of the LOMBARDS, insured the stability of Ottonian interests.

Otto reached his majority in 994. In spite of vigorous scholarly debate regarding the significance of specific aspects of Otto's reign, there is little doubt regarding his concern to redefine the political order in Italy and on the Empire's eastern frontier. In 996, Otto launched his first expedition to Italy. This visit is noteworthy, among other things, because it marked the advent of the first German pope. Upon hearing of Pope John XV's death, Otto had his cousin Bruno installed on the papal throne. The new pope took the name GREGORY V (996–999) and repaid Otto's generosity by crowning him emperor on May 21, 996. Subsequently, Otto issued diplomata in which he referred to himself as "Emperor of the Romans," and demonstrated his role as leader of Christendom by presiding over a synod together with the pope. Although this point remains very much in dispute, it is possible that Otto also used this occasion to denounce as a forgery the Constitutum Constantini (DONATION OF CONSTANTINE). It was on this occasion, as well, that Otto met and was deeply impressed by Gerbert of Reims and ADALBERT OF PRAGUE, two men, one a great intellectual and visionary, the other a saint and martyr, who would significantly influence the emperor's imperial vision. It is indicative of the limits of Otto's power that Pope Gregory encountered difficulties as soon as his imperial protector left Italy. Under the leadership of Crescenzio (Crescentius), the Romans expelled Gregory from the city and elevated in his place John Philagathos as Pope John XVI. This act of rebellion incited Otto to launch a second expedition to Italy which, among other things, resulted in the execution of Crezenzio and the degradation of his anti-pope.

Upon the death of Gregory V, Otto appointed Gerbert of Aurillac as Pope Silvester II (999–1003). Silvester's reign was marked by continued cooperation between pope and emperor. This cooperation was evident, in particular, on the Empire's eastern frontier, where Otto and Silvester collaborated in the establishment of a Polish archbishopric at Gniezno (1000). Gniezno was the burial place of Adalbert of Prague, and contemporary sources portray the emperor's progress from Rome as a kind of pilgrimage. Modern scholars have seen in it yet another example of Otto's concern to represent himself as the leader of Christendom. Diplomata issued along the way described Otto as "servant of the Apostles" and "servant of Jesus Christ." On the way back to Rome, Otto stopped at Aachen, where he apparently had the tomb of Charlemagne opened so that he could view the emperor's corpse. The meeting at Gniezno also appears to have substantially altered political relations between the Empire and Poland, and may have affected relations with other eastern neighbors as well. The establishment of an archbishopric at Gniezno marked the beginning of an independent ecclesiastical organization for the Polish duchy and hence, an important stage in its consolidation as a medieval state. Otto clearly intended to elevate the prestige of the Polish duke, Boleslav "Chrobry," whom he declared an "ally and friend of the Roman people." Although this point too is controversial, he may also have elevated Boleslav to the rank of king through the bestowal of a crown. If this latter point can be accepted, Otto's regulation of the Empire's relations with Poland may be seen, in conjunction with the foundation of a Hungarian archbishopric at Gran, as part of an overall imperial strategy.

Among modern scholars, that strategy is commonly identified as having the goal of creating a renovated Roman empire based on the city of Rome. This plan or program found its most striking manifestation in the phrase Renovatio Romanorum imperii, which appears on a lead seal attached to one of Otto's diplomata. In his classic definition of Otto's Renovatio, P. E. Schramm declared that Otto had constructed the policies of his government around an ideal vision of Rome that was unique in being specifically secular, political, and universal. Recent scholarship has cast doubt on Schramm's definition without necessarily replacing it. In any case, Otto's untimely death, at the age of twenty-one, ensured that whatever plan he may have had remained incomplete.

Bibliography: P. E. SCHRAMM, Kaiser Rom und Renovatio (Berlin 1929, reprint Darmstadt 1984). H. BEUMANN, Die Ottonen 2nd. ed. (Stuttgart 1991) 127–156. D. A. WARNER, "Ideals and Action in the Reign of Otto III." Journal of Medieval History 29: 1–18. E. MÜLLER-MERTENS, "The Ottonians as Kings and Emperors," in The New Cambridge Medieval History, ed. T. REUTER (Cambridge 1999) 3:233–266

[D. A. WARNER]

OTTO OF BAMBERG, ST.

Bishop, Apostle of Pomerania; b. Swabia, Germany, 1060–62; d. Bamberg, June 30, 1139. Born of a noble family, Otto received a thorough education. In 1088 he was appointed chaplain to the court of Duchess Judith of Poland, the sister of Emperor HENRY IV. He was sent on diplomatic missions to the court of the emperor and was given the task of supervising the construction of the cathedral of SPEYER.

Early in 1102 he was made chancellor to Henry IV, and on Dec. 25, 1102, was appointed bishop of Bamberg. Because of controversies between Henry IV, HENRY V, and the metropolitans of Mainz, Otto was not consecrated bishop until May 13, 1106, at Anagni by Pope PASCHAL II. He prudently avoided taking sides in the continuing political and ecclesiastical conflicts in the empire and tried to act as mediator between the groups. When Henry V went to Rome to be crowned emperor in 1110–11, Otto accompanied him and received the PALLIUM on April 15, 1111, probably because of his success as a mediator. He also took an essential part in preparing the Concordat of WORMS (1122). For many years he directed a great number of activities in his diocese: he rebuilt the cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire; he improved the cathedral school, founded new parishes, and built many churches and hospitals. In a well-balanced policy, he fortified the territory of the Diocese of Bamberg (by building castles) and enlarged it through new acquisitions.

He especially favored monasticism, founding or renovating about 30 monasteries and giving them to Benedictines of the Hirsau Congregation, to PREMONSTRATIANS, and to CISTERCIANS. He limited the power of the district rulers. Otto's two missions to Pomerania (1124–25 and 1128), where he established and organized the Church, won for him the title of Apostle of the Pomeranians. He is buried in the abbey of Michelsberg near Bamberg. Canonized in 1189 by Pope CLEMENT III, he is venerated especially in the territory and monasteries of the Diocese of Bamberg.

Feast: July 2 (Roman MARTYROLOGY), Sept. 30 (Bamberg), Oct. 1 (Pomerania).

Bibliography: E. VON GUTTENBERG, ed., Das Bistum Bamberg, v. 1.1 of Die Bistümer der Kirchenprovinz Mainz (Germania Sacra 2; Berlin 1937) 115–138. J. BRAUN, Tracht und Attribute der Heiligen in der deutschen Kunst (Stuttgart 1943). J. KIST, Fürst- und Erzbistum Bamberg (Bamberg 1962). H. CHRIST, in 900 Jahre Speyerer Dom (Speyer 1961) 110–122. J. PETERSOHN, Baltische Studien NF 49 (1962–63) 19–38. D. ANDERNACHT, Die Biographien Ottos von Bamberg (Unpub. diss., Frankfurt a. M. 1950). W. DZIEWULSKI, “Stasunek Ottona Bambińskiego . . .,” in Zapiski historyczne 23 (Toruń) 119–140. K. LIMAN, Dialog Herborda: ze studiów historycznoliterackich nad biografia łacińska XII wieku (Poznań 1975); Studia historyczno-literackie nad żywotami biskupa Ottona z Bambergu (Poznań 1966). Bischof Otto I. von Bamberg: Beginn der Christianisierung des Peenegebietes, ed. N. BUSKE, G. OTT and J. WÄCHTER (Greifswald 1977). G. BOJAR-FIJAŁKOWSKI, Święty Otton z Bambergu (Warsaw 1986).

[F. DRESSLER]

OTTO OF CAPPENBERG, BL.

Premonstratensian; d. Feb. 23, 1171. The sons of Count Godfrey of Cappenberg and Beatrice, Otto and his brother Bl. Godfrey of Cappenberg, a devout layman, gave their ancestral lands to NORBERT OF XANTEN for the foundation of the first abbey of PREMONSTRATENSIAN canons in Germany in 1122. Otto entered the community and served as the fourth prior of Cappenberg Abbey from 1156 until his death. Godfrey died (1127) at Ilbenstadt Abbey, which he had founded, and Otto had some of his relics brought back to Cappenberg.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826) 12:513–530. M. ERENS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 11:917–927. N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense (Straubing 1949–56) 1:101, 158. S. SCHNEIDER, Cappenberg (Münster 1949). H. GRUNDMANN, Der Cappenberger Barbarossakopf . . . Stiftes Cappenberg (Cologne 1959).

[C. DAVIS]

OTTO OF FREISING

Bishop and historian; b. Neuburg? near Vienna c. 1111–12; d. Morimond, Sept. 22, 1158. Otto, the son of Margrave LEOPOLD III of Austria and Agnes, daughter of Emperor HENRY IV, studied at Paris, perhaps under Abelard, Gilbert de la Porrée, and Hugh of St. Victor. He entered the Cistercians at the Abbey of MORIMOND, was elected abbot (1137), and shortly after, was made bishop of the Bavarian See of Freising. Under his stepbrother, Emperor Conrad III, he joined the Second Crusade as a military commander. Otto served as political adviser and diplomat at the German court under Conrad and his successor, the Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa.

Otto's great interest in the intellectual pursuits of his time led him to be the first to acquaint his countrymen with the New Logic of Aristotle. His main historical work, the Historia de duabus civitatibus, a world chronicle in eight books, is the most noteworthy attempt at a philosophical interpretation of world history in the Middle Ages. Unlike earlier and contemporary world chroniclers Otto selected his facts in accordance with certain leading ideas that he discussed at length in the prefaces. He was influenced especially by St. Augustine's City of God and fully endorsed the saint's concept of the Civitas Dei as the community of all saints living and dead (see HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF). Otto began his account with man. Like Augustine, he saw one city deriving from Cain, the other from Abel. Unlike Augustine, Otto did not tend to identify completely the pagan empires or regna with the City of Satan, but rather saw them as a sphere where his “two cities” met and intermingled. Otto believed that by God's providence the Roman Empire was selected to be the world organization that would prepare mankind for the coming of the City of God. At first, this task fell on the Church of the early Christians. But under Constantine and still more completely under Charlemagne, emperor and pope, those “two persons in the Church,” each acting as a vicar of Christ in his own sphere, achieved that unity and peace on earth that paved the way to the City of God in a transcendental future. Insight into the ever deepening conflict between regnum and sacerdotium that marked the history of the West after the collapse of the Carolingian Empire (see CAROLINGIAN DYNASTY)—a conflict in which Otto hesitated to take sides—tinged his account with a deep pessimism. This was especially apparent in the seventh book, which described contemporary events. To Otto history had become the story of human misery. As his hope for the realization of the City of God on earth faded, he turned, in the last chapters of the seventh book, to the Cistercians, which in turn led to the description of the eschatological events that would herald the appearance of the Heavenly Jerusalem after history, post praesentem vitam (book 8). Otto finished his chronicle in 1146, in the midst of the confusions and wars of the reign of Conrad III.

When Otto's nephew, Frederick Barbarossa, ascended the German throne (1152) a new era of peace and good government seemed to augur well for a renewal of the empire. Otto began another historical work, the Gesta Friderici imperatoris or Deeds of Frederick Barbarossa, in a more optimistic vein. Otto died after finishing only the two first books. His clerk, Rahewin of Freising, continued the work.

Bibliography: Editions. Otonis episcopi Frisingensis chronica sive historia de duabus civitatibus, ed. A. HOFMEISTER, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Berlin 1826–); Otonis et Rahewini gesta Friderici imperatoris, ed. G. WAITZ, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum; The Two Cities, tr. C. C. MIEROW (New York 1928); The Deeds of Frederick Barbarossa, tr. C. C. MIEROW (New York 1953). Literature. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jh., v.1 (7th ed. Stuttgart-Berlin 1904), v.2 (6th ed. Berlin 1894) 2:271–279. J. HASHAGEN, Otto von Freising als Geschichtsphilosoph und Kirchenpolitiker (Leipzig 1900). A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 4:476–485. A. HOFMEISTER, “Studien über Otto von Freising,” Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 37 (1912) 99–161, 633–768. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:376–388. F. FELLNER, “The Two Cities of Otto of Freising,” American Catholic Historical Review 20 (1934–35) 154–174. J. SPÖRL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1307–09; Grundformen hochmittelalterlicher Geschichtsanschauung (Munich 1935) 31–50. P. BREZZI, “Otto di Frisinga,” Bullettino dell’Istituto storico Italiano 54 (1939) 129–328. Otto von Freising: Gedenkgabe zu seinem 800. Todesjahr, ed. J. A. FISCHER (Freising 1958).

[H. WIERUSZOWSKI]

OTTOBEUREN, ABBEY OF

Benedictine monastery in the Diocese of AUGSBURG, Germany. Founded perhaps in 764, it became important under Abbot Rupert J. (1102–45), who introduced the HIRSAU Consuetudines, reformed Irsee and ELLWANGEN, founded MARIENBERG and one of the abbey’s convents, completed the building of Ottobeuren’s abbey and church, and instituted a scriptorium that flourished under his successor Isingrim. After a gradual decline until 1477, the abbey revived with reform from MELK. Prior N. Ellenbog (d. 1543) roused an interest in scholarship, and Abbot L. Wiedemann (1508–46) instituted a printing press in 1509. In 1617 Ottobeuren furnished almost the whole staff of professors (six priests) for the new University of Salzburg. Priests from Ottobeuren later taught in Rottweil, Freising, and Fulda, and in the abbey’s own school. Abbot Rupert II Ness (1710–40) completely rebuilt the church and cloister in a masterpiece of south German baroque. Of the 19 out of 45 priests who maintained the monastic life after the secularization of 1802, only one lived to see the restoration in 1834. Ottobeuren then remained a priory under St. Stephen in Augsburg until it again became an independent abbey (July 2, 1918). The Bavarian Concordat of 1817 gave permission for educational and pastoral work to the house; the abbey, which cares for the parish of Ottobeuren, has maintained a boys’ boarding school since 1855, an agricultural school (1920–36), and a Gymnasium for liberal arts (1922–38, and since 1946).

Bibliography: Ottobeuren: Festschrift zur 120-Jahrfeier der Abtei (Augsburg 1964). Ottobeuren 764–1964: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Abtei (Augsburg 1964), special issue of Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, v.73 (1962). B. KUEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche,

Abbey of Ottobeuren. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1310–11.

[B. KUEN]

OTTOMAN TURKS

A militant dynasty of Anatolian Turks who created an Islamic state in the Balkans, the Near East, and North Africa, threatening western Europe and assuming leadership of the Muslim world. This empire, which arose in the later Middle Ages, survived until modern times, when it disintegrated into nation states.

Rise to Power. The Ottoman state, founded in Bithynia c. 1299, was one of many petty principalities that sprang up in the ruin of the Seljuk Sultanate of Konya after that state was forced to become a vassal of the Mongol Il-Khans (see SELJUKS). Weakened by the Turcoman invasions of Asia Minor and by the Fourth Crusade (1202–04), the Byzantine Empire could not prevent the

Suleyman I, Ottoman Sultan, 1520–1566 Venetian portrait. (©Ali Meyer/CORBIS)

Islamic expansion westward. The Ottoman state was created by warriors, who refused to become peaceful citizens, on the Byzantine-Islamic frontier. Its location and the vigor of its ruling family helped the principality to grow rapidly at Byzantine expense, and by 1353 it had reached the European side of the Hellespont. In 1389 the power of Serbia was broken at the battle of Kosovo, and in 1396 Western Europe's attempt to meet the swiftly growing threat failed with the ill-fated Crusade of Nicopolis. The fortress city of Constantinople on the Bosphorus became a free enclave in the Ottoman state. At the same time, by marriage and political pressure, the Anatolian Turkish principalities were being absorbed. Reasons for this astonishing expansion must be sought in the comparative weakness of the Balkan Byzantine successor-states, the military and political efficiency of the Ottomans, and the post-Crusade hostility of the Greeks and Slavs to the Franks and the Latin Church. Given a choice of domination by Western Europe or the sultan, popular sentiment favored the sultan.

Ottoman civilization, which arose on the frontier between Byzantine civilization and the Persian-Islamic Seljuk culture, borrowed freely from both in its formative stage and took its final form only around the beginning of the 16th century A.D. The defeat of Sultan Bayazid by TIMUR (Tamerlane) in 1402 was only a temporary setback to Ottoman expansion. In 1453 Constantinople was taken after a heroic defense, to become the Ottoman capital.

Subject Peoples. While the ruling class were Muslims, Eastern Orthodox Christians were governed through their bishops and clergy subject to the patriarch of Constantinople, appointed by the sultan. The Greek clergy thus had far more real power than they had had in the Byzantine period, particularly over the Slavs in Ottoman territory. Jews and Armenians also were governed as separate communities through their own clergy, and this arrangement (see DHIMMI) seems to have been highly acceptable to the subject peoples until the 18th and 19th centuries, when internal Ottoman decline brought oppressive fiscality and interference.

Religious practice at the folk level in Anatolia and the Balkans, among Christians and Muslims, was strikingly similar, and equally distant from either orthodox Christianity or orthodox Islam; this situation together with the tax benefits of conversion explains why many subjects became Muslims despite the absence of forced conversion.

The talents of the subject peoples were channeled into the ruling class by the peculiar system of devshirme. Promising Balkan Christian boys were taken in levies, nominally converted to Islam, and educated as the sultan's private property. The ablest of them could rise to the highest offices of the state, frequently benefiting their Christian relatives, and forming an elite dependent on neither birth nor wealth. The rest were enrolled in the Janissaries, the sultan's private army. The Muslims opposed their own exclusion from the fruits of power, hence the devshirme was discontinued c. 1700.

Consolidation and Decline. State theory depended on an absolute autocracy, hereditary in the male Ottoman line, and the first ten sultans were long-lived, able soldier-statesmen. The last of these, Süleyman I, "The Magnificent," (1520–66) took Hungary, invaded Austria, and besieged imperial Vienna. Since each Ottoman prince was a candidate for the throne, state security demanded that the successful candidate put his brothers to death. In theory the sultan was subject to the Law of Islam, but since he controlled the conditions by which it was interpreted he was bound only insofar as he chose.

With the rise of the dynasty of the SAFAVIDS in Western Iran in 1502, its theocratic Islamic heresy, preached by the Safavi brotherhood (SHĪ'ITES) had a deep appeal for the Turcomans of Anatolia. Largely in self-defense, the Ottomans became officially, militantly, SUNNITES. This was intensified after 1517, when the kingdom of the Mamelukes in Syria and Egypt was annexed. Soon North Africa, except for Morocco, came under Ottoman rule. Without continuing the shadowy 'ABBASID caliphate of Cairo, the sultans could truly claim to be the leaders of Sunnite Islam. Western Christendom, torn by wars and heresies, was kept from being overrun only by the fact that the Ottomans were also at war with Persia.

The internal decline of the Ottomans coincided with the growth and transformation of Europe; but, blinded largely by its own early military success, the still medieval Ottoman state found no reason to transform itself as Europe was doing. With a more formidable West in the 17th century and several defeats from Western armies, together with an aggressively expanding Russia entertaining Balkan ambitions in the 18th, xenophobia and anti-Christian fanaticism grew in Ottoman society, estranging the subject peoples. The sultans sought alliances with Europe against Russia, but had to pay a heavy price in concessions and capitulations, chiefly to England and France. Whereas it had been once the terror and fascination of Europe, the empire became the "sick man" of Europe.

The spread of nationalist ideologies among the Balkan peoples in the 19th century, abetted by foreign powers, led to continual losses of territory; in World War I even the predominantly Moslem Arabs rebelled. Tardy and inconclusive efforts at internal modernization from 1839 to 1922 led to no lasting gains. Finally, in a rejection of the whole imperial system, a revolt headed by Kamal Ataturk in 1922 put an end to the Ottoman state and set up a national Turkish republic in Anatolia.

See Also: TURKEY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

Bibliography: P. WITTEK, The Rise of the Ottoman Empire (London 1938). G. J. S.-L. EVERSLEY and V. CHIROL, The Turkish Empire (1288-1922) (London 1923). H. A. R. GIBB and H. BOWEN, Islamic Society and the West (New York 1950). B. LEWIS, The Emergence of Modern Turkey (London 1961). J. H. KRAMERS et al., Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. M. T. HOUTSMA et al., 4 v. (Leiden 1913-38) 3:965-1024.

[J. A. WILLIAMS]

OTTONIAN RENAISSANCE

The popular name for the cultural surge experienced throughout the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE under the Roman emperors OTTO I the Great, OTTO II, and OTTO III; that is, during the years 936 to 1002. If this renaissance is to be understood, it must be linked with the intellectual movement initiated by CHARLEMAGNE and his successors, the so-called CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, when scholars tried to preserve and revitalize the culture of the late classical and early Christian period. The most distinctive characteristic of the Ottonian as opposed to the earlier

"Ottoman Sultan Mohammed II," portrait by Gentile Bellini, 1479.

Carolingian Renaissance was the greater part played by indigenous northern and eastern European influences in the cultural flowering of the 10th century.

Furthermore, the Ottonian Renaissance profited from the increased trade and communication with the older and more cultivated areas to the south, such as the Lombard kingdom, Venice, and Cordoba, and from its continued relations with Byzantium. Although the Ottonian, like the Carolingian, Renaissance attempted essentially to revive classical antiquity, it was able to imbue its work with a more personal touch and greater depth. Especially effective in creating the new intellectual atmosphere were the currents emanating from the imperial court of the Ottos, especially from such men as Archbishop BRUNO OF COLOGNE, NOTKER OF LIÈGE, and ADALDAG OF BREMEN. This new intellectualism spread as the missionary efforts of the Archdiocese of Salzburg and the dioceses of Freising, Passau, and Regensburg were directed southeastward; the cathedral school in Magdeburg, directed by Ohtric, one of the most famous scholars of his time, became both recipient and disseminator of the new Christian learning. Monasteries, reinvigorated by the CLUNIAN REFORM and the "strict observance" movement initiated at GORZE (Brogne), roused themselves to special spiritual and intellectual endeavors. Works of historical importance and literary worth were written in both Italy and Germany (LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA, WIDUKIND OF CORVEY, and ROSWITHA OF GANDERSHEIM)—works outstanding both for the knowledge of classical culture they displayed and for their rhetorical skill. Works of architecture, such as the abbey church of the nuns of Gernrode, the narthex and crypt of Oberzell monastery at Reichenau date from the period.

Eleventh-century Ottonian chalice. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

The Ottonian renaissance is sometimes designated as a renaissance of Carolingian culture; but, in continuing the work of the Carolingians, it produced much that was peculiar to itself. It undoubtedly reached its peak under Otto III (983–1002), both in its cultural efforts and in its maturity of religious thought; it was an era marked by the desire to evangelize peoples considered heathen (an endeavor that entirely consumed Otto III) and by enthusiasm for the arts and learning. While there are only meager remains of this artistic and intellectual activity, it is known to have been the developmental period of guilds of builders and artisans. It is clear also that the Emperor himself attempted with some success to write poetry. There is well-documented evidence to his collaborations in more than one literary venture, e.g., when his friend Bishop ADALBERT OF PRAGUE was martyred, he personally took part in the composition of a poetic life and paeon in honor of his martyrdom. Contemporaries saw the emperor, even while he was still very young, as the center of the intellectual and artistic life of his era. His almost impassioned participation in such endeavors increased considerably in his mature years, and through his tutors, who were also the most brilliant men at court, viz, Gerbert of Aurillac, the future Pope SYLVESTER II, whom the Emperor personally invited to his service, accompanying the summons with a poem, and Archchancellor HERIBERT OF COLOGNE, he provided the empire with effective intellectual leadership.

In view of Otto III's commanding personality, it is understandable that during his reign sculpture, miniatures, and book illuminations all served the glorification of the ruler. An example is found in those pages produced by the REICHENAU school of art after the imperial coronation on May 21, 996, including the famous double page of the Otto III Gospel Book (in Munich), the undisputed masterpiece, as well as similar pages in the Musée Condé in Chantilly, and in the Bamberg Josephus MS. These illuminated pages, which undoubtedly were produced after the coronation and which seem to have been products of competition among the most distinguished master miniaturists of the day (K. and M. Uhlirz, Jahrbücher . . . Otto III), show the influence of lands to the east (Sclavinia, that is, southern Slav and Polish territories, Hungary, and the Balkans). In charming contrast to these artistically arranged representations in which every detail (the color of hair, the stance, the weapons, etc.) is expressive in its political significance, is the simple work of a cleric from Ivrea who naïvely represented the emperor in his ordinary winter clothes, receiving from the hands of the Blessed Virgin a crown that has pediments like the crown of St. Stephen. Although sculptured likenesses of the emperor are rare, he is represented by a carving on the ivory holy-water font in Aachen and on the fountain at St. Bartholomew-in-the-Island, Rome, which shows the likeness of St. Adalbert on the reverse side of the column. It may be expected that future archeological discoveries will extend the knowledge of the Ottonian period.

See Also: MEDIEVAL LATIN LITERATURE.

Bibliography: J. DE GHELLINCK, Littérature latine au moyen-âge (Paris 1939) 2:9–43. P. E. SCHRAM, Kaiser, Rom und Renovatio (2d ed. Darmstadt 1957). E. R. CURTIUS, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, tr. W. R. TRASK (New York 1953). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1957) 1:252–306. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 202–229. K. and M. UHLIRZ, Jahrbücher des Deutschen Reiches unter Otto III (Berlin 1954). J. F. BÖHMER, Die Regesten des Kaiserreiches unter Otto III, 980–1002, ed. M. UHLIRZ (Regesta imperii 2.3; Graz-Cologne 1956–57). M. UHLIRZ, “Das deutsche Gefolge Ottos III in Italien,” Gesamtdeutsche Vergangenheit: Festgabe für H. v. Srbik (Munich 1938) 21–38; “Aus dem Kunstleben der Zeit Ottos III,” Festschrift Schramm (Weisbaden 1964) 51–56. L. GRODECKI et al., Le Siècle de l’an Mil (Paris 1973). The Plays of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, tr. K. WILSON (New York 1989). H. MAYR-HARTING, Ottonian Book Illumination: An Historical Study (2d ed. London 1999).

[M. UHLIRZ]

OUEN OF ROUEN, ST.

Bishop also known as Owen, Audoin, Dado, or Audo(e)nus; b. near Soissons, France; d. Clichy, Aug. 24, 684. Ouen came from a wealthy family and was the longest-lived of several distinguished men educated at the court of Chlothar II (d. 629), who served Dagobert I (629–639) and ultimately became bishops. While referendary (chancellor) to Dagobert, he founded the monastery of Rebais near Meaux and obtained for it a famous privilege (635). Consecrated bishop of Rouen (May 13, 641), he promoted monasticism (notably at FONTENELLE) and built many churches. His support of the palace mayor Ebroïn illustrates a continued interest in public affairs. Late in life he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome. His remains were translated to Rouen and accorded a public cult (May 7, 685).

Feast: Aug. 24.

Bibliography: DESIDERIUS CADURCENSIS, Epistulae, 1:9–10; 2:6. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae (Berlin 1826– ) 3:198–199, 206. Vita Audoini, ed. W. LEVISON, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826– ) 5:536–567. E. VACANDARD, Vie de saint Ouen, évêque de Rouen (Paris 1902); also in Revue des questions historiques (Paris 1866– ) 63 (1898) 5–50; 69 (1901) 5–58; 71 (1902) 5–71. F. BEYERLE, “Das Formelbuch des westfränkischen Mönchs Markulf und Dagoberts Urkunde für Rebais, a 635,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters (Cologne-Graz 1950– ); superseded Deutsches Archiv für Geschichte des Mittelalters (Weimar 1937–43) and Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde (Hanover 1876–1936) 9 (1952) 43–58.

[W. GOFFART]

OUTREMONT, EMILIE D', BL.

In religion, Mother Mary of Jesus, also called Baroness Emilie Olympe Marie Antoinette van der Linden d'Hooghvorst, married woman, missionary, and foundress of the Society of Mary Reparatrix; b. Wégimont, Liège, Belgium, Oct. 11, 1818; d. Florence, Tuscany, Italy, Feb. 22, 1878. Emilie was the daughter of Count d'Oultremont of Liège, who was later (1840) the Belgian minister to the Holy See. At age nineteen she was married to Baron Victor van der Linden d'Hooghvorst and bore him four children before his early death ten years later (1847). Her family wanted her to remarry, but the baroness made a vow of chastity. Two of her daughters—Mother Mary of St. Victor (1843–72) and Mother Mary of St. Julienne (1846–67)—assisted her in the foundation of the Society of Mary Reparatrix. Under the spiritual direction of the JESUITS, particularly that of Paul Gin hac (1824–95), the society was canonically established in Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine, in 1857. The following year she took the name Mary of Jesus and made her first vows together with her daughters and eight other companions. The mission of the society is “to make known the tenderness of God’s love for the world, to follow Jesus as Mary did, and to collaborate with Him in His mission of Redemption-Reparation.” Her relics are enshrined in the Church of Santa Croce e San Bonaventura in Rome. She was beatified on Oct. 12, 1997 by Pope John Paul II.

Former Abbey Church of Saint-Ouen, Rouen. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

Feast: Oct. 11

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis, no. 20 (1997): 999. L’Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 42 (1997): 1–2, 12. Emilie d’Oultremont, Baroness d’Hooghvorst, Foundress of the Society of Mary Reparatrix and Her Two Daughters (London 1932). In the Silence of Mary: The Life of Mother Mary of Jesus (London 1964). C. COUVREUR, Témoignage pour tous les temps, vie, esprit, oeuvre d’Emilie d’Oultremont, fondatrice de la Société de Marie Réparatrice (Toulouse 1967). V. DELAPORTE, The Society of Marie Reparatrice (Montreal 1919). P. SUAU, The life of Mother Mary of Jesus, Emilia d’Oultremont, Baroness d’Hooghvorst (London 1913).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

OUR LADY MOTHER OF MERCY, BROTHERS OF

Popularly known as the Brothers of Tilburg, Congregatio Fratrum Beatae Mariae Virginis, Matris Miseri- cordiae (CFMM, Official Catholic Directory #0980), founded in 1844 by Joannes Zwijsen (1794–1877), then a parish priest in Tilburg, and from 1854 archbishop of Utrecht. Its principal purpose is teaching. Members included priests and brothers until 1916. Since then all members have been brothers, because of the limited scope for priestly activities and the extension of educational work. In its modified form the institute received papal approval in 1927. By 1864 the congregation had many primary schools in the Netherlands and some boarding schools, notably St. Henricus Institute for blind boys at Grave. A school for deaf mute boys was opened in Maaseik, Belgium, in 1851. In the 1880s the brothers erected schools in the West Indies. After World War I they started schools in Indonesia. The most important recent foundation in Belgium is a school for deaf mute boys in Hasselt. Since 1939 houses have been established in Africa and South America. In 1963, the brothers established their first house in the U.S., in Oxnard, Calif. The generalate is in Tilburg, The Netherlands.

Bibliography: T. HORSTEN, De Fraters van Tilburg, 1844–1944, 3 v. (Tilburg 1946–52). In de voortuin der Congregatie der Fraters van O. L. Vrouw Moeder van Barmhartigheid (Tilburg 1950). Ontmoetingen, 17 v. (1957–64).

[P. N. BROEDERS/EDS.]

OUR LADY OF CHARITY, NORTH AMERICAN UNION SISTERS OF

The North American Union Sisters of Our Lady of Charity (NAU-OLC, Official Catholic Directory #3070) traces its origins to the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of Refuge, a congregation of religious women founded in Caen, France (1641), by St. John EUDES. Preliminary papal approbation was granted Jan. 2, 1666, and complete approval in 1741. The seven Houses of Refuge in existence at the time of the French Revolution were dispersed, but the work was resumed again at Tours and spread through France as circumstances permitted. The original purpose of the congregation was to provide a shelter for women of dissolute behavior, but it was later modified to include the care and training of neglected, dependent teenage girls. In the 19th century a separate branch developed as the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the GOOD SHEPHERD.

The first American foundation was established in 1855 at Buffalo, N.Y., by Mother Mary of St. Jerome, from Rennes, France. Although each house of the order is autonomous, the U.S. communities established a federation in 1944 for the purpose of strengthening the contemplative and apostolic life of the sisters. Similar federations were organized in Europe. In 1979, Rome granted permission for the establishment of the North American Union of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity, with its administrative offices in Wheeling, W.V. Within the union are the congregations of Our Lady of Charity of Green Bay, Wis.; Buffalo, N.Y.; El Paso, Texas; Erie, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Rochester, N.Y.; San Antonio, Texas; Walden, N.Y.; and Wheeling, W.V. In the U.S., the sisters run residential homes for women, nursing homes, day care centers, pastoral ministries, outreach programs, and the care of immigrants.

[M. GRABIAK/EDS.]

OUR LADY OF GOOD COUNSEL

The church that enshrines the original fresco of Our Lady of Good Counsel is located in the small town of Genazzano about 30 miles southeast of Rome in the Diocese of Palestrina. According to the still current legend, this church stood unfinished and roofless when, on April 25, 1467, the image of the Madonna was miraculously transported there from its former home in Scutari, Albania. Coming to rest precariously on a narrow stone ledge in the wall inside the church, the legend continues, the picture has remained in that position to the present day.

Careful investigations undertaken between 1957 and 1959 for the purpose of restoration have revealed something of the true origin of the fresco. The image of the Madonna—about 12 inches wide and 17 inches high—that the viewer sees encased in its elaborate glass, metal, and marble framework, is part of a larger fresco that once covered a portion of the wall now hidden by the baroque shrine altar. Art experts consulted during the restoration suggest that the fresco, and therefore the Madonna as well, is the work of the early 15th-century artist, Gentile da Fabriano. On the site of the present church once stood a small chapel within which Gentile painted his fresco around the time of Martin V (1417–31). At some subsequent date, but before 1467, the fresco, so it is surmised on the basis of the evidence, was covered over with plaster, and on the wall was hung a terra cotta Madonna, which was known as Our Lady of Good Counsel.

In 1467 the AUGUSTINIANS (in whose custody the shrine still remains) undertook to build a church on the site, enclosing within the structure the wall on which the then covered fresco was painted. This work was sponsored by a widow named Petruccia, who exhausted her means on the project and was unable to continue the construction. At that point the image of the Madonna appeared and was taken to be a token of divine favor. The unexpected appearance was perhaps brought about by the construction work in this way: when the stone ledge referred to above was being inserted into the wall, the plaster covering cracked and separated from the wall, revealing the fresco beneath. The image was immediately hailed as the Madonna of Paradise, an allusion to its apparently heavenly origin; but soon it came to be known by the former title of the shrine, Madonna of Good Counsel. One striking aspect of the fresco, which has lent a certain credence to the legends surrounding it, is that the upper portion of the image is separated from the wall and leans slightly forward. The fresco, nothing more than a thin layer of plaster, has survived for centuries in this precarious state, even through the aerial bombardment of Genazzano during World War II. Because of this condition, the restoration undertaken in 1957 was a delicate task.

The unfinished church was completed soon after the event of April 1467 and became the center of continuous pilgrimage. The numerous cures recorded as having occurred since then have caused the Madonna to be called miraculous. Many honors have been granted to the shrine by the Holy See, especially in more recent times. The initial approval of the devotion to Our Lady of Good Counsel was apparently given by Paul II. Although the record of his approval is not extant, there is abundant evidence of recognition by later popes: Sixtus IV, Alexander VI, Pius V, Gregory XIII, and Urban VIII. In 1682 Innocent XI approved the placing of a golden crown over the image, and in 1753 Benedict XIV established the Pious Union of Our Lady of Good Counsel, a spiritual society to which many indulgences were attached. Pius VI granted to the Augustinian Order, in 1779, a proper Mass and Office for the feast day. Pius IX had a personal devotion to the Mother of God under this title; he made a pilgrimage to Genazzano in 1864.

More than any other pope, Leo XIII was deeply attached to this devotion, which had associations with his childhood in Carpineto, a town not far from Genazzano. He instituted the white scapular of Good Counsel, inserted the title Mother of Good Counsel into the Litany of Loreto, declared the shrine a minor basilica, and installed a copy of the image over the altar in the Pauline chapel in the Vatican. Pius XII dedicated his reign to the Madonna of Good Counsel, and John XXIII made a visit to her shrine on Aug. 25, 1959. The present church, which replaced the former one about 1628, has been renovated in recent years, and elaborate mosaics have been added to the facade. A noteworthy 19th-century pastor of this church, Bl. Stefano Bellesini, is buried beneath the main altar. The feast day of Our Lady of Good Counsel is celebrated on April 26.

Bibliography: Acta ordinis e. S. Augustini: Commentarium officiale (1961) 25–33. A. F. ADDEO, “Apparitionis imaginis B.V.M. a Bono Consilio documenta,” Analecta augustiniana 20

(1946) 3–140. G. MALIZIA, “Il santuario del Buon Consiglio a Genazzano,” Lunario Romano 21 (1992).

[A. J. ENNIS]

OUR LADY OF PERPETUAL HELP (SUCCOUR)

A title given to the Blessed Virgin Mary, emphasizing her unflinching eagerness to pray for the welfare of human beings, especially those who seek her intercession. The original picture of Mary under this title is venerated in the Redemptorist church of Sant’Alfonso in Rome.

History. This picture, painted by an unknown artist in Crete in the 14th or 15th century, was brought to Rome c. 1495 by a merchant who apparently had stolen it from some church in Crete. In Rome he contracted a mortal illness, but before his death he consigned the painting to the friend in whose house he had been lodging, with the request that it be placed in some church, as a form of restitution. The friend promised, but later changed his mind at the request of his wife, who wished to keep the picture. Then Mary herself was seen in a vision by the little daughter of the family, and commanded that her picture be placed in a church dedicated to St. Matthew between the basilicas of St. Mary Major and St. John Lateran. To this child Our Lady also revealed herself as “Holy Mary of Perpetual Help.”

Accordingly, on March 27, 1499, the picture of Our Lady of Perpetual Help was solemnly enthroned on the high altar of St. Matthew’s church, cared for by the Augustinians. A tablet narrating the history of the painting was affixed nearby. For the next three centuries Our Lady of Perpetual Help was venerated there, and many miracles were ascribed to her intercession. However, in 1798 the French army seized Rome and led Pius VI into captivity. Shortly afterward, the church of St. Matthew, together with 30 other churches of Rome, was leveled to the ground at the order of the French commander. The picture of Our Lady of Perpetual Help was removed by the Augustinians from the church before its destruction and after being kept for a short while in the church of St. Eusebius, was transferred to the private chapel of the Irish Augustinians at their monastery of Santa Maria in Posterula, where it remained in comparative obscurity for many years.

In 1863 Francis Blosi, SJ, preaching at the church of the Gesù on the Roman shrines of Mary, related the history of Our Lady of Perpetual Help at St. Matthew’s and expressed the desire that the picture be found and again placed in a church between St. Mary Major’s and St. John Lateran's. This came to the attention of Michael Marchi, a Redemptorist, who knew the whereabouts of the picture because as a boy he had served Mass in the private chapel of the Augustinians. In 1855 the Redemptorists had purchased land for their motherhouse and a church on the Via Merulana, including the site on which St. Matthew's had stood. When Pius IX heard the story, he commanded that the picture be given to the Redemptorists for their church, since it fulfilled the condition laid down in the vision—"between the basilicas of St. Mary Major and St. John Lateran." The superior general of the Redemptorists was told to give the Augustinians another picture in compensation.

The picture of Our Lady of Perpetual Help was exposed for public veneration above the high altar of the church of Sant'Alfonso on April 26, 1866. The feast of Mary under the title of Perpetual Help (though restricted to certain churches and not in the calendar of the universal Church) is June 27.

Iconography. The original picture of Our Lady of Perpetual Help is painted on wood, and it measures about 17 by 21 inches. It is distinctly Byzantine in style, and many similar portrayals of Our Lady are found throughout the East and in Russia. This manner of portraying Mary is a further development of the famous Hodegetria, an icon of Mary (painted by St. Luke, according to some) venerated for centuries in Constantinople but destroyed in 1453 when that city fell to the Turks.

In addition to Mary, the picture represents her divine Son as a child of two or three years old, seated on his Mother's left hand, with his hands clasping her right hand. On either side are the angels Michael and Gabriel, bearing the instruments of the Passion. In Greek characters the abbreviated names of the four figures are added. The artist wished to depict the mental anguish of Christ as He gazes at the cross, and with a touching stroke painted the left sandal falling off His foot as He winces in terror. This portrayal of the Passion of Christ in an image of Mary classifies the picture as a "Passion Madonna." Such pictures are found today in many Orthodox churches, such as the cathedral of Rethymnon on the island of Crete.

The title "Our Lady of Perpetual Help," originally derived from Mary's own apparition to the little girl, is also most appropriately symbolized by this picture. For, although the sufferings awaiting her Son are so vividly portrayed, Mary's face is turned, not to Him but to those who gaze on the picture. Though she is indeed saddened by the vision of the instruments of the Passion, her sympathy goes out primarily to the children of men.

Bibliography: C. M. HENZE, Mater de Perpetuo Succurso (Bonn 1926), first scientific monograph, extract; Our Lady of Per- petual Help, tr. F. J. CONNELL (New York 1940). J. F. BYRNE, The Glories of Mary in Boston (Boston, Mass. 1921).

[C. HENZE]

OUR LADY OF THE GARDEN, SISTERS OF

(OLG); also known as Gianelline, or Hortus Conclusus; a papal religious congregation founded by St. Anthony GIANELLI, Jan. 12, 1829, at Chiavari, in Liguria, Italy, with the collaboration of Sister Caterina Podestà, who succeeded Gianelli upon his death in 1846 as superior general, and gave a vigorous impulse to the institute. Sister Podestà went to Rome (1864) to obtain papal approval of the institute and of the rules (1882). During the plague in Liguria (1835–37) the sisters became distinguished for such heroic charity that they were awarded medals of merit by King Charles Albert. The impulse of social charity has directed their activities to hospitals, schools for girls, homes for the aged, and orphanages. In 1856 the first members went to South America and undertook hospital work in Montevideo. From there they spread to Argentina (1859), Brazil (1908), Chile (1929), and Paraguay (1945). They also began work in Jordan (1901), Spain (1949), and the U.S. (1962). The generalate is in Rome.

Bibliography: L. RODINO, Istoria del religioso istituto delle Figlie di Maria SS. dell'Orto (Genoa 1889).

[A. FERRAIRONI]

OUR LADY OF THE MISSIONS, SISTERS OF

(RNDM); a religious congregation founded in 1861 at Lyons, France, by Mother Mary of the Heart of Jesus (Euphrasie Barbier, 1829–93). The institute, established primarily for educational, social and pastoral work in mission lands, received papal approval in 1906. By 1890, houses existed on three continents. In 1920 the congregation reopened its French houses, which had been suppressed in 1902 by the laic laws. The generalate is in Rome. At the beginning of the 21st century, there were more than 900 sisters serving in Australia, Bangladesh, British Isles, Canada, France, India, Italy, Kenya, Latin America, Myanmar, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Samoa, Senegal and Vietnam.

Bibliography: A. COULOMB, Life of the Very Reverend Mother Marie du Coeur de Jésus (Mechlin 1914). R. RIOS, A Heroine of the Mission Field (London 1944). Teaching Nations 100 Years (Regina, Can. 1961).

[I. ROSS]

OUR LADY OF THE SACRED HEART, DAUGHTERS OF

(FDNSC; Official Catholic Directory #0900); a congregation of religious women founded in 1882 at Issoudun, France, by Jules Chevalier and Marie Louise HARTZER (1837–1908). The institute developed from a small group that Father Chevalier united into a congregation in 1874, but that languished until the arrival of Madam Hartzer, a widow born in Wissembourg (now in the Bas-Rhin department) in northeastern France. Following the Franco-Prussian War she came to France with her father and two sons, settled in Issoudun after her sons joined the Sacred Heart Missionaries, and became associated with Chevalier's followers. Under her leadership, the Daughters grew into the present congregation. The Holy See granted its decree of praise in 1908 and approved the constitutions in 1928. In their apostolate the Daughters engage in educational and hospital work. The congregation spread first to Australia (1884), then to Belgium, Switzerland, Netherlands, Brazil, Italy, Ireland, England, and Spain. In 1955 it entered the U.S., in the Diocese of Camden, N.J. The motherhouse is in Rome. The U.S. provincialate is in Bellmawr, N.J.

Bibliography: F. and L. HARTZER, La Réverende Mère Marie-Louise Hartzer (Paris 1913).

[L. F. PETIT/EDS.]

OUR LADY OF THE SNOW

The legend that gives this name to the feast (August 5, also called the Dedication of the Basilica of St. Mary Major) is that in the pontificate of Liberius (352–366) a childless Roman couple promised their wealth to the Virgin Mother of God. Her approval of their vow was indicated by a miraculous midsummer snowfall on the Esquiline Hill; by her appearance the same night in a dream to the patrician John and his wife, instructing them to build a church on the site; and by her confirmation of these instructions in the dream of Pope Liberius. The church was built, and later rebuilt during the pontificate of St. Sixtus III (432–440). It has been called by various titles and is now known as the Basilica of St. Mary Major.

No mention of the legend is found before the 10th century, and the prevailing attitude toward it is one of disbelief. It has been noted, for example, that in tracing the site for the church the snowfall untraditionally oriented the basilica to the west rather than the east. The congregation that Benedict XIV appointed in 1741 to reform the Breviary recommended that the lessons proper to the feast be omitted, on the grounds that it seemed unlikely that such an extraordinary occurrence would have gone unmentioned for so long. However, the feast had been extended to the universal Church during the pontificate of St. Pius V (1566–72), who is buried in the basilica, and the feast remains in the liturgical calendar.

Devotion to Our Lady of the Snow in the U.S. was introduced in 1941 by the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate (OMI). As interest in the devotion grew, the Oblates established the National Shrine of Our Lady of the Snows in Belleville, Illinois to promote the devotion and accommodate the increasing number of pilgrims. Originally opened as an outdoor shrine 1962, further expansion of the Shrine resulted in the completion of the Church of Our Lady of the Snows for indoor liturgies in 1991, and the Millennium Spire in 1998.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, v.1–2 (Paris 1886–92) 1:207–208, 232. H. GRISAR, History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages, ed. L. CAPPADelta, 3 v. (London 1911–12) 1:140, para 2. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10.2:2091–2119.

[M. S. CONLAN/EDS.]

OUR LADY OF THE WAY, SOCIETY OF

An international secular institute of pontifical right, founded 1936 by Karl Dinkhauser, S.J. and Maria Elisabeth von Strachotinsky. Originally established as a pious union in 1936, Pope Pius XII reorganized it as a secular institute in 1947. In 1953, it became a secular institute of pontifical right. The members vow to follow the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience; but they remain integrated in their social and occupational groups. They follow various occupations, live wherever appropriate for their apostolate, and do not wear a distinctive garb. The society does not have works of its own; its apostolate is accomplished by the immersion of its members into their own local and occupational fields. The spirit of the society and its constitution stem from the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius: to work for the glory of God; to develop an alert conscience and a strong sense of responsibility; to be ready for self-sacrifice; and to be aware of the call to apostolic ministry in each and all encounters. The society has members worldwide in Europe, North America, the Caribbean, India, Japan and the Philippines.

[A. EMERY/EDS.]

OUR LADY OF VICTORY MISSIONARY SISTERS

(OLVM, Official Catholic Directory #3130); a pontifical institute of religious women founded in 1922 at Chicago, Ill., by Rev. John J. Sigstein; its members devote themselves to religious education and social work. Bp. John F. Noll, of Fort Wayne, Ind., built Victory Noll, the congregation's motherhouse, at Huntington, Ind. Our Lady of Victory Missionary Sisters, commonly known as Victory Noll sisters, teach religion on the elementary and secondary levels for Catholic children who attend public schools. The congregation are also engaged in youth ministries, counseling, and parish ministries.

[E. A. CLIFFORD/EDS.]

OVALLE, ALFONSO DE

Chilean Jesuit priest and historian; b. Santiago, Chile, 1601; d. Lima, Peru, March 16, 1651. He entered the Jesuits in 1618 and studied at Córdoba de Tucumán. In 1625 he returned to Chile, where he became famous as a preacher. He taught philosophy and theology and was rector of San Francisco Javier Seminary. In 1640 he was elected procurator for Rome and Madrid. He went to Europe via Lima and Panama and arrived at Cádiz at the beginning of 1642. While in Madrid he persuaded the king and the Council of the Indies to finance a large Jesuit expedition to accompany him upon his return. He also obtained tax exemptions and other benefits for the many victims of the earthquake of Santiago in 1647. He spent two or three months with the Chilean missionary Luis de Valdivia in Valladolid, and their conversations contributed to his historical publications of those years. At the end of 1643 he arrived in Rome. After consulting, among others, the general of the order, Muzio Vitelleschi, he wrote Histórica relación del reino de Chile (Rome 1646, in two editions, Spanish and Italian), which has been reprinted many times and translated into the principal European languages. This work is the basis of Ovalle's reputation. Because of its sound historical information and its elegant classical diction, it is considered the outstanding literary monument of colonial Chile.

[F. MATEOS]

OVARIOTOMY

Literally means the cutting of an ovary. Ovariectomy is a term often used loosely to signify the removal of one or both ovaries of a female (ovariectomy). Oophorectomy is considered by many a preferable term for this procedure.

[T. J. O'DONNELL]

OVERBERG, BERNARD

Educator; b. Höckel bei Voltlage, northwest of Osnabrück, May 1, 1754; d. Münster, Nov. 9, 1826. Overberg began studies for the priesthood in 1774 and was ordained at Rheine on Dec. 20, 1779. He was chaplain in Everswinkel (1780–83), director of the Münster normal school (1783), synodal examiner (1786), rector of the diocesan seminary and dean of Liebfrauenkirche (1809), Konsistorialrat (1816), honorary canon (1823), and Oberkonsistorialrat (1826).

In 1783 Franz von FÜRSTENBERG, the vicar-general, entrusted Overberg with the direction of the newly organized normal school in Münster. Overberg completely transformed the Catholic educational system in Münster, bringing it to a high degree of excellence. His pedagogical system was based on religious and moral education stressed equally with the development of teaching skills and complete mastery of subject matter. Foreseeing difficulties for the teaching religious orders in Germany, he encouraged the education of laywomen, inspiring them to regard the vocation of teaching as a true apostolate. When appointed rector of the seminary in Münster, he concerned himself especially with the moral formation of the clergy, at the same time continuing to exercise a strong influence on diocesan education through books and lectures, notably in the field of Christian doctrine.

Overberg was also a successful confessor and spiritual guide. He won the confidence of Amalia GALLITZIN and was instrumental in her return to the Church, remaining her lifelong friend and advisor. He also guided the priestly career of her son, Demetrius Augustine GALLITZIN. He influenced many contemporaries, including the convert Graf Friedrich Leopold von Stolberg; the stigmatized mystic Anna Katharina EMMERICH; foundresses of religious institutes: Clara FEY, Franziska SCHERVIER, Pauline von Mallinckrodt; and the poets Luisa Hensel and Annette Elisabeth von Droste-Hülshoff.

Overberg's most important work is his Anweisung zum zweckmässigen Schulunterricht für die Schullehrer im Fürstentum Münster (Münster 1793, 1835; Joseph Esterhues, ed, Paderborn 1957), in which he sets forth his pedagogical aims, methods, and principles. He also wrote Die Geschichte des alten und neuen Testaments (Münster 1799, 1889), Christkatholisches Religions-Handbuch (Münster 1804, 1827), Katechismus der christkatholischen Lehre zum Gebrauche der grösseren Schüler (Münster 1804, 1852), Katechismus der christkatholischen Lehre zum Gebrauche der kleineren Schüler (Münster 1804–48), and Kleiner Haussegen (Münster 1807, 1836).

Bibliography: B. OVERBERG, Aus dem Tagebuche einer grossen Seele: Die Tagebücher Bernard Overbergs, ed. P. KRÜGER

(Kavelaer 1937). R. STAPPER, Bernard Overberg als pädagogischer Führer seiner Zeit (Münster 1926). H. M. HEUVELDOP, Leben und Wirken Overbergs (Münster 1933). H. HOFFMANN, Bernard Overberg (2d ed. Augsburg 1949). W. SAHNER, Overberg als Pädagoge und Katechet und das Arbeitsschulprinzip (Gelsenkirchen 1949). S. SUDHOF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 7:1319.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

OID IN CHRISTIAN CULTURE

Publius Ovidius Naso (43 B.C.–A.D. 17), one of the most gifted of Roman poets, exercised an influence on Christian and secular poetry in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance second only to that of Vergil. Within a few years of his death his Metamorphoses became the standard work of reference for Greek and Roman mythology and legend, a position it has never lost. For painters, poets, and preachers, it became the greatest single source of myth, although the Heroides and Fasti were much used also. Similarly, Ovid's treatment of love is the most significant single literary formulation of erotic experience in the Latin tradition. When Augustine (Conf. 3.1) says, "I was not yet in love, but in love with loving" (nondum amabam sed amare amabam), he uses the word "love" (amare) with just that shade of meaning given it by Ovid. In the tradition before Ovid, love was usually treated as an aberration, madness, or sickness (furor, uesania, morbus, etc.) affecting the individual lover. Ovid extended and deepened this conception to emphasize his view that love is essentially a mutual experience between two persons who are equally involved. His Pyramus and Thisbe, Ceyx and Halcyone, Philemon and Baucis, and many others become typical examples for the Latin tradition after him. One always thinks of these lovers in pairs, whereas the typical lover of Greek epigram, the new comedy, or earlier Latin elegy is usually thought of by himself.

In technical matters, such as metrics, prosody, and poetic diction, Ovid's usage became the classical standard. Later writers admired Vergil but wrote in the language of Ovid. Ovid's influence became so dominant in the 12th and 13th centuries, especially as the patron of the wandering scholars, that the great medievalist L. Traube called this period the Aetas Ovidiana in Latin poetry. In the Middle Ages Ovid was widely interpreted in an allegorical manner and so ingeniously construed as to be found an authority on moral conduct. His works were an important source of the tradition of courtly love. E. K. Rand says that Chaucer owed to Ovid "a greater debt than to any other poet, old or new." He was much used by Dante and Boccaccio and had a great vogue in Neo-Latin poetry in general.

Poets tend like other craftsmen to learn their trade from earlier masters; in this sense Ovid has been one of the great masters, not only in the Latin tradition, but in modern European languages also. The English authors Dryden, Pope, and Milton, among many others, were his pupils. The Romantic revolt in poetry may be understood as a rebellion against the too dominant and restrictive influence of those standards of classicism that Ovid seems best to represent.

Bibliography: M. SCHANZ, C. HOSIUS, and G. KRÜGER, Geschichte der römischen Literatur 4 v. in 5 (Munich 1914–35) 2:206–264. E. K. RAND, Ovid and His Influence (Boston 1925). R. R. BOLGAR, The Classical Heritage and Its Beneficiaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1954). H. F. FRÄNKEL, Ovid: A Poet between Two Worlds (Berkeley 1945). F. MUNARI, Ovid im Mittelalter (Zürich 1960). Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, v.1–3, indexes s.v. Ovidius. L. K. BORN, "O. and Allegory," Speculum 9 (1934) 362–379. J. SEZNEC, The Survival of the Pagan Gods: The Mythological Tradition and Its Place in Renaissance Humanism and Art, tr. B. F. SESSIONS (New York 1953).

[M. P. CUNNINGHAM]

OWEN, NICHOLAS, ST.

Called "Little John," English martyr and Jesuit lay brother; b. Oxfordshire, date unknown; d. London, March 2, 1606. Owen probably was the son of Walter Owen of Oxford, and the brother of Henry, a Catholic printer, and Walter and John, priests. Nicholas first appears in Catholic history as a prisoner in London in 1582. He was the open champion of the innocence of Edmund CAMPION, whose servant he is said to have been. Soon after the arrival of Henry GARNET in England (July 1586) Owen, then at liberty, entered his service, in which he remained for the next 18 years.

He was employed principally in the construction of hiding places in Catholic centers established by his master, since he was a superb carpenter, mason, and architect. A few authentic examples survive, e.g., at Sawston Hall near Cambridge; Huddington Court, Worcestershire; Coughton Hall, Warwickshire, which point to his limitless ingenuity. The fullest contemporary appreciation of his character and work was written by John GERARD: "I verily think no man can be said to have done more good of all those that laboured in the English vineyard. For first, he was the immediate occasion of saving many hundreds of persons, both ecclesiastical and secular, and of the estates also of these seculars, which had been lost and forfeited many times over if the priests had been taken in their houses." Since he knew the hiding places of most priests in England, he was certain to receive very severe treatment if captured.

He was finally taken at Hinlip Hall, near Worcester, on Jan. 23, 1605. With Ralph Ashley he was forced out of hiding by starvation, and tried to pass himself off as a priest to save Garnet. The ruse failed. Taken to London, Owen was mercilessly tortured in the Tower. As a result of a fall from a horse he had a rupture, which legally exempted him from racking, but this was ignored by the Council. When he gave no information injurious to any Catholic, the torture became more violent. On March 2 while Owen was on the rack, his entrails burst out; he survived some hours in agony. On his death the Council gave out that he had committed suicide, but few believed it. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI in 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Feast: March 12; October 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); December 1 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:579–581. H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 4.1:245–267. J. GERARD, The Autobiography of a Hunted Priest, tr. P. CARAMAN (New York 1952); The Condition of Catholics under James I. Fr. Gerard's Narrative of the Gunpowder Plot, ed. J. MORRIS (2d ed. London 1872). J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints and Martyrs (Loyola Press, Chicago 1998), 67–69. M. WAUGH, Blessed Nicholas Owen (Postulation pamphlet; London 1961).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

OWENSBORO, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Owensboro (Owensburgensis), comprising 32 counties in western Kentucky, was established Dec. 9, 1937, from territory taken from LOUISVILLE, which became a metropolitan see at that time. Owensboro is Kentucky's third most populous city.

The first bishop, Francis R. Cotton, known for his piety, ruled the diocese strictly until his death, Sept. 25, 1960. Cotton made early preparations for a diocesan synod, which in its final session in Feb. 1943 adopted 114 statutes, later approved by Rome and promulgated. His successor was Henry J. Soenneker who, consecrated in 1961, served until 1982. Soenneker in turn was succeeded by John J. McRaith who was consecrated late in 1982.

From its earliest years, the new diocese attracted several religious communities to labor among its people, the GLENMARY HOME MISSIONERS being among the first (1941). The Ursuline Sisters of Mount Saint Joseph, founded in 1874 by the Ursuline Sisters of Louisville, are an autonomous community with a motherhouse at Maple Mount, a few miles southwest of Owensboro. Mount Saint Joseph Academy which had its beginning in 1874, continued until 1983. In 1925, the Ursuline Sisters began a junior college for women on the motherhouse grounds. In 1950, the school moved to Owensboro, today's Brescia University.

A diocesan Marian shrine, under the title "Mary Mother of the Church: Mary Model of All Christians" was dedicated in 1989. The Office of Hispanic Ministry was created in 1997 to better serve an Hispanic population estimated at 8,000. The Great Jubilee 2000 was celebrated in western Kentucky, at the invitation of Bishop John McRaith, as a joint effort of Christians throughout the area. A large candle, representing Christ, began its pilgrimage throughout the 32 counties on Reformation Sunday 1999, that concluded on Pentecost, 2000, at the Owensboro Sports Center. There, in a gathering of prayer and celebration, Christian leaders from many denominations signed an accord to work together for justice. The Owensboro diocese in 2000 reported 79 parishes serving a Catholic population of 50,000.

Bibliography: The First Synod (Owensboro 1943). First Review & Year Book (Owensboro 1952). J. HAYDEN, ed. This Far by Faith: The Story of Catholicity in Western Kentucky (Owensboro 1987). J. A. BOONE, ed. The Roman Catholic Diocese of Owensboro, Kentucky (Owensboro 1995).

[M. E. NAHSTOLL/C. F. CREWS]

OWL AND THE NIGHTINGALE, THE

The Owl and the Nightingale is a 12th-century poem generally regarded as one of the outstanding works in Middle English. It takes the form of a debate between the two birds as to which excels the other. The birds are well trained in the medieval débat tradition, and as their arguments develop, they range over many of the central intellectual questions of the century. The author never forgets, however, that the antagonists are birds, and they speak in character as they attack each other's personal habits, singing ability, and nest-building skill, as well as philosophical and moral outlooks. The poem is as noted for its liveliness and wit as for its rhetorical accomplishment.

It is clear, however, that the owl and the nightingale are more than mere representatives of two species of birds. Though scholars disagree upon any specific interpretation of their characters, or of their debate, the nightingale clearly stands for a joyous, the owl for a sober, approach to life. Among the most important of their topics is man's attitude toward his religion: should it be penitential or celebratory?

The birds are unable to convince one another, and agree to take their quarrel to one Nicholas of Guilford, who, we are told, is preeminent for both learning and able judgment. But the reader is left simply with the debate: the author appears to suggest that either view of life alone is partial, that both the sober owl on its stump and the playful nightingale on its branch have important things to say and make mistakes, which need correction, and that a proper tension of their attitudes contributes balance to life; resolution of the argument is less important than practical truth.

The author and the exact provenance of the 2,000-line, octosyllabic poem are unknown. It is not now generally supposed that Nicholas was the author, or that the poem was written at Guilford. The dialect is that of the southwestern part of England, and the work has importance as a philological document, as well as for its literary qualities.

Bibliography: The Owl and the Nightingale, ed. E. G. STANLEY (London 1960). R. M. WILSON, Early Middle English Literature (London 1939) ch. 7. H. HÄSSLER, "The Owl and the Nightingale" und die literarischen Bestrebungen des 12. und 13. Jahrhunderts (Frankfurt a. M. 1942). H. WALTHER, Das Streitgedicht in der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Quellen und Untersuchungen zur lateinischen Philologie des Mittelalters 5.2; Munich 1920).

[N. D. HINTON]

OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF

One of two ancient English universities, in Oxford, the county seat of Oxfordshire, England.

City of Oxford. Situated between the upper Thames and the Cherwell, this ancient "ford of oxen" was fortified against the Danes in 912 by Edward the Elder, King of the West Saxons. By 1000, Oxenford was one of the principal towns of the country. After the Conquest, Norman earls built a massive castle, city walls, and many churches. In the 12th century the ancient nunnery of St. Frideswide was given to the Austin Canons. The growth of the University in the 13th century brought Dominicans (1221), Franciscans (1224), Carmelites (1256), Friars of the Sack (c. 1262), Cistercians (1280), Benedictines (1283), Trinitarians (1293), and other religious orders. From the 13th to the 16th century the privileged position of the University repressed growth of the town, particularly after the riots of St. Scholastica's Day, 1355. Formerly a township in the Diocese of Lincoln, it became a cathedral city under Henry VIII. During the Reformation religious houses were suppressed or turned into secular colleges. National divisions of sympathy were reflected in the perennial feud between city and University, which was not reconciled until the visit of George III in 1785. The 20th century brought great growth and change. Many ancient religious orders have returned, and some newer congregations share in the activity of the city and the University. Since the reestablishment of the Catholic hierarchy, Oxford has been in the Diocese of Birmingham.

University. The origin of this oldest university in England is lost in obscurity, even after all legend has been discounted. Individual masters, like Theobald of Étampes, are known to have taught clerks (clerics) in Oxford before 1117; around 1150 some masters held their own schools there. It was not until Henry II checked the flow of English scholars to Paris, however, that English masters and students flocked to Oxford. By 1180 "a large number of scholars" from different faculties resided there (GERARD OF CAMBRAI), but probably without much formal organization until the legatine ordinance of 1214. ROBERT GROSSETESTE was appointed chancellor (c. 1215–21), representing the bishop of Lincoln; curricula in theology, law, medicine, and arts were modeled on University of Paris practice. The arrival of mendicant orders proved beneficial. In 1254 Innocent IV confirmed all immunities, liberties, and customs of the University and as at Paris, no clerk could enroll in theology unless he had first been a regent master in arts. The congregation of regents and nonregents of all faculties (congregatio magna), later called the convocation, was the supreme governing body; the congregation of all regent masters of all faculties (congregatio minor) governed ordinary affairs. To govern the arts faculty, regent masters in arts formed their own congregation (congregatio nigra), presided over by two proctors, one Australis and the other Borealis, who were the original University executives. Lectures were always given in the schools, and scholars lived wherever they could. Riots and disorders between "town and gown" induced Bp. Walter de Merton in 1264 to found a residence for secular students of theology, mainly his relatives, similar to the college founded by Robert de SORBON in Paris. Two earlier residential halls, University College (1249) and Balliol (1263), were soon reorganized to conform to Merton's statutes. Originally these colleges merely provided good lodging and company for a select group of fellows. Only later did the colleges become the self-contained, autonomous units that, grouped together, make up the University of Oxford as it exists today.

As a corporate body, the University dates only from the reign of Elizabeth I, when an act of Parliament, passed in 1571, incorporated "the chancellor, masters and scholars" of Oxford, and imposed the oath of supremacy and the 39 Articles. In 1634 the ancient, scattered statutes of the University were codified by Abp. William Laud and ratified by royal charter. The Laudian Code is still the basis of the existing statutes, although many modern provisions have been added. In 1850 the first royal commission was appointed to reform and modernize the University. Since 1854 continued organizational reform has been accompanied by the introduction of modern subjects: natural science, economics, modern and Oriental languages, social studies, fine arts, agriculture and forestry. In 1920 women were admitted to full membership in the University.

Oriol College, Oxford. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Organization. The chancellor, masters, and scholars form a corporate body within which the colleges are individual corporations. The highest officer is the chancellor, usually a man of distinction, elected by convocation. In practice the head is the vice-chancellor, a head of one of the colleges, who is nominated annually by the chancellor for a total of three years. Two proctors are appointed annually by two of the colleges in rotation. University business is initiated by the Hebdomadal council and decided upon by the congregation (all resident M.A.'s). The council consists of five ex officio members (chancellor, vice-chancellor, two proctors, and either the outgoing or incoming vice-chancellor) and 18 M.A.'s elected by the congregation. Since 1926 the power of convocation (resident and nonresident M.A.'s) has become nominal. The administrative work is delegated to academic bodies, supervised by the general board of faculties, and nonacademic bodies, such as curators.

No one can study for a degree or be a member of the University unless he is a member of one of the 26 colleges for men: University (founded 1249), Balliol (1263), Merton (1264), St. Edmund's Hall (c.1278), Exeter (1314), Oriol (1326), Queen's (1340), New College (1379), Lincoln (1427), All Souls (1438, no undergraduates), Magdalen (1458), Brasenose (1509), Corpus Christi (1517), Christ Church (1546), Trinity (1554, formerly Benedictine, Durham), St. John's (1555, formerly Cistercian, St. Bernard), Jesus (1571), Wadham (1612), Pembroke (1624), Worcester (1714, formerly OSB, Gloucester), Keble (1870, only for Anglicans), Hertford (1874), St. Antony's (1951), Nuffield (1958, for doctorate candidates), St. Catherine's (1868, reorganized 1962), and St. Peter's (1929, reorganized 1962); or the five colleges for women: Lady Margaret Hall (1878), Somerville (1879), St. Hugh's (1886), St. Hilda's (1893), and St. Anne's (1952). Besides innumerable authorized lodgings, there are five permanent private halls: Mansfield College, Campion Hall (Jesuit), St. Benet's Hall (Benedictine), Regent's Park College, and Greyfriars (Franciscan). Since 1954 Queen Elizabeth House has been a center for commonwealth studies.

Studies for degrees are of three kinds: (1) the normal undergraduate studies for the B.A. in any set subject; (2) undergraduate studies in one of the higher faculties, normally taken after the B.A., for the B.D., in theology, B.C.L. in law, the B.M. and B.Ch. (Surgery) in medicine, and B.Mus. in music; (3) original research under a supervisor for the degrees of B.Litt., B.Sc., B. Phil., and D.Phil. Higher doctorates are awarded for published work containing an original contribution to the advancement of learning.

There are 16 faculties and one department in which one may study: theology, law, medicine, litterae humaniores ("greats," the ancient arts faculty), modern history, English, modern European languages, Oriental studies, physical science (including mathematics), biological sciences, social studies (philosophy, politics, and economics, or "modern greats"), anthropology and geography, music, agriculture and forestry, psychology, fine arts, and a department of education.

Examinations for the B.A., the basic Oxford degree, are: (1) responsions—entrance examination taken before coming up to the University or its equivalent; (2) first public examination, which may be an honors examination (moderations), taken between the 3d and 6th term after matriculation, in Greek and Latin, mathematics, natural science or law, or a pass examination designed as a preliminary to one of the final honor schools; (3) final schools examination, generally an honors examination, in a single subject or in two or three closely related subjects, taken between the 8th and 12th term after matriculation. Having passed the final schools examination, a B.A. graduate may retain his name on the books of his college for a total of 21 terms (seven years) and supplicate for the degree of M.A. without any further examination, and thus become a member of the convocation.

Oxford uses two educational systems: the university lecture system, which centers on the lecturer's current interest or university needs, and the tutorial system, which centers on the needs of the undergraduate. The undergraduate is not obliged to attend any lectures, but he usually attends those pertinent to the final schools examination or those recommended by his tutor. The tutorial system, perfected in the 19th century, is the basic educational technique at Oxford. A freshman on his arrival at the beginning of his first term is introduced to the college tutor in charge of the subject that he intends to study. This college tutor determines the immediate needs of the individual and assigns one or more tutors who will be responsible for the intellectual development of the undergraduate. The precise form of the tutorial, or weekly session with the tutor, varies with the subject. Basically it is the presentation of some exercise, essay, or experiment, read or performed, singly or in small groups, for the tutor to criticize, query, or explain. The weekly tutorial is based on a heavy reading course, including the list published by the board of faculty concerned. The tutor's primary function is to instruct and to develop the critical abilities of the undergraduate.

The academic year at Oxford consists of three full terms of eight weeks each, fixed by the Hebdomadal council: Michaelmas, beginning on the second Sunday in October; Hilary, beginning on the first Sunday after January 14; and Trinity, beginning on the last or next to last Sunday in April, depending on the date of Easter. Specified terms of residence, usually nine and never less than six, are a condition of admission to any degree. These terms, each of which must be at least 42 days long, must be kept by residence within the walls of a college, hall, or in licensed lodgings. During the two short vacations of six weeks each and during the long summer vacation the student is expected to complete the heavy reading program set by the board of faculty and his tutor.

Strictly speaking, Oxford offers no graduate courses. Since 1895, however, certain faculties have established research degrees, particularly for graduates of other universities. The first research degree established was the B.Litt. The candidate must be accepted by a college or society, and through the college by the appropriate board of faculty for the area of research. The subject proposed for a thesis must be approved and a supervisor appointed. The examination for the degree is based solely on the written dissertation, which can be submitted after one year (if he is a graduate of Oxford) or two years of research, but not later than the third.

Application for admission as an advanced student in the technical sense for the D.Phil. degree is similar to the B.Litt. and B.Phil. However, much more is expected and a longer time is allowed (between two and five years, with possible extensions). A successful dissertation for the D.Phil. degree is "an original contribution to knowledge set forth in such a manner as to be fit for publication." When the original statute establishing the degree of D.Phil. was passed in 1917, advanced studies at Oxford secured a definite position subject to systematic control by the University.

In recent decades, through the work of the royal commission the University has come to assume a greater responsibility in the advancement of learning. Nuffield College, founded in 1937, was unique in being a University institution and not an independent corporation. It is a postgraduate college intended "to encourage research especially but not exclusively in the field of social studies." St. Catherine's was reconstituted as a full college in 1962 to promote study of the technological sciences. The University museum, the University laboratory of physical chemistry, erected in 1939–40, the Clarendon laboratory, completed in 1940, and more recent science buildings are under the direct control of the University and not of any particular college, although many of the colleges have their own laboratories.

Oxford is particularly blessed with good libraries. Besides college libraries, there is a central University library consisting of more than six separate collections in various buildings. The most famous is the Bodleian, founded in 1602 by Thomas Bodley, and its extensions, the Radcliffe Camera and the New Library, opened in 1946. The Bodleian is particularly rich in manuscripts and books. The Radcliffe science library contains the scientific section of the University library. The library of Rhodes House specializes in African and colonial history; the Indian Institute contains books dealing with India and Pakistan; Taylor Institute specializes in modern European languages and literature; and the Ashmolean Museum contains a number of specialist libraries in fine arts, archeology, antiquities, classics, and papyrology. Besides these there are smaller faculty libraries specializing in English, modern history, China and Chinese books, geography, and mathematics.

Details of the various fees, grants, prizes, and scholarships, notably the Rhodes scholarship, are given in Handbook to the University of Oxford, published and revised periodically by the Oxford University Press. The Rhodes scholarships, established under the last will (1899–1901) of the South African statesman, Cecil Rhodes, are for students from the British Empire, the U.S., and Germany. The great majority of American Oxonians have been Rhodes scholars.

Bibliography: A. G. LITTLE, The Grey Friars in Oxford (Oxford 1892). C. E. MALLET, A History of the University of Oxford, 3 v. (London 1924–27). J. WELLS, Oxford and Its Colleges (9th ed. London 1910). S. GIBSON, ed., Statuta antiqua universitatis Oxoniensis (Oxford 1931). A. G. LITTLE and F. PELSTER, Oxford Theology and Theologians, c. A.D. 1282–1302 (Oxford 1935). H. RASHDALL, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, ed. F. M. POWICKE and A. B. EMDEN, 3 v. (new ed. Oxford 1936). D. A. CALLUS, "Introduction of Aristotelian Learning to Oxford," Proceedings of the British Academy 29 (1943) 229–281. W. A. HINNEBUSCH, The Early English Friars Preachers (Rome 1951). E. CRASTER, History of the Bodleian Library, 1845–1945 (Oxford 1952). A. B. EMDEN, A Bio- graphical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59). M. H. CURTIS, Oxford and Cambridge in Transition, 1558–1642 (Oxford 1959). F. PELSTER and D. A. CALLUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1320–23. Publications. Oxford University Calendar (1810–) yearly. University of Oxford Examination Statutes (1883–) yearly. Oxford University Gazette (1870–), regularly. Oxford Historical Society Publications (1884–1936; N.S. 1939–). Handbook to the University of Oxford (1932–) esp. 1962 and periodic revisions. Oxford Studies Presented to Daniel Callus (Oxford 1960).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL/EDS.]

OXFORD MOVEMENT

An effort by Anglican clergymen of Oxford University between 1833 and 1845 to renew the Church of England by a revival of Catholic doctrine and practice. The following phases of the movement are discernible: (1) rise and progress (1833–39), (2) crisis (1839–41), (3) Tract 90 and its aftermath (1841–45), and (4) the period after Newman.

Background. The Church of England (see ANGLICANISM) emerged from the Reformation as an amalgamation of Catholic and Protestant doctrine and practice. These two disparate elements were welded together in the interest of national unity, mainly during the reign of Elizabeth I. The Catholic tradition, or HIGH CHURCH element, triumphed over the Protestant element during the period of such famous Anglo-Catholic divines as Lancelot ANDREWES and William LAUD. The REVOLUTION OF 1688 enabled the Protestant party to gain the ascendancy. LATITUDINARIANISM, which minimized doctrine, represented a third party.

By 1800 the English Church greatly needed reform. With its deep internal divisions, worldly prelates, and ineffectual clergy, however, it was hardly prepared to undertake this task itself. Hence it was faced with the prospect of having unwelcome reforms imposed upon it by secularist and liberal members of Parliament. The first such reform occurred in 1833 when ten Anglican bishoprics were suppressed in Ireland. To many loyal churchmen this was an omen of more drastic changes, perhaps even of disestablishment.

Rise and Progress (1833–39). A fear of such drastic moves motivated John KEBLE's sermon entitled "National Apostasy" (July 14, 1833), which John Henry NEWMAN considered the beginning of the Oxford Movement. The sermon was followed by a meeting held from July 25 to July 29 at Hadleigh, Suffolk, attended by a number of prominent clergymen, including Hugh Rose, William Palmer, and Richard Hurrell FROUDE. They decided to organize a defense of the Church through the formation of committees and the issuance of joint manifestoes.

Newman, Keble, and Froude, however, believed that the only true remedy for the evil condition of the Church lay in a theological and spiritual renewal. They held that the Catholic heritage of the Book of COMMON PRAYER and of the 17th-century divines had to be recovered. The English Church had to reaffirm her commitment to the almost forgotten Catholic truths, namely: she held divine authority as part of God's visible kingdom; her sacraments were indispensable channels of grace; and her bishops were successors of the Apostles. This message they decided to communicate to the clergy in brief pamphlets, subsequently named Tracts for the Times, an expedient originated by Newman, who wrote the first one (see TRACTARIANISM).

Keble, "the true and primary author" of the movement according to Newman, was a gentle poet and scholarly pastor who had imbibed the Catholic tradition in his father's rectory. Froude, an ardent disciple of Keble, burned with an impatient zeal to restore the Church of England to its medieval spiritual power. Newman, a bold, searching thinker, was a patristic scholar who had moved from an Evangelical to a Catholic position through his reading and personal contacts at Oxford, especially his friendship with Froude and Keble.

One of the first important conquests of the movement occurred at the end of 1833 when Edward B. PUSEY signed his initials to Tract 18. Regius professor of Hebrew, canon of Christ Church, and an aristocrat with friends in high places, he already enjoyed a reputation for great learning and holiness. His adherence to the cause was of invaluable assistance in establishing the movement as a serious contender for influence in the Church.

Newman, with his natural gifts, his acute, sensitive mind, his great capacity for friendship, and his insight into the minds of others, was destined to be the movement's natural leader. It was a leadership he exercised in many ways. His sermons at St. Mary's, Oxford, where he was vicar, were a powerful means of attracting many to the movement's ideals. Published as Parochial and Plain Sermons (1834–42), they reveal the essence of the Oxford reformation, its unworldliness, uncompromising quest for holiness, and unflinching asceticism. The sermons' psychological penetration, scriptural wisdom, and matchless beauty of language have made them enduring masterpieces.

Newman also did the most to establish a theoretical basis for the movement. This was the object of a series of lectures delivered between 1834 and 1836 and published as The Prophetic Office of the Church (1837). Drawing on the 17th-century Anglican divines, he argued that the Church of England held an intermediate position, a via media between the extremes of Roman infallibility and Protestant private judgment. Her rule of faith was simple fidelity to the teaching of the Fathers. He confessed, however, that Anglo-Catholicism was still merely a religion on paper. There was a great need of theological investigation of the Anglican tradition to make it one, intelligible, and consistent. To this end Newman, Keble, and Pusey began to edit the 45-volume Library of the Fathers (1838–88), a series of English translations of patristic writings, and the 83-volume Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (1841–63).

In his Apologia Newman revealed that the via media was based on three fundamental principles—dogma, the sacramental system, and anti-Romanism. The chief opponents of dogma, he said, were the Liberals, who viewed religion as a mere matter of opinion. His anti-Romanism at the time was evident in his reference to the pope as anti-Christ and in his accusations against Rome of corrupting the Gospel truths.

Valuable recruits were soon gained, especially among the younger fellows of Oriel and Trinity. Such talented scholars as Charles Marriott, Robert Wilberforce, Frederick Rogers, Richard W. Church, and Isaac Williams rallied to the reform banner. As Newman remarked (Apologia, 76) "the Anglo-Catholic party suddenly became a power in the National Church and an object of alarm to her rulers and friends."

Latent hostility erupted with the publication in 1838 of the private papers of Froude, who died in 1836. These Remains offended great numbers by their strong anti-Protestant character and confirmed a growing suspicion that the movement was pro-Roman.

Crisis (1839–41). Newman considered the year 1839 as the zenith of the movement. The revival of Catholicism seemed to answer definite spiritual needs of many members of the Church of England. Several developments, however, marked this year as the beginning of a crisis. There was, first, the formation of a new party of eager, acute, resolute minds with definite sympathies for Rome. Such men as William G. WARD, Frederick Oakeley, F. W. FABER, and J. D. DALGAIRNS "cut into the original movement at an angle, fell across its line of thought, and then set about turning that line in its own direction" (Apologia, 164).

A more fateful development occurred when doubts suddenly arose in Newman's mind about his via media. He found in his study of early history that MONOPHYTISM had upheld a via media similar to the Anglican one. At the same time he saw in St. Augustine's phrase "securus judicat orbis terrarum" a rule of faith that seemed to invalidate the Anglo-Catholic's rule of fidelity to the Fathers. As he put it, "the deliberate judgment, in which the whole Church at length rests and acquiesces, is an infallible prescription . . . against such portions of it as protest and secede." Catholicity, or communion with the whole Church, was the essential mark of the true Church, not fidelity to antiquity.

While the history of St. Leo showed me that the deliberate and eventual consent of the great body of the Church ratified a doctrinal decision as a part of revealed truth, it also showed that the rule of Antiquity was not infringed, though a doctrine had not been publicly recognized as so revealed till centuries after the time of the Apostles. Thus, whereas the Creeds tell us that the Church is One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic, I could not prove that the Anglican communion was an integral part of the One Church, on the ground of its teaching being Apostolic or Catholic, without reasoning in favour of what are commonly called the Roman corruptions; and I could not defend our separation from Rome and her faith without using arguments prejudicial to these great doctrines concerning our Lord, which are the very foundation of the Christian religion. The Via Media was an impossible idea! [Apologia, 149]

Still Newman tried to meet his own difficulty in an article in the British Critic (January 1840), in which he argued that jurisdictional or other forms of visible intercommunion were not necessary between the parts of the one visible Church. The English Church, although separated from Rome, was still the Catholic Church in England since it was still in possession of "the Succession, the Episcopal form, the Apostolic faith, and the use of the Sacraments" (Essays Critical and Historical, 20).

Tract 90 and Aftermath. However, Ward and others in the party leaning toward Rome cited the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES to disprove Newman's contention that the Anglican Church held its common faith with Rome. The Articles were drawn up to exclude Roman doctrines from the English Church, they said. In reply Newman undertook a commentary on the Articles in Tract 90, which he published in February 1841. It was a crucial experiment, he recognized. He tried to prove that the Articles implied a distinction between Catholic teaching and Roman dogma; that they definitely did not condemn the former and did not even condemn the latter entirely. Rather the historical circumstances of their composition show that they were deliberately made general and vague in order to pacify those in the national Church with Catholic tendencies, as well as those with Protestant ones. Thus, although Article 21 simply states that "General Councils . . . forasmuch as they be an Assembly of men may err . . .," Newman claimed that this did not rule out their inerrancy "when they are a thing of heaven." Despite the extreme subtlety of some of his distinctions, subsequent study has verified Newman's main contention.

The tract was not answered with argument, however. Panic and wrath ensued at this denial of the Protestant character of the Articles. All the resentment stored up against the "Oxford Malignants" now burst out in full fury. The heads of houses at Oxford, notorious for their ignorance of theology, publicly censured Tract 90 as an evasion. Newman's bishop demanded the cessation of the tracts.

Newman retreated to a mission church he had built at Littlemore, his position in the established Church seriously compromised. Then three more blows fell, all but destroying his belief in the Anglican Church. A further study of ARIANISM showed him again the existence of another heretical via media in early Church history, i.e., Semi-Arianism. Second, the bishops one by one disowned Newman's interpretation of the Articles. Finally, the establishment of an Anglican bishopric in Jerusalem embracing Lutherans and other Protestants indicated a formal recognition of Protestant doctrines. This was the ultimate condemnation of the via media for Newman.

Meanwhile Pusey was suspended from preaching for two years after delivering a moderate Tractarian sermon on the Holy Eucharist. Then Ward entered the conflict. With remorseless logic he defended the thesis that since Rome alone fulfilled "the ideal of a Christian Church" (the title of his book), the Anglican Church must humbly sue for readmission to her communion. Official Oxford was outraged. His book was censured, and he was deprived of his master's degree in the Oxford convocation (Feb. 13, 1845).

Newman despaired of the Anglican Church and withdrew into lay communion after preaching his last sermon, "The Parting of Friends" (Sept. 25, 1843). He was kept back from Rome for two years by difficulties over Tridentine doctrines, transubstantiation, and Catholic devotion to the Blessed Mother and the saints. Further study led him to favor the view that a principle of development was at work in the Church from earlier times. After writing his Essay on Development (1845) to prove this point to his own satisfaction, he made his profession of Catholic faith to Father Dominic BARBERI (Oct. 9, 1845).

After Newman. Ward, Faber, Oakeley, Dalgairns, and many others left Anglicanism with Newman. Pusey and Keble assumed leadership of the faltering party. Oxford ceased to be its headquarters. Pastoral and liturgical matters overshadowed doctrinal ones.

Another wave of secessions to Rome occurred in 1851 over the case of Rev. George C. Gorham. The bishop of Exeter had refused a parish to Gorham because of his questionable views on Baptismal regeneration. The bishop's decision, however, was reversed by the Privy Council in an unprecedented intervention in doctrinal matters. The impotence of the teaching authority of the Church appeared manifest to a number of clergymen, including Henry MANNING (later cardinal), who thereupon made their submission to Rome.

A long struggle was waged within the Church of England by Pusey, Keble, and their associates to revive the Catholic Sacraments, particularly the Eucharist and Penance. Puseyites were condemned by the archbishop of Canterbury and were brought to court for advocating the Catholic doctrinal interpretation of these Sacraments, but their patience and perseverance gradually won partial acceptance of this doctrine in the Church of England.

The revival of Catholic ceremonial, the use of altar lights, Eucharistic vestments, etc., was another result of work by Pusey and his friends. Although these practices were sanctioned by the Prayer Book, their advocates had to contend with furious mobs that wrecked churches where the reforms were introduced and with hostile bishops who condemned them as popish innovations. The revival of religious orders in the Church of England was another outcome of the Oxford Movement. Pusey's foundation of a sisterhood in 1845 was followed by the foundation of other communities of men or women. See RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ANGLICAN-EPISCOPALIAN.

The Oxford Movement failed to revive Catholic orthodoxy or to check the rising Liberalism in the Church of England. Its successful revival of Anglo-Catholic sacramental and liturgical practice, however, has greatly influenced the spirit and form of contemporary Anglican worship (see ANGLICO-CATHOLICS).

Bibliography: J. H. NEWMAN, Apologia pro vita sua (1st ed. London 1864). J. R. GRIFFIN, John Keble, Saint of Anglicanism (Macon, GA 1987). M. R. O'CONNELL, The Oxford Conspirators: A History of the Oxford Movement, 1833–1845 (Lanham, MD 1991). O. CHADWICK, The Spirit of the Oxford Movement: Tractarian Essays (Cambridge, England 1990). P. B. NOCKLES, The Oxford Movement in Context: Anglican High Churchmanship, 1760–1857 (Cambridge, England 1994).

[T. S. BOKENKOTTER/EDS.]

OXYRHYNCHUS

A provincial capital (Coptic, Pemdije), about 200 kilometers south of Cairo, which became a large and important city during the Hellenistic period. In about A.D. 380 it was listed as a diocese with at least 10 churches, in addition to many monasteries in the surrounding region. During the Byzantine period it was the metropolis and commercial center of the province of Arcadia, but it gradually declined under Muslim rule and is now in ruins. Its chief importance lies in the immense collection of papyri discovered there, beginning with the excavations of B. Grenfell and A. Hunt (1897–1907), W. F. Petrie (1922), and Breccia (1927–28). They unearthed thousands of unknown and very important pagan and Christian documents: fragments of classical literature, gospels, apocrypha, Greek and Hebrew hymns, patristic texts, calendars, and inventories of churches, as well as civil and commercial items.

Bibliography: B. P. GRENFELL et al., eds., The Oxyrhynchus Papyri (London 1898—). K. PREISENDANZ, Papyrusfunde und Papyrusforschung (Leipzig 1933). H. GERSTINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1324–35. H. DELEHAYE, Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882—) 42 (1924) 83–99.

[G. T. DENNIS]

OZANAM, ANTOINE FRÉDÉRIC, BL.

Married layman, French historian and literary scholar, and founder of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul; b. Milan, Italy, April 23, 1813; d. Marseilles, France, September 8, 1853.

A tradition of the Ozanam family traced its descent from a seventh-century Jew, Samuel Hosannam, converted by St. DESIDERIUS OF CAHORS, whom he sheltered from persecution. Frédéric was brought up and educated in Lyons. In 1829 he underwent a “crisis of doubt,” which he overcame with the assistance of his teacher, Abbé Noiroi. This experience consolidated the intellectual basis of his faith and imbued him with deep charity in controversy with unbelievers.

In 1831 he published his first work, a refutation of the socialist theories of the Saint-Simonians. In the same year he went to Paris to study law and made the acquaintance of the leaders of the Catholic revival—Chateaubriand, Montalembert, Lacordaire, Ampère, and others. He was concerned to refute the attacks on Catholicism that were widespread in the Sorbonne. It was in May of 1833 that he and a few fellow students formed a “Conference of Charity” to undertake practical work among the poor. This is accepted as the foundation date of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, although its formal title and rules were not adopted until 1835. Ozanam insisted that the Society should not restrict its charity to Catholics and that countries should assist each other; thus, the Paris Society aided Dublin during the Irish famine and Dublin reciprocated during the Revolution of 1848.

Ozanam completed his first degree in law in 1834, and was called to the bar in Lyons. However, his true bent was for literature and history. He returned to Paris, where he took his first degree in literature in 1835, his doctorate in law in 1836, and his doctorate in literature in 1839. During this period he was active in the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, Catholic journalism, and many Catholic causes. He was instrumental in bringing about the first of Lacordaire's famous series of Lenten sermons in Notre Dame.

Pope John Paul II at a Mass celebrated at Notre Dame for the beautification of Antoine Frédéric Ozanam, Paris, 1997. (Bassignac-Deville-Vioujard-Quidu-Ribeiro/Gamma)

Ozanam became the first to hold a chair as professor of commercial law at Lyons in 1839, but returned to Paris the following year to teach foreign literature at the Sorbonne. He was elected professor in 1844. His studies of Dante, beginning with his doctoral thesis, revolutionized critical work on the poet. Although Ozanam is a neglected figure in nineteenth-century historiography, his research in the development of Christian Latin, literature, and art showed an acquaintance with the original texts and contemporary critical research in the major European languages that was remarkable in the French scholarship of his day.

Ozanam advocated that Catholics should play their part in the evolution of the democratic state and unsuccessfully stood for election to the National Assembly in 1848. He denounced economic liberalism and any form of socialism. Lecture 24 in his course of commercial law is a brilliant exposition of Catholic social doctrine, foreshadowing RERUM NOVARUM and antedating the Communist Manifesto in its attention to the social question. Ozanam's personal visitations to the poor and his reports of the St. Vincent de Paul Society antedated even Villermé's pioneer social investigation published in 1840.

Ozanam may justly be regarded as an exemplar of the lay apostolate in family, social, and intellectual life. His marriage (June 23, 1841) to Amelie Soulacroix produced one daughter, Marie (b. 1845). Without neglecting family duties he worked for social justice.

At his request, Ozanam was buried in the church crypt of Saint-Joseph-des-Carmes at the Catholic Institute of Paris, among the students to whom he gave the best of himself. His cause for beatification, introduced in 1925, was followed by the declaration of his heroic virtues (July 6, 1993) and the approval of a miracle attributed to his intercession (June 25, 1996). Pope John Paul II beatified Ozanam, August 22, 1997, in Notre Dame Cathedral at Paris during the World Youth Day celebrations.

Feast: Sept. 8.

Bibliography: Works by Frédéric Ozanam: Oeuvres complètes, 11 v. (Paris 1859–65). Dante et la philosophie catholique au 13e siècle (Paris 1839); Études germaniques, 2 v. (Paris 1847–49); Les poètes franciscains en Italie au 13e siècle (Paris 1852). Lettres de Frédéric Ozanam. édition critique, 5 v., ed. D. OZANAM (Paris 1961–97). Literature about Frédéric Ozanam: C. A. OZANAM, Vie de Frédéric Ozanam (Paris 1879). T. E. AUGÉ, Frederic Ozanam and His World (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1966). L. BAUNARD, Ozanam d'après sa correspondance (Paris 1912), a standard work published by the Catholic Truth Society of Ireland as Ozanam in his Correspondence. B. CATTANÉO, Frédéric Ozanam le bienheureux (Paris 1997). V. CONZEMIUS, Frédéric Ozanam (Freiburg, Switz. 1985). G. FORSANS, Frédéric Ozanam 1813–53. Un précurseur de notre temps dans la fidélité à l'évangile (Chambray-les-Tours 1991). I. GOBRY, Frédéric Ozanam ou la foi opérante (Paris 1983). G. GOYAU, Frédéric Ozanam (Paris 1925); et al., Ozanam: Livre du centenaire, rev. ed. (Paris 1931). H. GUILLEMIN, La bataille de Dieu (Geneva 1944). H. L. HUGHES, Frederick Ozanam (London 1933). J.-A. LAMARCHE, Frédéric Ozanam: fondateur de la Société Saint-Vincent-de-Paul (Montréal 1997). F. MÉJECAZE, Fr. Ozanam et l'église catholique (Paris 1932). L. MEZZADRI, Federico Ozanam: se non ho la carità non sono niente (Cinisello Balsamo (Milano) 2000). K. O'MEARA, Frederic Ozanam, Professor at the Sorbonne; His Life and Works (Edinburgh 1876). E. RENNER, The Historical Thought of Frédéric Ozanam (Washington 1960). M. DES RIVIÈRES, Ozanam. Un savant chez les pauvres (Montréal 1984). A. P. SCHIMBERG, The Great Friend: Frederick Ozanam (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1946). M. VINCENT, Ozanam. Une jeunesse romantique (Paris 1994).

[F. MACMILLAN]

P

PACCA, BARTOLOMEO

Cardinal, papal diplomat; b. Benevento (Campania), Italy, Dec. 25, 1756; d. Rome, April 19, 1844. Of noble birth, he studied in Naples under the Jesuits and in Rome at the Collegio Clementino and the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici. In 1785 he received minor and major orders, becoming titular archbishop of Damietta and nuncio to Cologne, where he met the opposition of the bishop-electors of Mainz and Cologne, who were incensed against the Holy See because of the erection of the nunciature in Munich. These bishops, who were hostile to interventions in spiritual matters by nuncios, were impregnated with FEBRONIANISM and were defenders of the Congress of EMS. The repercussions of the French Revolution did more to improve the situation than did Pacca's firmness and ability. He was named nuncio extraordinary to Louis XVI, whose flight Pius VI believed successful, but the king's capture at Varenne made Pacca's mission pointless. As nuncio to Lisbon from 1794 to 1801, he had to struggle against the regalianism inherited from POMBAL and upheld at the University of Coimbra. Created cardinal (1801), Pacca became one of the most influential zelanti. He opposed the French CONCORDAT OF 1801 and remained in contact with the bishops of the Ancien Régime who refused submission to it. His nomination as prosecretary of state on June 18, 1808, after the occupation of Rome by Miollis and the expulsion of Cardinals Consalvi and Giulio Gabrielli by the French, indicated PIUS VII's will to resist. For impeding Pacca's arrest, the pope was also seized and carried off from Rome (July 1809). Pacca was imprisoned in the stronghold of San Carlo di Fenestrelle in Piedmont from July of 1809 until the CONCORDAT OF FONTAINEBLEAU (February 1813), after which he was permitted to rejoin Pius VII.

Contrary to what Pacca wrote in his memoirs (Memorie storiche del Ministero), neither he nor the cardinals around the Holy Father were responsible for the pope's decision to withdraw the concessions to Napoleon I in this so-called concordat, only the basis of a definite arrange. On January 28 Pius VII made his own decision and annulled these agreements in a secret declaration. Pacca's role consisted in counseling the best procedure to minimize the consequences of the pope's act. For this, Pacca incurred Napoleon's wrath and was deported to Uzès in southern France. He reentered Rome with Pius VII on May 24, 1814. During the Hundred Days he fled with the pope to Genoa to escape Murat, who invaded the States of the Church (March 1815).

As prosecretary of state from May 19, 1814 to July 2, 1815, during the sojourn of the secretary of state CONSALVI at Paris and the Congress of Vienna, Pacca practiced a policy of restoring the old order, contrary to Consalvi's broader views. During the latter part of Pius VII's pontificate, Pacca allied with the zelanti and ceaselessly opposed the reforms judged necessary by the pope. At the conclave in 1823 Pacca actively participated in the reaction which resulted in Consalvi's disgrace. Pacca became bishop successively of Frascati (1818), Porto and Santa Rufina (1821), and Ostia and Velletri (1829). Under Leo XII, Pius VIII, and Gregory XVI he was prodatary and a member of important congregations in the Curia.

Pacca was a true churchman, solidly pious, courageous in upholding the Church's rights, cultured, a patron of artists, and promoter of the first archeological excavations at Ostia; but his outlook was that of the Ancien Régime and lacked open-mindedness. He failed to understand Pius VII and Consalvi and passed severe judgments on them. His volumes of memoirs, published under various titles, are valuable historical sources, but they must be utilized with caution because later he substantially altered the section concerning Pius VII's captivity. To know his real sentiments it is necessary to refer to the original text.

Bibliography: G. BRIGANTE COLONIA, Bartolomeo Pacca, 1756–1844 (Bologna 1931). A. DURANTE, Tre papi e un cardinale (Rome 1940). J. LEFLON and C. PERRAT, "Les Suppressions et édulcorations qu'a fait subir à ses Mémoires le cardinal P.," Chiesa e stato nell'ottocento: Miscellanea in onore di P. Pirri, ed. R. AUBERT et al., 2 v. (Padua 1962), 2:355–381. L. PASZTOR, "Per la storia del Concordato di Fontainebleau," ibid. 597–606.

[J. LEFLON]

PACCANARISTS

Popular title of the Society of the Faith of Jesus, a religious institute that followed the rule of the JESUITS, dedicated itself to carry on their work, and above all sought the restoration of this order, suppressed in 1773. Its founder, Niccolò Paccanari (1773–?), was an enthusiastic and eloquent Italian, born at Valsugana near Trent; he was, however, deficient in formal education, humility, and prudence. Business and soldiery occupied him until a serious illness, (1795) followed by the influence of a pious Roman confraternity called the Oratory of Caravita and 14 months of prayerful retirement, led him to establish in Rome a religious congregation (Aug. 15, 1797). His four companions, one a former Jesuit priest, chose him superior, although he had only the tonsure. Members took the three vows of religion plus a fourth vow of special obedience to the pope, whose formulation proved a stumbling block to many former Jesuits. The garb was the one once worn by Italian Jesuits. Early in 1798 Pius VI approved the new institute, selected its name, permitted it to recite the Breviary with Jesuit supplements, and to admit former Jesuits.

With papal encouragement Paccanari arranged a union with the Society of the SACRED HEART OF JESUS (April 18, 1799), almost identical in rule and purpose with his own institute. Paccanari, not a priest until 1800, became superior of the merged groups that bore the title of his original foundation, although his had but 19 members, whereas the other had 50, far superior in caliber, education, influence, and material resources.

For a few years the society increased rapidly in numbers as it spread from Italy and Austria into Germany, Switzerland, France, Holland, and England. It gained a good reputation for varied pastoral and educational activities. When Pius VII confirmed the Jesuits in White Russia (1801) and in parts of Italy (1804) and allowed them to accept recruits from elsewhere, many Paccanarists joined them. Paccanari disconcerted his subjects by his worldly outlook, ambition to retain authority, and disinclination to restore the Society of Jesus or to affiliate with it. All the 70 or so members in France won the nuncio's approval to form an independent body. After a papal investigation, Paccanari received a ten-year prison sentence (August 1808). Released by the French (1809), he returned to prison for another offense (1810). No further reliable record of him exists. When the Jesuits were completely restored (1814), most of the few remaining Paccanarists joined them.

Bibliography: O. PFÜLF, Die Anfänge der deutschen Provinz der neu erstandenen Gesellschaft Jesu (Freiburg 1922). J. BURNICHON, La Compagnie de Jésus en France, 1814–1914 (Paris 1914–) v.1. A. GUIDÉE, Vie du R. P. Joseph Varin (2d ed. Paris 1860). H. CHADWICK, "Paccanarists in England," Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 20 (1951) 143–166. A. RAYEZ, "Clorivière et les Pères de la Foi," ibid. 21 (1952) 300–328. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934) 1763–64. L. DERIÈS, Les Congrégations religieuses au temps de Napoléon (Paris 1929).

[J. F. BRODERICK]

PACE, EDWARD ALOYSIUS

Educator, author; b. Starke, FL, July 3, 1861; d. Washington, D.C., April 26, 1938. As the son of George Edward and Margaret (Kelly) Pace, he was descended on his father's side from 17th-century English colonists in Virginia; his maternal grandfather was Owen Kelly, comptroller of ports of Halifax, Nova Scotia. He attended public school in Starke, and Duval High School, Jacksonville, before studying for the priesthood at St. Charles College, Ellicott City, MD (1876–80), and the North American College (with classes at the Propaganda University), Rome, where he was ordained on May 30, 1885.

After being awarded the S.T.D. degree in 1886, he returned to the Diocese of St. Augustine, FL, and served for two years as rector of the cathedral and chancellor. In 1888, following his selection for the faculty of the projected Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., he returned to Europe for graduate studies in psychology. After a year at Louvain and Paris, he transferred to Leipzig, where he studied under Wilhelm Wundt, and received the Ph.D. magna cum laude in 1891. Thereafter he served at the Catholic University of America as professor of psychology (1891–94) and of philosophy (1894–1935), dean of the School of Philosophy (1895–99, 1906–14, 1934–35), general secretary (1917–25), vice rector (1925–36), and founder (1899) and first director of the Institute of Pedagogy, which developed into the department of education. In 1936 he was named vice rector emeritus and professor of philosophy emeritus. The psychological laboratory that he established in 1891 was the second in America and the first in a Catholic university. As an editor of the Catholic Encyclopedia (1907–14), Pace took a leading part in planning and bringing it to a successful conclusion. At the international Congress of Arts and Sciences held in St. Louis, MO, in 1904, Pace served as chairman of the section of experimental psychology. He became first editor of Studies in Psychology and Psychiatry (1926), and with Thomas Edward Shields he founded and edited the Catholic Educational Review (1911). He was founder and first president of the American Catholic Philosophical Association, which was established at the Catholic University of America in 1926, and with James Hugh RYAN he first edited its journal, New Scholasticism. In 1925 he was elected president of the American Council on Education and in 1929 was appointed by President Herbert Hoover to the National Advisory Committee on Education. He received the medal Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice (1914), was named a prothonotary apostolic (1920), and received various honorary degrees.

Pace's publications include his doctoral dissertation, Das Relativitätsprinzip in Herbert Spencer's psychologischen Entwicklungslehre; many articles in philosophy, religion, and education; and The Mass for Every Day in the Year (1916), one of the first modern translations of the Missal, which he prepared with John J. Wynne, SJ. A pioneer in experimental psychology, Pace's teaching and writing were characterized by depth and originality of thought, careful reasoning, and clarity of expression. In 1919, the American bishops commissioned him to compose a national pastoral letter; his notable document analyzing issues then facing the Church and the nation was signed by Cardinal James Gibbons "in his own name and in the name of the hierarchy."

Bibliography: Pace Papers, Catholic University of America Archives, Washington, D.C. J. K. RYAN, "In Memory of Edward Aloysius Pace," New Scholasticism 35 (1961) 141–151. H. MISIAK and V. M. STAUDT, Catholics in Psychology: A Historical Survey (New York 1954). C. A. HART, ed., Aspects of the New Scholastic Philosophy (New York 1932), festschrift.

[J. K. RYAN]

PACEM IN TERRIS

Eighth encyclical of JOHN XXIII, issued April 11, 1963. Although widely hailed as an encyclical on international peace, in the narrow sense, its scope covers the whole range of order in human affairs, for it identifies peace with that unity of order that is based on respect for the law of God. To this end it expounds, in a more comprehensive manner than any previous papal document, the order that should prevail between man and man, between man and the community, and between communities inter se and the world community.

Because of the immense scope of the encyclical, it is not surprising that different interests welcomed it for different reasons. In one respect it appealed to all, namely, in its sincere desire for brotherhood between men. Western newspapers welcomed the encyclical for its humanitarian vision and boundless confidence in man's capacity for peace. Soviet news agencies gave it the favor of relatively extensive summary. In certain respects its welcome was selective. Some socialist sources praised it vaguely for positions already advocated by socialists, particularly internationalism, while the Communist press headlined its plea for disarmament to the extent that Autographed copy of "Pacem in terris," signed by Pope John XXIII, willed to John F. Kennedy, preserved in Kennedy Memorial Museum, Boston, Massachusetts.

Radio Vatican felt it necessary to issue a reminder that insistence on human freedom and dignity rather than advocacy of disarmament was at the core of the document.

The first part of Pacem in terris is built on the truth that order between individual men must be founded on the fact that man is a person. Such order consists essentially in respect for rights and duties that pertain to man entirely in virtue of his personality. The encyclical is a veritable charter of human rights, which it lists in specific detail, and is in a way reminiscent of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

In its second part the encyclical presents the relationship between the individual and the state as basically one of subjection to authority—not, however, as an authority rooted simply in physical force, but rather one representing the coercive power of a moral entity. For this reason the ordinances of human authority must be in accordance with the order of God's law. The encyclical launches into an important exposition of the philosophy of law that is diametrically opposed to all forms of legal positivism.

In its third part the encyclical argues that states, just as individuals, are the subjects of rights and duties. These rights and duties are translated into practical action by the persons who govern the state, for through these alone can the state be subjected to the moral law. Among the many things that this entails is a practical recognition of the equality of all states in dignity, whatever their racial backgrounds or their political or cultural stages of development. Recognition of solidarity implies in the concrete, not only that individual states should pursue their ends without hurting one another, but also that they should join forces whenever the efforts of an individual government cannot achieve its desired goals. The encyclical insists that trust rather than fear should be the vivifying factor in relationships between states. In place of the law of fear, which has prevailed for so long, the law of love should be substituted. Here there is a direct reference to war and peace, in the form of a plea that the arms race cease, that the stockpiles that exist be reduced equally and simultaneously by the countries concerned, and that nuclear weapons be banned and eventually a general disarmament reached.

The fourth part of the encyclical urges the importance of interdependence between states. Greater today than ever before, the collaboration that such interdependence stimulates puts an end to former ideas about absolute sovereignty and absolute national self-determination. The conclusion of the encyclical is devoted to pastoral exhortations. Catholics are urged to cooperate both individually and corporately with non-Catholics and even non-Christians for the advancement of praiseworthy social and political ends.

Bibliography: Official Latin text in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 55 (1963) 257–304. English translation in D. J. O'BRIEN and T.A. SHANNON, eds., Catholic Social Thought: The Documentary Heritage (Maryknoll, NY, 1992) 131–162. J. NEWMAN, Principles of Peace: A Commentary on John XXIII's "Pacem in Terris" (Oxford, 1964). D. J. O'BRIEN, "A Century of Catholic Social Teaching: Contexts and Comments," in J. A. COLEMAN, ed., One Hundred Years of Catholic Social Thought (Maryknoll, NY, 1991) 13–24.

[J. NEWMAN]

PACHER, MICHAEL

A leading late-Gothic painter and woodcarver in the Tyrol; b. near Brixen, c. 1435; d. Bruneck?, 1498. Pacher's workshop in Bruneck was on an important alpine road, and Pacher himself seems to have traveled to northern Italy, first as a young painter in the 1450s and again about 1475. His art shows a synthesis between the north Italian style of Mantegna's frescoes in the Eremitani church, Padua, and the widespread early Netherlandish style of Rogier van der Weyden. Pacher's most important work is the "St. Wolfgang Altarpiece" (1471–81, St. Wolfgang, Austria), which has a carved wooden shrine with life-size colored figures in a "Coronation of the Virgin" and a predella forming the center for two pairs of double-tiered painted wings. The spiky, carved pinnacles of the frame contain painted and gilded wooden figures; the sharp, angular folds of their drapery can be paralleled in Pacher's paintings. Scenes from the life of Christ and of the Virgin are depicted with detailed realism in spatially roomy surroundings in which the "worm's-eye view" perspective has been derived from Mantegna. His "Altarpiece of the Four Latin Fathers" (c. 1483, Pinakothek, Munich) shows a further development. Instead of a series of independent pictures, there is a central perspective construction for the four panels, and the elaborately carved frame of the "St. Wolfgang Altarpiece" is here painted illusionistically. The monumental figures under ornate painted canopies carry on a lively dialogue with their foreshortened symbols.

Bibliography: E. HEMPEL, Das Werk Michael Pachers (4th ed. Vienna 1941).

[M. M. SCHAEFER]

PACHOMIUS, ST.

Founder of CENOBITISM, one of the greatest of the monastic fathers; b. Esneh, Egypt, c. 290; d. Egypt, 346. Pachomius founded nine monasteries for men and two for women in the THEBAÏD, of which he was a native, and gave them a written rule that is still extant. Born and raised a pagan, he met some Christians in his youth while serving in the army. Their charity so edified him that he became a Christian and, eventually, a solitary (c. 314) at Schenesit under the direction of the hermit St. Palaemon. About six years later he moved a short distance away to TABENNISI and there began to develop what later became the first coenobium or monastery of the full communal life. His contemporaries, as well as present-day scholars, viewed him as a man of vision and purpose who from the beginning of monasticism saw the need for a development that would provide against the spiritual and physical hazards of the solitary life, by centering the movement on the communal charity inherent in Christianity from its start. He began with a few monks, who promised to obey him and to share in common the fruits of the employment that they had secured for themselves.

As the number of his disciples increased, Pachomius gradually developed a concept of mortification based on total obedience to superiors and subordinate officers, under whom all work was organized, and complete common ownership of goods and the fruits of labor. By the time he died, his monasteries formed a great and closely knit congregation, in which thousands of monks were organized for work in many trades and for common morning and evening prayer and meals. Throughout his lifetime Pachomius presided as superior general. He established Pabou, his second foundation, as his motherhouse and held there at Easter and in August of each year a general gathering of his superiors. The style and contents of his rule indicate that it was composed over a long period of time and not dictated by an angel according to the legend recorded by PALLADIUS (Historia Lausiaca 32.1). Its achievement was to provide an adequate economic and spiritual basis for the common life, legislating with discretion for what was of common obligation and allowing freedom for greater austerity on the part of the individual monk.

Six biographies of Pachomius by contemporaries survive; and also several of his instructions to his monks and the instructions and letters of his two great successors, Horsiesi (d. 380) and Theodore (d. 368). The two ruled jointly after a schism threatened the congregation in 350. Their writings, especially Horsiesi's De doctrina institutione monachorum, reveal a deep understanding and development of the Pachomian ideal. Within Horsiesi's lifetime the influence of Pachomius's rule had extended beyond the Pachomian monasteries and affected the cenobitic foundations and Rule of BASIL of Caesarea.

In 404 JEROME responded to a request to provide a Latin translation of the rule for the Latins who were entering the Pachomian monasteries. This text is the only one that has survived; it was the means by which Pachomian influence advanced in the West. The Regula Vigilii (or Regula Orientalis) written in Gaul c. 420 depends much on Pachomius's rule, borrowing about a quarter of its text. The sixth- or seventh-century Regula Tarnatensis also shows significant dependence. The Rule of St. BENEDICT (c. 540), and the rules of CAESARIUS OF ARLES and of his successor Aurelian (written c. 512–550) show less but unmistakable dependence. BENEDICT OF ANIANE (d. 821) includes the Latin version of Pachomius's rule in his collection of rules and refers to it frequently in his Concordia regularum. Besides the direct influence of his rule, Pachomius's influence must be estimated to some extent in terms of the total influence of cenobitism as the prevailing form of monasticism in Christian civilization.

Feast: May 9 (Roman martyrology and Coptic Church).

Bibliography: H. QUECKE, ed., Die Briefe Pachoms (Regensburg 1975). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 3:154–160. Vitae. Gr. ed. F. HALKIN (Subsidia Hagiographica 19; Brussels 1932). Syriac. P. BEDJAN, ed., Acta martyrum et sanctorum, 7 v. (Paris 1890–97) 5:122–176. Arabic. E. AMÉLINEAU, ed., Histoire de S. Pakhôme et de ses communautés (Annales de Musée Guimet 17) 337–711. L. T. LEFORT, tr., Les Vies coptes de S. Pakhôme et de ses premiers successeurs (Louvain 1943); ed. and tr., Oeuvres de S. Pakhôme et de ses disciples, 2 v.

(Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium [Paris-Louvain 1903] 159–160, Scriptores Coptici 23–24; 1956). A. BOON and L. T. LEFORT, eds., Pachomiana latina (Louvain 1932). The Life of Pachomius: vita prima Graeca, tr. A. N. ATHANASSAKIS (Missoula, Mont. 1975) with Greek text. The Life of Saint Pachomius and His Disciples, tr. A. VEILLEUX (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1980). E. A. T. BUDGE, Coptic Apocrypha in the Dialect of Upper Egypt (London 1913) 352–382. P. LADEUZE, Étude sur le cénobitisme pachomien (Louvain 1898). H. BACHT, “L'Importance de l'idéal monastique de S. P. pour l'histoire du monachisme chrétien,” Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 26: (1950) 308–326; in Antonius Magnus Eremita, ed. B. STEIDLE (Studia anselmiana 38) 66–107. C. DE CLERCQ, Mélanges L. Halphen (Paris 1951) 169–176. A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Les moines d'Orient, v. 4 (Paris 1964). Pachomian koinonia, tr. A. VEILLEUX, 3 v. (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1980–1982). P. ROUSSEAU, Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt (Berkeley 1985). A. DE VOGÜÉ, De Saint Pakhôme à Jean Cassien: études littéraires et doctrinales sur le monachisme égyptien à ses débuts (Rome 1996).

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

PACHYMERES, GEORGE

Byzantine historian; b. Nicaea, 1242; d. Constantinople, c. 1310. In 1261 he moved to Constantinople, where he held high positions in both state and Church. He was well educated, and his interests and writings covered a wide range of topics; but his most important work is his Συγγραφικὰ ἱστορία, a history of the reigns of the Emperors MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS and ANDRONICUS II PALAEOLOGUS (1261–1308). An eyewitness of many of the events he narrates, he is noted for his impartiality, even when writing of Michael's policy of ecclesiastical union with Rome, to which he was strongly opposed. He enters into detail on doctrinal matters, and his style is often difficult because of his fondness for archaisms. He also composed a short treatise on the Procession of the Holy Spirit, in which he accepted the Damascene formula, “through the Son,” some works on ARISTOTLE, and several others on Dionysius the Areopagite (see PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS).

Bibliography: G. PACHYMERES, De Michaele et Andronico Palaeologis libri XIII, ed. I. BEKKER, 2 v. (Bonn 1835), repr. PG v.143–144; Quadrivium, ed. P. TANNERY, rev. E. STEPHANOU (St-Test 94; 1940). G. MORAVCSIK, Byzantinoturcica, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1958) 1:280–282. V. LAURENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1713–18. F. DÖLGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1332. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 679.

[G. T. DENNIS]

PACIAN OF BARCELONA, ST.

Bishop; b. Spain, c. 310; d. Barcelona, Spain, before 392. Though married, and the father of the praetorian prefect, Dexter, Pacian became bishop of Barcelona and was praised by JEROME for his learning, sanctity, and pastoral zeal (De vir. illus. 106). Of his writings, only three works are certainly authentic: De Baptismo or sermon to catechumens, which speaks of the spiritual renewal and purification effected by baptism and describes the effects of ORIGINAL SIN with a clarity that was rare before the time of AUGUSTINE; a Contra Novatianos, in three letters to Sympronian, a rigorist propagating the condemned doctrines of NOVATIAN; and a Paraenesis sive exhortatorius libellus, an earnest plea in favor of penance, and a stern reminder of the far more severe punishments awaiting those who die without having fulfilled the penances imposed on them. This work presents invaluable source material for the study of the penitential system then in vogue throughout Spain. Pacian's other writings have disappeared, and the treatises attributed to him by Dom G. MORIN are of doubtful authenticity.

Pacian's doctrine on penance elaborated the teaching of Scripture and tradition—particularly as set forth by TERTULLIAN and CYPRIAN—to assert that the Church has the power from God to forgive all sins committed after baptism. In his first letter to Sympronian occurs the famous phrase “My name is Christian; but my surname, Catholic.” By Catholic he meant the worldwide expansion of the Church, the unity of faith among all its members, and their submission to one supreme head.

Feast: March 9.

Bibliography: Obras, tr. and ed. L. RUBIO FERNÁNDEZ (Barcelona 1958). B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) (Span. ed. 1949) appendix. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 11.2:1718–21. G. MORIN, “Traité inédit de Pacien de Barcelone,” Revue Bénédictine 29 (1912) 1–28; “Un nouvel opuscule de Saint Pacien” ibid., 30 (1913) 286–293. Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 38 (1942) 414–417.

[S. J. MCKENNA]

PACIFICO OF SAN SEVERINO, ST.

Franciscan administrator and mystic; b. San Severino in the Marches of Ancona, Italy, March 1, 1653; d. there, Sept. 24, 1721. A member of the distinguished family of the Divini, he was orphaned at an early age and brought up by an uncle who treated him very harshly. He entered the Observant Franciscans at Forano when he was 17 and was ordained to the priesthood in 1678. He taught philosophy for two years before beginning his preaching career. For eight years he worked with marked success among the poor inhabitants of the Apennine villages. When he was 35, he contracted an illness that left him deaf, blind, and crippled. These infirmities, which he bore with resignation for more than 30 years, did not prevent him from ably performing the duties of vicar and guardian at the Friary of Our Lady of Grace in San Severino where he resided continuously after 1705. He frequently experienced prolonged ecstasies while celebrating Mass, on several occasions displayed the gift of prophecy, and many times miraculously cured the sick. He was beatified by PIUS VI in 1786 and canonized by GREGORY XVI in 1839.

Feast: Sept. 24.

Bibliography: LÉON DE CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of St. Francis, 4 v. (Taunton, Eng. 1885–87) 3:224–229. S. MELCHIORRI, Vita di San Pacifico da San Severino (Rome 1839), C. ORTOLANI, San Pacifico da San Severino (Rome 1929).

[C. J. LYNCH]

PACIFICUS OF NOVARA, BL.

Also known as Pacific of Cerano (Ceredano), Franciscan Observant preacher; b. Ceredano, province of Novara, Italy, c. 1420; d. Sassari, Sardinia, June 4, 1482. After the death of his parents, he was educated by BENE-DICTINES in his native city. In 1445 he joined the FRANCISCAN Order. He was engaged in preaching popular missions in most of the provinces of Italy (1452–71). Appointed apostolic nuncio to Sardinia, he preached the crusade, announced by SIXTUS IV, against Muḥammad II (1480). Shortly after, at the instance of the general chapter of the Observants in Ferrara (1481), he conducted the visitation of the Sardinian friars. In 1473 he prepared a Somma morale, a casuistic manual for confessors, known also as the Somma Pacifica; it was printed in Milan in 1479 and frequently thereafter. His cult was confirmed in 1745.

Feast: June 9; June 8 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:406–407. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (3d ed. Quaracchi-Florence 1931–) 14:190, 306, 375–376. M. CAZZOLA, Il b. Pacifico Ramati (Novara 1882). J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo, 2 v. (Rome 1806; new ed. in 4 v. 1906–36) 2:302. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:506. E. GRAU, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1333. A. L. STOPPA, Il beato fra Pacifico da Cerano (Cerano 1974).

[O. J. BLUM]

PACIFISM

This term admits of no single definition. It can denote a political movement that seeks to eliminate war by inducing all nations to settle their disputes peacefully, but more commonly nowadays it denotes an ideology based on a personal conviction that war is morally unjustifiable. Absolute or doctrinal pacifism condemns all war as immoral; relative or practical pacifism limits its objection to particular wars or forms of war.

Pre-Christian Attitude. The ancient pagan world seems to have regarded war as a natural phenomenon or necessary evil entailed by the struggle for existence, and military service as a duty of citizenship or a burden owed to the sovereign that might bring gain or glory. Buddhism was exceptional among pagan religions in preaching a creed of nonviolence. The historical books of the OT echo with the clash of battles fought in the conquest or defense of the Promised Land, always with the conviction that they were a sacred duty willed by the God of Israel, Lord of Hosts. Jeremiah (27–29) might condemn particular wars, and Isaiah (11.1–9) foretell the reign of the Prince of Peace, but none of the prophets condemned all war as such. The ESSENES, an ascetical Jewish sect dating probably from the 2d century B.C., are said to have repudiated violence, but they were unrepresentative of Israel and are not mentioned in the Bible.

New Testament. The NT message is fundamentally one of peace among men of good will (Lk 2.14), based on brotherhood in Christ and sonship of His Father. Christ indeed warned His disciples that His Gospel would set men at variance: “I have come to bring a sword, not peace” (Mt 10.34); but He Himself blessed the peacemakers, rejected the lex talionis of an eye for an eye, and urged His followers not to resist evildoers, but to turn the other cheek, love their enemies, do good to them that hated them, and pray for them that persecuted and calumniated them (Mt 5.9, 38–39, 44).

That He did not condemn all use of physical force is clear from His use of a whip in driving the merchants from the Temple (Jn 2.14–16). Nor, to judge from his warm commendation of the faith of the centurion (Lk 3.14), did He regard the military profession as an impediment to discipleship. Nevertheless, though He had warned His disciples that they would need swords (Lk 22.36), He would not let them be used to save Him from arrest, and He ordered Peter to sheath the sword with which he had struck the High Priest’s servant, “for all those who take the sword will perish by the sword” (Mt 26.52).

The subsequent attitude of the Apostles to the use of force was similarly qualified. St. Paul wrote: “If it be possible, as far as in you lies, be at peace with all men” (Rom 12.18); yet he acknowledged the right and duty of rulers to wield the sword, as God’s ministers, in defense of the public good (Rom 13.4). So too St. Peter preached

LE PRÉSIDENT DU REICH ALLEMAND, LE PRÉSIDENT DES ÉTATS-UNIS D'AMÉRIQUE, SA MAJESTÉ LE ROI DES BELGES, LE PRÉSIDENT DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE, SA MAJESTÉ LE ROI DE GRANDE-BRETAGNE, D'IRLANDE ET DES TERRITOIRES BRITANNIQUES AU DELÀ DES MERS, EMPEREUR DES INDES, SA MAJESTÉ LE ROI D'ITALIE, SA MAJESTÉ L'EMPEREUR DU JAPON, LE PRÉSIDENT DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE DE POLOGNE, LE PRÉSIDENT DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE TCHÉCOSLOVAQUE, Ayant le sentiment profond du devoir solennel qui leur incombe de développer le bien-être de l'humanité;

Persuadés que le moment est venu de procéder à une franche renonciation à la guerre comme instrument de politique nationale afin que les relations pacifiques et amicales existant actuellement entre leurs peuples puissent être perpétuées;

Convaincus que tous changements dans leurs relations mutuelles ne doivent être recherchés que par des procédés pacifiques et être réalisés dans l'ordre et dans la paix, et que toute Puissance signataire qui chercherait désormais à développer ses intérêts nationaux en recourant à la guerre devra être privée du bénéfice du présent Traité;

Espérant que, encouragés par leur exemple, toutes les autres nations du monde se joindront à ces efforts humanitaires et, en adhérant au présent Traité dès qu'il entrera en vigueur, mettront leurs peuples à même de profiter de ses bienfaites stipulations, unissant ainsi les nations civilisées du monde dans peace (1 Pt 3.8–11), but he baptized the centurion Cornelius without apparently requiring him to seek another profession (Acts 10.47).

The Kellogg-Briand Pact was an agreement originally signed in 1928 by 15 nations whose leaders renounced war as an instrument of national policy. (CORBIS)

Early Christian Position. For the first three centuries of the Christian era, the general exclusion of Christians from public life removed the moral problem of war from the area of their immediate responsibility and concern. Only in regard to service in the imperial forces did a practical case of conscience arise. Many converts continued in fact to serve, and those who left the army seem to have done so in order to avoid being involved in idolatrous practices, or to devote themselves more directly to the service of God, rather than from any conscientious objection to war as such. The problem was never officially solved. Some, like St. Hippolytus (c. 170–c. 236), condemned voluntary military service by Christians (F. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum, Paderborn 1905, 2:97); and, a century later, after the Emperor Licinius had imposed idolatry on all his forces, canon 12 of the First Council of Nicea (325) enacted a severe penalty against Christians who reenlisted in the imperial army; but only Tertullian, writing as a Montanist c. 202 A.D. (De Idololatria, 19), and Lactantius (Divinae Institutiones 6.20) condemned military service outright. None

Quakers read a list of names of those who have died in Vietnam as a protest against America's involvement in the war. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS) of the accepted Fathers of the Church ever adopted this extreme position; and although the episcopate generally discouraged the military career while it involved religious and moral dangers, it ceased to do so after the conversion of Constantine, when these religious and moral dangers were largely removed.

Post-Constantine Tradition. What eventually became the accepted Christian attitude toward war was first established by St. Augustine. His doctrine, as contained in Civ. (19.7, 12, 13, 15), can be summarized as follows: peace is a supreme social good, indispensable to the proper development of man and human institutions; true peace consists, however, not in the mere absence of war, but in the tranquillity of order. It presupposes a just, equitable, and harmonious order of things like and unlike that secures to everyone and everything its due place. War cannot be justified except as a necessary means to the establishment or restoration of this order and of the peace that is its fruit; but it can so be justified because just men may be forced into war by the injustice of others. Nevertheless, war is so monstrous a means to just order that no public authority has the right to undertake it, even for a just cause, unless all peaceful means to an equitable settlement have first been tried in vain.

The conclusion that war can be justified was accepted by subsequent Christian writers of the early Middle Ages, notably by St. Isidore of Seville (Etymologiae, 18.1; Patrologia Latina, 82:639) and by Gratian (Decretum, 23, 1–3); St. Thomas Aquinas was himself content merely to enumerate and to analyse the necessary, conditions, viz, legitimate authority, just cause, and right intention (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 40.1). The outstanding Catholic authorities of later days, Francisco de Vitoria, OP (c. 1485–1546), Francisco de Suárez, SJ (1548–1617), and Louis Taparelli d'Azeglio (1793–1862), underlined or developed certain aspects of this traditional doctrine, but kept its substance intact. Vitoria, by arguing that the right of princes to make war on unjust aggressors was necessary to world order (Relectiones Theologicae 6; De Iure Belli 19; Lyons 1587, 234), implicitly made the exercise of the right dependent on the interests of world order. Taparelli enlarged on this point and drew the conclusion that the right of war of individual states would cease if and when an international society capable of imposing justice came into being (Saggio Teoretico di Diritto Naturale, Prato 1883, 2:198). Suárez rejected the notion that princes have the right to punish injustice anywhere in the universe (De Charitate 13.4.3; Opera Omnia 12, Paris 1858, 744).

Pacifist Sects. Denial of the right of war was limited in effect to a few heretical sects of relatively later date and minor influence. The WALDENSES, who originated in the 12th century, initially condemned all war or taking of human life, but eventually fought in their own self-defense. Certain groups of the 16th-century ANABAPTIST sect, notably the Swiss Brethren and the MENNONITES, likewise advocated pacifism and nonresistance. John Smyth, from whom the English Baptists derive, came under Mennonite influence, but not a few of his religious descendants fought in Cromwell's army. More consistent in their religious opposition to war and military service were and are the Quakers, founded by George Fox in 1668 and established in Pennsylvania by William Penn in 1682. Most of these sects, like the later PLYMOUTH BRETHREN and CHRISTADELPHIANS, were inspired primarily by the desire to return to what they believed to have been the primitive and true form of Christianity, or else to withdraw from a world which they believed to be irretrievably bad; pacifism was a consequence of their religious creed rather than one of its basic tenets.

Modern Developments. Modern pacifism is less closely associated with religious belief. Its adherents are to be found in all the major religious denominations and may belong to none. Some, like Tolstoy (1820–1910), base their philosophy of absolute pacifism on the Sermon on the Mount but without necessarily accepting the divinity of Christ. Others have been inspired by the success of Gandhi's policy of nonviolent resistance in India. With others, pacifism is a matter merely of personal conviction, either in regard to the will of God or in regard to the futility of war as a means to justice. Others see it as a practical policy, either in the form of nonviolence, which will convert aggressors by benevolence, or in the form of passive resistance, which will finally break their will. Others still are pacifist only in the sense that they work unceasingly for an international order in which war will be replaced by arbitration, judicial decision, or, failing these, by international police action. Fruits of their activity may be seen in the international peace congresses that led up to the Hague Convention (1899), the Hague Court (1907), or even the Kellogg Pact (1928), by which the signatory nations formally renounced war as a means of settling international differences.

Since the Second World War, Catholic reflection on pacifism, absolute and relative, has developed in three stages. First, with the advent of the threat of nuclear war, many Catholics adopted a position of relative pacifism. They admitted that a war of national defense against unjust aggression could be justified if the traditionally required conditions were fulfilled, but denied that these could in fact be fulfilled in the modern world, because war had become so violent and indiscriminate that its evil consequences, moral and physical, were bound to outweigh the intended good. Cardinal Ottaviani came close to accepting this position, when he insisted that not even a defensive war may be waged unless the responsible authority is sure of victory and even more sure that the good accruing to the nation outweighs the monstrous evils that will result for itself and the world (Institutiones Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici, Rome 1947, 1.86). Vatican II did not go so far as this, but simply condemned the idea that an act of war, nuclear or not, directed to “the indiscriminate destruction of whole cities or vast areas with their inhabitants” could be acceptable (Gaudium et spes 80). With the decrease in likelihood of nuclear war and the rise of terrorism at the beginning of the third millennium, Catholic thinking about war came to be less dominated by the prospect of “total war.”

Second, the council extended its recognition of pacifism as a legitimate public stance in saying that “it seems just that laws should make humane provision for the case of conscientious objectors who refuse to carry arms, provided they accept some other form of community service” (GS 79; also Catechism of the Catholic Church 2311).

Third, nonviolence has increasingly been promoted not as a simple negative (the absence of violence) but as a positive, practical program that can address some of the causes of war. At the time of Vatican II a number of Catholics, encouraged by John XXIII’s encyclical PACEM IN TERRIS, saw this hope embodied in calls for the development of international structures of cooperation and development: the community of nations organizing itself to address global needs, rather than individual nations pursuating a narrow conception of their own concerns. More generally, the teachers of the Church have highlighted the connection between peace and social justice. In a message, “To Reach Peace, Teach Peace,” issued on the World Day of Peace in 1979, Pope John Paul II outlined seven principles which are fundamental to world peace: human affairs must be dealt with humanely, not with violence; tensions, rivalries and conflicts must be settled by reasonable negotiations; opposing ideologies must confront each other in a climate of dialogue and free discussion; the legitimate interests of particular groups must also take into account the legitimate interest of the other groups involved and of the demands of the higher common good; recourse to arms cannot be considered the right means for settling conflicts; the inalienable human rights must be safeguarded in every circumstance; it is not permissible to kill in order to impose a solution. The pope’s statement reflects a deepened appreciation for the practice of nonviolence both as a method of achieving justice and as a spiritual practice. Vatican II had both recognized and praised those “who renounce the use of violence in the vindication of their rights and who resort to methods of defense which are otherwise available to weaker parties too, provided that this can be done without injury to the rights and duties of others of the community itself” (GS 33). Such statements are not an endorsement of absolute pacifism; however, they call for the development of a form of pacifism that matches the just-war theorist’s concern for the need to protect those threatened by an aggressor.

Moral Appraisal. Despite the legitimacy that has been accorded to pacifism in recent decades, absolute pacifism is still judged irreconcilable with Catholic doctrine. Catholic exegetes likewise commonly reject the pacifist interpretation of Christ’s teaching. His pronouncement on nonresistance to evil is taken as a counsel rather than as a precept, and for private individuals rather than for public authorities, since these latter would fail in an essential duty were they to offer no forceful resistance to violent aggressors from within or without. His warning to those who “take the sword” is commonly understood, as by St. Augustine (Contra Faustum 22.70), to refer to those who usurp the function of rulers, for rulers alone bear the sword as God’s ministers (Rom 13.14). Nor is there any intrinsic contradiction between a just war and Christ’s command that we love our enemies. A just war expresses hatred of the evil deed rather than of the evildoer.

On the other hand, the chief contention of relative pacifism is deduced from accepted Catholic principles. It is the logic of the conclusion that is disputed. No one can deny that the fulfillment of one of the essential conditions of just war (that the intended good shall outweigh the evil entailed) becomes less likely with every increase in the violence and indiscriminate destruction of modern war. Indeed, it is almost impossible to conceive of any merely temporal good that could outweigh the evil consequences of a total nuclear war; and though experience since 1945 has shown that not every modern war need be either total or nuclear, such a conflict remains a serious possibility. It was this consideration that led Pius XII to declare that nothing less than the absolute necessity of self-defense against an unjust aggression threatening the very life or integrity of a state or the essential and inalienable rights of its members can nowadays provide a just cause for war (address, Sept. 30, 1954, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46:589). But Pius XII was equally insistent that “the right to stand on the defensive cannot be denied to any State even today” (address Oct. 3, 1953, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 45:733) and that a situation can arise in which it can legitimately be exercised even against nuclear attack (Christmas message 1956, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 49:19). The immense evils liable to result from it are not demonstrably greater than those that would afflict mankind if force could no longer be used to repel the armed aggression of tyranny.

Whether the repeated calls of Pope John Paul II, the writings of the U.S. bishops (esp. The Challenge of Peace) and the efforts of peace-groups from all traditions can transcend the impasse of the endless argument between pacifists and just-war advocates, between the concerns of justice and those of peace, remains to be seen. A justice-seeking form of nonviolence is less easily accused of naivete toward the reality of sin in this “in between” time of history straining toward the eschaton. The development of such a form of pacifism remains partial at best. And absent an effective proposal for protecting the COMMON GOOD in a nonviolent way, a nation’s recourse to military action against an aggressor must be recognized as legitimate, if the criteria of a just war are met.

See Also: WAR, MORALITY OF; CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION; EPIKEIA.

Bibliography: In addition to the works already cited, R. COSTE, Le problème du droit de guerre dans la pensée de Pie XII (Paris 1962). M. F. SCHELER, L’Idée de paix et le pacifisme (Paris 1953). J. NEWMAN, Studies in Political Morality (Chicago 1963) 69–118. W. J. NAGLE, ed., Morality and Modern Warfare (Baltimore 1960) contains an article by a practical pacifist, G. C. ZAHN, and an excellent bibliography by W. J. BROWN. C. J. CADOUX, The Early Christian Attitude to War (London 1940) non-Catholic pacifist. J. LEWIS, The Case Against Pacifism (London 1940). E. A. RYAN, “Rejection of Military Service by the Early Christians,” Theological Studies 13 (1952) 1–32. J. CHILDRESS, “Moral Discourse About War in the Early Church,” Journal of Religious Ethics 12:1 (1984). J. DWYER, ed., The Catholic Bishops and Nuclear War (Wash. D.C. 1984). S. HAUERWAS, The Peaceable Kingdom (Notre Dame, Ind. 1983). R. HEYER, Nuclear Disarmament: Key Statements of Popes,

Luca Pacioli with mathematical instruments, painting by Jaco Bar, late 15th century. (Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Bishops, Councils and Churches (Mahwah, N.J.) NCCB, The Challenge of Peace: God’s Promise and Our Response (Wash. D.C. 1983). G. SHARP, The Politics of Nonviolent Action (Boston, Mass. 1973). G. A. VANDERHAAR, Christians and Nonviolence in the Nuclear Age (Mystic, Conn. 1982). J. H. YODER, Nevertheless: The Varieties and Shortcomings of Religious Pacifism (Scottsdale, Pa. 1976).

[L. L. MCREAVY/F. X. MEEHAN/EDS.]

PACIOLI, LUCA

Mathematician, Franciscan friar, the great teacher of mathematics in the courts and universities of Renaissance Italy; b. Borgo San Sepolcro, Tuscany, 1445; d. after 1514. His education was provided by the Franciscan Friars, and his writings show that his life was shaped by the reading of his early years. The force and influence of the Humanistic movement also are apparent in his works, into which he introduced theological moralizing, literary reminiscences, scholarly anecdotes, and practical hints. He brought the mathematics of the universities into close relation with that of artists and architects. Pacioli’s great contribution to civilization consisted in unearthing old material on mathematics and systematizing and formulating it with reference to the discovery of general truths and the operation of general laws.

The Summa de arithmetica, geometrica, proportioni et proportionalita (Venice 1494) is the first known published book of Pacioli. The Summa was influenced in a great measure by the Liber Abaci of Leonard of Pisa (1202) and is an extension of the works of JORDANUS DE NEMORE (1236) and JOHN DE SACROBOSCO (1256). The Divina Proportione (Venice 1509) was written in collaboration with Leonardo da Vinci, and is of interest to both artists and mathematicians.

Bibliography: L. PACIOLI, Divine Proportion (Norwalk, CT 2001). R. E. TAYLOR, No Royal Road: Luca Pacioli and His Times (North Stratford, NH 1981). T. A. LEE, A. BISHOP, and R. H. PARKER, eds., Accounting History from the Renaissance to the Present: A Remembrance of Luca Pacioli (New York 1996).

[M. C. ZELLER]

PADEREWSKI, IGNACY JAN

Foremost pianist of his time, composer, premier of Poland (1919–20), signer of the Versailles Treaty (1919); b. Kuryłówka, Poland, Nov. 6, 1860; d. New York City, June 29, 1941. Both his parents, Jan Paderewski, estate administrator, and Polixena (Nowicka) Paderewska, had musical backgrounds. His first wife, Antonia Korsak, died in childbirth, leaving him with an invalid son, Alfred. He married Mme. Helena de Rosen Gorska in 1899. He studied piano and composition privately, at the Warsaw Conservatory (1872–78), and in Berlin, and piano with Leschetizky in Vienna. His pianistic debuts were in Vienna (1887) and in the U.S. (1891) at Carnegie Hall with the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch. He was noted for his performance of music by his compatriot Chopin, whose works he was editing before his death. His compositions include two operas, a symphony, a cantata, three works for solo instrument and orchestra, a violin and piano sonata, 22 songs, and more than 54 piano pieces.

Paderewski donated generously to Polish relief during World War I, and was an architect of Poland's independence at the war's end. After its reenslavement by Hitler he vowed never to return until Poland was again free. In life he was honored by many nations and universities; at his death his body lay in state in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, and was interred in Arlington National Cemetery, a temporary haven granted by President Roosevelt. A bronze marker was placed at the site in 1963 at the instance of President Kennedy.

Bibliography: R. LANDAU, Ignace Paderewski: Musician and Statesman (New York 1934). A. STRAKACZ, Paderewski As I Knew Him, tr. H. CHYBOWSKA (New Brunswick, N.J. 1949). C. R. HALSKI, Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 6:482–484. J. W. HOSKINS, Ignacy Jan Paderewski, 1860–1941: A Biographical Sketch and a Selective List of Reading Materials (Washington D.C. 1984). J. JASIENSKI, ed., Ignacy Jan Paderewski: antologia (Poznan 1996). E. SLIVINSKI LISANDRELLI, Ignacy Jan Paderewski: Polish Pianist and Patriot (Greensboro 1999). M. PERKOWSKA, "Ignacy Jan Paderewski" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 14, ed. S. SADIE, (New York 1980) 73–75. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 660–661. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 1352–1353.

[H. E. MEYERS]

Ignacy Jan Paderewski.

ski, 1860–1941: A Biographical Sketch and a Selective List of Reading Materials (Washington D.C. 1984). J. JASIENSKI, ed., Ignacy Jan Paderewski: antologia (Poznan 1996). E. SLIVINSKI LISANDRELLI, Ignacy Jan Paderewski: Polish Pianist and Patriot (Greensboro 1999). M. PERKOWSKA, "Ignacy Jan Paderewski" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 14, ed. S. SADIE, (New York 1980) 73–75. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 660–661. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 1352–1353.

[H. E. MEYERS]

PADILLA, DIEGO FRANCISCO

Colombian priest, patriot, and pamphleteer; b. Bogotá, Colombia, c. 1754; d. Bojacá, Colombia, April 9, 1829. His parents were Alejo Padilla and Juana Francisca Rico. Diego, who joined the AUGUSTINIANS about 1770, had two brothers in the same order, in addition to four other brothers and three sisters who entered the religious life. Of the ten, Diego was the most gifted; he gained a reputation for erudition, eloquence, and literary skill. A contemporary reported that by 1809 Padilla had published 49 pamphlets (the majority of them anonymous) in defense of religion and of the movement for independence in New Granada. In 1810 he was one of the leading spokesmen for independence and he became a member of the first junta of the revolutionary government. With Manuel Bernardo Álvarez he published a weekly political journal, El aviso al público, that lasted for five months beginning on Sept. 19, 1810. He also founded a similar publication called El sabatino. In 1816, convicted of revolutionary activity by the Spanish authorities, Padilla was sent into exile in Spain. Pardoned on Jan. 15, 1820, he was released from prison and, some months later, at his request, granted permission to return to Colombia. His remaining years were spent in Bojacá where he had previously served as pastor.

Bibliography: M. G. ROMERO, "Participación del clero en la lucha por la independencia," Boletín de historia y antigüedades 49 (1962) 325–344. L. MONROY, "Los Agustinos en el pueblo de Bojacá, Colombia," Archivo agustiniano 56 (1962) 348–397.

[A. J. ENNIS]

PADILLA, JUAN DE

Martyr, missionary; b. Andalusia, Spain, c. 1500; d. c. 1542. He arrived in Mexico in 1528. Little is known of his background, but he had reportedly been a soldier in his youth and had joined the Order of Friars Minor in Spain. He accompanied the expedition of Nuño de Guzmán to New Galicia in 1529 and 1530. He went to Tehuantepec in 1533 to join an expedition that Hernando Cortez planned to send to the Orient. When the expedition did not materialize, he served in the Indian missions of Poncitlan and Tuchpán and founded the Franciscan friaries of Zapotlan and Tamazula. He also was superior at Tulantzingo. In 1540 Padilla joined Francisco Vázquez de Coronado's expedition to New Mexico. On the way north he was in the vanguard of the expedition with the exploratory groups. He went with Capt. Pedro de Tovar to the Hopi pueblos in July and August 1540; with Capt. Pedro de Alvarado across western New Mexico to the Rio Grande pueblos in August and September 1540; with Don Lope de Urrea to Pecos in the summer of 1541; and with Coronado's select team in the final dash to Quivira. When Coronado returned to Mexico in 1542, Padilla stayed behind to work among the Indians. In the spring of 1542 he set out for Quivira, accompanied by two Indian assistants, a Portuguese named Andrés do Campo, a few personal servants, and some Wichita braves from Quivira. He was well received among the Quivirans, but during a visit to another tribe he was attacked and killed by strange Indians. Do Campo and the two Indian assistants escaped and, after several years of wandering, reached Mexico to tell their story. The first priest to be martyred on what became U.S. soil, Padilla is commemorated on November 30.

[F. WARREN]

PADILLA Y ESTRADA, IGNACIO DE

Augustinian bishop; b. Mexico City, 1695; d. Mérida, Yucatán, July 20, 1760. His family held high social position; his grandparents were the Oidor Juan de Padilla Guardiola y Guzmán and Jerónima Cisneros; his parents, Juan Ildefonso Padilla Cisneros and Micaela Gregoria Estrada. Apparently he used various combinations of these names during his lifetime. After joining the Augustinians, he dedicated his life to study and preparation for an ascetic life. He received the doctorate in theology at the University of Mexico, then taught philosophy and theology at the Colegio of San Pablo, where he soon became rector. He held a number of offices: secretary of the province, visitor of the convents of Guadalajara and Havana, and prior of the convent in Mexico City. He was sent to Rome as a representative of the province, and was in Spain in 1743 on his way back to America when he was nominated archbishop of Santo Domingo. After consecration in Madrid, he arrived in Santo Domingo in 1745, where he undertook the reformation of the clergy and the rebuilding of churches, restoring the cathedral and opposing the destruction of the Jesuit college. He refused the bishopric of Guatemala in 1751 and that of Popayán in 1752, but finally accepted that of Mérida, Yucatán, in 1753. There he reformed the seminary, providing it with a new constitution and with an enlarged building; he endowed three chairs and brought in professors from Mexico to fill them. At his own expense he set up ten scholarships in the seminary for children of the poor and of the indigenous people. He stressed the welfare of the indigenous people in many ways and supported, with his interest and his money, hospitals for them.

[E. RODRÍGUEZ-DEMORIZI]

PADRE PIO (FRANCESCO FORGIONE), ST.

Capuchin-Franciscan priest, stigmatic; b. Pietrelcina, Italy, May 25, 1887; d. San Giovanni Rotondo, Italy, Sept. 23, 1968.

From early childhood he exhibited a spiritual sensitivity bordering on mysticism. Later, he confided to his spiritual director that at the age of five he thought of consecrating himself to God forever, a desire that he felt materialized when he entered the Capuchin-Franciscan Order. In his formative years as a Capuchin, physical ill-health and encounters with the devil plagued the quiet, gentle, and reserved friar.

After his ordination to the priesthood in 1910, his life was relatively uneventful, except for a brief stint—six weeks—in the medical corps of the Italian Army during World War I. He received a medical discharge after mistakenly being considered a deserter.

In 1918, he was officially assigned to the friary at San Giovanni Rotondo and in September of that year he was first gifted with the visible phenomenon of the stigmata. When the Vatican and the Capuchin Order intervened to ascertain the facts concerning the stigmata, Padre Pio had to face suspicion, embarrassment, and disciplinary action in addition to his crosses of ill-health and demonic affliction. Considerable controversy arose among doctors and the clergy over the natural and supernatural aspects of his stigmata.

The Vatican began its investigation by forbidding Padre Pio to say Mass publicly. This action by the Holy See combined with rumors that Padre Pio would be transferred from San Giovanni Rotondo stirred violent riots by the townspeople resulting in 14 deaths and 80 injuries. As a result, in 1920 Church authorities imposed restrictions that were to last 13 years on his public activities. Through it all Padre Pio remained obedient and compliant. Finally in 1933, Pius XI lifted the ban telling the friar's archbishop: "I have not been badly disposed toward Padre Pio, but I have been badly informed about Padre Pio."

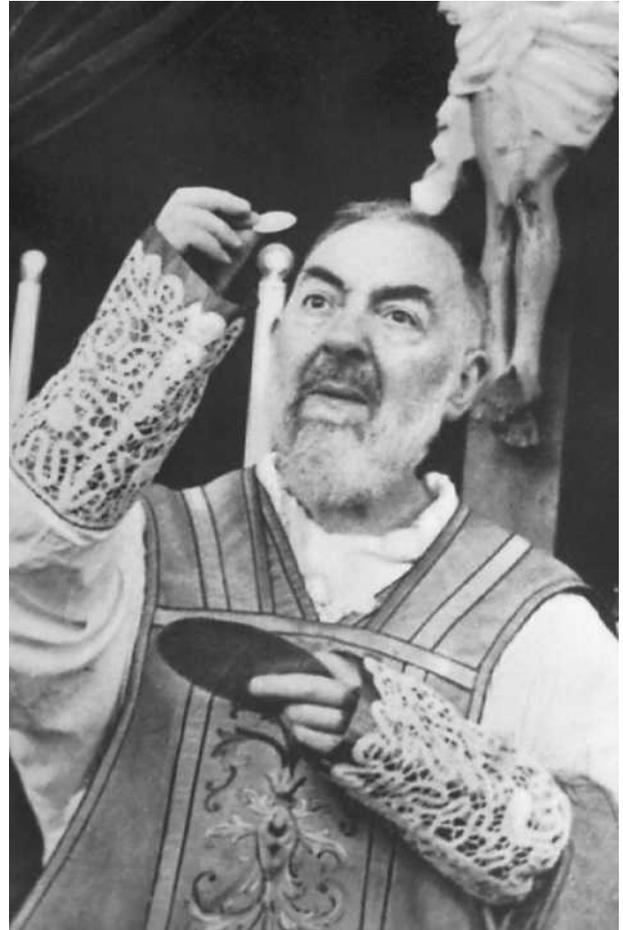

For 50 years Padre Pio never left San Giovanni Rotondo; yet his influence was felt everywhere as the world flocked to him for spiritual favors. Aside from saying Mass, preaching, hearing confessions, and being a victim of Christ's suffering, he did nothing extraordinary except for the creation of one mighty monument: Padre Pio's hospital, Casa Sollievo della Sofferenza, which was the result of his zeal and inspiration. After his death in 1968, the impact of his life, sanctity, and spirituality remained a powerful influence on the faithful and on the Church.

On the occasion of the centenary of Padre Pio's birth (1987), Pope John Paul II visited the tomb of the Capuchin stigmatic and paid him this tribute: ". . . as a religious he generously lived out the ideal of the Capuchin friars, just as he lived out the ideal of the priest. . . . Were not the altar and the confessional the two poles of his life? This priestly witness contains a message as valid as it is timely."

Padre Pio was beatified by Pope John Paul II on May 2, 1999, and canonized on June 16, 2002. His legacy includes nearly 3,000 prayer groups comprised of about 500,000 members.

Feast: May 25.

Bibliography: PADRE PIO DA PIETRELCINA, Epistolario-Corrispondeza con le Figlie Spirituali (1915–1922) (San Giovanni Rotondo 1977); Epistolario-Corrispondenza con i Direttori Spirituali (1910–1922) (San Giovanni Rotondo 1971); Vita di Padre Pio

Padre Pio celebrating Mass, San Giovanni Rotondo, Italy, 1964. (AFP/CORBIS)

attraverso le lettere, ed. A. MOTTA (Milan 1995). P. TREECE, Meet Padre Pio (Ann Arbor, Mich. 2001). G. PREZIUOSO, The Life of Padre Pio, tr. and ed. J. AUMANN (New York 2000). F. CONTESSA, Padre Pio: Venerable—December 18, 1997, Blessed—May 2, 1999, Saint (New York 1999). FRANCISCAN FRIARS OF THE IMMACULATE, Padre Pio: The Wonder Worker (New Bedford, Mass. 1999). E. MALATESTA, La vera storia di Padre Pio: l'unica biografia completa con i documenti segreti esclusi nel processo di beatificazione (Casale Monferrato 1999); I miracoli che hanno fatto santo Padre Pio, with A. AMATI (Casale Monferrato 1998). S. M. MANELLI, Padre Pio of Pietrelcina (New Bedford, Mass. 1999). A. PRONZATO, Padre Pio da Pietrelcina: mistero glorioso (Milan 1999). R. ALLEGRI, Padre Pio: un santo tra noi (Milan 1998); Il catechismo di Padre Pio (Milan 1996); A tu per tu con Padre Pio (Milan 1995), Eng. tr. Padre Pio: A Man of Hope (Ann Arbor, Mich. 2000); I miracoli di padre Pio (Milan 1993). G. SCARALE, Padre Pio nel cuore (Milan 1998). D. M. GAUDIOSE, Mary's House: Mary Pyle, Under the Spiritual Guidance of Padre Pio (New York 1993); Prophet of the People (New York 1974). J. A. SCHUG, A Padre Pio Profile (Petersham, Mass. 1987); Padre Pio (Huntington, Ind. 1976). C. RUFFIN, Padre Pio: The True Story (Huntington, Ind. 1982). J. MCCAFFERY, The Friar of San Giovanni (London 1978; Garden City, N.Y. 1981); Tales of Padre Pio (Kansas City 1979). G. PAGNOSSIN, Il Calvario di Padre Pio, 2 v. (Padova 1978). G.

A statuette of a woman used in pagan ceremonies. (©Phil Schermeister/CORBIS)

FESTA, Misteri di Scienza e Luci di Fede, le Stigmate Padre Pio da Pietrelcina (Rome 1938).

[S. F. MIKLAS]

PAGAN

A term now used in a religious sense to designate a person who is not a Christian, Jew, or Muslim. How the Latin word paganus, from which it comes, acquired the meaning of non-Christian is still not entirely settled. In profane Latin of the 1st century A.D., paganus was used in two senses: first, in the meaning of “rural” to describe the inhabitant of a pagus, or country district; second, in the sense of “civil” or “civilian,” in contrast to the “military.” It was long assumed that the Christians eventually adopted the term paganus to designate a non-Christian, either because the inhabitants of country districts resisted conversion to Christianity or because the Christian was a miles Christi, “a soldier of Christ,” and therefore to be distinguished in a religious sense from the non-Christian civilian. It is significant, however, that the Christians did not adopt the term paganus in the meaning of non-Christian before the age of Constantine. They commonly employed the terms of scriptural origin—

nationes, gentilis, and ethnicus. With paganism still so strong in urban centers, especially in the West, there was no reason for making a sharp distinction between urban and rural conditions and for adopting a term for non-Christian that would apply primarily, if not exclusively, to rural areas. However when, in the course of the 4th century, Christians became more numerous and increasingly conscious of their own solidarity and social and religious prestige, the analogy of the contrast between paganus and militaris undoubtedly suggested the employment of the word as an appropriate designation, but not necessarily a derogatory one, for non-Christians as profane persons, outsiders, not members of the Christian community. The term, incidentally, seems to have had a history of popular usage before it was given literary and official sanction, for St. Augustine speaks of “gentiles vel iam vulgo usitato vocabulo paganos” (Epist. 184 bis 3, 5). It is first employed officially in a rescript of Valentinian I of the year A.D. 370 (Codex Theodosianus 14.2.18).

Bibliography: J. ZEILLER, Paganus: Étude de terminologie historique (Paris 1917); “Paganus: Sur l’origine de l’acceptation religieuse du mot,” Comptes rendus de l’Acad. des Insc. et Belles Lettres (Paris 1940) 526–543. C. MOHRMANN, “Encore une fois: ‘Paganus,’” Vigiliae christianae 6 (Amsterdam 1952) 109–121, the best treatment, and with pertinent bibliography. E. BICKEL, “‘Paganus’: Kaiserambeter in den Laren-Kapellen der ‘pagi urbani’ im Rom Neros und des Apostels Petrus,” Rheinisches Museum für Philologie 97 (1954) 1–47.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

PAGE, ANTHONY, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1563 at Harrow-on-the-Hill, Middlesex, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, April 20, 1593. The well-born Anthony Page studied at Christ College at Oxford (1581–1584) and the English College at Rheims (1584–91), where he was ordained, Sept. 21, 1591. He was sent on the English Mission, but immediately arrested and condemned for being a priest. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924), I, no. 98. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

Ruins of Temples of Jupiter and Bacchus, ca. 10–249 A.D., Baalbek, Lebanon. (©Roger Wood/CORBIS)

PAGNINI, SANTES

Also known as Pagninus or Pagnino, philologist and biblical scholar; b. Lucca, Tuscany, Oct. 18, 1470; d. Lyons, France, Aug. 24, 1536. He entered the Dominican order on Feb. 16, 1487, at Fiesole (near Florence), where one of his early masters was Girolamo SAVONAROLA. Florence at that time was a center for Oriental studies, and Pagnini displayed a facility in this field. He was elected prior several times (e.g., at Pistoia 1502, Florence 1504, Lucca 1508) and gained a reputation for sanctity as well as for learning. Called to Rome by Leo X, he taught Oriental studies there until 1521. Adrian VI named him apostolic preacher and master of sacred theology. In 1524 he went to Lyons, where he fought successfully against the Waldensian and Lutheran heresies, and where appeared the most important of his several publications, the Veteris et Novi Testamenti nova translatio (1528), a Latin translation of the Bible from the original texts. The fruit of 25 years of labor, it was the first Latin translation of the Hebrew Bible since that of St. Jerome and the first Bible in which all the verses were numbered, chapter by chapter, a notation still in use in modern Bibles. Whatever the translation's defects, all admit its faithfulness in rendering the original idiom, and many concede that it influenced the English versions of the OT through the use made of it by the early Protestants.

Bibliography: J. D. GAUTHIER, "Santes Pagninus, O.P.," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 7 (1945) 175–190. Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 4.2:1949–50.

[A. SMITH]

PAIDEIA, CHRISTIAN

The system of education in the faith that the early Christians created through a combination of the Biblical revelation and the cultural patterns suggested by Hellenistic literature and philosophy. It had as its objective the

The weathered stones of a fifth-century Christian basilica are scattered among the ruins of Dodona, an ancient Greek site dedicated to the god Zeus. (©Wolfgang Kaehler/CORBIS) achieving of the wisdom of God, through a spiritual formation under the divine Pedagogue, the Logos, or the Word of God. The paideia looked to the formation of character and appreciation of values as much as it did to imparting knowledge or information. Its final aim was the true GNOSIS, or Christian philosophy, whose end was the imitation of Christ.

Development to Clement of Alexandria. The early Church provided detailed instruction for catechumens and clergy but did not think of creating a separate educational system for children. In the secular schools the Christian child pursued the enkyklios paideia, the all-round culture of Hellenism that the Romans called humanitas and studied in the trivium and quadrivium. Religious development was provided, outside this classical training, mainly in the family circle and in the Church.

The expression Christian paideia was first used in the Epistle of CLEMENT I of Rome (1 Cor. 21.6, 8; cf. 16.5; 35.8; 56.2, 16). Like St. Paul, the author stressed that the young should be subject to parental formation and discipline. POLYCARP bade husbands teach their wives “to train their children in the knowledge and fear of God” (Ad Phil. 4.2). The Shepherd of HERMAS also insisted on family sanctification through discipline and training (Vis. 1.3.1–2; 2.3.1).

Since Homer and pagan mythology formed the basis of secular paideia, it presented dangers to the faith of Christians. But to shun the schools was impossible, as even TERTULLIAN admitted: “How can we reject profane studies, without which religious studies are impossible?” (De idol. 10.4). But he banned Christians from teaching in the schools, and his basic opposition to Hellenism was expressed in his frequently quoted: “What has Athens to do with Jerusalem; the Academy with the Church?” (Praescrip. 7). TATIAN, the Syrian, was even more uncompromising in regard to pagan learning. For him the grammarians were idle prattlers (Orat. 26), and he turned his back on Greek paideia to become a professor of the philosophy of the barbarians. He found the Scriptures unpretentious in their language but too old and divine to be compared with the erroneous opinions of the Greeks (Orat. 29). Tatian had been a pupil of the more liberal JUSTIN MARTYR at the latter's school in Rome, where Christianity was offered as the true philosophy.

By the end of the 2nd century the catechumenal schools seem to have taken final form. Here the bishop or his delegate gave elaborate instructions preceding baptism; examples of these courses of instruction survive in the Great Catechism of GREGORY OF NYSSA, the Catecheses of CYRIL OF JERUSALEM and of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, and in the De catechizandis rudibus of St. AUGUSTINE. These schools contributed to the intellectual formation of candidates for Baptism, but their main function was to impart doctrinal, ascetical, and liturgical training, with the Scriptures as the basic text.

The catechetical schools offered more advanced instruction in the Christian way of life; provided protection against the immorality and persecutorial attacks of pagan adversaries; and deepened the knowledge of the faith for the neophytes. The most famous of these was the school of Alexandria. While Pantaenus and Clement of Alexandria evidently lectured on the Christian doctrines, it is only with Origen that the school acquired its official, ecclesiastical standing. Its pupils were adults in the process of conversion; and under Origen's direction the elementary catechesis came to be delegated to Heraclas, and Origen devoted himself to advanced philosophy and exegesis.

The Major Roles of Clement and Origen. For CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 200), paideia was the most excellent and perfect possession in life, a useful propaedeutic for the appreciation of the word of the Lord (Paid. 1.5.16; Strom. 1.5). His indebtedness to Greek classical authors, poets, and philosophers is obvious on every page. He had a decided predilection for Plato but was actually eclectic, regarding all of Greek philosophy as a guide to Christ, the best of educators (Strom. 2.2). His Paidagogos is the first complete educational treatise that combines pagan learning and cultural patterns with Christian theological thought and the sacramental way of life. It gives a minute description of the Christian's day, beginning with the main meal in the evening, and discusses every phase of his life.

Origen urged GREGORY THAUMATURGUS "to extract from the philosophy of the Greeks what may serve as a course of study or a preparation for Christianity, and even from geometry and astronomy what would serve to explain the Sacred Scriptures, in order that all that the sons of philosophy are wont to say about geometry and music, grammar, rhetoric, and astronomy, as fellow helpers of philosophy, may be said about philosophy itself in relation to Christianity." Thus he regarded all secular subjects as "ladders to reach the sky"; and his students were expected to be familiar with every aspect of Hellenic knowledge as a preparation for their study of Scripture. Origen taught at Alexandria from 212 to 231 and thereafter at Caesarea until his death. During the 4th century the Church Fathers in the various areas where the Church was well established used their secular education as a background for developing the Church's understanding of divine revelation.

The Golden Age of Christian Paideia in the East.

The Cappadocian Fathers made important contributions. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, in his Panegyric on Basil, spoke for both of them when he said: "As we have compounded healthful drugs from reptiles, so from secular literature we have received principles of inquiry and speculation, while we have rejected their idolatry, terror, and pit of destruction." BASIL of Caesarea, a friend of the pagan orator Libanius and an impeccable Greek stylist, elaborated on the utility of Greek literature properly used for the educated Christian in his To Young Men, on How They Might Profit from Pagan Literature. His Monastic Rules also was important in shaping an erudite monasticism. Gregory of Nazianzus in his Invective Orations against Julian [the Apostate] severely castigated that Emperor for his efforts to exclude Christians from higher education. In virtue of a decree of Julian on June 17, 362 (CodTheod 13.3.5), Christian teachers had either to abandon Christianity and return to belief in the pagan gods or cease to teach. MARIUS VICTORINUS had to quit his professorship of rhetoric at Rome, and many grammarians, rhetors, and even professors of medicine were affected; but the decree was rescinded by Julian's successor (364).

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM is the outstanding writer on pedagogy among the Fathers. Of especial importance is his De inani gloria et de educandis liberis, which deplors the lack of religious and moral training in an age that devoted so much energy to training in the arts, in literature, and in rhetoric. He reminded parents that they were bringing up "a philosopher, and a champion, and a citizen of Heaven."

Christian Paideia in the West. In the West the study of Greek declined in the 4th century; but the great Christian writers, such as LACTANTIUS, HILARY OF POITIERS, AMBROSE, JEROME, and Augustine, were masters of the rhetorical culture of their time. They derived their knowledge of Greek philosophy mainly from Latin sources, especially Cicero. Ausonius, however, spoke of "Greek grammarians" in his native Bordeaux, who used Homer as the first text (5.46) in their instruction.

Jerome studied under the famed grammaticus Donatus, and he himself expounded Vergil, the comedians, lyric poets, and historians during his sojourn in Bethlehem. Two of his letters (Epist. 107, 128) deal with the education of girls dedicated to God's service. Letter 22 gives an account of his famous dream in which he heard the Judge's condemnation, Ciceronianus es, non Christianus, and he asked rhetorically, Quid facit cum psalterio Horatius? Cum evangelii Maro? Cum apostolo Cicero? But it is clear from his subsequent writings that his studies of the sacred writers did not exclude a continued interest in the classical.

According to St. Augustine, the Christian writer should despoil pagan literature as the Jews despoiled the Egyptians when they were leaving Egypt; the gold and silver in the writings of pagans are not their own but are dug out of the mines of God's providence and more properly belong to the follower of Christ when he has abandoned paganism. The arts in secular learning are a help in understanding the Scriptures (Doct. Christ. 2.16.28). His De beata vita ushered in the birth of Western Christian philosophy and a renewal of paideia under Christian auspices. Among later writers, Boethius, with his Consolation of Philosophy, integrated a wealth of classical learning and pagan philosophy with an apparently orthodox Christianity; Cassiodorus's Institutes was devoted to an encyclopedic treatment of sacred and profane knowledge; GREGORY I the Great scorned literary niceties and endorsed monastic education and a new, specifically Christian education that rejected the classical and emphasized home training and moral formation; Martianus Capella and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE handed on the tradition of paideia to the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: H. FUCHS, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1970) 2:350–362, with bibliog. F. X. PORTMANN, Die göttliche Paidagogia bei Gregor von Nazianz (St. Ottilien 1954). P. PETIT, Les Étudiants de Libanius (Paris 1956). H. HAGENDAHL, Latin Fathers and the Classics (Göteborg 1958). M. L. W. LAISTNER, Christianity and Pagan Culture in the Later Roman Empire (Ithaca, N.Y. 1951). M. TESTARD, Saint Augustin et Cicéron, 2 v. (Paris 1958). A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Antioch païenne et chrétienne (Paris 1959). J. FONTAINE, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique, 2 v. (Paris 1959). E. L. FORTIN, Christianisme et culture philosophique au V(e) siècle (Paris 1959). H. I. MARROU, A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB from 3d Fr. ed. (New York 1956); ed. and tr., Clément d'Alexandrie: Le Pédagogue, v.1 (Sources Chrétiennes 70; 1960). W. BARCLAY, Educational Ideals in the Ancient World (London 1959). W. W. JAEGER, Early Christianity and Greek Paideia (Cambridge, Mass. 1961). P. RICHÉ, Éducation et culture dans l'Occident barbare, VI(e)–VIII(e) siècles (Paris 1962). E. KEVANE, Augustine the Educator (Westminster, Md. 1964).

[T. P. HALTON]

PAINE, JOHN, ST.

English martyr; b. Peterborough, date unknown; d. Chelmsford, Essex, April 2, 1582. His family was probably Protestant, but the time and circumstances of his conversion are unchronicled. He entered Douai College in 1574 to study for the priesthood and was for a time made bursar of the college; this indicates that he had some experience in stewardship, probably as a servant of the Shelley family at Stondon Hall in Essex. While he was at Douai, he saw a vision of the figure of Christ rising from the Sacrament during the Elevation. This vision was the subject of the Bosworth Burse now in Leicester Museum. On April 7, 1576, Paine was ordained, and a few days later he set out for England with (St.) Cuthbert MAYNE. Paine made his way to Ingatestone Hall in Essex, where the old, widowed Lady Petre lived, an uncompromising Catholic. Here he remained in the guise of a steward until about February 1577 or earlier, when he was arrested and, for a brief time, imprisoned. After a visit to Douai he returned to Ingatestone some time before June 1578. He continued to work there until the middle of July 1581, when he was betrayed into the hands of George (Judas) Elliot, Edmund CAMPION's captor, at Haddon in Oxfordshire. He was examined before Walsingham at Greenwich, then sent to the Tower and racked several times. In March 1582 he was taken to the dungeons of Colchester castle to await trial. He was charged with conspiracy against Queen Elizabeth and was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. When offered his liberty if he would change his religion, he told the officials "to stop their foolish babbling." The sentence was carried out at Chelmsford on April 2, 1582. After praying, he protested that "his feet did never tread, his hands did never write, nor did his wit ever invent any treason against her majesty." Since he was so well known and loved in the district, the crowd would not allow the hangman to cut him down and disembowel him until he was dead. He was beatified by Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886 and canonized on Oct. 25, 1970 (see ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF).

Feast: April 2; May 4; Oct. 25.

Bibliography: W. ALLEN, A Briefe Historie of the Glorious Martyrdom of Twelve Reverend Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN, 2 v. (St. Louis 1908). B. C. FOLEY, Blessed John Paine (Postulation pamphlet; London 1961). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:16–17. B. CAMM, Lives of the English Martyrs, 2 v. (New York 1904–05).

[G. FITZHERBERT]

PAINE, THOMAS

Journalist and pamphleteer whose political writings influenced American opinion in favor of independence, and whose popular tracts on Deism attacked organized religion; b. Thetford, Norfolk, England, Jan. 29, 1737; d. New York City, June 8, 1809. His early religious training was in his mother's Anglican faith; his father was a Quaker artisan, and young Paine served his apprenticeship in his shop. He was later employed as a staymaker, opened his own shop (1759), and became a customs officer (1764). Paine found his true calling in 1772, when he wrote The Case of the Officers of Excise, a plea for higher wages printed for distribution to Parliament by a subscription raised among his fellow customs officers. Discharged from his post, he immigrated to Philadelphia, Pa., in 1774; there he edited the Pennsylvania Magazine, contributing articles to its columns. He published a plea for the abolition of the slave trade and joined an antislavery society (1775), but his political views did not find expression until Common Sense (1776) issued a spirited demand for independence from Great Britain. Although the ideas he expressed were in no sense original, the influence of Common Sense in shaping public opinion was immense. Unlike earlier pamphleteers, Paine did not argue abstract truths but struck at George III and the whole British constitution. Paine's Hobbesian view of government was modified by a Lockean approach to society, but his isolationist view of America's role in world affairs owed little to literary sources. He served briefly as brigade major with Gen. G. Washington's army and began to write The American Crisis on a drumhead during the retreat across New Jersey. The Crisis appeared in 13 numbered pamphlets issued between 1776 and 1783.

In 1781 he visited France as secretary to an American mission and in 1782 was formally hired as a publicist for the Continental Congress; he later served the French embassy in the same capacity. Always interested in practical science, Paine invented an improved bridge and visited France again in 1787 to promote it. The French foreign office subsidized his Prospects on the Rubicon (1787) on Anglo-French relations, while he divided his time between London and Paris. As a reply to Edmund Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, he issued The Rights of Man, rejecting theories of rule by a priesthood or an aristocracy as based on superstition or force and arguing in favor of democracy with its basis in reason and the free consent of individual citizens. Any theory looking to the past is to be rejected, since every generation must act for itself and has no power to bind posterity. His positive suggestions for reform appeared in the second part of The Rights of Man (1792).

The French Assembly made him an honorary citizen in 1792 and shortly thereafter he was elected to the Convention. He took his seat, but his opposition to the execution of Louis XVI and his association with the Girondists led to his arrest and imprisonment in 1793. With the help of James Monroe he was released in 1794 and restored to his post as a deputy. The Age of Reason was still in manuscript at Paine's arrest; it appeared in 1794, offering the classic explanation of Deism and attacking the Bible and Christianity. Stating his belief in God and humanity, he argued that Christ did not found a religion, but called men to the practice of moral virtues and belief in one God; thus for him Christianity was the invention of myth-makers. Large segments of the work dealt with rather pedestrian scriptural criticism. Bishop Richard Watson of Llandaff wrote a refutation in 1796, and Paine was engaged in writing a lengthy reply until shortly before his return to America in 1802. He was closely associated with Elihu Palmer in promoting Deism and wrote articles for Palmer's monthly, the Prospect, from 1804 to 1805. In 1807 he published a critical pamphlet on the New Testament.

Thomas Paine, photograph of painting by Romney.

Bibliography: Complete Writings, ed. P. S. FONER, 2 v. (New York 1945), with biog. essay. G. VALE, The Life of Thomas Paine (New York 1841). M. D. CONWAY, Life of Thomas Paine, 2 v. (New York 1892). A. O. ALDRIDGE, Man of Reason (Philadelphia 1959). H. M. MORRIS, Deism in 18th Century America (New York 1960). G. A. KOCH, Republican Religion: The American Revolution and the Cult of Reason (New York 1933).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

Music manuscript page from "Duetto Comico," by Giovanni Paisiello, 1774. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

PAISIELLO, GIOVANNI

Church and opera composer of early classical style; b. Taranto, Italy, May 9, 1740; d. Naples, June 5, 1816. As a youth he studied at the conservatory of S. Onofrio in Naples; he then taught there while composing his first music. At first he wrote only sacred music, but later he became extremely successful in opera, composing more than 100 works in this form. He spent eight years (1776–84) at the court of Catherine II at St. Petersburg, Russia, producing there his most famous opera, The Barber of Seville (1782). He later held the post of maestro di cappella at the court of Naples until he left in 1799 for political reasons. He was Napoleon's favorite composer and became his maître de chapelle in Paris 1802; but after an unsuccessful struggle to please the Paris public, he resumed his position at Naples under Joseph Bonaparte a year later. His sacred music includes, among other works, 30 Masses with orchestra; several Masses for varying combinations; a Requiem scored for two choruses, orchestra, and organ; 40 motets; a Miserere; a Magnificat; and an oratorio on the Passion. Like his operas, these have the florid arias and grandiose choruses of the period, but also reveal the natural melodic beauty that characterizes his best work.

Bibliography: A. LOEWENBERG, "Paisiello's and Rossini's Barbiere di Siviglia," Music and Letters 10 (London 1939) 157–167. H. V. F. SOMERSET, "Giovanni Paisiello," ibid. 18 (1937) 20–35. A. MONDOLFI, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 10:639–647. J. L. HUNT, "The Life and Keyboard Works of Giovanni Paisiello (1740–1816)" (Ph.D. diss. University of Michigan, 1973). K. B. MOHR, "Giovanni Paisiello's Gli astrologi immaginari: An Urtext Edition" (Ph.D. diss. Florida State University, 1969). D. POULTNEY, "Giovanni Paisiello" in International Dictionary of Opera, 2 v. ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993) 979–982. S. WILLIER, "Nina, ossia La Pazza per amore (Nina, or Mad for Love)" ibid., 936–37. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996). M. F. ROBINSON, "Giovanni Paisiello" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 14:97–102. M. F. ROBINSON and U. HOFMANN, Giovanni Paisiello (1740–1816), A Thematic Catalogue of His Music, Vol. 1: The Dramatic Works

(Hillsboro 1991). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992).

[W. C. HOLMES]

PAKISTAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Pakistan is located in South Asia, bordered by India on the east, Iran and Afghanistan on the west, and China on the north. The population consists of five principal ethnic communities: Punjabi (55 percent of the population); Sindhi (20 percent); Pashtun (Pathan) (10 percent); Mujahir (immigrants from India at the time of the 1947 partition of India and Pakistan) (10 percent); and Baloch (5 percent). Pakistan attained independence from British rule on August 14, 1947, when the predominantly Muslim areas of India— West Punjab, Sindh, Baluchistan, the Northwest Frontier and East Bengal—were united to form the new country. Conceived as a homeland for Muslims of India, with non-Muslims equal citizens, the secular vision of the founder, Muhammad Ali Jinnah, was altered soon after his death. In 1956 the country was proclaimed an Islamic republic and Islam became the state religion. Continuing ethnic and civil strife between West and East Pakistan developed into a full-blown civil war in 1971, resulting in the independence of Bangladesh, the former East Pakistan. Islam has been promoted by successive martial law regimes as a way of legitimating their rule. In recent years this has led to ethnic and sectarian violence among Muslims and discriminatory and repressive laws against minorities.

Early Christian Presence. Pakistan is the site of the ancient Indus civilization (2,600 BC) and the northern areas formed part of the ancient Silk Route, which gave birth to the Buddhist Gandhara civilization in Swat (200 BC–200 AD). St. Thomas the Apostle was reputed to have passed through Taxila, near present-day Rawalpindi on his way to India. Though this cannot be verified, the presence of Christian communities in the area as early as the third century does witness to early activities. Along the Silk Route, two Assyrian Church of the East (Nestorian) crosses have been discovered and the Gilgit cross was found in a place (Kunodas) known to be an ancient burial place. A 7th century cross has been found near Chilas.

No permanent work resulted from the visits of these early Christians. In 1569 Jesuit missionaries from GOA, Frs. Monserrat and Acquaviva, arrived at the court of Akbar in Lahore. They were favored and accompanied the emperor to his residence at Fatehpur Sikri. After fourteen years of unsuccessful endeavors, they left the Moghul court in 1583. A second mission in 1583 and a Capital: Islamabad.

Size: 310,403 sq. miles.

Population: 141,553,775 in 2000.

Religions: Sunni Islam (76%), Shi'a Islam (20%), Christians (2%), Hindus (1%). The remaining 1% consists of small communities of Parsee, Baha'i, Buddhists, Sikh and tribal religionists.

Metropolitan Sees: Karachi, with suffragan Hyderabad; Lahore, with suffragans Faisalabad, Islamabad-Rawalpindi, and Multan.

third in 1594 were both fruitful. By 1597 there was a large church in Lahore and in 1604 the emperor allowed all his subjects to embrace Christianity. More priests arrived from Goa and began publishing in Persian books on the history and teaching of Christianity. Akbar's grandson, Shahjahan, proved less friendly and, in 1650, ordered the destruction of the Lahore church. The Catholic population of Lahore at that time comprised three distinct communities: the Europeans (mostly Portuguese), the Armenians and Indian converts. In 1606 they numbered about 50. By 1714, quite a number of the soldiers were Christian. During this time, Lahore was the center for various missionary expeditions to Kafiristan (present day Chitral in Pakistan and Nuristan in Afghanistan). These lasted from 1587 until 1700. After this the number of Jesuits began to decrease. By 1750 the Christian soldiers had no resident priest and by 1752 the soldiers themselves were deported to Kabul by the invading king, Ahmed Shah. In this same period of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries some Augustinians and Carmelites from Bombay and Goa evangelized Sindh near the Portuguese factories of Thatta but little is known of their activities and work ceased with the persecution of 1672. It was not begun again until after the conquest of Sindh by the British in 1842.

The Beginnings of the Modern Church. The beginnings of the present-day Catholic Church in Pakistan can be traced to the annexation of the Punjab by the British in 1846 and to services provided to those Christians who were British citizens, civil and military, as well as to immigrants from the southern provinces of India. To meet this need, Capuchins came from Agra to Lahore, and Carmelites and Jesuits from Bombay to Sindh and Baluchistan. To this day many important administrative and railway centers have as a colonial legacy at least three churches in every military cantonment, one Anglican, one Presbyterian and one Catholic. Lahore became an apostolic vicariate in 1855 and in 1886 a diocese. The northwestern provinces of Kashmir and Kafiristan were constituted into an apostolic prefecture entrusted to the Mill Hill Fathers, headquartered in Rawalpindi, in 1887.

Sindh and Baluchistan remained under the jurisdiction of Bombay.

Until 1890, the Church restricted itself mostly to the service of foreigners. Subsequently, demands from mainly lower-caste Hindus desiring closer contact with the Church in the Lahore-Sialkot area led to the development of the Pakistani Catholic Church. Over 80 percent of all Pakistani Catholics trace their roots to this ethnic group. In the Punjab the diocese of Lahore stretched from Jullundur to Bahawalpur. Direct mission work began from Sialkot in 1889–1890 and spread to the districts of Gujrat, Jhelum, Gujranwala and Sheikhpura and especially in villages established in the newly irrigated areas of the Doab. These Catholic agricultural colonies and villages became centers for evangelization in the surrounding areas.

A growing Catholic community and responsibility for a vast area dictated the need of ceding the eastern districts of Lahore diocese to the newly formed archdiocese of Simla-Delhi in 1910. In 1936 the entire division of Multan was formed into a prefecture and entrusted to the Dominicans of the Roman province, who had arrived five years earlier. In the North, the districts of Sargodha and Gujrat were attached in 1938 to the apostolic prefecture of Rawalpindi. The territory entrusted to Mill Hill was enlarged and included the civil divisions of Peshawar, Dera Ismail Khan, Rawalpindi and Sargodha. In 1947 this prefecture was raised to the status of a diocese. Sindh and Baluchistan remained part of the archdiocese of Bombay, where Jesuits, mostly Spanish, worked. Centres were established in the more important towns but there was little direct evangelization. In 1934 the whole territory was detached from Bombay to form the independent mission of Karachi under the care of the Dutch Franciscans.

In this pre-partition period, charitable and educational institutions were established in towns and villages throughout the area. Pioneers in the field in Lahore were the Religious of Jesus and Mary from Lyons (1856), and in Karachi, the Daughters of the Cross from Liege (1862). Two local congregations were formed during this time: the Franciscan Tertiary Sisters of Lahore (1922) and the Franciscan Missionaries of Christ the King in Karachi (1937).

The Church in Independent Pakistan. Independence in 1947 found the Catholic Church still part of two distinct ecclesiastical units with Sindh, Khairpur and Baluchistan belonging to the ecclesiastical province of Bombay, while the Punjab, Bahawalpur and the Northwest depended on the archdiocese of Delhi. Changes were made to accommodate the new political reality. The diocese of Karachi was created on May 28, 1948 for Sindh and Baluchistan, and was raised to the status of an archdiocese two years later. In 1958 the archdiocese was divided to form the new diocese of Hyderabad entrusted to the Franciscans. In 1960, after the arrival, in 1956, of Dominicans from New York, the diocese of Multan was entrusted to the Americans and the districts of Lyallpur (present-day Faisalabad), Jhang and Sahiwal were separated to form the new diocese of Faisalabad, entrusted to the Italian Dominicans. In 1973 Pope Paul VI raised the archbishop of Karachi, Joseph Cordeiro, to the rank of cardinal. Lahore was erected an archdiocese on April 23, 1994, and Armando Trindade named the first archbishop. There are also two monasteries: one Carmelite monastery in Lahore and one of Dominican nuns in Karachi. Many religious formation houses were established in Lahore. St. Francis Xavier Seminary in Lahore is affiliated with the Urbanianum in Rome, while the National Catholic Institute of Theology in Karachi has sought affiliation with Yarra Theological Union (Melbourne).

Roughly half the Christian population belongs to different Protestant churches. The Church of Pakistan, inaugurated in 1970 through a union of Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans and Presbyterians, claims the largest number of adherents. Other groups include the Salvation Army, Adventist, Baptist, Full Gospel and many smaller pentecostal and evangelical bodies. Relations between churches are generally friendly, especially when the welfare and survival of the tiny Christian minority is seen at risk. The bishops of the Church of Pakistan and the Catholic Bishops Conference of Pakistan meet occasionally and have made joint representations to the government. Ecumenical and interfaith cooperation is active on the national level in the Christian Study Centre in Rawalpindi, founded in 1967 to promote understanding between Muslims and Christians, the Idara-e-Aman-o-Insaf, the center for Peace and Justice in Karachi, and the Pastoral Institute in Multan, where regular ministerial meetings are held.

Church and Society. It would be hard to calculate the influence the Church has had on society but one witness to the presence and efficiency of church work is the frequent encouragement by leaders to government officials to work with "missionary zeal." For years, the only quality education and health care was that offered by missionary institutions. There are over 600 Catholic educational institutions, providing instruction in the national and provincial languages and in English, to Christian, Muslim and Hindu students. Since 1969 the government has exercised increasing control over Christian institutions and the activities of foreign missionaries. Most private schools and colleges were nationalized between 1972 and 1974. Although this law affected Muslim schools as well, its main purpose was perceived as weakening the Christian influence in Pakistan. Ownership, however, remained with the churches. In Sindh and in several dioceses of the Punjab, many of these schools have since been returned.

Besides traditional hospital care, the Church has always had a medical presence in the rural areas, where 80 percent of the population lives. It has done pioneering work in the care and eradication of Hansen's disease, and in care for the disabled, the elderly and the destitute. Many centers have been opened recently for the awareness and cure of drug addiction. Low-cost housing schemes, sponsored by diocesan agencies, have benefited many. Organizations like Catholic Relief Service (CRS) and Caritas have collaborated with the government in rehabilitation and health projects for refugees and displaced persons.

With Pakistani leadership in the dioceses and in many of the religious congregations, and with an active and educated laity, what was not possible before has now become possible. Forty years ago, there were only two national publications, one an English weekly from Karachi, the other a monthly in Urdu from Lahore. Now there are theological journals in English (Focus from Multan) and in English and Urdu (Al Mushir from Rawalpindi). National and diocesan commissions and centers publish regular magazines and newsletters. Evidence of this coming of age is also seen in the small but growing number of Pakistani women religious on mission in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and in the involvement of lay men and women in the field of catechetics, education and in the different commissions for justice and peace. This involvement has led to close cooperation with non-governmental organizations and human rights groups, out of which working alliances, deeper understanding and genuine friendship with Muslims have developed. The role of the Justice and Peace Commission of the Major Superiors Leadership Conference was crucial in organizing non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in the Jubilee 2000 campaign for cancellation of debt.

The martial law regime of General Zia-ul-Haq (1976–1988) introduced the system of separate electorates, where minorities (Christian, Hindu, Ahmadi, Parsee) vote only for candidates of their own religion. This effectively reduced minorities to second class citizens. In his attempt to create an Islamic society, Zia-ul-Haq introduced ordinances changing the laws of evidence (making the testimony of a non-Muslim witness equal to only half the value of a Muslim's), curtailing the civil rights of minorities and women, and introducing into the penal code mandatory death sentences for derogatory remarks against the Prophet Muhammad or desecration of the Qur'an. This led to street protests by women and the formation of many activist women's groups. It also led to the beginnings of the modern dialogue between Muslims and Christians. In most instances, particularly in Lahore and Multan, this began as the initiative of Muslims who wished to present a more tolerant and pluralist face of Islam, different from the monochromatic vision of Zia-ul-Haq. Since then, Christians and Muslims (the Muslims often at great risk to their own life) have defended those accused of blasphemy, worked together for the repeal of the amendments to the penal code regarding blasphemy and for the restoration of the joint electorate. Active centers for Muslim-Christian dialogue are the ecumenical Christian Study Centre in Rawalpindi, the Pakistan Association for Interreligious Dialogue based in Lahore and several groups in Karachi.

A continuing issue for Christians in Pakistan is one of identity as minority in a Muslim country. The Christian is not dhimmi, a member of a conquered race, nor is the Christian because of separate electorates and discrimination a citizen with equal rights. There were difficulties for Christians and Hindus during the wars with India in 1965 and 1971, when churches, temples and homes were attacked and Hindu and Christian loyalty suspect. Despite occasional flurries of violence after the Salman Rushdie affair and the Gulf War, Christians felt things were getting better. A defining moment came in 1992 when the government announced the addition of a column for religion in the national identity card. This was seen as discriminatory and led to mass protests, hunger strikes, press conferences and sit-ins with Christians joined by Hindus and Muslims. The government was forced to back down. The more lasting effect was the minority awareness and experience of power. They succeeded because the protests began at the grass-roots: they were united, had the support of many Muslims, and effective use was made of the media.

Christians and other minorities continue to face discrimination in civil society. They are especially vulnerable if they live in the vicinity of a mosque, where a loudspeaker could rouse a mob in minutes. The Christian community has been able to live with these things but was completely unprepared for a ferocious attack on Christian settlements in the Khanwal area near Multan on February 5–6, 1997. Churches and homes were attacked and burnt. The results of the government inquiry have not been released but it appeared that religion was used for political purposes. The aftermath was important for several reasons. The government was embarrassed by the international attention, many Muslims apologized to their Christian neighbors, and official and unofficial delegations visited the area. One of them comprised Muslim religious leaders, who themselves washed the floors of the desecrated churches and begged pardon from those who had been rendered homeless.

Bibliography: The Catholic Church in Pakistan Directory (Islamabad 1998). J. C. ENGLAND, The Hidden History of Christianity in Asia: The Churches of the East before 1500 (Delhi and Hong Kong 1996). J. ROONEY, MHM, A History of Christianity in Pakistan (Rawalpindi 1984–89). B. MENDES, "Looking Back at the ID Card Issue," Focus Supplement no. 1(1993). F. E. STOCK People Movements in the Punjab (Pasadena CA 1968). "The Shantinagar Story," Focus vol. 17, no. 1.

[T. C. MCVEY]

PALACE SCHOOLS

Palace schools is a name applied to education given in the courts of kings and emperors at the end of the Merovingian and all through the Carolingian periods.

Historical development. When Charlemagne reorganized education, which had been sorely neglected during the long period of military campaigns, churches and monasteries were in almost exclusive control of schools. Palace schools (schola palatii), however, which Charlemagne, taking advantage of an ancient tradition of royal patronage, had established for members of the court, boy lectors at the royal chapel, children of the nobility, and laymen, were an exception.

In fact, although there were no schools properly so-called in the Merovingian palaces, many young nobles and future bishops spent some years in the contubernium (residence) of the prince, often after having previously attended some school, as we see in the 7th century in the case of St. Ermenland, if we can believe his biographers, who was “withdrawn from school to be placed in a royal palace.” Even at the time of the early Carolingians, where, as among the Merovingians, the term schola palatii is found, this schola does not seem to be a school, as the word is generally understood, but rather a group of clergy and laymen who surrounded the king in his palace; for example, Benoît d’Arlane, who, though ranked inter scholares, was appointed cup-bearer, a duty that seems incompatible with the pursuit of serious literary studies. Nevertheless, constant association with palace officials did not fail to afford the young people some insight into state affairs, which explains the passage from Vita Adalardi: “Adalard, Charlemagne’s cousin, was instructed at the palace in the prudencia (wisdom) of the world by the same teachers as the prince of the land.” This prince of the land was Charlemagne, whose early education was incidental and who, only in later years when he came into power, received any formal intellectual training.

Organization. Whatever doubt may exist about the Merovingian school, it is certain that Charlemagne’s palace was an active center of serious study. Charlemagne took a personal interest in the restoration of arts and letters. In 774, on his return from the campaign in Italy that established the papal state, he brought back with him the grammarian Pierre de Pise and Paul Warnefield, also called Paul the Deacon; and in 776 he called in Pauline d’Aquilée. Charlemagne’s truly great teacher, however, the head of the palace school, was the renowned ALCUIN, former pupil at the episcopal school at York, who after several short visits to the court, established his residence there in 793. Even though Alcuin later withdrew to Tours, he never lost interest in his first mission, where he continued to wield a strong influence. The Irish monk Dungal and Theodulf d’Orléans were among other famous teachers at the court for short periods. The school continued its activity under Charlemagne’s successors, when from 845 to his death in 875, John the Scot (Joannes Scotus) was one of its most representative masters.

At the end of the 9th century, the most renowned palace school was that established by Alfred the Great, considered in English literature as the first translator. Having heard of the great learning and virtue of GRIMBALD, abbot of Saint-Bertin in France, Alfred invited him to Great Britain to restore the teaching of letters. Like the Carolingians, he gathered at his court the children of high birth to teach them to read both Latin and their native Anglo-Saxon tongue.

Objectives. Education in the palace school was intended first of all for the emperor and his court who formed, it seems, an academy, since Alcuin in a letter to Charlemagne referred to his academicians. The women of the Carolingian family also took part—reading poetry, solving problems, discussing theological and grammatical questions, and the like. The academicians took assumed names: Charlemagne called himself David; Angilbert, Homer; Eginhard, an artist, Beseleel; and the Abbess Gisela, Charlemagne’s sister, Lucy. Mingled with these scholars were children who followed more elementary and no doubt more formative courses. The monk St. Gall, in his Gestis Caroli Magni, tells us that the children were entrusted to the special care of the Irishman Clement.

Curriculum. It would be a mistake to place the academicians of either Charlemagne’s or Alfred the Great’s palace school and the children of the schola on the same plane as that of the students in the later medieval universities. The subject matter taught was, in comparison, very elementary, based on German common sense and subtlety and adapted to minds barely familiar with the most rudimentary notions of early science.

The education given at the Carolingian palace school has come down to us through the works left by Alcuin. Like Cassiodorus, 6th-century Roman monk, author, and educator, he divided the courses among the seven LIBERAL ARTS: the trivium—grammar, rhetoric, and logic, which constituted the first step—and the quadrivium—arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy, which made up the second step. On each of the subjects Alcuin wrote a small tract summarizing his teaching methods in which the oral exchange (dialogue) between teacher and student played an important part. Although Alcuin compared the seven liberal arts to the seven pillars of the house of wisdom, his teaching seems to have been elementary and not devoid of mistakes; for example, in his pamphlet on spelling he gives hippocrita (hypocrita), synonym for simulator, as a derivative of hippo-falsum, and chrisis-judicium.

Educational influence. It is evident that the educational influence of the scholae palatii was not so extensive as the vast program drawn up by Alcuin and theoretically adopted by his successors. This rather tenuous influence was felt principally on the grammatical plane since all the schools, from the end of the 11th century, devoted more time to grammar, considered the most necessary of all the arts. The palace school also contributed to the development of oratory. Charlemagne in Alcuin’s Rhetorica remarks that since this art was of major importance in civil affairs, it would be absurd “to ignore the precepts of the art in which they are constantly involved.” A prominent place was also given to logic, which, wrote Rabanus Maurus, “is the discipline of disciplines that teaches how to teach, and to learn how to learn; and in which reason discovers and shows what it is, what it wishes, what it sees." The four other liberal arts, on the contrary, seem to have been somewhat neglected and wielded little educational influence.

Finally, while other schools founded by Charlemagne and Alfred were devoted to the education of priests only, the palace schools contributed considerably to the literary and administrative formation of great laymen. At a time when culture was at its lowest ebb, the palace schools restored ancient disciplines—the liberal arts—and kept alive the legacy of classical antiquity, particularly by the interpretation of Sacred Scripture and the use of commentaries made by the Fathers of the Church. This dependence on ancient learning, both pagan and Christian, deeply influenced curricular orientation until the end of the 12th century.

Bibliography: J. B. WEISS, Geschichte Alfreds des Grossen (Schaffhausen 1852). J. E. SANDYS, History of Classical Scholarship, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng.), v. 1 (3d ed. 1921), v. 2, 3 (2d ed. 1906–08); repr. (New York 1958). C. PLUMMER, The Life and Time of Alfred the Great (Oxford 1902). L. MAÎTRE, Les Écoles épiscopales et monastiques en Occident avant les universités (2d ed. Paris 1924). M. L. W. LAISTNER, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, A.D. 500 to 900 (2d ed. New York 1957). P. RICÉ, Éducation et culture dans l'Occident barbare, VI<sup>e</sup>–VIII<sup>e</sup> siècles (Paris 1962). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 4.2:1805–13, 1872–76.

[J. IMBERT]

PALACIOS, MANUEL ANTONIO

Paraguayan bishop, executed for his supposed involvement in a conspiracy against the republic; b. Luque, near Asunción, July 1824; d. Lomas Valentinas, Dec. 21, 1868. He attended the literary academy where he was a brilliant student. In September 1848 he was ordained by Bishop López. When he was curate of Villeta, he was proposed, on Nov. 20, 1862, as auxiliary bishop by the president of the republic, Francisco Solano López. He was consecrated in the Cathedral of Asunción on Aug. 30, 1863, by Bishop Urbietta, whom he succeeded on Jan. 29, 1865. From the beginning of the Paraguayan War, he served as first chaplain of the army, accompanying Marshal López as friend and confidant. However, by order of López, he was taken prisoner in San Fernando, along with several other persons accused of treason to Paraguay and its government. In 1868 he was condemned to death in a summary judgment at Lomas Valentinas and was executed by firing squad in company with Benigno López, the marshal's brother; Gen. Vicente Barrios, the marshal's brother-in-law; José Berjes, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Eugenio Bogado, Vicar General; José María Leite Pereira, Consul of Portugal; Capt. Simón Fianza of the Italian Navy in the service of Paraguay; Col. Paulino Alem, former commandant of Humaitá; Juan Bautista Zalduondo, nephew of Palacios; and three distinguished ladies from Asunción.

The cause and manner of Palacios's death have given an unhappy fame to his episcopate, although the truth of the San Fernando conspiracy has been much discussed. The prosecutor himself, a relative of Palacios, later referred to it as a "supposed" plot. Further, the accused were denied the right of defense; the trials were secret; and the confessions were extracted by whippings, by an old form of military punishment known as "cepo," and by crushing the fingers with a hammer. Scholars now believe that the plot never existed, that the sentencing and execution of a group of prominent men and women was simply a desperate attempt by Marshal López to maintain the morale of a decimated population whose total destruction was increasingly imminent. According to the most reliable documents and the statements of some survivors, it had become clear that the Paraguayan cause in the war was definitely lost when Paraguayan resistance on the southern frontier was broken with the fall of Humaitá. Two opposing factions resulted: those who believed it preferable to risk total destruction of their country rather than see it submit to an iniquitous tyranny and become the victim of injustice; and those who believed that such an extreme position was inhuman and useless, that no people should be obliged to sacrifice itself completely. Bishop Palacios and the others who were executed held the second opinion, as the statements of the prosecutor of the trial indicated.

Bibliography: S. GAONA, El clero en la guerra del 70 (2d ed. Asunción 1961).

[A. N. ACHA DUARTE]

PALAFOX Y MENDOZA, JUAN DE

Spanish bishop of Puebla, Mexico; b. Fitero, Navarre, Spain, 1600; d. Osmá, Spain, 1659. Even in recent times Palafox has been a subject of controversy and heated discussion. The illegitimate son of Jaime Palafox, Marquesa of Ariza, he studied in Salamanca and was ordained after having served as fiscal to the Councils of War and the Indies. As chaplain he accompanied Empress María to Germany. In 1610 he arrived in Mexico, in the same group that included the new viceroy López Pacheco, Duke of Escalona, to assume his duties as bishop of Puebla de los Angeles. Along with his appointment as bishop, Palafox had been designated Visitor of the audiencia and of the University of Mexico. The viceroy, a first cousin of the Duke of Braganza in Portugal, became suspect during the war for Portuguese independence and was recalled to Spain. Palafox, who had also suspected López of sympathy for the Portuguese cause, took over the post of viceroy for a few months but later, recognizing the viceroy's loyalty to the King, returned to his diocese.

The bishop's ecclesiastical policies brought him into conflict with several religious orders, particularly the Jesuits, with whom he had a famous lawsuit that originated when Palafox denied the Jesuits the right to hear confessions and preach. The dispute lasted several years and was eventually settled in favor of the bishop. A cultured and enthusiastic person, Palafox worked zealously. He supported education, enlarging the existing institutions such as the Tridentine College, and founding new ones, such as a girls' school and a literary academy to which he gave a library of 6,000 volumes, known today as the Biblioteca Palafoxiana de Puebla. In 1644 he inspected the University of Mexico and the next year drafted a new constitution for it. It was not well received by some members of the faculty, especially the religious, who had been excluded from the rectorship. At their request the viceroy suspended the constitution. It was not confirmed by the king until 1649, after Innocent X settled the case between Bishop Palafox and the Jesuits, and through a series of complications it did not become effective until 1671.

On his return to Spain in 1649, Palafox was minister of the Council of Aragon and later became bishop of Osma. His fame as a holy man brought the introduction of his cause for beatification. In 1767 the pope confirmed his "reputation for sanctity, virtue, and miracles in genere." Palafox wrote many works—canonical, religious, moral, political, historical, and literary—which were published in 15 volumes after his death. His political writings reflect a great concern for the decline of Spanish power, and in Juicio político de los daños y reparos de cualquiera monarquía he analyzed the foreign and national policies that contributed to the decline. Although he was essentially a Hispanist, Palafox was able to see the importance of the various nations, that is, of the multiple nationality of the monarchy. He pleaded for the recognition of the individuality of each group and its equality with Castile and decried the distrust that prevented the full use of the monarchy's resources and energy.

Bibliography: G. GARCÍA, Don Juan Palafox y Mendoza, obispo de Puebla y Osma, visitador y virrey de la Nueva España (Mexico City 1918). J. L. BECERRA LÓPEZ, La organización de los estudios en la Nueva España (Mexico City 1963).

[H. PEREÑA]

PALAMAS, GREGORY

Byzantine mystical theologian, defender of HESYCHASM, bishop and saint in the Orthodox Church; b. Constantinople, c. 1296; d. Thessalonica, Nov. 14, 1359. Of a well-to-do family from Asia Minor, Gregory received a liberal education at the imperial university, came under the influence of the mystically minded metropolitan of Philadelphia, Theolytus, and at 22 entered a monastery on Mt. Athos with his two younger brothers. When the Turkish invasions of 1325 threatened the monastic life there, Palamas migrated to Thessalonica, where in 1326 he was ordained a priest and with ten companions retired to a hermitage on a mountain near Beroea. For five years he lived the life of the Hesychastic monk: five days of solitude and silence; then, on Saturday and Sunday, meeting with the others to celebrate the Eucharist and engage in spiritual conversation. He returned to Mt. Athos in 1331, fleeing Serbian incursions, and lived in the hermitage of St. Sabas, where he followed the same regime as at Beroea. In 1335 or 1336 he was appointed hegumen (abbot) of the Grand Laura, but he returned after a short while to St. Sabas.

Controversy with Barlaam. At St. Sabas Palamas became acquainted with the theology of BARLAAM, a Greek Orthodox monk from Calabria who was employing the syllogistic method in his attempt to refute the doctrine of the Latin Church regarding the procession of the Holy Spirit. Palamas wrote two letters to Barlaam (1332–33) in which he defended the position that apodictic arguments were possible in theology and rejected the agnosticism implied in the extreme apophatic, or negative, theology of Barlaam.

Barlaam, meanwhile, had begun to criticize the Hesychastic monks. He sarcastically impugned their psychophysical prayer practices, calling the monks omphalopsychoi (men-with-their-soul-in-their-navel) because of the prayer posture adopted by the monk, who was to focus his eyes on a spot below his chest for concentration (see JESUS PRAYER). Barlaam attacked in particular the explanation of the monks' goal of meditative contemplation (hesychia). The Hesychasts claimed that the saints as "the pure of heart" have the vision of God promised them in this life (Mt 5.8). They can see within themselves the working of the Holy Spirit as an uncreated grace. The Spirit is seen as a white light, the same light that shone about the Lord during the Transfiguration on Mt. Tabor. Barlaam accused the monks of Messalianism, a fourth-century dualistic heresy apparently adopted by the PAULICIANS in their claim that God was visible to human eyes. Barlaam prepared a work against this Hesychastic doctrine; but before its publication, Isidore, the future Patriarch of Constantinople, called Palamas from

Mt. Athos to aid in the refutation of Barlaam's charges (1338). Palamas prepared a threefold work (Triad) on the Hesychasts. He followed this with a second Triad, in which he described his famous distinction between God's being and His energy or operation. This became a distinctive characteristic of his theology. Later he defended the bodily prayer practices of the monks by insisting on the unity of the engraced man and rejected an extreme Platonic division of body and soul that would not see grace influencing and elevating the body of man to actual participation in the divine life of grace.

Elaboration of Palamas's Theology. In defending the presence of the Holy Spirit as uncreated GRACE within the saints, Palamas rejected Western explanations based on the idea of grace as created and supernatural. Such a concept of grace, Palamas argued, did not sufficiently explain the deification of the engraced man. A created entity is not the divinity, and man must somehow be deified by grace and thus participate in the very divinity. Only uncreated grace, the Spirit of God, can truly elevate the Christian to the divine life.

Palamas further sought to justify the Athonite monks and maintained that the action of God within the soul is a visible light, although not visible in the Messalian, heretical way, but visible to eyes elevated by grace. This light is the same as the light of the Transfiguration, which was not, as Barlaam claimed, a material light, but rather the divinity of the Lord, a divine energy. However, Palamas admitted that the Apostles did not see the essence or the nature of the divinity, which is invisible and incomprehensible, but rather this divine "energy" or activity. So too the saint sees a divine energy and not the essence of the Godhead. Even in the eternal life the blessed will not see the essence of God, which is incomprehensible, but rather the divine energy. The Holy Spirit, who sanctifies the saint, is seen as an uncreated divine energy present in the saint and deifying him. Barlaam rejected Palamas' explanations as unsatisfactory because they divided the Godhead into nature and energies. In 1341 Palamas accepted the theology of the Hagiorite Tome of PHILOTHEUS COCCINUS which became a fundamental manual for the monks of Mt. Athos.

Continued Controversy and Last Years. At a synod held in the Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (June 10, 1341) his position was examined; but despite Barlaam's representations, the theological question was left open, and both monks were forbidden to engage in further polemic. A former student of Palamas, GREGORIUS AKINDYNOS (d. 1349), led an opposition party of anti-Palamites who unsuccessfully attempted to have the Tome of 1341 repudiated. In August, however, a second synod was held without the patriarch; and JOHN VI CAN-TACUZENUS, who was eventually to seize the imperial throne, upheld the Palamite theology. However, Palamas was banished to Heraclea a short while later. In 1344 the anti-Palamite party led by Akindynos had Palamas condemned and excommunicated; but this action was colored by a mixture of motives that were both political and ecclesiastical in nature.

In 1347 Cantacuzenus overthrew the Emperor and selected the former monk Isidore as patriarch. He set about the vindication of Palamas, who was named archbishop of Thessalonica but could not take possession of his see until 1350 when the city came under the control of the new emperor. In July 1351 at a new synod in Constantinople Palamas's doctrines were declared orthodox, while Akindynos and Barlaam were condemned and Nicephorus Gregoras was banished. The Tome published by this synod was signed by the Patriarch Callistus, and the actions of the synod established Palamas as a teacher of orthodoxy. In a journey between Constantinople and Thessalonica, Palamas was captured by the Turks and was released only after several years upon the payment of a ransom. Meanwhile, in 1354 John V Palaeologus had regained the throne. He arranged a confrontation between Palamas and Nicephorus Gregoras, but was so badly impressed by the two disputants that he lost all interest in their quarrel. Palamas spent his last years as archbishop of Thessalonica, engaged mainly in refuting the charges of Gregoras and composing mystical treatises. He died of an intestinal paralysis, and was canonized in 1368 by the synod under the Patriarch Philotheus Coccinus of Constantinople. He has a special commemoration on the second Sunday in Lent.

Critical Evaluation. Several Western theologians, such as D. Pétau, M. Jugie, and E. Candal, have regarded the teachings of Palamas as at variance with the doctrines of the Western Church, particularly his distinction between the divine nature and the divine operation, which they maintain destroys the simplicity of God's nature. The teaching of Palamas that the blessed in heaven do not see the divine nature but a divine energy seems to be in contradiction with the teaching of Pope BENEDICT XII (Denz 1000) that the blessed enjoy a face-to-face vision of the divine essence.

Palamite doctrine on the divine nature of the light of Mt. Tabor and the visible presence of uncreated grace in the pure of heart has been an obstacle for Western theologians in accepting Palamas as a teacher of orthodoxy. On the other hand, Palamas's insistence that the whole man is engraced, body and soul, and the stress that he placed on the role of the body in prayer has been adopted in the West by theologians such as I. Hausherr.

The majority of Palamas's literary productions were devoted to defending his Hesychast doctrine by using a combination of Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy as foundation. Besides nine tracts in defense of the Hesychasm of the monks, ten treatises against Akindynos and five against Gregoras, he wrote small tracts, letters, and a poem of 618 iambic verses. He published six writings against the Latin theology, two of which (in 1355 and 1356) were directed against a papal legation in Constantinople, and a third against JOHN XI BECCUS. He also wrote apologetic tracts on his captivity in Islam; 150 chapters on spiritual practices, ethics, and theology; prayers; sermons, of which a homiliarium with 63 pieces was published soon after his death; and a commentary on the Ten Commandments.

Bibliography: J. P. MIGNE ed. Patrologia Graeca v. 150–151. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 364–368, 712–715. J. MEYENDORFF, A Study of Gregory Palamas, tr. G. LAWRENCE (London 1964); θεολογία 25 (1954) 602–613; ed. and tr., Défense de saints hésychastes, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1959). R. JANIN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. 4:1214. M. JUGIE, A. VACANT, et al., ed. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1735–76. I. HAUSHERR, “L’Hésychasme,” Orientalia Christiana periodica 22 (1956) 5–40, 241–285. B. KRIVOSHEIN, The Eastern Churches Quarterly 3 (1938–39) 26–33, 71–84, 138–156, 193–214. V. LOSSKY, The Vision of God, tr. A. MOORHOUSE (London 1963). G. G. ARNAKIS, Speculum 26 (1951) 104–118; Byzantion 22 (1952) 305–312. P. WITTEK, ibid. 21 (1951) 421–423.

[H. D. HUNTER]

PALASER, THOMAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1570 at Ellerton-upon-Swale (near Boulton), North Riding, Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered Aug. 9, 1600 at Durham. He studied in the English College at Valladolid (1592–96) where he was ordained (1596). Upon returning to England, he was arrested almost immediately in the home of Bl. John NORTON with Norton, his wife Margaret, and Bl. John TALBOT. All four were tried at Durham and sentenced to death: Palaser for his priesthood and the others for assisting him. Margaret Norton, who was pregnant, and another gentleman, who was condemned at the same time but apostatized, were reprieved. The attempted poisoning of Palaser and his companions by the jailer’s wife resulted in the conversion of Mary Day, her servant. Palaser, Norton, and Talbot were beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PALAU Y QUER, FRANCISCO, BL.

Also called Francis of Jesus Mary Joseph; Discalced Carmelite (OCD), mystic priest, thaumaturge, and founder of the Theresian Missionary Carmelite Sisters and the Missionary Carmelite Sisters; b. Aytona, Lérida (Lleida) Province of Catalonia, Spain, Dec. 29, 1811; d. Tarragona, March 20, 1872. Born into a poor but devout family, Francis Palau entered the seminary at Lérida in 1828. After studying philosophy and completing one year of theology, he joined the Discalced Carmelites (1832). He made his religious profession on Nov. 14, 1833 and was ordained a priest on April 2, 1836.

Upheaval in Spain at the time caused him to live outside the cloister in France from 1840 to 1851. Upon returning to Spain, he preached and gave missions in the Balearic Islands and in Barcelona, where he founded his “School of Virtue,” a model for catechetical instruction. The school was suppressed upon the accusation that it was being used to foment labor strikes, and Francis was forced into exile, from 1854 to 1860, on the small barren island of Vedrá, off the coast of Ibiza.

When Francis was allowed to return to the mainland following the intervention of Queen Isabella II, he organized small communities of women (1860–61) in the Balearic Islands that later became the Theresian Missionary Carmelite Sisters and the Missionary Carmelite Sisters. He also founded the now-defunct Brothers of Charity. Fr. Palau traveled to Rome to present his concerns to the pope (1866) and to serve as consultant to the bishops gathered for Vatican Council I (1870). He died peacefully at age 60 and was beatified by John Paul II on April 24, 1988.

Feast: Nov. 7 (Carmelites).

Bibliography: L’Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 16 (1988). GREGORIO DE JESÚS CRUCIFICADO, Braza entre cenizas: Biografía del R. P. Francisco Palau y Quer (Bilbao, Spain 1956).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PALEOGRAPHY, GREEK

The philological discipline dealing with Greek writings on papyrus, parchment, and paper from the 4th century B.C. to the 16th century A.D.

The Epigraphical Style of the Papyri and the Formation of the Ptolemaic Literary and Documentary

Byzantine minuscule: 10th century A.D.

veloped in the Middle Byzantine minuscule. Characteristic representatives of the Strict style are the Bacchylides Papyrus (British Museum), the Alcaeus Papyrus (Oxyrhynchus Papyri 1234), the Vienna Xenophon (G.24568), and the Phaedrus Papyrus (Oxyr. Pap.1016).

The “Biblical style” developed out of the Strict style in the course of the 3d century A.D. It takes its name from the famous biblical MSS of the 4th and 5th centuries, namely, the Codex Sinaiticus (London), Codex Vaticanus (Vat. Gr. 1209), and Codex Alexandrinus (London). The conventional designation “uncial” for this stylistic form is rightly questioned, but, in any case, to avoid misunderstandings the term should not be used for other types of writing. To the early precursors of the Biblical style in the 2d and 3d century A.D., a London Homer Papyrus (Pap. Lit. Lond. 7) and a Berlin Homer Papyrus (Pap. Berol. 7499), must now be added the earliest witness for the Gospel of St. John, known only since 1956 (Pap.<sup>66</sup> = Pap. Bodmer II). The most important characteristic feature of the Biblical style is the tendency to equalize the divergent sizes of small and broad letters. In this style most letters can be reduced to a basic square form or inscribed in a square. Iota, Rho, Phi, and Omega are the only exceptions. Full, rounded forms dominate, and the two-line system is strictly observed. Narrow or “emaciated” letters are avoided except at the ends of lines.

After the century of the great Biblical MSS this style developed only very gradually. The uncials of the famous Dioscorides MS at Vienna, which was written c. 512, exhibit thickenings at the extremities of Epsilon and Sigma, heavy dots on the top of the upper line in the case of Kappa, Pi, and Tau, and knoblike feet on the extended base of the Delta. Kappa frequently appears in two parts, a phenomenon that leads to popular confusion of EK and EIC. The length of the lower parts of Phi, Rho, and Upsilon is marked. Besides the uncial MSS showing vertical letters, others are found with a significant slope. This slope, however, should not be employed as a criterion for dating. In the Middle Byzantine period the uncial was used beside the newly introduced minuscule, especially in liturgical texts, well into the 12th century. Characteristic features of this late and so-called liturgical uncial are pointed oval forms of the earlier round letters, long truncations on the crossbars of the Gamma, Delta, Theta, Pi, and Tau, and a marked contrast between light upstrokes and heavy downstrokes.

Metochites style: 14th century A.D.

A special development of the uncial in the 6th to the 10th centuries has recently been called the Coptic style (by J. Irigoin). The Copts adopted the Greek uncial as the literary hand for committing their own literature to written form, but they stylized it probably under the influence of the chancery of the Alexandrian Patriarchate—in the direction of the chancery hand. The Coptic style exhibits unusually large individual letters, a small Alpha, and a deep-saddle form of Mu. Good examples are the Papyrus Codex of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA in Dublin, Paris, and Vienna, and the Paschal Letter from Alexandria of 719, now in Berlin. The Biblical Style, as an ornamental script for superscriptions, colophons, lemmata, and marginalia lived on for centuries in the form of a small uncial influenced by the chancery hand.

The Cursive from the Early Empire to the Arab Domination in Egypt. The Greek cursive of the Imperial Age developed without marked transitional features from the Ptolemaic documentary hand. The papyrus documents of the Early Empire are often written in a small, narrow script that consciously ignores stylization and constantly permits interchange in the ductus of its letters. The same letters are often written by the same hand in two or three different ways. The possibilities of confusion between various letters, as between Mu and Nu, Eta and Upsilon, multiply. In the 2d and 3d centuries, Beta usually rests on a broad horizontal base, and the bipartite Epsilon rises above the upper line. In the 3d century the lower extremities of letters increase in length to such a degree that they extend into the next line or even beyond it. The neglect of style, ductus, and alignment, and the deterioration of regular letter forms in documents written in this script increased steadily from the 4th century. As opposed to this kind of writing, the chanceries of high officials clung to their markedly characteristic style (the Chancery style). The vertical is emphasized, and the letters are regularly formed, but they are always taller than they are broad, so that the script reminds one of a trellis or lattice (Lattice Script). Individual “emaciated” forms (Alpha, Omicron, and also Delta and Omega), marked lower extensions, and ornamental hooks at the foot of many letters distinguish the Chancery style.

After the establishment of CONSTANTINOPLE as the new imperial residence and the foundation of the Byzantine Empire, the field belonged to the so-called Byzantine cursive, which is preserved in many thousands of papyrus documents and letters of the 4th to the 7th century. This new script of everyday use was strongly influenced by the Chancery style. Through numerous extensions of its letters upward and downward it became, toward the end of the 4th century, a true four-line system of writing. The most striking upward extensions are shown by Beta, Epsilon, Eta, Iota, and Kappa, and by Delta also in the shape of the Latin D. Extensions downward appear in Beta, Gamma, Iota, Rho, Phi, Chi, Psi, and especially in Lambda, which sinks completely below the line. Large and small letters are set off clearly from one another. The Byzantine cursive, with its many gradations and its frequent baroque ostentation, is the living image of the Byzantine spirit and outlook, characterized by its predilection for orders of rank and ceremonial in all phases of life.

Following the Arab conquest of Egypt (641) the Byzantine cursive deteriorated, and the difference between large and small letters increased even more. In a parallel development, however, there should be noted the gradual consolidation of letter forms that later—from the second half of the 8th century—were to constitute the elements of the new Byzantine minuscule. Hence many documents of the 7th and 8th centuries exhibit side by side in their colophons uncial and half-cursive letter forms that point to the coming of the minuscule.

The Byzantine Minuscule from Its Beginning to the 16th Century. The greater number of some 60,000 extant Greek MSS from the Byzantine period are written in the consciously created script that is customarily called book minuscule, calligraphic minuscule, or simply minuscule. The beginnings of this script, which developed out of the Byzantine cursive, may be traced back to c. 800. Clearly an attempt was made to combine the beauty and clarity of the uncial with the fluidity and practical utility of the cursive. The so-called Codex Uspensky, an evangelarium written in 835, is the oldest dated MS to show pure minuscule. The transfer of the extant works of ancient literature from uncial MSS to MSS written in the new minuscule was a process of decisive importance for the history of the transmission of texts. It was carried out in the age of the Macedonian dynasty (9th and 10th centuries).

The minuscule, like the Byzantine cursive, is a four-line system of writing: the elements of many letters rise above or sink below the lines. It exhibits a tendency to combine two to ten, or even more, letters into a continuous unit—often without regard for separation of words. The following features are valuable for dating in the first centuries of the minuscule: writing above the line—the letters standing on the pre-drawn or impressed line (mostly in the 9th century); a slight slope to the left (likewise in the 9th century); and the form of the rough breathing—a half-Eta in the 9th and 10th centuries, an angular form in the 10th and 11th centuries, and a round form predominating from the late 10th century and gaining ground steadily in subsequent centuries. The entrance of uncial letter forms into later MSS (from the 10th century) can also be observed, but not everywhere with the same regularity.

The older division of minuscule MSS into three or four periods has been abandoned. It seems preferable to make only two major divisions: (1) the period from the 9th to the 12th century, characterized by a predominantly conservative script retaining symmetrical forms and exhibiting gradual introduction of changes; (2) the period from the end of the 12th century, characterized by marked changes in the form of writing and a pronounced deterioration of order or regularity in ductus.

From the 9th to the 12th Century. In general, the minuscule MSS of the 9th and 10th centuries present a fairly symmetrical aspect, with an austere to reserved character that results from a certain angularity of forms. In the 11th century the scribes in the scriptoria of the capital overcame this harshness or primness by using regular round forms, avoiding points and angles, and eliminating uncial letters and abbreviations. Because of the resemblance of many groups of letters in which the elements of this script, especially the circular Omicron and the fanlike round Upsilon similar to a string of pearls, predominate, this form of writing has been christened “Pearl script” (Hunger).

The changes in the aspect of writing that appear in many MSS of the 12th century resulted from the enlargement and cruder formation of many letters, new ligatures, and abbreviations, and from the piling up of letters on one another. The circumflex is extended in use and spans three or more letters, and the boundaries of the writing area are broken by lines running into the margin, or by letters with excessively large upper and lower extremities in beginning and closing lines. A glance at the originals of imperial documents of the 10th and 11th centuries shows that the script of the imperial chancery reveals in especially pronounced forms the characteristic features mentioned above. In all probability, therefore, the chancery may have exercised its influence on the minuscule.

From the End of the 12th to the 16th Century. The majority of minuscule MSS experienced marked changes in the course of the 13th century. The phenomena noted above increased in a much more extensive manner. The ligatures Epsilon-Rho and Epsilon-Xi pass from the pointed to the rounded form. The syllable  $\mu\epsilon\nu$  is written in a single character with a high, drawn-out and hooklike Epsilon. The prepositions  $\epsilon\pi\iota$  and  $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$  appear in cursive abbreviation, and Iota subscript and the modern Epsilon (sloping to the left) are frequent. Accents are connected not only with abbreviations, but also with letters and tachygraphic signs. Neglect of alignment and ductus, and abandonment of aesthetic considerations, often transform the calligraphic minuscule into a purely utilitarian hand.

The influence of political events is closely connected with the history of writing. The establishment of the LATIN EMPIRE by the Venetians and the crusaders (1204) forced many Byzantines to leave Constantinople. From new centers (Nicaea and Epirus) they planned restoration of the Byzantine state. During this period, following the dissolution of the Byzantine imperial chancery in the capital, it was possible to employ the large ornamental letters and flourishes and the extended extremities of letter forms that had hitherto been restricted to the imperial chancery. It should not be overlooked, however, that in addition to such degenerate and undisciplined hands of the 13th century, there were others that, in a consciously archaizing tendency, attempted to continue an approximation of the Pearl script of the 11th century. In most such cases there is question of biblical texts or liturgical MSS. A closer examination indicates that the archaizing scribes from the 13th to the 15th centuries sooner or later betrayed themselves by the use of modern elements in their writing.

In the late 13th and in the first half of the 14th century two further styles of Greek writing may be noted. Many MSS from the period 1275 to 1325 are characterized by the fact that some of their rounded letters, such as Omicron, Sigma, Omega, Alpha, and the ligature Epsilon-Iota are written especially large. These closed, round forms float over the jumble of the rest of the script after the manner of blobs of fat in a soup (the "Blob style").

The imperial chancery under ANDRONICUS II (ruled 1282–1328) and his grandson, ANDRONICUS III (ruled 1328–41), employed another distinctive style. Archaizing and calligraphic elements were used to create a new and aesthetically satisfying minuscule that, to its advantage, turned away from the examples of the unpretentious common script described above. Its limited use of abbreviations and large letters with long upper and lower extremities, its reduction of the large accent marks to small form, and its moderation in the employment of ligatures, all bear witness to the work of disciplined scribes. Since this style, in addition to its use in imperial documents of the age, appears especially in MSS containing the works of Theodore Metochites, Grand Logothete and friend of Andronicus II, it may be called the Metochites style (Hunger). It is found—in somewhat modified form—until the end of the 14th century.

In the early 15th century the Byzantines, in an effort that parallels that of the Western humanists in Italy, attempted to go back to the minuscule forms of the 9th to the 12th centuries, thus improving the contemporary script and putting a brake on further deterioration. By the use of separation of letters and words, punctuation, and free standing accents, the MSS written in the revised style—often containing classical authors—were made much more legible.

Following the invention of printing by Johann GUTENBERG, the first book set wholly in Greek type, namely, the Greek Grammar of Constantine Lascaris, was published at Milan in 1476. The cutting of Greek type fonts, difficult as it was at first, reached its maturity by the 1490s at the presses of Zacharias Calliergis, but especially in the outstanding productions of Aldus MANUTIUS. At this time, and far into the 16th century, a reciprocal influence may be noted in MSS and printed books. Many letter forms of the "Press Minuscule" betray their origin by a certain rigidity and lack of adaptability. The single-stroke Tau with handlelike crossbar; the elongated Gamma with a similar handle; the ugly, squashed majuscule Theta; and the angular Phi, all characterize the Press Minuscule.

Bibliography: B. A. VAN GRONINGEN, Short Manual of Greek Palaeography (3d ed. Leiden 1963). E. M. THOMPSON, An Introduction to Greek and Latin Palaeography (Oxford 1912). A. DAIN, Les

Manuscripts (rev. ed. Paris 1964). W. SCHUBART, Griechische Paläographie (Munich 1925). R. DEVRESSE, Introduction à l'étude des manuscrits grecs (Paris 1954). A. SIGALAS, Ἱστορία τῆς Ἑλληνικῆς Γραφῆς (Salonika 1934). V. GARDTHAUSEN, Griechische Paläographie, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1911–13). H. HUNGER, Studien zur griechischen Paläographie (Vienna 1954); "Antikes und mittelalterliches Buch- und Schriftwesen," in Geschichte der Textüberlieferung der antiken und mittelalterlichen Literatur, ed. H. HUNGER et al. (Zurich 1961– ) 1:25–147, esp. 72–107. J. IRIGOIN, "Pour une étude des centres de copie byzantins," Scriptorium 12 (1958) 208–227; 13 (1959) 177–209; "L'Onciale grecque de type copte," Jahrbuch der österreichischen byzantinischen Gesellschaft 8 (1959) 29–51. C. H. ROBERTS, Greek Literary Hands, 350 B.C.–A.D. 400 (Oxford 1956). K. and S. LAKE, eds., Monumenta palaeographica vetera. First Series: Dated Greek Minuscule Manuscripts to the Year 1200, 10 v. (Boston 1934–39), indexes to v. 1–10 (1945). E. MIONI, Introduzione alla paleografia greca (Padua 1973). E. GAMILLSCHEG and D. HARLFINGER, Repertorium der griechischen Kopisten 800–1600 (Vienna 1981–97). E. FOLLIERI, Codices graeca Bibliothecae Vaticanae selecti, temporum locorumque ordine digesti commentariis et transcriptionibus instructi (Vatican City 1969).

[H. HUNGER]

PALEOGRAPHY, LATIN

The object of Latin paleography is the study of the various forms of handwriting in which Latin texts were written and of the forms of writing derived from them. Like all alphabets used in ancient Italy, the Latin alphabet represents a Western type of Greek alphabet, that is, an alphabet in which the Γ, Δ, Λ, Π, Ρ, Σ, and Υ of the Eastern and classical Greek alphabet have forms that are quite similar to C, D, L, P, R, S, and V (U), but in which the X was pronounced ks and not kh, the H indicated aspiration, and the Digamma and Koppa were still in use. The Latins, however, did not borrow their alphabet directly from the Greeks, according to most authorities, but took it from the Etruscans. This would explain why their C had the value of a voiceless guttural, which gave it the same value as K and Q, and why there was no symbol to denote the voiced guttural (ModE G). Their G was created only in 312 B.C. by modifying the letter C.

Rise and Spread of Latin Writing. The oldest Latin text is that engraved on the mutilated stele found in 1899 on the site of the old Forum Romanum. It dates from either the end of the 7th century B.C. or the beginning of the 6th. Latin writing was used by Roman soldiers, merchants, and officials throughout the empire. In the East, however, as well as in other areas where Greek was used as a means of communication, neither the Latin language nor the Latin script took root. In the Eastern areas of the empire various native linguistic groups, such as the Copts, the Goths, and later some of the Slavs, used alphabets derived essentially from the Greek alphabet. As a result, after the fall of the empire, Latin handwriting, like the Latin language, survived only in the West.

After the 3d century, Latin writing became that of the Roman Church, and from the 6th to the 12th century, in the course of the Christianization of the pagan peoples of northern Europe, it became the writing of Ireland, Germany, Norway, and Sweden. At various times Latin writing was adopted for the vernacular languages (even for non-Indo-European ones): for Celtic in the 1st century; in the 8th century for Welsh, English, and German; for French in the 9th century; for Provençal, Catalan, Spanish, Portuguese, Norwegian, and Icelandic in the 12th century; for Italian, Hungarian, Czech, Danish, and Swedish in the 13th century; for Old Prussian in the 14th century and for Polish and Croatian in the 15th century. Basque, Breton, Lithuanian, Lettish, Estonian, and Finnish adopted Latin writing in the 16th century; Albanian and Romanian, in the 19th century.

Through the influence of printing, Latin writing became widely disseminated and received a fixed form during the 15th century, and it has since become the writing of Western civilization. During the 19th century, Catholic and Protestant missionaries adapted the Latin alphabet to many native languages, among others, those of Vietnam and Madagascar. Some of the nationalistic and revolutionary movements of the 20th century, in an attempt to fight illiteracy and to promote modernization, abandoned traditional writing in favor of the Latin form of writing. Even though Russia and many other nations in the former U.S.S.R. still retain their Cyrillic alphabet, other nations have adopted the Latin hand. Since 1926 it has been used by the Islamic-Turkish republic of the former U.S.S.R.; and since 1928, by Turkey. China officially adopted the Latin alphabet in 1958 but was faced with a tremendous task of adjustment, which it has still hardly begun.

The Science of Paleography. The first scientific treatise on Latin paleography is found in the last four chapters of Book I of the De re diplomatica (1681) by Dom Jean MABILLON. A contemporary of the first naturalists, among them J. P. de Tournefort, whose Éléments de Botanique (1694) contained the first modern classification of plants, Mabillon attempted to classify the scripts known to him on the basis of their distinctive characteristics. He thus distinguished three types of Roman script—the uncial, or capital; the minuta, or minuscule; and the minuta forensis—as well as four types of national hands that he believed to be original creations, Gothic, Lombard, Frankish, and Anglo-Saxon.

This classification was refuted and rejected by Scipione Maffei in his Istoria diplomatica (1727). Maffei was the first to advance the thesis of the original unity of Latin writing. He maintained that the so-called national hands were only “degenerate” forms of Roman writing.

The six-volume Nouveau traité de diplomatique (1750–65) by R. P. Tassin and C. F. Toustain, Benedictines of the congregation of Saint-Maur (see MAURISTS), is the masterpiece of the “Nomenclature School,” or, as their members would be called today by the naturalists, the “taxonomists.” To some extent the Nouveau traité is to the De re diplomatica of Mabillon what the Systema naturae (1735) of C. Linnaeus is to the Éléments de botanique of Tournefort. The paleographic section of the Nouveau traité is an “abecedarian history” in which the authors strove to teach “the art of determining the age and the country of origin of the letters by studying the variety of their forms and characteristics, acquired between their origin and the 18th century” (2.2). One can only admire the work of the two Maurists. Unfortunately, however, their classifications were not based on such obvious and fundamental characteristics as those selected by the genius of Linnaeus. Script is neither a living organism, the product of natural growth, nor even a system of self-developing forms. The ordering of hands on the basis of external characteristics can lead only to arbitrary and extremely complicated classifications. In fact the classification of the Maurists is recognized today as completely inadequate, and frequently incomprehensible.

In the latter half of the 19th century, W. Wattenbach in his Anleitung zur lateinischen Paläographie (1866) and Léopold Delisle in his works after 1875 found a new and more fruitful approach. Both Wattenbach and Delisle studied the letters in relation to their formation in writing. Botanists might describe their approach as that of the “geneticists,” for they tried to reconstitute the ductus, i.e., the movement of the pen in forming the letter, and to establish a genealogy of writing based on the historical development of its forms. The latter approach resembled that of their contemporaries the comparative philologists, who sought to establish families of languages. Delisle and Wattenbach succeeded in separating paleography from diplomatics and in definitively making paleography an autonomous discipline. At the same time L. Traube assigned paleography its true place among the historical sciences by viewing the scripts it studies as the expression or reflection of a civilization.

Latin Writing from the 1st to the 6th Century. Although in principle the “science of handwriting” does not need to concern itself with the material on which the letters are written, the very fact that scholars turned their attention to the ductus led them to neglect the fixed forms of writing, which are characteristic of engraved letters. Latin inscriptions on stone and bronze were, even as late as 1850, almost the only known specimens of Roman writing and the only “documents” preserved—as opposed to narrative sources and juridical codifications. The study of these inscriptions was established as an autonomous discipline under the name of epigraphy. Paleography, accordingly, abandoned inscriptions to devote itself solely to the study of official documents and books written by hand and in ink. Since the oldest manuscripts then known could be dated no earlier than the 4th or 5th century, paleographers ignored the preceding centuries. Epigraphists, however, showed little or no interest in the form of the letters. As a result, scholars began the history of Latin writing only with the 5th century. So complete was the ignorance of earlier scripts that Natalis de Wailly attempted to prove that the wax tablets found in 1841 in the gold mines of Transylvania, and dated between A.D. 139 and 162, were forgeries. In 1889 M. Prou expressed the same opinion in the first edition of his Manuel de paléographie (24).

Meanwhile, the excavations at Pompeii had revealed the cursive Latin hand of the 1st century. The first graffiti were discovered in 1765 but were not published until 1792 and 1793 in Nuremberg (cf. R. Garucci, Graffiti de Pompei, 2d ed. Paris 1856). Their publication was barely noticed, and it was not until 1837 that the Inscriptiones Pompeianae of J. Wordsworth brought them to the attention of the scholarly world. In 1849 the first edition of the Graffiti of Garucci contained a thoroughly satisfactory study of cursive writing, but it too was scarcely noticed by paleographers. Finally, some slight interest was shown in the publication of C. Zangemeister's Inscriptiones parietariae Pompeianae (Corpus inscriptionum latinarum 4; Berlin 1871).

Four years after Zangemeister's publication, the tables of the banker Jucundus were discovered at Pompeii, but they did not become common knowledge until Zangemeister in 1898 devoted the Supplementi pars prior of Corpus inscriptionum latinarum v. 4 to their publication. The first ancient Latin papyrus to be unearthed in modern times, the Carmen de bello Actiaco, had been found during the excavations at Herculaneum in 1730 and was reproduced as an engraving in 1793 in the first volume of the Herculanensium voluminum quae supersunt (see Papyrology). Zangemeister and Wattenbach in their Exempla codicum latinorum litteris maiusculis scriptorum (Heidelberg 1876) plates 1, 2, 3, reproduced two others in part. From 1895 Egypt began to furnish literary as well as documentary Latin papyri but in very small numbers—approximately 200 between 1895 and 1914—of which only half were published at the time; and only about 50 were reproduced by 1915. A young American papyrologist, H. B. Van Hoesen, studied their script (Roman Cursive Writing, Princeton 1915) and traced the history of the Roman cursive hand from the 1st to the 6th century. But the study of all forms of writing used prior to the 5th century was not definitively included in Latin paleography until the publication in 1921 of Luigi Schiaparelli's Scrittura latina nell'eta romana.

All the above-mentioned works were remarkable; yet they were not as perfect and precise as their authors might have made them had the available documentation been less rudimentary.

The Use of Photography and Electronic Digitalization. Photography was first introduced into paleography in 1858 by T. von Sichel, who later used photoengraving as well in his Monumenta graphica medii aevi ex archivis et bibliothecis imperii Austriaci collecta (10 fasc. 1858–82). Paleographers were rather slow in recognizing the potential role of photomechanical reproduction. The imperfections of the first processes, the high cost of the stereotype plates, and the unsatisfactory lighting apparatus were no doubt the cause of their slowness. In 1871 Zangemeister failed in his attempts to reproduce photographically the graffiti (Corpus inscriptionum latinarum 4:11.39), and E. Hübner decided against employing photoengraving in his Exempla scripturae epigraphicae latinae (Berlin 1885). In fact, the photography of graffiti and inscriptions continues to present particular difficulties (cf. J. S. and A. E. Gordon, Contributions to the Paleography of Latin Inscriptions, Berkeley 1957; repr. Milan 1977). The most adequate process for photographing graffiti and wax tablets involves the use of sodium lamps, but this is extremely difficult outside a well-organized laboratory. The paleographical study of inscriptions is therefore still in its infancy, and this has inhibited the study of the Latin calligraphy of the first four centuries. Even as late as 1953 there were barely three or four photographs of the graffiti of Pompeii, and scholars were content to use copies. The first photographs of the Latin papyri of Herculaneum were published by E. A. Lowe in Codices latini antiquiores (v. 3 Oxford 1938, Nos. 385–387).

There have been numerous reproductions of medieval manuscripts, and starting in the late 19th century several large collections appeared in which the photography leaves nothing to be desired. These collections, however, had no preestablished design and were arranged by chance, depending on findings and research. As a result they contributed only a fragmentary documentation on which no exhaustive study could be based. These insufficiencies were partially remedied by the prodigious development of microfilm technique, but a more effective remedy would come through a series of systematic and massive facsimile collections.

The first, Codices Latini Antiquiores (= CLA), conceived and carried to completion by E. A. Lowe, began to appear in 1934. In twelve volumes (1–11 + Supplement) (Oxford 1934–1971) and two series of Addenda in Mediaeval Studies (47 and 54, Toronto 1985 and 1992) a paleographical description and a sample facsimile from one or more pages are furnished for every known extant Latin literary manuscript copied before the 9th century (1884 items in all). Starting in 1954, A. Bruckner and R. Marichal and eventually many other collaborators did something similar for official documents. Their Chartae latinae antiquiores (= ChLA), in 49 volumes (1–4: Olten-Lausanne; 5–49: Dietikon-Zurich; 1954–98), provides a complete facsimile edition with transcription of all known extant Latin charters copied before the 9th century (1468 items in all). With some exceptions (a few papyri, graffiti, wax tablets, and inscriptions) all the extant writing evidence of the first eight centuries of the Christian era is now available for study in published facsimiles.

The same, however, cannot be said, and almost certainly will never be able to be said, for the period from the 9th century onward, because of the sheer mass of the surviving material (hundreds of thousands of manuscripts and documents). Just the same, for the 9th century itself some systematic projects are underway. All of its Latin literary manuscripts from the Continent are being systematically described, though unfortunately without facsimiles, in B. Bischoff's Katalog der festländischen Handschriften des neunten Jahrhunderts (mit Ausnahme der wisigotischen) (Wiesbaden 1998–). Part I deals in alphabetical order by place of preservation with the manuscripts from Aachen to Lambach. The documents of the 9th century have begun to be published in a facsimile edition in a second series of Chartae latinae antiquiores, edited by G. Cavallo and G. Nicolaj (Dietikon-Zurich, 1998–). Seven volumes (50–56) were published by 2000 (181 items, all from Italy).

But long before these two 9th-century projects began to see the light of day another approach had already been taken to the massive numbers of manuscripts from the later period. At an international conference held in Paris in 1953 at the instigation of C. Samaran most of the leading Latin paleographers of the time decided to support a plan to publish catalogues with sample facsimiles of all the objectively dated manuscripts copied before 1600 (or at least 1550), i.e., up to a time by which the codex was definitively replaced by the printed book. The international committee, under whose aegis each nation would publish its own dated, and if it so desired also its objectively placed, manuscripts, became in 1957 the Comité International de Paléographie (Latine, added to its name in 1985 = CIPL) and henceforth provided permanent patronage and direction for paleographical studies.

The first volume of the Catalogue des manuscrits datés (= CMD), issued in two parts for the descriptions and the facsimiles respectively, appeared in 1959 and dealt with the Musée Condé and Parisian libraries other than the Bibliothèque Nationale. By 2000 42 volumes had been published, mostly also in two parts, treating the dated manuscripts in Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Great Britain, Holland, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, and Vatican City. Even though most of these national catalogues are still not wholly complete, there are now facsimiles of almost 25,000 dated manuscripts available for comparison by anyone who wishes to date an undated manuscript, and also available of course for anyone interested in tracing the history of Latin scripts. This is certainly one of the greatest accomplishments in the whole history of paleography. That no analogous project has yet been undertaken for the publication of dated documents (charters, etc.) down to modern times, however desirable this would be, is undoubtedly due to its enormity, since most documents are dated and would therefore have to be included.

If photography marked a new era in the history of paleography by making a generic advance over hand-drawn facsimiles and by giving in its further developments—enlargement, ultraviolet and infrared lights, color filters, x-rays, beta-radiography, etc.—an image of a manuscript often more clear and legible than the original itself, a still greater era may have been introduced with the invention of the computer and of digitalized reproduction or electronic “photography.” Enlargement can now be pushed far beyond the possibilities of traditional photography without a loss of precision. Data can be manipulated to enhance or deemphasize any element one chooses, with an obvious advantage for the reading of palimpsests. The application of computerization to the study of scripts is still in its infancy, but the use of digitalized images, eventually of thousands and thousands of manuscripts, promises to make paleographical study enormously easier, cheaper, and more thorough, and to make all of these advantages accessible even in the privacy of the paleographer's own home.

Modern Trends in Paleography. In England and in Austria at the beginning of the 20th century two calligraphers, Edward Johnston and Rudolph von Larisch, as a result of their researches in Latin manuscripts, began to study the writing technique and the shape and holding of the pen best adapted for forming the ancient letters (see E. Johnston, Writing and Illuminating and Lettering, London 1906; and the work of a student of Larisch, Otto Hurm, Schriftform im Schreibwerkzeug, Vienna 1928). In France in the 1930s and 1940s, Jean Mallon and R. Marichal sought to find in the technical modifications of ancient writing the origin of the considerable changes that Latin writing had undergone during the first four centuries of the Christian era. Their research was independent of that of Johnston and Larisch but led to similar conclusions. In Germany many scholars working in fields touching paleography tried, with considerable temerity, to explain the variations of script in the light of similar changes in architecture and the other arts; at the same time others applied graphology to the history of writing (see H. Fichtenau, Mensch und Schrift im Mittelalter, Vienna 1946). As paleography became conscious of its true object, it was more able to clarify its relationship to neighboring disciplines. The study of book scripts was no longer isolated from that of the book itself; and, in fact, a new name, “codicology,” was invented for this specialized discipline. This new tendency, advocated particularly in Belgium by F. Masai, led to the creation in Brussels in 1946 of the review Scriptorium and in Paris in 1982 of the Gazette du livre médiéval which has since become the organ for the CIPL and its companion organization, the Association Paléographique Internationale Culture-Écriture- Société (= APICES). Finally, greater knowledge of the Latin papyri of Egypt has given greater urgency to the question of the relationship between Greek and Latin writing, even though J. Mallon’s wish to establish a distinct field of “Greco-Roman” paleography has not come to fruition.

These various developments have resulted in some new theories regarding the history of Latin script. Originally the Greek, Etruscan, and Latin alphabets consisted of “capitals,” i.e., generally their form was similar to the letters that are still used in the titles of most books and signs; hence their name. Over a long period the capital, more or less carelessly employed, had been the only form of Latin writing, and at the beginning of the Christian era it was still the only bookscript. The script that became the printers’ Roman type font of today, the minuscule, was the humanistic round hand that had been revived at the beginning of the 15th century by the humanists of Florence from the Caroline minuscule of the Carolingian renaissance. To be sure, the Caroline minuscule underwent many changes after the 9th century. Toward the end of the 12th century it assumed angular forms that made the humanists disdainfully call it “Gothic,” a name that it still retains but without the pejorative connotations. As writing developed, this Gothic minuscule, while continuing in a formal textual or textura mode, was also debased into various cursive forms, which during the 16th century became extremely difficult to read. These cursive hands continued to be used throughout the 17th century especially by notaries, bailiffs, and lawyers. But at Florence, in the first half of the 15th century, a humanistic cursive hand, the model for the later Italic type font, had been created, paralleling the humanistic round hand and influenced by it. The humanistic cursive had its beginning in the chanceries. Meanwhile in France the normal Gothic cursive hand, known as bastard Gothic, became the book hand, particularly for books written in the vernacular. Modern forms of handwriting were born of both the humanistic cursive and the bastard hands. Therefore, since the 14th century at the latest, all Latin forms of writing have been derived, at least in part or indirectly, from the Caroline minuscule.

Where the Caroline minuscule came from thus becomes the obvious question, to which, basically, two answers have been given. One claims that it comes ultimately out of the later Roman cursive as this was modified in Merovingian Gaul and gradually through a number of pre-Caroline stages made more simple and written more deliberately. This answer can explain all the letter forms in Caroline minuscule except its uncial a. The other answer derives it from half-uncial, which can explain all its letter forms except a, g, and n. The two answers, however, are not as incompatible as they might seem. The scribes who first produced a recognizable Caroline minuscule had undoubtedly earlier been writing a more cursive pre-Caroline minuscule and the new script retained the proportions and something of the vitality of their earlier script. At the same time the models towards which the pre-Caroline letters were moving came, except for a, g, and n, from half-uncial. But they did not become quite identical with the half-uncial forms—they were less broad and more supple—and the Caroline minuscule scribes continued to make a clear distinction between their script and half-uncial, using the latter mainly for special purposes such as prefaces or first lines of new texts.

If one wants to trace the origins of Caroline minuscule back beyond the later Roman cursive or half-uncial, there is now available, thanks to the excavations of archaeologists since the late 19th century, a considerable amount of new material to compare from the first centuries, including older or earlier Roman cursive and early half-uncial or primitive minuscule. Even the new material, however, is still too sparse, particularly from the crucial second and third centuries, to bring about a unanimous answer. Those who see Caroline minuscule deriving from further developments in the later Roman cursive tend to find the origin of this cursive in the earlier Roman cursive, thanks to changes in the direction of the strokes and to writing dynamics (cf. Bischoff 1990, 65). The earlier Roman cursive would derive from capital script. The later Roman cursive would also be the source of both primitive minuscule and half-uncial. Those who see Caroline minuscule deriving directly from half-uncial tend to find the origin of half-uncial in early half-uncial or primitive minuscule. This latter script would derive in turn from the capital script under the influence of a changed angle of the writing material with respect to the scribe, the result of the change from the papyrus roll to the codex form of the book and possibly also of a different manner of holding the pen. The later Roman cursive would derive from the primitive minuscule (cf. Marichal).

To the paleographer the broad lines in the development of Latin writing appear to have been surely drawn: they follow closely the outline of the intellectual evolution of Western civilization. Yet one very challenging task remains: to determine—with greater or lesser certainty, depending on the degree to which the various types of Gothic and humanistic scripts have been “canonized”—the geographical and chronological characteristics of the last three centuries of the Middle Ages, thereby permitting the localizing and dating of all the documents of that period. With this achievement, rendered immensely more feasible by the many series of Manuscripts Dated now available, paleography will have made a valuable contribution to the history of culture and to the history of the diffusion of ideas, a contribution which it alone can supply.

Bibliography: G. BATTELLI, Lezioni di paleografia latina (4th ed. Vatican City 1999). B. BISCHOFF, Latin Palaeography: Antiquity and the Middle Ages, trans. by D. Ó CRÓINÍN and D. GANZ (Cambridge-New York 1990) from Paläographie des römischen Altertums und des abendländischen Mittelalters (2nd ed. Berlin 1986). B. BISCHOFF et al., Nomenclature des écritures livresques du IXe au XVIe siècle (Paris 1954). G. CENCETTI, Lineamenti di storia della scrittura latina (Bologna 1954; reprinted with bibliographical update 1997). J. J. JOHN, “Latin Paleography” in Medieval Studies: An Introduction, ed. by J. M. POWELL (2nd ed. Syracuse 1992) 3–81. J. MALLON, Paléographie romaine (Madrid 1952). R. MARICHAL, “L’Écriture latine et la civilisation occidentale du Ier au XVIe siècle,” in L’Écriture et la psychologie des peuples (Paris 1963) 199–247. M. B. PARKES, English Cursive Book Hands 1250–1500 (Oxford 1969). A. M. PIAZZONI, “Vers une paléographie électronique?” in Gazette du livre médiéval 33 (1998) 11–19. F. STEFFENS, Lateinische Paläographie (2nd ed. Trier 1909, and 3rd unaltered ed. Berlin 1929, reprinted 1964), still the best general collection of facsimiles. B. L. ULLMAN, The Origin and Development of Humanistic Script (Rome 1960). C. E. WRIGHT, English Vernacular Hands (Oxford 1960). Current bibliography in Gazette du livre médiéval (Paris 1982– ) and the “Bulletin codicologique,” in Scriptorium (Brussels 1959– ).

[R. MARICHAL/J. J. JOHN]

PALESTINE

This article treats the topic of Palestine under the following headings: (1) The Name, (2) Physical Geography, (3) Political Geography, (4) Natural History, (5) Archeology, (6) Pre-Israelite Ethnology, and (7) Holy Places.

1. The Name

The term Palestine is derived from the PHILISTINES who invaded and settled the central and southern coastal area of the Holy Land about the same time that the Israelites were invading the central highlands from the eastern and southern deserts (c. 1200 B.C.). In early Christian terminology Palestine included the territory that extended from the foothills of the Lebanon Mountains in the north to the edge of the desert, the Negeb, in the south, and from the Mediterranean Sea eastward to the Transjordan Plateau, a usage derived from the Roman designation Syria Palaestina for this area, the southern section of the Roman province of Syria. This usage prevails today.

Stele depicting lion and dog fights, 14th century, Palestine.

Biblical Names for Palestine. The writers of the pentateuch called this territory CANAAN and its inhabitants Canaanites (Gn 12.5; Ex 15.15). The Hebrews, after their gradual conquest of it during the 12th and 11th centuries B.C., called it the land of Israel, the name that they used to refer to their confederation of 12 tribes descended from the patriarch Israel (Jacob). They considered it to be the land promised them by God as part of His covenant blessing (Heb 11.9; Gn 12.6–7; Ex 12.25). After the Exile, Zechariah termed it the Holy Land, the land of Yahweh’s holy people, ruled by Him as their King (Zec 2.16; 2 Mc 1.7; Ex 19.5–8). In Hellenistic and Roman times it was known as Judea from JUDAH, the tribe that dwelt in the hill country from JERUSALEM south to Beer-sheba. To this greatly reduced territory the Jewish exiles returned from Babylon and there established an ethnicity that became the Hasmonaean Kingdom.

Nazareth and Church of Annunciation, Israel. (©Richard T. Nowitz/CORBIS)

More generally, localities that were frequently mentioned or that played an important part in the Bible have been given the name Lands of the Bible. These extended much beyond the confines of Israel at the time of its greatest expansion in the reigns of David and Solomon (10th century B.C.). The OT Bible Lands included what is known today as the Fertile Crescent going from UR, an ancient city of Sumer, near the Persian Gulf, through the fertile lands of Mesopotamia, North Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine, to the lands made fruitful by the Nile River. They also included, in late books of the OT, Persia, Asia Minor, Greece and its islands, and Rome. In the NT the geographical outlook spread with the carrying of the gospel "to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1.8) and became centered more to the west, on Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy, mainly because of the Pauline literature and the Acts. This general area is of interest to all serious Biblical students, but this article restricts itself to the much smaller territory known as Palestine.

The Area of Modern Palestine. Palestine lies between the Arabian Desert and the Great Sea, the Mediterranean, as east and west boundaries; its north and south limits are the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon massif and the southern desert, approximately from the 33rd to the 29th degree north latitude (roughly the latitude of Alabama). This north to south expanse corresponds generally to that of the Biblical description, from Dan to Beer-sheba (Jgs 20.1; 1 Sm 3.20), a distance of about 145 air miles. The greatest extent from east to west is close to 100 miles in the southern area when one includes the Transjordan region. The territory's total area therefore is only about 10,000 square miles, 4,000 of them east of the Jordan. Palestine is smaller than Belgium, hardly larger than Sicily, and approximately the same size as Vermont.

2. Physical Geography

Palestine's position on a land bridge between the ancient civilizations of the Tigris-Euphrates and Nile Valleys gave it a special importance as a highway for caravans and rival armies. It also was the only easy land passage from Egypt to the Phoenician coast and on to Asia Minor; the Transjordan route to the Red Sea and southern Arabia ran along its eastern boundary. By its physical surroundings, therefore, it was one of the main crossroads of the Near East. Israel's economic, political, and cultural life was always greatly influenced by this fact.

Topography of Palestine. Three of the four main regions of Palestine are mentioned in Nm 13.29: the highlands, the seacoast, and the Jordan Valley. Add to these the Transjordan Plateau, and one obtains four zones, running north and south, parallel to the sea, which may be considered separately in their physical and topographical characteristics. Here only three will be described, the coastal plain, the hill country, and Transjordan

The Coastal Plain. Most of Palestine's littoral is flat and without natural shelter except for the smallest boats. The eastbound currents that run along the north coast of Africa have banked the shores with sand as far north as Mt. Carmel, leaving a straight coastline without natural harbors. In fact, the two seaports that had any importance, Joppa and CAESAREA, were mainly artificial. North of Palestine the irregular coast of Phoenicia provided many harbors suitable for ancient ships, the most important being Tyre and Sidon whence ships sailed southwest to Egypt and Carthage and northwest to the Aegean and Italy. The best harbor along Palestine's coast was Acco, the Greek Ptolemais (Acts 21.7), and St. Jean d'Acre of the crusaders, a port that remained throughout the biblical period in other than Israelite possession. Acco's function as a port has now passed to Haifa at the foot of Mt. Carmel, southward across the Bay of Acco.

The limestone hills of Upper Galilee reach all the way to the coast a short distance south of Tyre and form a headland separating the Phoenician plain from that of Acco or Asher, thus protecting the southern approach to Tyre. Southward, beyond the Plain of Asher (very fertile, except for the sand dunes along the shore) and the interruption of Mt. Carmel projecting its head into the sea, the narrow plain of Dor (Jos 12.23; 1 Mc 15.11-14) widens into the marshy, luxuriant plain of Sharon, in biblical times thickly covered with an oak forest (Is 33.9; 35.2) and now famous for its citrus groves. The plain of Sharon extends to the valley of Aijalon, which joins the Brook of Cana to enter the sea a little north of Joppa. The rich plain of Philistia, the ancient land of the Philistines, lies to the south of this main entrance into the hill country of Judea and Ephraim, occupying a section of the coast that is likewise very fertile except for the sand dunes along the shore. The area's fertility was exploited by Palestinian Arabs who cultivated extensive citrus groves there, now the possession of the Israelis. Farther south the annual rainfall diminishes rapidly and the plain gradually becomes desert in the western reaches of the Negeb. The width of the coastal plain varies from five miles at Acco, and two miles around Dor, to the maximum of 20 miles inland from Gaza.

This coastland provided the main route northward from Egypt, "the way of the Philistines' land" (Ex 13.17). It terminated its desert journey across the base of the Sinai triangle at Gaza, where it met the road leading east to Beer-sheba. The next main junction was just outside Askelon, where it crossed the road going inland to Lachish, thence to Jerusalem and JERICHO. It then passed before the walls of Ashdod at the confluence of three valleys coming down from the east, then on to Jabneel, crossing the road to Jerusalem through the Valley of Sorek. Farther north it met at Beth-Dagon, the main road between Joppa and Lydda that continued eastward to Aijalon, the Beth-Horons, and Ramah. A caravan having business in the western Plain of Sharon, Caesarea, Dor, Acco, and the Phoenician coast would have veered west to Joppa here and then north along the coast, but one whose destination was Damascus or the Plain of Esdraelon with its many important cities would have continued directly north until it came to the western end of the pass of MEGIDDO, whence it would veer northeastward toward the Sea of Galilee, passing many junctions with east-west roads. The coastal plain was therefore a funnel for almost all traffic toward Egypt. The only other route was the more difficult Road to Shur from Beer-sheba southwestward through the Negeb and the Desert of Shur to Lake Timsah, a way that the Israelites would have had to follow whenever enemies occupied the Philistine Plain.

The Hill Country. East of the coastal plain the highland ridge of Judea and Ephraim does not begin immediately, but some foothills of more recent formation interpose a barrier to direct entrance to the hill country. Along this minor ridge important frontier cities were placed, such as Aijalon, Gezer, Lachish, and Debir, guarding the various valleys leading farther inland. This region was called the Shephelah, the foothills of Dt 1.7. To its east and forming another natural barrier lay a narrow chalkstone valley or moat sometimes referred to as the Moat of Judah. One easily sees why the Israelites and the Philistines were continually vying to control this territory.

Tel Hazor, Israel. (©Richard T. Nowitz/CORBIS)

The central highlands of Palestine are the backbone of the country, formed by the ridge of Judah and Ephraim that, with only the interruption of the Plain of Esdraelon, runs from the Negeb to join, through Lower and Upper Galilee, the Lebanon ranges. The Lebanons rise 6,000 feet above the sea level, while in the Anti-Lebanon range Mt. Hermon towers at 9,232 feet. Palestine's highest peak is Mt. Jarmak in Upper Galilee at almost 4,000 feet. Compared to these heights Mt. Tabor, five miles east of NAZARETH in Lower Galilee, is not much more than a prominent hill rising out of the Esdraelon Plain to less than 2,000 feet.

Upper Galilee is a lofty plateau, rugged and wild, forming the foothills of the Lebanons, with Safad as its principal modern town. The waters of Merom (Jos 11.5, 7) were probably those of the Wadi Meiron east of Safad. The ancient Hyksos and Canaanite city of Hazor (Jos 11.10; 1 Kgs 9.15) and its plain lie on the eastern slope of the central ridge, a short distance southwest of Lake Huleh.

Lower Galilee is a series of transverse, east-to-west ridges alternating with enclosed valleys and picturesque wooded defiles. This was the more populated and cultivated part of northern Palestine, the "District of the Gentiles" and "the seaward road," i.e., the main trunk route past the Sea of Galilee and Hazor to Damascus (Is 8.23; see also Mt 4.15). Bethsaida, the home town of the Apostles Peter, Andrew, and Philip, at the northern end of the Sea of Galilee, CAPERNAUM, the headquarters of Jesus during the first part of His public ministry (Mt 4.13), and Tiberias, built in honor of the Roman Emperor Tiberius by HEROD ANTIPAS during the life of Jesus, were really in the Jordan Valley but can be considered as Galilean cities. Sepphoris was the capital of Herod's tetrarchy of Galilee (Lk 3.1) before he built Tiberias. Some other important cities of Galilee were Arbela (1 Mc 9.2), CANA (Jn 2.1), Endor (1 Sm 28.7–8), Nain (Lk 7.11–17), and Shunem (2 Kgs 4.8). Gabaath-Hammore (Jgs 7.1), an ancient volcano a few miles south of Tabor, is responsible for the fertility of the surrounding valleys and was called at one time "Little Hermon." NAZARETH is a pleasant spot nestling on the side of a steep hill a few miles south of Sepphoris. The Horns of Hattin, a pass along the main trunk route as it descended to the Sea of Galilee, was a strategic spot and the site of many battles, including SALADIN's victory over the crusaders in 1187.

Ancient center of the tribe of Dan in the plain at the foot of Mt. Hebron near the northeast border of Palestine. (©Shai Ginott/CORBIS)

The plains of Megiddo and Jezreel form an important break in the central highlands and an easy passage from the Mediterranean to the Jordan Valley. The water parting near Jezreel marks the division between the two valleys. The Plain of Megiddo, "the great plain" (1 Mc 12.49), and the coastal Plain of Acco are drained to the west by the Kishon River, which in the rainy season becomes a torrent (Jgs 5.21). In the Hellenistic period the Plain of Megiddo was called the Plain of Esdraelon, from the Greek name for Jezreel, a town guarding its eastern boundary. From Jezreel a more narrow plain drops off quickly eastward to below sea level and merges into the plain of Beth-shan, part of the Jordan Valley. These plains formed a zone of great agricultural wealth and strategic importance, as is clear from the many fortified cities guarding their gates, from west to east, Jokneam, Megiddo, Taanach, Ibleam, Jezreel, and Beth-Shan. Megiddo, already occupied in the 4th millennium B.C., was where King Josiah was killed in battle while trying to stop the northward march of the Egyptian army under Neco (2 Kgs 23.29). Since so many battles were fought at this pass, it became in Revelation (16.14–16), under the form Armageddon, the scene of the last great battle between the forces of good and evil. Beth-Shan (1 Sm 31.10) was known in the Hellenistic period as Scythopolis (2 Mc 12.29–30), a city of the DECAPOLIS. Mt. Gilboa, just west of Beth-Shan and the site of Saul's death (2 Sm 1.21), forms the northeast end of the mountain ridge of Ephraim.

The highlands of Ephraim or Samaria, rising to the maximum height of 3,332 feet at Baal-Hazor just northeast of Bethel (2 Sm 13.23), have several fertile valleys and small plains, those of Dothan, SHECHEM, and Lebona. The Judean section of the range is more uniformly hill country and less fertile, although adequate for olive groves and vineyards. No well-defined geographical feature, however, marks the boundary between the regions of Ephraim and Judah.

Ascending from the plain of Esdraelon, the highland road passed the cities of Dothan, Samaria, and Shechem, which controlled the important defile between Mt. Gerizim and Mt. Ebal, the mounts of cursing and blessing (Dt 27.11–13). Farther south the road followed the water parting most of the time, passing near Lebona, Shiloh, BETHEL, Mizpeh, Machmas, Gibeah, Jerusalem, BETHLEHEM, and reaching its highest point just north of Hebron, whence it descended to Beer-sheba. At Hebron another road branched off to the southeast, passing Carmel of Judah, Maon, Arad, and joining the road from Beer-sheba that led to the Araba and the mining and smelting area of Eziongeber.

East of the divide the land falls rapidly to the Jordan Valley, forming an eroded wilderness that is much more desolate in the southern Judean section. From Shechem a road along the Wadi Fara leads gradually down to the Jordan Valley and was possibly the way used by Abraham and his family to ascend to Shechem (Gn 12.6). More arduous canyon roads link Bethel and Jerusalem with Jericho. South of Jerusalem the paths leading down to the Dead Sea along canyon walls were used only by shepherds or fugitives, for they terminated in the wilderness of Judah, useful only for winter grazing and seclusion from the inhabited lands.

The central and southern hill country of Palestine has the aspect of a pocket cut off from the surrounding regions by the narrowness of its transverse valleys and canyons. Although it was close to the main trunk route of the Middle East, it was not astride it, as was the Plain of the Philistines and the Esdraelon Valley. It looked down upon the crossroads of the world and the caravans laden with treasures from Egypt and Mesopotamia, but it was by its physical nature aloof in its heights. Passing armies could ignore it on their way to Egypt or to Syria and Iraq and would slash back at it only when it provoked or hindered them in their main purpose. This physical aloofness has always been an important factor in the hill country's history.

Transjordan. The great plateau east of the Jordan Valley, with its lofty and precipitous bluffs facing toward the west and its gradual merging with the Arabian Desert to the east, is commonly known as the Transjordan. The lowest level on the plateau is 1,500 feet, but to the south in Edom it rises to 5,000 feet. Its principal peaks in the central region range in height from 3,500 to 4,000 feet.

Four important river valleys, the Yarmuk, the Jabbok, the Arnon, and the Zered cut this tableland in a westerly direction and form boundaries of well-known regions. North and east of the Yarmuk lay Bashan and the plain of Hauran. Gilead with its fertile highland valley lay between the Yarmuk and the Arnon, and at the eastern headwaters of the Jabbok the kingdom of Ammon flourished. Sihon's Amorrite kingdom once possessed all of the region from the Arnon to the Jabbok but was conquered by the Israelites and surrendered its territory to the tribes of Gad and Reuben. Moab (see MOABITES) was originally situated between the Arnon and the Zered (Nm 21.13) but later extended its territory northward to include the eastern bank of the Jordan River just north of the Dead Sea, thus giving its name to this region, the Plains of Moab. South of the Zered lay Edom in the highest part of the Transjordan. Farther south the Midianites, a seminomadic people, dwelt along the shores of the Gulf of Aqaba.

The King's Highway (Nm 20.17) was the main route running north and south along this plateau from Damascus to Aqaba. In Roman times it was Trajan's Road, and under Turkish rule, the Sultan's Highway. By it the Damascus market had access to the exotic products of South Arabia. Some of the most important towns along the route were Theman, Sela, and Bozrah in Edom; Kir-hareseth (the capital), Aroer, and Dibon in Moab; Madaba and Heshebon in land constantly contested between Moabites and Israelites; Rabbah, the capital of Ammon, conquered by Joab and David (Philadelphia, now Amman, the capital of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan); Gerasa, a city of Gilead, captured by Alexander Jannaeus, one of the HASMONAEOANS, in 83 B.C.; Ramoth in Gilead, Arbela; and finally, in Bashan, Ashtaroth and Karnaim (Gn 14.5; Am 6.13).

The fertile region of Transjordan was much wider in the north (in Bashan and Hauran) than in the south. Gilead was also very fertile, producing oil, wine, and grain, the staples of the Near East, and was famous for its timber.

Hydrography of Palestine. In Dt 8.7 Palestine is described as a land highly favored by water courses and springs, and other texts mention numerous wells. A land's water resources depend on its climate, especially its rainfall, and on its geological nature.

Climate. In no such small area of the world are there such differences in rainfall and climate as are found in Palestine. This is due to a complex of causes: its situation between the southeastern angle of the Mediterranean and the vast Arabian Desert, its hill country immediately falling off to the world's lowest and hottest valley, and its high plateau in the Transjordan. Whatever the causes, the effects are startling.

The climate's main feature is its two seasons: the long, completely dry summer, and the comparatively short rainy season when cyclonic storms come blowing off the sea. The rainy season has a quite variable beginning and ending, the early and late rains of the Bible (Dt 11.14) both of great importance. The early rains are necessary for plowing and planting, the late rains for bringing the grain to full ear. The early rains should begin in late October, and when they are delayed until late November or even early January the crops suffer from a tardy germination. The heaviest rains arrive in January, February, and early March, not the steady, soaking rain of more northern regions, but heavy showers, continuous on the first day of the storm, followed by intermittent showers for two or three days. Once the storm has passed, the atmosphere becomes extremely clear, and one may look from Jerusalem and see to the east every crag of the mountains of Moab more than 30 miles away. This is the time for collecting as much water as possible in pools and cisterns for the long dry season ahead. The late rains, ripening the harvest, occur in late March and early April, but when they come much later and are violent hail storms, the crops and the frail blossoms on the fruit trees may suffer irreparable damage.

May and early June on the one hand and late September and October on the other are transitional periods during which the dry, scorching desert wind, the sirocco, may descend on Palestine without warning and with dire results for all living things. The heat and dryness are oppressive; verdure quickly withers; the air becomes opaque with fine sand that magnifies the sun's heat; and man and beast grow irritable. Fortunately, the sirocco usually last for no more than two or three days—in autumn, blown away by the rain-burdened westerly winds, and in June, by the summer westerlies that become a constant feature of every day when the land heat of late morning grows intense enough to draw them from the sea.

From mid-June to mid-September the weather pattern remains the same, the heat of the late morning gives way to the cooling sea breeze of the afternoon, which gradually moves inland, reaching the edge of Transjordan by about 4 P.M. Along the coast the humidity is higher; the breeze, less refreshing; and the discomfort of the day, prolonged into the night. In the hill country the nights are cool and the shade during the day is always refreshing compared to the coast's humid shade. In the Jordan Rift even the sea air rushing down its steep slopes is so heated that it becomes only an afternoon annoyance. The wind's effect on the eastern plateau is refreshing, but it arrives too late to lower the day's heat very much.

The amount of rainfall diminishes greatly from north to south, from west to east, and from higher to lower altitudes. The annual rainfall of Jerusalem is almost 24 inches, while only five miles to the east it decreases rapidly; and in Jericho, 17 miles away, it measures only about five inches. At Beer-sheba, 50 miles south of Jerusalem, the annual rainfall measures only eight to nine inches, but at the same altitude and distance to the north it measures more than 20. In the highlands of Upper Galilee it reaches more than 35 inches; on the summit of Mt. Hermon, the source of the Jordan River's water, the annual precipitation is more than 60 inches. The coastal region, because of its low altitude, receives less rain than the hills; thus Transjordan, higher than the central ridge, sometimes receives more rainfall than Jerusalem, although it is much farther from the sea. One must remember that Palestine's annual rainfall is crowded into a five-month period, a fact that is important in understanding its reliance on springs, wells, and cisterns, and the formation of its wadis or torrent canyons.

Springs and Wells. The absorbent limestone structure of Palestine's rock bed provides storage for the heavy winter rains. The sources of the subterranean water occur sporadically throughout most of the land and afford places for human habitation. The main towns usually were built near an important spring or well, and intricate subterranean passages were devised to bring the well's water within the city walls so that in times of siege a supply would always be available. Such a tunnel to the fountain of Gihon in Jerusalem was repaired and extended by Hezekiah in preparation for the onslaught of the Assyrians (2 Kgs 20.20). Similar constructions have been found at Megiddo, Lachish, Gibeon, etc. The spring at Jericho is one of the main reasons why this is the site of the oldest-known town in the world.

Where well water was insufficient, or simply to supply a greater abundance of water, cisterns were built to store the winter rains. Samaria, built by Israel's King Omri, had no natural spring and depended solely on its vast cisterns.

Rivers and Wadis. The only copious perennial watercourse in Palestine that merits comparison with even a minor American river is the Jordan. The few perennial rivers are rushing torrents during the rainy season, quickly draining the highlands and causing marshes in the low-lying plains, but, as summer advances, they become quiet rivulets whose courses may be discovered only by the vegetation along their narrow banks. Most of the watercourses, however, flow only during the rainy season, becoming dry beds or washes soon after its end.

The wadis of Palestine have scarred the domelike hill country with deep canyons, especially on the eastern and western slopes of the Jordan rift. One of the most impressive wadis is the canyon of the River Arnon, which rivals the rugged beauty of the canyons of the southwestern U.S. Though they are beautiful, these torrents have been the main source of erosion of the hill country. They also are impediments to travelers and the cause of many a tortuous road.

Bibliography: F. M. ABEL, Géographie de la Palestine, 2 v. (Paris 1933–38). L. H. GROLLENBERG, Atlas of the Bible, tr. J. M. REID and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1956). M. DU BUIT, Géographie de la Terre Sainte (Paris 1958). Oxford Bible Atlas, ed. H. G. MAY et al. (New York 1962). D. BALY, The Geography of the Bible (New York 1957); Geographical Companion to the Bible (New York 1963).

[E. LUSSIER]

3. Political Geography

“This is a list of the kings whom Joshua and the Israelites conquered west of the Jordan . . . thirty-one kings in all” (Jos 12.7–24). A statement such as this gives a good indication of conditions in Palestine prior to the Israelite invasion. It was a land divided, a country of mixed population and independent city-states. (For the pre-Israelite ethnology of the country, see section 6 below.) However, this feature is characteristic of Palestine throughout its long history. Rarely was there ever one single united country, and when, on occasion, such a union was achieved, it was of relatively short duration.

