Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

MOSAICS

Pictures or patterns formed by closely spaced polychrome or monochrome stones (tesserae) of near uniform size, natural or artificial, embedded in a binder, such as cement. In its use as architectural revetment and pavement surfacing, mosaic combines decorative qualities with a high resistance to humidity and wear. These qualities mosaic shares with related media, such as glazed tile, stone incrustation, and inlay. The latter differ from mosaic in that their units are larger and of varying sizes and shapes. The employment of these media began very early in history. An inlay depicting animal fables decorates an early dynastic harp from Ur (Museum of the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia). Glazed tile is found in the funerary precinct of Pharaoh Zoser of the Third Dynasty in Old Kingdom Egypt. It is noteworthy that the extensive and refined use of stone incrustation parallels that of mosaic during the late Roman and early Byzantine periods.

Terminology. The term “mosaic” seems borrowed from the Greek μοῦσα. In its present meaning it is of late antique origin (Spartian, Pesc. Nig. 6.8: “pictum de musio”; Trebellius Pollio, Trig. Tyr. 25.4: “pictura est de museo”; Augustine, Civ. 16.1.1: “quae musivo picta sunt”). The term seems to have been applied at first only to wall and vault decoration and not to pavements. A list of artisans in a decree of A.D. 337 (Cod. Theod. 13.4.2) includes both tessellarii who laid mosaic pavements and musivarii, makers of wall and vault mosaics. The comprehensive use of the term to include both kinds of mosaic became established gradually in the post-antique period.

Early History. The earliest recorded use of mosaic is found in Sumer. A temple façade in Warka (Biblical Erech), dating from the protoliterate period before 3000 B.C., was covered with geometric designs formed by colored cones of fired clay embedded in the walls. Luxury objects and jewelry decorated with a mosaic inlay of costly materials were produced in ancient Mesopotamia, Crete, and Egypt. However, a continuity of mosaic production on a large scale can be observed only since ancient Greece. Beyond the boundaries of European civilization the Aztecs and Mayans had developed an independent production of turquoise mosaics used on armor and luxury articles.

Ancient Greece and Rome. In ancient Greece figural scenes composed of polychrome pebbles have been found on pavements dating from the late 5th and early 4th centuries B.C. These pebble mosaics were popular in the early Hellenistic period. Some examples of rare quality have been excavated at Olynthus and Pella. Polychrome pebble pavements of decorative design were used during the archaic period. The earliest pebble mosaic is of the late 8th century; it was discovered at Gordion in Asia Minor and consists of geometric designs distributed in a blue and red pattern on a white ground.

It seems likely that the rounded shapes of pebbles and their limited polychromy as found in nature induced the Greeks to stress silhouette and outline in the design of their figured pebble mosaics. Nonetheless, certain of these display a considerable degree of modeling in the round, notably the “Stag Hunt” by Gnosis excavated at Pella.

During the Hellenistic period the development of the practice of cutting stones into small pieces of deliberate shape, called tesserae, allowed for an increase of sophistication in pictorial design akin to painting, with which the pebble mosaics had not been able to compete. An example of this technique is a panel by Sophilos depicting Alexandria personified found at Thmuis in Egypt.

Other tessellated pavements of the 3d century B.C. have been found in Morgantina. By the 2d century before Christ tessellated pavements achieved an extreme refinement in technique and pictorial conventions. Mosaics found in the palace of the Attalids at Pergamon, dating from the period before the annexation of the city by the Romans (133 B.C.), are among the finest Hellenistic pavements known. They are notable for the extremely small size of their tesserae and particularly for their rich polychromy intensified by the appearance—the earliest recorded on pavements—of glass tesserae in colors not available in natural stone. The development of a brilliant mosaic art during the Hellenistic period, attested by a limited number of originals, is corroborated by Roman copies and texts. The luxurious boats of Hellenistic rulers were decorated with mosaics. Sosos, a Pergamene mosaicist, is credited by Pliny with the invention of "the unswept floor," a subject often repeated on Roman mosaic pavements (Nat. Hist. 36.184). Roman reflections of sophisticated pictorial conventions developed in Hellenistic mosaic are found in the mosaics located in the lower sanctuary of Fortuna at Palestrina, from the period of Sulla (82–79 B.C.). One depicts a panoramic Nilotic landscape filled with human figures, architecture, and the fauna of Egypt. The other portrays a sanctuary of Neptune beneath the sea filled with fish and encompassed by a shore. The many abrupt changes in scale and orientation evident in the composition of this mosaic are in accord with its pavement location, which excludes the possibility of a consistent spatial vision on the part of the viewer.

The widespread use of mosaics in the decoration of the Hellenistic home is illustrated by the mosaic pavements located in middle-class houses in Delos of the 2d century B.C. During this century the Romans came into intimate contact with the Hellenistic world, and the Roman patricians soon adopted the practice of decorating homes with mosaic. The wealthy Campanian houses, buried by the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79, were amply decorated with mosaics. In the House of the Faun in Pompeii were found pavements dating from the latter part of the 2d century B.C. (Naples Museum). Most famous is the large panel depicting the victory of Alexander over Darius at Issus. It copies a Hellenistic painting, most likely by Philoxenos of Eretria. Judging from the recorded names of mosaicists on signed pavements, the artists were mainly of Greek origin.

During the period of the Roman Republic and the early Empire decorative mosaics were a popular means of pavement surfacing. Their tesserae were large, of relatively constant shape and size, and evenly laid. These decorative mosaics, whose production required no unusual talent, were called opus tessellatum by the Romans, who distinguished between them and the much finer opus vermiculatum (wormlike workmanship) comprising smaller figural panels made of much finer stones, irregularly disposed. Such smaller panels were capable of great refinements in pictorial modeling and landscape space. A number of the finest emblemata from Campanian houses, notably the Dioskurides panel from the House of the Faun, were mounted on plaques. The mounting indicates that they had been produced in specialized workshops and were then acquired for insertion in the pavements.

Occasionally mosaics in the towns buried by Vesuvius were used on the surfaces of walls and columns. In a small court of a house in Herculaneum an entire wall that contained a fountain and niches was decorated with mosaic. Sparkling glass tesserae depicted hounds chasing deer and vine branches and festoons set against a dark ground. On an adjacent wall appeared a panel portraying Neptune and Amphitrite. The resistance of mosaic surfaces to humidity led to their application on the walls and vaults of baths and nymphaea. However, the use of mosaic on a large scale can be traced only from the 2d century A.D. Remains of vault mosaics appear in the baths of the Sette Sapianti in Ostia and in the canopus of Hadrian's villa in Tivoli.

During the later Roman Empire the mosaic emblem of limited size containing figural subjects was gradually replaced by a more extensive pictorial design. This tendency involved changes toward simplification in technique and composition; it is evident in the black and white pavements popular in Italy during the 2d and 3d centuries A.D. These pavements allowed for a graphic clarity in the discernment of an expansive subject matter presented on a neutral white ground. The reduced mosaic style of late antiquity yielded masterpieces, for example, the polychrome mosaic of the Glorification of Hercules in the Tetrarchial villa at Piazza Armerina in Sicily.

Mosaic pavements were used widely in private homes and public buildings throughout the Empire. A particularly rich tradition of polychrome pavements in North Africa extends from the 1st century A.D. until after the Vandal conquest. An early North African pavement of unusual refinement was found in a villa at Zliten, dating from the later 1st century A.D. It depicts a plant scroll with various birds and animals distributed among the volutes. The extreme fineness of the work in the figured parts is indicated by the mean count of 40 to 50 tesserae per square centimeter.

Excavations that have been made at Antioch, in Asia Minor, have given evidence of a continuous mosaic production extending from the middle Empire into the early Byzantine period. A pavement showing the Seasons from the Constantinian villa in Antioch is square and sectioned into geometric fields disposed around a common center; this symmetrical mode of composition lent itself to the design of ceilings and domes.

Early Christian, Medieval, and Byzantine Mosaics. The development of mosaic as the preferred monumental art extends from early Christianity through the entire course of the Byzantine Empire. In the medieval West its use was centered in Italy and was dependent on the presence and influence of early Christian sources, as well as on the influence of Byzantium. Northern Christian Europe was acquainted with architectural mosaic until the Carolingian revival as witnessed by the original mosaic decoration of Charlemagne's Palatine chapel at Aachen. However, in the later Middle Ages mosaic as the preferred architectural decoration was replaced by sculpture, fresco, and stained glass.

The earliest extant vault mosaic in good condition is located in a modest Christian tomb beneath St. Peter's in Rome. Christ-Helios in a quadriga occupies the apex of the vault. A radiant halo surrounds the head, and the figure is displayed against a gold ground. A grapevine spreads over the golden vault, which preceded by a short period of time the construction of the church above it.

The intense polychromatic effect achieved in large interiors by the use of mosaic revetment, and especially by gold tesserae, is evident in Hagios Georgios in Thessalonica, whose mosaics date probably from the later 4th century. The most impressive of all must have been the interior of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (532–537; 557 and after) judging by descriptions contemporary with its construction. The gold mosaic surfacing of its vaults produced a radiance that was intended to transform the experience of the architectural interior into a vision of God's heaven: "The dome covers the church like the radiant heavens" (Paulus Silentiarius).

In centralized domed buildings with mosaic interiors, churches or baptisteries, the main subject is located in the center of the dome with subordinate subjects grouped around it. In the Baptistery of the Arians in Ravenna (c. 500) the Baptism of Christ is so situated. In the zone around the Baptism appear the Twelve Apostles. The dome of the Baptistery of the Orthodox (449–452) has a third zone that shows, in alternation, the four Gospel books set on altars and four ornate empty thrones (Ap 22.1–4).

The longitudinal basilica was decorated at times with mosaic on its façade. During the Middle Ages the façade of Old St. Peter's in Rome depicted the 24 Elders adoring the Holy Lamb (Ap 4.4–11). Mosaics were distributed around the interior of the basilica. The mosaics on the nave walls of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome (432–440) depict Old Testament scenes, and along the nave walls of Sant' Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna (6th century) processions of saints move in the direction of the apse. A striking apse mosaic is preserved in Sant' Apollinare in Classe (dedicated 549). In the center of the apse St. Apollinaris spreads his arms apart in the orans gesture. He is flanked by 12 lambs denoting the Apostles. Above the saint is depicted a Transfiguration rendered in symbolic terms. Christ appears in the shape of a cross enclosed in a mandorla that encloses a starry sky. A small bust of Christ is located at the center point of the cross. The three sheep beneath the mandorla symbolize the Apostles present at the Transfiguration. Elijah and Moses appear in the sky above. The mosaic decoration of the Christian sanctuary presented the illiterate devout with visual sermons whose beauty was intended to deepen the experience of faith. The mosaic panel in San Vitale in Ravenna depicting Justinian and his court illustrates an ability to represent succinct resemblances with reduced means.

In the later Byzantine period refined workmanship was particularly stressed, for instance, in the carefully modeled figures of the Deësis mosaic in Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (late 12th or 13th century). This tendency reached a peak in the portable mosaics of late Byzantium composed of extremely fine stones. Two such panels depict the 12 main feasts of the liturgical year (14th century; Opera del Duomo, Florence). The concern for the thematic distribution of mosaics within centralized interiors culminates in the decoration of the post-iconoclast cross-in-square church. In the church at Daphni (c. 1100) a severe Christ Pantocrator dominates the center of the dome and turns His eyes upon the devout beneath. Around Him are the 12 Apostles, and further below appear scenes from the life of Christ; the Virgin and Child occupy the eastern apse.

During the course of the Middle Ages the influence of Byzantine mosaics often reached far beyond the geographical boundaries of Byzantium. The mosaics of the Ummayyad mosque at Damascus (8th century) depict landscapes with villas, derived from ancient Roman and classicizing Byzantine sources and transmitted by Byzantine mosaicists working for Muslim patrons.

Byzantine influence in medieval Italy is reflected in the flourishing mosaic activity in the Veneto and Norman Sicily. The Norman kings employed Byzantine artists for the mosaic decoration of their cathedrals at Monreale and Cefalù (12th century). St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice (1063 and after), which was copied after the Church of the Holy Apostles in Constantinople, offers with its vast mosaic program perhaps the most cogent visual reflection of the interior decoration of the large churches of the Byzantine capital. The Virgin and Child in the apse of the basilica at Torcello (12th century), floating on a sea of gold, is perhaps the most striking example of Byzantine mosaic style in the West.

Rome, with its heritage of early Christian mosaics, remained an active center of mosaic production until the advent of the Renaissance. GIOTTO's most monumental pictorial work was the Navicella, a mosaic 52 feet wide and 33 feet high, located on the entrance tower facing the atrium of Old St. Peter's in Rome. This mosaic may well have imitated an early Christian model. A major artistic achievement of the 13th century in Tuscany was the vast mosaic decoration of the dome of the baptistry of Florence.

From the Renaissance until Modern Times. With the advent of the Italian Renaissance and the fall of Byzantium to the Turks mosaic ceased to be a primary artistic medium. From the 15th century onward it relied mainly on conventions established by the painters. The "Death of the Virgin" in the Mascoli Chapel in St. Mark's in Venice, perhaps the finest mosaic of its period (mid-15th century), illustrates this attitude. Its perspective depth explains, as in Renaissance painting, the natural spatial relationships within the panel itself; but its deep space is totally unrelated to the shape of the vault on which the panel rests. RAPHAEL supplied the cartoons for Luigi di Pace's mosaics in the dome of the Chigi Chapel in S. Maria del Popolo in Rome (1516). The reliance of the mosaicist on the painter can be traced in St. Mark's, Venice, during the following centuries. The 18th-century "Arrival of the Body of St. Mark" by Leopoldo del Pozzo, situated over the north door of the facade, is based on a cartoon by Sebastiano Ricci. The same situation prevailed elsewhere in Italy. During this period mosaicists had little interest in medieval work. Orazio Manenti's thorough reconstruction of Giotto's Navicella (1673–75), relocated in the narthex of St. Peter's in Rome, follows Giotto only in the general features of the composition.

In the later 18th century the renewal of interest in classical, early Christian, and medieval mosaics resulted in a growth of mosaic production throughout Europe; the renewal also reached America. This revival reflected in many ways the eclecticism of the period. Early Christian mosaics were carelessly restored, as in the case of the apse mosaic of San Michele in Affricisco in Ravenna, acquired by Prussia in 1844 and transferred to Berlin. Early Christian subject matter was rendered in an unrelated contemporary style, as in Burne-Jones's pre-Raphaelite "Christ Enthroned Flanked by Angels" in the American Church in Rome. The classical pavements discovered in the excavations of the Roman towns in Campania influenced the activity of the Belloni workshop in Paris during the early 19th century.

During the 19th and the early 20th centuries churches received extensive mosaic decoration. St. Paul's in London was partially decorated with mosaics after designs by G. F. Watts and Alfred Stevens. In Paris, the apse of the Panthéon was covered with a mosaic depicting "Christ Revealing to the Angel of France the Destinies of her People," and Magne and Merson depicted in Sacré Coeur (1912–23) a Christ in Glory, the Virgin, St. Michael, and Joan of Arc. The new cathedral in St. Louis, Mo. (dedicated in 1914) is decorated largely with mosaics designed by Albert Oerken. On the whole, the style of all these mosaics is eclectic and mechanical.

At the present time mosaic is used widely as an adjunct to architecture and as an independent art. But its importance is not clearly established. The preference in contemporary art for composite media has blurred the role of mosaic as an independent medium. The recent mosaics of Jeanne Reynal, consisting of tesserae scattered here and there on rough panels of colored cement, illustrate this tendency. Around the turn of the century Gaudí used mosaic together with glazed tile and other materials in the revetment of his art nouveau architecture in Barcelona.

In recent church architecture, because of the increased awareness of the medieval heritage of Christian mosaics, frequent use is made of mosaic for the decoration of central areas in the sanctuary. On the whole, however, the influence of the architecture of the International Style on recent churches and buildings in general, with its emphasis on clean wall surfaces and spatial clarity, seems to have impeded a broader role for architectural mosaic. A notable recent exception is the university library in Mexico City, designed and decorated by Juan O'Gorman. The exterior of the library is wholly covered with mosaics depicting scenes from the history of Mexico. In the bright sun these mosaics sheathe the building in a blaze of color.

MOSCATI, GIUSEPPE MARIO CAROLO ALPHONSE, ST.

Lay physician; b. Benevento, Italy, July 25, 1880; d. Naples, Italy, April 12, 1927. Giuseppe Moscati was seventh of the nine children of Francesco Moscati (d. Dec. 21, 1897), a magistrate, and his wife Rosa (d. Nov. 25, 1914). The family moved to Naples when his father was appointed (1884) president of the court. Following his graduation from secondary school with honors (1897), Giuseppe studied medicine at the University of Naples. He earned his degree with first-class honors (Aug. 14, 1903) by his thesis on hepatic urogenesis.

At age twenty-three Giuseppe began his career at the Santa Maria del Popolo Hospital for the Incurables in Naples. When Vesuvius erupted (April 1906), Moscati rushed to the hospital at Torre del Greco to help evacuate patients before the roof collapsed. Similarly, in 1911, he assisted in containing a cholera outbreak. That same year he finished his scientific preparation, passed the medical boards, was appointed to a university chair in biochemistry, and began lecturing on applied research and clinical research, as well as clinical medicine. He became known as one of the most outstanding researchers in his field.

In addition to his educational and scientific contributions, Giuseppe was a practicing physician and an administrator. In the course of time he was appointed director of military hospitals during World War I with the rank of major (1915), director of the Hospital for Incurables (July 16, 1919), coadjutor ordinary, medical director of the United Hospitals, director of the department of tuberculosis, and associate of the Royal Academy of Surgery.

Giuseppe Moscati is honored by the Church for the manner in which he practiced medicine. He required no payment from the poor, the homeless, religious, or priests, and, in fact, paid for their prescriptions himself. He used his time with patients to speak to them about the faith, often healing wounded souls as well as bodies. Moscati dedicated himself to the sacraments and prayer for his patients. He died peacefully of a stroke at age forty-seven. Three years later, his relics were translated to the church of Gesù Nuovo.

Moscati was declared venerable in 1973, beatified by Paul VI in 1975, and canonized by John Paul II, Oct. 25, 1987. Patron of bachelors.

Feast: Nov. 16.

MOSCHUS, JOHN

Seventh-century Byzantine monk and scriptural writer (also known as Eucratas); d. 619 or 620. He was a monk and traveler, known for his collection of vivid monastic tales titled Leimon or Neos Paradeisos (in Latin, Pratum Spirituale). Moschus began his monastic life at St. Theodosius' near Jerusalem in the third quarter of the sixth century. He made sojourns elsewhere in Palestine, Egypt, Sinai, Cyprus, Antioch, Egypt again, and finally Rome (614), usually accompanied by his disciple SOPHRONIUS the Sophist, later patriarch of Jerusalem.

Toward the end of his life, John set down over 300 tales of edifying incidents, replete with details of the life and beliefs of the times. These are dedicated to Sophronius, but the preface indicates that Sophronius saw to their publication after John's death in Rome and his burial at the monastery of St. Theodosius. Their circulation was widespread. There are translations in Old Slavonic and Arabic; in Latin, a partial translation of the ninth and eleventh centuries; in Italian, first printed in 1475; and in the Latin of AMBROSE TRAVERSARI (1423–24), published by Lippomano in 1558 and reprinted many times.

The Greek text was first printed by Fronton du Duc (1624), more completely by Cotelier (1686). French translations appeared in 1599, in 1653 by Arnauld d'Andilly, and in 1946 by M. J. Rouët de Journal. There seems to be no English translation. It is a neglected source of social and religious history, and a critical edition is needed. Sophronius and Moschus also composed a life of John the Almsgiver, Patriarch of Alexandria, of which only a portion has survived.

MOSES

Leader of the Israelites in their exodus from Egypt and their mediator in their COVENANT with Yahweh at Mt. Sinai. Little is known with historical exactitude about this key figure in the history of Israel through whose efforts the motley Hebrews became a tribal confederacy and, ultimately, a monarchy. Although his existence is no longer denied by scholars, arriving at the historical substance of Moses has been made complex by authors and editors of the Pentateuch. Factual details have long been obscured in the oral and written traditions of the cult epic celebrating the historical deeds of Yahweh.

Life. The name Moses (Heb. mōšeh) is of Egyptian origin (mes, mesu, born), perhaps originally connected with the name of an Egyptian god (as in the names Thutmose, Ahmose, etc.) that was later omitted under the influence of Israelite monotheism. A popular Hebrew etymology is offered in Ex 2.10 connecting mōšeh with māšā [to draw forth (out of water)]. Moses was born apparently at the beginning of the 13th century B.C., the son (Ex 2.1–4; 7.7; Nm 26.59) of Hebrew parents Amram and Jochabed (Ex 6.20), with an older sister Miriam and a younger (?) brother AARON. The account of his birth parallels the legendary story of King Sargon I of Akkad, who, deposited in a basket boat and rescued, achieved great prominence. As a ward of the Pharaoh's daughter, Moses doubtless pursued the academic program of an Egyptian scribe (cf. Acts 7.22). The Biblical narrative, a composite of oral and perhaps even written traditions, portrays Moses as fleeing to Midian after killing an Egyptian in defense of a countryman (Ex 2.11–15). There he again exercised his role of champion in the cause of the seven daughters of the Kenite Jethro, a Midian priest, in whose household he then resided (2.16–21). Moses married Zipporah, a daughter of Jethro, who bore him two children, Gershom (2.22) and Eliezer (18.4). On Mt. SINAI (HOREB) Moses the shepherd experienced a theophany in the event of the burning bush. Commissioning Moses to deliver the Hebrews from Egypt, Yahweh entrusted him with the credentials of the revelation of His identity as Yahweh, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (3.6), together with the power to perform miraculous signs (4.1–9). In a scene somewhat inconsistent with his personality and education, Moses pleaded his ineptness for the task. Yahweh assigned a coadjutor role to Aaron (4.14–16). Before Pharaoh, Moses and Aaron presented in vain the case for the Hebrews, so that Yahweh punished Pharaoh with the ten PLAGUES OF EGYPT (7.14–12.30). Finally Moses led the Hebrews from Egypt after the ceremonial of a Passover meal. The journey to freedom became a flight from captors as Pharaoh's army attempted to recover his laborers. Moses was forced to lead the people through the only avenue of escape, the RED SEA, into the desert. Arriving at Mt. Sinai, the people through Moses entered formally into the covenant relationship with Yahweh (Ex 19 and 24; Dt 5), the terms of which are codified in the Decalogue (Ex 20.1–17; Dt 5.6–21) and the BOOK OF THE COVENANT (Ex 21–23). At Cades Moses guided the Israelite tribes through the difficult period of development. His mission accomplished, he died at Mt. Nebo without entering the promised land of Canaan (Nm 20).

Though the name of Moses has always been connected with the Pentateuch, his personal contribution to Israel was long overlooked. Outside the Pentateuch the oldest references to the Exodus make no mention of Moses. Reference is seldom made to him among the Prophets. Perhaps this is due to the Israelite mentality of eliminating instrumental causes and attributing events to the direct intervention of Yahweh. The picture that Israelite tradition created is reflected in his subordinate characterization by later authors as the servant of God (2 Kgs 21.8; Ps 105.26; Mal 3.22; Bar 2.28), God's chosen one (Ps 106.23), priest (Ps 98[99].6), prophet (Hos 23.13; Wis 11.1), and man of God (1Chr 23.14). In the NT, where he is the most frequently mentioned OT personality, he appears primarily as the lawgiver (Mt 8.4; Mk 7.10; Jn 1.17) who communicates God's law to man. For this reason Jesus met opposition in attempting to bring the law of Moses to final realization. As Moses proclaimed the Old Law from Mt. Sinai, the Gospel writers similarly situated Jesus on a mountain for the revelation of the New Law. The typological prefigurement of Jesus by Moses in the Exodus events is solidly founded. Jesus used him to witness His approaching suffering and death (Mt 17.1–8; Mk 9.1–8; Lk 9.28–36). Moses is a model of faith for all Christians (Heb 11.23–29).

Iconography. Although Moses is portrayed as the father type in the Sistine Chapel, elsewhere he is more often represented in the role of savior and legislator. The striking of the rock and the revelation of the Law were the two predominant scenes until the 5th century, when other themes were introduced. The Christian community forged detailed comparisons between the activities of Moses and those of Jesus, some founded in Scripture, others in the creative imagination: e.g., between the burning bush and the virginal birth of Jesus, between the crossing of the Red Sea and Baptism (1 Cor 10.1–2), between the brazen serpent and the Crucified (Jn 3.14–15), between the manna and the Eucharist (1 Cor 10.3–4), between the striking of the rock and the piercing of the side of Christ. As a result of a misunderstanding of Ex 34.29–35 Moses was often portrayed with two horns (instead of rays) on his forehead (cf. 2 Cor 3.7).

MOSES THE BLACK, ST.

Monk; b. c. 330; d. c. 405. Ethiopian by race, Moses was one of the most picturesque of the DESERT FATHERS.

“Moses and the Burning Bush,” painting by Raphael, early 16th Century, the Vatican, Rome. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

First a servant or slave of an Egyptian official, he was dismissed for his immoral conduct and continual thefts, and he took to brigandage and soon gathered a gang that terrorized the district. His strength and ferocity became legendary. The details of his conversion are not known. It is thought that he took refuge from the law with some monks and was overwhelmed by their example, for he next appears at the monastery of Petra in the Desert of Scete. He found it hard to control his violence, but he was encouraged by Abbot St. Isidore of Alexandria. Finally, through physical labor, mortification, and prayer, he succeeded in overcoming himself. THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA heard of his virtue and ordained him a priest. When the Berbers threatened his monastery, he remained with seven companions; all but one perished. He was buried at the monastery of Dair al-Baramus, which still stands.

MOSQUE

Islamic place of worship. The Arabic word masjid, literally, a place of worship, is derived from the verb sajada, to prostrate one's self; the term is to be compared with Nabataean msgd', a votive STELE, and with Ethiopic mesgad, a church or temple. In Islam the mosque is also called muṣallā, a place where one prays (ṣallā) and more commonly, jāmi' (pl. jāwāmi'), a gathering place.

Plan of the Mosque. The normal mosque consists fundamentally of a large open, quadrangular court (ṣaḥn) surrounded by a colonnaded portico (muḡaṭṭā) supported by several (often many) rows of columns, the passages between which are called riwāq (pl. 'arwiqa). In the center of the court stands a large basin (mīḍa‘a) with a fountain for making ablutions (wuḍū‘). The covered hall on the side facing MECCA is generally much deeper, and in the wall on this side is a large ornamented niche called the miḥrāb, which indicates the qibla or direction in which one is oriented during prayer; in front of this the IMĀM stands while leading the prayer. In larger mosques there may be several miḥrābs used by different “rites” (madhāhib; see ISLAMIC LAW). Near the miḥrāb stands the minbar, an elevated seat from which the Friday sermon (khuṭba) is preached; this was originally a kind of throne from which the ruler or governor might address the people and was therefore reserved, in the earliest period, for only the chief mosques. Attached to the outside wall of the building, often on the corners, stands one or more towers or minarets (manāra, ma’dhana, mi’dhana), from which the call to prayer is first sounded by the muezzin (Arabic, mu’adhḥin), within some larger mosques there is also a raised platform (dakka), near the minbar. From here he repeats the call at two specified points during the Friday service. There is also a seat (kursī) with a desk for the recitation of the QUR’ĀN by the qārī‘ (or qāṣṣ). Within the riwāq along the qibla side there is in some principal mosques an enclosure (maqṣūra) near the miḥrāb, reserved for the ruler, where he may pray free from any danger of attack. In larger mosques there are a number of apartments (called also riwāq, or zāwiya), built within the extended riwāq or in subsidiary buildings, set aside for various purposes. These serve for study and teaching, or as living quarters for Qur’ān readers and other personnel of the mosque, or frequently for students and those making a retreat (i’tikāf), whether simply during the last ten days of RAMADĀN or on a more or less permanent basis.

Early Mosques. The most important shrine in Islam is the Holy Mosque (al-masjid al-ḥarām) of MECCA that contains in its enclosure the Ka’aba, a rectangular building 40 feet by 35 feet and some 50 feet high, oriented at its corners toward the cardinal points of the compass and containing in its eastern corner the Black Stone, which has been an object of particular cult from ancient times. Around the Ka’aba is a paved area (maṭāf) where the tawāf (see HAJJ) is made. The Ka’aba was destroyed during a siege in 64/684 (i.e., A.H. 64=A.D. 684), at which time it was already a reconstructed edifice, dating from 608, of alternating courses of stone and wood; the replacement, entirely of stone, was built by ‘Abdallāh ibn al-Zubayr.

The earliest mosques of Islam were little more than open quadrangles. The house of the Prophet in MEDINA, where his followers gathered for prayer, consisted of an open court surrounded by mud-brick walls; against the north wall was a roofed portico (zulla) supported by palm stems; along the east wall there were built, over a period of time, nine little huts for MUḤAMMAD’s wives. Where preexisting buildings were not simply taken over, as was the case in Damascus, Homs, and elsewhere, the first mosques were no more than quadrangles marked off next to the governor’s or commander’s residence (dār al-‘imāra) to which walls were later added, as in Baṣra (founded 14/635) and Kūfa (founded 17/638). In Fustāt, the original mosque was built (21/642) by ‘Amr ibn al-‘As as a simple walled quadrangle with some kind of roof, possibly a zulla. (On the development of the mosque, see ISLAMIC ART.)

The Mosque and Worship. The mosque was, at the beginning, the center of all aspects of the community life of Islam; thus the first mosques of Medina, Baṣra, Kūfa, Damascus, and Fustāt were built immediately adjacent to the dār al-‘imāra and the dīwān or government offices. The caliph or provincial governor received his investiture in the mosque and there acted as imām and khaṭīb, his khuṭba, or discourse, often consisting in orders for battle, etc., while the faithful were exhorted by the preaching of the qāṣṣ (pl. quṣṣāṣ). Outside the capital prayers were recited in the mosque for the Caliph or ruler as a kind of oath of loyalty; often it was in the mosque that revolutions were begun, the first open sign thereof being the substitution of another name for that of the ruler. Although it was from the outset a place in which people gathered for many purposes, the mosque rapidly took on the character of a sanctuary and came to be called, as in the most ancient Semitic usage regarding sacred shrines, the House of God (bayt Allāh), a name originally applied in Islam only to the Ka'aba. A particular holiness was, of course, attached to the Mosque of Medina, where the Prophet was buried; also to that of Qubā, just outside Medina, where he stopped and prayed immediately before entering the city in September 622 (see HIJRA). Prayer in the mosque and the recitation there of the Qur'ān, especially in the mosque of Medina or those associated with some renowned saint, is considered particularly meritorious. A special holiness too is associated by some with the mihrāb and the minbar, and visitors or pilgrims will often touch them hoping to receive a blessing (baraka).

The Friday or congregational mosque (al-masjid al-jāmi') is specifically designated within a community for the common Friday service that every male Muslim who has reached the age of reason is obliged to attend. Originally it was a community function in which the ruler led the prayer and preached the khuṭba; for this reason the number of congregational mosques (early called dhāt manābir, i.e., having a minbar) was restricted. According to some authorities there should be no more than one in a particular town; in fact, according to others there should be no congregational mosque save in the chief cities. With the great increase in the number of Muslims, however, and the universal need that was felt for the weekly community service, there came to be Friday mosques even in the villages; the larger centers may have several, often of considerable size. From the beginning there were many mosques besides the congregational mosques. Numerous local and tribal mosques formed the center of both the religious and political activities of particular groups.

Again, following the ancient Arabian custom of honoring the graves of ancestors and important chiefs and the Christian veneration of the saints, a great number of mosques were built as sanctuaries over the tombs of various saints and heroes of Islam, distinguished for their piety, learning, etc., even though the association of a place of prayer with a tomb was frowned upon by many authorities. Numerous mosques were built in Hijaz in association with events in the life of the Prophet; there and elsewhere other mosques arose in particular commemoration of 'ALĪ and his descendants. The site of the temple of Solomon in Jerusalem, where the Dome of the Rock now stands, is linked both by Muslim tradition and by the name given its congregational mosque, al-Masjid al-'Aqṣā (the Furthest Mosque), with a reference in the Qur'ān and with the life of Muḥammad.

While originally the building of mosques and their maintenance were taken as responsibilities of the government, later many were built and endowed by private individuals as pious works. As a result, the number of mosques reported to have existed at certain times in various major cities, even allowing for considerable exaggeration on the part of the sources, is truly astounding.

The Mosque and Education. Teaching in Islam has always been associated with the mosque, as the primary sciences ('ulūm) of Islam are concerned with the Qur'ān, the ḥadīth [see ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (HADITH)] and the law (fiqh). From early times mention is made of the majlis or ḥalqa (circle) of those who came to hear and receive the instruction of learned men and ascetics who taught and preached there. Teaching was done in all the important mosques, several of which had extensive libraries, and in many of the smaller ones, so that finally the term jāmi' became the equivalent of madrasa (school) and riwāq came to mean a student's living quarters. The 'Azhar Mosque was built in Cairo in 361/972, and in 378/988 the Fatimid Caliph, al'Azīz, endowed 35 chairs of learning; the lecturers not only received ample salaries, but also were housed in rooms adjacent to the mosque. Scholars were attached likewise to the mosques of 'Amr and Ibn Ṭūlūn, also in Cairo, and to most of the important mosques throughout Islam. In many of these, stipends (some quite high) were available for students who were given lodging in or near the mosque.

MOSQUERA, MANUEL JOSÉ

Archbishop of Bogotá, staunch opponent of regalism; b. Popayán, 1800; d. Marseilles, France, 1853. He was a member of a distinguished family. He studied in Popayán and Quito. After being ordained, he held several posts in Popayán: rector of the University of Cauca, canon, and vicar-general. Selected archbishop of Bogotá by the congress of 1834, his selection was confirmed by the Pope, and he took over his see in 1835. From the start, he worked for the sanctification of his clergy. To this end he reorganized the seminary and made it a model for others in Spanish America; he organized the Spiritual Exercises for the priests and issued important decrees on ecclesiastical discipline. He visited all of his extensive diocese and endeavored to provide for the Christian education of youth. For this purpose he opened a secondary school run by the Jesuits; he adapted the catechism to the needs of the people of his diocese; and he helped to establish elementary schools. Mosquera tried to support the legitimate government in times of revolution, and this made many enemies for him. Since the government considered itself the heir of the Spanish crown in the exercise of patronage, the congress of 1851 passed a series of laws on religious matters that amounted to serious interference in the discipline of the Church. The archbishop of Bogotá addressed respectful but forceful messages to the congress and to the president, requesting the repeal of these laws and stating that in good conscience he could not comply with them. He asked his suffragans to work to the same end. The congress of 1852 took him to court for disobeying the laws and inciting others to do so, and he was condemned to exile and deprived of his salary. Pope Pius IX on several occasions formally approved the archbishop's conduct. Mosquera traveled to the United States, where he was given a warm demonstration by the Catholics of New York. He continued to France and was en route to Rome to see the pope when he died.

MOTA Y ESCOBAR, ALONSO DE LA

Mexican bishop; b. Mexico City, 1556; d. Puebla, April 15, 1625. He was educated at the Dominican convent in Mexico City, earning a doctorate in theology. After serving as a curate in Chiapas, he was sent to Spain by the University of Mexico; there he eventually became tutor to the future King Philip II. After receiving his degree in canon law from the University of Salamanca, he returned to Mexico to become dean successively of Michoacán, Tlaxcala, and Mexico City. He twice refused appointment as bishop (of Nicaragua and later of Panama) before accepting the See of Guadalajara in 1597. His work among the indigenous people earned him considerable fame, particularly during the rebellion in the Serranía of Topía in 1601. Preaching to the rebels in their own language, he exhorted them to remain obedient. Through a policy of care, gentleness, and justice he succeeded in pacifying them while at the same time he won the Spaniards over to better treatment of the indigenous tribes. One result of his labors was the baptism of five important caciques. In 1608, Bishop Mota y Escobar was transferred to the see of Puebla de los Angeles, where he founded several hospitals, the Colegio de la Compañía de Jesús, the convent of Trinidad, the monastery of Carmen y Santa Ines, and several chapels.

MOTET

A musical term of French origin, generally applied to a vocal, or vocal and instrumental, work with a Latin text intended for church use. In the Middle Ages and Renaissance, secular and political motets also were extensively cultivated, and the term fell somewhat into disrepute, though not disuse, for titles such as Sacrae cantiones vulgo motecta appellatae are occasionally encountered. In its earliest stages the motet was a verbal trope of the clausula (the short melisma in the chant Gradual or Alleluia)—words (mots) carefully underlaid to the hitherto vocalized duplum (second voice part). The duplum later changed its name to motetus. When a third or fourth voice was added to the existing tenor and duplum, it might sing the same text as the motetus (conductus-motet), or each voice might have a separate text. Two or three texts could be sung simultaneously without incurring practical or aesthetic objections, since the various texts were usually related to each other as well as to the feast for which the composition was intended. The tenor, whose rhythm was usually less lively than that of the upper parts, was often provided with a syllable or word indicating the source of the chant, and therefore the organum as a whole.

Although in the 13th century the early motet was at its peak as a genuine and expressive embellishment of the liturgy, it was then also that the substitution of French secular texts for the Latin took place. By mid-century the top voice part tended to predominate because of its deliberately attractive melodic interest (Franconian style), showing the way for the more advanced methods of Petrus de Cruce, Philippe de Vitry, and Guillaume de Machaut, all of whom wrote political as well as liturgical motets. From the short-winded ordines, or rhythmic schemes for the tenor, the concept of isorhythm slowly developed, reaching a perfect, though by no means final, stage of technique in the motets of Machaut. Originally applied to the tenor only, isorhythm later pervaded all voice parts in certain motets, so that they were melodically independent but rhythmically bound to a recurring pattern called talea. Some relaxing of this strict compositional discipline came with the motets of Guillaume Dufay and John Dunstable, whose example was influential for a considerable part of the 15th century. At this time it was not unusual to find the plainsong, skillfully decorated, in the highest voice, supported by two independent instrumental parts.

The growth of choral polyphony caused a further change in the career of the motet. Texture became much richer, progressing from density to radiance in the works of Ockeghem, Obrecht, and Desprez. Their music, known throughout Europe, set a standard of taste and technique that was to usher in the greatest era of the choral motet, culminating in the vast production of Lasso, Palestrina, Byrd, Victoria, and their contemporaries. Most of their texts were still liturgical, but some composers preferred psalm verses and other Biblical texts occasionally brought together for special reasons. Ceremonial motets for great occasions of church and state continued to emerge from time to time, and a growing interest in instrumental support can be sensed toward the end of the 16th century. The Roman composers remained faithful to the unaccompanied choral motet well into the baroque era, while the Venetians (notably G. Gabrieli and Monteverdi) were boldly experimenting in instrumentation, spatial separation of choirs, and new effects of every kind (stile concitato). Lully, Charpentier, and Couperin brought the choral-orchestral motet to its zenith in France; Schütz, Buxtehude, and Bach gave to Germany a rich heritage of solo and choral motets. From the 17th century onwards, the term motet came to be applied mainly to non-liturgical musical settings of religious texts. With the end of the Baroque period, the motet became less prominent as a distinctive genre of church music.

MOTHER OF GOD

That Mary is the mother of God (see THEOTOKOS) is a revealed fact so closely linked to Christ's salvific plan for the human race that since the Council of Ephesus in 431 its recognition has been the touchstone of Christian orthodoxy. If Mary is not truly the mother of God, then Christ is not true God as well as true man, and he is not the Redeemer of the whole of humanity.

What makes Mary's motherhood essentially different from purely human motherhood is not the fact that she did something more or something different in conceiving her child, but that her child is a Divine Person. St. Ignatius of Antioch writes that God Our Lord Jesus Christ was born of Mary, who was from the seed of David. Opponents to this teaching sprang up in the early Church. GnosticisM, which taught a redemption from the flesh through knowledge, considered the flesh an evil thing utterly beneath God's dignity. DocetisM held that Christ's body was a mere phantom. Valentinus erroneously taught that Christ's real body was a celestial body that merely passed through Mary's body as through a channel. In his version of the New Testament, Marcion has Christ appear as a full-grown man. These false teachings were ably refuted by St. Ignatius of Antioch, St. Justin, St. Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Tertullian, but others continued to challenge this key doctrine.

Faustus of Mileve, the champion of ManichaeisM, affirmed that the virgin whom the Holy Spirit overshadowed was the earth itself and not Mary, and that later the mortal Christ became divine when He was baptized in the Jordan. In rebuttal St. Augustine speaks in his sermons of Mary as God's mother and clearly distinguishes between Mary's conceiving and that of her cousin Elizabeth.

ArianisM and NestorianisM did not deny that Mary is the real mother of Christ, but did deny that Christ is God. In denying this primitive belief that the Incarnate Word is the uncreated Son of the Father, coequal to the Father, the Arians refused to accept Christ's divinity and as a consequence Mary's divine motherhood.

St. Athanasius, Arius's opponent, proclaimed Mary the mother of God (θεοτόκος, THEOTOKOS) and buttressed the doctrine theologically by giving the first explanation of the interchange of properties known in theology as the COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS. The early 4th-century prayer, the earliest known Marian prayer, begins with the words: “We fly to thy patronage, holy Mother of God.”

The denial of Mary’s divine motherhood by NESTORIUS led to the General Council of EPHESUS. Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople, was a disciple of Bishop THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, who was in turn the disciple of DIODORE, Bishop of Tarsus. As representatives of the ANTI-IOCH SCHOOL of theology, these three saw two persons in Christ, and the Son of God was distinct from the Son of David. Mary was for them the mother of Christ in whom the Word dwelt substantially.

When St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA heard that Nestorius was preaching that Mary was christotoko (Χριστοτόκος, mother of Christ) but not theotokos (mother of God), he took Nestorius to task in letters, sermons, and writings that defended the INCARNATION and the divine maternity. In the midst of a flurry of letters with charges and countercharges showered upon Pope CELESTINE I by both St. Cyril and Nestorius, the Emperor THEODOSIUS II convoked the General Council of Ephesus.

At the first session, on June 22, 431, the Council fathers unanimously approved one of St. Cyril’s doctrinal letters and deposed Nestorius (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum ed. A. Schönmetzer, 250–53). The enthusiastic crowds surged through the streets of the city, shouting “Holy Mary, Mother of God.” The official approval of the doctrine contained in St. Cyril’s letter was in effect the equivalent of a definition. Theotokos became the chant of the Christian, and the commemoration of “the glorious and ever virgin Mary, Mother of God,” found its way into the liturgy of the Eucharist in the Christian East and West.

Mystery of the Motherhood. To restore the human race into his own image, the heavenly Father willed to put his own Son into the very materials of his creation in such a way that the eternal Word would restore harmony in the universe of matter and spirit and between the human and divine orders. The Son of God would become a Son of Adam, and a daughter of Adam’s race would become the mother of God’s own Son. St. Irenaeus develops this parallelism between the fallen angel and the disobedient virgin in Eden and the loyal angel and the obedient virgin at Nazareth, between the first Adam and the tree in paradise and the Second Adam and the Tree on Calvary.

Since divine motherhood involves the human conception of a preexistent Person, the relation of divine motherhood might even exist from the first instant of Mary’s own existence, because of her predestination as mother of God. St. Peter Chrysologus asks why Mary, who was a virgin after Christ’s birth, could not be his mother before his conception? Sylvester de Saavedra, studying the likeness between the virgin mother and the eternal Father, claimed that the root and perfection of the mother-Son relation of Mary to Christ is a grace infused into Mary’s body preceding in nature Mary’s generative action.

M. J. Scheeben looked rather to the relationship of the mother’s union with the divine Word. The mutual giving of the Person of the Word and Mary to each other in mutual consent is a kind of divine marriage. These divine nuptials (matrimonium ratum) by a special grace in her soul virtually and radically bestow upon Mary the bride the divine motherhood from the first instant of her existence. Mary’s divine brideship is completed (matrimonium consummatum) at the Incarnation. This theory has no support in Scripture or patristic tradition.

M. J. Nicolás finds the essence of Mary’s motherhood not in a relationship of union but rather in a relationship of origin and even of opposition. The proper effect of generation is separation, since the human flesh substantially sanctified is no longer Mary’s flesh in the very instant in which the HYPOSTATIC UNION is realized. This resulting relation of origin forms a supernatural reality that stands between the hypostatic union and the accidental union caused by sanctifying GRACE.

Theologians commonly agree that Mary’s transient generative activity is the proper foundation of her relationship to her Son. St. Thomas Aquinas affirms that some relations are founded upon what remains in the agent from the action performed (In 3 sent. 8.5). Nicolás explains the kind of perfection left in a mother because of her generative action.

As the divine Word assumed a nature perfect in its humanity, he accepted Mary’s generative act as a perfect human act—virginal, conscious, voluntary. What remains in the agent after the transient generative action is a permanent disposition or habit, drawing the mother to her child as an immediately connatural object of knowledge and love. As the human generative act was composed of a spiritual and a material element, so does the resulting habit possess composite elements. And just as human nature is raised to the supernatural order by sharing in the divine nature Mary’s human motherhood is raised to the hypostatic order by sharing in the relationship of the eternal Father to the Son. Thus Mary’s maternal perfection is a unique relationship, a formal image of the relationship which the eternal Father has to the same divine Son. Only the Father and Mary have generated the same eternal Person, he according to his divine nature, she according to his human nature.

From his patristic studies, Joseph Bover concludes that the mother of God would have to be a virginal mother and that only the mother of God could be a virginal mother. Aquinas bases his theology of Mary's virginity upon her assimilation to the Father in virtue of her divine motherhood (see VIRGIN BIRTH).

J. M. Alonso finds in the Church Fathers the thesis that the divine motherhood is a formal participation in the fecundity of the Father. He holds that the three Divine Persons in the order of efficient causality keep their distinct functions in the identity of operations and impress their personal characters on the effect produced. The supernatural form effected in Mary by the Trinitarian relation of the Father is called her personal maternal being, and is the only sanctifying form she possesses. Alonso's thesis seems to disregard papal teaching that all the divine activities that sanctify the human race are common to the Trinity.

De la Taille holds that what gives a divine gift a strictly supernatural quality is the relation of union between created OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY and uncreated act. Just as the Word elevated and substantially united his human nature to his Person by actuating it with his divine act of existence, so by analogy in the accidental order the Father communicates his fecundity, elevating and assimilating to himself the foundation of Mary's human motherhood.

Liturgical Feast. First introduced toward the end of the 4th century, the Feast of Mary, Mother of God is the oldest Marian feast in the Roman liturgical calendar. In the latter part of the 5th century, especially after the Council of Ephesus (431), the liturgical commemoration of the Mother of God appeared in many places. Its date varied, but generally it was close to Christmas: December 18 in Spain, January 18 in Gaul, and January 1, the octave of Christmas in Rome. Thus, the first Marian feast was a feast of the divine maternity of Mary and it concluded the Christmas Octave in the Roman calendar. Until the middle of the 7th century, the Christian West did not seem to have known any other feast other than the feast of Mary, Mother of God. When other Marian feasts were introduced from the 7th century onward, the feast of Mary, Mother of God declined in importance and was replaced by the feast of Circumcision of Christ. The 1969 revision of the Roman liturgical calendar revived the celebration of the feast of Mary, Mother of God on January 1, thereby restoring the octave of Christmas to its original Marian character.

MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA

Founder of Missionaries of Charity, teacher, social worker, Nobel Peace Prize Laureate; b. Aug. 26, 1910, Shkup, Albania, in the Ottoman Empire (now Skopje, the capital of the Republic of Macedonia); d. Sept. 5, 1997, Calcutta, India. Baptized Gonxha (in English, Agnes) Bojaxhiu, she was one of five children of a middle-class family. Her father Nikola, a grocer, died in 1919, and her mother, Drona, in 1968. At the age of 18, Gonxha joined the Sisters of Loreto with the intention of serving in the missions. En route to India she spent two months in Ireland, studying English. When she entered the novitiate in 1929 at Darjeeling in the foothills of the Himalayas, she became known as Sister Teresa. Professed in 1931, she was sent to teach at St Mary's School for Girls in Calcutta. On Sept. 10, 1946, while riding the train to Darjeeling, Sister Teresa experienced "a second calling," a vocation to serve the poor of Calcutta. In August 1948, she left the sisters of Loreto with the blessing of her superiors and the permission of the archbishop of Calcutta to live in the slums of Matizhil. She donned the sari and applied for citizenship in her adopted country. Teresa's initial effort was to organize dispensaries and outdoor schools where she fed, clothed, and taught poor children. The women, including some of her former students, whom she enlisted as volunteers to assist in the work became the nucleus of the Missionaries of Charity. In 1950 the order received canonical approval from church authorities.

In 1952 Mother Teresa opened the first of many hospices for the dying. In 1957 she founded a leper colony called Shanti Nagar (Town of Peace) near Asansol, India. Under her guidance the Missionaries of Charity established numerous centers where they ministered to the aged, lepers, cripples, AIDS victims, and the dying. In 1963 the Indian government awarded her the Padmashri ("Lord of the Lotus") for her services. As the Missionaries of Charity expanded their ministry to other countries, Mother Teresa's reputation spread throughout the world. In recognition of her work Pope Paul VI awarded her the first Pope John XXIII Peace Prize in 1971, and she received the Nobel Prize for Peace in 1979. Upon accepting the Nobel honor she said, "I choose the poverty of our poor people. But I am grateful to receive [the Nobel] in the name of the hungry, the naked, the homeless, of the crippled, of the blind, of the lepers, of all those people who feel unwanted, unloved, uncared-for throughout society, people that have become a burden to society and are shunned by everyone."

The sisters continued every six years to reelect her as major superior until early 1997 when, because of her rapidly failing health, they acceded to her wish to step down. In March they elected Nepal-born Sister Nirmala to head the order. Surrounded by sisters of the community Mother Teresa died peacefully on Sept. 5, 1997. On September 13, they buried her in a simple white marble tomb in the mother house of the Missionaries of Charity. In reminiscing about Mother Teresa some weeks after her death Pope John Paul II who had met with her on several occasions said, "I hope she will be a saint." Eighteen months later, he dispensed with the normal five-year waiting period and allowed the archbishop of Calcutta to initiate the formal process for beatification.

MOTION

Motion (Gr. κίνησις, Lat. motus) can be taken in a wide and in a strict sense. In the wide sense it stands for any CHANGE, for any transition from one state or condition to another. In a strict sense it means successive and continuous change, usually spoken of as movement. Aristotle held that it is unnecessary to prove the existence of motion, since the fact is evident. This notwithstanding, motion constitutes the first and enduring problem of philosophy, and through the study of it philosophers come to significant insights into material being and into the nature of being itself. It is also of interest to psychologists, for the perception of motion—examined in scholastic and modern psychology alike—has given rise to several theories on this subject. Accordingly, the present article treats motion under two aspects, the first part dealing with it from the standpoint of philosophy, the second from that of psychology.

Motion In Philosophy

Originating among the early Greeks, the philosophical analysis of motion reached its fullest development in the thought of Aristotle and the scholastics. This analysis forms the conceptual background against which the characteristic approach of modern science, as well as further contributions by modern philosophers, are most easily discussed.

Early Greeks. Since the early Greek philosophers lacked precise concepts of the different kinds of being, they reduced all changes to the simplest type of motion, local motion or change of place. From the beginning they spoke of the process of becoming in this terminology: things came into being by being "separated" from an original mass, by condensation and rarefaction, or by a downward and upward path. The only philosophers to deny the possibility of change were PARMENIDES and his Eleatic school. The famous paradoxes of ZENO OF ELEA, for example, purported to disprove the intelligibility of local motion. Because his concept of being was absolute, Parmenides himself denied that anything could come to be. The subsequent atomists were one in denying the possibility of absolute coming into being. They reduced all change to local motion, that is, to the redistribution of atoms in space (see ATOMISM; GREEK PHILOSOPHY).

PLATO distinguished motion from becoming (γένεσις; Theaetetus 152D–153E), although he usually understood motion as local motion (Laws 893B–894A). In Theaetetus (181C–182A), however, he introduced the concept of qualitative change or alteration (ἀλλοίωσιν) as one of the two types of motion. He also defined soul as “the motion which can move itself” (Laws 896A), and he listed psychic operations as examples of motion (Laws 897A). Yet he was constrained to think even of the movement of reason as similar to the local motion of a sphere and its relatively immobile central point (Laws 898A; cf. Tim. 33B–34A).

Aristotelian concept. It remained for ARISTOTLE to give the first reasonably complete analysis (Physics 200b 12–231a 20; 250b 11–267b 26). In this he was followed by St. THOMAS AQUINAS, whose commentary on Aristotle’s Physics is the fullest account of a philosophy of motion. Because of his historical milieu, Aristotle had first to justify the possibility of motion by assigning principles that would account for motion in the face of the Eleatic denial. The possibility of change he saved by distinguishing being into ten categories and into actual and potential being. For Aristotle motion was the proper formality from which to study nature and natural phenomena. No other formality, such as being or extension, can in his view reveal the nature and explain the sensible properties of matter. He maintained it necessary, however, to distinguish motions that are natural from motions that result from art, chance, or compulsion. The first kind is of fundamental relevance to his scientific study of the world.

In Book 3 of the Physics the famous definition of motion is given. Aristotle begins by stating the concepts to be used in its definition. Since motion spans several CATEGORIES OF BEING, the elements of the definition must also transcend the categories; the only available prior concepts for defining motion are POTENCY AND ACT. Motion must be situated midway between potentiality and full actuality. When a body is only in potency, it is not yet in motion; when it has been fully actualized, the motion has ceased. Therefore, motion consists of imperfect ACT. But since imperfect act can be the termination of a motion or the starting point of a new motion, it is necessary to indicate motion as the act of a being in potency precisely as still in potency to more of the same act. Hence, motion is defined as “the fulfilment [act] of what exists in potency in so far as it is in potency” (201a, 10).

Types of motion. Plato had adumbrated various types of motion, but Aristotle put the classification on a scientific basis. Motions are distinguished by the goal or terminus ad quem (Physics 224b 7). Motion does not of itself belong in the categories of being, since it is not BEING, but BECOMING; however, it is reduced to the category of the being in which it terminates.

Local Motion. The first, most obvious, and easiest motion to observe is change of PLACE, or local motion. It is divided into circular, straight, and mixed, as well as into uniform and accelerated. The nature of motion is most easily seen in local motion, and even the terms one uses to describe other types are terms applied primarily to local motion. Local motion clearly goes from term to term, from a point of departure to one of arrival. These two terms are opposed and incompatible, but admit intermediary states: thus, they are called contraries. The motion between them is continuous, or unbroken and successive, that is, traversing the intervening positions. It is divisible by reason of the extension crossed. Since an instant is not divisible, motion cannot be instantaneous, but takes TIME. Likewise, motion properly speaking belongs only to bodies, since only they have the divisibility essential to motion. Local motion of some sort is involved in all other motions, and other motions are called such by analogy with local motion.

Alteration. Qualitative motion is called alteration. It is realized only in the third species of QUALITY, namely, sensible qualities. Only these fit the definition of motion as continuing and successive actualization of potency. Changes occurring in the vital or psychic orders are not motions in the same sense as local change and change of sensible qualities. One speaks of the mind as “proceeding” from known to unknown, of discursive REASONING; this, however, is only by analogy with local motion. Vital and psychic operations are not acts of beings in potency, but of beings already proximately determined to act; these operations are not the fulfillment of potentialities, but the products of potentialities already actualized (cf. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 1a, 18.3 ad 1). Further, in psychic acts there is not the successiveness characteristic of motion, nor the contrariety between the terms of the process. In SENSATION the preliminary stimulation of the sensory organs is a qualitative change, but the determination of the faculty itself is not a gradual reception of act and thus is not motion. In the sensitive appetite there is motion, insofar as there is a physical accompaniment to the psychic act; the motion may be qualitative or local. Changes of moral disposition, although gradual, are not truly motions, but rather one or a series of instantaneous changes. Substantial changes are preceded by alterations that dispose matter toward becoming a new being, but the actual generation of a new substance and destruction of the old are instantaneous, and are thereby not classified as motions in the strict sense. (See SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE.)

Augmentation and Diminution. Motion in the category of QUANTITY is called augmentation or growth and diminution or decrease. Augmentation does not consist of mere addition of distinct quantities to form an aggregation; such would reduce to local motion and would be augmentative, but not the motion of augmentation. The motion of augmentation must take place within the unity of a single SUBSTANCE. This happens only in living beings. By nutrition these assimilate their food into their own substance and consequently achieve growth. This is a true motion. It involves some local motion, as a growing body extends spatially. It is gradual, ordinarily so slow as to escape observation. It passes through successive stages, from the smallest one-cell stage to the full measure of growth determined by the specific nature. It also goes from contrary to contrary, from one positive state to another in the order of quantity. Such a motion is obviously immanent operation on the part of the living subject as agent, but it is true motion on the part of the subject as receptive of a new perfection. The opposite of augmentation is diminution or decrease.

Other Categories. The two categories of ACTION and passion do not constitute separate types of motion, for they are really identified with motion. Action is motion considered as being from the agent. Passion is the same motion considered in the patient. There is no motion in the category of “when” (quando), since time itself is the measure of motion. Nor is there motion in the category of RELATION. A new relation arises as a result of a change in some other category; for instance, by reason of a change of place, a relation of proximity arises, and from change of quality in one being, a relation of similarity or dissimilarity results in another being. A mutual relation can come into being and cease to be without any change in one of the related members. Hence, change is merely incidental to relation. The categories of SITUATION (situs) and condition or vestition (habitus) are constituted by relations, and so do not found separate types of motion.

Reality of motion. The objective reality of motion is known through a recognition of the various stages of actualization from the beginning to the ultimate termination of motion, even though these stages are not identified with motion. Fundamentally, each one has immediate experience of his own motions, particularly local (see below, Motion in Psychology). The paradoxes of Zeno, while purporting to disprove the reality of local motion, can be solved by an analysis of the CONTINUUM and of the infinite (cf. Physics 239b 5–240a 18). Though directed against the intelligibility of motion, they do not overturn the immediate EVIDENCE of the fact of motion.

The reality of motion is further confirmed by the need of an efficient cause or mover. Motion is an emergence from a state of potentiality to one of actuality. This is possible only under the influence of some being in act. Even vital movement requires that one part of a living being function as agent and another part as patient; otherwise the same being would be in potency and act together. The mover must be distinct from the moved and must be proportioned to the motion produced. There must be contact, at least mediate; there is no action at a distance. In a series of movers that are themselves moved, there is no ultimate explanation for the motion unless there be a first unmoved mover, a first cause of motion (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF).

Motion in modern science. The Aristotelian requirement of a mover in act as necessary to account for motion was not easily satisfied; this was particularly the case in assigning the cause of projectile motion, such as of a stone thrown upward. Aristotle had explained the motion of the projectile after it left contact with the mover by supposing that the agent moves not only the stone, but also the surrounding air, giving the air motive power to continue projecting the stone. In the 6th century, JOHN PHILOPONUS of Alexandria criticized the Aristotelian theory and proposed the theory of IMPETUS in its stead: the mover imparts a “motive power” or energy to the projectile itself. In the 14th century JOHN BURIDAN spoke of the impetus as a qualitative power given to the body by the mover. He suggested that impetus theory could explain the motion of the heavenly bodies, once God had put them in motion. His doctrine has been assimilated into Aristotelianism and scholasticism, where impetus is explained as a quality or an instrumental power communicated by the mover. It is usually not thought to be an efficient cause of motion, but rather it is seen as analogous to the internal principle of natural motion.

Ockhamist Critique. WILLIAM OF OCKHAM reduced all physical being to the two categories of substance and quality, the only two that denoted distinct realities. The reality of local motion and position in place were thus denied, and there was no longer need to find a cause for the continuance of projectile motion. Accordingly, Ockham could deny both the original Aristotelian and the impetus theory.

Galileo’s Contribution. Galileo GALILEI initiated a radical departure from such theory and study of motion. Confining himself to local motion, he stated that he had discovered by experiment certain properties of motion not hitherto observed or demonstrated. He set himself to study these properties through the method of measurement and correlation. Motion, for him, gave way to momentum, the product of the quantity of matter and velocity. Galileo identified momentum with impetus, and this became no longer an instrument or principle of motion, but a property of motion. He was not interested in an efficient cause for the continuance of motion, but in a measurable external cause of the acceleration or retardation of motion. Therefore, observing that a velocity once imparted to a body is accelerated or retarded according to the slope of the plane along which the motion takes place, he inferred that frictionless motion along a horizontal plane is uniform and perpetual. However, since in the real world this horizontal plane is circular—the surface of the sea, the path of the heavenly bodies—then the motion of bodies continues in a circular path, rather than in a straight line. Thus did Galileo give partial formulation to the principle of inertia.

Newton and Mechanism. Sir Isaac Newton correctly stated the principle of inertia as the first of his axioms, or laws of motion: “Every body continues in its state of rest, or of uniform motion in a straight line, unless it is compelled to change that state by forces impressed on it.” From this and other axioms, Newton developed the science of mechanics, discovering in the process a formula of gravitation that is applicable to celestial as well as terrestrial phenomena. He also studied the properties of light according to principles of motion, and in his Optics he proposed a science of nature guided and inspired by mechanics. Newton’s successors thereupon extended mechanics into every region of science, into acoustics, hydrodynamics, magnetism, electricity, heat, even into biology, psychology, economics, and sociology, at the expense of denying all that is not reducible to matter and motion (see MECHANISM).

Recent Physics. The use of mechanical principles as ultimate explanations of physical reality ran into difficulties in the 20th century with the advent of relativity and quantum theory. The Heisenberg principle of uncertainty, according to which it is impossible in principle to measure both the position and velocity of a particle, makes it impossible to construct a mechanical model of the world. Moreover, the concept of quantum jumps is interpreted by some to involve a denial of the continuity of motion.

Motion in modern philosophy. René DESCARTES recalled the common doctrine that NATURE is the principle of motion and rest, but he could conceive of motion only as local motion. Therefore, he attempted an explanation of all material reality from a mechanical point of view, i.e., in terms of matter and local motion. He held that all that man can know of external objects are their figure, magnitudes, and motions—all modes of extension. Color, odor, taste, and other sensible qualities, in this view, are not objective. Descartes also taught that in the beginning God created a definite quantity of motion, which remains constant. Not interested in the Aristotelian or qualitative definition of motion, which he never understood, he concentrated instead on the quantity of motion, or momentum. Motion became, for him, an actual and measurable state of a body, without consideration of a potential state that is being further actualized (cf. Principles of Philosophy 2.24–36).

Leibniz and Kant. LEIBNIZ objected to Descartes’s idea that the quantity of motion in the universe remains constant; this, for Leibniz, is true rather of force (Discourse on Metaphysics 17–18). Likewise, he denied that extension is a clear and distinct idea. Extension, together with size, figure, and motion, are subjective phenomena, no less than the other sensible qualities the mechanists had rejected. Accordingly, he formulated his monadology, a doctrine in which bodies are composed of simple forces, psychic in character (see MONAD). The DYNAMISM of the system did not prevent Leibniz from interpreting bodily actions mechanically, even though they do not act upon one another. Bodies are divine machines or natural automatons (The Monadology 64). The motions of bodies, however, are regulated by their pre-established harmony with one another and with souls, which act according to final causality and the divine plan of the best possible world.

Immanuel KANT, in his precritical days, developed the monadology of Leibniz. In his definitive philosophy he defined motion as “actuation in space” (Critique of Pure Reason B291). Motion is an empirical concept, since experience apprises one of something moving in space and time. But there is also a subjective element to it: the two forms of sensibility, space and time, organize the successive determinations of a movable object.

Bergson’s Critique. The most searching criticism of such views was that of Henri BERGSON, who held that the scientific mind cannot grasp the reality of motion. The intellect makes static, snapshot views of various stages of a transition, thereby solidifying into discontinuous images the fluid continuity of the real. Just as a movie projector, by reason of the movement of the apparatus, reconstitutes the motion that had been immobilized in a series of still pictures, so does the mind string snapshots of reality upon an abstract “becoming” contributed by the mind itself. The mechanism of ordinary knowledge is “cinematographical.” In order to grasp reality, which is duration or change itself, one must escape from the cinematographical mechanism and employ a metaphysical intuition. Since change is the essence of reality, there is no underlying subject of change; movement does not imply a mobile [see Creative Evolution (New York 1911); The Creative Mind (New York 1946)]. The mobile continuity of the real, or concrete duration, is for Bergson the subject of metaphysics. If Bergson's critique accomplishes nothing else, it at least intimates that modern thinkers, by reducing motion to a state, have allowed reality in flux to escape them.

Motion in Psychology

The study of motion in psychology has a long and interesting history. Once it was realized that motion could be experienced when there was no physical movement and that actual physical motion might not be experienced as such, the investigation of just how man perceives movement captured the interest of psychologists. To explain these illusions, most psychologists relied upon some type of logical analysis in terms of space and time, until the significant research of Max Wertheimer on apparent movement showed that a new phenomenological approach was needed.

Perception of Movement. Current investigation of the perception of movement may be classified under the following headings: induced movement; autokinetic movement; direction, speed, and causality of movement; and apparent movement.

Induced Movement. In induced movement one object is displaced in relation to another, but the subject is not able to perceive which has moved. He may, for example, see the object move when in reality it is the frame that has moved. The tendency is to interpret the figure as moving rather than the background. Also the meaning of the stimulus for the particular subject can determine which of two stimuli the subject perceives as moving.

Autokinetic Movement. Another interesting illusion of movement is the autokinetic effect, in which a stationary point of light is perceived as moving in a completely dark room. This phenomenon is explained largely in terms of nystagmus eye movements, but it is influenced also by the posture of the body, and kinesthetic sensations from the muscles. Moreover the autokinetic phenomenon is greatly influenced by social suggestibility of the subject. In both induced and autokinetic movement, the experienced movement cannot be differentiated from real movement.

Direction, Speed, and Causality. More recently it has been discovered that both direction and speed of movement depend upon the organizational factors present. It appears that the speed of movement is apprehended independently of distance or time. One peculiarity of directional movement is the trapezoidal illusion, in which a rotating trapezoid is perceived as oscillating because of the conflict in cues. Another interesting piece of research by A. E. Michotte (1881–1965) indicates that movement can have more complex attributes such as causality. The simulated appearance of one ball striking another is perceived as the first ball causing the second to move, even though there is no actual contact.

Apparent Movement. Of great importance is the study of the perception of movement. To illustrate this phenomenon two lights are mounted side by side. First one, then the other, is turned on and off. By varying the time between the turning on of the two lights, one induces three different perceptual experiences. If the time interval is long, the first light is perceived simultaneously. If the time interval is just right, one light is perceived as moving from position A to position B. A light is seen as moving when in fact there is no movement at all, and across a space where there is no stimulus present. The same phenomenon of apparent movement has also been reported for skin sensitivity of two successive stimuli, and for the hearing of two successive clicks.

The conditions governing the occurrence of the phenomenon were investigated by Korte (1915). He found that the threshold was determined by distance between stimuli, the time interval of the succession, and the intensity of the stimuli. Moreover, the direction of the apparent movement was determined by the grouping laws of proximity and similarity. Finally the spatial arrangement of the successive stimuli may direct the apparent movement.

Theories of Perception. On the basis of the phenomenon, field theorists maintain that movement is a primary sensory phenomenon not reducible to sensory attributes or to space or time. On the other hand the sensory-tonic theory of H. Werner and S. Wapner stresses the role of muscle activity in enhancing the autokinetic effect of apparent movement. The transactional functionalism theory of Ames's group and the probabilist theory of Brunswick attempt to explain the illusion of movement in terms of the cues of position, size, distance, and past experience, maintaining that these operate immediately and unconsciously.

The explanation offered by Thomistic psychologists is that movement is a per accidens sensible known through the operation of the internal senses, operating simultaneously in conjunction with the external senses and through physiological and psychological cues. The IMAGINATION is the faculty that supplies the sense of movement in conjunction with the work of the senses; thus the phenomenon of apparent movement results from the work of the imagination. This faculty fuses together the successive sense impressions, e.g., moving pictures, and at the same time relates this information to the past experience of actual moving things to give an experience of movement. Such a Thomistic view can give a rational explanation of all the phenomena of movement reported in experimental psychology; yet it should be noted that what it subjects to complex analysis is in reality a spontaneous and frequently an unconscious process.

MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF

Experience shows that some things in the world are in motion, whereas others are at rest, and that things pass from rest to motion and from motion to rest. In view of these facts, the question arises whether each and every thing is so constituted as to be capable of both motion and rest, capable of being either a mover or something moved, or whether besides things of this sort, something exists that is a mover, but is itself unmoved by any other. Is there an unmoved mover that is the primal source or first cause of motion? Scholastic philosophers commonly answer this question in the affirmative.

Existence of an Unmoved Mover

The scholastic proofs for the existence of a first unmoved mover are based upon an argument first proposed by ARISTOTLE (Phys. 241b 24–267b 27) and subsequently commented upon by St. THOMAS AQUINAS (In 7 phys. 1–9; In 8 phys. 1–23) in the context of their natural philosophy. In what follows, the concepts and distinctions presupposed to this argument are first explained, then the argument itself is exposed, and some observations made on the place of such a proof in natural philosophy and its relevance to traditional proofs for the existence of God.

Presuppositions. By MOTION is meant the act or process of change. This is not a disembodied energy, nor something purely and simply actual, but an actual determination of a natural body precisely as this is capable of further actuation. Motion thus conceived requires a mobile or potential subject that remains the self-same throughout the change, but becomes different from the way in which it was before the change. When a body passes from REST to MOTION, motion itself begins to be in this mobile subject. Whatever begins to be does not spring from mere nothing, nor does it produce itself, but depends for its being on some active principle, called the efficient cause. The efficient cause is the mover, or active source of motion, whereas motion is an effect produced in the moved or mobile subject. Each kind of motion requires a mobile subject capable of being moved with that motion, as well as a mover able to produce the motion.

Atemporal Aspect. If the supposition is made that motion had a beginning in time and has not existed from eternity, then it is manifest that there must be a first efficient cause of motion, because anything that begins to be requires an efficient cause from which it originates. However, since it is not clear from human experience or scientific reasoning that motion did have a beginning in time, the present discussion does not assume this.

Accidental vs. Essential. In order to prove by reasoning that there is a first cause of motion, a distinction should be made between motion that is caused or possessed accidentally and motion that is caused or possessed essentially. Motion is accidental when it is associated with something that merely belongs to something moved, as a color belongs to an animal and is moved accidentally when the animal moves. Motion is also accidental to something contained as a part in a whole; when the whole is moved, the part shares the motion of the whole, as a man in a boat is moved with the boat. On the other hand, motion is essential to something that is moved of itself, and not merely as part of another. Thus the motion of a stick moved by the hand, or of a thrown stone, is essential motion. Accidental motion presupposes and requires essential motion, and to the latter the argument is confined.

Mover and Moved. Several conditions must be fulfilled in order for essential motion to occur. First of all there must be a distinction between the mover and the moved: whatever is moved is moved by something else. The distinction between the mover and the moved appears by way of induction from sensory experience, and by reasoning from effect to cause. Among the things that have essential motion, some derive their motion from themselves, and others from something else; in some cases the motion is natural, whereas in other cases it is mechanical, that is, by impressed force.

It is manifest that things moved mechanically, by art or by violence, are moved by something else, that is, by a mover distinct from the moved. On the other hand, living things have in themselves an active principle or efficient cause of their own motion, by which they move themselves in different ways. They are also composed of heterogeneous parts; the part that causes motion is distinct from the part moved, as the nerves and muscles are distinct from the bones. Organisms thus move themselves by means of their parts, with the part in motion being moved by another part that is an active cause of motion. Nonliving bodies do not appear to move themselves, or to have in themselves an efficient cause of their own motion; thus they are moved by some cause that is distinct from themselves.

Reason also aids in understanding that whatever is in motion is moved by something else. Motion itself is an effect requiring both an efficient cause and a subject capable of being moved. If something is in motion and does not have the efficient cause of its motion within itself, then it is moved by something other than itself. If it does have the cause of motion within itself, then it moves itself by means of its parts, and these are related as mover and moved. In all cases, whatever is in motion is divisible and has parts, and the whole depends upon the parts, both for its existence and for its motion, whether it is moved by something else or moves itself.

Contact and Simultaneity. The second condition required for motion is that the mover and the moved must be together. Experience shows that some things are capable of causing motion and yet sometimes are not causing it, and that some things are capable of motion, but sometimes are at rest. Motion requires not only a distinction between the mover and the moved, but also that mover and moved be together in place and time. The need for contact between the mover and the moved may be understood inductively, by considering the various kinds of motion, whether according to place or quality or quantity, and by reasoning in terms of cause and effect.

Local Motion. In regard to local motion, everything that is moved locally is moved either by itself or by something else. Something that moves itself has the cause of motion in itself, and so in this case it is clear that the mover and the moved are together as parts of one and the same whole. A body can be moved locally by something else in various ways, namely, by pushing, pulling, carrying, etc. Yet all these are reducible to some kind of combining or separating, because by local motion things are either brought together or separated.

Both experience and reason show that combining or separating require contact between the mover and the moved. The reason lies in the fact that the mover is the principle and cause from which the motion proceeds and begins to exist in the moved. Without contact the mover would have nothing on which to act. Since mover and moved are together and, as it were, one by contact, they share one and the same motion in different ways: the mover as efficient cause and the moved as patient or subject. Just as an effect cannot come from nothing, so it cannot come to be without some contact with its source. (See ACTION AT A DISTANCE.)

Alteration and Augmentation. In cases of change in quality, whatever causes alteration and whatever is altered are in contact with each other. This is clear in regard to sensory qualities and the organs of sense. For sensations of touch, taste, or smell to take place, something with the peculiar sensible quality must contact the proper organ of sense to act on it and cause the sensation, which is a kind of alteration. Sight and hearing also require contact with the appropriate sense, although in these cases the distant object first causes an alteration in the medium, and then, through the medium, causes an alteration in the sense. Likewise, when the condition of contact is fulfilled, natural bodies interact through their physical and chemical qualities and cause alterations in each other. In change of quantity also, whether increase or decrease, there is contact between the organism and the parts that are added or lost.

Together in Time. Furthermore, mover and moved are together in time as well as in place; that is, they are simultaneous. At the same time as the mover causes motion, the moved is in motion. This is seen in the example of the hand moving the pen. The motion of the pen requires the hand as mover and contact of the hand with the pen; when, and only when the hand moves the pen, the pen is moved by the hand. Mover and moved are together in place and time because they are parts of one system, and the motion is the act of both mover and moved, although in different ways: it is actively from the mover and passively in the moved (see ACTION AND PASSION).

Argument for a First Cause. Although man has no experimental knowledge of the prime mover, he can reason from sensible effects to the first cause of motion. It is evident from experience that something can be moved by something else in two ways. The proximate mover may itself be the source of motion, or this mover may depend upon something else. A mover that is itself the source of motion may cause the motion either directly and immediately, or through one or more intermediates, as a man can move a stone either immediately or by means of a stick in his hand. In such a case the stone is moved principally by the man, and only instrumentally by the stick, because the man moves the stick, but the stick does not move the man, nor does it move the stone unless it is moved by the man.

With facts and distinctions such as these in mind, one can propose a general argument. Many things in the world are in motion, but everything in motion is moved by something else, and mover and moved are together in place and time. The mover, in turn, is either moved by something else or it is not. In either case there must be a first mover that is not moved by anything else, but is itself as unmoved mover and the first cause of motion. Motion requires an efficient cause, and every cause that is a moved mover requires another efficient cause. Every moved mover, regardless of how many there may be in any given series, is an intermediate cause dependent upon another cause. Such a series of movers moved by something else cannot be infinite, but must terminate in a first cause of motion that is not moved by any other. If there were no unmoved mover, there would be no first cause of motion nor any other cause, and hence no motion, which is contrary to fact.

This argument may be stated briefly in another way. Where there is motion, there must be a moved and a mover, distinct and yet together in place and time. There may also be an intermediate mover or instrument of motion. Motion is in the moved; the intermediate mover moves something and is moved by something; there must also be a first cause of motion that is unmoved by anything else, because the effect cannot be without such a cause. If anything is a mover and yet incapable of causing motion by itself, but only as moved by something else, and this in turn by something else, then such a series of moved movers cannot be infinite. It must be limited, in the sense that an unmoved mover must be the first cause of motion. Besides all the movers moved by something else, however many they may be, or of whatever kind, there must be a first cause of motion that imparts motion by itself and is an unmoved mover, independent of every other.

Role in Natural Philosophy. Questions concerning the first cause of motion may arise either in natural philosophy, or in metaphysics, or in natural and sacred theology. In natural philosophy the first cause of motion is considered only insofar as is necessary to understand motion in natural things and to determine whether the primary source of motion is or is not a natural body (see PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE). A body is something extended and divisible in parts that are in it and thus compose the whole. A body or extended whole is not an independent being, but depends upon its own parts for its being. A body is dependent upon its parts for being moved, because motion requires a subject that is extended and divisible into parts, but the first cause of motion is completely independent in action, and hence also in being, because operation follows being, and the manner of acting is consequent upon the manner of being. Therefore, the first cause of motion is not a body, and does not have parts on which it depends for its being and acting. It is not composed of matter and form, nor of potency and act. It is not capable of being moved or having motion, either by itself or by something else, but is the unmoved mover of other things. Because it is unmoved, it is not a temporal being but eternal. Because it is unmoved and incorporeal, it does not cause motion mechanically, as one body moves another from without, but rather as mind or intelligence moves a body with a higher order of action. It may be true that there are many kinds of spiritual beings who are intermediate movers, in the sense that they cause motion only insofar as they are themselves moved by another mover in a way different from the movements to which material things are subject. If this is the case, however, these spiritual beings are not the first cause of motion whose existence has been proved, but are themselves moved by it.

To account for motion in the world, it is sufficient for the purposes of natural philosophy to admit one first cause of motion. One mover entirely unmoved suffices to cause motion in all things that are moved—not indeed as the only mover, but as the only first and unmoved mover—because it acts with complete independence, whereas everything that is moved in any way whatever is dependent upon an unmoved mover. Moreover, the first cause of motion is eternal and acts without detriment to itself, and so is capable of being the first cause of all motions in the world. Furthermore, the unity and the order of the world indicate that the first cause of motion is one and unique, somewhat as the orderly motion of an army indicates that there is one in command (see UNIVERSE, ORDER OF). To treat of the first cause more profoundly and in greater detail pertains to metaphysics and theology (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF).

First Mover and God. It is sometimes questioned whether the first cause of motion proved in natural philosophy is the being whom men call God, and whether the existence of God can be discussed or proved with the concepts and principles that pertain to natural philosophy. Although the considerations of this branch of philosophy are limited, and the first cause of motion is not included within the proper subject of natural science, yet Aristotle touched upon these ultimate problems in his Physics, and both St. Thomas Aquinas and Sir Isaac Newton maintained that in natural science one should seek the first cause of motion, and treat of God inasmuch as He can be known as the cause of motion in the world. Moreover, as has been shown in the argument above, one can prove the existence of the first cause of motion through the data of experience and the principles of ordinary understanding and can show that this cause is not a natural body but an incorporeal and unmoved mover, entirely independent in action and being, and so reasonably identified with the being that men call God.

This proof from matter and motion, suggested by Aristotle and pursued by St. Thomas, has many advantages. From ordinary experience and consciousness men are aware not only of sensible motions in the world, but also of activities such as sensation, thought, and volition in themselves. Although these last are not motions in the strict sense of the term, nevertheless they are motions in the broad sense of alterations or qualitative dispositions. Sensations are initiated by sensible motions, and thoughts and volitions are in some ways dependent upon sensible motions, as they are also causes of sensible motion in man and in other things. Even thoughts and volitions are dependent on a first cause of motion, because every passing from potency to act requires a mover and ultimately an unmoved mover. It is the proper business of the natural philosopher to seek the causes of motion in natural bodies, and in order to understand his subject he must not rest content with some intermediate mover, nor with all intermediate movers—supposing that they could all be determined—but must seek the first cause of motion. Furthermore, it is only after one knows, through the study of nature, that there exists a kind of being that is not mobile or corporeal, but immobile and incorporeal (including the unmoved mover and spiritual substances) and that he can show the need for a science, beyond natural philosophy, called METAPHYSICS (see BEING).

MOTIVE

Whatever moves the human WILL, or the sufficient explanation for the act of willing in man. This article investigates the elements that move the rational APPETITE from a state of potential willing to that of actually willing. The investigation, which is propaedeutic to all moral science, can be treated in two ways: the philosopher pursues the broad principles that necessarily cover and are applicable to the quasi-infinite variety of human operations, whereas the psychologist considers the same human actions in their more particular existential framework of environment, heredity, biochemistry, etc. The former's conclusions are universal, certain, and "confused," in the sense that all particular differences are fused into a broad unity. The latter's approach gives a more detailed and comparatively clearer, though less certain, picture of human acts in their concrete setting. The two methodologies, though distinct, are, however, complementary; for it is only by their dual process that any integral and sure knowledge of human actions can be gleaned.

This article limits itself to the philosophical analysis of the will's motivation. To ensure completeness, it first considers the fact of the will's motion and its causes, then the mode of freedom in which the will is moved.

Motion of the Will. To discern the cause of the will's motion, it is necessary to distinguish between the two moments of any MOTION, that is, that which physically produces the motion and that which determines it by way of OBJECT, or term. This distinction concerns itself with efficient causality in the order of exercise, namely, to will or not, and with final causality in the order of specification, namely, to will this or that; in other words, with what moves the will as agent and with what moves it as providing its object.

The first conclusion to be seen is that in the actual execution of properly human activity, the will holds the place of first mover in man and so is itself unmoved in this order by any other human faculty. The reason is not hard to discover. Every action is by nature directed toward an object that is its END and GOOD. Now, by comparison, one can see that the object of the will is a more universal end and good than the objects of man's other powers; for the will seeks the good of the whole individual, while all other potencies are inclined only to their particular perfection. Thus man is conscious that he ponders, eats, walks, etc., as he wills. The proper object of the will alone is the total good of the one willing, which is integrated by the partial goods of thinking, eating, walking, etc.

In the order of specification, however, the will cannot but be moved by other faculties. The observation that one cannot love what he does not know is here pertinent. The rational appetite is indeed thrust toward goods, but this drive must be elicited by knowledge of what is good and convenient. If a person is to be open to being and goodness, he must first be aware of reality. Certainly, man's emotional states depend on his consciousness, no matter how dim or clouded, of the pleasurable and the painful. So too, a truly human response to good (and conversely evil) must be governed to some degree at least by an intellectual insight into the goodness of things. In short, if one is to will any particular good, he must first have seen it in the light of what he has conceived as his perfection. Thus the will can operate only inasmuch as it is moved by the intellect presenting a possible good to be desired and attained.

Yet the acts of the intellect and will are exercised in the concrete existential order. Men are not subsistent spiritual faculties operating outside of the spatiotemporal dimension. It is always the will of this individual that seeks what he, as a person, wants here and now. The integral conception of a human act, then, demands recognition of man's emotional states as somewhat determinative of his will-acts. Experientially, one is aware of willing to do things precisely because of his emotional condition, of fear, desire, hate, etc. Words spoken in anger are often regretted when wrath has subsided; what was then viewed as good is now regarded with remorse. The sensitive appetites therefore have their dispositive role in shaping the will-act by molding the man willing to the present desirability of this or that particular good (see EMOTION [MORAL ASPECT]).

Cause of Will's Motion. Within man, then, the will is the prime mover in the executing of his actions, while the will in turn is moved by way of object by the INTELLECT presenting and the passions disposing. A question remains, however, regarding the will's primacy in moving man. Here experience seems to furnish the answer. The will simply moves itself. Everyone is conscious that he wills to do and to have solely because it is his will. And, let it be added, man is not aware of any exterior force moving him physically; dispositively yes, but not as if it were compelling him to act. This appears true from the very nature of the will, because any particular good that one opts for here and now is always sought in relation to and pursuant of an all-embracing fulfillment. As the will-power is actualized in regard to all-good, it is not inconsistent that it move itself here and now to any particular good. Always the particular is contained in the universal; the commander who can order an army into battle has the power of moving a battalion into action.

While experience testifies to the self-motion of the will, reason is constrained to seek a further explanation. Granting that the will moves itself in terms of particular goods sought, because it is already actualized in regard to its universal function of being open to all-being and good, yet this primary inclination must be accounted for. The will at one time had to pass from the mere capability to the actual willing of this end. As the will is unmoved efficiently by anything within man, clearly the source of its motion must be sought in a mover exterior to himself.

The history of man testifies to the validity of this quest. Cassius might protest that "the fault, dear Brutus, lies not in our stars," but the human race has ever looked upon the celestial luminaries as forces of its destiny. Such has been a constant belief from man's primitive religious persuasions to the more sophisticated theories associated with an ever-expanding universe. Despite its popularity, however, careful study has as constantly rejected this opinion as impossible. That the heavens, atmospheric conditions, etc., have an influence on human affairs is an undeniable fact. But to dispose a man objectively in his willing is in the order of specification, and reason rightly rejects the thesis that the grossly material can efficiently actuate the spiritual, or that the inferior can activate the superior. To hold the contrary is in effect to deny the spiritual nature of man's vital principle; it is to reduce the human to the merely animal.

Indeed, the search for the necessary mover of man's will can be successfully terminated neither in the material order of nature nor even in a world of limited and finite being. The principle of SUFFICIENT REASON is here invoked. A cause, limited in itself, cannot suffice to explain an infinite effect. But man's will is unlimited in its yearning for consummation; there is no finite determination in its inclination to embrace all-being and all-good. The cause, then, of this infinite thirst, this openness to being as such, can be only what is itself unlimited, the infinite and uncaused source of all being, "to which everyone gives the name of God."

Freedom of Motion. This conclusion, of course, poses a problem in regard to the FREEDOM with which the will is traditionally endowed. It seems that if man is not his own first mover, then the ultimate responsibility for his actions must lie in another. It is necessary, therefore, to inspect more closely the manner, or mode, in which the will is moved, i.e., to discover whether it is activated necessarily or freely.

Specification. In the order of specification, the will-act, like all motion, is constituted formally and finally by its proper object. Moreover, the primary limitation of its action must come from its natural determination, that is, from the object that specifies it. This object is the good, or that which is convenient to the one willing. But this good, as has been seen, is presented to the will under the universal competency of the intellect. This means that the proper and adequate object of the will, naturally determining it, will be what is universally good containing within its ambit whatever possesses in any way the aspect of being and goodness. As the eye is for seeing and the hand for manipulating, so too is the will for the real possession of unlimited being and goodness. To this object the will is necessitated by the force of its nature. Whatever a man wills as his good may not be truly good, but it must be sought as constituting or contributing to his perfection. "All men seek happiness," and though at times it may be sought in the ultimate flight from the absurdity of existence, yet in the main man necessarily wills his life and his thought as necessary conditions to his fulfillment.

But beyond this basic determination to HAPPINESS, the will remains free to choose or reject any particular good. It is true that a psychological determinism as old as Socrates posits that the will must always choose the better good. More than a trace of this theory underlies educational systems that expect the more educated person to be necessarily the better person.

Yet such a position inevitably defeats its own idealistic aim, for it limits the horizons of man by curtailing his freedom. The human mind with its universal power of penetration is apprehensive not only of being and goodness in things, but also of the imperfection and limitation native to this finite world of reality. Always the particular good presented to the will can be shown as possessing goodness, and so being desirable, or as lacking in being, and so being undesirable. The will, determined only to the universal good, is not then irresistibly drawn to anything that lacks this universal appeal. Even an abstract consideration of a being necessarily possessive of all being would not perforce move the will, since the very concept of such a being is itself contingent and so unable to move necessarily. Therefore, although the will is determined to goodness, under which aspect alone it may operate, yet, confronted by any particular object lacking a totality of goodness, it remains free.

Again, the question of man's freedom in the light of his emotional reactions has always been a matter of dispute. There are those who, conceiving man as a highly organized type of animal life, contend that, given a certain degree of emotional intensity, he must react in a determined way. There are many who delimit the extent of human liberty in the face of social and physiological factors, all of which influence man by way of emotional stimulation.

But a philosophical consideration of the principles of human action, gained not in an a priori hypothesis but through observation of human nature, ineluctably refutes any such determination of the sensitive order, while at the same time admitting its dispositive influence. For if man's powers of apprehension and appetition are really distinguished into the rational and the animal, the intellectual and the sensitive, his activity will be likewise characterized. Since it is the PERSON who operates by his various faculties, it is possible that his action may be threefold. His activity may be solely on the intellectual plane, as is evidenced when he is so fully integrated as to arrive at the state of maturity in which his rational nature completely controls his sensitive activity. Again, his action may be purely emotional, in which case all rational vitality is lacking, as in the child or mentally retarded adult. Still a third state is possible, that is, when his voluntary movement runs counter to his animal inclinations. In this more common state, reason and will, though experiencing the impact of passion, are yet free to repel its influence and to hold themselves aloof from its tensions. Thus—as is implicitly affirmed in traditional social and legal thought—whenever there is properly human activity, man is free and capable of restraining the demands of sensitive nature.

Exercise. The problem of the will's freedom in the order of exercise must finally be faced. The will, as any other potential agent, must derive its actualization from a being that is itself unmoved since it is PURE ACT (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF). Since subsistent activity would by nature be an irresistible mover, it seems clear that a will so moved could hardly retain the capacity of not moving. The will then would be necessarily moved to execution and its so-called liberty would become impossible.

In principle, the problem is solved by considering the efficacy of the First CAUSE whose power extends not only to the production of all things (including the will-act) but also to the mode or manner in which such things are effected. If one is not to fall back into a discredited OCCASIONALISM, one must grant true causality to things. Experience, moreover, is the best proof that the will is an agent that acts freely. As secondary cause, it is indeed moved to its proper operation according to the nature of its being as a participation of Being itself. Since its nature is to operate freely, it is moved freely by the sole cause of its nature. To hold otherwise, for a deistic determinism, would be to place an impossible limitation on providence. But here the human mind reaches the mystery of infinity. Conscious of its own limitation, the human intellect strives in vain to understand how subsistent motion can be composed with liberty of CHOICE. Reason can demonstrate the truth of each principle, but their correspondence remains shrouded in the transcendence of the First Cause.

MOTIVE, UNCONSCIOUS

In discussion of the influence of an unconscious or hidden motive upon the morality of human action, the term has been applied to two quite different situations, sometimes with no clear recognition that between them there is a difference that is, from the moral point of view, one not only of degree but also of kind. Sometimes the hidden motive is understood to be more or less deliberately or culpably excluded from consciousness by a kind of self-deception; at other times it indicates a motive that an automatic psychic mechanism has buried deeply in the unconscious, where it is inaccessible under ordinary circumstances to the conscious mind but exercises a notable influence upon an individual's conscious behavior.

Self-Deception. This is common enough in human experience. "It is a common and often repeated conviction of the ascetical writers through the ages that human beings are all too apt to allow their behavior to be determined by motives quite other than those which they think to be operative; and unless that assumption is accepted, all the warnings of the ascetical writers against self-deception become meaningless" (Vann 118). In this kind of situation the hidden motive is the true end for which the agent acts, and the motive that is consciously asserted is no more than a fabrication invented by the individual to permit himself to appear in his own eyes and in those of others in a more creditable light. The motive he invents is not in any true sense the cause of his acting as he does, but is simply the excuse with which he attempts to justify his action. His inadvertence to his true motive is voluntary and culpable, and it does not in any way prevent his action from being attributable to the motive that is truly operative. In this type of case, therefore, there is no question of double motivation in any proper sense of the term. There is one true motive, and the other is falsely pre-empted and asserted by the conscious mind. One cannot generalize, however, and say that wherever there is self-deception that is in any degree culpable, the hidden predisposition to act in a particular way always constitutes a true end or motive in the sense in which the moralist understands the term. But it can be reasonably said that if a person does in fact act for an end that he culpably excludes from consciousness, then the camouflaged objective is the real motive of the action. There is no theoretical difficulty in harmonizing such a falsification of motivation with the teaching of Catholic moral theology regarding the structure of the human act. It is a possibility of which moralists and ascetical writers have always been aware.

Strictly Unconscious Motive. The difficulty lies rather in integrating into the traditional concept of the human act the motive that is alleged by depth psychologists to lie in some cases more deeply buried in the unconscious through the operation of nonvoluntary psychic mechanisms. The existence of such motivation has not been established beyond doubt, but it is assumed by many and, indeed, is asserted to be a common if not indeed a normal phenomenon and one by no means reserved to those suffering from psychic disorder. It may appear difficult, however, to reconcile this assumption with the view of the human act taken in traditional Christian moral thought, according to which a man is normally capable of knowing and indeed of choosing the ends for which he acts.

To avoid equivocation, a distinction must be made between the meaning given to motivation by the psychologist and by the moral theologian. The moralist generally uses the term in the sense of an end, or causa finalis, to which human action is directed, whereas for the psychologist a motive is more likely to signify a drive, a tendency, an urge, or an impulse to act—a meaning that is, incidentally, nearer to that given the term by St. Thomas Aquinas, for whom a causa motiva, or a principium movens, or simply a motivum, was identified with efficiency rather than finality. This distinction makes it possible to see that the operation of an unconscious motive (psychological) does not necessarily invalidate, or contradict, or make unreal the motive (moral) asserted by the conscious mind. The two can coexist, each contributing in a different order of causality to the same human activity but without negating the reality of the influence of the other (see Ford and Kelly 1:126).

If there exists a kind of knowledge or volition below the level of consciousness, this cannot be sufficient to account for proper human motivation or the finalization of the human act in the full sense of the word. The unconscious desire, if it exercises any influence at all, must do so in the form of impulses or urges toward activities in conformity with its bent. Impulses or urges, however, account for one's feeling like doing something, but they do not at all account for why he does it.

In the past the vagaries of individual impulse were regarded as mysterious, and it was considered sufficient for moral judgment to evaluate an act simply in the light of what appears in the conscious mind. Modern depth psychology has not essentially altered this situation. If its assumptions are valid, these simply make clearer the causes of the predispositions and inclinations that precede moral decision. That these influenced moral decision in some cases was not a thing unknown to the older theologians or even to the ancient philosophers. But from the fact of influence it cannot be inferred that they normally dominate or control human behavior. The conscious mind, aware of an urge or an impulse to something though unaware of its cause, evaluates what one is attracted to and considers whether it can be harmonized with one's interests as these are consciously recognized, whether it can be integrated into a pattern of life one consciously wants to realize. This rational deliberation leads to the acceptance or the repudiation of the impulse. If it is accepted, its satisfaction becomes a human motive and end; if it is rejected, it does not. The rejected impulse may continue to be felt, but its satisfaction is desired only on a level below that of deliberate volition. If it is so strong that it cannot be resisted, the hidden motive does actually dominate and control behavior, but what one does in such a case is neither human nor moral, and so has no human end or goal. But where deliberation is not frustrated, the hidden motive will do no more than account for something seeming desirable. It may explain desire on the level of sense, or perhaps even velleity in the will, but it does not account for actual choice. This must be explained in terms of the end to which one's activity is consciously directed.

Rationalization. Unconscious motivation is sometimes expounded in such a way as to make the deliberation of the conscious mind appear simply a rationalization. The conscious mind looks for and finds acceptable pretexts for doing what the unconscious wants for different and less creditable reasons, the mind's deliberation being simply a bit of stage play to hoodwink the conscience. This, however, is an unfounded assumption. The conscious mind not only finds justifying reasons to act upon some impulses, but it also finds cause to reject others. A man does not live in blind submission to his impulses and urges, whatever their source. Consider, for example, a man who has an unconscious desire to dominate and subdue others and experiences in consequence consciously felt impulses to aggressive behavior of one kind or another. Sometimes he may yield to these impulses because he judges aggression to be appropriate and reasonable in the circumstances, as well it may be; but at other times he will reject them because he sees that aggression would be unreasonable and would serve no good end. That such judgment can be sound and honest is plentifully evident from human experience.

Nevertheless, one should grant the possibility of unconsciously motivated impulses being rationalized by the conscious mind in an objectionable sense of the term. It is possible for a person to deceive himself more or less culpably in thinking that his activities are directed to the good end he alleges. But when such is the case, the spurious character of the pretexted motivation should be perceptible to the conscious mind, however deeply in the unconscious the source of the impulses may be hidden; a good examination of conscience should bring to light the fact that one's behavior is not reasonably related to the lofty ends one claims to serve.

It may also be granted that the existence of an unconscious motive can predispose an individual to rationalize his behavior in an objectionable sense. Before the time of modern psychology it was well known that men incline to find reasons to justify what they feel inclined to do. A strong unconscious motive may therefore prove an obstacle to sound moral judgment and rectitude of will, but it does not follow that these are normally made impossible.

MOTOLINÍA, TORIBIO DE BENAVENTE

Franciscan missionary, one of the “Twelve Apostles” in Mexico; b. Benavente, León, Spain, c. 1495; d. Mexico City, probably in 1565. As a young man he became a Franciscan, joining the strict reformed section of the Province of Santiago. In 1523 Martín de VALENCIA was instructed by the Franciscan minister general to choose 12 friars from the province for the first formal Franciscan mission to Mexico. Father Toribio was one of those chosen. Upon arriving in Mexico in May of 1524, he took for his name the first word he learned in the Tlaxcalan tongue, motolinía, meaning “poverty.” In June of 1524, when the friars formed the Custody of the Holy Gospel, he was appointed the first superior of the Friary of San Francisco in Mexico City. In spite of the municipal officials, he maintained the authority of the Franciscan custos as head of the Church in Mexico. In 1525 he was appointed superior of Huejotzingo, and in 1527 he went to Honduras and Nicaragua, returning in 1529. That year he gained the enmity of the civil authorities by granting asylum in Huejotzingo to native leaders who had complained of heavy taxations. From 1530 to 1533 he was guardian in Tlaxcala, and he traveled widely among the native people west and north of Mexico City, helping to found the Spanish town of Puebla. In 1534 he was once more sent to Guatemala. Returning after a year or so, he was stationed as a missionary in Tlaxcala.

When the Custody of the Holy Gospel was made a province, Motolinía was appointed guardian of Tlaxcala and was instructed to write an account of the life and beliefs of the native people in pre-Spanish times and a history of the work of the Franciscans among them. From this came his Historia de los indios de Nueva España, completed in 1541, his most important work. Later he wrote a related volume entitled Memoriales. In 1543 he was again sent to Guatemala as custos of a band of 24 friars. When conflicts arose with the Dominicans and several Franciscans asked to leave, he resigned his office in 1545 and returned to Mexico. In 1546 he became acting provincial in Mexico when the provincial was lost at sea; later he was made provincial by election (1548–51). Little is known of his later work. In 1555 he wrote a scathing attack on the exaggerations in Las Casas' Brevísima relación. His last years were spent in retirement in the friary of Mexico City.

MOTRIL, MARTYRS OF, BB.

The Martyrs of Motril, also known as Vicente Soler and Companions, Augustinian Recollect Martyrs of Spain; d. July 25–26 and Aug. 15, 1936, near Motril, Granada, Spain; beatified by John Paul II, March 7, 1999.

This group of seven Augustinian Recollects and a parish priest of Motril represent a small fraction of the 7,000 priests and religious killed for their faith during the Spanish Civil War (1936–39). One week after the war began, revolutionaries attacked (July 25, 1936) the Augustinian monastery, forced five priests out, and shot them in the street when they refused to renounce their faith. The next day two priests sought refuge in prayer in the Church of the Divine Shepherd next to the monastery. They were found and killed in the church courtyard. The final priest was captured later. All eight were decreed martyrs on March 8, 1997. In his beatification homily Pope John Paul II stressed that they “did not die for an ideology, but freely gave their lives for Someone who had already died for them. They gave back to Christ the gift they had received from him.” The blessed include:

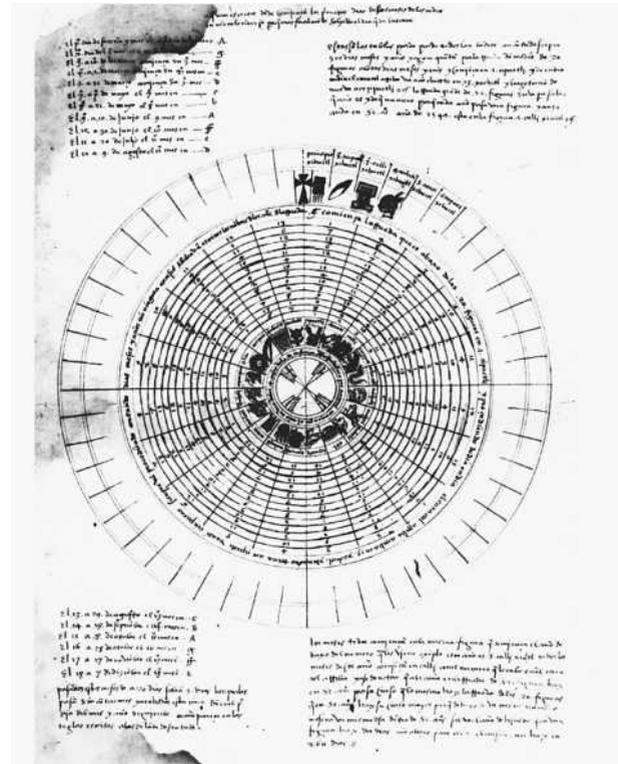

Diez, José Ricardo; Augustinian priest, d. July 25, 1936 in the streets of Motril.

Inchausti, Leon, Augustinian priest, d. July 25, 1936 in the streets of Motril.

Martin Sierra, Manuel, parish priest at the Church of the Divine Shepherd in Motril; d. July 26, 1936.

Moreno, Julian Benigno, Augustinian priest, d. July 25, 1936 in the streets of Motril.

Palacios, Deogracias, Augustinian priest, d. July 25, 1936 in the streets of Motril.

Pinilla, Vicente, Augustinian priest, d. July 26, 1936 with Father Manuel Martin in the church courtyard after praying in the parish church.

Rada, José, Augustinian priest, d. July 25, 1936 in the streets of Motril.

Soler, Vicente, Augustinian priest, b. 1867, Malon near Saragossa, Spain; d. Aug. 15, 1936. He had been a missionary in the Philippines, provincial in Spain, and superior general of the order for seven months in 1926. He had been in the choir when five of his brothers were arrested and shot. He escaped but was caught and imprisoned on July 29, 1936. Throughout his incarceration he ministered to other prisoners and lead them in a Marian novena in the days before his death. He offered his life in exchange for that of a father of eight children, but the offer was declined. He was shot with 16 others. One of the 18 survived to relate the story of Vicente’s martyrdom.

MOTT, JOHN RALEIGH

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION (YMCA) official, evangelical missionary, and leader in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC); b. Livingston Manor, N.Y., May 25, 1865; d. Orlando, Fla., Jan. 31, 1955. He was the son of John S. and Elmira (Dodge) Mott. After graduating (1888) from Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y., he married (1891) Leila White and became chairman of the executive committee of the Student Volunteer Movement and student secretary of the International Committee of the YMCA. In 1895 he helped to organize the World Student Christian Federation to coordinate youth groups for Christian unity, and he was its general secretary (1895–1920) and chairman (1920–28). From 1900 to 1914 he repeatedly toured the world, especially the Far East, to organize Christian youth and student movements, becoming one of the chief proponents of ecumenical Christianity. After heading the first preparatory commission for the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference (1910), he was chairman of its continuing committee until 1920, when it became the International Missionary Council with him as chairman to 1942. Meanwhile he continued his work for the YMCA, becoming (1915) secretary of its International Committee and also of the National Council of the YMCA in the United States. During World War I he was general secretary for the National War Work Council of the YMCA and worked with the Allied armies and among prisoners of war in Europe. From 1926 to 1946 he was president of the YMCA's World's Committee and World's Alliance. He received France's Legion of Honor, America's Distinguished Service Medal, and Norway's Nobel Peace Prize (1946).

Mott exercised an important influence on the ECUMENICAL movement of the early 20th century. According to C. Howard Hopkins, History of the Y.M.C.A. in North America (1951), "the most obvious contribution of the Y.M.C.A. to the world-wide movement that eventuated in the World Council of Churches was the person and influence of John R. Mott." He spent 50 years exemplifying the slogan adopted by the World's Alliance in 1881: that they may be one. His work with the International Missionary Council was permeated by this spirit and contributed to the formation of the World Council of Churches. In 1937 he presided over the first Faith and Order Conference at Oxford, England; a year later at Utrecht, Netherlands, he acted as vice chairman of the provisional committee to plan the projected world council. This project was delayed by war, but was crowned with success at Amsterdam in 1948, where he served as one of the presidents. Recognition of his enormous contribution to ecumenism was given him there, when he was made lifetime honorary president of the WCC. His 16 books dealt mainly with world evangelism.

MOUNIER, EMMANUEL

Founder of a philosophy of PERSONALISM; b. Grenoble, April 1, 1905; d. Paris, March 22, 1950. Mounier began his active career as a professor of philosophy at St. Omer. In October 1932 he founded the journal Esprit, in which he applied his philosophy of personalism to the contemporary social, political, and cultural problems of the France of his day. During World War II he was a member of the Lyons resistance; was arrested (1941) but later released as a result of a hunger strike; and spent the occupation near Beauvillon, where he was a member of the dromois maquis. He resumed the editorship of Esprit after the war. Three of his works that have appeared in English translation are A Personalist Manifesto (New York 1938), Personalism (London 1952), and Be Not Afraid: Studies in Personalist Sociology (New York 1954).

Mounier's personalism was based on belief in the person as a spiritual being, maintaining his existence by adhering to a hierarchy of values freely adopted and assimilated. The person lives by his own responsible activity and interior development, unifies all his activity in freedom, and by creative acts develops his individuality and vocation. The person freely involves himself in the world while maintaining a spiritual detachment from, and transcendence over, the material aspects of civilization. Personalism means "engagement in action" in contemporary civilization. Real communion is also a demand of the person; the need for it leads to neither individualism nor communism, but to a personalist communitarian society in which each person would achieve his vocation in the totality, and in which the communion of the totality would be the result of the efforts of each person.

Mounier applied this philosophy to contemporary society. For him, the capitalist economic order subordinated the person to a system of production because of the profit motive. A personalist economic order would regulate the economy according to service rendered to the members of society. This would mean in practice a type of socialism involving elimination of the primacy of the profit motive, socialization of certain sectors of industry, development of cooperative life, the priority of labor over capital, the abolition of class distinctions based on division of labor or wealth, and the priority of personal responsibility over organizations.

In Mounier's thought, a personalist political order would be based upon a pluralistic society. The resulting democracy would be limited by the spiritual person and the rights of the natural societies that compose the nation. Such a democracy would be based upon autonomous societies exercising authority in their own spheres of influence and freely cooperating for national projects; it would result in a decentralization of authority and the personalization of the political order.

MOUNT ATHOS, MONASTIC REPUBLIC OF

The Monastic Republic of Mount Athos is unique in being a theocratic republic whose principal inhabitants are multi-ethnic Orthodox monks from Greece, Turkey and the Slavic countries. Although it is within the physical boundaries of Greece, the Greek Constitution recognizes its administrative autonomy. Ecclesiastically, it is subject to the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE rather than the Greek Orthodox Church.

History. Mount Athos is the outside promontory of the three-pronged peninsula in northern Greece called Chalcidice that extends about 35 miles into the Aegean Sea and is named after a pyramid-like peak that rises to 6,760 feet. Before the arrival of Christian monks the site contained several cities dating from pre-Christian antiquity. Legend places a sanctuary of Zeus or Jupiter on the peninsula. Even today the traces can be seen of the canal, 3,950 feet long, that Xerxes constructed on the isthmus in his attempt to invade Greece in 480 B.C. without having to undergo the dangers of rounding the cape of the peninsula.

Although there were individual hermits inhabiting the Holy Mountain earlier, the first documentary records of Christian hermitages are from the 9th century when fugitives from the persecutions of ICONOCLASM increased the hermit population. Organized monastic life began there in 963, when Saint ATHANASIOS the Athonite built the first cenobitic monastery, known as the Great Lavra. His Rule derived chiefly from that of Saint BASIL the Great and Saint THEODORE THE STUDITE. Despite opposition to the innovations of organized community monasticism on Mount Athos, and with the support of the Byzantine Emperors Nicephorus Phocas and John I Tzimisces, the Rule of Saint Athanasios was accepted as a model; cenobitic life was imposed upon the hermits and Athanasios became the abbot, ruling 58 monasteries.

Under the constitution approved by the Emperor Constantine Monomachus, the famous law excluding women and female animals from the holy mount was enacted in 1045. In the 11th century other Christian nations began to send representatives to Mount Athos, and princes of the Balkan peninsula and of the northern Slav countries (especially Russia) endowed monasteries, thus making the peninsula pan-Orthodox in its representation. Even after the Eastern Schism (c. 1054), Benedictine monks of Amalfi, Italy, maintained a Catholic monastery there.

The monks turned to Pope INNOCENT III for protection against the Latin Crusaders and Catalan invaders in the 13th century; but when the Turks captured Salonica in 1430, the monks broke off all contact with Rome and submitted to their Turkish rulers.

Monasteries. Today Mount Athos exists as a republic under the Greek government, but enjoys self-rule. Internal government is centered in the holy Koinotis (central governing body) made up of 20 members chosen from the 20 monasteries that have the sole voting power. From these 20 members, a committee of four called the epistatae is chosen to form the executive branch. A president elected for one year presides over the sessions, which are held in the capital of Karyes, the seat of government since the 10th century. Of the 20 monasteries with voting power, 17 are Greek, one Bulgarian, one Russian, and one Serbian; these are: the Great Lavra (the oldest), Vatopedi, Saint Panteleimon (Russian), Hilandari (Serbian), Xeropotamou, Xenophontos, Docheiariou, Kastamonitou, Zographou (Bulgarian), Esphigmenou, Pantokratoros, Iviron, Koutlousiou, Philotheou, Karakallou, Saint Paul's, Dionysiou, Gregoriou, Simopetra, and Stavroniketa (the last built, in 1545). Historically some of the monasteries adopted the idiorhythmic monastic life, while others adopted the cenobitic monastic life. Under the cenobitic system, monks give a great degree of obedience to an abbot (higoumenos) chosen for life, perform all liturgical services in common, and submit to a stricter discipline in regard to food and property. In contrast, the idiorhythmic (literally, one's own rhythm) model allowed the individual monk to set his own pace. The idiorhythmic model came under much criticism for its propensity to tolerate abuses and laxity among the monks. By 1992, all 20 principal monasteries became cenobitic, when the Pantokratoros officially adopted the cenobitic model, being the last to do so.

Besides the 20 main monasteries, there are others, called sketes, some of which are even larger than the 20 main monasteries. These sketes, or clusters of ascetics living together, are also divided into the cenobitic and idiorhythmic types. The cenobitic sketes differ externally from the main cenobitic monasteries, only in that rather than an abbot, a superior (dikaios) rules and is subject to the abbot of the main monastery to which the skete belongs. The idiorhythmic sketes are groups of small huts with three or four monks living together in each hut. In the midst of these clusters of huts there is the central church (kyriakon), so called because the monks come to common liturgical services only on Sunday, the day of the Lord (Kyrios). An elder rules the hut or hermitage, while the whole group of huts comes under the rule of a superior chosen by the main monastery to which the skete is attached. Observance in the idiorhythmic skete, unlike the idiorhythmic life in the main monasteries, is usually conducive to strict discipline and fervor in religious life.

Scattered throughout the rugged terrain of Mount Athos there are independent hermitages, called kalyves. The hermits who inhabit the southernmost tip of the peninsula (called Karoulia meaning pulleys), live one to a hut or in very small groups; each hermitage is independent and directly under one of the main monasteries. There are also kellia, separated houses ruled by an elder and dependent only upon the main monasteries, but in which the ascetical rule is not so austere as that practiced in the kalyves. Thus one finds a great deal of variety in monastic rule and observance, with much left to individual preference.

Architecture, Art, Libraries. Because of the ravages of time, earthquakes, plundering by pirates and the coming of Latin Crusaders, little of the architecture and art work dates back further than the 16th century; yet because of the utter conservatism, all that is found exactly reflects the Byzantine architecture and art of the 10th to 14th centuries. All the large monasteries follow an identical architectural plan and have fortified walls on the outside and on the inside a quadrangle, where the central church (katholikon) is found. The walls of the church and the numerous cupolas are frescoed; along with the art work of icons painted on wood, the metal work, and the iconostasis, the frescoes reflect very well the style of medieval Byzantine religious art.

Many of the libraries, such as those in the monasteries of Saint Paul and Simopetra, have been destroyed by fire; some were ravaged by the Turks during the War of Greek Independence (1821–29); and others were depleted by the neglect or even the vandalism of monks. Many ancient manuscripts were sold to libraries and museums in Russia and France; but about 11,000 remain, dealing mostly with theological and ecclesiastical subjects. Since contemplation rather than intellectual culture has characterized the monks of Mount Athos, little research has been done on these manuscripts. There has been a steady movement to give the monks a better education, and aspirants now spend five years training at the Athonias school in Karyes before they are attached to a monastery.

Mount Athos is unique as the last outpost where Byzantine religious culture and the spirituality of HESYCHASM are preserved in contemporary times.

MOUNT MELLERAY ABBEY

Monastery of Cistercian contemplatives of the strict observance or TRAPPISTS, Cappoquin, County Waterford, Ireland. It was founded in 1832 by 64 monks expelled from the abbey of MELLERAY, France, after the revolution of 1830. The monks, mostly Irish, a few English, were under the leadership of Dom Vincent M. Ryan (1778–1845) a native of Waterford City, and former prior of the French abbey. They obtained refuge on a farm in Kerry until 1832 when Sir Richard Keane of Cappoquin offered them 500 acres of unreclaimed moorland. Nearly 10,000 volunteers from neighboring parishes helped to erect a temporary house, to fence the land and to begin its reclamation. In 1838 the Church was consecrated, but the monks lived in poverty—yet during the Great Famine of 1847 and its aftermath they aided starving thousands. The following monasteries have been founded by Mount Melleray: 1835, Mount St. Bernard, Leicestershire, England; 1849, New Melleray, Iowa; 1878, Mount St. Joseph, Roscrea, Ireland; 1938, MELLIFONT ABBEY, County Louth, Ireland; 1948, Portglenone, County Antrim, Ireland; 1954, Kopua, Hawke's Bay, New Zealand.

MOUNT OF OLIVES

The Mount of Olives lies east of the city of JERUSALEM. A long ridge, running north and south for about two miles, separated from Jerusalem by the Kidron Valley, it is slightly higher in elevation than the city itself. The hill is part of the central Judean range that falls off sharply to the Jordan Valley on the east and more gradually to the Mediterranean Sea on the west. The term “Mount of Olives” refers most properly to the southernmost of the ridge’s three sections. The northernmost section is known as Mt. Scopus. The middle section is probably the site of the Old Testament Nob (1 Sm 21.1). The southern section, directly east of the Temple area, now called Jebel et-Tur, is, properly, the Mount of Olives, the traditional site of Jesus’ Ascension into heaven. The village Kefr et-Tur, on the eastern slope, is believed to be the site of Bethphage, while farther down the southeastern end of the slope stood Bethany.

In the Old Testament. The Mount of Olives is mentioned only once in the Old Testament and only in a rather late post-exilic book, the Apocalypse of Zechariah (Zec 14.4), but it must be the same hill that was the scene of David’s flight from Absalom (2 Sm 15.23). In Ez 11.23, the hill to the east of the city on which “the glory of the Lord . . . took a stand” after leaving the Temple must also have been the Mount of Olives. In Zec 14.4, on the day of the Lord’s return to Jerusalem, “. . . his feet shall rest upon the Mount of Olives, which is opposite Jerusalem to the east. The Mount of Olives shall be cleft in two from east to west by a very deep valley, and half the mountain shall move to the north and half to the south.”

In the New Testament. The Mount of Olives is mentioned frequently in the Gospels, either as τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν (the mountain of the olive trees) or τὸ ὄρος τὸ καλούμενον Ἐλαιῶν (the hill called “The Olive Grove”). The vicinity of the hill was frequented by Jesus whenever He visited Jerusalem. The road from Jericho to Jerusalem passed over this ridge. It was along this road that His triumphal entry into Jerusalem took place (Lk 19.37). When He came over the brow of the hill and saw the city, He wept because of the suffering in store for it (Lk 19.41–44). Jesus delivered his eschatological discourse while sitting on the Mount of Olives (Mt 24.3; Mk 13.3). He spent the last nights before His death on the Mount (Lk 21.37), at Bethany, or Bethphage, or in the Garden of Gethsemani just across the Kidron (Jn 18.1) at the foot of the Mount. The Ascension of Jesus into heaven took place from the Mount of Olives, according to Acts 1.12.

Shrines and Archeology. The Mount of Olives is dotted with Christian shrines commemorating these events in Our Lord’s life. Evidence of shrines and literary witnesses go back to very early times. The pilgrim Etheria, shortly before 400, mentioned that she took part in the liturgical services at Eleona, a church erected by the Empress Helena, to commemorate the spot where Our Lord taught; she mentions the place whence Our Lord ascended to heaven; she also mentions Gethsemani and Bethany. Today a modern basilica at Gethsemani is built upon the foundations of earlier churches. Halfway up the hill is a small chapel commemorating Our Lord’s weeping over Jerusalem. In his excavations there B. Bagatti has found numerous OSSUARIES dating from early Christianity. Farther up the hill is the church and convent of Carmelite nuns, called the Pater Noster Monastery in memory of Luke's account of the Lord's Prayer (Lk 11.1–4). On top of the hill are the restored remains of an octagonal church, now in the possession of Muslims, and believed to occupy the spot from which Jesus ascended into heaven.

MOUNT ST. MARY'S COLLEGE AND SEMINARY

lege and the second-oldest Catholic seminary in the United States [preceded, respectively, by Georgetown University (1789) and St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore (1791)]. It is located near Emmitsburg, Maryland, about 70 miles north of Washington, D.C. Dubois, a refugee from revolutionary France, bought a tract of land on the side of a mountain already known as Saint Mary's Mountain. He built a church there in 1806, and in 1808 established a college as a preparatory seminary for Saint Mary's in Baltimore. Later in 1808, he became associated with the Society of St. Sulpice, who operated St. Mary's, and in 1811 control of the Mount was formally transferred to the Sulpicians. In 1812 Dubois was joined by Father Simon Gabriel Bruté de Remur, who came to be known as the Mount's "second founding father." Except for 1815–18, Bruté remained at the Mount, teaching theology and philosophy and exercising a strong hand in institutional governance, until 1834, when he was made bishop of Vincennes, Indiana.

In 1809, St. Elizabeth Anne Seton came to Mount St. Mary's. Dubois lent her his cabin while she awaited the completion of her own settlement in St. Joseph Valley, two miles away. He served as her religious superior and was instrumental in her community's adoption of a modified version of the rule of the Daughters of Charity, with whom he had been familiar in France. Bruté later served as her spiritual director. One of Mother Seton's sons, William, is buried in the cemetery on the Mount campus.

Though founded as a preparatory seminary, the college needed the income provided by young men who did not intend to study for priesthood, and was a "mixed" institution at least from 1811. Also for reasons of economy, Dubois initiated a system in which older students taught younger ones (a system which persisted into the twentieth century). This required some students to remain at the Mount beyond the point at which they could have entered Saint Mary's. Eventually, in 1820, Dubois obtained permission to introduce a full program in theology for study toward priesthood. Thus, by 1820 the institution included something like the college and seminary as they now exist, though what was then the college later divided into a high school or "preparatory school," which closed in 1936, and a college in the modern sense.

By 1826, financial difficulties and competition between St. Mary's and the Mount as major seminaries had led to a formal separation of the Mount—and of Dubois and Bruté personally—from the Sulpicians, who ceded control of the Mount back to Dubois. Upon his appointment that year as bishop of New York, Dubois sought unsuccessfully to give Mount Saint Mary's to the Jesuits at Georgetown but eventually deeded it to two diocesan priests. Together with Bruté, they formed the nucleus of the College Council, which became the institution's official owner and governing body when it was chartered in 1830 by the state of Maryland. With this charter, the institution's official name became Mount Saint Mary's College, whereas previously it had been called Mount Saint Mary's Seminary.

The College Council, composed of diocesan priests, was self-perpetuating and elected from its own members the president and other officers of the college. In 1930, a separate administration, headed by a rector, was established for the seminary, under the president and the council. Previously, the president of the college had served as seminary rector. In 1967 the council dissolved itself and the college was re-incorporated under a Board of Trustees. In 1971 Dr. John J. Dillon became the Mount's first lay president. While in 1967 priests comprised nearly half the faculty, by 2001 most remaining priest faculty were in the seminary and only one taught full-time in the college.

The Civil War threatened the college's survival, as enrollment dropped substantially and afterward many southern families were unable to pay their debts to the college. The resulting financial difficulties led to the college's being placed in receivership in 1881, but it was rescued in 1882 after a fund-raising effort led by James Cardinal Gibbons. Over the next several decades, it expanded its enrollment and physical plant. World War II shrank the student population once again, but the college remained open to train naval officers. After the closing of nearby St. Joseph's College, operated by the Daughters of Charity, at the end of the 1971–72 school year, Mount Saint Mary's became co-educational (1972). Today a slight majority of its undergraduate students are women.

The college offers degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science in 24 fields. An integrated and sequenced liberal arts core curriculum, established by the faculty in 1988, is the centerpiece of Mount undergraduate education. The seminary offers the degrees of Master of Divinity and Master of Arts. A graduate program in business, leading to a degree of Master of Business Administration, and a Master of Education program were established in the college in 1975 and 1992 respectively. In 2001, the full-time equivalent enrollment, graduate and undergraduate, in the college was more than 1500, while the seminary enrolled approximately 150. The campus includes the National Shrine Grotto of Our Lady of Lourdes. The mountainside site dates from the time of Dubois and Mother Seton as a place of private meditation. In 1879, a replica of the Lourdes Grotto in France was added. After 1958, the centenary of the Lourdes apparitions, the grotto was expanded and opened to the wider public. As many as 100,000 people visit it each year.

In the nineteenth century Mount Saint Mary's came to be known as the "Cradle of Bishops," having given the church 29 bishops, including John J. Hughes (first archbishop of New York), John McCloskey (first American cardinal), and John B. Purcell (first archbishop of Cincinnati). Twentieth-century alumni have included Bishop James E. Walsh of Maryknoll (imprisoned for 12 years by the Chinese Communists), Archbishop Harry J. Flynn of Minneapolis-St. Paul, Monsignor Geno Baroni (civil rights activist and Undersecretary of Housing and Urban Development under President Carter), and Father Stanley Rother, assassinated in Guatemala in 1984 as a result of his work on behalf of the rural poor. Lay alumni have included the nineteenth-century artist John LaFarge and poet George Henry Miles.

MOURRET, FERNAND

Ecclesiastical historian; b. Eygalières (Bouche-du-Rhône), France, Dec. 3, 1854; d. Paris, May 28, 1938. Fernand Maria Émile Mourret completed his classical education and studied law at Aix-en-Provence. After the obligatory military service, he practiced law for a short time and in 1879 entered the seminary of St. Sulpice at Issy, near Paris. In 1883 he joined the Sulpicians and was sent to study in Rome, where he was ordained on Dec. 22, 1883. Severe illness forced him to interrupt his graduate studies in Rome after one year. Too frail for seminary work, he devoted the next ten years to less arduous tasks. He taught in the major seminary in Avignon (1894–96) and was then appointed to teach philosophy in the seminary of St. Sulpice in Issy. In 1898 he was transferred to the Sulpician theological school on the Rue de Regard, Paris, where he taught apologetics, dogmatic theology, and sacred eloquence. In 1902 he began to teach ecclesiastical history, the subject with which his name remains associated. His principal works, all published in Paris, are La Vénérable Marie Rivier (1898); Leçons sur l'art de prêcher (1909); Le Mouvement catholique en France de 1830 à 1850 (1917); Les Directions politiques, intellectuelles et sociales de Léon XIII (1920); and La papauté (1929). Le Concile du Vatican, d'après des documents inédits (1919) made use of the papers of M. Icard, former superior of St. Sulpice. In conjunction with J. Carreyre, Mourret published Précis d'histoire de l'Église (3 v. 1924). Mourret's best-known work is Histoire générale de l'Église (9 v. 1914–27), written to provide his students with an up-to-date textbook. Essentially it represents the history courses conducted by Mourret, but for the contemporary period it constitutes an original work that remains authoritative, especially for French history. The first eight volumes (to 1878) have been translated into English by Newton Thompson as A History of the Catholic Church (1931–57). Mourret was an eminent professor, noted for his extensive knowledge, vivacity, and clarity, and he won renown, too, as a professor of homiletics and a spiritual director. He was extraordinarily kind and accessible.

MOVEMENT FOR A BETTER WORLD

An international movement to infuse in individuals and groups the spirit of mutual charity and unity that provides the basis for the social presence of Jesus: “For where two or three are gathered together for my sake, there am I in the midst of them” (Mt 18.20). The movement was inaugurated by Pius XII. In a radio message Feb. 10, 1952, Pope Pius called himself the “herald of a better world willed by God” and asked for a renewal of the structures of society [Dal Nostro cuore Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 158–162]. The founder and first international director, Riccardo Lombardi, SJ, of Rocca di Papa, Italy, answered the plea. Since 1952, through Father Lombardi's initiative, promoting groups of the movement have been established on every continent. The promoting group consists of specially trained clergy, religious and laity who strive to promote international collaboration and the quest for the common good and peace in the strife-torn world. To this end, the movement works closely with other international organizations at all levels, including the United Nations. Within parishes, the movement seeks to promote renewal of parish life, and a deeper awareness of and consequence sense of responsibility and commitment for reaching out to others.

MOWINCKEL, SIGMUND

Old Testament scholar; b. Lutheran manse of Kjer-ringöy, Norway, Aug. 4, 1884; d. Oslo, June 4, 1965. In 1917 he began his academic career at the University of Oslo, where he had matriculated the previous year. He was ordained in 1940. His most important works are Psalmstudien 1–6 (1921–24) and The Psalms in Israel's Worship 1–2 (1951, tr. 1962). While following in the footsteps of his former teacher at Giessen, H. Gunkel, he went beyond him and established the cultic character of nearly all Psalms. He associated many Psalms with the autumn harvest festival of the New Year, in which Yahweh was ritually enthroned. Other insights of his are the role of the king (the communal “I” in the Psalms), and the eventual democratization of the Psalms, whereby they became a vehicle of prayer for the average worshiper. Also important is He That Cometh (1951, tr. 1956), a basic study of Old Testament messianism and eschatology (the latter would have risen out of the disappointment of the exile).

His expertise ranged throughout the Old Testament: Tetrateuch-Pentateuch-Hexateuch (1964), La religion et la culte (1957), Prophecy and Tradition (1946), and Le décalogue (1927). He combined intellectual brilliance with a warm faith in The Old Testament as the Word of God (1938, tr. 1959).

MOYË, JOHN MARTIN, BL.

Founder of religious congregations of women and missionary to China; b. Cutting, Lorraine, France, January 27, 1730; d. Trier, Germany, May 4, 1793. John, the sixth of 13 children born to John Moyë and Catherine Demange, was educated at the Collège of Pont-à-Mousson, the Jesuit College of Strasbourg, and the Seminary of Saint-Simon in Metz. After his ordination in 1754, Father Moyë devoted himself as vicar to pastoral work in the Diocese of Metz for 17 years. To secure free education for village children, he founded the Congregation of the Sisters of Divine Providence in 1762. He was appointed superior of the Seminary of Saint-Dié in 1767, but two years later he asked to join the PARIS FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. On March 28, 1773, he arrived in Chengdu, the capital of Sichuan in southwestern China, to work under Bp. François Pottier, the vicar apostolic. His missionary field covered half of Sichuan and the province of Guizhou. He worked there for ten years with tireless and inventive zeal, baptizing native children in danger of death, writing books of devotion, and organizing exercises of piety. In 1782 he established an Institute of Christian Virgins to care for the sick and to give Christian instruction to Chinese women and children in their homes.

Physical exhaustion and the opposition to his apostolic methods manifested by his five co-workers caused him to ask to return to France in 1784. Lorraine again became the field of his apostolate and the Sisters of Divine Providence his special care. Within the decade, the French Revolution created grave religious problems. Father Moyë gave counsel and generous help to the persecuted nonjuring priests and the religious forced from their cloisters. To save the congregation he had founded, he moved the Sisters of Divine Providence to Trier in 1791. The advance of the French army, however, caused its suppression the next year. Restored in 1816, the congregation numbered 116 convents by the end of the century, and in 1866 the Sisters made a foundation in San Antonio, Texas. Father Moyë died in the typhus epidemic that spread to Trier. LEO XIII approved the introduction of his cause, January 14, 1891. The heroicity of his virtue was proclaimed May 21, 1945, and he was beatified Dec. 27, 1954, by PIUS XII.

MOYENMOUTIER, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery located in the Vosges Mountains on the upper Meurthe River in eastern France. It was founded toward the end of the 7th century by St. HIDULF, a monk at Saint-Miximin and auxiliary bishop of Trier, who, having left Trier, settled as a hermit on the site that was to become Moyennmoutier. Others joined him and formed a small monastery situated midway between five others, consequently known as medianum monasterium or Moyennmoutier. In its long history (11 centuries) Moyennmoutier was influenced by reform movements emanating from the Abbey of GORZE, and later, from CLUNY. One of its outstanding sons was HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA. To counteract the evils brought by the system of commendatory abbots, it joined (1601) with the Abbey of Saint-Vanne at Verdun in forming the great Congregation of Saint-Vanne et Saint-Hydulphe, which was suppressed by the French Revolution in 1790.

MOZAMBIQUE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Mozambique is located in south-eastern AFRICA and is bordered by the Indian Ocean on the east, the Republic of South Africa and Swaziland on the south and southeast, Zimbabwe and Zambia on the west, Malawi on the northwest and Tanzania on the north. The region, with its tropical climate, contains a low coastal region that rises to central uplands, with high plateaus in the northwest and mountains at its western border. Natural resources include coal, titanium, natural gas and hydropower, while agricultural products consist of cotton, cashew nuts, sugar cane, tea, copra, coconuts and citrus.

After its discovery by Vasco da Gama in 1498, Mozambique served as a way station for the Portuguese en route to India around the Cape of Good Hope. Later it was a source of slaves for Brazil. Its boundaries were definitely established only in 1891. In 1951 it became an overseas province of Portugal and in 1975 gained full independence. The massive emigration of the Portuguese elite, a drought and civil war resulted in the region being considered one of the poorest nations in Africa by the early 1990s. However, the fall of Mozambique's Marxist government, Great Britain's decision to cancel some of the Mozambique's debt and the privatization of industry bolstered the sagging economy, attracting foreign investments. Despite increasing economic stability, the high illiteracy rate and the human toll from AIDS caused the standard of living to suffer; by 2000 the average life expectancy of a Mozambican was 37 years of age.

Early History. Portuguese Jesuits initiated mission activity in the 16th century, and Gonçalo da SILVEIRA, SJ, was martyred in 1561 after baptizing the rulers of Monomotapa and 300 persons in the court. Portuguese territories in the region were attached to the See of GOA in India, until 1612 when they formed a separate prelature nullius. The Dominicans, who had entered the area in 1577, evangelized the Monomotapa region, whose king was baptized in 1652. After many isolated efforts, a sustained missionary presence was established in the 17th century when the Dominicans, the Jesuits and the Augustinians worked on the southern coast and up the Zambezi. Quelimane, Sena and Tete developed into important centers; even Zumbo, near the Zambian border, was reached and maintained well into the 19th century. A decline of the Capital: Maputo (formerly Lourenço Marques).

Size: 297,730 sq. miles.

Population: 19,104,700 in 2000.

Languages: Portuguese; indigenous dialects are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 4,585,130 Catholics (24%), 3,855,000 Muslims (20%), 4,250,300 Protestants (22%), 6,414,270 adhere to indigenous beliefs or do not practice a religion.

mission during the 18th century was accelerated by the anti-Jesuit policies of the Marquis de POMBAL. Portugal's suppression of religious orders in 1834 made the situation worse and by 1855 no missionaries remained.

A change for the better occurred in 1881 when the Jesuits resumed their work. They were joined by the Franciscans in 1898, and by 1910 there were 71 missionaries, mostly Portuguese. The mission again suffered from the extreme anticlericalism of Portuguese regimes between 1910 and 1925, but the Concordat and the Missionary Statute with the Holy See in 1940 resulted in progress and the creation of the hierarchy. The number of Catholics rose from 4,000 in 1900 to 60,000 in 1936, and to 850,000 in 1960. Archbishop Teódosio de Gouveia of Lourenço Marques received the red hat in 1940, the first prelate south of the Sahara ever to be named cardinal.

The 1940 concordat, while strengthening the Church, did little to extricate the Church from the repressions of colonialism. Missions were funded by the state to the degree to which they served colonial interests. Generous financial help for religious orders, including the payment of salaries, free overseas passages, special status for bishops who enjoyed privileges similar to state governors and authority for all primary education were some of the rewards for the Church's subservience to Portugal's "civilizing mission." Internally, the Mozambican Church appeared very much as a faithful copy of religion as practiced and organized in Portugal. Many a missionary never bothered to learn a local African language. Small efforts were made to inculturate the liturgy, catechetics and pastoral methods (see INCULTURATION, THEOLOGY OF). The Church's leadership remained decidedly Portuguese. The first Mozambican Catholic priest of the modern period was not ordained until 1953, and native clergy in the year of independence numbered only 38 against 478 foreign priests.

The period 1940 to 1970 was one of great expansion as churches, missions, schools and clinics were constructed, among them the catechetical center Nazaré, founded in 1968 near Beira and run by the White Fathers. However, the Church remained unaware of the growing unrest among the native population. As late as 1970, in the pastoral letter “A Christian Message for the Ordering of Right Relations in Mozambique,” the bishops, all Portuguese, noted “the total absence of racial discrimination in Portuguese laws,” condemned “every kind of guerrilla action (terrorismo)” and expressed the wish that social inequalities be resolved gradually. With the notable exception of Bishop Sebastião Soares Resende of Beira (d. 1967) and later of Bishop Vieira Pinto of Nampula, the hierarchy supported the colonial status quo, remained silent in the face of repression and injustices, and even defended the colonial war waged in the name of Christian civilization.

The conformist attitude of the hierarchy was increasingly rejected by many missionaries. In May of 1971, 48 White Fathers from Beira and Tete left Mozambique in order not to be “accomplices of an official support which even the bishops . . . seem to give to a regime that shrewdly uses the Church to consolidate and perpetuate in Africa an anachronistic situation.” This missionary exodus had repercussions on other congregations, especially those of the Burgos, Consolata and Comboni Fathers. In the meantime, local violence escalated and local priests began to confront bishops with reports of civilian massacres. While the hierarchy protested to the governor general, its protest was ineffective. In July of 1973 a report on the violence by the Burgos Fathers found its way to the international press via the London Times (July 10, 1973). As protests multiplied, so did deportations; nearly 100 missionaries, including Bishop Pinto of Nampula, were expelled prior to the coup that overthrew the Portuguese government on April 25, 1974.

The Church after Independence. On June 25, 1975 Mozambique gained political independence as the People’s Republic of Mozambique, resulting in a radical change in Church-State relations. While the liberation government, FRELIMO, appreciated the efforts of some priests to promote the struggle for independence, it remained critical of the Church as a whole. The government of President Samora Machel nationalized church assets and stopped all subsidies. Clergy were turned out of their residences, seminaries shut and schools and hospitals taken over by the state. Radio Pax, founded in 1953 in Beira, was shut down. Four bishops resigned and hundreds of church personnel left the country by the end of 1976 as a result of the radical disestablishment of the Church. Under the new constitution, Mozambique became a secular state, although the freedom to practice one’s faith was guaranteed. The socialist government’s attitude toward the Church eventually softened into a growing appreciation of the Church’s role in charity, particularly in the face of the civil war that would follow. A perceptible thaw in Church-state relations occurred in 1982 when some buildings were returned for Church use, and seminaries were allowed to reopen. Prior to his death in a plane crash in 1986, President Machel told Church leaders: “Let us cooperate in dialogue without prejudice on either side. Let us argue, if necessary, but not about subjects of secondary importance.” The state eventually decreed that all nationalized church institutions be returned.

A New Pastoral Vision. Church leaders created a new vision of missionary and pastoral work. A document by Nampula’s bishop published in July of 1975 reflected this vision by stating that the colonial and bourgeois mentality should shift to an awareness and solidarity with native people, and that the Church should not defend its material interests over its main interest, the salvation of the people. In March of 1975 the country’s first two native bishops were ordained. Two years later the first National Pastoral Assembly developed practical programs for change that stressed lay ministries; the second Assembly, held in 1991, would review these programs in the light of the traumatic civil war and add recognition of the dignity of the human being and social justice by means of reconciliation and re-evangelization.

After the government released to the Church those buildings confiscated immediately after independence, it raised a new issue. While some Catholics advocated a return to the highly institutionalized infrastructure of the pre-civil war era, others called for an approach rooted in small, local Christian communities, with a respect for native languages and cultures and meaningful enculturation of the faith.

When Pope John Paul II visited the region in September of 1988, the civil war had created over two million refugees while tens of thousands had been killed. The pope appealed for a national dialogue asserting that the Church would help by every possible means, and denounced all terror in the strongest terms, confirming the local bishops in their indefatigable appeals for peace and reconciliation. Alexandre Cardinal dos Santos of Maputo and Archbishop Jaime Gonçalves of Beira played an im-tions. Diplomatic relations with the Holy See were established in 1995.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 the Church in Mozambique had 277 active parishes tended by 88 diocesan and 328 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 90 brothers and 890 sisters, many of whom worked in the country's 217 primary and 32 secondary Catholic schools. Responding to an increasing need for Church personnel to support a growing Catholic community, churches in Brazil, Nigeria and Zimbabwe sent priests and others, while a renewed commitment was made by orders and congregations formerly active in the country. The Comboni Missionaries reopened their famous Technical Training School in Nampula and a Catholic University was planned for Beira. Most Catholics resided in the central provinces, while a growing Muslim population could be found in the north and along the coast. In response to the severe flooding experienced in the region by cyclone Eline in March of 2000, the pope donated $150,000 from his private charity, Cor Unum, to aid in the relieve efforts led by Caritas Mozambique.

MOZARABIC CHANT

The repertory of chant used in the Mozarabic (Visigothic) liturgy of the medieval Church in Spain. This chant style burgeoned and came to full bloom between 550 and 650 and was firmly fixed at the time of the Arab invasion (771). It is called Mozarabic because the term describes a Christian living under Arab or Islamic domination (711–1085), and because its principal MSS date from this period. The principal surviving musical codices of the Visigothic-Mozarabic liturgy are preserved in the cathedral of Toledo; in San Domingo Abbey, Silos; in San Millán Abbey, Cogolla; in the cathedral of León; and in the University of Santiago de Compostela. These codices, copied in the 10th and 11th centuries, contain an almost complete musical repertory of the Visigothic Church of Toledo that dates back to the 6th, 7th, and early 8th centuries. The most precious of them is the Antiphony of León. According to some scholars, this is an early 10th-century copy of an original MS of King Wamba written for the Toledo parish of St. Leocadia in 672. It begins with the feast of St. Asciscus (November 17) and contains the Office and the Mass for the entire ecclesiastical year.

Notation. Mozarabic chant had its own musical notation, but the notation of these codices is illegible for the reason that there is not a single musical codex of the Mozarabic period that is copied upon lines of the musical staff. When in the 11th century the Gregorian codices without lines were transcribed into codices with lines, Spanish musicians did not do the same for their own melodies. As a consequence, the Visigothic-Mozarabic neumes are legible only to the extent of the number of their notes. There is no means of determining the relations of tonal height within the notes of a neume, nor its melodic connection with the preceding and following neumes. The melodic treasury incased within the neumes is undecipherable without the help of a later diastematic notation. Such notation was found for 20 or so of the actual melodies preserved. In 12 folios of the MS of the Liber Ordinum of the Monastery of San Millan an Aquitanian superimposed system was substituted for erased Mozarabic neumes. The comparison of these folios with the Mozarabic neumatic notation of the same pieces in the MS of the Liber Ordinum of the San Domingo monastery of Silos served as a key to decipher the existing melodies. These melodies show that Mozarabic chant was monodic and of a free rhythm and modality equal to that of Gregorian chant. They exemplify syllabic, neumatic, and melismatic styles.

There are two classes of script in Mozarabic notation: the horizontal and the vertical. The horizontal script pertains exclusively to the codices of Toledo and to a very fragmentary Portuguese codex of Coimbra. In these codices the neumes incline to the right. The codex of Silos and the Antiphonary of León are in vertical scripts. Both the horizontal and vertical scripts originated, however, in the scriptoria of Toledo.

Diffusion. Through the efforts of CHARLEMAGNE and the promulgation of the Lex Romana, France sacrificed her own liturgy and chant for the liturgy and chant of Rome. The effect of this edict in Spain paralleled the success of the reconquest. The Lex Romana did not triumph in Aragon until 1071 and became successful in Navarre, Castille, and Leon only in 1076. The Spanish Mozarabic rite was finally suppressed by Pope GREGORY VII in 1089, except for six parishes in Toledo where it was allowed to continue. Here it struggled along with much difficulty and became almost extinct until Cardinal XIMÉNES DE CISNEROS became archbishop of Toledo. He received a concession from Pope Julius II in 1508 to found the Mozarabic chapel of Corpus Christi in the cathedral church of Toledo. The service books edited by him include a missal in 1500 and a breviary in 1502. They preserve some Mozarabic melodies in an altered form of the older, non-diastematic sources.

MOZARABIC RITE

The name that designates the autochthonous liturgical system celebrated by Christians in Spain. The rite has been variously called the Visigothic or Gothic rite because of its greatest development under Visigothic rule beginning in the 5th century, and the Mozarabic rite because of its celebration by Christians in areas under Islamic control from 711 to 1492. These Christians were called mozárabes ("like Arabs" or "Arabicized"). The rite is also referred to as the Old Spanish rite or the Hispanic rite. With its official reestablishment in 1988, the rite was renamed the Hispano-Mozarabic rite in order to designate its origin, Hispania, and to honor the ethnic Mozarabs who have continued to celebrate it over the centuries.

History. The Hispano-Mozarabic rite is one of several Latin language liturgical systems developed in the West after Christianity had been implanted and began to spread throughout the Roman empire in the first centuries of the Church. Only three Western rites have survived to this day, namely the Roman, the Milanese (Ambrosian), and the Spanish.

The rite has experienced various vicissitudes as well as periodic renewals throughout the course of its history. A charge of Adoptionism stemming from the Council of Frankfurt (794), the Europeanizing efforts of Alfonso VI (1065–1109), and the program of liturgical unification of Gregory VII (1073–1085) contributed to the rite's suppression in 1080 by the Council of Burgos. However, when Toledo was retaken from Islamic control in 1085, Christians there were permitted to retain their rite solely in the then-existing six parishes. Only two of these parishes survive today, namely Santa Eulalia y San Marcos and Santas Justa y Rufina. The ancient liturgy of Spain has been celebrated in these two parishes on a continuous though limited basis. After the Roman rite was decreed for Spain, the Hispano-Mozarabic rite began a long period of decline. This decline was partially stemmed by the humanist Cardinal Francisco XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS (1436–1517) after he became Archbishop of Toledo (1495). He saw the rite as part of the ancient Spanish heritage stemming from the classical Roman era. In order to save this heritage he had editions of the Missal and Breviary prepared. Furthermore, he founded a cadre of Mozarabic chaplains and installed them in the Corpus Christi chapel of Toledo’s Cathedral, where the rite is celebrated on a daily basis. The publication of liturgical books and the establishment of a chaplaincy helped to conserve and perpetuate the rite. The rite is also celebrated once or twice a year at the Talavera chapel in Salamanca and on special occasions at other sites throughout Spain. Even so, only the Eucharist and the Divine Office in the Hispano-Mozarabic rite tend to be celebrated outside of Toledo. Baptism, Confirmation, and Marriage are celebrated on a periodic basis in the Mozarabic parishes of Toledo. The other sacraments are yet to be revived. At an unofficial level, elements of the Hispano-Mozarabic rite survived in popular devotions.

Renewal. Vatican Council II, in its call for the reform of the liturgy in the Constitution Sacrosanctum Concilium, paid particular attention to liturgy’s pastoral aspect. The need for adaptation of the liturgy was especially accentuated. Instead of rigid uniformity in the celebration of liturgy throughout the Catholic world, room was made for legitimate differences. As a facet of this, the Council explicitly fostered diversity in the celebration of the liturgy by calling for the incorporation of the genius and talent of the various peoples who comprise the Catholic Church. Behind this principle is the perception that diversity in the celebration of the liturgy in no way harms unity but instead displays the universality of the Church. As a consequence, all the rites celebrated by Catholics in East or West are recognized as enjoying the same dignity and privileges as the Roman rite. Therefore, the ancient Spanish rite enjoys renewed status and life.

Prior to its renewal, the rite was subjected to the same principles and norms of reform as the Roman rite. Thus, the Spanish church undertook efforts to revitalize its ancient rite by studying the available liturgical sources. In this way the church preserved the rite’s authentic structure and content to the extent possible. The “masses” or sets of eleven variable prayers used in the celebration of the Eucharist underwent a careful theological review and were revised as needed according to the Church’s doctrine. The prayers are the Oratio Post Manuscript folio from “Orationale Gothicum,” prayers for non-Eucharistic Mozarabic services, 9th century, found in monastery of San Domingo de Silos, Burgos, Spain (Add. MS 30.852, fol. 16v).

Gloriam, Oratio Admonitionis, Alia, Oratio Post Nomina, Oratio Ad Pacem, Illatio, Oratio Post Sanctus, Oratio Post Pridie, Ad Orationem Dominicam, Benedictio, and Completuria. Cardinal Marcelo González Martín established a commission of fourteen members in 1982 for the purpose of reforming the rite’s liturgical celebrations. The Commission prepared the new Ordo Missae for the Eucharist and published it in 1985. The Ordo was approved by the Spanish Episcopal Conference in 1986 and received confirmation ad interim from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments in 1988. That same year the restored rite became an optional liturgy for Spain under certain stipulations. The official Latin text of the Ordo Missae iuxta ritum Hispano-Mozarabicum appears in the new Missale Hispano-Mozarabicum of 1991. In January 1992 Cardinal González Martín decreed the obligatory use of the Missale for use at Eucharist in the Hispano-Mozarabic rite. In addition, an ad experimentum Spanish translation of the texts has been made for use in Toledo.

Sources. The extant manuscripts date from the 8th to the 14th centuries. Dom Jordi Pinell, OSB (1921–1997), considered the premier expert on the rite during its restoration, catalogued 250 liturgical texts emanating from this era. The recovery and study of the ancient manuscripts have led scholars to identify two distinct traditions, simply named A and B. Tradition A comprises the majority of the recovered texts, dated to the 8th through 12th centuries; these have been linked to the ancient Roman provinces of Tarraconensis and Carthaginensis and include the cities of Narbonne and Toledo. This group of manuscripts were conserved primarily by the parish of Santa Eulalia. Tradition B texts are later and are as late as the 14th century; they are associated with the Roman province of Betica and its capital Seville. These manuscripts were conserved by the parish of Santas Justa y Rufina. Nonetheless, in Pinell's assessment the Tradition B texts contain the more ancient elements. The frequent indications of the authors of hymns and liturgical texts are an interesting feature of the Hispano-Mozarabic manuscripts. These include the brothers Leander (d. 600) and Isidore of Seville (d. 636) as well as Ildephonse (d. 667) and Julian of Toledo (d. 690).

Pinell and other members of the Commission relied heavily on the previous work of Marius FÉROTIN. Interest in the Mozarabic codices in the contemporary era was initiated at the end of the 19th century. Through his work on ancient Spanish sources discovered at Silos and San Millán de la Cogolla (near Burgos), Férotin was able to identify two codices of a ritual entitled the Liber Ordinum. He produced the first critical edition in 1904. Férotin produced in 1912 a critical edition of ancient manuscripts found in various places in Toledo that he compiled and identified as the Liber Mozarabicus Sacramentorum. His ground-breaking work aided further analysis of the textual sources, which resulted in clarifications as to their origin, purpose and transmission. José Janini, in his analysis of the texts of the Liber Ordinum, for example, was able to make distinctions between them that Férotin did not make and thus identified Codex A as destined for episcopal use and Codex B for presbyteral use. Janini updated the critical edition of Codex A and called it the Liber Ordinum Episcopale. Other critical editions have been published as well. These include the Sacramentary of Vich, the Office, which represents the oldest extant text of the office of the Hispano-Mozarabic liturgy, and, an updated critical edition of the Liber Missarum. In addition, Janini published a critical edition of the Liber Misticus for Lent and Easter in 1980.

The texts used by the parishes of Santas Justa y Rufina and of Santa Eulalia were continuously copied until the beginning of the 14th century. However, due to the movement of peoples as well as the eventual blending of the Mozarabic community with the Castellians and Franks, and the limited number of clergy and parishioners who knew how to celebrate the rite, it was in danger of disappearing by the 15th century. Cardinal Cisneros assigned Alfonso Ortiz, a canon of the cathedral, the task of preparing an edition of the missal and breviary, which appeared in 1500 and 1502 respectively. The missal was reedited in Rome in 1755 along with a commentary by Alexander Lesley. Cardinal Francisco Antonio Lorenzana reedited the breviary in Madrid in 1775 and published a corrected version of the missal in Rome in 1804.

Based on the publication of the extant sources in critical editions and the work of Cisneros and Lorenzana, the new Missale Hispano-Mozarabicum for the Eucharist appeared in 1991. Published to date are the two volume Missale (sacramentary), two volume Liber Commicus (lectionary), the Liber Offerentium (the book of the altar containing the Ordo Missae published in a Latin version and a Spanish translation), the General Calendar, and a bilingual (Spanish-Latin) worship aid for the assembly.

Eucharist. The eucharist reflects a tripartite structure of proclamation of the Word, anaphora, and communion. These are elements common to other Western and Eastern rites. How these are executed, however, distinguishes the rite from others. Two distinctive features of the eucharistic celebration are the initial rites or prayers and actions of the liturgy, and the transition from the proclamation of the Word to the beginning of the anaphora. The two Hispano-Mozarabic traditions, identified by Pinell, reveal an important difference in how the eucharistic celebration commenced. Probably in the second half of the 7th century, an introductory section was added to the structure of the Mass, apparently due to the influence of other rites. Tradition A (Toledo) maintained this addition for Mass throughout the year. Tradition B (Seville), however, omitted this introductory part on ferial days and on the Sundays of Lent. Tradition B provides the core of the restored rite though augmented by Tradition A.

When the Mass begins with the introductory rites they consist of an antiphon called Praelegendum, the hymn Gloria in excelsis, and an Oratio Post Gloriam. In addition, on solemnities the Trisagion is sung between the Gloria and the oration. The last part of the introductory rites is the prayer Oratio Post Gloriam. This prayer roughly corresponds to the Roman collect (opening prayer). A characteristic aspect of Hispano-Mozarabic prayers is that they tend to echo preceding texts. The Oratio Post Gloriam does this by reiterating themes from the Gloria, the Trisagion or from both. Consequently, the Oratio Post Gloriam completes the introductory rites rather than initiates the Liturgy of the Word. The restored rite follows the practice of Tradition B (Seville) during ferial days and the Sundays of Lent. On these occasions the Praelegendum, the Gloria, the Trisagion, and the Oratio Post Gloriam are omitted. When this occurs, the priest enters, kisses the altar, bows to say a private preparatory prayer, goes to the chair, and greets the people. The Liturgy of the Word then commences.

An ancient feature of the Hispano-Mozarabic Liturgy of the Word is the proclamation of three scriptural pericopes during the Ordinary Sundays of the year. There are two distinct distributions of readings and chants for most of the solemnities and some liturgical seasons. Nevertheless, the readings may be chosen from either cycle during certain times of the year. Some of the pericopes for the eucharist are marked by centonization rather than the lectio continua of the Roman rite. Centonization is the practice of putting together a variety of passages drawn from different parts of the Bible and assembled into one reading.

The first reading is titled Prophetia and is taken from the Prophets or the Law. It is replaced by a reading from the Wisdom books and an additional reading from the Historical books during Lent, resulting in four readings during this season. During Eastertide, the Prophetia reading may be substituted by a reading from Revelation. After the first reading, the Psallendum is sung. This is the name given to the repertoire of psalm texts used as a response to the reading. The Threni are chanted in place of the Psallendum on the Wednesdays and Fridays of the first five weeks of Lent in the Hispano-Mozarabic calendar. The Threni texts are penitential in character and dramatically express the Church's repentance as well as recount the suffering of Christ. The texts are based on various passages from Lamentations, Job, and Isaiah.

The second reading is called Apostolus and refers to the readings from the epistles, both Pauline and catholic. The Apostolus may be preceded by a reading from the Acts of the Martyrs on the feast day of a martyr. Therefore, on these days, there are four readings. After the reading from the martyr's life, a portion of the Benedictiones or Canticle of the Three Children from the Book of Daniel (Dn 3:51–90) is sung and leads to the Apostolus.

The Evangelium, a reading from the Gospel, completes the scriptural readings. This is marked off from the others by the greeting Dominus sit semper vobiscum as in the Roman rite. The Liturgy of the Word is concluded by the Laudes, an antiphon of praise which includes singing the Alleluia, except in Lent. This is always chanted after the Gospel, never before. In addition, if there is a homily, Laudes follows it.

The prayers and actions that take place between the Liturgy of the Word and the anaphora are a second distinctive feature of the Hispano-Mozarabic Eucharist.

These consist of the Offering, Diptychs, and Sign of Peace, three elements that are linked together by four variable prayers, namely the Oratio Admonitionis, Alia, Oratio Post Nomina, and Oratio Ad Pacem. Throughout this intermediary ritual, the prayers are divided among the presider, the deacon, and the assembly. The usual interjection of the assembly is Amen but also included are phrases that echo what has been said before. The intermediary ritual begins with the Sacrificium, an antiphon that recalls the sacrifices of Old Testament figures such as Abel, Abraham and Melchizedek. It accompanies the offering, which consists of the preparation of the bread and wine as well as their placement on the altar by the ministers. Sacrificium, with its theme of sacrificial offering, sets the tone for what follows. After the antiphon, the priest prays the Oratio Admonitionis, a unique prayer in that it is addressed to the assembly. It also reflects the motif of the feast or liturgical season being celebrated. This prayer is followed by the admonition Oremus, the first of only two times this appears. The choir or assembly responds by singing or reciting Hagios, Hagios, Hagios, Domine Deus, Rex aeternae, tibi laudes et gratias.

The Diptychs or Solemn Intercessions are the next element in the celebration. The title refers to a litany of intercessions for the needs of the Church and of humanity in the course of which the names of the living and the dead are introduced. They assume the character of a solemn profession of unity in faith and love with the universal Church which encompasses the clergy, the faithful, the saints, and the faithful departed. They also include petitions for temporal needs such as for the ill, prisoners, and travelers. Two of the four variable prayers comprising the intermediary ritual occur in the midst of this formal supplication: the Alia and the Oratio Post Nomina. The Alia echoes the earlier offering by asking God to accept the gifts of the Church, the bread and wine, as well as what they signify, namely the submission of the Christian community to God's saving action. At the same time the intercessions are joined to the bread and wine as part of the offering. The Oratio Post Nomina concludes the Diptychs by reiterating their content. The text of the oration frequently relates the proclamation of the names in ordinary prayer to their inscription in the heavenly Book of Life. The last phase of this intermediary ritual consists in the fourth variable prayer, the Oratio Ad Pacem, as well as a Trinitarian blessing, the Sign of Peace, and the antiphon Pacem meam do vobis.

Upon completion of the intermediary ritual, the Liturgy of the Eucharist commences with the anaphora. The anaphora follows a fixed structure consisting of Dialogue, Illatio, Sanctus, Oratio Post Sanctus, Institution Narrative, Oratio Post Pridie, Doxology, and Amen. It should be noted that there is no set content to the prayers of the anaphora per se in the Hispano-Mozarabic liturgy. That is, they vary in content, length, and subject of address, seemingly according to the specific season or feast being celebrated. The underlying motive for the difference in length and content appears to be the principle of variability. This principle allows for the articulation of different themes by means of Mass-sets, that is, groups of prayer formulas destined for specific celebrations. Only the Dialogue, Sanctus, Institution Narrative, and Amen have invariable content. The anaphora begins with a Dialogue between presider and assembly which is very similar to the Roman Preface Dialogue. The Hispano-Mozarabic Dialogue begins with Introibo ad altare Dei. The incipit is identical to the antiphon from Psalm 43:4 used in the entrance rites of the Roman rite. The next element in the eucharistic prayer, the Illatio, is equivalent to the Preface of the Roman rite and like it, is variable in content. Even so, its focus tends to be thanksgiving for salvation. The Illatio is directed to both the Father and Son though this can vary according to the main idea expressed in the body of the prayer.

The heavenly hymn as found in Isaiah 6:3 with its Christian modification now follows. This element is invariable, but unlike the Roman Sanctus, the Spanish version adapts the conclusion of the second phrase from “full of your glory” to “full of your glorious majesty.” As for the third, fourth, and fifth phrases, a unique feature of the Hispano-Mozarabic version is its dependence on the Vulgate Matthew 21:9 which says: Hosanna filio David. Benedictus, qui venit in nomine Domini. Hosanna in altissimis. In the Hispano-Mozarabic version, in excelsis replaces in altissimis in the last acclamation. Finally, the Sanctus concludes with the Greek version of the opening acclamation: Hagios, Hagios, Hagios, Kyrie O Theos. This is the second time Hagios is used in the Spanish liturgy as a regular congregational response in the revised celebration; it also occurs in the midst of the Diptychs. The Trisagion also incorporates Hagios during the opening rituals when it is chanted by the choir.

The Oratio Post Sanctus is the next element in the Spanish liturgy. It is a prayer that varies in length and content according to the liturgical season or particular feast being celebrated. The prayer’s main function is to transition from the Sanctus to the Institution Narrative. The Institution Narrative of the Hispano-Mozarabic liturgy is taken almost literally from 1 Cor 11:23–26 with minor adaptations to the incipit and the Pauline gloss at the conclusion. The use of the Pauline version distinguishes the Institution Narrative from other Catholic rites both in East and West. Also, distinctive is the use of Amen as the congregational response to two of the three sections of the Narrative. The next variable prayer, the Oratio Post Pridie, corresponds to the anamnesis and epi-chlesis of the Roman rite though its content rarely elaborates remembrance or the invocation of the Spirit. Instead the prayer tends to be addressed directly to Christ and makes explicit the object of memory: his saving work and life-giving power. The anaphora concludes with a doxology. As can be expected, the text is variable with only the first few words and the saecula saeculorum leading to the Amen fixed.

The Hispano-Mozarabic liturgy commences communion with four distinct elements of preparation including the Creed, Fraction Rite, Lord’s Prayer, and Blessing. The two Spanish traditions ordered these elements differently. Tradition A began with the Fraction Rite and then followed with the Creed and the Lord’s Prayer, whereas Tradition B began with the Creed followed by the Fraction Rite and then the Lord’s Prayer. The reformed rite of 1988 has opted for the order of Tradition B. A sacerdotal admonition, Fidem, quam corde credimus, ore autem dicamus initiates the communal recitation of the Creed in unison by the community. In this way a link is made between the Sic credimus which follows the Institution Narrative and the reception of communion. The Spanish liturgy was the first in the West to introduce into the eucharist a version of the Creed following the form of Nicaea I (325) as amended by Constantinople I (381). This was done in 589 shortly after the conversion of the VISIGOTHS to Catholicism and was dictated for the churches under their jurisdiction, including those in Gaul. The text used in the liturgy today is the version promulgated by Toledo III (589). The recitation of the Creed is followed by the Fraction Rite during which the host is broken into nine pieces. The fraction is accompanied by a very brief acclamation. Upon being broken, the pieces are arranged on the paten in the form of a cross. As the presider places them on the paten, he names the nine mysteries of Christ celebrated throughout the Hispano-Mozarabic liturgical year: Corporatio, Nativitas, Circumcisio, Apparitio, Passio, Mors, Resurrectio, Gloria, and Regnum. After a variable introduction, the presider begins the prayer with Oremus and then divides the Lord’s Prayer into eight petitions. After each petition, the assembly responds with Amen. This is the second and last time Oremus is used in the Eucharist. The Lord’s Prayer and its responses are usually chanted. An embolism, similar to the current Roman version though lengthier, follows the Lord’s Prayer. An important difference though is that the assembly responds Amen to the embolism instead of a doxology.

The presider then elevates the paten and chalice declaring Sancta sanctis (Holy things for holy people). This is the only elevation in the ritual. Afterwards the presider takes the ninth particle, titled Regnum, and deposits it into the chalice saying a prayer that refers to the reconciliation wrought by the Body and Blood of Christ. Before the presider consumes the various particles, the deacon instructs those present to bow their heads for the blessing. The assembly responds Deo gratias to the instruction. The presider then invokes the blessing. It is a unique prayer, though, in that it consists of three variable verses generally directed to those present; they respond Amen to each verse. A stereotyped formula referring to God in the third person follows. Toledo IV (633) fixed the position of the blessing prior to communion.

Communion takes place under both species and is accompanied by the Cantus Ad Accedentes, an antiphon based on Psalm 33:6. After the distribution, another antiphon is sung expressing thanksgiving. The Post Communionem antiphon is followed by a final oration titled Completuria. The celebration is finalized with a greeting by the presider and dismissal by the deacon.

Church Building. The earliest type of church buildings identified as Mozarabic give evidence of Visigothic influence with their distinctive horseshoe arches, compartmentalized spaces, and columns with carved capitals decorated with animal and plant motifs. The building is usually divided into three naves. The apse at the end of the center nave is often separated from the nave by a low wall forming a type of iconostasis. Illuminations indicate that a curtain was also used to separate the sanctuary-apse from the nave. Some buildings follow a Greek cross floor plan with a rectangular sanctuary while others follow a basilical plan. Later Mozarabic church buildings show evidence of distinctive Arabic influences such as inlaid ceilings and merlons on roof lines. The use of richly ornamented frescoes and plaster decorative elements influenced by Islamic practice are also evident. Mozarabic architecture is associated with this “mixed style” of Visigothic and Islamic elements.

MOZART, WOLFGANG AMADEUS

A principal composer of the classical period and of all time; b. Salzburg, Austria, Jan. 27, 1756 (baptized Johannes Chrysostomus Wolfgang Theophilus); d. Vienna, Dec. 5, 1791. Mozart’s father, Leopold, had been a respected composer and violinist in the employ of the archiepiscopal court of Salzburg. As a small boy, Mozart already displayed amazing talents as violinist and harpsichordist, even as composer. In 1769 he entered Archbishop Colloredo’s service. There, he had frequent opportunities for writing sacred music, yet he resented increasingly the confining environment of a small ecclesiastical state, and this resentment was aggravated by travels to important musical centers throughout Europe. The inevitable break between the archbishop and the young musician occurred in 1781. Mozart then settled in Vienna, always hoping for a desirable court position. As late as 1790 he applied for an appointment to the Austrian court, stating in his application that “from my childhood on I have been familiar with the church style.” The desired appointment did not materialize. That Mozart wrote virtually no sacred music after leaving Salzburg is attributed in part to this failure, but also to the curtailment of church music during the age of JOSEPHINISM.

Mozart was essentially a believing and practicing Catholic, as seems certain from many of his letters (Einstein, Mozart: His Character, His Life, His Work 77–81). He saw no conflict between his religious beliefs and Freemasonry in which he became involved in 1784, taking an active part in its affairs and providing a number of compositions for Masonic occasions—e.g., Cantatas K. 429, 471, 623; Masonic Funeral Music, K. 477. The “Masonic virtues” of tolerance, brotherly love, steadfastness, and silence also figure in the libretto of The Magic Flute, an opera generally interpreted as a Masonic allegory. Objections against liturgical use of Mozart’s sacred compositions have often been voiced, in the 19th century and today, chiefly because of their allegedly “worldly” or “operatic” nature. Such a view can largely be explained by the fact that his operas and his instrumental music have always been more widely known. Many features that simply represent Mozart’s own style, and that of his period, when encountered in his sacred works remind some listeners of his secular music. To this day, however, his church music regularly receives liturgical performances in Austria and Southern Germany.

Sacred Works. Both individual Mass movements and complete Masses from Mozart’s childhood and adolescence have been preserved, e.g., the Kyrie, K. 33 (1766), and the Missa Brevis, K. 49 (1768). Many early works (e.g., the incomplete Missa Brevis, K. 115) indicate that he had studied the sacred music of Eberlin and Michael HAYDN, especially their works in strict (contrapuntal) style; yet few of his own compositions are consistently in this style. Strict contrapuntal writing (the stile antico of which Padre Martini was considered a master) represented a challenge to the young composer but was in Mozart’s idiom united with other elements, especially the prevailing Italian church style—the stile moderno, in which one melodic line was prominent, and often quite florid, with orchestral accompaniment.

Masses. The Missa Solemnis, K. 139, a substantial early work, has a large orchestra with timpani and four trumpets. Other important settings include the Missa in honorem SSmae Trinitatis, K. 167, in which there is no vocal solo writing; the Missa Brevis in C, K. 220, in an essentially homophonic style; K. 257, the “Credo Mass” (so-called because of the recurring exclamation “Credo, credo”); the “Coronation Mass,” K. 317, written for a small pilgrimage church near Salzburg; and the great but incomplete Mass in C-minor, K. 427 (1783). Some portions of this last, especially the Laudamus te with its florid solo passages in Neapolitan style, have been cited as evidence of the “operatic” quality of his sacred music. Other sections, however, are severely contrapuntal, some in five- or eight-part choral writing. Much of the music is serious, full of dramatic tension, expressing the sacred text with eloquence and sincerity. The unfinished Requiem, K. 626, completed by his pupil Franz Süssmayer, has become his best-known sacred work. During his last years Mozart thought often of death; he seems to have felt that the Requiem, commissioned under rather mysterious circumstances, was to be his own funeral Mass, and the setting is consistently in keeping with the text.

Other Liturgical Music. Among other extended sacred works are two settings of Vesper Psalms and Magnificat, K. 321 and 339, and several litanies, K. 109, 125, 195, 243. His smaller sacred works, especially the motets, show great variety. The Introit Cibavit eos, K. 44 (Bologna 1770), is a study in the stile antico, based on a Gregorian CANTUS FIRMUS. Other motets, e.g., the Offertory Inter natos mulierum, K. 72, reflect the musical idiom of the young composer’s home environment. Motets in the purely soloistic Italian style were written when an occasion called for them. One such, Exsultate, jubilate, K. 165, composed for the castrato Rauzzini, consists of three arias, ending with the well-known Alleluia. His last motet, Ave verum corpus, K. 618 (1791), scored for four voices, strings, and organ, still appeals widely because of its simplicity and sincerity. There are also 17 church or “Epistle” sonatas, short compositions for strings and organ, with wind and timpani parts added in some instances. In the Salzburg cathedral these compositions were traditionally performed between the Epistle and the Gospel (see ORGAN MUSIC).

Style. Many stylistic characteristics of Mozart’s sacred works are found also in his secular music. Some Mass movements are in sonata form (suggested especially by the Kyrie-Christe-Kyrie text). Characteristic themes may recur throughout a movement. Melodic structure, the harmonies, and instrumentation found in Mass and Offertory frequently resemble those of symphony and opera. No more than in J. S. BACH’s age did composers of Mozart’s draw rigid distinctions between sacred and secular style, though counterpoint (the “Palestrina style”) was considered especially suitable for the church, particularly during Advent and Lent. Mozart’s style developed and matured along similar lines in sacred and secular works. Thus, parallel prominence is given to wind instruments and use of chromaticism in Mozart’s later sacred works (C-minor Mass, Requiem) and in symphonies and concertos from the same period. Skillful counterpoint distinguishes many of his later works, especially after 1782, when his acquaintance with Baron Swieten led to renewed interest in the music of Bach and HANDEL. While he impressed his own style characteristics on his sacred music, Mozart did observe many conventions found in liturgical music of his age, among them the use of a figured bass (by then largely obsolete in secular music), and the traditional fugal endings of Gloria (Cum Sancto Spiritu) and Credo (Et vitam venturi saeculi).

MOZI

Chinese philosopher also transliterated as Mo Tzu, Mo Ti; and political theorist. He holds a unique place in the history of Chinese thought for his logical method, deep religious faith, and his doctrine and practice of universal love (chien ai). He disagreed with the Confucians of his time on certain fundamental points, and singly condemned their skepticism about Heaven and ghosts, fatalism, and preoccupation with ritual and music.

In Moist philosophy, as seen in the Mozi ("Master Mo"), the concepts of achievement and benefit are the standards for judging whether a theory is right or wrong, beneficial or harmful. A theory is right and beneficial if it is patterned on the deeds of the sage kings of old, if it is borne out by the experience of the common people, and if it is applied to government with proven benefits to the country and the people. The wealth and populousness of a country are its greatest benefits. Whatever does not further these two ends or tends to injure them must be discarded. Thus, lavish funerals, prolonged mourning, extravagant entertainment, elaborate ritual and music, and costly government should be abandoned. But the greatest harm is done by the incessant struggle of man against man, state against state. Its cause lies in the failure of men to love one another. Men, being partial in their love, hate and injure others. Their partiality must be replaced by universality, which is obtained when everyone loves others as he loves himself and regards the state, city, family, and possessions of others as he regards his own; when he feeds the hungry, clothes the cold, serves the sick, and buries the dead. The calamities of the world all come from men's failure to love one another, and may be prevented or remedied only by the practice of universal love.

The motive for universal love is the Lord on High, or Heaven (Shangdi, Tian). Heaven wills righteousness and imparts the standard of right to the Son of Heaven (Tianzi: the emperor), who in turn communicates it to the people. All men must follow the Will of Heaven, yet only the Son of Heaven can identify himself with Heaven. Representing Heaven on earth, the Son of Heaven issues orders, and the people have but to fulfill them. The emperor thus becomes the absolute arbiter of men's ideas and actions.

In its early centuries, Moism flourished, and it appears to have been a principal rival of Confucianism until about the 1st century B.C., when it went into decline and eventual extinction.

MRAK, IGNATIUS

Second bishop of Marquette, MI; b. Hotovle, Carniola, Austria, Oct. 16, 1818; d. Marquette, Feb. 1, 1901. After education at the Royal Gymnasium and the Seminary of Laibach (Ljubljana), he was ordained there on Aug. 3, 1837. Influenced by the work of his countryman Frederic BARAGA, Mrak sought admission (1845) to the Diocese of Detroit, Michigan. Upon arriving there, in October of 1845, he was immediately sent to assist another countryman, Rev. Francis PIERZ, at Arbre Croche (Harbor Springs). Two years later Mrak was given his own mission at La Croix (Cross Village) with Middletown (Good Hart), Castor Island (Beaver Island), and Manistee (Manistique) included. Here and later at Grande Traverse the missionary spent 13 years ministering to the indigenous people of the lakelands. Much to his dismay, Mrak was chosen (1868) to succeed Baraga as bishop of Sault Ste. Marie and Marquette. He was consecrated in the metropolitan cathedral at Cincinnati, Ohio, on Feb. 7, 1869, wearing secondhand regalia.

Devoted to a life of simplicity, Mrak continued his work among the Native Americans and struggled to meet the pioneer needs of the Catholic Church in northern Michigan. He made special efforts to improve the caliber and education of his missionary clergy and opened Catholic schools wherever possible. He also organized elected lay boards to assist pastors in the material administration of their parishes. Because of a painful rheumatic condition, he resigned his see (1878), which then had 20 priests serving 27 churches with missions and a Catholic population of 20,000. Appointed titular bishop of Antinoe, Mrak returned to his beloved missions. During the last nine years of his life he remained at Marquette, where he performed chaplain duties at St. Mary's Hospital. Mentally alert to the end, the old missionary made his last public appearance in August of 1899 at the consecration of Marquette's fourth bishop, Frederick Eis, whom he had ordained.

MUARD, MARIE JEAN BAPTISTE

Founder of the Society of ST. EDMUND; b. Vireaux (Yonne), France, April 24, 1809; d. La Pierre-qui-Vire (Yonne), France, June 19, 1854. After studies at the major seminary in Sens, he was ordained (1834) and spent the next six years in parochial ministries. He was eager to become a missionary, but his bishop refused him permission to go to China. In 1843 he founded at the ancient Cistercian monastery in Pontigny (Yonne) a group of diocesan missionary priests, known originally as Prêtres Auxiliaires, Missionnaires de St. Edmond, and later as the Society of St. Edmund. Muard remained at Pontigny until 1848. During this period he gave stability to the community and composed its rule. After sojourning in Rome and Subiaco he returned to France and in 1850 founded the monastery of Sainte Marie de La Pierrequi-Vire near Avallon (Yonne). This community, which belongs to the Benedictine congregation of Subiaco, became an abbey in 1884. Muard continued an active apostolate until he fell ill after preaching a mission at Saint-Étienne. He died a few days later. His process for beatification opened in Rome in 1928.

MUENCH, ALOISIUS JOSEPH

Cardinal and diplomat; b. Milwaukee, WI, Feb. 18, 1889; d. Rome, Italy, Feb. 15, 1962. He was the oldest of six children of immigrant German parents. After studies at St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, he was ordained on June 8, 1913, and served as assistant at St. Michael's Church, Milwaukee, and at the University Chapel, Madison. He received a master's degree (1919) from the University of Wisconsin and studied at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, receiving his doctor's degree summa cum laude in the social sciences. Before returning to the United States, he spent a year auditing classes at Louvain, Cambridge, Oxford, London, and the Sorbonne. In 1922 he was appointed to St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, where he served as professor of dogma and as rector. On Aug. 10, 1935, he was named third bishop of FARGO, North Dakota, and on Oct. 15, 1935, he was consecrated in the Gesu Church in Milwaukee by Archbishop Amleto Cicognani, apostolic delegate to the United States.

Assuming his new duties at the height of the Depression, Muench proved himself an able administrator. He organized the Catholic Church Expansion Fund to save many mortgaged and indebted parishes and to provide capital funds for future expansion. He founded a diocesan newspaper, established diocesan seminary scholarships, organized a priests' mutual aid fund, convoked the first synod in the diocese, and published a synodal book of diocesan legislation. Active in many social conferences and organizations, he was a staunch supporter of the Catholic Central Union and was prominent in the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, serving two terms as its president. With two priests of the Fargo diocese, William T. Mulloy and Vincent J. Ryan (both later bishops), Muench edited a sociological work, Manifesto on Rural Life. He was a member of the pontifical commission for the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., and of the episcopal Commission for Peace among Peoples, as well as of the international organization Pax Romana. Throughout his 23 years as bishop of Fargo he wrote an annual Lenten pastoral letter for distribution among his flock. The most famous of these, "One World in Charity" (1946), was a plea for just treatment of our former enemies, and it condemned the Morgenthau plan of restricting Germany to a rural economy. A translation of this letter found wide distribution in Germany.

In February of 1946 Pope Pius XII appointed Muench apostolic visitor to Germany; shortly thereafter Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson named him liaison consultant for religious affairs to the military governor of Germany. In this capacity he was advisor to General Lucius Clay and his successors on matters involving the Catholic Church and the American Army of Occupation. He also functioned as administrator of the Vatican mission established by the Pope to provide for the spiritual and material needs of the refugees, expellees, and displaced persons in Germany. The National Catholic Welfare Conference also appointed Muench to serve as military vicar delegate for the Catholics serving in the American Armed Forces in Germany. In November of 1949, in anticipation of Germany's independence and sovereignty, Pope Pius XII named Muench regent of the apostolic nunciature in Germany, and a year later granted him the personal title of archbishop. On March 6, 1951, when Germany became sovereign, Muench as papal nuncio was the first diplomat to present his credentials to the West German government; he was named dean of the diplomatic corps. In gratitude for his varied and signal services to the German people, Theodore Heuss, President of the West German Republic, conferred upon Muench Germany's highest honor, the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit on Dec. 20, 1957.

On Dec. 9, 1959, Pope John XXIII made Muench a member of the College of Cardinals with the title of St. Bernard at the Baths. He was the first American to serve actively as a cardinal in the Roman Curia. He was a member of the Sacred Congregations of Religious, Rites, and Extraordinary Affairs, as well as protector of a number of religious communities. He died in Rome at Villa Salvator Mundi, after receiving personally the apostolic blessing of Pope John XXIII; his remains were interred in St. Mary's Cemetery, Fargo.

MUHAMMAD

Founder of the religion of ISLAM; b. Mecca, c. A.D. 570; d. Medina, Arabia, 632. His life is generally divided into three periods: (1) his early life, the period of about 40 years before he received his "prophetic call" (2) his first or "Meccan" period as prophet of Islam, dated from his first "revelations" and public appearances declaring his message about 610 and extending to 622, the date of his flight from MECCA to MEDINA (known as the HIJRA, "emigration"); and (3) his second or "Medinese" period as prophet, during which he firmly established Islam as a religion and state, between 622 and his death in 632.

Early Life. Muḥammad's father died before his birth, and at age six he lost his mother. During his earliest years he was entrusted to the care of his grandfather 'Abd-al-Muṭṭalib, and later came under the protection of his uncle Abū Ṭālib. The Hāshim family into which he was born was a part of the Quraysh tribe, then prominent in Mecca; it was in fact among the most important constituents of the Quraysh, though clearly below the two leading families of Makhzūm and 'Umayyah. In spite of their social prominence, however, the Hāshimites had grown relatively poor just before Muḥammad's birth, and indications are that his early years as an orphan were spent under conditions rather miserable even for the times. Little reliable information concerning his youth has come down in the ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (ḤADĪTH), since, in the view of early Muslims, the period of the Jāhiliyyah (ignorance) before Islam, even as regards Muḥammad himself, was of scant interest. Later traditions supplied the need and embellished this portion of the biography with tales such as the famous BAHIRA LEGEND, some of them with fairly evident Biblical parallels and a few containing elements with a modicum of plausibility. It is certain at least that Muḥammad engaged in commerce and trade, perhaps to the extent of participating in trade caravans to Syria, and that his financial situation improved substantially when, at the age of about 25, he married a rich merchant's widow named Khadījah. By her he had seven children, four daughters, who lived to maturity, and three sons, who died in infancy or early youth. Mecca at this time was no mere desert oasis but a bustling and prosperous center of commerce on the major north-south trade route and its sanctuaries were places of religious pilgrimage for many neighboring tribes.

Attitude to Paganism. Muḥammad began by following the idolatrous beliefs and practices that were commonly adhered to by his tribe, by most of the citizens of Mecca, and by much of Arabia generally (see ARABIA). So deeply ingrained were his early religious experiences, in fact, that later, as the prophet of Islam, he occasionally made extraordinary concessions to Meccan paganism, attempting no doubt to harmonize some of its elements in order to render Islam more appealing to the Meccans. The principal example is the later incorporation of the ritual at the Ka'aba in Mecca, where a black stone was worshipped by the pagans, into Islam as the center of worship and direction of prayer (Arabic qiblah). It is also likely that he had early acquired a familiarity with and possibly even penchant for the special rhymed prose (called saj') used by the Arab soothsayers in their wild utterances, choosing it later as the style of his own "recitation" (Arabic qur'ān), the QUR'ĀN.

It is a matter of general agreement, however, that what Muḥammad retained of his early paganism was slight indeed by comparison with his single-minded conviction that as a system it had to be overthrown. A case has been made that mere economic gain was the inspiration for Muḥammad's religious revolution. That case does not suit the facts as they are known. Muḥammad must gradually have been appalled at the absurdities of pagan worship and the low level of pagan morals around him—for instance, the live burial of female infants.

Attitude to Judaism and Christianity. Neither Arabian Jews nor Arabian Christians, unfortunately, were to be classed among the better representatives of their faiths at the time. The Jews had lived in comparative isolation possibly since the middle of the first millenium B.C., although they had been mildly successful in proselytism. Of the two, Muḥammad evidently preferred the former, though there is one later Qur'ānic verse (5.85) that may indicate that he came eventually to regret that early preference.

Relations with "the Pure Ones." Most important of all, Muḥammad was associated with a small group of men, which included his wife's cousin Waraqa ibn-Nawfal, who thought of themselves as ḥunafā', "the pure ones," and who favored a monotheism of a somewhat syncretistic nature that tended toward neither Judaism nor Christianity. Three out of four of the most famous ḥunafā' later became Christians. As for Muḥammad, the essential simplicity and the syncretistic quality of the ḥanīf views must have impressed him deeply and evoked a firm conviction, for he withdrew into solitude more and more frequently in order to meditate on them. For this purpose he developed a habit of going up late at night to a cave on Ḥirā', a mountain near the city. It was there that he had an experience one night that completely changed his own life and profoundly affected human history.

Meccan Period. Although the Islamic "traditions" are usually highly problematical, they remain our unique sources for Muḥammad's life and can be made to yield important insights. In the light of the general account they present of Muḥammad's "prophetic call" and of his activities immediately thereafter, it is not sensible to doubt the man's basic sincerity at this point or to assert that he fabricated that and all subsequent experiences of "revelation." It is preferable, though of course far more difficult, to explain these highly colored but often remarkably plausible accounts in other ways. Apparently Muḥammad had been confused and despondent just before his first revelation, one source (no less reliable than the others) going so far as to insist that he had been contemplating suicide at the precise moment it occurred. However that may have been, his claim was to have seen a personal vision that commanded him, "Recite!" He replied, "What shall I recite?" [or, according to later interpretations concerned with proving him illiterate and thereby establishing more firmly the credibility of the Qur'ān, "I cannot recite (or, read)"]. There followed the revelation of the first part of Qur'ān 96 or, according to other versions of the tradition, 68, 74, or 93.

Effect of First Revelation. Muḥammad himself was frightened, incredulous, and unsure of the meaning of the experience. It required persuasion from his wife and friends before he was convinced and believed that he had actually received a revelation from God. From the Medinese period on, Muslims have confidently asserted that all of the revelations of the Qur'ān were delivered to Muḥammad through the medium of the Archangel Gabriel and that he memorized, but never wrote, them for his disciples. But there is no mention of Gabriel until the revelations of the Medinese period, and indications are that Muḥammad was first persuaded that he was receiving the revelations from God Himself, or from "the Spirit," most likely to be identified with the Holy Spirit. In any case, it is necessary to recognize that after his first doubts he himself never again questioned that his revelations were in a literal sense the word of God. As it worked itself out in his own mind, with assistance from the revelations themselves in the Muslim view, he was not to be considered inspired, let alone divine, but rather the vehicle through whom God and His angel were dictating a final revelation, a redaction of previous revelations whose authenticity he never challenged, to the Arabs and to all mankind. That dictation came in parts (Arabic 'āyāt, used for "verses") from a heavenly archetype. He was a messenger (rasūl) and a prophet (nabi), indeed the last of the prophets, as he was ultimately compelled to assert.

Early Chapters of the Qur'ān. The temper of the first chapters (Arabic sūra) of the Qur'ān is simple and fiery, unobjectionable and even appealing to a Christian. The nature of Muḥammad's message as therein conveyed is mainly a warning to men of their sins, more particularly to the Meccans against polytheism. One supreme God (Allāh, best understood, as it must have been to not a few contemporaries, as 'ilāh, "god," with the definite article), whose attributes and statements identified Him as the God of the Jews and the Christians, demanded surrender of men's wills to Himself. He commanded men to become converted, reform, purify their actions, and unify in faith. He reminded some (and told most for the first time) that there is an afterlife in which, after judgment, men will continue forever in a state of punishment or pleasure. These eschatological passages in the Qur'ān, primitive as they are, are not only the best from a literary standpoint but also the most endearing and vindicating from a Christian standpoint. During these years they clearly were not regarded by Muḥammad as the basis of a new religion but rather as a "proof" and continuation of an old religion within which the Arabs, too, had a noble destiny as the sons of Abraham. He was called 'ummī in the Qur'ān, which does not mean (as his followers needlessly contended) that he was an "illiterate" prophet, but rather that he was a prophet to a "people without a (sacred) book," an apostle to the Gentiles.

Opposition at Mecca. Unfortunately for all concerned, but chiefly for Muḥammad himself, his message and claims were met either with indifference and scoffing or with general, swift, and powerful opposition. The pagan Meccans, including his well-to-do relatives, took his "warning" very much to heart, but not as he intended. They immediately set about organizing resistance to Muḥammad and planning the elimination of his tiny group of followers (Arabic muslimūn, hence Muslims, "those who have surrendered"). It must be granted that their reaction was justifiable inasmuch as the growth of a religious sect in Mecca with principles such as Muḥammad's constituted a serious threat to the basis of the main source of wealth for Mecca's leading families, its pilgrimage trade. Even worse for Muḥammad, in consideration of the results, was the refusal of neighboring Jews and Christians to recognize in him a true prophet in the line of their common tradition. Moreover, small as it was, the community of Islam was already experiencing apostasy induced by pagan intrigues and Jewish and Christian skepticism.

Concessions to Paganism. At this point interesting new material was introduced into the more recent chapters of the Qur'ān, much of it aimed at, or conveniently coincidental with, coming to terms with the opposition. The Meccans were treated to sermons against trust in wealth, which leads only to pride and hinders man from realizing his dependence upon God. On the other hand, the goddesses (al-Lāt, worshipped at Ṭā'if; al-'Uzzā, worshipped at Nakhlah; and Manāt, whose shrine lay between Mecca and Medina) were acknowledged to be venerable "daughters of Allah" (Qur'ān 22.51) whose cults might therefore be expected to continue without hindrance. These devices neither convinced nor placated the Meccans, and Muḥammad was soon to regret such revelations and declare them "Satanic suggestions" rather than God's revelation. Ultimately a good many verses in the Qur'ān were "abrogated" in this fashion. For the benefit of Jews and Christians the revelations embarked upon fuller statements embodying items in their creeds and references to, even a few tentative narrations of, their Biblical sources. Whether this latter attempt produced more concrete results or merely promised a more fruitful line of development for Islam is impossible to determine. At any rate, it lasted well into the Medinese period.

At the same time Muḥammad sent about 80 Muslims to Ethiopia to seek refuge with the Christian Negus. Surface indications are that the increasing persecution of the Meccans alone prompted this action, but closer scrutiny suggests that Muḥammad may have been troubled over sharp differences within his community. He hoped to prevent apostasy by entrusting one group with a mission to attempt to win sympathy from the Negus, perhaps also the promise of military assistance or at least trade relations. The Negus was understandably perplexed, but permitted the Muslims to remain. Some of them did not return to Arabia until seven years after the Hijra.

Muḥammad was obviously losing ground in Mecca. There were planned attacks during his public preaching and economic boycotts against his followers. About 619 he lost both the stabilizing presence of his wife Khadijah and the protective presence of his guardian Abū Ṭālib, who as chief of the Hāshim clan had warded off more violent steps toward destroying Muḥammad. He seemed to be faced now with a single set of alternatives, either to abandon his cause and community altogether, or to find a different site in which to settle them. Reports from the Ethiopian diaspora had evidently not raised hopes of possibilities in that direction. Then a highly fortuitous opportunity presented itself.

First Followers at Medina. On occasion Muḥammad had had among his audience in Mecca various tribesmen from other parts of Arabia, and had already asserted in clear terms that Islam was destined to unify the Arab tribes. To members of two tribes of the Banū Qaylah in Medina, the Aws and the Khazraj, such an idea had a very immediate and practical interest. They were tribes of Judaized Arabs who had been feuding with one another for many years. Some of their constituents, who had come to regard the feud as mutually debilitating and had heard (or heard of) Muḥammad, thought that he would be an ideal mediator, since there were religious disputes involved in the feud that Islam seemed capable of harmonizing. In 620 and 621, when Muḥammad's fortunes at Mecca were at their lowest ebb, he made an encouragingly steady number of converts from Medina. Accordingly, arrangements were made for his followers to leave Mecca unobtrusively in small groups and, finally, for his own departure.

Medinese Period. The first day of the Arabian lunar year in which the Hijra took place, July 16, 622, was later chosen as the beginning of the Islamic era. It might at first appear strange that that date was selected in preference to that of Muḥammad's birth or first revelation, but the selection was a natural one after the fact. Islam as a state was born with the Hijra. Scholars have tended to exaggerate somewhat the difference in Muḥammad's character after the Hijra. Difference there was, but far greater was the difference in the community of Islam itself as it was transformed into a conquering state at Medina.

Results of the Hijra. That transformation did not take place at once. Change was neither rapid nor general at first, for the Hijra had not by any means solved all of Muḥammad's problems. Although this early period of trial in Medina was eased by the fact that so many of the Medinese (later called the Anṣār, helpers) accepted Islam, he still encountered strong opposition to his presence and his message and was not able to halt the feuding of the Aws and Khazraj immediately. However, Muḥammad took two particular steps at this time aimed at a bold solution of the major problems. First, he integrated as far as possible the Muhājirūn, the "emigrants" who had come from Mecca, with the native population of Medina by means of employment, intermarriage, and a system of assumption of fraternal relationship. Then he attempted to win the unqualified support of the Jewish communities in and around the city. Apparently he thought he could achieve this end with relative ease simply by incorporating into Islam various forms of Jewish ritual and law. His optimism on this score was, however, misguided, since most of the Jews resented what they regarded as his rewriting of their Scriptures and completely rejected his claims to prophethood. The final period in the development of the Islamic faith under Muḥammad can be understood only in the light of this formidable opposition of the Jewish communities. Ultimately the wholesale incorporation of Jewish elements ceased and Islam assumed its own direction of prayer, Mecca, and its own month of fasting, Ramaḍān.

First "Holy War." Before that, however, Muḥammad proved himself to be a shrewd and eminently practical political leader as well as prophet to his community. For economic and social reasons he now openly sanctioned warfare, preached jihād (holy war) against unbelievers, and himself led expeditions against trading caravans and neighboring Bedouin tribes. It seems quite clear that these expeditions were part of a more general scheme whereby Muḥammad hoped to blockade his most formidable enemies, the Meccans, into surrendering to his authority, while impressing the rest of the Arabs with the growing force of his religious state. In 624 the Muslims won their first major military victory at Badr. The opposition had been accustomed to attack and assembled an army of approximately 1,000 men. Muḥammad with a force of only about 300 ambushed the army and greatly elevated Islamic morale and his own position in the eyes of the enemy and neutral forces. But the battle of Badr did not secure an unshakable footing for Muḥammad or his followers. In the next year, for instance, the Muslims were badly defeated at Uḥud, and Muḥammad himself was wounded. Yet the only major Meccan effort against Muḥammad, a siege of Medina, ended in failure, and meanwhile Muḥammad was enjoying even greater successes in the realm of conversion. He won over some prominent persons by force of his personality and several tribes by means of alliance—frequently marriage alliance, which so swelled his own harem that it was necessary to receive a special revelation permitting himself more than the usual four wives.

Winning of Mecca. In 628 Muḥammad won one of his major victories by sheer stratagem. He announced his intention of coming to Mecca with his followers for the peaceful purpose of making the pilgrimage to the Ka'aba. The confused Meccans were forced to conclude a treaty at al-Ḥudaybiyah allowing for an annual pilgrimage of Muslims under terms of complete truce between the two forces. Muḥammad then turned toward unifying the Arab tribes north of Medina. So successful was this effort during the following 22 months that in 630 Muḥammad was able to return to Mecca and enter it against only token resistance. Victory had to be consolidated, however, and Muḥammad spent much of his time during the remaining two years of his life in seeking solutions to the complicated problem of tribal allegiances. His efforts met with considerable success in 631, the "Year of Delegations (of Arab tribal shaykhs)" of early Islamic historiography.

Consolidation of His Triumphs. Not all his time was occupied in warfare and secular activities during the Medinese period. The bulk of Qur'ānic revelation in these years far outweighs that from Mecca. In these chapters the rhymed style of saj' remained, but there was little left of the imagery, succinctness, and fire that characterized the Meccan chapters. They were ponderous relations of Biblical stories and legislative detail. At Mecca Muḥammad had proclaimed a new religion that was rather bare. At Medina he clothed it and set it up as a community embodying a radical reform of the Arabian social structure. He succeeded in replacing Arab tribalism with a notion of 'ummah, a brotherhood of true believers under God destined for dominion in this world and enjoyment in the next.

Muḥammad had experienced bitter disappointment in the failure of Jews and Christians to accept Islam. When he was able, he retaliated by forcing Khaybar and other Jewish colonies to submit to his rule. But he was too respectful of the prophetic tradition in which he saw himself, and too economically canny, to fail to single out the ahl-al-kitāb (people of the Scripture, hence Jews and Christians) from others. Those who were willing to accept Islamic rule could retain their faiths under certain conditions, chief among which was the payment of a larger tax. Those who refused were to be treated like others, to be subjugated or killed. Draconian system as it no doubt was, it was still better than what pagans, including his own relatives, received at his hands.

Muḥammad did not return to Mecca to make the pilgrimage in 631. Instead he sent Abū Bakr to proclaim that henceforth pagans were not to participate in the pilgrimage. They were given four months to be converted to Islam or face extinction. In the following year Muḥammad made his "Farewell Pilgrimage," solely in the company of his believing Muslims. His war against Meccan idolatry had been so crowned with victory that it no longer made any great difference that a Meccan idol now lay at the pivot of a dynamic, virtually irrepressible force soon to make its indelible marks upon the world outside Arabia. A few months later in 632, after a short illness, Muḥammad died. Abū Bakr, the father of his favorite wife 'Ā'ishah, succeeded him as his first CALIPH (Arabic khalīfah, "successor").

MÜHLENBERG, HENRY MELCHIOR

Organizer of the Lutheran Church in Colonial America; b. Einbeck, Hanover, Germany, Sept. 6, 1711; d.

Trappe, PA, Oct. 7, 1787. Educated under the influence of PIETISM at Göttingen University, in Hanover, Muhlenberg was sent to America in 1742 in response to appeals from Lutheran colonists.

Despite the fact that the center of Muhlenberg's activity was in southeastern Pennsylvania, his travels and correspondence extended his influence to the entire Atlantic seaboard. He strengthened existing congregations and helped to organize new ones, secured additional clergymen from Europe and began to train a native ministry, united ministers and congregations in a synodical organization (1748), and through his reports to Europe (the so-called Halle Reports) secured financial and other assistance. Mühlenberg's three sons achieved prominence: Peter (1746–1807) was brigadier general in the American Revolution; Frederick (1750–1801) was first speaker of the U.S. Congress; and Henry Ernest (1753–1815) was a botanist as well as a clergyman.

MULDOON, PETER JAMES

Bishop; b. Columbia, CA, Oct. 10, 1862; d. Rockford, IL, Oct. 8, 1927. He was the eldest son of Irish immigrant parents, John and Catherine (Coughlin) Muldoon. After attending the public schools of Stockton, Calif., he continued his studies at St. Mary's College, St. Mary, Kentucky. In 1881, he entered St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Maryland, for his philosophical and theological training. He was ordained for the Archdiocese of Chicago by Bishop John Loughlin of Brooklyn, New York, on Dec. 18, 1886. A favorite of Archbishop P. A. FEEHAN, he acted as his chancellor and secretary from 1888 to 1895, when he was appointed pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church, Chicago. The recognition accorded the young American-born priest was resented by some of the Irish-born clergy of the archdiocese, and a few vented their hostility on him and flouted the authority of the archbishop.

When Archbishop Patrick A. Feehan and his auxiliary, Alexander J. McGavick, declined in health, Muldoon was consecrated titular bishop of Tamassus and auxiliary of Chicago in Holy Name Cathedral on July 25, 1901, by Cardinal Sebastian Martinelli, apostolic delegate to the United States. Martinelli's presence was construed as Rome's approbation of the young bishop and an admonition to his detractors. Six days after his consecration he was appointed vicar-general of the archdiocese.

Feehan died on July 12, 1902, and Muldoon, the administrator, was one of the candidates for the vacant see. However, in January of 1903, Rome transferred Bishop James E. Quigley of Buffalo to Chicago. Five years later, the Diocese of Rockford was erected from territory of the Archdiocese of Chicago, and Muldoon was named bishop of the new see. He was a candidate for the See of CHICAGO when Quigley died in July of 1915, but Rome appointed George W. Mundelein, auxiliary bishop of Brooklyn. In December of 1916, Muldoon was consulted about accepting the vacant See of Monterey-Los Angeles, California, but he expressed his preference for remaining in Rockford. There followed five months of confusion and frustration. The appointment of Muldoon to the West was made, the bulls were issued, and the wire services informed, but the bishop refused to act until an answer was received from Rome on his recent petition to remain in Rockford. In May of 1917, Rome finally acquiesced, and Muldoon remained in his diocese.

During his years as a bishop in Chicago and Rockford, Muldoon played a prominent role in the movement for social reform, gaining a reputation as a friend of labor and a defender of labor unions. When the American Federation of Catholic Societies, under the inspiration of Peter E. Dietz, a prominent labor priest, established a social service commission in 1911, Muldoon was appointed chairman. As chairman of the National Catholic War Council (1917–18), he became a nationally known figure. This organization, designed to coordinate all Catholic activities in furthering the war effort, brought Muldoon into close association with members of other religious groups and governmental agencies. His forcefulness and diplomacy ensured the success of the council and prompted Cardinal James Gibbons to propose a peacetime organization comparable to it. Muldoon, as one of the new committee members, submitted a program to the hierarchy at their meeting in September of 1919. It was approved, though not unanimously.

Rome at first viewed the new organization favorably, but when dissatisfied American bishops complained to the pope, the original approbation was qualified and then revoked. On his ad limina visit in 1920, Muldoon pleaded the case of the National Catholic Welfare Council; later Bishop Joseph Schrembs of Cleveland, Ohio, was dispatched to Rome to defend the new organization. The Holy See finally gave unqualified approbation, and the new agency was continued under the title of National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC).

During the formative years of the NCWC Muldoon was chairman of its Social Action Department and commanded attention locally and nationally in the social reform movement. Muldoon's death in 1927 came after an illness of several months.

MULHERIN, MARY GABRIELLA

Maryknoll Sister, missionary to Korea, co-founder of the Korean Credit Union in 1960, b. Scranton, Penn., 1900; d. Maryknoll, N.Y., 1993. Worked as a legal secretary for several years after high school. After she heard Maryknoll co-founder, Thomas F. PRICE, preach, she decided to enter the MARYKNOLL SISTERS in 1923, and was sent as a missionary to Korea. Between 1926 and 1941, Mulherin directed the Industry Department in Yeung Yu, was later was a language teacher in the same city, and served in several other towns, including the capital of Korea, Pyongyang. When World War II erupted, she returned to the United States to work as the secretary for the Maryknoll Superior General, Bishop James Edward WALSH. She returned to a war-torn and divided Korea in 1952, chagrined at the plight of the people. As part of the reconstruction of the social agencies of the country, Mulherin and Maryknoll Father George M. Carroll founded the Korean Association of Voluntary Associations in order to coordinate the many volunteer groups which had arisen after the Korean conflict. Because the war left many widows who did not have a source of income, Mulherin organized art and craft schools to teach them and other young women, who were without sources of income, how to lead economically independent lives.

In 1960, amidst a student revolution and the collapse of the Syngman Rhee government, Mulherin inaugurated a leadership training program for thirty workers, as the foundation for a voluntary Credit Union Movement. On May 1, 1960, twenty-eight members formed the first union on the Maryknoll Sisters' compound in Pusan. The movement was based on the principles Mulherin learned in Nova Scotia under the tutelage of Monsignor Moses M. Coady. The leadership training of the Antigonish Movement was based on democratic values and developed trust and self-responsibility among the members. After the first year as the director of the Credit Union, Mulherin turned over the leadership to two Korean leaders. When the Korean government honored her in 1988, the organization numbered 1.3 million members. She retired in 1967 and returned to Maryknoll, N.Y., where she continued her interest in the unions through conversations with visiting Koreans until her death in 1993.

MULLANY, AZARIAS OF THE CROSS, BROTHER

Educator, author; b. near Killenaule, County Tipperary, Ireland, June 29, 1847; d. Plattsburg, NY, Aug. 20, 1893. Patrick Francis Mullany immigrated to Deerfield, New York, in 1857. While attending Assumption Academy, Utica, New York, he chose the vocation of his teachers, the Brothers of the Christian Schools; he was professed in 1862. He was assigned in 1866 to Rock Hill College, Ellicott City, Maryland, as a teacher of mathematics. He was president of the college (1879–86) and worked with such educators as Daniel Coit Gilman, Herbert Baxter Adams, and Andrew D. White. He moved to De La Salle Institute, New York City, in 1888, where his lectures and writings made him one of the best-known Catholic religious in America. He helped to organize Catholic reading circles and was a founder of the Catholic Summer School of America at Plattsburg. Although limited by ill health and inadequate formal education, he mastered nine languages and became a specialist in varied fields of knowledge, notably literature and philosophy. A frequent contributor to Catholic periodicals and the International Journal of Ethics, his chief writings were An Essay Contributing to the Philosophy of Literature (1874), The Development of Old English Thought (1879), Aristotle and the Christian Church (1888), Books and Reading (1889), and Phases of Thought and Criticism (1892). Posthumously, many of his articles and reviews were compiled as Essays Educational, Essays Philosophical, Essays Miscellaneous (1896).

MULRY, THOMAS MAURICE

First president of the Superior Council of the U.S. Society of ST. VINCENT DE PAUL, and businessman; b. New York City, Feb. 13, 1855; d. there, March 10, 1916. Of Irish–Dutch extraction, he was the second of 14 children born to Thomas Mulry and Parthenia (Crolius) Mulry, of New York City. He was educated in parochial schools and at De La Salle Academy and as a young man took night classes at old Cooper Union. In 1872, after the family's second brief venture into farming in Wisconsin, he became associated with his father as an excavation contractor in the firm of Mulry and Son, New York. In 1880 Mulry married Mary E. Gallagher, a Hunter College graduate and teacher in New York public schools. The couple had 13 children; four of them joined the Society of Jesus, and one became a Sister of Charity. The contracting business of Mulry and Son prospered, with the younger Mulry eventually taking over active management. As a moderately successful businessman, he expanded his interests to include banking, insurance, and real estate, becoming president of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank in 1906.

After becoming a member of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul at 17, Mulry continued throughout his life to exercise this layman's charitable vocation, accepting offices from the presidency of St. Bernard's Parish Conference, 1880, to the presidency of the Superior Council of the U.S., 1915. Under his leadership, Vincentians relinquished an earlier position of aloofness and entered into cooperative effort with other public and private welfare agencies. Mulry permanently influenced the Catholic charities movement in the U.S. He fought the abuses inherent in almshouse care of dependent children and, notably, succeeded in improving conditions and standards of placement care. His plea for moderation all but ended the long controversy between advocates of institutional care and proponents of foster home care. The Government in Charity (1912), his principal publication, vigorously affirmed the state's responsibility to encourage and work cooperatively with private charitable agencies, but opposed excessive secularization of social welfare work. Under his direction special programs were initiated: summer outings and camps for needy boys and girls; the Catholic Home Bureau, which stimulated Catholic home placement programs; and the Catholic Boys' Club movement. National unification of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, attributable in part to Mulry's leadership, was achieved with the establishment of the Superior Council of the U.S. in 1915.

Although principally identified with the Vincentian organization, Mulry achieved recognition in the broader welfare community. He was among the founders and served as a vice president of the National Conference of Catholic Charities, helped establish the Fordham School of Social Service, founded St. Elizabeth's Home for Convalescent Women and Girls, and was a member of the Board of Governors of the New York Catholic Protectory. In 1907 he was elected president of the National Conference of Charities and Correction. U.S. President Theodore Roosevelt named him to be one of a committee of three to organize the first White House Conference on Children (1909).

MULTITUDE

Considered absolutely and in the broadest sense of the term, unspecified plurality, hence intelligible only as opposed to some kind of UNITY. Often usage connotes, in addition to mere plurality, a collectivity or superior kind of unification embracing a plurality of more ultimate units, as when one speaks of "a multitude." The more properly metaphysical notion refers to a non-numerable plurality. This article discusses the origin of the notion, its various analogies, and its uses in philosophy and theology.

Origin. In the order of development of the various analogical uses of this term, the first refers to the kind of plurality that is grasped in immediate sense experience, such a rudimentary and ultimate experience that no further analysis seems capable of altering the basic content or interpretation. Prior to any notion of number, this plurality of material things is available to the sense of touch, to sight, and to hearing. The ability to grasp such a plurality as a collective set is sometimes referred to as number sense, but this precedes the formation of the number concept since number, taken concretely, is a measured material multitude. This prime analogate of multitude, pertaining to material entities only, manifests finer distinctions within it. Thus some pluralities are not perfect in the sense that their parts cannot be perfectly distinguished, e.g., the fingers of the hand, distinct yet joined. Again, some multitudes are irreducible, e.g., a group of men, whereas others are not, e.g., several pieces of wax that can be melted together to form one. This latter instance indicates that plurality is due to materiality, to quantity, and not to formal differences that characterize the individual members who constitute the multitude.

Analogies. Plurality requires some kind of distinction, for without distinction there is simple IDENTITY under which only unity can be found. Confining one's thought to perceptible, physical multitude, it makes little difference whether the elements of the collection be substantial individuals or mere parts, whether they be of the same type or species or simply diverse in kind. Almost any degree of physical separation or any kind of actual separation will suffice to found such a multitude, but some sort of dividedness based on the distinctions proper to quantified matter is required. Since distinction itself is based on some mode of opposition that sets one element over against another, the ultimate foundation of physical multitude can be found in the fact that in extended matter one part is not the other: "this here" is not "that there." This opposition, a difference in QUANTITY, is sometimes called SITUATION (situs). The parts of such a quantitative multitude can be understood as units; and when the collection is compared to a representative unit, the number, or relative measure, of the collection can be determined. This kind of multitude is opposed to, and yet, in some way, composed of, units that can be signified by the numeral "1."

Following a somewhat similar line of development, it is possible to conceive of multitude in another, analogous, sense based on some mode of formal OPPOSITION. Consequent upon opposition, formal distinctions can be made, and thus DIVISION and plurality or multitude in a formal sense. This notion of multitude is often called transcendental and is opposed to transcendental unity or unity of BEING itself, since form is the principle of entitative unity. Aristotle distinguished four modes of formal opposition: contradiction, contrariety, privation, and relation. Any of these may found a formal distinction and hence transcendental multitude—"transcendental" because not limited to any category but analogically common, as the term being is common. Clearly the notion of multitude changes as the basis of opposition changes, but in any case the correlative unity is a kind of nondividedness in being itself and hence not a standard for quantitative measure or enumeration. A formal, or transcendental, multitude cannot be counted in any sense of the term, whereas material, or quantitative, multitude is the proper subject of enumeration.

Philosophy and Theology. In philosophical thought the opposition between unity and multiplicity appears in many guises. The problem of the one and the many is one of the most fundamental metaphysical issues: how can being be one, i.e., common to all that is, and yet be the obvious multitude that it is? The Eleatics tended to regard multiplicity as an illusion of the senses (see GREEK PHILOSOPHY). PLATO found a unity in the transcendent Idea in which the sensible multitude participates, and Aristotle resorted to a theory of ANALOGY to preserve both undeniable facts. The solution of I. KANT, unique in its time, required a synthesizing activity of the mind that alone could attain intelligible unity in phenomenal multiplicity by the imposition of its own categories and connectives. The same issue reappears in epistemology as a dispute between NOMINALISM and REALISM, in the philosophy of logic as the problem of UNIVERSALS, in the philosophy of nature as the problem of MONISM versus pluralism, and in philosophical theology as PANTHEISM versus monotheism. Even in the philosophical considerations of mathematics, which seems to concern itself with quantitative plurality, there is a reflection of the problem in questions about the formation of the number concept.

In theology the concept of transcendental multitude is quite important inasmuch as all distinction and hence plurality of nonmaterial being must be formal. Any speculation about the pluralities of ANGELS involves transcendental multitude, and each angelic individual can be understood as formally distinguished from all others. Likewise, in Trinitarian theology, the divine Persons are distinguished by a relational opposition that is itself transcendental and so the multiplicity in the Persons must be analogically transcendental. Apparently the image-making power of the human mind and the necessity for material signification create the impression that such multiplicity is subject to counting.

MUNDELEIN, GEORGE WILLIAM

Cardinal, third archbishop of Chicago, Ill., archdiocese; b. New York City, July 2, 1872; d. Chicago, Oct. 2, 1939. He was the only son of Francis and Mary (Goetz) Mundelein, who sent him to St. Nicholas parochial school on Manhattan's lower East Side. Because his family had only modest means, friends helped him through De La Salle Institute and Manhattan College, New York City, from which he received a B.A. degree in 1889. A fellow Classmate, Patrick J. Hayes, and he decided to study for the priesthood. It is not altogether clear why he decided to study for the neighboring Diocese of Brooklyn, N.Y. He spent three years at St. Vincent's Seminary in Beatty, Pa., and completed his training at the Propaganda College, Rome. He was ordained in Rome by Bishop Charles McDonnell of Brooklyn on June 8, 1895, and celebrated his first Mass at St. Peter's Tomb.

On his return to Brooklyn, he was appointed McDonnell's associate secretary and administrator of the Lithuanian Church at Williamsburg. In December of 1897 he became diocesan chancellor, and nine years later was made a domestic prelate, an unusual distinction in those days. The Arcadia, a group of Catholic scholars known for their literary attainments, elected him to membership on April 20, 1907. At the request of McDonnell, Mundelein was named titular bishop of Loryma and auxiliary bishop of Brooklyn and consecrated on Sept. 21, 1909, in St. James Pro-cathedral. He resigned as chancellor to become rector of the Cathedral Chapel of Queen of All Saints, where he supervised the building of a church, school, and rectory, combined in one Gothic structure. He also directed the erection of Cathedral College of the Immaculate Conception, the preparatory seminary.

Archbishop of Chicago. On Dec. 9, 1915, Mundelein was chosen to be the third archbishop of CHICAGO. Only 43 years old, he was the youngest archbishop in the United States. His enthronement in Holy Name Cathedral took place on Feb. 9, 1916, with the apostolic delegate, Archbishop Giovanni Bonzano, presiding. A civic reception followed at the Auditorium Theatre on February 13 at which the new archbishop spoke, promising to bring the name of his predecessor Archbishop James E. Quigley "permanently and prominently before every man, woman, and child in the diocese." This pledge was fulfilled three months later when a pastoral letter of May 14, 1916, announced the building of Quigley Preparatory Seminary, a project the clergy and people enthusiastically supported. While this building was under construction, Mundelein planned a major seminary, which the archdiocese had needed since August of 1868 when the seminary department of the University of St. Mary of the Lake had been closed. A site was found near Area, Ill., and when the diamond jubilee of the archdiocese and the silver jubilee of the archbishop's ordination were celebrated in April 1920, the project for a new major seminary was announced. The purse given to the archbishop for his jubilee was used to begin construction of the philosophy buildings. During the next 14 years St. Mary of the Lake Seminary added 14 buildings in Georgian architecture to its plant on the shores of Lake Eara in Lake County. In 1924 the town of Area changed its name to Mundelein, and the school became known as Mundelein Seminary. Ten years later, the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities recognized St. Mary of the Lake Seminary as a pontifical faculty of theology with the privilege of conferring the doctorate in theology. Mundelein always took special interest in the seminary and collected rare books, manuscripts, autographs, coins, vestments, chalices, and pictures for its museum, library, and chapels.

Another of Mundelein's notable accomplishments was the organization of Catholic Charities in March of 1918, by which he united the diverse charitable activities of the archdiocese and prompted support for them. He never forgot that he had been a poor boy and always expressed affection for the underprivileged. Each year at Christmas he personally paid for a complete outfit of clothing and shoes for 100 needy children. Toward the end of his life he said to the members of the Holy Name Society: "The trouble with us in the past has been that we were too often allied or drawn into an alliance with the wrong side. Selfish employers of labor have flattered the Church by calling it a great conservative force, and then called upon it to act as a police force when they paid but a pittance of wages to those who worked for them. I hope that day is gone by. Our place is beside the poor, behind the working man."

Cardinal. All Chicago rejoiced at the news on March 2, 1924, that its archbishop would be elevated to the College of Cardinals in the consistory of March 24. When Mundelein was in Rome to receive the red hat, he began preparations to hold the 28th International Eucharistic Congress in Chicago from June 20 to 24, 1926. More than a million Catholics, including 12 cardinals, 64 archbishops, 309 bishops, 500 monsignors, and 8,000 priests made this congress one of the greatest religious demonstrations ever witnessed in the United States. In 1928, when Pope Pius XI appealed for help in building the new Propaganda College in Rome, Mundelein responded with a check for $1,500,000, underwritten by the generous mission contributions of his priests and people.

In 1934 he celebrated his episcopal silver jubilee in Rome, where he purchased a building for the Collegio S. Maria del Lago, a house for postgraduate students. Three years later on May 18, 1937, he condemned the religious persecution undertaken by Hitler and the Nazi party. His description of the Fuehrer as "an Austrian paperhanger" brought protests at the Vatican and Washington.

A personal friendship developed between Mundelein and president Franklin D. Roosevelt. When the new Outer Drive Bridge, Chicago, was dedicated on Oct. 5, 1937, the President was his luncheon guest. In October of 1938 Mundelein served as papal legate to the eighth national Eucharistic Congress in New Orleans, La. While in Rome to report to Pope Pius XI, he celebrated the beatification Mass for Frances Xavier CABRINI, whose funeral Mass he had offered in Chicago in 1917. After the death of Pope Pius XI in February of 1939, Mundelein participated in the conclave that elected Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli as Pope Pius XII on March 2, 1939. Seven months later Cardinal Mundelein died suddenly of a coronary thrombosis and was buried in a crypt behind the main altar in the seminary that bears his name.

MUNDWILER, FINTAN

Second abbot of ST. MEINRAD, Ind.; b. Dietikon, Zurich, Switzerland, July 12, 1835; d. St. Meinrad, Feb. 14, 1898. He studied at the claustral school at EINSIEDELN, entered that monastery in 1854, and was ordained in 1859. With Martin MARTY, later abbot and bishop, Mundwiler was sent (1859) to the newly founded monastery of St. Meinrad, where he served as rector of the school and first prior (1870). Upon Marty's nomination as vicar apostolic of the Dakota Territory, Mundwiler was elected second abbot of St. Meinrad on Feb. 3, 1880. During his term of office St. Meinrad experienced many difficulties, including the destructive fire of 1887, the struggles to rebuild, and certain internal dissensions. With tact and moderation Abbot Fintan brought about a renewal in observance, the reconstruction of the abbey, and an increase in school enrollment. Under him St. Meinrad's daughter-house, New Subiaco in Arkansas, was made an abbey (1891), and St. Joseph's Abbey in Louisiana was founded (1889). He was the first president (1881) of the Swiss-American Congregation of BENEDICTINES, and he composed the congregation's first statutes.

MUNGUÍA, CLEMENTE DE JESÚS

Mexican prelate and scholar, active in the defense of the Church during the Liberal reform and the period of Emperor Maximilian; b. Los Reyes, Michoacán, Nov. 21, 1810; d. Rome, Dec. 14, 1868. He graduated in law and practiced the profession in Morelia and Mexico City from 1838 to 1841, when he was ordained to the priesthood. He then served in various ecclesiastical posts of the Diocese of Morelia, including those of vicar-general and vicar of the curia. In 1843 he was named rector of the seminary, where he had taught, and he brought this institution to a high level of academic and scientific activity. Munguía was elevated to the bishopric of Michoacán in 1850. In 1853 he was named president of the council of state by the dictator Santa Anna. With the victory of the Ayutla revolution, he vigorously defended the Church against the Liberal reformers and was exiled in 1856 by President Comonfort. Returning to his diocese the following year, he declared himself in favor of the Plan of Tacubaya, which called for the derogation of the liberal constitution of 1857 and set in motion the War of the Reform. At the conclusion of the war in 1861, which resulted in victory for the Reform party under Benito Juárez, he was again sent into exile. With the beginning of the French invasion of Mexico, he returned to Morelia in 1863 as its first archbishop. He soon incurred the enmity of Emperor Maximilian because of his outspoken views on the rights of the Church. He was one of the prelates who signed the Manifest of Dec. 29, 1864, urging the government not to legislate in religious matters without a previous concordat with the pope. He also protested against the Law of Religious Tolerance; but disillusioned in his hopes under the emperor, he went into exile again in 1865 and spent his last days in Rome. A prolific writer, he left 14 volumes, ranging from a course in universal jurisprudence (1844) to a synthesis of the philosophy of thought and expression (1852), in addition to numerous essays and addresses.

MUNICH METHOD IN CATECHETICS

An adaptation to catechetics of the psychological steps of learning and teaching, developed by J. F. Herbart and T. Ziller. The Munich catechists formulated their method in six principal and secondary steps: presentation, explanation, application and preparation, aim, and synthesis. The primary steps in the teaching procedure correspond to three steps in learning on the part of the pupil (viz., perception, understanding, and practice). Furthermore, there is direct appeal to the cognitive and appetitive powers of the learner: to the senses and imagination in the “presentation,” to the intellect in the “explanation,” and to the will and emotions in the “application.” These principles of learning have their roots in the psychology of Aristotle and were formulated by St. Thomas Aquinas as the bases for all learning and teaching. A story, usually from the Bible, containing a doctrinal or moral truth is presented by the teacher; explanation of the religious elements to be learned is followed by practical application to daily living. The inductive process of teaching from the known to the unknown, from the concrete to the abstract, was a major improvement over the hitherto prevailing word analysis of the catechism answers.

MUNIFICENTISSIMUS DEUS

On Nov. 1, 1950, Pope Pius XII defined the Church’s doctrine of the ASSUMPTION OF MARY into heaven. The phrase Munificentissimus Deus (Most Bountiful God) both entitles and begins the document of definition, an apostolic constitution.

Apart from its survey of various descriptions and defenses of the Assumption, and the definition itself, this papal bull has established itself as a milestone in the history of MARIOLOGY for: (1) the capital significance which the Pope gives to the universal contemporary belief in the Assumption as evidenced by the almost unanimous concurrence of the bishops of the world when he asked their opinion: “This outstanding agreement of the Catholic prelates and the faithful by itself and in a way altogether certain and free of all errors, manifested this privilege as a truth revealed by God and contained in that divine deposit which Christ has delivered to His Spouse to be guarded faithfully and to be taught infallibly”; (2) the lack of systematic appeal to Holy Scripture as basis for the proclamation. The Pope states that all the “proofs and considerations of the Fathers and theologians are based on the Scriptures as their ultimate foundation,” but he does not analyze individual texts (as did Pius IX in Ineffa- bilis Deus, the definition of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). It is noteworthy that (1), despite the long history of differences on the meaning of the PROTO-EVANGELIUM (Gn. 3.15), he forthrightly applies the text to Mary; (2) without any exegetic reservation he alludes to “theologians and preachers who, following in the footsteps of the Fathers, have been rather free in their use of events and expressions taken from Sacred Scripture”; (3) with approval he refers to St. Bonaventure who applied to Mary “in a kind of accommodated sense” words of the Canticle (8.5) which helped to justify, in the original sermon, belief in the Assumption.

Then, after drawing practical moral consequences from this belief, the document concludes with the solemn statement: “We pronounce, declare, and define it to be a divinely revealed dogma that the Immaculate Mother of God, the ever Virgin Mary, having completed the course of her earthly life, was assumed body and soul into heavenly glory.”

MUÑOZ, VICENTE

Franciscan architect; b. Seville, Spain, 1699; d. Salta, Argentina, Sept. 8, 1784. He entered the convent of Buenos Aires as a Franciscan novice on July 7, 1741. Muñoz directed the building of the church of San Francisco in Buenos Aires, begun in 1730 with plans formulated by Andrés Blanqui, SJ. Since the church was not inaugurated until 1754, Muñoz probably carried out the major part of the work. Years later, when the convent was rebuilt, he again acted as builder and director. Muñoz also directed the work on the chapel of Terciarios de San Roque in Buenos Aires. Muñoz, called to Córdoba to complete work on the cathedral (begun in 1690 by architect José González Merguelte and continued in 1729 by Blanqui), probably designed its majestic dome, equalled in beauty by few works in all America. In 1759 he moved to Salta to direct the work of the new Franciscan church. Although there is no documentary proof that the plans were by Muñoz, the similarity of the dome to that of the cathedral of Córdoba suggests that he was the author. In 1882 the forward part of this church was completely remodeled by Luis Giorgi, and at present Muñoz is credited with the design of San Francisco de Salta only from the transept back. Although there is no proof that he planned the buildings mentioned above, it is certain that he was their builder, a fact that attests to the exceptional quality of his skills as a technician.

MÜNZER, THOMAS

Revolutionary sixteenth-century Anabaptist leader who fatefully influenced the Catholic and Protestant attitude toward the Anabaptist movement; b. Stolberg, Germany, before 1490 (1468?); d. Mühlhausen, Germany, May 27, 1525. After studying at universities in Leipzig and Frankfurt an der Oder, he was ordained and served for a time as convent chaplain. At the Leipzig Disputation in 1519 he met Luther, who recommended that Münzer serve a church in Zwickau (1520). In this socially unstable environment Münzer came under the influence of Nicolaus Storch and his Zwickau prophets, which led him to accept direct communication with God, rejecting Luther’s reliance on the written word. Expelled from Zwickau (1521), he wandered about Central Europe until he was invited in 1523 to serve a church in Allsted in Electoral Saxony. Münzer proved to be a successful and eloquent preacher. He produced the first complete German liturgy, which anticipated Luther and influenced liturgical development. Involved in agitation against local authorities, Münzer organized a secret confederation consisting of peasants and miners from neighboring Mansfeld. In a command performance sermon preached on July 13, 1524, he vainly attempted to win John of Saxony, brother of Frederick the Wise, to his plan to establish a theocratic state. Opposed by Luther and forbidden to preach, Münzer fled to Mühlhausen, where he aided Heinrich Pfeiffer in making the city a center of the peasant revolt. He soon joined a roving, undisciplined, and poorly equipped army of peasants whom he encouraged with his apocalyptic preaching. Captured and tortured after their rout at Frankenhausen (1525), he recanted his political and religious views before execution. Replacing Luther's justification by faith with justification by suffering and Luther's distinction between the two kingdoms with theocratic millennial hopes, Münzer obtained religious certainty through dreams and visions. When these proved to be delusions he collapsed. Erroneously considered the typical Anabaptist by the Protestant reformers and the typical chaotic consequence of the Reformation by Catholics, Münzer became a symbol, distorting both Protestant and Catholic interpretations of the Reformation. His later popularity among Marxists as an early communist is based upon a misinterpretation of the records.

MURATORI, LODOVICO ANTONIO

Italian historian; b. Vignola, Italy, Oct. 21, 1672; d. Modena, Jan. 23, 1750. He began his brilliant scholarly career in 1695 as Doctor of the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana in Milan. Declining other offers, such as that of Victor Amadeus II who wanted him for the University of Turin, Muratori returned to Modena in 1700 as ducal archivist. There he devoted himself to the history of the political life of the ESTE family; his work Antichità estensi (2 v., Modena 1717, 1740), the basis of his fame as a historian, grew out of his several studies on the current legal struggle between Pope CLEMENT XI and Emperor Joseph I for possession of the city of Comacchio. At the suggestion of Apostolo Zeno, Muratori began collecting the works of historians of the Italian Middle Ages, Rerum Italicarum scriptores (27 v., Modena 1723–38; v. 28 posthumously pub. in 1751; 2d ed., Città di Castello 1900). This work, together with his other publications of sources, Antiquitates Italicae medii aevi (6 v., Milan 1738–43) and Novus thesaurus veterum inscriptionum (6 v., Milan 1739–43), marked Muratori as the founder and initiator of modern Italian historiography. In his 12-volume Annali d'Italia (Milan 1744–49), deliberately patterned on MABILLON's annals of the Benedictine Order, Muratori did not succeed in really elaborating his source material, but his Annali do represent the first large-scale attempt at a unified view of Italian history. A conscientious priest as well as a historian, Muratori was unswerving in his recognition of ecclesiastical authority in purely theological questions, but he consistently and trenchantly held that historical criticism should be brought to bear on the secular phenomena of the Church. This brought him into conflict with current ecclesiastical opinion in regard to the power of the PAPACY and the cult of the saints (see HAGIOGRAPHY). His moderate reformist ideas, especially his demand for freedom of science and scholarship, even in questions of religion, mark him as a representative advocate of "enlightened Catholicism" [see especially his work De ingeniorum moderatione in religionibus negotio (Paris 1714)].

MURATORIAN CANON

Discovered by L. A. MURATORI in the Ambrosian Library at Milan in 1740, the Muratorian fragment is the oldest known canon of the New Testament. The Milan copy, which seems to have come from Bobbio, is hardly older than the eighth century. Mutilated at both ends, it contains 85 lines. Four fragments, probably of the 11th and 12th centuries, were found at Monte Cassino.

The date of composition is clear from lines 74–77: “Very recently [nuperrime], in our times, Hermas wrote the Shepherd, when his brother, Bishop Pius, was sitting in the chair of the Church of the City of Rome” (see HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF). The pontificate of Pius I was about A.D. 142–155.

The poor Latin suggests that the original was Greek. Additionally, the neuter plural subject with singular verb (alia plura . . . recipi non potest: lines 65–67) is normal in Greek, but barbarous in Latin. Most of the literature of the Roman Church at this time was in Greek, but Latin was also in use by the end of the second century, and there were at that time Latin translations of at least part of Scripture. Moreover, the play on words in lines 67–68, fel cum melle misceri non congruit, could not be made in Greek. Perhaps the translator substituted a current Latin saying for a different original.

It is uncertain who composed this canon. Clement of Alexandria, Melito of Sardes, Polycrates of Ephesus, Pope Victor, Pope St. Zephyrinus, and St. Hippolytus have been suggested as possible authors. The last, the first antipope, is the most favored. From the way it speaks of the city, the canon seems to have been written at Rome. It uses a tone of authority, which would accord with one who claimed to be pope; e.g., it says firmly that some works attributed to St. Paul “cannot be received in the Catholic Church,” and, “We receive only the Apocalypses of John and Peter.” Moreover, the canon strongly argues, against the Roman priest Caius, that St. John the Apostle wrote both the fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse. The arguments used are thought to come from Hippolytus. M. J. Lagrange [Revue biblique 42 (1933) 182] cites Denys bar-Salibi, a 12th-century Syrian: “Hippolytus says that John, writing . . . 13 Epistles, wrote them to seven churches” (cf. lines 48–50 of the canon). Yet these arguments are not conclusive; the author might be merely citing general belief or decisions of authority. Nor would Hippolytus have used a tone of authority before c. 217, when he laid claim to the papacy, but that was not soon after the papacy of Pius I (cf. lines 74–77). For the contents, see CANON, BIBLICAL 3.

MURBACH, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey in Upper Alsace, near Colmar, France, on the Murbach River; one of the most important German abbeys of the Middle Ages. It was founded a little before 728 by Count Eberhard, and St. PIRMIN of Reichenau. It soon received great prerogatives: vast possessions, EXEMPTION from episcopal jurisdiction, and autonomy under the Holy See. Murbach enjoyed its finest era in Carolingian times, when it had an important community, schools, and a rich library. Deserted in the 11th century during the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, it was quickly reestablished during the 12th century; its beautiful church, of which some parts still remain, was built at that time. During the 13th century the abbot ranked among the princes of the empire, and Murbach was imperial territory. But at the end of that century the abbey suffered a decline—a decline even more pronounced in the 14th century when the abbey would accept only noblemen. Common life was abandoned in the 15th century. From the 14th century the prince abbots of Murbach were also the abbots of Lure, in the Diocese of Besançon; and in 1560 Pius IV permanently united the two monasteries, both then held in COMMENDATION. The affiliation of Murbach with the Swiss Benedictines in 1666 and then with the congregation of Strasbourg in 1715 proved to be vain attempts at restoring the common life. In 1764 the monks obtained the right to become secular clerics and moved to the neighboring town of Guebwiller. A riot on July 26 and 27, 1789, destroyed this chapter of CANONS composed exclusively of noblemen.

MURI, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey, formerly in Aargau, Diocese of Basel, Switzerland; since 1845 in the former Augustinian monastery of Gries in Bolzano, Italy. It was founded in 1027 by the Hapsburgs as a family cloister and settled from EINSIEDELN. The first prior, Reginbold (1032–55), built the convent. The church, a Romanesque three-nave, flat-roof basilica with two towers, was consecrated in 1064; and in 1065 the provost became an abbot. In 1082, as the customary of FRUTTUARIA was introduced from SANKT BLASIEN, Muri was detached from the Hapsburgs, who became advocati. The abbey came under imperial (1114) and papal (1139) protection. The Acta Murensia, begun c. 1150, offer data on the early Hapsburgs. In the 14th century fire damaged the abbey twice; in 1431 the right of advocatus went to the Swiss Confederation. Pontifical privileges were granted to the abbots in 1507. The Reformation brought Muri, which had accumulated extensive possessions, to the brink of ruin; but Abbot Johann Jodokus Singeisen (1596–1644) applied Tridentine reforms, helped found the Swiss Benedictine Congregation (1602), and raised Muri to new heights. In 1622 the abbey became exempt from the bishop of Constance. Placidus Zurlauben (1684–1723) was made a prince of the empire (1701) after he acquired new lands, making Muri the richest abbey in Switzerland. Decline began with restrictions by the Helvetic Republic, and secularization by Aargau occurred in 1841. Austria offered a refuge to the monks in Gries; the abbot, however, retains his title of Muri. Since 1841 the abbey has cared for the Swiss Gymnasium in Sarnen. The buildings in Muri now house a mental institution; and the church, which was rebuilt (1694–97), now serves a parish. The stained-glass windows, as well as the library went to Aargau.

MURIALDO, LEONARDO, BL.

Founder of the Congregation of St. Joseph (Turin); b. Turin, Italy, Oct. 26, 1828; d. Turin, March 30, 1900. Murialdo studied theology in the university of Turin, where he obtained a doctorate (1850) and was ordained (1851). He then devoted himself to the education of poor boys, and in 1857 he became director of the oratory of San Luigi, offered to him by St. John BOSCO. To improve his pedagogical talents and to familiarize himself with the French school of spirituality, Murialdo attended the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris (1865–66). Upon returning to Turin he was named rector of the Collegio Artigianelli, which aimed to supply poor youths between the ages of 8 and 24 with Christian education and training in a trade. Under Murialdo's leadership the school gained a high reputation for its modern methods of vocational guidance and for its superior teaching staff.

In 1873 Murialdo founded the Pious Congregation of St. Joseph (Turin) and became its superior general. As one of the first in Italy to promote the Catholic worker movement, he established Catholic workers' unions (Unione Operaie Cattoliche, 1871) in Turin and began the weekly publication La Voce dell'Operaio. To effect the Christian renewal of society and win liberty for the Church, Murialdo participated actively in the Opera dei Congressi, served on Catholic committees, and initiated many Catholic associations. At the sixth Catholic Congress in Naples (1883), he established a national federation of societies to improve the press and founded the monthly La buona stampa. In beatifying him (Nov. 3, 1963), Paul VI remarked that the Church was exalting not only his personal virtues, but also “the social force that these virtues clothe.” Murialdo's remains are venerated in the church of St. Barbara in Turin.

MURIEL, DOMINGO

Jesuit philosopher and canonist; b. Tamanes, near Salamanca, Spain, 1718; d. Faenza, Italy, Jan. 23, 1795. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1734, and was sent to Rio de la Plata in 1748. As professor of philosophy in Córdoba, he introduced the “new or Cartesian philosophy.” He was subsequently a professor of moral theology and canon law, rector of the Colegio of Monserrat, and secretary to the provincial. In 1762 he was selected as procurator at the courts of Madrid and Rome; he was in Spain at the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767. During his exile in the Papal States, he was rector and provincial of the province of Paraguay with headquarters in Faenza. The general opinion of his holiness was such that the cause of his beatification was initiated soon after his death. No less distinguished for his knowledge than for his sanctity, he wrote the Fasti novi orbis et ordinationum apostolicarum ad Indias pertinentium breviarium (Venice 1786), and Rudimenta Juris Naturae et Gentium (Venice 1791), as well as several unpublished writings in the archives of Italy and Spain, such as the “Collectanea dogmática de saeculo XVIII” and “Monumenta historica, chronologica, dogmática ab anno 1776 ad annum 1780.” Among Muriel’s published writings that do not, however, bear his name is his Lettre à l’auteur de l’article jésuite dans le Dictionnaire Encyclopédique (1766). He also wrote the Breve noticia de las misiones vivas de la Compañía de Jesús en la provincia del Paraguay (1766).

MURILLO, BARTOLOMÉ ESTEBAN

Painter of the “golden age” of Spanish baroque; b. Seville, 1617 (baptized Jan. 1, 1618); d. Seville, April 3, 1682. He was a devout man who for a time aspired to the priesthood; his daughter became a Dominican and his son a Franciscan. Orphaned at an early age, he earned a livelihood by painting cheap religious pictures until he studied (1642–45) at the royal galleries in Madrid under Velázquez, from whom he learned a great deal. Murillo then became the favorite artist of Seville’s aristocratic class and the universally popular interpreter of the Immaculate Conception. His first effort on this theme resembles the earlier Ribera in grandiosity; such works, at Aranjuez and the Prado (Madrid), adumbrate the rococo. Among Murillo’s other renowned works are The Angels’ Kitchen, St. Elizabeth Healing the Sick, St. Francis with the Crucified Christ, and the Vision of St. Anthony. His religious work is distinctively baroque in its brilliant coloring and preference for beauty that tends toward intimacy and prettiness, and away from classical perfection and the spiritual realities (the estilo vaporoso). This same spirit marks his paintings of childhood, such as Children with a Shell and Little St. John, and his secular subjects are unique in Spanish painting as clearly foretelling the spontaneity of composition, lightness of movement, and decorativeness of the eighteenth century. The best of these is the charm-

MURNER, THOMAS

Satirist and vigorous foe of Luther; b. Oberehnheim, Alsace, Dec. 24, 1475; d. Oberehnheim, Aug. 22, 1537. Murner entered the Order of Friars Minor Conventual at the age of 15 and was ordained when he was 19. Between 1495 and 1502 he traveled in France, Germany, and Poland, studying at Freiburg, and receiving the M.A. degree at Paris, and the Th.B. at Cracow. He returned to Strassburg in 1502. In 1506 Emperor Maximilian I made him poet laureate. He criticized in satire the abuses of the Church, and welcomed the reformers until they attacked dogmas and tradition. From this time he became the champion of Catholicism at Strassburg against Lutheranism and at Lucerne against Zwinglianism. The Peace of Zurich in 1529 stipulated that Murner be brought to trial before judges of the Protestant cantons, but he fled to the Palatinate. In 1530 he returned to Oberehnhelm, where he remained until his death. Murner represents the contrasts of his age. He was ardent for reform, yet crude in his writings; passionate for novelties, but an advocate of tradition; frivolous and grave, restless and tormented with the contradictions of the time.

Murner's works include Chartiludium logicae (Cracow 1507); Ludus studentum Friburgensium (Frankfort 1512); Arma patientiae, Germania nova, Narrenbeschwörung (Strassburg, 1519); Der lutherischen evangelischen Kirchendieb und Ketzerkalender (Lucerne 1526); translation of the Defense of the Seven Sacraments by Henry VIII (Strassburg 1522); and Causa helvetica orthodoxae fidei (Lucerne 1528).

MURPHY, JOHN

Spiritual director, preacher; b. Dublin, Dec. 29, 1710; d. Dublin, July 3, 1753. He was the son of Bryan Murphy, tallow chandler of Thomas Street, Dublin, and Alice McMahon. Bryan, deprived of his father by the Williamite wars, through apprenticeship had been brought up a Presbyterian, but returned to the Church on his deathbed. John showed early promise, was sent to Santiago in 1727, and then went to Salamanca, where his brilliance, linguistic ability, and ascetic spirit made a notable impression. Ill health compelled his return to Dublin, where he was ordained. His priestly ministry was remarkable for charity, preaching that attracted many non-Catholics, and extraordinary influence with the crowds in a time of many riots. Tireless in counteracting the effects of the Charter Schools, in providing for orphans, in caring for the wayward, he undermined a weak constitution by his unremitting apostolate in Dean Swift's Dublin, coupled with his self-mortification. Though a canon, he remained always an assistant priest in his native parish of St. Catherine. In 1750 he visited Rome to solicit help in the struggle against the Charter Schools and received the Doctory of Divinity degree. His funeral evoked an extraordinary manifestation of public grief, noted by the Protestant press of the day.

MURPHY, JOHN JOSEPH

Publisher and printer; b. County Tyrone, Ireland, March 12, 1812; d. Baltimore, MD, May 27, 1880. His parents, Bernard and Mary (McCullough) Murphy, immigrated to Delaware when John was ten years old. After attending New Castle Academy, Delaware, he learned printing in Philadelphia and about 1835 moved to Baltimore where he established a book and stationery store. He married Margaret E. O'Donnoghue (1852), who died in 1869; they had seven children. During his publishing career, which began in 1836, he issued 1,458 editions of 817 titles, the peak year being 1860 with 91 imprints. Spiritual reading and devotional works constituted the largest category with 100 entries, the most famous being Cardinal Gibbons's The Faith of Our Fathers, which sold more than two million copies. As the publisher of documents pertaining to the dogma of the Immaculate Conception he was awarded a papal gold medal in 1855; for the Acta et Decreta of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (see BALTIMORE, COUNCILS OF), he was given the title of "Typographer of the Holy See." In the field of serials, he published the U.S. Catholic Magazine (1842–49), later absorbed by the Catholic Mirror. He launched one of the earliest Catholic juveniles, the Catholic Youth Magazine (1857–61), and was the publisher (1859–61) of the Metropolitan Catholic Almanac and Laity's Directory, begun (1833) as the U.S. Catholic Almanac. The Murphy imprint appeared on many speeches, especially of those of congressmen, on five by Jefferson Davis, for example, and on several by Stephen Douglas. For a quarter of a century he published for the Maryland Historical Society of which he was a member. The Murphy firm was dissolved in 1943 and the New York firm of P. J. Kenedy took over the assets.

MURRAY, DANIEL

Archbishop of Dublin; b. near Arklow, County Wicklow, April 18, 1768; d. Dublin, Feb. 26, 1852. After studies at the Irish College in Salamanca, Spain, he was ordained (1792) and then served as a curate in Dublin and Arklow. At the request of the aged Archbishop John TROY of Dublin, Murray was consecrated his coadjutor bishop with the right of succession (1809). A man of gentle manner and moderate views, Murray was active at a critical time for the Church in Ireland. He was president of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth (1812–13). His deep involvement in the veto controversy caused him to visit Rome in 1814 and again in 1815 to oppose granting the British government a veto over Irish ecclesiastical appointments. Largely because of Irish opposition, the veto proposal was dropped. As archbishop of Dublin (1823–52), Murray devoted much attention to providing schools and hospitals, especially for the poor. With Mary AIKENHEAD he founded the Irish Sisters of Charity (1811). Under his patronage Catherine MCAULEY introduced the Sisters of Mercy in Ireland, and Frances BALL established the Ladies of Loretto in Dublin. Murray encouraged the Irish Christian Brothers to work in his diocese. During the struggle for Catholic EMANCIPATION, Murray was an active supporter of the Catholic Association. His political views were always Whig rather than nationalist. Usually he avoided political controversy, but he did not hesitate to oppose Daniel O'CONNELL during the agitation to repeal Ireland's legislative union with England. Murray cooperated with the government in establishing the Commission for Charitable Donations and Bequests (1844–45), despite O'Connell's opposition. Murray also upheld the government's program for higher education (the so-called godless colleges) against O'Connell, Archbishop John MacHale, and the majority of the bishops. Successive British governments sought Murray's advice on matters concerning Catholics.

MURRAY, JOHN COURTNEY

Jesuit theologian and expert on Church-state relations; b. New York City, Sept. 12, 1904; d. New York City, Aug. 16, 1967; the son of Michael John and Margaret Courtney Murray; entered the Society of Jesus in 1920; ordained June 25, 1933. Murray was educated at Weston College (B.A., 1926), Boston College (M.A., 1927), Woodstock College in Maryland (S.T.L., 1934), and the Gregorian University in Rome (S.T.D., 1937). Upon completing his studies at the Gregorian University, he was appointed professor of dogmatic theology at Woodstock, the Jesuit theological seminary for the Maryland province, where he remained on the staff until his death. He was one of the chief editors of the scholarly quarterly, Theological Studies (1941–1967); visiting professor of Medieval Philosophy and Culture at Yale (1951–52); and noted peritus at Vatican Council II. He also served as director of the John La Farge Institute in New York City, a center for the interreligious and interracial dialogue that was Murray's life-long commitment.

Murray first gained prominence through a series of literary debates on the questions of ecumenical cooperation, religious freedom, and the Church-state relationship. Convinced that the Catholic Church could not accomplish a redemptive purpose in society and history on its own, he began to promote what was then known as "inter-religious cooperation." This led to several bishops and theologians accusing him of promoting indifference. At the same time, many Jews and Protestants were equally suspicious of Catholic motives in "inter-religious cooperation," fearing that the Catholic Church would infringe on the religious freedom of non-Catholics. Writing in Theological Studies along with two other prominent Jesuits, John La Farge and Wilfried Parsons, Murray defended his view on Church-state relations and religious freedom against the attacks of several conservative theologians, notably Francis CONNELL C.Ss.R., Joseph Clifford FENTON and George Shea, writing in the American Ecclesiastical Review. The discussion continued in the two journals for more than eight years, and attracted national and international attention. In the debates, Murray strongly insisted that the American system of Church-state relations was in fact the most desirable form and should be acknowledged as such by the Vatican.

Murray's view attracted the criticism of Cardinal Ottaviani, secretary of the Holy Office, who denounced Murray's stance without naming him in a lecture on the duties of a Catholic state toward religion on March 5, 1953. After being assured by PIUS XII'S private secretary, Robert Leiber, S.J. that Ottaviani's views were his own, and by other sources that Pius XII's subsequent speech in December 1953 on tolerance was a diplomatic repudiation of Ottaviani, Murray delivered a lecture at THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in March 1954 where he publicly stated that Pius XII had repudiated the position of Ottaviani on church-state relations. After learning of this, Ottaviani initiated a formal investigation into Murray's views. At a session on July 7, 1954, the Holy Office held that Murray's views, summarized in four propositions, were condemned as "erroneous." These were communicated to Murray by the Jesuit Father General in 1954. The Holy Office also attempted, without success, to halt the publication of a book by the University of Notre Dame Press that contained an essay of Murray's that was deemed objectionable. In October 1954, Murray's chief critics, Fenton and Connell, were given copies of the four propositions against Murray and informed of the measures against him, but they were told that these measures were to be kept under wraps.

Under pressure from the Holy Office, Murray's Jesuit superiors in Rome requested that he stop speaking and writing on the topic. When his 1955 essay to clarify and defend his position was rejected by the Roman censor, Murray was advised by his Jesuit superiors to withdraw from this area of enquiry. After another attempt in 1958 to clarify his stance was refused permission, Murray turned to what he called a "public philosophy," a set of principles derived from natural law that could serve as the foundation of a pluralistic society, providing the criteria for addressing social-ethical issues. In 1960, a selection of his many essays on this issue was published as We Hold These Truths: Reflections on the American Proposition, which subsequently earned him a place on the cover of Time magazine.

During the second session of Vatican Council II, Murray became one of the most influential and best known periti from the United States. Notwithstanding the repudiation of his views in the Theological Commission's first draft on Church and state, Cardinal Spellman secured Murray's appointment as a peritus, enabling him to be the U.S. bishops' chief adviser on Church-state matters. Murray was entrusted by Cardinal BEA and his committee with the task of rewriting the Declaration on Religious Freedom (Dignitatis humanae), following the suggestions of the Council fathers in the second session. The final draft of the document, promulgated in 1965, adheres for the most part to the language and reasoning of Murray. In addition, his many appearances before various national groups of bishops contributed to the successful acceptance of his ideas on religious freedom by the Council. He spent the final two years of his life writing and lecturing on the Declaration on Religious Freedom.

In addition to many periodical articles, Murray is the author of the following books: We Hold These Truths (1961), The Problem of God (1963), Yesterday and Today (1963), Problems of Religious Freedom (1965), and editor of Religious Liberty, An End and A Beginning (1966). A selection of Murray's important writings may be found in J. C. Murray, Bridging the Sacred and the Secular: Selected Writings, ed. J. L. Hooper (Washington, DC 1994).

MURRAY, PATRICK

Theologian; b. Clones, County Monaghan, Ireland, Nov. 18, 1811; d. Maynooth, Nov. 15, 1882. He entered Maynooth in 1829 and was elected a Dunboyne scholar, which meant three years of graduate study. He was appointed to a chair in theology and occupied it until his death. His major theological work, De Ecclesia Christi (3 v. Dublin 1860–66), was long a source book for Catholic controversialists. He was intensely interested in the theological education of the laity and wrote four volumes of Essays, Chiefly Theological (Dublin 1850–53) for this purpose. At his death he was prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment, revered for his kindness as a professor, for his holiness of life and for his intellectual gifts.

MURRI, ROMOLO

Italian priest, sociologist, politician, publicist, Modernist; b. Montesampietrangeli (Ascoli Piceno), Aug. 27, 1870; d. Rome, March 12, 1944. After ordination (1893) he studied at the University of Rome, founded the Catholic periodical Vita nuova, participated in the origins of the Federazione universitaria cattolica italiana, and adhered enthusiastically to the Catholic social movement and to Christian Democracy. Cultura sociale, a periodical begun by him in 1898, advocated a new political and social direction for Catholic activity. Soon he came into conflict with the leadership of the Opera dei Congressi and its president, Giambattista Paganuzzi, and guided a group, composed mostly of young persons, that was eager for independence and for predominance in the entire Catholic movement. Murri was unable to reach an understanding even with the second (social) group of the Opera dei Congressi, the one most open and disposed to collaborate, because of the ever more direct intervention of the Holy See in the Catholic social movement during the last years of Pope Leo XIII. The widening of the conflict induced Pope Pius X to suppress the Opera dei Congressi and to reorganize on other bases Italian CATHOLIC ACTION. Murri became discontented, partly because he was not placed in charge, and founded the Lega democratica nazionale, condemned by Pope Pius X in 1906. Passing from the political to the doctrinal field, Murri showed himself favorable to philosophico-theological modernism, in rebellion against the hierarchy. In 1907 Murri was suspended a divinis, and in 1909 he was excommunicated. Some of his best disciples then abandoned him. He continued his conflict in the new Rivista di cultura, the organ of the Lega democratica nazionale. Turning again to political life, he was elected a deputy (1909) and joined the extreme left. After losing all his political influence, he devoted himself to writing for the liberal press. Murri was a very talented man and a prolific author who could arouse enthusiasm, but who was incapable of directing a movement or collaborating with one. He returned to the Church in 1943.

MUSIC (PHILOSOPHY)

Initially music (Lat. musica, Gr. μουσική [τέχνη]) was employed in a broad sense to signify any human art over which the nine Muses presided. It was then gradually restricted in meaning to signify the fine art of combining vocal and instrumental sounds into rhythmic, melodic, and harmonic structure. It is generally regarded as the most moving emotionally of all the arts. Since the concern of philosophers with music is summarized in their attempts to arrive at ever more precise definitions, this article explores in a summary fashion the positions of a number of philosophers on the nature of music.

Greek Thought. Among available documents, the fragments of the Pythagoreans are the oldest. Their principal interest in music was to discern the mysterious role of number in the physicomathematical order. By means of this investigation, they discovered three important truths about music: (1) tonal intervals can be described by fixed numerical relations; (2) harmony is produced by contraries (namely, high and low sounds); and (3) an analogy exists between geometric and musical harmony inasmuch as (a) musical harmony has a continuity similar to the continuity of various geometric figures and solids, and (b) musical harmonies can involve inverted proportions. (See PYTHAGORAS AND PYTHAGOREANS.)

Plato. The divine origin of harmony and rhythm was emphasized by PLATO. Thus God has produced in man the natural inclination to produce harmony and rhythm, not at random, but ultimately in imitation of spiritual harmony (Ion 534D, E). Mathematics, according to Plato, is of considerable help in making a clear delineation of rhythms and harmonies (Rep. 400). In the Laws (812C), he describes music as "the movement of melodies imitating the soul agitated by the passions."

Aristotle. In general, ARISTOTLE accepts what his predecessors have said about music (Pol. 1340a 14–19; 1340b 5–10; 1341b 8–15, 23–40). In his extended consideration of music in the Politics (1339a 11–1342b 33), he discusses the role of music in the education of youth, and in this context manifests certain formalities about music not previously recognized or made explicit. Aristotle agrees with the common view that music imitates the movement of human emotions (Poet. 1447a 20–25; Pol. 1340a 19–1340b 10). But since human emotions are related to human action, music imitates artistically human action as well, and therefore should first be examined in a general consideration of all the arts (Poet. 1447a 14–17).

In the extant writings of Aristotle there is not much treatment of music distinctively as an art form. In some agreement with Plato, Aristotle recognizes that the formal principles for disposing musical matter are derived from mathematics; arithmetic provides number, which ensures proportion within and among rhythms and harmonies, and geometry serves as the foundation for conceiving and achieving musical coherence (cf. Phys. 194a 8; Meta. 1004a 6–8). Because of this special relation between music and mathematics, music is a distinct science and art (Anal. post. 76a 9–15, 23–25). Yet music has something in common with the arts of epic, tragedy, comedy, dithyrambic poetry, dancing, and painting (Poet. 1447a 20–1447b 15; 1448a 1–18; 1449a 1–12). From the general science of poetics, music derives the distinction of meters and their capacity for mutual order with a view to signifying epic, tragic, or comic action (ibid.). In this way, music can be understood to signify the order of human emotions as related particularly to these three types of action.

Since man is naturally inclined to be iambic in speech, Aristotle maintains that the iamb is the natural meter (ibid. 1449a 24–27). The external use of the iamb, however, is traceable to the human inclination to resolve problems; and the iamb contains the sign of indecisiveness (the "arsis" or light measure) as its first part, the sign of decisiveness (the "thesis" or weighty measure) as its second part. Thus iambic music, or music wherein the iamb is the architectonic and regulating meter, is especially apt to help man develop his natural propensity to speak and move decisively, and, indirectly, to judge decisively (Pol. 1340a 16–19; 1340a 40–1340b 14; 1341a 3–9).

Aristotle goes on to discuss the musical “modes,” which are established by the proportion of harmony to rhythm (Pol. 1341a 17–1342b 17). Thus the Doric mode is the best for the training of young persons because the Doric harmonies have the best proportion to iambic meter, whereas the proportion of the Lydian harmonies to the iamb is not very clear and is, therefore, more suitable for very young children and elderly persons (Pol. 1342a 1–1342b 30).

Plotinus and the Prescholastic Tradition. PLOTINUS starts his examination of music by observing that its ulterior purpose is to bear the listener beyond nature, to the highest beauty, whereby the soul, being beautified, becomes like God (Enneads 1.6.6). More generally, however (and here Plotinus makes explicit a truth generally presupposed in Aristotle’s discussions), music has the poetic purpose of making man attentive to some truth that should be examined (ibid. 4.4.40). This it accomplishes by binding his irrational appetites. As regards the signification of the meters, Plotinus notes that the art concerning sounds is analogous to “intelligible rhythm” (ibid. 5.9.11).

The contributions of St. AUGUSTINE to traditional doctrine on music are considerable. Observing the proportion between musical continuity and the muscular control exercised by the singer, he describes music as “the science of good modulation.” Since this proportion has a similar effect upon the listener, he goes on to say that music is the science moving man “by the preserved dimensions of tempi and intervals” (Musica 1.2–3). On the basis of the foregoing, music is a principle whereby man can know, analogously, the harmony of God’s government (Epist. 166.5.13); and, from the knowledge of the immutable numbers in music, one can analogize to immutable Truth (Musica 6; Retract. 1.11).

In addition to his extensive consideration of the relation between mathematics and music, BOETHIUS distinguishes three types of music: (1) mundane, found especially in the phenomena of the heavens; (2) human, which gives the incorporeal vivacity of reason to the body and reconciles the rational and irrational parts of the soul; and (3) that which enables instruments to serve melody (De instit. mus. 1. 2). According to his description of “human” music, then, one purpose of music is to counteract sluggishness in the body and its faculties (ibid. 5.2).

Whether Boethius arrived at this conclusion on his own or because of his close friendship with CASSIODORUS is hard to discern. One of the best read and most extensive writers on music during the early Middle Ages, Cassiodorus was more interested in proportion and harmony as achieved in musical works than under their strictly mathematical aspects. He describes music as “the discipline which examines the differences and accords among mutually congruous things, that is, sounds” (Comm. in Ps. 97). The suggested analogous supposition of the term “sounds” is confirmed by his tenet that sonorous music is the symbol of all physical and moral harmony (Epist. ad Boeth.). This harmony is readily discerned in the first-accomplished, although nonprimary, effect of music, namely, pleasure in the experience of bodily well-being and of the soul’s love for the body. Indeed, there is a mysterious bond between musical pleasure and supreme happiness, because aesthetic joy is a symbol of happiness in heaven; the satisfaction of the soul in music is especially analogous to the beatific vision because of the similarity in the respective effortless acts of the intellect (De anima 12).

Within its own scope, music frees man from the cares of life, distracts him from his occupations and pre-occupations, and raises him to fully interesting activities (Epist. ad Boeth.). Cassiodorus held that, by promoting fortitude, the Dorian mode promotes also modesty and chastity. By the use of harmonies of a range lower than those employed by the Greeks, the Phrygian mode can animate the soul to fight against evil, while the Lydian mode comforts the person who feels defeated (ibid.). According to Cassiodorus there are three parts of music, namely, harmony, rhythm, and meter (ibid.). Vocal music should observe the notes, pauses, accents, pedal melody, and “composition” of the phrase (ibid.). Finally, he mentions the fact that natural overtones and natural undertones are contained in the human voice as focused on distinct mid-range tones, and that this fact constitutes the basic meaning of “symphony” (or “sounding together”).

High Scholasticism and Grosseteste. Most of St. ALBERT THE GREAT’s important observations on music are contained in his Commentary on Aristotle’s Politics (bk. 8). In addition to his many references to Aristotle’s doctrine on music, St. THOMAS AQUINAS made a theological application of the Aristotelian summation, with further analyses, in his Commentary on Psalm 32.

The coherence of the tradition concerning music up to and including Aquinas is rather clear. ROBERT GROSSETESTE, however, introduced a subtle confusion that served to obscure this solid tradition for at least 6 centuries. As summarized by De Bruyne (Études d’Esthétique médiévale 3: 139–148), Grosseteste teaches that there are five fundamental proportionalities, identically repeated in a whole, from which is derived “all beauty, that is, all ‘concord,’ whatever the magnitudes may be.” This fundamental, universal, metaphysical principle is as true of plastic beauty as it is of sonic beauty (De luce 59). The five proportionalities are at the basis of harmony in the musical arts: music, dancing, and poetry (ibid.). Both sonic and visible forms can be represented by simple figures (De gen. sonorum 8). All these forms are reduced to movements, which can be measured and ordered according to the principles of spatial proportionality, as well as by time measures (De artibus liberalibus 2). One and the same discipline concerns the proportions in singing and in the movements of the body (ibid. 3). All artistic compositions, however, are regulated by the number ten and the simple relations that it contains, and the ethical effects of music are based upon the concordance between the proportionality in the soul and the proportionality of sensible nature (ibid.).

THOMAS OF YORK and ROGER BACON extend Grosseteste’s position, Bacon holding that music is the fundamental art, since, without it, grammar and the other arts of the trivium cannot possibly be learned with any thoroughness (Opus majus 4).

Here one has an attempted philosophical justification of formalistic music, that is, music without pulsation (or genuine modulation). The truths partially contained in Grosseteste’s position are that the proportions established by number do regulate artistic production; that geometry is a discipline that enables the artist to establish coherence (taken in its full analogous meaning) in the work he produces; and that what is directly imitated is natural movement (especially human motion). But by reducing all these truths to mathematical proportions, Grosseteste tends to destroy the hierarchy of artistic signification.

Renaissance and Modern Developments. A reaction against this position was manifested early in the RENAISSANCE by M. FICINO, who held that “love is the master of all the arts,” including music. Later G. VICO taught that, like poetry, music has divine and heroic characteristics; it is the expression of "the most violent passions of the nascent human race," and that, therefore, music is the first expression of man, coming before words and the reflections of the "pure mind" (Scienza nuova). Apparently, then, Vico was restoring the analogous signification of music; yet his dialectical language prevents one from establishing this point with certainty. He arrived at Roger Bacon's cited position, yet based upon another principle.

For G. W. LEIBNIZ, music is "a hidden arithmetical exercise of the mind not knowing how to number itself" (Epist. 154). According to Immanuel KANT, music is "a charming game concerned with the sensations of hearing" (The Critique of Judgment 1). He doubts whether it is truly an art, since it is "the pleasure which culture incites [the game of thoughts being the effect of a quasi-mechanical association] and, judged by reason, it has less value than any of the other beaux-arts" (ibid.). Finally, music is "a continuous commotion and excitation of the soul" (ibid.).

Friedrich Schlegel seems to revive Vico's position by holding that, since music expresses the most profound sentiments, it is analogous to philosophy. Arthur SCHOPENHAUER expands this doctrine by teaching that music has an absolute primacy over the other arts because of its inconfutably metaphysical character. Unlike the other arts, music represents the will, rather than ideas. It is an immediate objectivization. Richard WAGNER rejects Schopenhauer's conclusions, but agrees with him in his general position that music manifests the profound essence of things, especially the tragic aspect of human existence. Friedrich NIETZSCHE carries the implicit pessimism of these tenets to its logical extreme by holding that, since music is a Dionysian rather than a plastic-Apollinean art, it is concerned with the world of drunkenness and dreaming.

Recognizing that the foregoing positions involve almost a complete denial of music as a discipline, Eduard Hanslick maintains that the expression of sentiments does not constitute the content of music, and that specifically musical beauty consists only in sounds and their artistic arrangement. Paul Hindemith and Igor Stravinsky have espoused Hanslick's theory as accenting the most important aspect in the act of composing.

The Nature of Music. As is evident from the foregoing, direct contributions to an essential definition of music seem to have ended with the propagation of Grosseteste's ultimate reduction of music to mathematics. From his predecessors, however, one can glean its basic elements and say that music is the art which, through the use of modulation and the mathematical delineation of rhythms and harmonies (and, possibly, with the aid of established modes), imitates human emotions as engaged in epic or dramatic action, with the direct aim of recreational contemplation, which indirectly promotes man in the moral good. This definition corresponds with the general position taken by critics and others on the nature of music.

Mention should finally be made of scholars and composers who have developed the science of music under its mathematical and acoustical aspects. In fact, a knowledge of this development, together with a thorough acquaintance with the works representing the whole history of music, and a knowledge of contemporary acoustical research, are all needed for a full appreciation of the philosophical tradition concerned with this subject.

MUSO, CORNELIUS

Theologian; b. Piacenza, April 16, 1511; d. Rome, Jan. 9, 1574. He joined the Conventual Franciscans at Piacenza, studied at the University of Padua, and taught metaphysics at the University of Pavia and theology at the University of Bologna. He was consecrated bishop of Bertinoro in 1541, and was transferred to Bitonto in 1544. Musso gave the inaugural address at the Council of TRENTO, and thereafter played a considerable role in the procedural sessions. He took a particularly active part in the discussions on the sources of revelation, original sin, justification, and the Sacraments. At the end of the council, he returned to his diocese to begin the work of reform. Opposition from the court of Naples forced him to give up this work and resign his see in 1572. His sermons fill eight volumes. Musso is faithful to BONAVENTURE and DUNS SCOTUS in theology; his chief works are: the De Deo Uno et Trino (Venice 1585), Commentaria in b. Pauli Epistolam ad Romanos (Venice 1588), and De Divina Historia Libri III (Venice 1585, 1587).

MU'TAZILITES

The earliest important theological school of ISLAM. The name (Arabic mu'tazila) is derived from the verb i'tazala, meaning "to separate oneself from." The first Mu'tazilites were political, those who "separated themselves from" both 'ALĪ and his opponents in the quarrel over the legitimacy of his succession to the caliphate. Later the term indicated the position that the Muslim grave sinner was neither believer, unbeliever, nor hypocrite, but simply a sinner (fāsiq).

History. The founders of the Mu'tazilite school were Wāṣil ibn 'Aṭā' (d. 748) and 'Amr ibn 'Ubayd (d. 762), both of Baṣra. But Abu'l-Hudhayl al-'Allāf (d. 840) was the true founder of Mu'tazilite dogmatics. Other prominent members of the Baṣra school were Mu'ammar, Hishām al-Fuwaṭī al-Aṣamm, and al-Nazzām. The Baghdad school was founded by Bishr ibn al-Mu'tamir (d. 826), and included such men as Thumāma ibn Ashras and Ibn Abī Du'ād. Under the Caliphs Ma'mūn, Mu'taṣim, and Wāthiq, Mu'tazilism was the state theology, and its teaching that the QUR'ĀN was created was enforced by a kind of inquisition (miḥna). The Caliph Mutawakkil was hostile to the Mu'tazilites, and from his time on the school gradually declined, though it long maintained centers in the eastern part of the empire. After the Mongol invasions it survived mainly among the Zaydites of YEMEN, where it still exists.

Teachings. There are divergencies in doctrine among the many Mu'tazilite doctors, yet nearly all have held the fundamental position expressed in the five basic principles commonly attributed to the Mu'tazilites. The first, pure monotheism (tawḥid), is the most important principle of Mu'tazilism, since it is the source of almost all its doctrines. God is one in the strictest sense. Anthropomorphisms are to be denied, or, when they occur in the Qur'ān, are to be interpreted symbolically. The attributes commonly assigned to God have only a figurative meaning and are in no way realities in or distinct from the divine essence. The Qur'ān is created. There is no beatific vision. Several solutions are proposed to the problems of creation and of God's relation to the created world.

The second principle concerns divine justice ('adl). God is supremely just. He always does what is best for His creation. He cannot will evil; hence man is personally responsible for his own moral acts. The Mu'tazilites insisted strongly on man's free will, a position that was practically rejected by later "orthodox" Muslim theology. The third principle, called "the promise and the threat" (al-wa'd wa'l-wa'īd), begot discussions concerning the final lot of the believer, sinner, and infidel; the nature of faith and unbelief; grave and light sins; legal questions in general; and the authenticity of traditions. The fourth was the intermediate state of the grave sinner (al-manzila bayna'l-manzilatayn). This is not clearly distinct from the two preceding principles. But the discussion of the grave sinner's state involved lengthy consideration of the caliphate and of the legitimacy of the first four caliphs. The fifth principle dealt with commanding good and forbidding evil. The expression is Qur'ānic (e.g., 3.106, 110). Disapproval of evil must be by word and deed, and even by the use of the sword. This was little discussed as time went on. The general framework of these five principles left much room for refinement and difference of opinion, and later discussions often developed into philosophical disputes.

Significance. The Mu'tazilites have sometimes been called rationalists, freethinkers, or liberals of Islam. They were rationalists only in the sense that they used rational argument in their teaching. To this they were forced by the necessity of defending Islam against the dualists (Manichaeans) and the followers of other religions, many of whom became halfhearted converts to Islam. It later became the practice of "orthodox" writers to vilify the Mu'tazilites in every possible way. Their writings were destroyed, so that the only surviving Mu'tazilite manuscript, apart from works preserved in Yemen, is the Kitāb al-Intiṣār, edited by Nyberg in 1925. Certain Zaydite manuscripts in Yemen may lead to a better knowledge of the Mu'tazilites and their teaching. By their polemic they certainly saved Islam from its early adversaries, and by their use of reasoning and philosophy they founded the science of KALĀM. They also contributed much to the development of the sciences of Qur'ān exegesis, jurisprudence, and tradition. Far from being liberal, they showed much intolerance when themselves protected by the state. They played an important role in the development of Muslim theology and profoundly influenced many of the "orthodox" theologians. Since the time of Muḥammad 'Abduh, the great Egyptian reformer (d. 1905), there have been indications of a revival of interest in the Mu'tazilites among Muslim thinkers, and even of a return to some of their principal theses. This "neo-Mu'tazilism" could have far-reaching effects on the development and direction of modern Islam.

MUTH, CARL

Journalist; b. Worms am Rhein, Jan. 31, 1867; d. Reichenhall (Bavaria), Nov. 15, 1944. His parents were devout Catholics, and his father's occupation as church painter brought young Carl early into contact with the problems of art and religion. Muth took six years of his gymnasium studies in Algiers, where the whole spiritual and intellectual ferment of French Catholicism was revealed to him under the influence of Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE. Muth abandoned early plans for mission work to devote himself to the study of political science and German philology in Giessen, Berlin, and Strassburg. During this time he contributed to the Mainzer Journal, was editor (1893–95) of the daily Der Elsässer (Strassburg), and published the family magazine Alte und Neue Welt, in which he concerned himself principally with the problem of modern literature. In an article "Wem gehört die Zukunft" (1893), he opposed the superstitious belief in progress inherent in materialism and began considering for the first time the possibilities of overcoming the "literary inferiority" of the Catholics in Germany, so as to liberate church and theology from their isolation.

With his polemical works published under the pseudonym of Veremundus (Steht die katholische Bellettristik auf der Höhe der Zeit?, and Die literarischen Aufgaben der deutschen Katholiken, 1899), he launched the "Catholic literary controversy" in which he had to fight on two fronts, against the intellectually unambitious in his own camp and against the "Enlighteners" hostile to the Church. He was severely critical of the literary backwardness of Catholic writers and critics, whom he reproached for "apathy and unconcern for the general artistic endeavors of the nation," denominational prejudice, moral and pedagogical narrowmindedness, and "a positively unbelievable prudery." Simultaneously Muth opposed modernism and its naturalistic and materialistic aberrations, proposing instead an idealistic philosophy. He won the debate with his key work, Wiedergeburt der Dichtung aus dem religiösen Erlebnis (1909), directed particularly against his principal opponent, Richard von Kralik and Viennese neoromanticism ("The Gral").

A stay in Paris brought Muth into contact with the renouveau catholique; this contact was crucial for his later development. The magazine Hochland (a monthly publication "for all fields of knowledge, literature, and art"), which he founded in 1903 to cope with the grave perils and difficulties besetting German Catholic literature, aimed at a "new encounter between Church and culture." Until World War I, Hochland's interests were mainly literary; only in 1916 did the magazine begin to devote attention to political and social problems. Muth became a champion of the concept of democracy within the still predominantly monarchically minded German Catholicism of those days. The essay "Res publica" (1926) typifies his political stand; it is a call to Catholics to become aware of their political responsibility and to cooperate actively in the fashioning of the new social order.

Muth believed that Europe's survival was dependent on the solution of the social question, on whether it would be possible to imbue social democracy with the sentiments and impulses of Christian brotherliness. He made an urgent appeal to all Christians (in "Die Stunde des Bürgertums," 1930) to abandon their antisocialist prejudices and to the socialists to get rid of their anti-Christian resentments. Muth was forthright in his opposition to the rising tide of national socialism (in Das dritte Reich und die Sturmvögel des Nationalsozialismus, 1931). Hochland maintained its stand even after Hitler had come to power and was banned only in 1941. It resumed publication in 1946 and remained in publication in Munich, under the direction of Muth's long-time associate Karl Schaezler.

MUTTATHUPANDATU, ALPHONSA, BL.

Baptized Anna and called Annakutty, also known as Sister Alphonsa of India, Alphonsa of the Immaculate Conception, Alphonsa of Bharananganam; mystic, virgin of the Syro-Malabar Poor Clares; b. Aug. 19, 1910, Arpukara, India; d. July 28, 1946, Bharananganam, India. The fourth child of Joseph Muttahupadathu and his wife Mary, who died shortly after her birth; her family ensured Annakutty was well educated in preparation for a good marriage. Recognizing her vocation to religious life, Annakutty rejected her suitors and disfigured herself with fire so that she would be unmarriageable. Thereafter she was permitted to join the tertiary Clarist sisters in their convent at Bharananganam (Pentecost 1927). With the veil of the postulant she received the name Alphonsa of the Immaculate Conception (Aug. 2, 1928). She became a novice on August 12, 1935 and made final vows the following year. Throughout her life she endured repeated illness and physical pain, but received the consolation of mystical union. She possessed the gift of prophecy and experienced a vision of Saint Thérèse of Lisieux. Alphonsa's death after a prolonged illness went almost unnoticed. However, when miracles were granted to Alphonsa's beloved school children through her intercession, her tomb at Bharananganam became a pilgrimage site. The diocesan process for her beatification began, Dec. 2, 1953, and a miracle wrought through Alphonsa's intercession was approved, July 6, 1985. She and Blessed Kuriokose Chavara became the first Indians raised to the altars, when they were beatified at Kottayam, Archdiocese of Changanacherry, Kerala, India, by John Paul II, Feb. 8, 1986.

Feast: Feb. 8.

MUZI, GIOVANNI

Bishop of Città di Castello and first papal representative to come to the Americas; b. Rome, 1772; d. Spoleto, 1849. With independence, it became necessary for the Spanish-American republics to conduct their own ecclesiastical affairs with the Holy See. In 1822 a Chilean envoy, Archdean José Ignacio CIENFUEGOS, arrived in Rome and requested that a nuncio be sent to Chile with ample power to settle the many critical problems of the Church there. Since Chile was not yet recognized as an independent country, it was decided to send an apostolic vicar, or non-diplomatic representative of the Holy See. Muzi, auditor of Nuncio Pablo Leardi in Vienna since 1817 and a former theology professor of the Roman College, was chosen for the mission. He was named titular archbishop of Filipos and was given faculties for Chile and for all Spanish American countries. These faculties included the naming and consecrating of bishops without further recourse to Rome.

The Muzi Mission, as it became known, left Genoa on Oct. 5, 1823, with Gian Maria Mastai, later Pope Pius IX, as chaplain to the archbishop, and Giuseppe Sallusti, who wrote a history of the mission, as secretary. Muzi's reception and later expulsion from Buenos Aires, his eight-month stay in Santiago, and his visit to Montevideo belong to the church history of these countries. Before returning to Genoa, where he arrived June 25, 1825, Muzi wrote a Carta apologética (Córdoba 1825) defending his mission against his many critics. In Rome the archbishop gave the first detailed report on the condition of the Church in the various countries he visited.

After the personal failure of his mission, he retired from the papal diplomatic service and accepted the bishopric of Città di Castello, where he published an important work of local history, Memorie ecclesiastiche e civili di Città di Castello (7 v. 1842–44). He was consulted regularly on Spanish-American Church problems by the Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. A special report he had compiled on his mission to America was lost until recently, but it has been located in the Vatican Archives.

MYCONIUS, FRIEDRICH

One of the leading Protestant reformers in central Germany; b. Lichtenfels am Main, Dec. 25, 1490; d. Gotha, April 7, 1546. While attending Latin school in Annaberg, Myconius (also called Mecum) encountered Johann TETZEL, the indulgence preacher, and was offended by him. Myconius joined the Franciscan Order, but he failed to find assurance of God's grace in the monastic way of life. In 1524 he fled to Electoral Saxony. He was active as an evangelical preacher in Zwickau and Buchholz and in August 1524 went to Gotha. He reformed the church order, participated in the official church and school visitations in Thuringia in 1527 and 1533, attended the Marburg Colloquy in 1529, contributed to the Nuremberg Concord of 1536, and helped in the negotiations at Schmalkalden in 1537, Frankfurt and Nuremberg in 1539, and Hagenau in 1540. In Melancthon's place he made a trip to England in 1538 for union efforts with the English Church. He helped to introduce the Reformation in Annaberg and Leipzig in 1539 upon the death of Duke George.

MYCONIUS, OSWALD

Swiss humanist and reformer: b. Lucerne, Switzerland, 1488; d. Basel, Oct. 14, 1552. Myconius (originally Geisshäusler) was educated at Rottweil, Bern, and at the University of Basel (1510–14). He came to Zürich as a teacher in 1516. In 1518 his influence was decisive in securing the election of his friend Huldrych ZWINGLI as people's priest of Great Minster. He began intensive study of the Bible in 1520 and went to Lucerne in that same year to teach. His departure in 1522 was occasioned by his open espousal of the Reformation. After a brief sojourn in Einsiedeln, he returned to Zürich in 1523 to assist Zwingli in his reform of the city. In 1531 he moved to Basel, there to succeed OECOLAMPADIUS as antistes of the city in August 1532. In addition to writing commentaries on several books of the Bible, he wrote a brief biography of Zwingli in 1532, prepared the Basel Confession of 1534, and contributed to the formulation of the First Helvetic Confession of 1536 (see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, II: PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS OF FAITH).

MYSTAGOGY

Mystagogy (“interpretation of mystery”) is the final period of the initiation of adults (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults [Study Edition, Chicago 1988] 37). During this period the meaning of the Sacraments is explained to those who have newly received them. When Baptisms take place at the Easter Vigil, the mystagogy are held at the Sunday Masses of the Easter season (ibid. 40). No specific ceremonies are prescribed for this period, save that the neophytes maintain a special place among the faithful and are mentioned in the homily and the General Intercessions (ibid. 236). The purpose of the mystagogy is to enable the newly baptized to draw from their sacramental experience a new sense of the faith, the Church, and the world (ibid. 38). The families of the neophytes, their godparents, and the entire congregation share in this experience with them, but a heavy responsibility must fall upon the “mystagogue,” the person (normally the pastor) who opens to them the mysteries of faith.

The practice of mystagogy emerged in the early Church, where the term “Mystagogical Catechesis” (Katecheseis Mystagogikai) referred to the postbaptismal catechesis of the neophytes. Sources indicate that this period of postbaptismal catechesis lasted anywhere from five to seven days during Easter week. Its purpose was to explain to the neophytes the significance of the various rituals, signs, and symbols that they experienced at their initiation at the Easter Vigil. In contrast to the didactic orientation of prebaptismal catechesis, which focused on the communication of the foundational creedal tenets of the Christian faith, postbaptismal catechesis explored rituals, metaphors, symbols, images, and stories to reveal the deeper significance of the initiation experience.

It was at the mystagogy that St. AMBROSE, St. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, and other Church Fathers preached their classic homilies on the Christian Sacraments, opening their meaning to those who were newly frequenting them. It is here that the Church has traditionally taught the meaning of the sacramental life in Christ. These postbaptismal homilies represent some of the richest sources of patristic sacramental theology.

With the decline of adult baptism and the corresponding rise in infant baptism in the Middle Ages, the period of mystagogy, together with the CATECHUMENATE process, fell into disuse. It was reintroduced in 1972, with the promulgation of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. For the Church today the period remains one of great importance both pastorally and pedagogically. It requires the active participation not only of the newly baptized and the pastor, but of the whole congregation, for it incorporates the newly baptized into the community of the faithful and places instruction in the meaning of the Sacraments in the context of their frequent reception. In this way the newly baptized can deepen and enrich their own experience of the Sacraments by a clear exposition of the Sacraments' inner meaning for their own lives and that of the whole Church and a showing forth of that meaning in the actual community life of the Church.

MYSTERIUM FIDEI

Encyclical letter, “Mystery of the Faith,” promulgated by Pope Paul VI on Sept. 3, 1965. In light of the initiative of the Second Vatican Council to reform the sacred liturgy of the Church, Mysterium fidei provides clarification and direction concerning the doctrine and worship of the Eucharist.

The introduction establishes that when treating the reform of the liturgy, Vatican II “considered nothing to be more important than urging the faithful to participate actively and with sound faith and with utmost devotion in the celebration of this most holy mystery; to offer it with the priest to God as a sacrifice for their own salvation and for that of the whole world, and to find in it spiritual nourishment” (no. 2). Following these points, the pope affirms, “the mystery of the Eucharist is at the heart and center of the liturgy itself” (no. 3). He explains that with regard to the Eucharist the council “wished to make evident the indissoluble relationship between faith and devotion” (no. 4).

In part 2, “Reasons for Pastoral Concern and Anxiety,” Paul VI registers alarm at “opinions” about the Mystery of the Eucharist that circulate “in written or spoken word” (no. 10). As a corrective to these judgments, he decrees that the following interpretations are “not allowable”: “to emphasize . . . the Mass ‘of the community’ to the extent of disparaging Masses celebrated in private; or to stress the sign value of the sacrament as if the symbolism . . . expresses fully and exhaustively the meaning of Christ’s presence; or to discuss the mystery of transubstantiation without mentioning the changing of the . . . bread . . . and wine . . . as stated by the Council of Trent; or finally, to propose and to act on the opinion according to which Christ the Lord is no longer present in the consecrated hosts left after the celebration of the sacrifice of the Mass” (no. 11).

Part 3, “The Holy Eucharist Is a Mystery of Faith,” highlights the concept of mystery: the Eucharist is a “very great mystery” and a “Mystery of Faith” (no. 15). Believers must approach the Eucharistic mystery with “humble respect, not following human [rational] arguments . . . but adhering firmly to divine revelation” (no. 16). Investigations of this unparalleled mystery should be guided by “the magisterium of the Church” (no. 22). In addition to “safeguarding” the integrity of the Eucharistic mystery itself, its “proper mode of expression” (no. 23) must also be safeguarded. Thus, the Church has established a “rule of language,” which it has “confirmed . . . with the authority of the councils” (no. 24).

In part 4, “The Mystery of the Eucharist Is Verified in the Sacrifice of the Mass,” the pope reviews traditional Catholic doctrine related to the Mass. Here, he indicates that “the whole Church . . . in union with Christ in His role as Priest and Victim, offers the Sacrifice of the Mass and is offered in it.” He also underscores, “the distinction between the universal priesthood and the hierarchical priesthood is one of essence and not merely one of degree” (no. 31). Explaining the “public and social nature of every Mass,” the pope says, “Mass is not something private; it is an act of Christ and of the Church.” As such, “every Mass is offered not for the salvation of ourselves alone, but also for that of the whole world” (no. 32).

In part 5, “In the Sacrifice of the Mass Christ Is Made Sacramentally Present,” the pope teaches that “sacrifice and Sacrament pertain inseparably to the same mystery.” The foundational principle of this instruction is that “in an unbloody representation of the Sacrifice of the Cross and in application of its saving power, in the Sacrifice of the Mass the Lord is immolated when, through the words of consecration, He begins to be present in a sacramental form under the appearances of bread and wine” (no. 34). Of the various ways Christ is present in the Church, the Sacrament of the Eucharist “surpasses all the others.” To refer to Christ’s presence in the Eucharist as “real” does not “exclude all other types of presence as if they could not be ‘real’ too,” but is “presence in the fullest sense,” that is, “it is the substantial presence by which Christ, the God-man, is wholly and entirely present.” It is “wrong to explain this presence by . . . recourse to the ‘spiritual’ nature . . . of the Glorified Body of Christ . . . or by reducing it to a kind of symbolism” (no. 39).

Part 6, “Christ Our Lord Is Present in the Sacrament of the Eucharist by Transubstantiation,” reiterates Catholic teaching on transubstantiation: “the voice of the teaching and praying Church. . . assures us that the way Christ is made present in this Sacrament is none other than by the change of the whole substance of the bread into His Body, and of the whole substance of the wine into His Blood, and that this . . . change the Catholic Church rightly calls transubstantiation.” As a consequence of this substantial change, “the species of bread and wine . . . take on new meaning and a new finality, for they no longer remain ordinary bread and ordinary wine, but become the sign of something sacred, the sign of a spiritual food.” Thus, transformed bread and wine “contain a new ‘reality’ which we may justly term ontological.” Transubstantiation alters the “objective reality” of the bread and wine, “since after the change of the substance or nature of the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, nothing remains of the bread and wine but the appearances, under which Christ, whole and entire, in His physical ‘reality’ is bodily present” (no. 46).

Part 7, “Latreutic Worship of the Sacrament of the Eucharist,” recalls that the Catholic Church “has always offered and still offers the cult of Latria to the Sacrament of the Eucharist, not only during Mass, but also outside of it, reserving Consecrated Hosts . . . exposing them to solemn veneration, and carrying them processionally” (no. 56). The pope highlights the feast of Corpus Christi as a testimony to this veneration, which continues to give rise to inspirational Eucharistic pieties. Through them, the Catholic Church strives “to do homage to Christ . . . to thank Him . . . and to implore his mercy” (no. 63).

The concluding section, "Exhortation to Promote the Cult of the Eucharist," exhorts persons entrusted with the care of believers "to preserve this faith in its purity and integrity" and to "promote the cult of the Eucharist" (no. 64).

MYSTERY (IN THE BIBLE)

Exegetes of the "History of Religions" school (e.g., W. Bousset and R. Reitzenstein) have suggested that the Pauline use of μυστήριον (Gr. for "mystery") to refer to salvation in Jesus Christ was a borrowing from the pagan mystery religions as part of an attempt to make Christianity understandable to the Greek world (see MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL). Today, however, it is more widely recognized that "mystery" was an ancient Hebrew theological term that was current in Jewish circles at the time of Christ. This article explains the concept of mystery in the Old Testament, in non-Biblical Jewish thought, and in the New Testament.

In the Old Testament. In the Septuagint (LXX) the word μυστήριον occurs some 21 times; it appears only in the postexilic books (Tobit; Judith; Daniel; Sirach; 2 Maccabees), normally translating the Hebrew word rāz (borrowed through Aramaic from Old Persian), which is generally in the plural. There are other Greek synonyms for mystery in these late books, including κρύπτα and ἀπόκρυφα, "secrets, hidden things." In tracing the idea of mystery, one must begin long before the postexilic period with the Hebrew concept of sôd, a word which is never translated by μυστήριον. This Hebrew word seems to have originally meant "council, assembly"; but ultimately it came to designate what was decided in a council, namely, "counsel," particularly "secret counsel," and thus "mystery."

Preexilic Period. One of the early theological uses for sôd was in reference to the heavenly council. H. W. Robinson, F. Cross, and others have shown that there was a common Semitic belief in an assembly of heavenly beings that decided the fate of the world. In pagan thought it was an assembly of the gods; in Hebrew thought it was an assembly of angels presided over by Yahweh who had the dominant role in making the decision [Jb 1.612; Ps 81(82).1]. There is probably a reference to the heavenly assembly in Gn 1.26, "Let us make man in our image and likeness"; and in Is 40.1 Yahweh's imperative is addressed to the angelic court.

The power of the heavenly sôd to enact decrees concerning men gave it practical importance in Hebrew life. The decisions on high were made known to the people by the prophet who was introduced through visions into the sessions of the heavenly assembly. Isaiah's call consists of his seeing the heavenly assembly where God is asking the angels, "Whom shall I send?" (Is 6.8). When Micaiah, son of Imlah, is asked by the King of Israel to prophesy, he answers by telling what he saw in the heavenly assembly (1 Kgs 22.19–22). Amos announces almost as a proverb that God will surely not do anything "until He has revealed his sôd to His servants the prophets" (Am 3.7). To know the heavenly sôd (council, counsel) became the criterion for distinguishing a true prophet from a false prophet. Jeremiah says scornfully of the false prophets, "For which of them has stood in the sôd of Yahweh and seen and heard His word?" (Jer 23.18; see also Jb 15.8).

Postexilic Period. This concept of a prophet's being introduced into the heavenly council and its mysterious counsels was the basis for the importance attributed to heavenly secrets in postexilic Judaism. The Persian loanword rāz made its way into Aramaic and Hebrew, alongside sôd, to express the concept of mystery. The number of individuals who claimed to have seen the heavenly mysteries increased, as did the types of mysteries that were reported.

In Daniel ch. 2 rāz (μυστήριον in the LXX) is used eight times to refer to Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its symbolic contents. No wise man can unravel such mysteries, but only God in heaven who reveals mysteries can make known what shall be. Here "mystery" is employed in what shall become a very frequent usage: a vision of the future given to man by God, in symbols. In apocalyptic literature it will often be an angel who interprets this mystery for the chosen seer, but sometimes God Himself speaks.

The Book of Sirach says that God's secrets, like the vicissitudes of life and the working of providence, are beyond human knowledge (Sir 11.4) and it warns man not to investigate such things (3.21–22). Occasionally, to the humble, God will reveal His secrets [4.18; 42.18–19; 3.19 (Hebrew)], as He did in the past to Isaiah (48.24–25). It is in Sir 4.18 that one meets, for the first time, Wisdom as God's agent in revealing mysteries. Besides God's plan for men, mysteries in Sirach include astronomical and meteorological phenomena (43.32) and the secret actions of men, often evil (1.28–29). One way for men to come to a knowledge of mysteries is through a study of ancient traditions found in the Law, and in the teaching of the wise men and the prophets (39.7; 47.15–17).

In the Hellenistic outlook of the Book of Wisdom, the mysteries of God include His plans for the afterlife (Wis 2.22). The origins of Wisdom are classified as mysteries (6.22), and Wisdom herself is initiated into the knowledge of God (8.4). Some of the language of the mystery religions appears in this book (12.5; 14.15) but chiefly by way of attack on these religions. Solomon is pictured as the example of a man to whom God has given true knowledge of a variety of mysteries (7.17–21).

In Non-Biblical Jewish Thought. There are important uses of mystery in extra-Biblical literature. In investigating these it will be useful to distinguish between apocryphal writings in general and the Dead Sea Scrolls in particular.

Apocrypha. The sobriety of the mystery passages in the canonical literature is appreciated when one studies the noncanonical literature. Dating from the 2d century B.C., Enoch presents a fascinating variety of mysteries: (1) evil mysteries (9.6–8; 10.7; 16.3), such as those taught to women by the evil angels—an echo of Gn 6.1–4; (2) cosmic mysteries and their relation to men (41.3; 60.11–22)—an angelic guide introduces Enoch to these astrological secrets; (3) mysteries of God’s will and human actions (63.3; 83.7; 84.3)—a special mystery is the judgment God will render on man’s deeds (103.2; 68.5); and (4) the mystery of the Son of Man, the Elect One, hidden in God’s presence before creation (48.6; 62.7), who shall be revealed on the day of judgment (62.1) to pour forth the secrets of wisdom and counsel that God has entrusted to him (53.1; 62.2).

From A.D. 60 to 150 a series of apocalypses (2 Baruch; 3 Baruch; 4 Ezra) gives witness to the last Jewish developments in the use of “mystery” parallel to the usage of the New Testament. In 2 Baruch are described the visions accorded to Baruch amid the ruins of Jerusalem after the city had fallen to the Babylonians. The term “mysteries” is used for these visions and for their interpretation. The mysteries include cosmic phenomena (48.2–3; see also 3 Baruch 1.8), as well as the happenings of the last time (2 Baruch 81.4; 85.8).

In 4 Ezra are found the visions of Ezra about the fall and rise of Jerusalem. Throughout his life, Ezra had received revelations of the mysteries of God pertaining to the future in store for Jerusalem and the world (6.32–33; 10.38); and in this he was privileged like Moses who also saw “the secrets of the times” (14.5). Some of these mysteries revealed to Ezra are to be kept secret (12.36–37; 14.6 for Moses).

The Dead Sea Scrolls. In the Qumran DEAD SEA Scrolls (DSS) also, one finds mysteries playing an important role. The Hebrew word most frequently used is rāz, sometimes occurring in parallelism with sôd; nistôrôt (hidden things) also occurs.

The first type of mystery we may distinguish in the DSS concerns God’s providence as it affects angels, men, and the future of Israel. In 1QM 14.14 God’s “marvelous mysteries” concern the elevating and casting down of the angels. Evil persons are under the dominion of the Angel of Darkness “according to the mysteries of God until the final time set by Him” (1QS 3.20–23; 4.18). On a more personal level the author of 1QH (9.23–24) says to God, “You have chastised me in the mystery of your wisdom.” The death of the just in the final war against evil will be according to the mysteries of God to test the eagerness of others (1QM 16.11; 17.8–9). To the Teacher of Righteousness have been revealed secrets concerning the future found in the words of OT prophets (1QpHb 7.1–5); it is perhaps this figure who speaks in 1QS 11.3–4, “He made my eye contemplate His wonders; and the light of my heart, the mystery to be.”

A second set of mysteries in the DSS concerns the community’s own interpretation of the Law. If we remember that the Qumran community thought of itself as an assembly or council, this use of “mystery” may be related to the origins of the term as the secret counsel of a council. The ideal of intimate union between the sectarians and the angels is a theme of the DSS, and the community’s council on earth was considered to be a reflection of the angelic council in heaven (1QS 11.8). Thus, in 11.5–7 one initiated into the community comes to know God’s marvelous mysteries, a wisdom hidden from wise men, a fountain of glory hidden from any worldly assembly. In CDC 3.12–14 we hear that to faithful Israelites God revealed the hidden things in which all Israel had gone astray, and then by a process of historical selection the Qumran community became God’s final repository of those hidden commands whose observance is necessary for eternal life (3.18–20). Those who are fully accepted as members are to be made “wise in the marvelous and true mysteries amidst the men of the community” (1QS 9.18–19), but they must keep these hidden from the noninitiated (4.6; 1QH 5.25–26). The author of the hymns seems to have a special role: “You have set me up . . . as the interpreter of knowledge in your marvelous mysteries to test the seekers of truth and to try the lovers of discipline” (1QH 2.13–14).

Thirdly, the cosmic and meteorological mysteries are also mentioned in the DSS (1QH 1.11–12, 21; 12.11–13).

Fourthly, there are evil mysteries. BELIAL has his own evil sôd (1QS 4.1), his own hostile mysteries (1QM 14.9); and according to these “mysteries of iniquity” men deform the works of God in their guilt (1QH 5.36). However, all this is doomed to perish. On the trumpets that will give the signal in the great war against evil will be written: “The mysteries of God for the destruction of evil” (1QM 3.8–9). (See APOCRYPHA 1, 2.)

In the New Testament. Because of the special use St. Paul makes of mystery, it will be useful to study his epistles separately, after having investigated the use of the term in the rest of the New Testament.

Outside the Pauline Writings. The word μυστήριον occurs in one logion in the Gospels, a parallel passage in Mk 4.10–12; Mt 13.10–13; Lk 8.9–10, which is found between the parable of the sower and its explanation. The setting of this logion is not original, but it does concern parables: “To you is granted the mystery [“mysteries” in Matthew and Luke] of the kingdom of God; but to those who are outside everything is in parables.” The fluctuation between the singular and the plural reminds us of the fluctuation in Hebrew between the use in singular of sôd and the use in the plural of rāz. This use of “the mystery of the kingdom of God” is to be associated with the use seen above where divine providence and its working for the salvation of men comes under the rubric of God’s marvelous mysteries. It is to be noted that Enoch 41.1 speaks of “the mysteries of the heavens and how the kingdom is divided.” That only the specially selected are given to know the mysteries is consonant with the whole history of the concept of mystery. (See PARABLES OF JESUS.)

In Rv 1.20 mention is made of the mystery of the seven stars seen in the right hand of Alpha and Omega; and in 17.5–6 the prostitute astride the scarlet beast is a mystery, as is her name. As said above, in Daniel and in the Jewish apocalypses “mystery” was often used to characterize symbolic visions and their interpretation. In particular, mystery as applied to the symbol of the stars may be an echo of the cosmic mysteries. In Enoch 43.1–4 the mysteries of heaven include the stars, which have names given them by God. The names of the stars are the names of the saints on earth, just as the stars of the Revelation stand for the ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES. A parallel to Rv 17.5–6 may be found in Enoch 60.10 where the explanation of LEVIATHAN and Behemoth is called a mystery; and in 3 Baruch, 3 one of the “mysteries of God” is the DRAGON of evil.

It is said in Rv 10.7 that with the trumpet of the seventh angel God’s mystery will be completed, as He announced to His servants the Prophets. The last clause echoes the use of sôd in Am 3.7 (see also 1QpHb 7.1–5). As previously mentioned, the secret will of God concerning the end of time was one of the standard mysteries.

Pauline Writings. The earliest occurrence is in 2 Thes 2.7 where, in reference to the signs of the last times and the appearance of the man of lawlessness, it is said, “The mystery of lawlessness is already at work.” This is a reference to the economy of evil. While mention is made of evil mysteries in Sirach and Enoch, the best parallel is in the DSS where the evil spirit is permitted to function until the end time—according to the mysteries of God. The very expression “mystery of iniquity” (i.e., lawlessness) occurs in the DSS.

Next, there are five (or six) occurrences of “mystery” in 1 Corinthians, and here the Pauline doctrine of salvific mystery is beginning to take shape. In 1 Cor 2.7 Paul speaks of “a hidden wisdom of God in a mystery, a wisdom which God predetermined before the ages for our glory, which no one of the rulers of this world had known.” The emphasis is on the wisdom of God hidden in a mystery, and this wisdom is God’s plan for man’s salvation in Jesus. As Pauline thought and theological vocabulary progresses, the emphasis will pass over to the mystery, and wisdom will become an attribute of mystery. Connections between wisdom and mystery have been seen in the Old Testament. In 1 Cor 2.10 Paul says that this wisdom hidden in a mystery has been revealed to us through the Spirit. In both Sir 48.24–25 and Dn 4.6 God’s mystery is revealed through the workings of His spirit.

Paul refers to himself as one of the “stewards of the mysteries of God” in 1 Cor 4.1. The context does not clarify this use of mystery. “Mysteries of God” is a frequent expression in the DSS; and in 1Q 36.16 mention is made of “men in custody of Your mysteries.”

In contrasting various gifts with the gift of charity, Paul mentions in 1 Cor 13.2 the gift of being “acquainted with all the mysteries and all knowledge.” (See CHARISM.) When Enoch receives a revelation, it is frequently said, “He showed me all the mysteries of . . .” (Enoch 41.1; 52.2; etc.). Thus Paul is speaking of a gift of revelation given to special figures like apocalyptic seers.

In 1 Cor 14.2 Paul says that he who speaks in a tongue is not understood, but through the Spirit he utters mysteries. It is difficult to decide whether “mysteries” here means unintelligible language or hidden truths. In 1 Cor 15.51 Paul announces the resurrection of the dead at the last trumpet as a mystery. It has been shown that mystery was connected with judgment in Enoch and connected with the afterlife in Wisdom.

There is, finally, a dubious occurrence of mystery in 1 Cor 2.1 where Paul describes how he came preaching the μυστήριον or μαρτύριον (witness) of God. The textual evidence is divided between the two readings, and it is not possible to decide with certainty which is correct.

The word mystery occurs twice in Romans. In Rom 11.25 Paul reveals the mystery that Israel has been blinded until all the nations come to believe in Jesus, but ultimately all Israel will be saved. Once again mystery is applied to the divine economy of salvation. We recall that in 4 Ezra the vision of the ultimate redemption of Jerusalem was described as a mystery. In Rom 16.25 Paul speaks of his preaching of Jesus Christ in terms of a mystery kept secret for long ages but now brought into the open and by means of the prophetic writings made known to the Gentiles. Whether this final salutation of Romans is authentic has been questioned. If it is genuinely Pauline, this is the first of Paul's equation of the mystery with Jesus Christ, an equation that is a specification of the larger mystery of God's plan of salvation. Paul mentions the prophetic foreknowledge of the mystery, a feature that has been seen as part of the most ancient Hebrew concept of mystery.

It is in the Captivity Epistles, Colossians and Ephesians, that the Pauline mystery finds its fullest expression. The equation of the mystery with Christ, seen in Romans, becomes standard: in Col 1.26–27 the mystery is identified as “Christ among you, the hope of glory”; in Col 2.2–3 Paul speaks of “the mystery of God, Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge”; and in Col 4.3 and Eph 3.4 he speaks of “the mystery of Christ.” Once again it is said that this mystery, which in previous generations was not made known to men, has been revealed to the Apostles and Prophets in the Spirit. Perhaps the closest parallel for this is in Enoch 48.6; 51.3; 62.7, where it is said that the Elect One, the Son of Man, was chosen and hidden in God's presence before creation to be revealed to the elect in the end time. There are good Qumran parallels for the expressions in these Epistles connecting knowledge and wisdom with mystery. One notices that Paul, who began with “wisdom hidden in a mystery” (1 Col 2.7), has come around to a mystery in which wisdom is hidden.

The special characteristic of the mystery in Ephesians is the collective aspect of the salvific plan in Christ, as in Eph 1.9–10: “the mystery of His will . . . to gather all things in Christ, both heavenly and earthly in him.” This includes the subjection of the hostile angelic powers to Christ. The three references to “mystery” in Eph 3.2–11 constitute the longest single Pauline treatment of the topic, and pull together most of the themes that have already been pointed out.

A special use of “mystery” is found in Eph 5.32, where Paul cites Gn 2.24 and says, “This is a profound mystery, and I interpret it as referring to Christ and his Church.” “Mystery” is used here, as by 2d-century Christian writers, especially Justin, to refer to a deeper meaning of a Scripture passage. In Sir 39.2–7 and 1QpHb 7.1–5 the theory that the hidden things of God can be found in the ancient Scriptures is propounded.

In Eph 6.19 mention is made of “the mystery of the gospel,” which is but a variant of the mystery of Christ, since the gospel announces salvation for all in Christ.

In the Pastoral Epistles “mystery” is found in 1 Tm 3.9 and 16: “the mystery of faith” and “the mystery of religion.” What is meant is the doctrinal content of faith or religion which involves, as 3.16 indicates, a belief in Christ from His Incarnation to His glorification. Thus, the mystery in 1 Timothy is once more God's plan of salvation for men effected in Jesus Christ.

In summation, the New Testament and Pauline use of mystery is varied with many of the same modalities found in the pre-Christian Semitic use of mystery. The predominant use concerns God's salvific plan for men in Jesus [see REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE)], even as the origin of mystery in the Old Testament seems to have been the divine plan for men as formulated in the heavenly council. Once granted the uniqueness of Paul's concept of Jesus, there is nothing in the Pauline mystery passages by way of vocabulary and thought pattern that cannot be explained from the Jewish background without recourse to the pagan mystery religions.

MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY)

A hidden reality or secret. More specifically, in the theology of revelation, a truth that human beings cannot discover except from revelation and that, even after revelation, exceeds their comprehension. In addition to this primary meaning, which will be discussed in the present article, the term has other connected meanings that should be kept in mind: (1) in soteriology, the great redemptive acts of God in history, especially in Jesus Christ; (2) in the theology of worship, the sacramental re-enactment of the redemptive deeds of Christ (see SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY).

History of the notion. While the complete history of the term has yet to be written, the following high points may be noted.

Greek Fathers. The term μυστήριον is used by the Greek Fathers in many senses. They include the following: 1. The salvific counsels of God, hidden from all eternity in the divine mind, but partly manifested through His Prophets and especially through Christ. 2. The great salutary interventions of God in history, whereby He executes His salvific designs, including especially the decisive events of the Incarnation, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ. 3. The hidden senses of Scripture, especially the typological sense of the Old Testament, which looks forward to Christ and the Church. 4. The Sacraments, as ritual continuations of God's salvific actions in Christ. This sacramental use of the term μυστήριον did not become established until the fourth century, when the mystery religions were no longer serious competitors of Christianity. 5. The pagan cults and rites, for example, those of Eleusis, Attis, Osiris, Cybele, and Mithra (see MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL). 6. In some of the Alexandrian writers (notably Clement), certain esoteric doctrines that, for fear of profanation, should be restricted to an elite among the faithful. 7. In Gregory of Nyssa, objects of mystical knowledge, such as were revealed to Moses and Paul in their ecstasies. 8. Especially in the fourth-century Fathers (Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, etc.), a revealed truth that even to faithful and educated Christians remains obscure by reason of its sublimity.

This last use of the term is particularly important in view of the later development of the notion. The theme of God's incomprehensibility, already set forth by Philo Judaeus in the first century, was strongly emphasized by the orthodox Fathers of the fourth century in opposition to the Eunomians, who maintained that God had so revealed Himself that the Christian believer could fully understand His essence. The anti-Eunomian Fathers developed a markedly negative (or "apophatic") theology, insisting on the total otherness and immeasurable majesty of God. As Rudolf Otto noted in his work, The Idea of the Holy [tr. J. W. Harvey (2d ed. New York 1958)], Chrysostom provides some of the finest expressions of the sense of the "numinous" in ancient Christian literature. With apt illustrations from the Bible, Chrysostom shows how the mysterious presence of the revealing God gives rise to sentiments of consternation, mental disarray, and trembling due to a combination of fear and delight.

In the sixth century, Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite made effective use of the vocabulary, of the mystery religions to inculcate a sense of holy awe. His mystical works, translated into Latin by John Scotus Erigena (c. 850), were to influence the great scholastics, including THOMAS AQUINAS.

Latin Fathers and Doctors. In the West the Greek term μυστήριον, especially where it referred to Christian sacred rites, was generally translated by sacramentum. But mysterium was also used, both to designate the pagan mystery cults and to signify hidden truths, including the hidden meanings of Scripture. St. AUGUSTINE uses sacramentum and mysterium almost interchangeably, but with slightly different connotations. Sacramentum refers primarily to the outwardly visible rite or symbol; mysterium refers to the hidden meaning behind it.

The medieval tradition was, on the whole, quite faithful to Augustine in its handling of the terms. Often mysterium was used to denote the spiritual or allegorical significance of Scripture.

St. Thomas Aquinas, relying on the etymology of the word, takes note of hiddenness or secrecy as fundamental to mystery (In Isaiam, prol.). In his theology, the divina mysteria are truths hidden in God, knowable to man only under the veils of FAITH. Very frequently in Thomas's writings mysterium occurs as the object of the verb credere. Following the biblical practice, he normally applies the term "mystery" not to the inner being of God, but to His redemptive counsels, whether already executed or still to be accomplished in eschatological times. Only on rare occasions does he call the Trinity a mystery, and then principally in connection with the Incarnation, which he terms "the most excellent of all mysteries" (Summa Theologiae 1a, 57.5 obj. 1). For example, in Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 1.8 he distinguishes between the "secret of the Godhead" (occultum divinitatis, i.e., the Trinity) and the "mystery of Christ's humanity." Except in passages referring to the Eucharist, Thomas practically never calls the Sacraments mysteries. The consecrated wine, he says, is rightly called "mystery of faith" (mysterium fidei) because the blood of Christ is not apparent to the senses (ibid. 3a, 78.3 ad 5).

Nineteenth Century. During the controversies with various rationalistic movements, mystery gradually emerged as a technical term in the Catholic theology of revelation. The semirationalists maintained that human reason, at least when sufficiently schooled under the tutelage of revelation, was in principle capable of comprehending and demonstrating all the dogmas of faith. From this it would follow that faith, in the sense of an assent to testimony, would not be required on the part of those who had reached full intellectual maturity. The doctrines of the leading semirationalists were severally condemned (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2738–2740, 2828–2831, 2850–2861). The Syllabus of Errors, reaffirming this stand, rejected the fundamental tenets of semirationalism (ibid. 2909–2914).

Vatican Council I, climaxing this development, solemnly defined that there are "true mysteries properly so called," that is, dogmas of faith that cannot be "understood and demonstrated by a properly cultivated mind from natural principles" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3041). In the chapter corresponding to this definition, the council explained that by strict mysteries it meant truths “hidden in God that cannot be known unless divinely revealed” (ibid. 3015) and that “by their nature so transcend a created mind that even when communicated by revelation and accepted in faith, they remain covered by the veil of faith itself and as it were shrouded in obscurity, so long as in this mortal life ‘we are exiled from the Lord, for we walk by faith and not by sight’” (ibid. 3016; cf. 2 Cor 5.6–7).

The council, in the passage just quoted, seems to imply that there will be no more mysteries in heaven, when the light of glory replaces the dimmer light of faith. This classical position of Catholic theology—which is also that of St. Thomas (In 1 epist. ad Cor. 2 lect. 1)—is supported by various biblical texts in addition to the one cited by the council (e.g., 1 Cor 13.9–12; 1 Jn 3.2). Nevertheless, it is well to note, as K. Rahner has several times insisted, that no created intellect can be elevated to the point where it will have absolutely comprehensive knowledge of God (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3001). Not even in heaven will God be appropriated as an object by the dynamism of the human ratio.

While stressing the negative note of incomprehensibility, Vatican I took pains to point out that “reason, enlightened by faith, when it diligently, reverently, and modestly inquires, by the gift of God, attains some understanding of mysteries, and that a most profitable one” (ibid. 3016). Such understanding is achieved by comparison of mysteries with things naturally known, with one another, and with the final destiny of man. In this way one may perceive the harmony between the natural and supernatural orders, the mutual coherence among the truths of faith, and the meaningfulness of the mysteries for man in his earthly pilgrimage. Although the concepts by which one knows mysteries are only remotely similar to the realities for which they stand, they afford a knowledge that is fully valid so far as it goes. Indeed, the contemplation of mysteries in this life can provide a kind of faint anticipation of the eternal vision enjoyed by the blessed.

Further speculation. In the struggle against rationalistic tendencies in the nineteenth century, the notion of mystery was gradually modified. Whereas the Fathers and medieval Doctors, thinking of mystery as something hidden within a sacramental presence, were inclined to regard the Incarnation as the supreme mystery, the nineteenth-century theologians, concentrating on the features of transcendence and obscurity, more frequently held with M. Scheeben that the Blessed Trinity is the “mystery of mysteries.” In line with this tendency, Leo XIII referred to the dogma of the Trinity as “the greatest of all mysteries, since it is the fountain and origin of all”

[Divinum illud munus; Acta Sanctae Sedis 29 (1897) 645].

In current Catholic teaching, three classes of divine mystery are commonly recognized. These are discussed below in the order of ascending sublimity.

Natural Mysteries. Naturally knowable truths that remain obscure because we lack proper and positive concepts of the realities involved are natural mysteries. While such mysteries may be found in the created order (e.g., animal instinct, human free will), they are preeminently verified in God, by reason of the extreme deficiency of the created analogies by which we know Him. For example, the divine freedom is far more a mystery than human freedom, for our experience affords no clue as to how freedom can be present in an immutable subject.

Supernatural Mysteries in the Wide Sense. Truths concerning the created order that are not knowable without revelation but that, once revealed, are free from any special obscurity are supernatural mysteries in the wide sense; for example, the primacy of the Roman pontiff in the Church. Such a fact, being dependent on God’s free disposition, could not be known without revelation, but after being revealed it has an intelligibility comparable to that of other juridical notions.

Supernatural Mysteries in the Strict Sense. Those truths that cannot be known without revelation and that, even after revelation, remain obscure to us by reason of the sublimity of their object are supernatural mysteries in the strict sense. Three principal mysteries are normally recognized as belonging to this class: (1) the Trinity (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3225), which is the mystery of the communication of divine life within the Godhead; (2) the Incarnation (ibid. 2851), which is the supreme supernatural communication of the divine life to a created nature; and (3) the elevation of finite persons to share, through grace or glory, in the divine life (ibid. 2854). All other supernatural mysteries (e.g., original sin, the Eucharist, the Church as a supernatural communion, predestination) are commonly held to be reducible to the three central mysteries just named.

Supernatural mysteries in the strict sense, since they concern realities of the divine order, are beyond the comprehension of any created intellect. Their special obscurity comes from the fact that they have to do with God, not merely under those aspects in which He is directly mirrored by creatures (as, for instance, His goodness is reflected in the goodness of creatures), but precisely under those aspects wherein, thanks to His immeasurable transcendence, created analogies break down (see ANALOGY, THEOLOGICAL USE OF). Because the generation of living creatures only remotely resembles generation within the Godhead, we cannot reason from the former to the latter. Even after revelation, we cannot see the inner grounds that account for the fact. Revelation tells us that there are three Persons in God, that one of them has become man, and that men are called to be sharers of God's inner life. But it does not explain how such things can be.

During the early part of the twentieth century, a controversy arose as to whether we could know without revelation that there are any strict mysteries in God. Many competent theologians (e.g., C. Pesch, I. Ottiger, H. Dieckmann) replied in the negative, but others (e.g., R. Garrigou-Lagrange, M. D. Roland-Gosselin) held that we can definitely establish that there must be in God perfections that lack any counterpart in the created order, so that we could not learn them without revelation or, even after revelation, understand their internal possibility.

Apologetical considerations. Apologetics must show that the Christian notion of strict mystery is meaningful and credible. This task is necessary, for modern rationalism and scientism have sometimes claimed that in view of the unlimited possibilities of rational and scientific progress, all truths of revelation can eventually be reduced to strictly demonstrative knowledge.

To this object one may reply, with K. Rahner, that the human mind is so structured that it necessarily grasps particular limited objects against the horizon of the unconditioned and indefinable, the Absolute. Since this Absolute is the ground of all intelligibility, the human mind, even before it is the faculty of comprehension, is the faculty of mystery. The revealed mysteries of Christianity enrich our knowledge of the Absolute by certifying that God can communicate His divine life and draw near in grace without compromising His utter transcendence. But because all these truths have reference to the inner being of the Absolute, which outstrips objective concepts, the Christian mysteries can never be rationally or scientifically demonstrated.

Religious phenomenology, by showing that the notion of mystery is a constant feature of human religion, has underscored the value of mystery. All vital religions, as R. Otto recognized, live off a numinous experience of the divine presence, which arouses sentiments of awe and fascination. Men have always suspected that if God communicates with us, He must do so in a mysterious way, imparting deep and inscrutable secrets. Scheeben was therefore able to argue that the mysteries of the Christian faith, far from making it incredible, support its claim to be God's supreme self-revelation. If Christianity were devoid of mystery, he added, it could not stir and hold men as it does.

Approaching the question from another point of view, modern personalistic philosophers (such as M.

Scheler, G. Marcel, and J. Lacroix) have shown that an element of mystery is inseparable from genuinely personal knowledge. Spirit as such is never deductively proved or experimentally verified; it is normally discerned through the signs by which it freely manifests itself. When a man reveals himself to a friend, he opens up something of the mystery of his own being. If God wishes to reveal Himself and draw human beings into friendship, He must share with them His own inner mystery. The human relationship of personal intercommunion therefore provides a fruitful analogy by which to approach the revealed mystery of our SUPERNATURAL communion with God. In this perspective, mystery appears less as a particular datum of revelation than as a dimension in which the entire relationship of revelation and faith unfolds.

MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL

The word "mysteries," as used in this article, signifies the secret cults of Greco-Roman antiquity permeated by Orientalism. They form two groups. (1) Autochthonous Greek cults; in Roman times only those of Eleusis and of Dionysus—with Orphism as a branch of the latter—were still important. (2) Oriental cults; only the Phrygian and Egyptian cults developed into the complete form of a mystery religion, whereas the Syrian Adonis cult did not reach this stage. The mysteries of Mithras have their own ideology and their own history. Therefore, they are treated separately near the end of the article.

A first question is whether the mysteries, in respect to origin, can be thought of as a whole. The answer must be affirmative, except for Orphism and Mithraism, both of which were artificial creations. The three Oriental cults, along with the Eleusinian mysteries of Demeter, belong to the same eastern Mediterranean group and have a prehistoric origin. Their unifying principle is their fertility aspect, typical of the cults of agricultural populations. Occupying a central place is a female figure, fertility personified; closely connected with her is another figure, fecundity, i.e., actual fertility or its products. This second figure, her partner, undergoes in his own person the dramatic change of the seasons in nature from yearly birth to yearly death. In Eleusis this partner is a young woman; in the Oriental types of this religion, a young man.

Chief Focal Areas. Four great focal points of fertility religion may be distinguished: ancient Crete, North Anatolia (Phrygia), Syria, and Egypt. This fourfold grouping contains many secondary focal points that are omitted in this article for the sake of brevity. The form of the fertility rite found in Syria goes back to the Sumero-Babylonian cult of Ishtar and the myth of Du-muzi-Tammuz, the existence of which is already attested for the 3d millennium B.C.

Ancient Crete. The copious data furnished by archaeological excavation on Creto-Mycenean civilization show that, while the phenomenon of life stood in the forefront of thought and feeling, there are only very few traces of those excesses (e.g., the reaper vase of Knossos) such as are often connected with living fertility religions. According to present knowledge it seems that all religion here is dominated by an apparently single female deity ruling simultaneously three realms: the kingdom of animals and plants (better perhaps, of all growth), the abode of the dead, and the domain of war. The last function may be a part or a concomitant function of her role as goddess of the royal palaces and of the kings themselves. Images on seals depict religious dances of priestesses. They express a belief in the epiphany of the goddess and her male partner. At her entrance all vegetative life starts moving ecstatically. The sarcophagus of Hagia Triada shows a death cult combined with the veneration of a fertility and earth goddess. The name of Dionysus has been deciphered on one of the tablets in Linear Script B as part of a theophoric cognomen. It is, however, uncertain whether this member of the old Cretan pantheon already possessed the essential traits of the classical Dionysus and also, whether he may be considered the partner of the great goddess of nature. Neither of the two hypotheses can be wholly rejected. In any case, the Eleusinian Demeter, goddess of the fertility of the earth, is one of the most important descendants of the ancient Cretan nature goddess. The dramatic element characterizing the Eleusinian cult has its prototype in the partly ecstatic cult of ancient Crete. This assumption, which is more or less the opinion of M. P. Nilsson (The Minoan-Mycenaean Religion and Its Survival [2d ed. Lund 1950]), revives an old thesis of P. Foucart. Further research of the Minoan tablets may be expected to clarify ancient Cretan correlations, for both Eleusis and Dionysus, though for the latter the correlation Asia Minor—Thrace—seems to be the more important.

North Anatolia. In the culture cycle of North Anatolia, rock carvings in the vicinity of the old Hittite capital (near Ankara) depict two deities that, on account of the flowers they offer each other, were formerly dubbed god and goddess of spring and considered as prototypes of the later couple Cybele-Attis. These Hittite deities are now recognized as complex in nature, representing the sun goddess of Arinna and the Hittite representative of the Hurrian weather god Teshub. Nevertheless, there remains the motif of a "sacred marriage," which often points to a fertility cult, and in the numerous train of one of the two deities a direct ancestor of the later Cybele has been recognized. The orgiastic element, characteristic for the pair Attis and Cybele at an early date, may have been present at this early stage of the Anatolian cult; but the Phrygian invaders of Asia Minor from Thrace certainly strengthened it. The Artemis of Ephesus is but an offshoot of this Anatolian mother. She was worshiped only incidentally and in secret rites. Their details are not known.

The goddess Anahita, is in reality an East Anatolian deity whom the Persians worshiped. Her cult in Asia Minor spread westward at an early date and she appears in company with Mithras. The similarity between Cybele and Anahita—the two were often interchanged—led at times even to a local fusion of the concomitant figures of both Attis and Mithras, although they had nothing in common with each other (cf. W. Wüst, ‘Mithras’ in Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. Wissowa et al. [Stuttgart 1893– ] 15.2 [1932] 2135– ).

Syria. The Syrian fertility goddess bears different names in different places of worship. Especially important is the goddess called in Greek the consort of Adonis of Byblos (likewise Aphrodite), and the Dea Syria of Hierapolis, also called Bambyce, Atargatis (i.e., the Atar of Attis). Conformities in ceremonial, particularly the emasculation of male followers, prove that the principal figure of this cult kept much of the nature of the old Anatolian goddess. Likewise, the old Mesopotamian Ishtar lives on in the Syrian Astarte, as is evident also from the close correspondence between Adonis of Byblos and the old Mesopotamian Dumuzi-Tammuz. Since, in the final development of the Egyptian myth, Isis finds the body of Osiris in Byblos, the clear mythological connection between the Syrian and Egyptian pair of vegetation deities is thereby indisputably confirmed.

Egypt. In Egypt the fertility aspect is found not only in Isis but, considering the connection between gods and animals, also in Hathor. The latter was represented as a horned cow or else—a case of incompleting iconographic anthropomorphism—with a cow’s head. But in Egypt itself, and especially in the Egyptian component of Hellenism, Isis and her partner Osiris were destined to have a far greater influence.

Mythicoritual Development of the Basic Vegetation Duality. A mother goddess does not occupy the supreme role in cult, as she did in Crete, among any of the Near Eastern peoples where such a female divinity is found. Everywhere male deities have the leading place. Thus, in Mesopotamia several great gods, e.g., Anu, Enlil, Ea, Marduk, and Ashur, tower above the goddess Ishtar, notwithstanding her position as mistress of life, who appears now as virgin, now as wife and mother, while her lover Dumuzi-Tammuz shares the tragic fate of all nature heroes. In Syria at Bambyce, beside the goddess one finds the god designated as Attis—and as the superior figure. The whole ritual as represented on coins shows that he is not conceived as having a secondary position, as the Phrygian Attis and the later Adonis of Byblos had. Lucian’s description in his De Dea Syria makes this clear.

The same is true of the female successor of the North Anatolian mother goddess, named usually after the many individual mountains in the forests of which she was thought to roam, but less frequently after towns. The invasion of the Phrygians, a people related to the Greeks, brought her into contact with a religious sphere that assigned the chief role to a male deity. And the mountain mother surely had to take a subordinate position herself wherever the Greek colonists of Asia Minor seized power. Thus, in Homer the Idaean Mother—the ‘‘Mother of Mt. Ida’’ of the Trojans—is represented as being closely connected with Zeus, but as subject to him. Copious archaeological evidence from the mountain dominating Ephesus, of later date but clearly pre-Christian, has confirmed the different relative positions of mistress of nature and high god. A whole row of reliefs depict the triad Zeus, with beard; the Great Mother, with tympanon and other emblems and flanked by lions; and the youth Attis. One of the inscriptions of Ephesus expressly mentions Zeus as the autochthonous, or ancestral god. Hence, it may be concluded that the Greeks did not favor the elevation of Attis to the status of a true god, as is to be noted here and there in Phrygia as a result of his assimilation to Men, the moon god; nor did they favor the loose relationship of Attis and Cybele, which will be discussed below.

In the chief centers of population the cult of the Great Mother had extensive temple possessions and was under the control of a hierarchic priesthood that often politically administered the temple territory. It is sufficient to mention the temple-states of Ma (i.e., mother), Commagene, Bambyce, Hierapolis Castabala, and also the theocratic state of Ephesia. But the fact that a supreme deity of the stature of Zeus was being recognized at the same time proves that these fertility cults were not to be regarded as the total expression of religion but rather as elements in the whole religious complex of the area. That is very important for the understanding of their precise nature after their expansion westward, especially in the Roman Empire. The individual Oriental cults could not, and probably did not, wish, of their own accord at least, to compete with Christianity. They were part of the total potential of paganism that under imperial leadership wished to prevent Christianity from conquering souls.

Common Elements in the Mystery Cults. Their original structural likeness was not lost in later development, although naturally the cults emanating from a single point of departure came to differ considerably in details. The similar course of historical evolution makes it possible to sketch the nature of this group of Oriental cults together, at least with regard to their main features.

It is appropriate to start with the myth, since it contains so many common elements. In every case there is a basic pair of deities dissimilar in rank. Of these two, the female figure embodies fertility itself, whereas her male companion (who is intended to portray fecundity, the result of fertility, i.e., the abundant growth of plants and animals) is represented sometimes as her son, sometimes as her lover, and hence exhibits a peculiar hybrid character. This basic personification opened the road for further mythology, and it was a road that could not help leading into many byways.

O. Kern has given the following explanation. In the subtropical regions that are regarded as the home of the mysteries, namely, Asia Minor, Egypt, and the Aegean area, the change from the winter stagnation of nature into sprouting vegetation and the still greater change seen in the decline of growth in summer as a result of heat and drought usually occur abruptly and are full of contrasts. These contrasts, with their very disquieting effects on the feelings, found expression in emotional outbursts, and the more so as men pictured to themselves the proximate cause of the death, assumed as real, that the mythological being representing biological life was destined to undergo. Typical for Phrygia is the legend of the death of Attis, circulating with many variations; he emasculates himself out of remorse for his unfaithfulness toward his mistress, the Great Mother. In Syria, Adonis dies during the hunt, killed by a wild boar. In Egypt, Osiris succumbs to the snares of Seth, who symbolizes the hot desert wind that is so dangerous to most plants.

When once this stage was reached in the construction of the myth, a psychologically simpler motivation followed. A double set of feasts, often gathered in a cycle, mourning the disappearance of vegetation and again hailing its reappearance, was established. Instead of a merely mild, sympathetic feeling for the impersonal decay of nature, one could now abandon himself to personal grief at the tragic death of a being regarded as a youthful and handsome person. This personal relation gave a new emphasis to the joyous feast that belonged to the whole series of religious celebrations. These expressions of religious emotion were publicized by mass actions and not by individuals. In this way primitive celebrations honoring demigods of vegetation became great public festivals in their area of origin.

Intense excitement, however, could easily lead in two directions to sexual excesses. Cruelty and lust are passions that are psychologically closely related. It seems that in prehistoric times it was considered a service to the community to give to the Mistress of Nature the sacrifice of sexual power through emasculation. This may be compared to sacred prostitution, which represented an offering to the powers of fertility, and was often regarded as a magic act. Research has confirmed for many of these cults the emasculation of priests even of the highest class, although it is difficult to ascertain how widespread this practice actually was in later historical times. In many places, e.g., in the service of the Magna Mater of Pessinus, the emasculated high priest was called Attis and therefore as such was the companion or attendant of the goddess. This peculiar fact has led to the opinion that the emasculation of cult personnel, long practiced as a fertility sacrifice, was transferred to the myth of the god, thus providing the mythical ἀΐτιον (explanation) for the ancient rite.

The Element of Secrecy. All the cultic phenomena mentioned have been postulated on fairly solid ground for the early part of the 1st millennium B.C., and for the areas of origin of the Oriental group of the later Hellenistic mysteries. If the god occupying the primary position in the pair of vegetation divinities in northwestern Asia Minor is called Zeus, the insertion "Homeric religion" on the table is justified. The Indo-European tribes that fused with the original inhabitants of the Aegean area and founded the Greek people looked upon these ecstatic fertility rites as foreign and strange. The knightly and warlike class of nobles of the archaic and legendary period immortalized by Homer gave a tone to the religious sphere and kept itself aloof from the whole world of chthonic cults. Hence, since the older religious element was pushed into the background in Greece, it was in Greece itself that psychological necessity gradually led to secrecy. The autochthonic population, keeping strictly to the ancient forms of worship (e.g., in Eleusis) came to practice them apart and surrounded them with a wall of silence.

But even in Greece it is not likely that this esoteric factor, necessitated by circumstances, was the sole reason for the origin of secrecy. An added reason may have been that the rites had a partly sexual character, as is obvious from the pronounced biological mentality from which they derived their origin. This is also why many women's cults (e.g., the Thesmophoria at Athens and the cult of the Bona Dea at Rome) were closed to men. Some authors, K. Kerényi, e.g., have tried with much insight to show that male societies were at the root of the ancient secret cults. This hypothesis is manifestly untenable in the case of the most important cults (e.g., that of Eleusis), since they were open to both sexes from the outset, although their priestly functions were in the hands of women. Lastly, wherever eschatological hopes came to be connected with the performance of the rites, a certain awe for the latter, which were said to conceal something sublime, tended to encourage the practice of secrecy on the part of all. At Eleusis, it is true, this hope itself is not part of the secret but only the ritual way for becoming a sharer in it.

The Eleusinian Mysteries

The early Christian writers, especially CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, are severe in their criticism of the Eleusinian Mysteries (see Clement of Alexandria, Protrept. 2.21.2).

General Characterization and Early History. This cult may claim a detailed treatment because of the long tradition of supporting evidence and its important role in the classical period. It seems very probable that, at the beginning of the 3d century B.C., the Hellenistic form of the Egyptian mysteries was fashioned on the Eleusinian by Timotheus, a member of the Eleusinian priestly family of the Eumolpids, and that a similar imitation may be assumed in the case of the final elaboration of the cult of the Magna Mater and Attis under the early Roman principate.

Thus the Eleusinian ritual may be regarded as a typical and historical Greco-Oriental mystery religion. It includes the Dionysiac mysteries, the second mystery cult rooted in early Greek religion. Specialists such as U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff hold that the latter was not merely the only mystery cult still active in imperial times, but that it was very important. The discoveries in the Roman cemetery under St. Peter's at Rome have shown that in the later years of the 2d century A.D. Dionysian emblems had replaced Egyptian ones. Although this fact may be explained as a matter of fashion, it tends to reveal in any event a newly awakened interest in Dionysus as a porter god and god of the netherworld—aspects of the deity that were stressed in the mysteries.

The Eleusinian mysteries belong to a cycle of feasts performed in two stages, a year apart, or even in three stages, thus requiring a total period of three years if performed according to rule. The three stages are: initiation (μύσις), dedication (τελετή), and full revelation of the mystery (ἐπόπτεια). A person could take part in these ceremonies only once, but it was not a civic duty to participate. It is not certain whether famous Athenians, who were deeply interested in ancestral beliefs, such as the tragedian Aeschylus, were mystai of Eleusis. Yet the Eleusinian celebrations were considered to have an importance and to bring honor to the city. Eleusis, originally, was not connected with Athens; it was an independent and significant place, the residence of a king. The foundations of the citadel reach back partly to the beginning of the 1st millennium B.C. The place of worship was structurally connected with the royal stronghold situated on the top of the adjacent height.

By the early 7th century B.C., Eleusis had lost its independence to Athens. As a result, the administration of the cult passed into the hands of Athenian officials, who respected the old customs, as ancient religious sentiment demanded. Thus, they permitted the old Eleusinian families, among which certain ritualistic functions were hereditary, to retain their rights and privileges, reserving for themselves, however, the power of appointing the high priest.

The Celebration of the Mysteries. The celebration of the mysteries was connected with Athens in the following manner. The preliminary ceremonies were held in Athens and were somewhat modified. But the second and third stage of the ceremonies, which took place in September (Boedromion) and could be held only in Eleusis, began with a solemn procession from Athens to Eleusis.

The dominant theme of the myth is the mother love of Demeter for her daughter Kore—this generic name being apparently older than the individualized name Persephone. Many who might be indifferent to other features of this myth could still appreciate this beautiful human motif. Everywhere else the core of the myth is not mother love but sexual love between man and woman, and only in the Egyptian mysteries is this sexual love the love between husband and wife (Isis and Osiris). In Egypt a child, the boy Horus, is added to this couple, but that is only a side aspect of the myth and does not affect it in any essential way, as it does in part at Eleusis. Actually, however, as regards the symbolism of the Eleusinian Kore, the dominant feature is her relationship to Pluto, the god of death. Kore, the bride whom he captures, represents the final destiny of all vegetative life, indeed of all earthly life, and thus can portray human death in an allegorical manner. The other associations with her and her mother, intended and aroused by the mysteries, become more meaningful only when both become mediators of a better life after death.

The Eleusinian hope is the high point of the so-called Homeric Hymn to Demeter, where in 5.479–481 the lot of the initiated in the hereafter is pictured as more pleasant than that of the noninitiated. Several verses later, they are called the blessed on whom the pair of exalted and chaste goddesses bestow their loving care. The same word blessed (ὄλβιος) describing the lot of the initiates is used by Pindar (Frg. 137, ed. Bergk) and Sophocles (Turchi, no. 152). The word ὄλβιος has about the same sense as the word μακάριος used in the two accounts of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:3– ; Lk 6:20– ). But whereas this word, as used by the Evangelists, praises as blessed the way of life made possible by the New Covenant, the sole title to Eleusinian blessedness is initiation. There is no question of atonement. Only the worst criminals were excluded from initiation, a point severely criticized already in antiquity.

Opinions differ respecting the performance of the rites in the second and third stages and also respecting the precise arrangement of the interior of the sacred building. Benches for spectators, cut out of rock and still recognizable today, prove that participants in the cult engaged in liturgic actions that were visible to all. Literary allusions to emotions of fear manifested by the spectators, and likewise the express mentioning of a descent (καταβάσιον) by Asterius (Hom. 10; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. [Paris 1857–66] 40:324B) suggest the dramatic performance of the moving legend of the rape of Persephone by Pluto. Clement of Alexandria (Protrept. 2.21) has preserved for us the so-called password (σύνοθημα) of Eleusis. It is a formula to be repeated by the candidate for final admission, who had to show thereby that he had passed the intermediate stage. Thus one learns the main actions. The formula runs: ‘‘I have fasted, I have drunk of the sacred cup [κυκεών], I have taken [the things] from the sacred chest, having tasted thereof

I have placed them into the basket and again from the basket into the chest.’’ The fasting and drinking from a ritualistic container evidently aim to imitate ceremonially the fasting of Demeter out of sorrow for the disappearance of her daughter, as related in the legend, and also the drink with which she refreshed herself after having been cheered by the indecent jests of her maid Baubo.

Fertility Aspects of the Rites. In his account, Clement of Alexandria puts the Baubo scene before the cultic action and criticizes it harshly. The handling of the anonymous things (ἀπόρρητα) suggests that they were symbols of female and male sexuality. The dual containers, differentiated by the names ‘‘chest’’ and ‘‘basket,’’ seem also to confirm this view. This assumption seems logical and is confirmed by other intimations of the Church Fathers.

This explanation of the last act of the synthema, or password ceremony, which is described in such cryptic language, seems sound for intrinsic and extrinsic reasons. (1) Such an act is in keeping with a fertility cult. Other secondary Eleusinian rites contain this feature, as the call to the earth: ὕε, χύε, ‘‘rain, conceive’’ (Proclus, In Tim. 40E). (2) This action is appropriate to the second stage of the rites. (3) Certain finds in the temple of Demeter at Priene, a kind of affiliate of Eleusis, similar to the one established especially in Alexandria, show a marked sexual emphasis. These finds suggest directly the use of the female sexual symbols as a means of initiation. The simultaneous use of the male symbol is the more easily explained, since the latter plays a central role in the Hellenistic mystery rites that exhibit a more or less close dependence on Eleusis.

The procedure at the third stage, revelation (ἐπόπτεια), is known through independent and credible assertions of early ecclesiastical writers and Fathers. Two acts are mentioned. The first is the ‘‘hierogamy,’’ or sacred marriage between the high priest (hierophant) and priestess (cf. Gregory of Nazianzus and Proclus; Turchi, nos. 32– ). It was probably intended to symbolize the mythical nuptials of Demeter and Iasion on the thrice-plowed field (Hesiod, Theog. 969–972), itself the mythical symbol of the sacred marriage of heaven and earth. Hippolytus furnishes important additional information. The priest raised a freshly cut ear of wheat—obviously the fruit of this sacred marriage—with the loud cry: ‘‘The exalted goddess bore a holy boy, the strong one bore a strong child’’ (Turchi, no. 130). As a confirmation of the prehistoric age of this rite and of the relation of the nucleus of the Eleusinian cult actions to the early farming stage of culture, it is to be noted that the same rite has been found in North Africa and in the period preceding the spread of the Indo-European culture in the West (cf. D. J. Wölfel in König, Christus, 1:340– ).

Thus, one sees that at Eleusis hope in a better life to come and improvement of material welfare, which is so dependent on the fruits of the earth, are closely connected. St. Paul has pointed out an association of ideas between wheat and the hereafter (1 Cor 15.37). Eleusinian eschatology, however, did not embrace precisely what for Paul was the symbolism of the sprouting seed, namely, bodily resurrection. The quasi-official formulation of the Eleusinian hope in the Homeric Hymn is remarkably modest. It does not look beyond a life in the lower world, and even for this it dares to promise the initiates, as opposed to noninitiates, only a gradual improvement in their lot.

Evaluation and Later History. Yet these rites gave their initiates the consolation that there was at least one form of divine worship that showed some interest in the great question of the beyond. The official cults of the Greek states ignored this problem. The Olympians enjoyed their own blessedness without caring for the future lot of men. M. J. Lagrange has given the noblest interpretation of the Eleusinian Mysteries; one should not speak blindly of magic here, but should regard the whole procedure as an act of trust in the power of the “august goddesses.” But despite the consolation furnished by the rites and the veneration they enjoyed from age itself, they could not withstand critical examination. The comfort could be only as real as the persons of the divinities themselves.

Later classic times and especially the Hellenistic age, however, recognized fully the symbolic-mythical values contained in the rites. Not only in Athenian but in all ancient literature, Eleusis was renowned as an inalienable jewel of the city of Athens, a symbol of its cultural contributions, the first and most basic of which was the raising of cereals. Even after the mysteries had lost all credence in ancient Greece, including Attica itself, they were still celebrated with pomp as old folk customs, with a feeling for history and with a treasuring of the past for its own sake. During the several revivals of Greek culture, beginning with the great efforts of Hadrian, the mysteries’ power of attraction was proved again and again, especially in the case of the Romans who took pleasure in becoming initiates. Alaric destroyed a great part of the sanctuary in A.D. 395, and the celebration of the rites was forbidden by the laws of Theodosius the Great in the same period.

The Cult of the Great Mother, or Magna Mater

Within a limited space it is not possible to cover all vegetation or fertility cults that have mystery elements. The cult of the Great Mother, however, deserves formal treatment, being both so representative and so important.

The early Greeks were already familiar with the mother of Zeus (Μήτηρ Ῥέα), simply as mother of the gods, a figure undoubtedly related to the mother goddess of Asia Minor. But this Greek Rhea has no partner of such dubious and uncertain status as Cybele’s partner Attis. When, therefore, the Phrygian goddess with her companion Attis asked for admission, as was inevitable in a commercial town such as Athens as a result of the influx of immigrants from Asia Minor, the new mother goddess was not identified simply with Rhea but had to be satisfied, like all foreign cults, with a place outside the city walls.

But apparently, already before the Persian wars, some traits of the Asian form of the mother cult had been introduced into the Greek worship of Rhea. This has psychological probability in its favor, since Pindar praises the venerable Asian Mother in one of his Olympic odes (on Hiero). In the Hellenistic Age, the worship of the Magna Mater is conducted at the Peiraeus in full Asiatic style by the ὄργεῶνες (i.e., men who celebrate the orgia) with the assistance of a special cult personnel. There is mention of a priestess of Attis and a couch (κλίνη) that she must prepare for the god. This act may represent the mourning over the dead Attis, who previously seems to have been honored by joyous dances around a throne. Plato was familiar with the exotic ritual of enthronement (ἐνθρονισμός) as part of the initiation of the followers of the Magna Mater, the corybantes (Euthyd. 429D).

Eight hundred years after Plato, in the 4th century A.D., when taurobolia were celebrated in Athens in honor of the Magna Mater, the Asian Mother definitely entered the Greek pantheon and had Demeter and Kore beside her as companion goddesses—a situation that would have been unthinkable in early times.

The Cult of Magna Mater in the Roman Period.

The Romans knew Adonis at an early time in their history, partly through the Greeks of south Italy, and partly through the Etruscans. In 205 B.C., in the crisis of the Second Punic War, they introduced the cult of the Asian Mother from Pessinus in Galatia. The Phrygian cult was given a place on the Palatine, opposite the later house of Livia, but the astute heads of the Roman state allowed only one annual public celebration: the lustration of the image of the Magna Mater in the Almo stream, which had no connection with the fate of Attis. The cult, in the form given it by the emperor Claudius, who was interested in religious antiquities, is known through its incorporation in the Roman religious calendar as well as through archeological representations, e.g., on a sarcophagus in S. Lorenzo fuori le mura. In order to understand the performance of the cult in this later and elaborated form, one must remember the personality of Attis as the representation of the nature cycle and also the basic structure of his myth as outlined earlier in this article. A pine tree, which was intended to represent the hero, profusely decorated as a tree of spring and adorned with an image of Attis, was carried in procession (Firmicus Maternus, De errore prof. rel. 22). At the same time, the tree, since it was an evergreen, may have symbolized his ostensibly newly assumed life, though the myth says nothing about this. Then the procession with the image of the Magna Mater was carried out with much greater pomp. Quite apart from these public ceremonies, secret rites were also performed. As in Eleusis, these were obviously based on ritualistic imitation of events in the myth. Firmicus Maternus mentions a ceremony of mourning the dead (ibid. 23), probably but not necessarily referring to Attis, and an anointing of the throat of the candidates with oil, with the accompanying words: "Take courage, mystae, you belong to a god who has been saved, and he will also be your salvation from toil." Even more valuable is the formula reported in common by both Firmicus Maternus and Clement of Alexandria: "I have eaten from the tympanon [drum], I drank from the kymbalon [cymbal]"—both are instruments employed in the worship of the goddess. Whereas in Firmicus the words "I became a mystes of Attis" follow immediately, Clement mentions (Protr. 2.15) two more mystic acts: "I carried the kernos, I slipped into the bridal chamber." The kernos, a container having several parts and found already in ancient worship, was employed as something intended obviously to produce its effect as an archaic rite. The last statement quoted gives a key at least to the general meaning.

Evaluation and Later History. Obviously the rite was intended to impress upon the mystai the subjective certainty of having been united in a special way with the goddess, as in a mystic marriage or, on a more modest plane, as Lagrange has proposed, as a personal servant of the Great Mother. It seems clear that the strong motivation of hope present in this cult, a hope in harmony with the religious interests of the Greco-Roman period, probably served as a foundation for a belief in a higher and better life beyond the grave. It would thus be in the line of the Eleusinian ideology. The rhetorical vehemence with which Firmicus, the chief source, criticizes such rites must be understood in the light of the times. But the Christian polemist is right in reminding the believers in these mysteries that the whole activity has no real value or meaning, since it is based entirely on myth. In form and content the sacred formulas are essentially an imitation of the Eleusinian "symbol." Formally they are a synopsis of the rites that the candidate for membership had to undergo before he could be admitted to the final initiation. In content these rites are modeled on the myth, as the containers chosen for food and drink are the drum and the cymbal. These instruments were said to have been used by the goddess on her mythical journey through the mountains of Asia Minor and hence were employed also in the public processions in honor of Cybele.

Something original, something as yet without analogy in any Greek cult, is mentioned by Prudentius (Peristeph.). In some 80 verses he describes the ceremony of the TAUROBOLIUM in the cult of the Magna Mater. It deserves notice here because the rebirth mentioned in the pertinent inscriptions as the expected effect has often been compared with the rebirth that is promised as an effect of baptism (Ti 3:5). But the taurobolium aimed at a restoration of physical forces only through the blood of a bull. The general atmosphere of the rite is not one of spiritual hopes, and it is occasionally taken over as a rite beneficial for the common good (pro salute Caesaris). All the Western evidence dates from the 2d century A.D. on.

The Mysteries of Dionysus

Between the Eleusian and the Dionysian mysteries there are several important differences. The cult of Eleusis keeps its external structure unchanged, primarily because it is bound to a definite locality, but the cult of Dionysus varies considerably in place and time. The significance of the two Eleusinian divinities is already evident from the Homeric poems; and in addition to the data furnished by archeology, a considerable body of relatively clear information is found in early Christian literature.

As regards the secret worship of Dionysus (i.e., mystery rites that go back to the pre-Hellenic period), the evidence comes in part from widely separated places and is difficult to correlate. Furthermore, the evidence is open to serious question on the historical side and refers to markedly different periods. Yet Dionysus is a divinity who is clearly the object of a mystery cult. This is evident from his local origin and his myth, scanty as it is, as well as from the nature of the god as revealed by the sum of all available data—and especially by the data preserved in the form of his cult.

According to Greek legend, Dionysus came to Greece from Thrace (as in Euripides's Bacchae) and also by sea (as is recalled in the role of the vehicle in the form of a ship employed in the Athenian Dionysia). The recently established connection of this god with ancient Cretan religion tends to confirm that he was not out of harmony with the Greek fertility worship and was integrated into it at an early date. The restriction of the domain of Dionysus to wine, and more specifically to viticulture, is found in certain ancient writers, e.g., Diodorus, who have spun out long myths on Dionysus as the god of wine. Relying on this evidence, H. Jeanmaire thinks he can clarify more sharply the particular function of this god and his cult. The difficulty is that among the late mythographers it is hard to distinguish between earlier and later myths. The Orphics elaborated the saga of the birth of the god into a confused pattern of stories in order to obtain a foundation for their profound speculation. The older saga tells of the tragic death of the god's mother, Semele, and it is highly suggestive that this name means earth, as P. Kretschmer has established. The desire to see Zeus cost her her life.

The myth relates matters that normally belong to child rearing, but with this difference, that the people engaged in this task are naturally mythical persons. Thus Hermes entrusts the care of the child to the nymphs, but it soon escapes from its nurses. This incident provides the Boeotian cult of Dionysus, at least in the later period, with the motif of a search in the mountains for Dionysus by the Thyads. The latter are but other names for the frenzied female attendants of the god, the Maenads, who personify in the cult the nymphs assigned to the care of the child by Hermes.

The birth of a god who, like Dionysus, is so closely connected with vegetation and belongs to the old pair of fertility divinities, must be followed by a death. Accordingly, Philochorus, a specialist in the history of religion writing in the early Hellenistic age, mentions a tomb of Dionysus within the temple precinct of Delphi. The ceremonies devoted to the awakening of the god to a new birth took place, however, only every third year. This was a very awkward situation, since Dionysus was regarded as being temporarily in residence at Delphi, substituting for Apollo, who was thought to spend the winter with the Hyperboreans.

The love affair between Dionysus and Ariadne is typical of the vegetation myth: Ariadne's early death is the counterpart of the disappearance of Persephone. The myth, which in the elaborate literary form given it by poets such as Nonnus (5th century A.D.) tells of Dionysus's journey to India, is very late. It is merely a reflection of Alexander's Indian campaign.

Spread of the Cult and Its Special Features. The older myths of the journeys of Dionysus reflect the early propagation and the peculiar nature of the cult. This cult, manifestly an ecstatic one from the outset and under the strong influence of women, was spread successfully despite the opposition of political authorities, as indicated in the story of the revenge of Dionysus on the Theban king Pentheus. Euripides in his Bacchae describes this revenge in detail. Bacchus (Dionysus) induces Pentheus to search for the Maenads who are roving about Mt. Parnassus, but they take him for an animal and tear him to pieces. This is, at the same time, one of the earliest accounts of the rite of omophagy. During the winter and early spring, female worshipers of Dionysus used to roam about Parnassus, hunting down wild animals, tearing them apart, and eating their raw flesh.

Phrygia furnishes more convincing evidence than does central Greece for the ceremony of the awakening of Dionysus. Here he passes for a god hibernating in the realm of Persephone—a slight mitigation only of the idea of the death of the vegetation god, who in spring is brought in with great pomp at the feast of the Katagogia (cf. Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Die Religion der Griechen [Leipzig 1932] 2:373–). In the Hellenistic period there is mention of a state-controlled cult of Dionysus at Miletus, in which raw flesh was eaten, evidently a civilized continuance of ancient savage customs, but subsequently placed under state control (ibid. 372). The mad celebrations in the Parnassus region, which were intended also to awaken the god Dionysus, did not exclude men completely but were the special privilege of women. In this respect, because of the esoteric tendency present, the celebrations in question fall within the general framework of the mystery cult.

The time after Alexander witnessed a general revival of Dionysian worship. For Egypt, there is proof for the spread of secret Dionysian rites in the fact that Ptolemy Philopator took measures to bring even the privately conducted rites of Dionysus under his control. A royal decree ordered those in possession of initiation formulas to register them in person with the government; obviously the government feared excesses. About the same time this cult, which for a long time had been prevalent in southern Italy, exhibited a new development, characterized by violence, sexual excesses, and even murder; and it spread to Rome itself. Therefore the Roman Senate took prompt and severe action, as is recorded in the extant inscription on bronze, the Senatus consultum de Bacchanalibus and by the historian Livy (39.14.1).

The Pompeian Evidence. Nevertheless, more moderate forms of the rite were allowed to continue, as is proved by the series of paintings in one of the halls of the so-called Villa dei Misteri (also called the Villa Iam). The connection with the cult of Dionysus is certain, since in this cycle of paintings Dionysus, with his familiar attribute the thyrsus, or staff, and reposing on the bosom of his beloved Ariadne, occupies the commanding place. This obviously mythical scene may be considered as expressing the inner meaning of the mystery that is to be dramatically presented. As the precise portraiture indicates, the actors include not only definite persons, such as the mistress of the house, but also, along with them and without sharp distinction, mythical beings such as Silenus and Pan. A winged form, whether a mythical figure or a personification of the mystic rite (τελετή), lays the lash upon the back of a woman. This scene is framed first by the unveiling of the phallus, the initiation proper, and secondly by the solo dance of a woman. If it was intended to symbolize the joys of the hereafter to be expected from participation in the initiation, this dance, not perhaps positively licentious and yet not especially exalted in character, bears witness to the typically pagan concept of the future life. In any case, the series of scenes in the Villa Igem, whether representing an initiation into a mystery or simply a bridal ceremony, is characteristic of a Greco-Roman Dionysian ritual, with an emphasis on sensation and surprise.

This set of paintings of the Villa Igem, notably the initiation rite proper (i.e., the unveiling of the phallus), is paralleled by a series of so-called Campanian reliefs, and M. I. Rostovtzeff has interpreted the paintings of the Casa Omeria in Pompeii as having much the same content. Accordingly, it seems assured that some kind of mystery cult of Dionysus flourished in the vicinity of Naples in the 1st century A.D. Whether the inscription of Agripinilla describes genuine Dionysiac worship or refers to more or less licentious revels under the cloak of mystery rites is not clear (see M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion, 2 v. [2d ed. Munich 1955–61] 2:343–344). By this time the Hellenistic mystery religion had developed a kind of “common liturgical language” with fixed formulas.

Problems of Interpretation. The real secret seems to be the sexual element, but sublimated as a symbol of all fertility. The striving to come into closer contact with the mystery divinities, however, is difficult to explain, especially in the case of Dionysus, when one looks for the precise reason why Dionysus should be a particularly fitting mediator of hopes for the hereafter. Heraclitus of Ephesus, reflecting on the riotous scenes during the Dionysia in his city in the 5th century B.C., states in one of his customary obscure utterances: “They celebrate the grape feast in honor of Hades.” But he says this as one who sees more deeply than the common man, and he says it with pensive melancholy in the light of the contrast between festive joy and the frailty of all vegetative and earthly life. In any case, the cycle of Dionysian myths, while to a limited degree symbolizing growth, offers far less expectation of salvation than is the case in the Oriental group.

A ritualistic drama commemorating the annual awakening and passing of vegetation, as mentioned earlier, maintained itself in a few places only, e.g., in Delphi and in Phrygia. Even this fact would hardly be known, unless historians such as Plutarch with antiquarian interests had reported it. Dionysus was surnamed from the outset Lyseus as a symbolic personification of or as the mythical giver of wine. All that ancient speculation itself associated with this title exhibits an attempt at a theological interpretation of this metaphor, which has interest chiefly because, beneath the play of legend, it reveals the religious aspirations and longing for salvation on the part of pagan souls.

Orphism

The myth of the child Dionysus already pointed in the direction of the Dionysus of Orphism. The latter figure, it is true, has received a highly complex elaboration and is overladen with fantastic myths that cannot be told here in detail. And yet Orphism is so important that some attention must be given it in this article. It was certainly a combination of opposites and had a bad name in antiquity because of its practice of licentious rites and its strange manner of life. Orphism, the origins of which continue to be warmly debated, alone among the mystery religions—except perhaps Mithraism and the Egyptian mysteries because of their emphasis on eschatology—possessed a complete system of doctrine, and was concerned with the dissemination of knowledge. All other mysteries, being essentially forms of worship, aimed only at producing certain dispositions of mind and vague hopes.

Earlier History. In the modern investigation of mystery religions, Orphism has long occupied a special place through the importance assigned to it by Plato. Whether the latter agrees with the opinions he introduces from Orphism is not always clear from his words. It is to be assumed rather that he wishes merely to praise the general character and line of thought that he quotes in support of his own doctrines, e.g., the belief in retribution in the hereafter and therefore in the meaning of human life as involving moral responsibility.

In support of such a view of life Orphism created a profound myth. It can be traced back to an origin in single individuals and in the first place to Onomacritus, who lived in the age of the Pisistratids (6th–5th century B.C.). The lot of man is viewed as a miserable result of an original sin, yet one not committed by man but by his mythical ancestors. According to Orphic teaching men are formed out of the ashes of the Titans, sons of Uranus and Gaia, therefore, of a pre-Olympian race of gods. They had been destroyed by the lightning of Zeus because they had committed the outrage of tearing to pieces and devouring his child Dionysus, all except his heart. Athena brought the heart to Zeus, who in turn swallowed it and produced another Dionysus, namely, the Dionysus of Orphism. The Papyrus Smily, also called the Papyrus Gurob after its place of discovery in Egypt (Kern, Orph. Frg. 31), dates from the 3d century B.C. and confirms the earlier myth.

In mentioning the playthings of the child Dionysus, it tells of the Titans tearing him to pieces. They fell upon him while he was playing a child's game, amusing himself with the apples of the Hesperides. This tends to prove its existence at an earlier date in the Greek area, the sole source for its spread to Egypt. It is very interesting to note that writers under the early empire are the first to tell that the Titans had devoured the limbs of the child.

Orphism, in keeping with the formal, artificial character of its origins, left free scope for further development and personal transformation. But as opposed to the view of I. M. Linforth, it must be maintained that closed Orphic associations, therefore societies of mystai, existed already in classical Greek times. In the Hellenistic age, the Papyrus Gurob—perhaps because it was the cult legend of one of the Dionysian societies that by order of Ptolemy Philopator was required to turn over religious documents—appears to confirm the existence of mysteries under Orphic influence. Orphism in this period, however, seems to have been the object of scholarly study rather than a living and active cult.

Later History and Evaluation. An Orphic book of hymns dating from the early imperial age seems to be the work of certain societies, especially in the city of Pergamon, where a shrine has been discovered in which deities praised in the hymns were worshiped. But the manner of worship that the book indicates has nothing to do with a mystery religion so far as almost all external rites described are concerned. The cosmogony of Orphism—which is intended to include its theogony and anthropogony—was fully elaborated apparently only at a late date and is known exclusively from Neoplatonic sources. It gives an important place to the primitive cosmic egg. This motif is not a mythical Greek fabrication but belongs to the earliest mythological cosmogony and can be traced back to very early prehistoric cultures. In the Roman imperial age it was connected with the figure of Aion. The Aion of Modena is of the greatest value historically. It is a figure so loaded with attributes as to leave an unaesthetic impression; but to the men of late antiquity, to which it belongs, it served as a symbol of the esoteric wisdom underlying the outward representation. The so-called Orphic passports for the dead, found in Crete and south Italy, contain instructions for a confession of innocence similar to those with which the ancient Egyptians provided themselves for their meeting with the judge of the dead in the other world. Connection with Egypt, accordingly, has been suggested for this Orphic phenomenon (see Prüm, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. Pirot et al. [Paris 1928– ] 6:72).

Mithraism and Other Oriental Mysteries

At the outset, it may be stated that there are certain analogies with Orphism. These analogies are found in the form of its origin and in its emphasis on doctrinal content. Mithraism, like Orphism, was founded by specific individuals. Magi, Persian priests from north and east Persia and from the highlands of Cappadocia, consciously influenced by the tendencies toward a union of Greek and Oriental religious elements, created this cult in the 4th—3d century B.C. The Oriental basis was primarily Persian popular religion and not Persian Zoroastrianism. Zoroaster had condemned all gods of the popular religion without being able to extirpate them. The Magi put the Indo-Persian deity Mitra, conceived as a noble figure and given certain features of the Babylonian sun-god Shamash, in the center of a theogonic and cosmogonic myth. The name Mitra means truth, faithfulness, or contract. (See MITHRAS AND MITHRAISM.)

Sources of Mithraism. In the absence of literary sources, the myth must be interpreted essentially from the monuments, a relatively large number of which have been preserved. The fairly copious monumental evidence is to be explained in part from the nature of the places of worship. The latter were artificial grottoes, imitations of natural caves, which were low and small and could accommodate only a few dozen worshippers. No Mithraic association had more than 100 members, and most of them had a much smaller number. Since the worshippers were mostly soldiers, the Mithraea, or shrines of the cult, have been found especially on the frontiers—hence, in Britain, along the Rhenish and Danubian Limes, and in Africa and Asia. Dura-Europos on the Euphrates was a flourishing center of Mithraism. After the abandonment of the military frontiers under various pressures, these shrines, often wholly or partly subterranean, no longer occasioned special interest, and thus much of their content was left intact. Obviously Rome as a military center and world capital with a large percentage of foreigners in its population has revealed many Mithraic shrines, though these may not have been used simultaneously. Archeological investigation has identified more than 50. Ostia, possibly more Orientalized than Rome, has yielded 18 Mithraea, a relatively large number, even if they are usually small.

The Mithraic Myth. The doctrine of Mithraism, a combination of Greek theogony and an Iranian myth, is concerned with the origin of fertility from a celestial bull. The god, born out of a rock, who enters an already existing pantheon of the Greek type, brings this bull from the kingdom of the moon and kills him. This triumph of youthful force was given a typical iconographic form by a great artist and this form was never changed: a represensation of Nike bringing a sacrifice of thanksgiving after victory. This achievement of Mithras made Mithraism an appropriate religion for soldiers. Further mythical scenes beside the main picture show another battle of Mithras, this time with the Sun (Sol, Helios), who finally receives him in friendship and takes him to heaven in his chariot. The last scene undoubtedly embodies the hope that is impressed in seven ceremonial stages (Raven, Nymph, Soldier, Lion, Persian, Sun-runner, Father): an expectation of an afterlife in the sky, which gained ground under the empire, because an underworld hereafter came to be felt as gloomy and repulsive.

Mithraic Ritual. The whole interior of the Mithraic shrine is arranged for holding a meal in the ancient way, with participants reclining on couches—hence the bench-like structures along the side walls. The meal consisted of bread and water. But neither the meal nor the Mithraic baptism—exclusively a form of purification as found in many religions—was the essential element of Mithraic ritual. The all-important feature was the tests of courage required for admission to the higher degrees. They are represented in formidable fashion in the Mithraeum of Capua and partially also in that found under the church of St. Prisca in Rome. An inscription from the latter mentions a cauterisatio, the branding with the sign of the god, a ceremony that Tertullian compares with confirmation. A Mithraeum discovered at San Marino (Castelli Romani) exhibits beautiful cultic scenes.

For the higher speculations associated with Mithraism, the Borysthenic discourse of the famous Sophist Dio Chrysostom (b. c. A.D. 40; d. after 112), is repeatedly cited. He describes a cosmogony and an anthropogony, including a kind of original sin of man, in the sense of Plato's Phaedrus, but with emphasis on the Stoic doctrine of universal conflagration. It is not known, however, to what extent this is his own personal doctrine (cf. M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion, 2:688). The age and origin of the figure of Aion, which is often represented separately along with the bull scene and which resembles the Orphic Aion of Modena, are doubtful. The opinion of F. Cumont, who would have Aion dominate the whole pantheon, has lost ground. The figure is now identified rather with Ahriman himself, the evil principle of Mazdaism, and it seems that a place was found for this worship in Mithraism.

Other Oriental Mysteries. It is not necessary here to deal in detail with the cult of Adonis—which never became a fully developed mystery religion—and with the Egyptian mysteries, since their more important aspects were covered earlier in the article and in particular in the treatment of the Mysteries of Eleusis. Attention was called also to the possibility of connecting the congratula-tion of the mystai on “the god that has been saved,” which is directed perhaps to the mystae of the Magna Mater, with the mystae of Osiris. Since the various mysteries had so much in common, it is very much to the point to refer to a passage in the Metamorphoses of Apuleius. It makes a journey to the elements or the stars the core of the mysteries of Isis. This journey was probably intended to be an actual anticipation of the eventually expected real journey to the stars (see Metamorphoses 11.23).

Relations with Christianity

The question of the relations between the mystery religions and Christianity arose in the 19th century as a result of the simultaneous operation of two factors, namely, the systematic scholarly investigation of the history of the mystery religions by classical philology and archeology and the decline in the belief in the historical reliability of the New Testament revelation as a consequence of so-called liberal and historical exegesis. Within the limits of this article, only the high points concerning the question of relationship can be treated. For detailed coverage, see the bibliography following this article.

New Testament Evidence and Its Interpretation.

In contrast to the Old Testament, where a specific warning is given against Adonis worship, the Gospels mention the Magi; and this in itself might well be interpreted as containing an allusion to a mystery cult, namely, that of the Persian Mithras (cf. Matthew ch. 2). On the basis of the copious evidence for the employment of Semitic equivalents in the Qumran texts for the Greek mysterion, it is clear that the mere use of the term mysterion does not mean that St. Paul consciously wished to imply a connection between Christian and pagan use of the term, to say nothing of any positive approval of any Christian connection with pagan mysteries whether in their forms of worship or in their literary or written presentations. Paul uses the word mysterion nearly always in the singular, while by contrast the pagan mysteries are nearly always mentioned in the plural. The following point is more significant. Paul employs the singular form mysterion in the sense of the secret, hidden design of God in its totality. There is no emphasis on the cult aspect.

Christian Mystery and Pagan Mystery. Forms of worship, namely, the Sacraments, may be included in the term mysteria as found in 1 Cor 4.1; but in that case, as incorporated into the plan of salvation as a unity and in subordination to the Apostles' mission of serving as ambassadors of Christ (2 Cor 5.19, 20).

Even among Catholics, a certain school of exegesis has maintained that Paul saw the tragic experiences of the heroes of the mysteries as a divine pedagogy for the pagans to prepare them for the message of salvation, and from that point of view intended to represent, as opposed to the pagan mystery cults, the real and true mystery. This is unlikely, however, for several reasons. The ancient mysteries do not represent a historical fact, but a regularly recurring annual rhythm. In Christian worship “representation” is not a theatrical and mimic one in a series of separate acts, but is centered as one single moment, the redemptive and decisive act of the Lord on the cross. Finally, in Christian worship this remembrance of a fact is not connected with specific seasons (at least in apostolic times), but takes place every Sunday, and continues to be observed even after the institution of the main liturgical feasts with Easter as their center.

The Apostles’ various admonitions against revels, banquets, etc., cannot be interpreted as referring specifically and literally to the mysteries; at most they are concerned with the excesses occasioned by the public and private worship of Dionysus (Rom 13.13; Eph 5.18). Some exegetes suspect an implied condemnation of the mysteries in the reminiscence in 1 Cor 12.1 of a “magic urge” on the part of hearers to certain cults. Such scholars adopt this view because they believe that Paul, with the idea of the “dumb idols” vividly in mind, is perhaps thinking of those divinities whose emotional worship presents a certain resemblance to excesses connected with phenomena at Corinth. A more likely reference to pagan mysteries is to be found in the heresy of Colossae (see Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. Pirot et al. [Paris 1928– ] 6 [1960] 218–222).

Bibliography: The literature on the mystery religions is voluminous and, given the difficulties presented by the sources, on many points there is no unanimity among scholars. The older literature in this field, furthermore, is dominated, in general, by a tendency to regard Christianity as largely, if not exclusively, an adaptation of the pagan mysteries. General works. N. ## MYSTERY THEOLOGY

The doctrine proposed by O. CASEL concerning the active presence of Christ’s redeeming action in the Sacraments, especially in the Eucharist.

Casel’s Theory. In more than 100 articles, letters, and works from 1918 to 1941, Casel never ceased to develop, to clarify, and to defend a doctrine that he deemed adequate to express the teachings of the Fathers and the most ancient liturgies and that he based on the notion of mysterium. The most explicit exposition of this doctrine can be found in his work The Mystery of Christian Worship (Westminster, Md. 1962; originally published in German in 1932). He says: “The mystery means three things and one. First of all it is God considered in Himself as the infinitely distant, holy, unapproachable, to whom no man may draw near and live. . . . And this all-holy one reveals His mystery, comes down to His creatures and reveals Himself to them; yet once again in mysterio, that is to say, in a revelation by grace to those whom He has chosen, the humble, the pure of heart” (5). “For St. Paul μυστήριον is the marvellous revelation of God in Christ. . . . Christ is the mystery in person, because He shows the invisible Godhead in the flesh” (6). “Since Christ is no longer visible among us, in St. Leo the Great’s words, ‘What was visible in the Lord has passed over into the mysteries.’ We meet His person, His saving deeds, the working of His grace in the mysteries of His worship. ST. AMBROSE writes: ‘I find you in your mysteries” (7). “The content of the mystery of Christ is, therefore, the person of the God-man and His redeeming act for the salvation of the Church; it is through this act that the Church is integrated into the mystery” (12).

It is precisely in the mystery of worship that this integration of the Church in the mystery of Christ takes place. “As a participation in the life and truth of God, this divine reality infinitely surpasses all abstract teaching. It could not be encompassed in a doctrine; it had to find expression in symbols. Cultic symbols, then, are necessary modes of expression; they do not have a purely pedagogical value, but are bearers of divine salvation. Thus the mystery of Christ finds its necessary incarnation in the mystery of worship” [“Glaube, Gnosis und Mysterium,” Jahrbuch für Liturgiegeschichte 15 (1941) 276]. “The [cultic] mysteries are a working out and an application of Christ’s mystery. God, who revealed Himself in the man Christ, continues after the Ascension of Christ to act on earth through Christ the high priest according to the ordinary economy of communicating grace in the Church, namely, the mystery of worship, which is nothing else but the prolongation of the God-man’s action on earth” (The Mystery of Christian Worship 27).

Although essentially in conformity with the best tradition explicated in PIUS XII’S Mediator Dei and Vatican Council II’s Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Casel’s teaching comprised two elements that in time gave rise to violent controversies. These controversies at least have gradually shown what in Casel’s position was of passing value and what represented a permanent theological acquisition.

Pagan Mysteries. Casel placed his teaching against the perspective of the mystery cults of the ancient Hellenic Mediterranean world. He certainly did not claim that the pagan mysteries exercised a direct influence on the organization of Christian worship. He nonetheless insisted that the use of the same terms by both indicated a fundamental analogy, not indeed on the level of objects, but on that of ways of expression. “The language of the ancient mysteries was used unhesitatingly to express to some extent the unfathomable content of what she [the Church] possessed; indeed many ancient forms and customs were taken over to enrich and adorn the simplicity of the Christian ritual” (The Mystery of Christian Worship 34).

This aspect of Casel’s theory was subjected to lively attack, notably by K. Prümm and J. M. Hanssens, who rejected any influence of pagan mystery terminology in Christian liturgy and believed the Christian use of the term mystery had to be interpreted solely in accordance with its Biblical meaning: a divine secret communicated by revelation. One may say that Casel’s theory has been greatly undermined by subsequent research done on the mystery cults. It seems well established that the latter contained no precise doctrine on the participation of the mysteries in the divine life, even less on the intervention of savior-gods. On the contrary, D. Deden and G. Söhngen appear to have solidly proved the continuity of the Christian doctrine of mystery with the Biblical tradition, notably the Pauline texts.

Presence of the Redemptive Act. Casel, however, put the accent on the active reality of the mystery of salvation to the point that the very presence of the saving act becomes reactualized in the liturgy. He based the necessity for this reactualization on the fact—to him indisputable—that tradition understands man’s participation in the mystery of salvation as implying and demanding a real but mystical participation in the life and death of Christ. It demands a life and a death of Christ in the very sacramental act; this is how we share in His act of salvation. Some of Casel’s expressions seem to imply a reactualization of even the historical aspect of the redemptive act. Despite his lack of precision, his thought was very firm on this point. He did not insist on such historical contingencies, but his fear of seeing the realism of the mystery-presence reduced, and his inability to use a more conceptual way of thinking prevented him from accepting the approach of other theologians, even of those who were less distant from his own conception than he recognized. However, his disciples, notably V. Warnach and B. Neunheuser, thought they were able to be faithful to him and yet propose explanations with more delicate nuances and more in conformity with classical theological modes of expression.

Controversy and Progress. Both aspects of Casel’s doctrine came in for criticism; his harshest critics were J. B. Umberg and Prümm, who rejected not only his theory of the Christian mystery’s relationship to the pagan mystery cults, but also his conception of the mystery presence.

The traditional character of Casel’s doctrine and its conformity with patristic teaching have also been the object of discussions. It can now be considered as established (L. Monden, E. Schillebeeckx, and J. Betz) that the Fathers

. . . regard sacramental grace as an ontological participation in the glorified existence of Christ by means of a real configuration to the mystery of His passion and death. In particular, they hold the Mass to be the reactualization, the representation (in the etymological sense of the word) of the sacrificial act of Christ on the cross for His Mystical Body. They therefore clearly and indubitably affirm the fact of a presence of Christ’s death as a saving act in the mystery of Christian worship. Beyond this they do not go. One does not find in their writings a speculatively elaborated theory of the Sacraments; they do not provide any indications as to the how of the mystery presence. [Monden 188]

The compatibility of Casel's doctrine with St. THOMAS AQUINAS'S theology was also discussed. Casel himself did not seem certain that his teaching was in accord with Thomas. Söhngen, the first theologian to attempt the integration of a modified Caselian doctrine in the perspective of classical theology, considered Casel's thought at least foreign to Thomas's teaching.

Such was not the opinion of E. Schillebeeckx, who took up and deepened the views of A. Vonier and E. Masure. Because of the hypostatic union, all that Christ's humanity experienced was assumed by the Divine Person whose acts do not suffer the limits of duration. Consequently, the effect of each act will be realized when the Divine Will, eternally actual, determines that it should be realized. It is primarily through the Sacraments and the other mysteries of worship instituted by the Church that the redemptive mystery is brought to us according to the will of Christ. Summarizing Schillebeeckx's thought, J. Gaillard writes (541):

In the liturgical mysteries we have, at one and the same time, the actual presence of the transcendent element and the virtual presence of the total act (passion, resurrection, etc.) always acting, though its transitory elements belong definitively to the past. The historical salvific act is thus attained by the mysteries, either in itself as far as its permanent element is concerned, or by divine power as far as its purely temporal element is concerned. Liturgical mysteries are truly the celebration and manifestation of the historical redeeming act, even though their actual content is only the mysterium, i.e., the permanent element and the instrumental power.

Moreover, the Thomistic teaching on the sacramental character as a participation in the priesthood of Christ ensures "the real foundation for this unity [of the various liturgical mysteries] and therefore occupies a key position in Catholic sacramentalism. Because of the sacramental character, the symbolic worship of the Church becomes a mysterium; by this mysterium the Sacraments are Christ's own actions in and through the Church" (Schillebeeckx 670).

Bibliography: A complete list of Casel's works (211 nos.) may be found in A. MAYER et al., eds., Vom christlichen Mysterium (Düsseldorf 1951). ## MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST

The phrase "Body of Christ," as applied to the Church, is both Pauline and patristic, but the adjectival modifier "mystical" is neither. As far as known, the phrase "Mystical Body" is first used to designate the militant Church in Latin theological writings of the second half of the 12th century; and the first official document using it is Boniface VIII's bull Unam Sanctam (Nov. 18, 1302, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 870–75). From the time of the Eucharistic controversies in the 9th century until c. 1150, the Latin phrase Corpus mysticum occurs frequently, but it always means Christ's Eucharistic Body. In this Eucharistic meaning there is at work a profound awareness, chiefly Augustinian in inspiration, of the intimate link between Christ's Eucharistic (i.e., mystical) Body, and his Church Body, often called at this time Christ's true Body (verum Corpus). The connection is this: the mystical Eucharistic Body, as a sacramental mystery, both signifies and realizes the "true" or Church-Body of Christ. From c. 1150 onward, BEREN-

GARIUS's errors touching Christ's Eucharistic Presence occasioned by way of reaction such an emphasis on the identity of Christ's Eucharistic Body with his "physical" Body (see Enchiridion symbolorum 700), that the Eucharist began to be called Christ's "true" Body (verum Corpus); and, by a gradual inversion of the two earlier formulas, Christ's Church-Body began to be called his Mystical Body to distinguish it from his true physical Body present in the Eucharist. At first, the qualifier "mystical," applied to the Church-Body, kept its traditional Eucharistic resonances; the Church-Body is thought of as a "mystically" or sacramentally signified and realized Body. With the passage of time, however, this Eucharistic sense of the qualifier "mystical" gradually disappeared. In St. Thomas this dissociation of the adjective "mystical" from its Eucharistic context seems already well begun (see Summa theologiae 3, 8.1 and 8.3); and by the time of the Reformation the Eucharistic connection was wholly lost. For the meaning attached to the term in the early 20th century, see Pius XII's encyclical MYSTICI CORPORIS, par. 58.

St. Paul. Exegetes are not wholly agreed (1) on the origin and meaning of the Pauline theme "Body of Christ;" (2) on the relation between 1 Cor and Rom, where the theme occurs only occasionally, and later epistles such as Col and Eph, where the theme is central and combined with the new themes of "Head" and "fullness."

Origin of Theme. Some exegetes see its origin in the popular Stoic commonplace likening the cosmos or the state to an organism (see 1 Cor 12.12–30; Rom 12.4–5), while others prefer to appeal to the Gnostic myth-motif of the Primal Heavenly Man. Still the most distinctively important elements of the Pauline Body of Christ theme are to be found within the resources of Christian revelation and life, and within the framework of Judaic habits of thought and of expression.

In his presentation of SALVATION HISTORY St. Paul sees Christ as the countertype of ADAM. Just as "the first man, Adam" (1 Cor 15.45) was the head of humankind in its catastrophic fall, so Christ, "the last Adam, became a life-giving spirit" (ibid.) to the new humankind, restored according to "the likeness of the heavenly man" (1 Cor 15.49; see Rom 8.29. See in general 1 Cor 15.20–28; 45–49; Rom 5.12–21). Because Christ, risen and glorified after the victory in his own Body-Person over sin and death, is "the beginning" (Col 1.18; 1 Cor 15.20, 23), i.e., not merely a fresh start in time, but a total fontal beginning of new life, he is the Head of the new humanity in whom all live anew.

In this Adam-Christ parallel St. Paul is using a Hebraic category of thought, namely, the so-called "corporate or inclusive personality." To the Hebraic mind the father-head of a family or nation is looked on as fulfilling a real-representative role compassing and including all his issue; he acts in their name and stead and holds their destiny in his own person and work. His descendants in turn are their forefather, in the sense that his destiny unfolds itself in their lives. This conceptual framework enabled the Hebrew to pass in thought and language from the One to the Many in him, and vice versa. Such inclusiveness, when applied to Christ's Person and work, supposes his oneness with human flesh and blood, but is grounded primarily in his mission, held from his Father, to be the one who is the beginning of the new age and the new creation; whose saving acts, once done in history's center, have meaning and make destiny for the Many compassed in his Body-Person; and whose Spirit-filled Humanity is now in glory qualified to invest sacramentally the Many, as they appear in the unfolding of time, with the new life which is his once and forever.

To appreciate the realism of St. Paul's SOTERIOLOGY, one must recognize how forcefully he stresses the role of the human being Jesus in salvation history (see Rom 5.15; 1 Cor 15.21; 15.47; 1 Timothy 2.5). To St. Paul SALVATION in Christ is neither Greek nor Gnostic in aiming at any final emancipation from the body; rather it presses for the integral renewal of the "old man" in totality. This is possible only through union with the human being Jesus and with his saving work, wrought in his Body-Person; this is possible only through a sharing in his passage from his lowly Body of death, wholly like (sin apart) the human being's own natural style of existence, to his new Body of life in glory. In Christ's own life the Body of sin and death, which he took on himself at his Father's behest, was broken in death (see Rom 8.3), and in a critical reversal of the old world's momentum this same Body, now "spiritual" and "life-giving" (1 Cor 15.44–58), is endowed with all the newness of life through the Spirit (Rom 1.4). To be saved one must share in Christ's way and level of life; one must be wholly conformed to "the body of his glory" (Phil 3.21; see 2 Cor 3.18); one must "bear the likeness of the heavenly man" (1 Cor 15.49). The Body of Jesus, the living Body-Person, has then the decisive role in the work of the salvation of humans; and it is into that Body, passing and passed from death to glorious life, that Christians are baptized (see Rom 6.3–11; Gal 3.27; 1 Cor 1.13–15) in a union the reality of which belongs to a new final order that in this present world is still hidden (Col 3.3) and only beginning. By Baptism in faith the whole Christian, as a body-person, begins sharing in the new life of the human being Jesus, and this sacramental union, inaugurated in Baptism and consummated in the Eucharist, tends right from the start, even in this world, toward the "spiritual body” that will transform the human being’s “natural body” (1 Cor 15.44; see Rom 6.8; 8.11).

The Pauline theme of the Body of Christ has thus primarily a soteriological provenience and meaning. It always involves a reference to the individual Body of Christ, i.e., to him who has borne death up in his own Body onto the cross, and who enters into heaven to become the bearer of new life in his glorious Body. The mode of this most unique of unions by which the glorious Christ compasses in himself all Christians as his members is something St. Paul is not much concerned with. What he does stress is: (1) the tremendous reality and intimacy of this inward-outward union, without prejudice to the distinct personalities, divine or human; (2) the prime ground of the union in the dead and risen Savior, the human being Jesus (see Col 2.17); (3) the wholeness of the term of the union, i.e., the individual member is a body-person; and (4) the many members who are Body together, or “fellow members of the same body” (Eph 3.6).

Relation of Great Epistles to Col and Eph. The main lines of the development of the theme in Rom and 1 Cor (1 Cor 6.12–20; 10.17; 12.12–30; Rom 12.4–5) are substantially continued in later epistles (Col 2.11–13, compared with 1.22; 3.9–11; Eph 2.14–16; 4.4–6). These letters are clearly within the tradition of Paul, though their direct authorship is debatable. They combine new traits with the earlier Body of Christ theme, thus enriching it with a fusion of new elements. The new emphases in Col are the following: (1) the Body is now personified and practically identified with the universal Church; (2) the glorified Christ appears as the Head of the Church-Body and is thus clearly distinguished from it; and (3) the Body theme is associated with a more cosmic dimension of salvation, a development that is manifested by its linkage with the term “fullness.” Eph includes these themes and contributes further: (1) a focus on the hierarchical structure of the Body of Christ; and (2) the image of the Church as the “Bride of Christ,” which stresses its distinctiveness from Christ more than its identity. The Body of Christ now designates the object of Christ’s redemptive love; He is the “savior of the body” (Eph 5.23), of which Christians are “the members” (5.30). This Body is a living organism, holding together all Christians and which “attains a growth which is of God” (Col 2.19; see Eph 4.16). This Body is “the Church” (Col 1.18, 24; Eph 1.22–23; 5.23–33); Christians are its “members” (Eph 4.25); and Christ is its “Head” (Col 1.18; 2.19; Eph 1.22; 4.15–16; 5.23). Lastly, this Body is associated with the theme of “fullness” (Col 1.18–2.3; 2.9; Eph 1.23; 4.13–16).

In the Head-Body combination, the term Head is used in a twofold metaphorical sense: (1) superior authority or leader (Col 1.18; Eph 1.22; 5.23); (2) source of the energies of life and growth (Col 2.19; Eph 4.15–16). The origin of this thematic combination is not easy to discern. However, the term Head, meaning superior authority, is a Biblical metaphor, which St. Paul applies to Christ, apart from the Body theme, first in 1 Cor 11.3, and then later in Col 2.10. In the latter case St. Paul calls Christ the Head of the cosmic “Powers,” thus countering certain false speculations, current at Colossae, that placed Christ on a level with these “Powers.” Once Christ is thus thought of as Head in this sense, the metaphor could be conveniently combined with the Body theme, with Christ becoming the authoritative Head, the glorious Lord, ruling his Body the Church. The Head-Body combination once thus made, could admit a further metaphorical coloration with the use of the term Head to signify the vital principle of nurture and of growth in a living body, a usage which St. Paul could have taken over from his Hellenistic milieu, especially from the Stoics or from contemporary medical language.

The splendid passage in Eph 5.22–32 is a synthesis of all the ideas on the Church as Body and Christ as Head, with the exception of the Head understood as principle of the Body’s life and growth.

Members of the Body. For St. Paul the baptized faithful are members of the Body. He emphasizes the charismatic diversity in unity of the various members of Christ’s Body in his one Spirit (1 Cor 12; Rom 12.3–8). The faithful are “fellow-members of the same body” (Eph 3.6), not in spite of their differing CHARISMS, but because of them. The member’s various gifts (see 1 Cor 12.7) are meant to conspire under the one Spirit, their author and mover (1 Cor 12.7–11; see Eph 4.7), to serve and adorn the whole Body (Rom 12.3–8; 1 Cor 12.7; 14.12, 26). This unity in diversity is a permanent characteristic of the structure and life of Christ’s Body (1 Cor 12; Rom 12.3–8).

Spirit and Body. That Christ’s Body is intimately joined to the Spirit is clear from the way St. Paul coordinates “one body and one Spirit” (Eph 4.4; see Eph 2.16, 18). The Spirit that is the life principle of the new economy is the Spirit of the Father who quickens the Body of the risen Christ, and through Him, the Christian (1 Cor 15.44–49; see 1 Cor 6.17). The Spirit of Christ (Rom 8.9; Gal 4.6; Phil 1.19; see 2 Cor 3.17) is the inward life-giving principle, sovereignly building up and forming the Church as the living Body of Christ (1 Cor 12.3–11, 13). The Spirit is given in Baptism (1 Cor 6.11; Tit 3.5).

Fathers. The mystery of the Church as Christ’s Body found congenial expression in the Fathers (notably Origen, Hilary, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, and Augustine), although often they treat it less in itself than in the elaboration of other doctrinal themes, e.g., the INCARNATION, the REDEMPTION, the divinization of the Christian, and the Eucharist. Here only certain general patristic orientations will be indicated.

(1) St. Ignatius of Antioch touched the heart of this mystery when he urged the faithful of the Church of Magnesia to “a union both according to the flesh and according to the spirit” (To the Magnesians, 1.2; see To the Smyrnaeans, 12.2). The key patristic belief that Ignatius expresses here is this: that the empiric Church-Body that the Fathers knew so well as churchmen and as faithful is Christ’s Spirit-quickened Body; that the great mystery that the Father had in mind since eternity is now being realized, with a beginning finality, in the continuing work of Christ in his Body, the present Church. In the early Church “the appeal to the Church’s holiness was born of the fact that men took the visible Church seriously” (J. Ratzinger, Volk und Haus Gottes in Augustins Lehre von der Kirche, München 1954, 65). The grace of the new economy is profoundly incarnational, an embodied grace, because the Church’s “beginning and first-fruits is the flesh of Christ” (Augustine, In epist. Ioh. 2.2, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 35:1990). The principle that the Fathers used in their reflections on the mystery of the visible Church is “the sacramental principle, which marks the necessary union between the visible sign and the hidden reality, . . . a principle as dear to the West as to the East” (J. DANÉLOU, “Μία Ἐκκλησία chez les Pères grecs des premiers siècles,” in 1054–1954: L’Église et les Églises, Chevetogne 1954, 1.139).

(2) A second patristic constant is this: “the great and glorious Body of Christ” (Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 4.33.7, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 7:1076) is the one sphere of Christ’s Spirit ever “realizing the will of the Father in human beings and renewing them from their old way into the newness of Christ” (ibid. 3.17.1, Patrologia Graeca 7:929). “For,” says Paul, “God has established in the Church Apostles, prophets, teachers,— and all the other effects of the Spirit’s working, in which those who do not come together in the Church, have no share. . . . Where the Church is, there is the Spirit of God; and where the Spirit of God is, there is the Church and all grace. And the Spirit is truth. Wherefore those who have no share in the Spirit . . . do not drink of the shining water flowing from the Body of Christ . . .” (ibid. 3.24.1, Patrologia Graeca 7:966). It is to “Christ’s own Spirit” (Cyril of Alexandria, In Ioh. Evang. 17.20–21, Patrologia Graeca 74:561) that is primarily due the varied and total inward-outward life of Christ’s Body, in which each member has his proper energies and role suiting him to serve the interplay of faith and hope and love in the communion of the saints; it is to the Spirit likewise that is due the Body’s splendid holiness. These patristic convictions are condensed in an Augustinian formula still current: “What the soul is to the body of a human being, that the Holy Spirit is to Christ’s Body which is the Church” (Serm. 267.4, Patrologia Latina 38:1231). Indeed these patristic affirmations were so urgent and so massive that they opened up genuine problems. Faced with certain heterodox puritan movements such as MONTANISM and DONATISM, the Fathers were challenged to save not merely the appearances, but the reality of the “Una Sancta,” the One Holy Body of Christ. Among the troublesome problems that they thus had to grapple with were these: (a) how is the grave sinner, especially a heresiarch, to be thought of as having place and role within the glorious Body of Christ; (b) in what measure is the Spirit, with his grace, at work outside the Church’s frontiers, particularly in the Sacraments of the schismatic and Heretic?

(3) Another significant orientation is the indissoluble association that the Fathers proclaimed between Christ’s Eucharistic Body and his Church-Body, with the Eucharist being the supreme symbol and the chief realization of the inward-outward unity of the Church-Body. To the Fathers it was unthinkable to accord the Eucharist a kind of independent treatment apart from its chief effect, which is the in- and con-corporation of Christ’s members in his one Body. To partake of the Eucharist meant to be embodied into the Church. Communion in the sacred “things” or elements of the Eucharist (communio sanctorum in the real-sacramental sense) meant communion with Christ and with the saints who are his members (communio sanctorum in the masculine-personal sense). For St. Augustine, writes Ratzinger, “what makes the essence of the concrete Church is this: that she celebrates and is the Body of Christ” (“Herkunft und Sinn der Civitas-Lehre Augustins,” in Augustinus Magister, Paris 1954, 2.978). Augustine, who here, as elsewhere, dominates the whole development of medieval ECCLESIOLOGY, says: “If then you are the Body of Christ and his members, your mystery is laid on the Lord’s table; you are receiving your own mystery. . . . Be what you see, and receive what you are” (Serm. 272, Patrologia Latina 38:1247–48).

(4) One last patristic orientation. At times some Fathers give the term “Body of Christ” a meaning and an extension different from that of the Pauline letters, in which Christ’s Body is a visible Body, sacramentally and hierarchically structured, and composed of baptized Christians as its members. St. Augustine, e.g., more than once makes the Body of Christ comprehend all the saints “who are to be born and to believe in Christ from Abel himself until the end of time” (In Psalm. 90 serm. 2.1, Patrologia Latina 37:1159). The Church-Body thus understood as reaching out and comprising in a solidarity of Christian faith all the saints of both covenants, old and new, is a theological construct, due mainly to the Latin Fathers. St. Augustine and St. Gregory the Great were deeply influential in impressing this development on later Western ecclesiology.

Although the Fathers found it useful to express in this way the continuing unity of the whole historical economy of salvation, nevertheless they had a deep sense of the newness and originality of Christianity and held that the Church of the Old Testament was but an imperfect, preparatory stage, a kind of childhood minority with respect to the adult Church of the New Testament. But in their effort to stress the overall economy of salvation in the one Christ, what held their attention, at least from St. Augustine onward, was rather the invisible line of inward Christian grace; whereas the continuing embodiment, itself a grace, of that same inward grace in both the Old Testament and the New Testament, was much less satisfactorily integrated into a balanced synthesis. This orientation tended to view the mystery of salvation from a metahistorical and an asocial plane. In affirming that the Old Testament saints, by their faith in the Christ to come, were really Christians and members of his Body, St. Augustine explained that “the times have changed, but not the faith . . . the signs have varied, but the faith abides” (In evang. Ioh. 45.9, Patrologia Latina 35:1722, 1723). This Augustinian orientation occasioned in subsequent Western theology a bias toward an un-Pauline disembodiment of Christ’s Body, toward a one-sided view of Christ’s Body as an interior community of grace with Christ, whose headship is thus limited to an invisible in-pouring of grace. The question left unanswered is this: what has the fullness of the times (Heb 1.1–2) brought to the fullness of the mystery; and wherein lies the fulfillment within the acknowledged continuity (Col 2.17)?

Medieval Period. St. Augustine’s authority dominates the ecclesiology of the early and high scholastic periods. As in the patristic age, so too here there are no formal treatises of ecclesiology. The pertinent matter is distributed piecemeal, not only in the various questions of the summists (see SENTENCES AND SUMMAE), but also in liturgical, homiletic, and exegetical writings.

In the 12th century the dominant description of the Church is the Body of Christ. This designation, although allowing a variety of meaning and extension as in the Fathers, still has its central reference and focus in the visible Catholic Church. However, the elaboration of the theme “Body of Christ” commonly emphasizes the inward community of grace in Christ, without any special effort to integrate the socio-juridic aspect of the Church into the Body of Christ. Such a one-sided concern marks an inchoative dissociation of sensibility and interest with respect to the total mystery, i.e., the theandric reality of the Body of Christ. The reasons for this practical dissociation are the following: (1) the patronage of the Augustinian tradition in ecclesiology; (2) the then visible Church as a reality, peacefully forming and framing life, unchallenged by any significant heresies; (3) the beginnings of Canon Law as a separate discipline, with socio-juridic questions in ecclesiology falling gradually to its purview, while the more inward elements of the Church were appropriated to speculative dogma.

The 13th century does not fundamentally alter the orientations and emphases of the 12th. The scholastics of this period, beyond doubt, had a sound sense of the theandric nature of the Body of Christ (see, e.g., St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 108.1; 3a, 60.6; 3a, 62.6). This fact is discernible, for instance, in the physico-instrumental causality assigned by St. Thomas to Christ the Head in his humanity (Summa theologiae 3a, 8.1 ad 1), a role that Augustine never attributed to the human being Jesus (see G. Philips, “L’influence du Christ Chef sur son corps mystique suivant s. Augustin,” in Augustinus Magister, Paris 1954, 2.805–15); it is perceptible, too, in the strongly affirmed ecclesial dimension of the Eucharist, which is “the Sacrament of Church unity” (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 3a, 67.2), and whose reality is “the unity of the Mystical Body” (Summa theologiae 3a, 73.3), or “the Mystical Body of Christ which is the society of the saints” (Summa theologiae 3a, 80.4).

It is clear enough, however, that in practice the 13th-century theologians were more interested in the inward grace of the Christian Body than in the Christian embodiment, itself a grace, of that inward grace. What commanded their attention was the inwardness of grace. This fact is discernible in various ways:

1. In the Augustinian view that “the ancient Fathers belonged to the same Body of the Church as we do” (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 3a, 8.3 ad 3). Citing the Aristotelean dictum that “each thing appears to be that which preponderates in it” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 106.1), and rightly holding that “the grace of the Holy Spirit” (ibid.) is the chief element in the New Covenant, St. Thomas concludes that the saints of the Old Covenant “in this respect belonged to the New Testament” (ibid., ad 3). This theological construct uses “Body” in a quite un-Pauline way.

2. In the treatment of Christ’s Headship—and of the correlative membership or incorporation of the faithful—principally from the viewpoint of the Head’s invisible in-pouring of interior grace (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 3a, 8.3 corp. and ad 3) and of the member’s inward adhesion to the Head through faith and love.

3. In the tendency to look on the heavenly Church in a way analogous to the Augustinian consideration of the Church of the New Alliance, i.e., to attend to what is “principal” in it, namely, the soul’s vision of the Triune God, without a firm enough evangelical emphasis on what is “secondary,” i.e., the whole human being, according to the Biblical anthropology, gloriously sharing in one’s risen body in the new life with one’s fellows (see St. Thomas, In 3 Sent. 26.2.5, sols. 1–2 compared with Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 106.1 corp. and ad 1; 1a2ae, 107.1 ad 3).

14th to the 19th Century. The 14th and 15th centuries mark the beginnings of a separate treatise on the Church, often the work of canonists and arising chiefly under the sign of controversy. The 16th-century Reformers, with their dissociation of any empirical Church from the true Church of the saints or the predestined, led the Catholic controversialists to counter by stressing the visible Church as the social means of salvation and by deemphasizing some of the older Augustinian themes judged less useful to mark the visible reality of the New Testament Church. BELLARMINE, e.g., distinguishing between the “body” and the “soul” of the Church, and between the various ways of pertaining to them, singly and jointly, (see De Eccl. Mil., ch. 2), gives a value to the element “body” in which, at the rare extreme, the visible elements, i.e., “the external profession of the faith and sharing in the sacraments” (ibid.), seem to acquire almost a consistency by themselves. The Church, which is “a society, not of angels, nor of souls, but of human beings” (ibid. ch. 12), has for “its form, not interior faith, . . . but exterior, i.e., the confession of faith” (ibid. ch. 10). In this Bellarminian emphasis, which admittedly considers only very extreme cases, the meaning of “body” becomes almost the opposite of what that term so often stressed in the medieval scholastics, i.e., the inward grace-filled company of the Christian saints. At the same time the older Augustinian ecclesiology continued its way unflinching, chiefly in more speculative theological writing.

It is symptomatic that neither orientation was very successful with the theological problem of the grave sinner’s place in Christ’s Body; and that often the solution, phrased in embarrassed language, resulted in a partial dissociation of the visible Church and the Mystical Body.

19th Century. J. A. MÖHLER (1796 to 1838) contributed decisively to a recentering of the theology of the Mystical Body, though his early and later works stand somewhat in tension with each other. In Die Einheit in der Kirche (1825) Möhler rather romantically describes the Body of the Church as “the concentration of love” (no. 64), thus assigning a dynamism to grace that is inward-outward in its orientation; “the whole social structure of the Church is nothing else but the embodied love” (ibid. of the community of the faithful, itself fashioned by the Spirit of the Lord. In Symbolik (5th ed. 1838), however, Möhler resolutely makes the redemptive Incarnation the guiding principle of his ecclesiology. The visible Body of the Church is presented as a theandric mystery, patterned on Christ as its paradigm (see THEANDRIC ACTS OF CHRIST), and charged with continuing his work and his way among human beings until he come. Möhler thus establishes a fruitful and harmonious interplay of life between the Church as the bearer of salvation and the Church as the company of the saints; under both aspects—that of the saving energies of Christian grace and that of the new life of salvation in Christian grace—the Church is an embodied grace, both sacramental and social.

Möhler’s later orientations were usefully elaborated by several theologians who in one way or another underwent his influence and who had an affinity of spirit with him. They are Carlo PASSAGLIA (1812 to 1887), Klemens SCHRADER (1820 to 1875), J. B. FRANZELIN (1816 to 1886), and the celebrated M. J. SCHEEBEN (1835 to 1888). The work of the first three of these, although today not well known, was solid and influential. Themes from Möhler’s early and later works continue to stand in tension in contemporary ecclesiology.

20th Century. Pius XII’s Mystici Corporis (1943) used the Mystical Body of Christ to tie together the Church understood as a social institution with the Church of grace and love imbued with the Holy Spirit. In that encyclical, he explicitly identified the Mystical Body of Christ with the Roman Catholic Church. Many theologians whose work was to be influential at the Second Vatican Council, such as Yves Congar and Charles Journet, developed the mystical body as a major theme. Vatican II’s Lumen gentium also used the Mystical Body of Christ as a prominent image. It complemented it, however, with other important images of the Church, such as the People of God, the Pilgrim Church, the Communion of Saints, and the Church as Leaven in the World. Also, although Mystici Corporis was not lacking in ecumenical sensitivity, in Lumen Gentium the identification of the Mystical Body with the Catholic Church was expressed in a yet more ecumenically sensitive manner: “this church of Christ . . . subsists in the Catholic Church. . . . Nevertheless, many elements of sanctification and of truth are found outside its visible confines.” (8) The Mystical Body of Christ continues to function in official church documents as well as the work of theologians as a primary and indispensable image of the Church.

MYSTICAL MARRIAGE

Mystical marriage or spiritual marriage (also espoused to Christ) is a figure used to denote the state of a human soul living intimately united to God through grace and love. In a broad sense, mystical marriage is applicable to all unions of souls loved by God and drawn to Him, as in the case of virgins solemnly consecrated, religious in vows, and all other souls espoused to Christ (2 Cor 11.2). More properly, and in a more restricted sense, mystical marriage refers to what is recognized in mystical theology as a "transforming" union between a soul and God, requiring extraordinary graces, and to which God calls only a few particularly privileged persons, e.g., SS. John of the Cross and Teresa of Avila. The latter (Interior Castle, 7 Mansions, ch. 2) and the former (Spir. Cant., stanzas 12–27) recognize the "transforming" (permanent) union as distinct from and higher than mere spiritual betrothal (transitory). Mystical marriage constitutes a consummate union of love; a total possession, a fusion of "lives"—the soul is made one with God, made divine, by participation, without losing its identity. It is a total union involving the transformation of the substance of the soul by sanctifying grace, and the transformation of the faculties by divine light and love (Ascent of Mt. Carmel 2, 5, 6). The initiative in this matter and the choice of souls to whom this union is granted belong to Christ. It is permeated with His transcendence; its action and effects are of the Holy Spirit. Though this union is not of its own will, the soul "adheres to Christ with all its strength; lives for Him; allows itself to be ruled by Him," according to St. Bernard of Clairvaux (In Cant. Serm. 85, 12).

It is a union that comprises the elements of a certain continuous awareness of the presence of the Divine Spouse; a consciousness of His assistance in the higher operation of intellect and will. These and other characteristics notwithstanding, we find St. Teresa admitting that she did not know with what to compare it—since it is so sublime a favor and brings the soul such great delight (7 Mansions).

The model of mystical marriage is the union of the Humanity of Christ with the Verbum—a union perfect in charity and absolute in continuity. Mary, the Bride of Christ par excellence, is its greatest exemplar in this life.

The figure of marriage significantly portrays that intimate union of a completely dedicated soul (bride) to Christ (Bridegroom). Its basis is found in Holy Scripture, e.g., marriage was a common image of the union of Yahweh and His people Israel (Hos 2.19). It was a figure familiar to the Fathers of the Church. St. Ambrose referred to consecrated virgins as "married to God" (De Virg., I, c.8, n.52). Jesus called Himself the "Bridegroom" (Mt 9.15); and St. Paul writes: "For I betrothed you to one spouse" [Christ] (2 Cor 11.2).

Mystical marriage is always related to the mystery of Redemption, which was accomplished objectively through the Redeemer, Christ the Bridegroom; and is realized subjectively in the soul-bride, through Baptism and sanctification. Redemption enters into the very essence of mystical marriage; it gives it a salvific value. In this life, it bestows upon the soul in "transforming" union, a "taste" of the joy of consummated love with her Divine Bridegroom in the Beatific Vision (Rv 21.2).

MYSTICAL PHENOMENA

In popular usage, the term mystical phenomena is sometimes used to embrace all those unusual and mysterious phenomena that surpass the known, normal powers of the human soul and imply the operation of some being superior to the soul or of some unfamiliar factor within the human soul. So understood, the subject would belong to the field of parapsychology, which investigates phenomena of this kind in religion and mysticism, spiritualism, occultism, diabolism, psychology, physiology, physics, and chemistry (Omez, 11–17).

In Christian spirituality, however, the term is taken in a stricter sense and includes only: (1) those internal and external manifestations that ordinarily proceed from the authentic mystical activity of a soul (concomitant mystical phenomena); and (2) the extraordinary graces, charisms, or miracles that sometimes accompany mystical activity but are not essentially related to mystical operations as such (charismatic mystical phenomena). Concomitant mystical phenomena are called ordinary mystical phenomena and are supernatural quoad substantiam; charismatic mystical phenomena are called extraordinary and are supernatural quoad modum [R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Christian Perfection and Contemplation (St. Louis 1937) 235–238].

From the point of view of Christian spirituality an authentic mystical contemplation of the purely natural order is a contradiction in terms, and an intimate experience of God can occur only through grace (J. Maritain, Les Degrés du savoir, 4th French ed., 534). However it would seem that an authentic mystical experience and the concomitant phenomena are possible among non-Christians who possess a high degree of sanctifying grace and sufficient intensity of charity. Moreover, it is possible that certain persons, psychologically so gifted, may enjoy a profound awareness of God that although less intense than authentic mystical experience, is yet beyond the religious experience of the average believer. Into this latter category would fall numerous Buddhist, Hindu, and other non-Christian “mystics” whose experiences are tentatively explained by some parapsychologists as a psi-function of the human soul [Omez, 20–26; H. Brémond, Prière et Poesie (Paris 1926); A. Wiesinger, 3–96].

The present treatment of mystical phenomena is restricted to those manifestations that ordinarily proceed from authentic mystical activity (concomitant mystical phenomena) and those extraordinary psychosomatic manifestations that sometimes occur in authentic mystics (charismatic mystical phenomena).

Concomitant Mystical Phenomena. The concomitant phenomena vary with the degree of intensity of mystical activity and serve as an indication of the soul’s progress in the mystical life, although each soul does not necessarily experience all the concomitant phenomena or even all the phenomena proper to a given stage, for mystical activity is the work of God, who can lead souls as He will. Moreover, mystical activity is possible in the life of a person who is not in the mystical state. Theologians commonly agree that mystical activity is essentially an experience of God, more or less intensely felt through the operation of the gifts of the Holy Spirit; and since the gifts themselves pertain to the supernatural organism of the spiritual life, whatever proceeds from the activity of the gifts should be classified as concomitant and ordinary phenomena.

The division of concomitant mystical phenomena given by St. Teresa of Avila (cf. Interior Castle, 4th–7th Mansions) has been adopted by most theologians since her time. She lists the mystical phenomena in connection with the various grades of mystical prayer, and the same approach is used by St. John of the Cross and St. Francis de Sales (cf. Treatise on the Love of God ch. 6–7). [For the mystical activity of the active life, see John of St. Thomas, The Gifts of the Holy Ghost (New York 1951); G. G. Carluccio, The Seven Steps to Spiritual Perfection (Ottawa, Canada 1949); and J. Maritain, Prayer and Intelligence (London 1928).]

The following are the principal and concomitant mystical phenomena, from the beginning to the end of the mystical state: 1. An intuition of God or divine things, as distinct from discursive knowledge, with a profound penetration of divine mysteries. 2. An experimental or quasi-experimental knowledge of God or divine things. This is the essential phenomenon of the mystical life and is usually accompanied by spiritual joy, interior absorption in God, disdain for worldly pleasures, and a desire for greater perfection (cf. Poulain, 2, 5–6; Arinterro, 2, 3). 3. Passive purification of the senses, which presupposes the active purgations of senses and spirit (see PURIFICATION, SPIRITUAL). 4. Continued awareness of the presence of God, accompanied by “sleep” or suspension of the faculties, filial fear of God, love of suffering, divine touches, spiritual sensations, flights of the spirit leading to ecstasy, wounds of love, and interior communications (see St. Teresa, Interior Castle, 5th–6th Mansions; Arinterro, 2:4, 7). 5. Passive purgation of the spirit (see St. John of the Cross, Dark Night; Arinterro, 2:184–204). 6. Total death to self, heroism in the practice of virtue, joy in persecution, zeal for the salvation of souls, and relative confirmation in grace.

Charismatic Mystical Phenomena. Extraordinary mystical phenomena do not occur in the normal development of the spiritual life, but proceed from a supernatural cause distinct from sanctifying grace, the virtues, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Therefore they are classified as charisms (gratiae gratis datae) and since charisms neither presuppose grace in the soul of the individual nor flow from sanctifying grace, they are no proof of the sanctity of the individual. Some charisms are true miracles; others are supernatural in cause but do not necessarily surpass the powers of created nature and thus are called “epiphenomena” of the mystical life and are “paranormal” in relation to mystical activity (cf. the charisms listed in 1 Cor 12.4, which pertain to the apostolate).

Considered exclusively as paranormal, extraordinary phenomena could be attributed to one of three possible causes: God, occult natural powers, or diabolical influence. Hence the rule established by Pope Benedict XIV in De Beatificatione et Canonizatione Servorum Dei: No phenomenon is to be attributed to a supernatural power until all possible natural or diabolical explanation has been investigated and excluded. The difficulty involved in discerning the cause of paranormal mystical phenomena is that the psychosomatic structure can react to stimuli in a limited number of ways. Sometimes the same psychic or bodily reaction will occur in a seizure of hysteria as in a true mystical ecstasy (e.g., visions, locutions, or revelations). In many instances the most that can be concluded is that a phenomenon could have proceeded from God, from some occult natural power, or from a diabolic influence. In view of the foregoing, the following statements serve as rules of discernment concerning paranormal phenomena: 1. No extraordinary phenomenon may be attributed to a supernatural, i.e., divine, cause as long as a natural or diabolical explanation is possible. 2. The extraordinary phenomenon is not of itself an indication of the sanctity of the individual, for God could grant charisms to a person in mortal sin and even work miracles through such persons. 3. Normally it would be temerarious to petition God for charisms or miracles, since none of these phenomena flow from sanctifying grace, the virtues, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit; and privileges of this kind could in fact be damaging to the spiritual life of an individual. 4. No extraordinary phenomenon is necessary for the attainment of sanctity. 5. The extraordinary phenomena, when they come from God, are generally classified as gratiae gratis datae, and are primarily for the good of the faithful and not for the one who receives them, although accidentally the individual may benefit from them. 6. Because of the impossibility of identifying the cause of some of the extraordinary phenomena, the investigator should consider primarily the effects of the phenomena on the life of the individual who has experienced them. (For the signs of the spirit of God, the diabolic spirit, and the human spirit see Arinterro, 2:7; Royo-Aumann, 28.)

Is it possible that a person could be subject to the influence of several of these spirits at the same time? Or in other words, could a true mystic be subject to diabolical influence at the same time that he is acting under the impulses of the gift of the Holy Spirit? Or is it possible for a person to be acted upon by a gift of the Holy Spirit (a truly mystical operation) and at the same time suffer from a pathological mental or organic condition? The answer to these questions can best be stated in a series of conclusions: 1. Any deliberately willed phenomenon that involves a defect in any virtue is incompatible with the perfection of charity that constitutes Christian perfection and sanctity. 2. Any phenomenon that flows from the weakness of the individual or from any other cause that is not deliberately willed may coexist with mystical phenomena, so that a genuine mystic may exhibit truly neurotic or psychotic symptoms. 3. It is possible that a true mystic may, with God’s permission, be given over to the influence and power of the devil (diabolical obsession). 4. Any person, even one in mortal sin, could be the recipient of any of the gratiae gratis datae or be the instrument of God in working a miracle.

Since grace does not destroy nature, but perfects it (cf. St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 1.8 ad 2), and since each person is unique, certain individuals will be better or worse disposed for the perfection of virtue by reason of temperament and other characteristics that influence the workings of grace. Because of these predispositions, certain types will be more inclined to manifest paranormal phenomena, charisms, or truly mystical phenomena. Thus, the choleric and the melancholic temperaments are more receptive to ecstasy, trance, visions, raptures, revelations, and locutions (see St. Teresa, Book of Foundations, ch. 7); the sanguine temperament is more disposed to interior touches, caresses, consoling visions, or any phenomenon of the affective order. The history of spirituality shows that women are more prone to illusion than men, and more women among the saints have been remarkable for extraordinary phenomena. Other factors that dispose for extraordinary phenomena are a vivid imagination, uncontrolled emotions, badly regulated mental prayer, exhausting mental labor, and excessive austerities.

Charismatic Phenomena. The following are the principal charismatic phenomena.

Visions. By visions we mean the perception of an object that is naturally invisible to man. Visions can be divided into corporeal (perception by bodily eyes), imaginative (result of a phantasm in the imagination), or intellectual (result of intelligible species impressed on the intellect); (see SPECIES, INTENTIONAL). Corporeal and imaginative visions may be caused by some natural power or by the devil, and therefore such possibilities must be investigated. The intellectual vision could not be caused immediately by the devil, who has no direct access to the human intellect, but it could proceed from a natural or a supernatural cause (see VISIONS).

Locutions. These are interior illuminations by means of words or statements, sometimes accompanied by a vision and seeming to proceed from the object represented. They can be divided into auricular (words heard with the bodily ear), imaginative (words perceived in the imagination), and intellectual (concepts perceived immediately by the intellect). Unlike prophecy, locutions are generally for the consolation or enlightenment of the one who receives them and thus differ from gratiae gratis datae in the strict definition. Auricular or imaginative locutions could proceed from any one of three causes: natural, diabolical, or supernatural; intellectual locutions could proceed from natural or supernatural causes (see LOCUTIONS).

Revelations. These are manifestations of hidden truths that are not normally accessible to man. Truly mystical revelation is usually accompanied by the gift of prophecy and its interpretation requires the gift of DISCERNMENT of spirits. Revelations may be absolute (simple statement of a truth or mystery), conditioned (usually a threat or promise based on some condition), or denunciatory (a condemnation or threat of punishment). Private revelations may proceed from a natural, a diabolical, or a supernatural source, and even if the revelation is supernatural in origin, the seer may unwittingly distort its meaning (see REVELATIONS, PRIVATE).

Reading of Hearts. The knowledge of the secret thoughts of others or of their internal state without communication is known as reading of hearts. The certain knowledge of the secret thoughts of others is truly supernatural, since the devil has no access to the spiritual faculties of men and no human being can know the mind of another unless it is in some way communicated. But knowledge of the secrets of another's heart may be conjectured by the devil and transmitted to a person, or they may be surmised by a deluded individual who takes his conjectures to be supernatural illuminations.

Hierognosis. This is the ability to recognize a person or object as holy or blessed and to distinguish what is genuinely so from what is not. A similar phenomenon with regard to holy objects is sometimes found in sinners and therefore the phenomenon is not necessarily supernatural but could also proceed from a diabolical power.

Flames of Love. These are burning sensations in the body without apparent cause. They admit of degrees: simple interior heat (usually a sensation around the heart, which gradually extends to other parts of the body), intense ardors (when the heat becomes unbearable and cold applications must be used), and material burning (when the heat reaches the point of scorching the clothing or blistering the skin, especially around the heart). This phenomenon could be caused by the devil or some pathological condition and therefore is not necessarily to be attributed to a supernatural cause.

Stigmata. These phenomena are the spontaneous appearance of wounds and bleeding that resemble the wounds of Christ. Sometimes the entire body is covered with wounds, as if from a scourging, or the forehead is punctured as if by thorns. These wounds usually appear during ecstasy and the wounds do not become inflamed or infected. Stigmatization could be produced by natural causes (autosuggestion, hypnosis, fraud), by the devil, or by supernatural power (see STIGMATIZATION).

Tears of Blood and Bloody Sweat (Hematidrosis). The effusion of blood from the eyes, as in weeping, or from the pores of the skin, as in perspiring, could be caused by the devil or it could be the effect of some physical or psychic pathology.

Exchange of Hearts. The substitution of the heart of the mystic for the symbolic heart of Christ, or the bestowal of a ring to designate the mystical espousal or MYSTICAL MARRIAGE, could also be effected in an imaginative vision.

Bilocation. This phenomenon is the simultaneous presence of a material body in two distinct places at the same time. It is physically impossible that a physical body can be in two places at the same time by a circumscriptive presence, although this is denied by Leibniz, Suárez (De Eucharistia, 48.5.4), and Bellarmine (De Sacramento Eucharist., 3.3.662). True bilocation with circumscriptive presence could not occur even by a miracle. What is miraculous in this phenomenon is that while the physical body is circumscriptively present in a given place, the same body is present by a sensible representation in a distinct place.

Agility. This is evidenced in the instantaneous movement of a material body from one place to another without passing through the intervening space. The agility could only be apparent if the movement were not instantaneous, but simply faster than the human eye could follow.

Levitation. This is the elevation of the human body above the ground without visible cause and its suspension in the air without natural support. It may also appear in the form of ecstatic flight or ecstatic walk. True levitation cannot as yet be naturally explained. Apparent levitation has been witnessed at spiritualistic séances and in certain cases of psychosomatic pathology (see Thurston).

Compenetration of Bodies. This occurs when one material body appears to pass through another material body. It is generally held to be philosophically impossible although much remains to be learned concerning the quantity, weight, and distribution of parts in a body. In the apparent compenetration of bodies, one of the bodies could be an immaterial representation of a body; or it is possible that a body might enjoy the anticipated quality of subtlety that is characteristic of a glorified body.

Bodily Incombustibility. This is the ability of bodies to withstand the natural laws of combustibility. It may be due to some occult natural cause or to the devil. If mystical, it could be interpreted as a testimony of the holiness of the individual or, in cases of a test by fire, of the truth of doctrine.

Bodily Elongation or Shrinking. Sudden reduction or increase in size of the body may occur for no apparent reason. This is said to have occurred in spiritualistic séances (see Thurston, 192–208) and could also be caused by occult natural powers or by the intervention of the devil. It is not generally accepted as a mystical phenomenon because of its morbidity and apparent lack of purpose.

Inedia. This is an absolute and total abstinence from all nourishment beyond the limits of nature. Some investigators are not convinced that inedia is necessarily miraculous.

Mystical Aureoles and Illuminations. Resplendent light may emanate from the body of an individual, especially during ecstasy or contemplation. It is considered an anticipation of the radiant splendor of a glorified body. Illumination and phosphorescence have been verified of certain plants and animals.

Sweet Odors. These have been noted as emanating from the living or dead body of a person. They are classified as miraculous by Benedict XIV, although the phenomenon could be caused by the devil or by autosuggestion. If it is a true mystical phenomenon, it is interpreted as the sign of the sweet odor of glory and a testimony to the holiness of an individual.

Blood Prodigies, Bodily Incorruptibility, and Absence of Rigor Mortis. These phenomena are well attested in the lives of the saints. Many cases could possibly have a natural explanation or be caused by diabolical power. Some are accepted as true mystical phenomena and testimonies from God concerning the holiness of an individual; others seem to be purely morbid and serve no spiritual purpose.

MYSTICAL UNION

Mystical union may be described as the relationship between a person and God in the highest degrees of the mystical life. Ordinarily, mystical union is said to have three stages: prayer of union, prayer of ecstatic union, and prayer of transforming union (MYSTICAL MARRIAGE).

In the prayer of union the soul is deeply aware of God's presence. All the internal powers of the soul, including the memory and imagination, are captivated and occupied with God. This union, usually of short duration, is marked by the absence of distractions, and the certainty of being deeply united to God.

The prayer of ecstatic union differs from the prayer of union in that the external senses are also suspended or captivated. As the intensity of the mystical union grows, it becomes so great that the body cannot withstand it and so falls into ecstasy. In this union the Holy Spirit, acting through His gifts, so intimately and ardently unites the soul to God that the natural weakness of the subject cannot withstand the intensity of the light and love communicated. The soul falls into ecstasy, and this causes the body to experience an alienation of the senses.

In the prayer of transforming union (mystical marriage) there is a complete transformation of the soul into the Beloved. God gives Himself to the soul and the soul gives itself to God in a certain consummation of divine love, so that the soul shares in God's life as fully as is possible in this life. This union is more or less permanent; the soul is more conscious than ever of the Blessed Trinity. The soul is absorbed in seeking the honor of God, eagerly desiring to undertake anything or suffer anything that God may will.

MYSTICI CORPORIS

Pius XII issued the encyclical Mystici corporis [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943) 193–248] on June 29, 1943. The encyclical was in part a reaction against a vague and diffuse tendency discernible in some quarters of Catholic theology, especially in the years between the two world wars, toward what has been labeled a romantic vitalism or biologism in ECCLESIOLOGY. Nonetheless the encyclical is primarily a positive document, designed to present a doctrinal view of the militant Church as the Body of Christ (pars. 11, 90). Its obvious effort to synthesize the achievements of the past, both theological and magisterial, around the theme of the Body of Christ supports the view that the document's chief concern is not merely terminological exactitude but doctrinal formation.

Among the chief orientations found in the encyclical the following deserve notice: (1) there is a decisive turning away from a non-Incarnational and asocial concept of Christian GRACE, which tends to regard grace's outward dimension as a purely provisional and transient reality; (2) hence the socio-sacramental reality of the Church as the communal life of grace is itself a true component of the total Christian grace, and thus Christ's Church Body cannot be the anomaly of a nonbody in which the vital relationships between Head and members tend to be unchurched; (3) this theandric ecclesiology is grounded on a pneumatology in which the role of Christ's Spirit, insofar as He is at once immanent in and transcendent to Christ's Church Body, is analogous to His role in Christ's physical Body, i.e., He is sent to invest Christ's Church, in whole and in its parts, with Christ's own life and energies, and thus to assimilate it, Body and members, to Christ, its paradigm and Head; (4) Christ is the "sustainer" of His Body (51–52), its HYPOSTASIS in some mysterious sense, without prejudice to His own transcendence or to the distinct personalities of His many members.

Against this larger background it is easier to situate the following positions of the encyclical: (1) the identification of the Roman Catholic Church with the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST on earth; (2) the delineation of the inward-outward grace of membership in a way clearly affirming the outward factors, without, however, any unilateralism; (3) the refusal to admit any basic dislocation between the Church of law and the Church of love, indeed the affirmation of the complementariness of the pneumatic and the juridic missions in the Church; (4) finally, the strong sense of Christian communion, or of the total common life of the Church, conceived as an inward-outward total grace, with a variety of members gifted in Christ, comprising both the lowly and the exalted, each serving together in his way the upbuilding of the Body in Christian love.

Mystici Corporis's direct identification of the Church of Christ as the Roman Catholic Church has been qualified by the ecumenical position expressed in Vatican II's Lumen gentium that "the unique Church of Christ . . . subsists in the Catholic Church, which is governed by the successor of Peter and by the bishops in communion with him. Nevertheless, many elements of sanctification and of truth are found outside its visible confines."

The encyclical concerns itself chiefly with the NT "militant Church" (1); hence it does not stress the OT ἐκκλησία as the forerunner of the NT Church Body of Christ, nor is any special relief given to the heavenly Jerusalem as the final realization of the Church's earthly pilgrimage. The encyclical does not attend to the question whether the NT "Body" theme has, over and above its assured metaphorical sense, a prior realistic sense, related to Christ's real Body, dead to sin on the cross, risen again to new life, and now gloriously reigning in heaven. The profound nexus between Christ's Eucharistic Body and His Church Body, though by no means passed over (81–84, 18), is not as centrally placed in the encyclical as, e.g., in patristic ecclesiology. The question is left open whether the Holy Spirit may be considered the soul of the Mystical Body in any proper sense (see SOUL OF THE CHURCH).

It has been noted that the encyclical omits the Biblical theme of the Church as the PEOPLE OF GOD and to that extent constricts the overall viewpoint from which the mystery of the Church can profitably be regarded. The metaphorical theme of God's people is proposed as a useful complement to the Body theme, particularly advantageous in that it enables the theologian to reflect better on the historical continuity between the two covenants, old and new, and between the two covenant peoples, according to God's total plan of SALVATION. Any effort, however, to invest the Biblical theme of the Body of Christ with theological disfavor, as an infratheological construct, or to dislodge it from its notable place among the many Biblical themes or images cumulatively employed and required to draw out that measure of fruitful understanding that man may reach in this life of the mystery of Christ's Church, is a disservice marked for failure.

MYSTICISM

A term used to cover a literally bewildering variety of states of mind. Perhaps the most useful definition is that given by Jean GERSON: "Theologia mystica est experimentalis cognitio habita de Deo per amoris unitivi complexum" (Mystical theology is knowledge of God by experience, arrived at through the embrace of unifying love). There are three points to notice: (1) the use of the term mystical theology (which was traditional in the Church until comparatively modern times) associates the mystical state with, while distinguishing it from, natural theology, which enables man to arrive at some knowledge of God by natural reason: also from dogmatic theology, which treats of the knowledge of God arrived at by revelation. (2) We do come to know God through mystical theology. (3) This knowledge is obtained not by intellectual processes but by the more direct experience implied in the term "unifying love."

Non-Christian mysticism. This article is concerned primarily with Catholic mysticism, but it is necessary to recognize that Catholics and Christians in general have no monopoly on mysticism. Indeed, every religious tradition has its mystical aspect, and we cannot do adequate justice to the subject of Catholic mysticism without seeing something of the background from which it sprang. Just as in the realm of Biblical scholarship, exegetes have come to recognize that we cannot isolate the Jewish experience from the larger context of Egyptian and Babylonian religion, so we have to see the whole development of Christian mysticism in the light of a common human striving.

Thus, within the remote world of China an early teaching maintained that man's highest purpose was the quest of Dao (see DAOISM), which was regarded as the Ultimate Reality, source of all that is, pervading and harmonizing all natural phenomena. Hence, for man, Dao is the exemplar of conduct and man can find himself only by some kind of identification with it.

The process by which this identification is achieved bears a remarkable resemblance to the traditional teaching of Christian mysticism. First comes a process of purification. In the words of LAOZI: "Only one who is eternally free from earthly passions can apprehend the spiritual essence of Dao." After this stage comes the condition in which the achievement of virtue is not a self-conscious, self-regarding effort but rather a connatural state. The final stage is reached when harmony with Dao is fully realized. In this condition, man is the unresisting vehicle of Dao, so that he is able to rise above the limitations of matter and the laws of the physical universe.

On the other hand, it must be insisted that in much Chinese speculation, especially in the writings of Laozi, there is no idea of "religion" as we understand the term, no sense of a personal relationship with God, or of obligations to him. In fact, the end of the mystical way for the Daoist might well seem to be an absorption into some pantheistic system (see PANTHEISM). It is hardly surprising that, to all intents and purposes, Daoism became amalgamated with BUDDHISM.

Of HINDUISM it is unnecessary to speak here, except to mention the possible influence that Indian ideas had on the Greek tradition through Pythagoras, and hence on Plato and NEOPLATONISM. Neoplatonic influence on the Christian tradition through PLOTINUS and PROCLUS is undeniable. It was recognized that nothing made life more worth living than to look upon Beauty, not just in its partial and imperfect realizations, but in itself.

There is a kind of universal tradition embracing a metaphysics "that recognizes a divine reality, substantial to the world of things and lives and minds; and a psychology that finds in the soul something similar or even identical with divine reality; and an ethic that places man's final end in the imminent and transcendent Ground of all being." (See A. Huxley, The Perennial Philosophy, introduction.)

Is mystical experience open to all? Yet, if the foregoing were true, the problem at once arises, why is the recognition of this universal reality so partial and fragmentary? What is it about the mystics that enables them to pierce through the veil that conceals from so many others the essential truth and goodness and beauty of God Himself? In the words of one of the mystics quoted by Huxley (ibid.):

O my God, how does it happen in this poor world that thou art so great and yet nobody finds thee, that thou callest so loudly and nobody hears thee, that thou art so near and nobody feels thee, that thou givest thyself to everybody and nobody knows thy name? Men flee from thee and say they cannot find thee; they turn their backs on thee and say they cannot see thee; they stop their ears and say they cannot hear thee.

There has been much debate whether the full mystical experience is possible for all men or whether it is open only to those of a certain temperament. Dom Cuthbert Butler, a recognized authority, argued that the traditional Christian view, which had been lost to sight during the 18th and 19th centuries, is that all men are called to a specifically mystical way of knowing and loving God. In favor of this view he quoted Bishop John Hedley, who argued that contemplation is the chief act of the heart of man, for the heart flowers in the act of charity, and contemplation is charity that is actual, pure, and flowering under the movement of the Holy Spirit. It differs from ordinary prayer, yet is not extraordinary in the sense that humble souls cannot aspire to it. It is not a miraculous activity, but is simply the perfection of supernatural prayer, ordinarily given by God to those who remove obstacles to it and avail themselves of the requisite means.

R. Garrigou-Lagrange protested against the view that there are two ways of perfection: an ordinary way, intended for all, and an extraordinary one of prayer and mystical life, to which all fervent souls are not called by God. On the contrary, there is only one unitive way, not of its nature extraordinary, to which, by docility to the Holy Spirit, generous souls are led to perfection. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged that because of a lack of proper guidance or because of other unfavorable circumstances, or because particular individuals are strongly inclined to exterior activities, some generous souls may not arrive at the mystic life during the span of an ordinary lifetime. This, however, Garrigou-Lagrange considered to be accidental.

Accidental or not, Abbot Butler recognized the situation to be so common that, through no fault of the individual concerned, the circumstances of life may, and often do, render the experience of mystical union all but impossible. He cited St. Gregory's complaint that by becoming pope he had lost the gift of contemplation he had enjoyed in the monastery, and concluded there is much to be said for the view that there are not one or two "unitive ways" but many, just as there are many mansions in our Father's house.

One of the problems raised by much mystical literature is that far too many authors seem anxious to achieve a basic classification of states into which, like some bed of Procrustes, the diversified experiences of a whole host of highly individualized personalities must be made to fit. The all but infinite variety of physiological conditions, intellectual endowments, social background, educational equipment, and the like, render it unlikely a priori that the way to God will be precisely the same even for any two persons, let alone for a whole mass of people. It seems desirable, therefore, to maintain flexibility of mind in trying to evaluate the accounts that different mystics give of their experiences, even while we recognize that, as the fundamental qualities of human nature remain unchanged, so there is likely to be a rough parallelism between any two sets of experience.

The role of grace. Certainly an absolutely essential starting point for all is the desire to arrive at whatever the goal may be and a consequent willingness to undertake whatever steps may be required to attain that goal. Yet even this starting point itself implies some faint recognition of what the goal is. "You would not be looking for me if you had not found me," as Pascal expressed it. Already the process of turning away from what is not God in order to come to God has begun; already God is "drawing" the soul to Himself. It is here that we begin to encounter what is probably the crucial problem in any discussion of mysticism—the cooperation between the soul and God. This is, of course, only a specialized form of a larger problem (see GRACE AND NATURE), but it calls for particular treatment here.

Without going into the question of the possibility of genuine mystical experiences for those who do not belong in any external sense to Christianity (though the modern view tends to be that such grace may be more widely available than was once thought), all Christian writers agree that where genuine mystical experiences occur they are the direct result not of any efforts of the mystics themselves but of a special grace over and above the ordinary graces available to all Christians.

Some chosen souls appear to enjoy more than the ordinary gift of faith and the power to love and serve God. They seem to enjoy a supernatural knowledge and love beyond that of other generous souls, as though in some manner they participated more fully in God's own knowledge and love of Himself, and thus shared more intimately in the life of the Blessed Trinity and of the blessed in heaven. In their case, grace appears to do more than cooperate with their human effort. It is as if God produces in them a knowledge and love that exceeds all that can be felt or expressed by the faculties, although it is experienced by the soul.

The whole mystery of the relationship between any human soul and its Creator, at any phase and therefore especially at the stage of mystical union, springs from the nature of man's being. Dependent as he is on the creative act of an eternal Creator, an act that is described in its temporal effects as an act of conservation, man's whole conscious life is passed in a space-time world; yet he is more than a "pilgrim of eternity." The roots of his being, at a level deeper than consciousness, are to be found in the very Being of God Himself. Because of original sin the consciousness of God that would seem to be connatural to man has become fitful and obscure. It can be restored only by a rigid process of "purgation," a deliberate effort to turn away from this space-time world of everyday experience to concentrate on the eternal reality of God.

Precisely because so much of our conscious life is inextricably bound up with this world of sense, the process of purgation is a painful one. Hence follows the dark night of the senses, then the dark night of the soul, in the course of which the personality is detached from that absorption in temporal, material reality that has become connatural to man. Hence comes, too, the traditional insistence on the via negativa, the attainment to some knowledge of God by seeing Him as the denial of all that is commonly thought and felt by human beings through the ordinary channels. In this "cloud of unknowing," the mystic learns God by unlearning, so to speak, everything that is not God. Moreover, unlike the objects of ordinary knowing, God is not the passive object of the mystic's contemplation. Rather is He the active inspiration, an overwhelming Power to whom the mystic submits freely and therefore not inertly. The surrender becomes an immense enrichment, simply because the knowledge and love of God is the consummation of man's purpose.

The mystic's knowledge of God. St. Thomas Aquinas developed what has come to be accepted as the classic explanation of what we may call the mechanics of the intellectual communication implicit in the experience of mystical union. Human knowledge begins with some sense of awareness. On this raw material—the colored shapes, the sounds and feelings, the scents and tastes produced by physical and chemical interaction between an external object and the sense organ—the intellect works to "abstract" the idea or concept that is the specific object of normal, human rational activity. Out of changeable phenomena is derived the changeless concept. By linking together these abstract ideas the mind makes judgments; it reasons and infers. Ordinarily in the act of thinking the concept is never entirely free of a penumbra of images or phantasms, be they no more than the words in which we normally clothe our ideas. (Yet we do distinguish between the word and the idea, as is shown by those occasions when, as we say, we are trying to find the right word to express what is in our minds.)

In the highest forms of intellectual activity, it does seem that the image becomes less and less helpful and can indeed be a positive nuisance. The most obvious example is provided by mathematical reasoning. The geometrical figure, the algebraic formulas are necessary to begin the process; but the stage is reached sooner or later when what we are thinking of bears only the remotest relation to what can be pictured: the curve is replaced by the formula, which is seen to bear less relation to what it purports to describe than do the stenographer's notes to the rhetorical cadences of the speaker, or the notes of a musical score to the symphony or sonata as it is created by the composer or performed by the orchestra.

Perhaps there was some way of knowing that began with an immediate activity of intellect without any previous stage of sensation and abstraction. Since any created nature is finite and liable to imperfection, only by special divine help would human nature be able to abide permanently in the enjoyment of a situation calling for the complete integration and subordination of all its faculties to the purposes of the spiritual side of its being. Having lost that preternatural endowment, man, of himself, is no longer capable of that intellectual awareness of God which, if awareness is to be adequate, must obviously be free from the distorting effects of imagery. God is pure spirit and is therefore not to be described in language drawn from sense experience.

But there seems to be no reason in the nature of things why, in some cases and for special reasons, God should not confer a grace that might restore a person temporarily to that condition of perfection that man enjoyed before the Fall. We may presume that whereas in an un-fallen state man's preternatural endowments would enable him to enjoy such an immediate awareness of God while still retaining his normal consciousness, direct awareness is not possible in the fallen state except at the price of a suspension of normal consciousness. In St. Thomas's words:

In contemplation, God is seen by a medium which is the light of wisdom elevating the mind to discern the divine. . . .; and thus the divine is seen by the contemplative by means of grace after sin, though more perfectly in the state of innocence. [De ver. 18.1 ad 4.]

The foregoing remains no more than a theory, but as far as it goes, it is a coherent explanation and serves as at least a useful working hypothesis. It helps us also to understand why the mystic, after his experience, is invariably incapable of describing what happened or even, it would seem, of remembering anything at all except that something did happen. Thus St. Augustine says:

Thy invisible things, understood by those that are made, I saw indeed, but was not able to fix my gaze thereon; my weakness was beaten back, and I was reduced to my ordinary experience (Conf. 7.23).

Moreover, as F. L. Mascall says (Christ, the Christian and the Church, 61):

When the soul tries to describe this object to itself, when it tries to relate this knowledge to knowledge obtained by normal means, and above all when it tries to tell other people about it, it is faced with an enormous problem of translation and interpretation.

A. F. Poulain, in an exhaustive treatise on this subject, includes examples of some remarkable ways in which mystics interpreted their experiences. Thus St. Mechtild apparently declared that Christ had told her in a vision that the virtue of patience was especially dear to Him because patientia combines pax and scientia; St. Catherine of Siena claimed to have had a vision in which Our Lady revealed that she was not conceived immaculate! In individual cases, of course, it is possible to doubt whether any genuine mystical experience did in fact occur; but it is equally possible to suppose that, in attempting to translate into normal language and thought the contents of some mystical illumination, even a saint must be reduced to an ordinary way of thinking.

Validity of mystical experience. At this point, the question may well be asked, by both the skeptic and the sincere believer, whether there may not be some validity in R. A. Vaughan's unkind definition: "Mysticism is that form of error which mistakes for a divine manifestation operations of a merely human faculty." How can the mystics be said to "know" something that cannot be expressed in words and communicated to others, or rendered explicit by the mystics even to the mystics themselves? Perhaps it must be admitted that mystical experiences cannot be "justified" or authenticated by and in themselves. But this is not to say that there is no answer to the question raised here.

There is danger of concentrating too closely on mystical experience as an isolated phenomenon, dissecting the statements of this or that individual mystic, and so losing sight of the whole history of the subject. For in the words of William James: "There is about mystical utterances an eternal unanimity which ought to make a critic stop and think."

First, there is the general background of the long line of Christian mystics to be considered. The intellectual equipment, temperamental qualities, and educational opportunities of such men and women as SS. John, Paul, Augustine, the Pseudo-Dionysius, SS. Gregory, Bernard, Teresa of Avila, and John of the Cross, to say nothing of the English and German mystics, were so vastly different that one might expect differing approaches to mystical activity and widely dissimilar consequences. Yet, despite immense difference in detail, there is an almost monotonous sameness about their general attitudes to the basic matters of moral conduct and religious beliefs. If mystical experience were no more than a self-induced trance, and if the alleged intuition of a divine reality were sheer hallucination, it is remarkable that these baseless and purely subjective phenomena should be under the control of a persisting framework of ideas and beliefs.

Forgetting for the moment the specific problem of the authenticity of mystical experiences, one might look at normal Christian belief and practice. We believe that this world of material substance and rational and moral activity is but the surface of an unfathomed abyss of energy, eternally operative and effective.

"The weariness, the fever and the fret" that make up the conscious content of normal human experience cannot be understood save in relation to an external existence, which is the deepest reality. From that deepest reality man has come to live out his little day, realizing, as best he may with the help of God, the perfection for which he was made. Even apart from the assurance of revelation, there is what is described by Dean Inge as "the raw material of all religion, and perhaps of all philosophy and art as well, namely that dim consciousness of the beyond, which is part of our nature as human beings." At the heart of the Christian message is the doctrine that the world of man and the world of God, time and eternity, meet and blend in the Incarnate Word. Our reasons for believing this have nothing to do with mysticism.

Mysticism, on the other hand, has a history of experience in which the mystic claims to have been in immediate contact with the Ground of Being, known in an intellectual way that is free from imaginative content and incapable of normal conceptualization. Further, the result of the total experience is not so much a deepening of understanding as a sort of fusing of personalities. Hence the prevalence of language and imagery drawn from the common experience of human love, an experience leading to physical union in which the lovers seek to express an identification of interests, desires, joys, and delights as symbolizing a longing for union of personality. It is not given to mortals to achieve such union; but, from the accounts the mystics have left, it would seem that somehow it is achieved in the highest form of their experience, sometimes even described as a "mystical marriage." Now human love is a powerful revealer of personality. Through love one comes to know another in a profounder way than by the ordinary exchange of social contact. (It is not without significance that we speak of a man's "knowing" a woman in sexual intercourse.) The difference between God's self-revelation in what may be called the ordinary ways—through the Prophets, the teaching Church—and what is given to the mystic in his special experiences may well be that, in the latter, there is a fusing of will and intellect in one act, analogous to but immeasurably fuller than the communion of souls that is experienced in human love.

Recalling Gerson's definition—"knowledge of God arrived at through the embrace of unifying love"—we might suggest that, in the mystic's experience, there is a complete coordination of both intellect and will, directed toward God, who is the perfect and adequate end of their activity. Hence, it can be seen why the effect of mystical contemplation is not merely, not even primarily, an illumination of the intellect but chiefly a deepening of the whole personality, an enriching of character, a development of virtue. It is this fact that, in the end, is the guarantee of the mystic's claim. For in the authentic mystic, we have a man or woman who is invariably distinguished for integrity, candor, and sensitivity of conscience. At the state of ordinary awareness, he shares our ideals, our beliefs, our principles of conduct. It is conceivable that, in some cases, the mystic's alleging of his experience of God is a piece of self-deception, hallucination, hysteria, megalomania, and the like. But it is absurd to suggest that all the mystics are so deceived all the time. Once it is admitted that some of the mystics may be right sometimes, that some of them genuinely "experience God" in an act wherein the whole of their spiritual nature, will, and intellect is operating at the highest level attainable by man (and then only with the special assistance of God), there is sufficient ground for claiming the mystics as witnesses, in a sense eyewitnesses, to the ultimate truth after which the rest of us are dimly groping.

Modern interest. Current interest in mysticism is both theoretical and practical, is not limited to the educated or initiated, and is ecumenical or cross-cultural in its orientation. An adequate assessment of the current situation needs to consider more than the spectacular or exotic features, which, in the long view of Christian history, suggest the déjà vu rather than innovation. Particular notice should be taken of new directions in Christian spirituality, presaged by current mystical language and symbolism. Furthermore, its rather broad theoretical base adds a dimension to the contemporary renaissance of mysticism which prompts more serious reflection and indicates that Christian spirituality may be in the process of significant modification.

Scholarly or theoretical interest in mysticism has been steady and fruitful, even if not intense, throughout the present century. William James' chapter "Mysticism" in his Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), with its observation that mysticism discloses a realm of consciousness beyond the rational, gave an unremitting impetus to the study of mysticism by the behavioral and social sciences and to the continuing dialogue within and among these disciplines. The comparative study of religions has considerably improved the comprehension of a notoriously elusive subject. Even the well-known experimental attempts to induce mystical experiences by means of drugs have led to meaningful distinctions between the religious goal of spiritual endeavor and its occasional exotic sensory accompaniments. Reasonable facsimiles of the latter can be artificially stimulated, and this fact, itself well known for centuries, has reemphasized the age-old cautions of the spiritual masters against overvaluation of emotional states.

Interest in mysticism as experiential also follows behavioral science's concerns with the role and function of emotion generally, especially in its capacity to add richness and depth to life. Proliferation of sensitivity clinics and awareness institutes of indescribable variety is some indication of a general search for emotional fulfillment, a datum which corroborates theoretical observations. The successful quest for more intense feelings of personal intimacy as well as for a closer relationship with nature and life generally, has made the so-called peak experience, described by Abraham Maslow, less extraordinary.

Developments in theology. In the theological sphere of theory, modern Christian theologians, unlike their medieval predecessors, have not given much attention to the mystical emphasis. Post-Tridentine Catholic theology, with its defensive stress on ritual efficacy and ecclesiastical authority, felt compelled to relegate mysticism to the exotic realm inhabited by a few "chosen souls" on the way to "infused contemplation." Mainline Protestant theology had little need for mystical vision because "this worldly," mundane activity was not seen to have any causal relationship to salvation and hence did not need to be transcended. Protestantism represented a "this-worldly asceticism" rather than an "other-worldly mysticism" in Max Weber's categories. The anti-mysticism of Karl Barth and Emile Brunner reflect this emphasis.

Current theological interest in mysticism owes much to ecumenical developments. Mystical traditions within the major religions seem to share so much common ground that ecumenical endeavor frequently appears superfluous. Recent exponents of the view that at their highest, mystical levels, the world religions are, in reality, one religion (e.g. A. Huxley, F. Schuon, and S. Radakrishnan) have understandably been criticized for glossing over precious and essential distinctions, but their positions do highlight areas of almost ready-made religious unity. Conceptions of the Absolute and, even more so, descriptions of ineffable experience, tend linguistically to converge as they approach what they perceive to be their respective goals.

In its ecumenical concerns Christian theology has begun what promises to be an enormously fruitful discussion with comparative-religions studies. Mystical worldviews as well as mystical practices are three major preoccupations among comparative-religions scholars which have already stimulated some development in Christian mystical theology. Jungian psychology has also proved to be an important partner to this multileveled conversation. William Johnston's works on Zen and Christian mysticism offer a distinguished example of the theological enrichment available from such comparative studies. Robert Zaehner's comparative studies of Hindu, Muslim, and Christian mysticism have also made an enormous contribution, not only by way of generating scholarly interest in the subject but also by reason of his clarification of similarities and differences.

Some support is given scholarly concerns by widespread popular interest in Zen and Yoga. The faddish nature of the popular brands is often obvious, but the very fact of concern or curiosity, and especially its breadth, could signal substantial readjustment in overall religious orientation. At the very least it indicates a dissatisfaction with religious resources traditionally available in the Christian West. Even though such forms as Yoga and techniques as Transcendental Meditation assert their non-religious nature and are allegedly compatible with the traditional faiths, it is apparent that all but the merely physical ("Yoga as exercise") do clash in some way with traditional Christianity (see YOGA).

Significance for Christian spirituality. From the two distinguishing and mutually inseparable marks of the mystical phenomenon, namely its experiential emphasis and its unitive worldview, several observations relative to contemporary Christian spirituality suggest themselves. To some extent these two marks or characteristics correspond to the correlative symbols Self and Universe, and any decided enlargement of consciousness in either area would elicit a corresponding reaction toward maintaining intimacy and cohesion between the two. Historical periods witnessing significant world expansion and its corresponding threat to intellectual and psychological cosmos are invariably accompanied by a rise in mystical experience and a more comprehensive religious worldview.

The mystical vision of Teilhard de Chardin accommodates an impressive range of recent world-expanding discovery, stretching from paleontology's substantial revisions regarding human origins all the way to nuclear theory and space travel. With the affirmation characteristic of the mystic and an imminentism at times nearly indistinguishable from pantheism, he offers a spirituality in his The Divine Milieu, which meshes with contemporary valuations of nature, science, and technology and which, in its cosmic sweep, is little disturbed by the hairsplitting details that exercised traditional dogmatic and moral theology. His vision offers Christians, both Protestant and Catholic, an affirmative valuation of work and invention, of learning and recreation. For Teilhard, as well as for his kindred spirit in India, Sri Aurobindo Ghose, all these activities are inherently religious and need no ritual blessing or specific intention to make them so. Matter itself is raised to the plane of the spiritual and this coincidentia oppositorum finds resonance in the social sphere where the mystical and the prophetic become one in the cause of social reform.

Contrary to many popular images, the mystical religious mode is not extraordinary and is not for reclusive types. As James and others have asserted, there is a mystical dimension in all serious and sincere religion. Contemporary religion's emphasis on social problems, its deemphasis of institutional and clerical prerogatives, its diminished enthusiasm for laws, forms, and ritual all bear upon the current interest in mysticism. Even rather ordinary or commonplace religious experience can be personally transforming and authoritative and, because of its immediacy, tends to reduce dependence on institutional structures and to call into question their very relevance. This helps explain the apparent inner freedom as well as the specific orientation of such famous innovators and reformers as Paul, Bernard, Catherine of Siena, Eckhart, and Cusanus.

Teilhard's is by no means the only mystical vision influencing contemporary spirituality. An approach that can be thought of as a personalist emphasis forming a salutary counterbalance to Teilhard's universalism is the I-Thou religious vision of Martin Buber. Despite Buber's demurrer, his spiritual approach bears all the necessary marks of the mystical mode: it is experiential, comprehensive, immediate, and transforming. Buber's influence upon Catholic spirituality continues to be both deep and broad. Thomas Merton's life and example have been influential in sustaining an interest in contemplative spirituality, and he himself embodied the cross-cultural emphasis mentioned above. His last days were spent in Asia pursuing the mystic ideal. He is significant not so much for the power of his vision as for the orientation and persistence of his quest. Finally, mention should be made of Simone Weil, a mystic of powerful and awe-inspiring conviction, whose importance for the spirituality of the future should not be minimized. As visionaries all of these shared a deep engagement in the world and helped set the tone for a spirituality of personalism and human concern, global in its orientation and resource, affirmative in its assessment of nature and action.

MYSTICISM IN LITERATURE

A consideration of the place of mysticism in literature poses some initial difficulties in the matter of definition (for the characteristics of mysticism, properly so called, see MYSTICISM). It should therefore be these qualities that imbue works that can properly be called both literary and mystical. The habit is quite current, unfortunately, for any literary work to be called "mystical" as long as it manifests a deep religious attitude or experience, deals with the supernatural or even the preternatural, or sees nature as a veil that at once conceals and reveals the Absolute. In the strictest sense, mysticism is the direct, intuitional experience of God through unifying love. There have been and are mystics in this strict sense outside the Catholic Church, even among non-Christians (e.g., Muslims or pagan Greeks). Such experiences, however, are difficult to identify. When absorptions in the Soul of the universe or in some universal Mind are described, it is difficult to determine whether these are an experience of a personal God in charity. Oftentimes there is question only of a religious experience in the realm of ideas and feelings. Without prejudging the mystical quality in this strict sense in the writings of Blake, Huysmans, Emerson, or Goethe (to take these as representatives of different literatures), it seems possible and even necessary to distinguish their vague and often pantheistic tinged absorption from the more effective union with a personal God that gives depth and fire to the writings of such mystics as ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS, St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, and St. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

It may not be an oversimplification to say that the first type of mysticism is an "I-It" relationship, the second an "I-Thou" realization, and that consequently from this second more intimate confrontation a more profound, moving, and universally significant literature would be expected to arise. This expectation is largely fulfilled in the writings of the "I-Thou" mystics; the frustration that so often hampers the efforts of these mystics to state their experiences arises from the very fact that their union with God in intuitive love has been so intimate, so unique, so literally ineffable that it defies capture in human words.

"I-It" Mystics. The whole course of world literature has been definitely shaped by those who wrote what may be called mysticism in a broad sense. This mysticism is specified by an intense realization of the difference between things of this world and the great otherworldly spiritual realities. Since many of these writers receive separate treatment in this encyclopedia, they cannot be singled out here for extensive consideration. To give but a sampling, and restricting mention to those who are of acknowledged literary importance, there are from ancient times and up to the 12th century PLATO and PLOTINUS, PHILO JUDAEUS, AVICEBRON (Ibn Gabirol), and MAIMONIDES (Moses ben Maimon); in later times, Samuel COLERIDGE and BLAKE in England, Jonathan EDWARDS and EMERSON in the United States, Johann HERDER and Klopstock in Germany, and the Symbolists in France. Many more, without being clearly Christian, have spoken eloquently of a world beyond sense, and their collective testimony to these invisible realities has been a force constantly and powerfully working against the materialistic and positivistic influences that always threaten to infiltrate a literature written by sense-fettered and earthbound men.

"I-Thou" Mystics. It is, however, with mystics in the strictest sense of the word that one enters the realm of a literature that is unique in its intrinsic beauty and significance. The Epistles of St. Paul and St. John and the Revelation open the way to the subsequent attempts of Christian mystics to recount in human language the sublimity of their experience of direct knowledge of God. St. Paul distills the literary difficulty that all Christian mystics have faced when he states (almost in complaint) that he was “caught up into paradise, and heard secret words, which it is not granted to man to utter” (2 Cor 12.3). His account of his raptures and visions is nevertheless magnificent prose. St. Augustine hints at something of the same difficulty in expressing the ineffable when he says: “Thee when first I saw, Thou liftedst me up, that I might see there was something which I might see, and that as yet I was not the man to see it” (Confessions, tr. Watts [London 1912] 1.373). But Augustine overleaped the barrier of expression to give the world in the Confessions, and indeed in much of his other work, abiding literary masterpieces. The influence of NEOPLATONISM gave a distinct literary quality to the work of Dionysius the Areopagite (see PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS), one of the great shapers of subsequent Christian mysticism.

The Middle Ages saw a great flowering of mysticism. Most of the accounts of mystical experience are superb in the fervent tenderness and modesty that make them gems of affective literature. Such, for example, is St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX’s sermon on the Song of Songs:

I confess, then, though I say it in my foolishness, that the Word visited me, and even very often. But although He very frequently entered into my soul, I have never at any time been sensible of the precise moment of His coming. I have felt that he was present. . . . You will ask, then, how, since the ways of His access are thus incapable of being traced, I could know that He was present? But he is living and full of energy, and as soon as He has entered into me He has quickened my sleeping soul, has aroused and softened and goaded my heart, which was in a state of torpor, and hard as a stone. He has begun to pluck up and destroy, to plant and to build, to water the dry places, to illuminate the gloomy spots, to throw open those which were shut close, to inflame with warmth those which were cold, as also to strengthen its crooked paths and make its rough places smooth, so that my soul might bless the Lord, and all that is within me praise His holy Name. (Life and Works, ed. J. Mabillon [London 1896] 4.457.)

Others whose prose possesses this literary charm were RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, St. BONAVENTURE, and St. DOMINIC; there were also mystics who were great poets, such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS, whose majestic hymns (e.g., Pange lingua and Sacris solemniis juncta sunt gaudia) are obviously the fruit of his own mystical prayer.

The literary qualities of the English MYSTICS have often been adverted to. There is a simplicity and charm to their recounting of their experiences, which recalls the Franciscan influence that stemmed so largely from St. Francis of Assisi himself (see FIORETTI, THE) and from the Laudi of his followers. But there is much Augustinian influence at work, too, as may be seen in the anonymous The Cloud of Unknowing (between 1345 and 1386). Other true masterpieces of the English school are Walter Hilton’s The Scale of Perfection, JULIAN OF NORWICH’S Revelations of Divine Love, and Richard Rolle’s poems.

On the Continent, Jan van RUYSBROECK introduced a superb symbolism in his The Book of the Sparkling Stone and spoke with great ardor in The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage. The same intimate fervor is manifest in the works of St. BRIDGET OF SWEDEN and St. CATHERINE OF SIENA. The great German mystics, such as MECHTILD OF MAGDEBURG and St. HILDEGARD OF BINGEN, had profound literary influence. But it is to Spain that one looks for the greatest mystical literature, beginning with the Catalan, Raymond LULL, and culminating in the rich prose of St. TERESA OF AVILA and the sublime poetry of St. John of the Cross.

One of the seminal literary achievements of the mystics was in developing and deepening (if not in originating) various symbolical “frames” for the account of their experiences. Such, for example, are the symbols of the ladder, the pilgrimage, and, with particular influence, the bold symbols of earthly wooing, love, and marriage as analogues of the divine union. But even more fruitful for deeply affective and intimately moving revelation has been the mystics’ constant meditation on the Passion of Christ. It has been this intimacy that has given the “I-Thou” mystics the source of the superb literature produced by them. They, like (but how much more profoundly than) their paler “I-It” counterparts, speak in a chorus of loving testimony to the reality (in truth, a personal reality) of the God with whom they had achieved direct, intuitive knowledge through unifying love. That they were not able to speak of this experience more often in what are called the accents of literature lay in the fact, as Julian of Norwich said in her Revelations of Divine Love, that “Ah, hard and grievous was His pain . . . for which pains I saw that all is too little that I can say; for it may not be told.”

MYSTICS, ENGLISH

The great flowering of English mysticism was in the 14th century, with such writers as Walter HILTON, JULIAN OF NORWICH, Richard Rolle (see ROLLE DE HAMPOLE, RICHARD), and the nameless author of The CLOUD OF UNKNOWING. It was the full and final growth of a tradition of devotion and speculation that had begun soon after the Christianization of England with Bede; in many of his homilies and commentaries we find his learning in the Scriptures and the Fathers expressing itself in an affective prose that tells of a progress through prayer and contemplation to an immediate perception of God's nature. In Bede's writings we find the germ of the devotions to the Sacred Heart, to the Passion and to the mysteries of Our Lady, for which later medieval England was to become famous.

Development. From the earliest days of the Anglo-Saxon Church, contacts with Ireland, though not always amicable, had existed. No doubt the Irish contributed to the growth of the body of highly individual prayers, especially those to the crucified Savior, found in such pre-Conquest compilations as the Books of Cerne and Nunnaminster. The Dream of the Rood, a much earlier composition, is beyond question the finest contribution of Old English literature to Christian devotional writing. One further circumstance in the religious life of the times, a trait shared with Ireland, helped to mold the forms and the thought fully expressed only centuries later: England became celebrated for its great numbers of hermits and anchorites. It may be that the Norman Conquest, which for a time excluded most Englishmen from ecclesiastical preferment, gave impetus to the solitary life of contemplation. Certainly in the 11th century and onward, we have much evidence to show that this life was pursued by many.

In the simple illiterate hermit Godric of Finchale, poet of the love of Christ and His Mother, we have a successor to the great tradition of Caedmon. Godric's contemporary, Christina of Markyate, though she wrote nothing, survives in her biography as an intrepid seeker for graces which she gained only by a total denial of the world. Some of the greatest figures in the English Church of this time wrote treatises which became standard among those vowed to anchoritic contemplation. Special mention must be made of St. Anselm's Latin Meditations, St. Aelred's Latin Mirror of Love and St. Edmund's French Mirror of Holy Church. Their fruitfulness is witnessed by the speed with which they were turned into English, and the wide circulation such translations gained. In the early 13th century there appeared a wholly original English work, the ANCRENE RIWLE, in which the traditions of vernacular prose writing were given new life. The Riwle is only one of a number of contemporary guides to the solitary life of contemplation. The "Katherine Group" of English spiritual writings show that the author of the Riwle was not alone in his revival of English prose. Until the very end of organized religious life in the mid-16th century, the Riwle continued to be read, adapted, copied, and quoted. Many works which gained an independent fame in the 14th and 15th centuries, such as The Chastising of God's Children, The Poor Caitiff and Disce Mori, derive inspiration from it; and its study is today essential to those who would understand the individual genius of the spiritual thought of the age.

Religious Poetry. The religious life of medieval England is, indeed, singular in the West for the huge body of vernacular religious poetry, almost all of it anonymous, which has come down to us. It is still fashionable to regard much of it, the poems of love for Our Lady in particular, as derivative alike in language and inspiration from profane songs of courtly love; but this view is objectionable in many ways. It is equally arguable that courtly literature owes much of its inspiration to religious models, and the evidence, in England alone, provided by such very early lyrics as those of Godric and the evocative quatrain upon the Crucifixion quoted by St. Edmund in the Mirror, shows that the Franciscans were far from being the first to make popular songs about the love of God. Even before Richard Rolle we have such poems as Thomas of Hales's Love Rune to witness to the survival of long-established traditions. In Rolle, though we may think his reputation as a contemplative exaggerated, in his own times and ours, we find an unrivaled poet of the sweetness of divine love. The author of the Cloud and Walter Hilton both make adverse criticisms of the type of devotion which Rolle popularized, showing that it could lead to a superstitious veneration of "consolations," real or imagined, for their own sake; but they were themselves in some respects Rolle's debtors. He helped to preserve and adapt the style in which they wrote, and there are few who study the Cloud and The Scale of Perfection without having first known Rolle's Incendium Amoris and his English treatises and poems. Who the author of the Cloud was we do not know, nor is his identity important. His teachings, partly inspired by Pseudo-Dionysius and Richard of Saint-Victor, on the steps in contemplation and prayer that will lead to an immediate union with God, to "deification," aroused hostility. Doctrinally, the Cloud and its constellation of minor treatises, Privy Counsel and the rest, resemble principally John Ruysbroeck among Western mystics. Walter Hilton, the solitary turned Augustinian canon, is more sober, more academic, less original in his manner of presentation; nonetheless his writings established themselves in the 15th century as authoritative guides to contemplative prayer.

Ecstatic Mysticism. Quite apart from these two is their contemporary, Julian, the anchorite of Norwich whose Revelations show her to have been England's one great ecstatic mystic. This she does not claim for herself: her book merely records a series of mysterious visions, granted to her over a short period early in life, and the doctrine she drew from them after long pondering. What she teaches of the Incarnation, the Passion, Redemption, and damnation, makes comparison of her with Hadewijch, Mechtild of Magdeburg, and Catherine of Siena not inappropriate.

Until the ruin of organized Catholic life, and afterwards, these mystics continued deeply to influence the country's life and thought, as St. Thomas More and Augustine Baker, among many others, show us; but they had written for an age which had died, and it was not until the 19th century revived men's reverence for the medieval world that they were able again to show students of spiritual life the paths towards God which they, no less than the saints of the Counter Reformation, had followed to their goal.

MYTH, LITERARY

The investigation of "literary" myth is not limited to those forms that are found in highly developed civilizations with a written literature. As a matter of fact, it is essential for an exact understanding of myth to give special importance to primitive and archaic cultures because the more sophisticated forms of the so-called high civilizations frequently conceal or cloud myth's true nature and function.

DEFINITION

In a very general way, myth can be defined as a story about the holy. Already in the oldest Greek texts where the word occurs, it is used—though not exclusively—for narrative or story, and at an early period it became the technical expression for the traditional stories about the gods. The evolution of the concept of myth, partly of a merely semantic nature, and partly caused by a changing religious consciousness or attitude, is very instructive with regard to the present confusion in the use of the term.

The Greek term  $\mu\upsilon\theta\omicron\varsigma$ , which means word, is derived from the Indo-European root meudh or mudh, i.e., to reflect, to think over, to consider. This seems to indicate an original stress upon the deeper content of the word, the definitive and final expression of a reality. However, the opposition between  $\mu\upsilon\theta\omicron\varsigma$  and  $\lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ , introduced by the SOPHISTS, who disbelieved—or misunderstood—the stories about the gods, gave later on a rather pejorative connotation to  $\mu\upsilon\theta\omicron\varsigma$ . Xenophanes made a radical criticism of the mythologies as related by Homer and Hesiod. Theagenes of Rhegion interpreted them allegorically, whereas Euhemerus invented a pseudohistorical explanation of myth, which, to this day, continues to be called after him (EUHEMERISM). Plato repeatedly equated myth with legend or fairy tale, although he himself used myths as appropriate means to convey a mystery. Aristotle regarded myth as a product of fancy and fabrication. All these authors, to be sure, knew myths mainly through the literary transformations of the poets, where legendary and etiological elements are plentiful. In Lucian  $\mu\omicron\theta\omicron\lambda\omicron\gamma\epsilon\iota\nu$  means to lie, to tell tall stories. This Hellenistic conception is typical also for the Judeo-Christian tradition: myths were discredited fictional narratives and were rejected as absurdities and falsehoods, if not as abominations and diabolical inventions.

RENEWED INTEREST SINCE THE RENAISSANCE

With the revival of classical antiquity, the Renaissance renewed the interest in myth. Natalis Comes considered myth to be a symbolical or allegorical expression of philosophical speculations. VICO, a remarkably independent figure in an era of rationalism, interpreted myth as a spontaneous reaction of primitive man to natural phenomena, but also as a poetic expression of historical events. His interpretation combined allegorical explanation and historical reductionism. The Romantic movement gave much emphasis to the religious factor in myth, e.g., J. G. HERDER and especially SCHELLING, who saw myth as a necessary stage in the self-revelation of the Absolute. In the second half of the 19th century, the systematic and comparative study of religions, then first established as a science, although naturally interested in myth, still largely shared the old prejudices of the ENLIGHTENMENT. Max Müller's (1823–1900) ingenious and widely popular, but rather extravagant, thesis about myth as a disease of language is well known, but even Frazer, an arduous and rather well-informed student of religions, regarded myths as mistaken explanations of human or natural phenomena. RATIONALISM called myth everything that did not agree with its own concept of reality. For W. Wundt (1832–1920) it was a product of imagination; for L. Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939), of a prelogic, a primitive mentality.

The neo-Kantian philosopher CASSIRER attempted to evaluate the mythical function in the structure of human consciousness. He rejected the allegorical interpretation and stressed the autonomy of myth as a symbolic form and an interpretation of reality: it was the primitive intuition of the cosmic solidarity of life. Freud, JUNG, and their psychoanalytical schools gave a new impetus to the study of myth by pointing out the striking similarities between their content and the universe of the unconscious. Their error, all too often, was to reduce myth altogether to the dynamics of the unconscious.

20TH-CENTURY DEVELOPMENTS

In the mid-1960s, philosophers such as K. JASPERS (1883–1969) and P. RICOEUR (1913– ) gave a very positive evaluation of myth as an expression, or as a cipher, of the transcendent, a language of being. It was, however, the diligent study of primitive religions, where myths exist in a more or less unadulterated form as living and functional religious values, that proved to be the determining factor in the new understanding of myth. Although, in the common acceptance of the word, myth still belongs more or less to the world of imagination, there was a growing awareness of the fact that myth is par excellence the language of religion. Anthropology, ethnology, phenomenology, and the history of religions, completing the insights of sociology, psychology, philosophy, and folklore, were instrumental in the 20th-century revalorization of myth.

From the works of scholars such as J. Baumann (1837–1916), A. E. Jensen (1899–1965), and M. ELIADE (1908–1986), it was easy to extract a synthetic view of myth, although not so easy to define or to describe it in such a way as to take care of the variety of forms and types of myths resulting from its intricate development. Fundamentally, myth is the sacred story of a primordial event that constitutes and inaugurates a reality and hence determines man's existential situation in the cosmos as a sacred world. Myths deal with the so-called limit-situations of man, as expressed in the great mysterious moments of his existence: birth, death, initiation. But they make such limitations transparent for their sacred meaning, referring them to a divine prototype that happened in mythical time, or, rather, mythical no-time.

RECOGNITION OF SACRED CHARACTER

It is this sacred character that distinguishes myth from related literary types: saga, legend, and fairy tale, although, in fact, it is rather difficult to discover pure myths. Most myths, by the time they are recorded, appear as hybrid literary types, and it is not always simple to make out where myth ends and legend begins. Sagas, and to a certain extent also legends, are founded on something that really, or at least supposedly, happened in time, whereas myths deal with metahistorical events. Fairy tales, however, have no fundamental relation whatsoever to time or reality. But myth has this relation in an eminent way because it founds reality, brings a reality into time. Moreover, as Eliade, among others, convincingly shown, fairy tales and legends are often secularized myths. There is no doubt that myths are primary; no longer understood, they ceased to be revelations of a mystery or expressions of a mode of being in the world, but became diversions told for entertainment. However, their initiatory character very often can still be recognized. One could say, in a certain sense, that myth becomes less and less myth when it becomes more and more literature, because it enters a process of secularization in which it is blended and embellished with many nonmythical elements. But even in its highly sophisticated forms as a literary work, myth cannot be understood unless its religious nature is first recognized.

R. Pettazzoni gave due importance to the fact that the Pawnee and other North American Indian tribes make a distinction between true and false stories. According to this distinction, which can easily be substantiated and corroborated with evidence from archaic peoples all over the world, myths are true stories that deal with the holy and the supernatural, whereas false stories, those that have a profane content, are just make-believe.

It is important, however, to stress the difference between the truth of myth and its historical veracity. Myth, of its very nature, repels historicity, because the event it relates happened before history began, in an eternal instant. Myth, therefore, is not some sort of garbled history; it tells what really happened, not in time, but in the beginning, in the era of the gods. It is the story of a primordial event that accounts for the way a reality came into existence, i.e., began to exist in time. If myth is true, it is because it deals with what is real par excellence, because it deals with the reality that accounts for what exists in time and space. It reveals the true nature and structure of the hic et nunc realities by relating them to a metaempirical reality. It reveals the deeper, authentic meaning of life by showing how this particular mode of being in the world came about. In general one might say that the etiological concept, and consequently the etiological criticism of myth, misses the point, because it misunderstands the true nature of myth. Myth does not explain as much as it reveals and is unconcerned about apparent contradictions, because such contradictions exist in the empirical realm only. Historical and logical precision are irrelevant in the world of myth, because myth expresses not an erudition but a consciousness of a reality. It expresses what, in the religious consciousness of the believer, is true and valid.

The distinction between true and false stories in archaic cultures is also a distinction between sacred and profane. Myth is holy because its protagonists are gods or superhuman beings who intervene in the universe and establish it as an ordered cosmos. Myth is holy also because of the sacredness it makes present. Already the mere recitation of the myth results in the supernatural being present hic et nunc, and in this way mediates to those who hear it an insight into the holy ground of empirical or phenomenological reality. Usually this recitation is restricted to certain periods of sacred time. Frequently it is performed in the course of cult ceremonies, in which the myth is then the ἱερὸς λόγος, by certain authorized members of the community only, priests or elders. There may be certain taboos involved with the recitation too, e.g., the presence of women. Myth is not common property; one has to be initiated into it. Usually the stories about the gods are known thoroughly to certain experts only, who have the task of initiating the boys coming of age into the sacred traditions of the tribe.

EXEMPLARY CHARACTER

Another fundamental characteristic of myth is its exemplarity. The intervention of the gods in this world, related in the myths, is paradigmatic and normative for man's behavior, ritual as well as social. One could say that myth prescribes for man the mode of being in the world, which it reveals to him: his place in time and space, his participation in the world of animals and plants as well as in the society of men, his cosmic dimension, the laws that govern the specific nature of his human existence, etc. The order the gods established, because it is powerful and holy, because it is reality, has to be safeguarded. Their deeds, because they constitute reality, life, salvation, have to be faithfully repeated, and therefore they become models for all significant human activities. This explains why archaic man is fundamentally imitative and traditional: he wants to secure the power of his actions and gestures by patterning them after the powerful deeds and gestures of the gods. The order of the cosmos and the regularity of its phenomena are reflected in the sacred norms that determine social relations and ethical behavior, as well as ritual procedure. Moreover, since the model is no part of the temporal, but some sort of an eternal instant, it remains paradigmatic and can be repeated over and over again in time. For archaic man, reality is a function of the imitation of a mythical archetype.

MYTH AND RITUAL

The exemplary nature of myth is most evident in the ritual reenactment of a holy, primordial event. As suggested above, the recitation of a myth is in itself already some sort of a ritual because of the solemnity connected with the recitation: "Der rezitierte Mythos ist immer ein Schöpfungswort" (G. van der Leeuw). Very often, however, the recitation of the myth is accompanied by a dramatic representation of the event that it relates. The ritual execution of the myth makes the primordial creative event infinitely repeatable and hence continuously present in time. By reenacting the deeds of the gods that brought about reality, life, fecundity, etc., man is able effectively to maintain or renew them. Ritual projects man into the era of the gods, makes him contemporary with them, and lets him share in their creative work.

This close association between myth and ritual gave origin, beginning with the work of W. Robertson Smith (1846–1894), to widely opposed theories about the nature of their mutual relationship. Is myth the offshoot or description of the corresponding ritual, or is it, on the contrary, some sort of libretto or script for the dramatic representation in ritual? Both theories found very articulate defenders. The first one, in particular, was brilliantly proposed and widely popularized by the English myth and ritual school (S. H. Hooke) and the Scandinavian school of Uppsala (Mowinckel). However, they did not always escape successfully the pitfall of some sort of pan-ritualism, which attempts to reduce almost everything to a ritual origin. In a certain sense the opposing theories carried on a sterile discussion, because, historically speaking, it is impossible to substantiate any linear or genealogical evolution from ritual to myth, or vice versa. All agreed that one can find examples of primary rituals as well as of primary myths, but nothing allows one to project this present situation into the origin. True enough, at a certain stage of the development of religious consciousness it is possible to find the awareness that a myth sanctions a rite. But since myth, as B. K. Malinowski (1884–1942) put it, vouches for the efficiency of a rite, this awareness may very well be an a posteriori etiological interpretation. It would be hazardous to conclude from this to the chronological priority of the ritual. Myth certainly is not fundamentally an etiological explanation of a ritual or a rationalization of an existing custom. It would be wrong to reject the possibility, or even the fact, that in the later development of both myth and ritual the former assumed the function of explaining or justifying obscured aspects of the latter, but to accept as the origin of myth a rite that has to be explained would leave no alternative to the shaky theory of the magical origin of religion. (See RELIGION; RELIGION IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE.)

Neither myth nor ritual really explains anything; rather, they express in parallel, more often intertwined, and always mutually complementary ways the fundamental religious experience of archaic man in a cosmos that reveals the creative presence of the gods. It does not make too much sense, for example, to say that the recitation of the ENUMA ELISH by the Babylonian priests at the Akitu festival served the purpose of explaining the ceremonies. Rather, it is the presence, within its temporal reenactment, of the ideal, eternal model. The mystery of creation is expressed simultaneously in word and in imitation. The ritual in the strict sense of the term presents the event, and the myth relates this presentation to its transcendental model and meaning. The concomitant myth, in a certain sense, identifies the ritual reenactment with its divine prototype, and, by so doing, intrinsically determines or prescribes the process to be followed.

The dichotomy of myth and ritual seems to be a recent phenomenon. For primitive man they were not two things brought together, but two aspects of one reality, one experience expressed in the two fundamental forms of human expression: word and gesture, each one clarifying, complementing, and requesting the other. Really primary is the divine model or archetype as it is revealed in the reality of the cosmos and of life. "We must do what the gods did in the beginning," says the Śatapatha Brāhmana, and this old Indian adage is valid all over the world. Even where myth, because its justifying or etiological character is obvious, can be proved to be chronologically secondary to the rite, it would still be imperative to distinguish between the formulation and the content of the myth. Myth and ritual are not to be separated; where they are, myth enters a process of secularization and ritual becomes superstition.

TYPES OF MYTH

Myths are usually classified according to their subject matter: cosmogonic, theogonic, and anthropogonic myths, Paradise myths, myths of Fall and Flood, soteriological or eschatological myths. The various types can, of course, be further subdivided typologically; the cosmogonic myth, for example, could be further divided into myths of emergence, of the earth-diving type, of struggle with the primordial dragon, of dismemberment of a primordial being, etc. Such divisions have their practical usefulness but are quite artificial, and there would be a good case for reducing all myths, if not to a single type, at least to one prototype. Indeed, all myths have a very definite common denominator: they deal with the beginnings of realities—the origins of the world and of humankind, of life and death, of the animal and vegetable species, of culture and civilization, of worship and initiation, of society, its leaders and institutions. The only apparent exception, the eschatological myth, in fact also deals with the restitution of creation in its original purity and integrity. Because it reveals how the totality of the real came into being, the cosmogonic creation myth is the prototypical one, continued and completed by the other myths.

MYTH AND THE BIBLE

Where the word myth is mentioned in the Bible, almost exclusively in the NT, it is invariably in the pejorative sense of fiction, old wives' tale, lie, or error. Typical is the well-known text of 2 Tm 4.4: "They will stop their ears to truth, and turn to myth." It is obvious, however, that this negative attitude is nothing more than a conformity with the prevalent use of the term, together with a rather exclusivistic religious absolutism. Foreign religious traditions are not false because they are myths; they are called myths because they are, or are supposed to be, false. This does not necessarily imply a fundamental incongruity between Holy Scripture and myth, as myth is understood. The incongruity is not between Bible and myth, but between Bible and falsity.

It is evident that the narratives of Genesis about the creation of the world and of man, about Eden and the Fall, etc., are not really history in the ordinary sense of the word, but very much stories about events that took place "in the beginning," events that constituted the cosmos as a reality, and about man in his specific mode of being in the world, his existential situation as a created, mortal, sexed, and cultural being. If it could be substantiated that the story of Genesis ch. 1 was recited at the Hebrew New Year's festival, this association between the creation myth and the annual ritual of cosmic renewal would be a further confirmation of its mythic character. Other examples of this association between narrative and ritual—with the essential difference that the mythical archetype is replaced by an historical prototype—are the Exodus story, reenacted in the Passover ceremony, and the mystery of Christ's redemptive sacrifice and Resurrection, renewed in the Eucharistic celebration of the Mass.

The Bible, as a literary work, has a tradition that includes myth as a literary genre and does not reject mythical patterns from other civilizations. This is not surprising; what is surprising is the remarkable restraint Israel used in this regard. One could say that, in a certain sense, the authors of the Bible demythologized to a great extent whatever myth they used. In the cultural and civilizational context of the Bible, the use of mythical language in order to express the supernatural and transcendental content of a religious message is self-evident. Because myth reveals in a dramatic way what philosophy and theology try to express conceptually and dialectically, it adapts itself naturally to the expression of an active divine presence in the cosmos. Because myth is not limited by the laws of logic, it expresses naturally the divine reality as something that transcends thought in a coincidentia oppositorum. Because myth takes place in a nontemporal era, it presents naturally a transtemporal or metahistorical event that never happened, but always is, ab origine.

With regard to the mythical outlook of religious man, there is, however, in the Judeo-Christian tradition a totally new factor. Although mythical patterns remain discernible, the decisive events are no longer extra-temporal, but, in a very real sense, historical: God intervenes effectively in human history. Myth reveals the existence of the gods as the ground of all created reality, but the Bible reveals God's activity on the scene of time. In myth, as in Platonism, time is but the moving image of unmoving eternity, a never ceasing repetition of creation through a process of periodical regeneration. But in the Judeo-Christian tradition time is creation itself in the act of being accomplished. Historical events have a value in themselves because they mark God's interventions in time. They do not mark a recurrence of archetypes, but a new, unique, and decisive moment in an irreversible process. The message of the Prophets, for example, is much more about these interventions of God in history than about His presence in the cosmos. As a matter of fact, one could very well, with Tresmontant, define the nabi (prophet) as one who has the understanding of the sense of history. Here again there is an implicit demythologization in the Bible.

Creation, Fall, and Flood can be said to be events of the beginning, but not the Exodus, the passage of the Red Sea, the crossing of the Jordan, the invasion of Canaan. These are historical events. Again, the mythical pattern is discernible in the ritual repetition of creation of those events as well as in the liturgical year that periodically repeats the events of the Nativity, life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus. But, although the reactualization is obvious, especially in the Sacraments, this repetition is nevertheless, in the awareness of the believers, a remembrance of an historical fact, an ephapax that already achieved its soteriological end "once and for all." In 2 Pt 1.16–18 one can see the importance given to this historical aspect by early Christianity, and again it is in opposition to myth: "We were not following fictitious tales when we made known to you . . . Jesus Christ, but we had been eyewitnesses. . . . We ourselves heard. . . . We were with him."

After STRAUSS, RENAN, and others in the 19th century, Rudolf BULTMANN (1884–1976) stressed the mythical character of the NT and the need to demythologize the Christian kerygma, i.e., to strip it from its obsolete, mythological elements, caused mainly by Hellenistic gnosticism and Jewish apocalyptic ideas, in order then to interpret it anthropologically or existentially. Since this question is extensively dealt with in other articles, a few general remarks will suffice here (see DEMYTHOLOGIZING; FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL). Sometimes demythologization really stands for deliteralization, a nonliteral interpretation or understanding of an imagery that became inappropriate because it was based on an outdated, mistaken, or incomplete knowledge, e.g., an erroneous cosmology. This is, of course, what respectable theology did throughout the ages, and it is imperative as long as the message is not evacuated with its expression. Insofar as myth, for Bultmann, is to conceive and to express the divine in terms of human life, the only alternative to some sort of re-mythologization seems to be complete silence. Finally, demythologization sometimes stands for an effort to salvage in the narratives of the NT the historical kernel from its so-called "mythical husk." To assess critically what is strictly historical and what is not is certainly to be commended. But to distinguish does not mean to separate or to oppose. What is denounced as mythical garb may be a necessary or at least a convenient instrument to reveal the historical event as a theophany. To eliminate myth in this sense would be disastrous because both myth and fact are demanded by—and coinstrumental in—the revelation of divine presence in history. As such they validate each other.

MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY

The myth is a narrative that portrays an event. What marks the narrative as a myth are both the characters appearing in it and the influence of the event on the structure and order of the existence or life assumed. The time in which the mythical event takes place is therefore of basic meaning for every other time.

Precise Definition

If attention is concentrated on the characters appearing in myth, there is a tendency to define myth simply as a narrative or story concerned with gods. However, such a definition needs certain qualifications. Myth, it is true, usually deals with gods or divine beings (daemons, angels, and others), but a story about gods in itself is by no means necessarily a myth. The territory of genuine mythical literature is abandoned as soon as a people has reached the cultural stage in which, through its love of stories, it creates ever new and more exciting tales about its favorite gods, ascribing unusual traits or features to them and furnishing details concerning their complicated adventures or escapades. Such stories about gods lead to creative literary art and serve merely for entertainment.

The genuine myth deals with incidents and actions, with struggles and afflictions, with death and resurrection, with defeat and victory, in which the god endures his lot and reveals his nature. The myth, therefore, is not a divine biography. While in biography the essential and the unessential are combined, the myth is concerned in its narrative exclusively with the character and range of activity of the god, focusing attention on his relation to the cosmos and to man. If the myth, for example, tells of a divine child, this is not to be understood as the beginning of a continuing story, which later covers his full growth and development. The divine child is identical with the god himself, and his activity corresponds to the activity that the god carries out according to his nature.

The nature of the myth is revealed in Kerényi's definition of it as the "story of beginnings." The myth tells about a god and, in so doing, gives an account of origins. In the mythical event a condition or an order is introduced and is realized in a foundation. The myth as such adduces in etiological fashion the reason that the condition or order exhibits the precise form that it has and not another. Yet it should be emphasized that the reason intended is to be regarded first as ἀρχή (beginnings) and then as αἰτία (cause). The relation between the mythical event and the consequent order connected with it has not occurred by chance or in any external way, but order itself has sprung from the content of the event in the process of its happening.

MYTH AND TIME

There is a correspondence between the original character of the myth and the kind of time in which the mythical event takes place. The myth is thought of as true insofar as no doubt is present that the mythical event actually took place. However, it did not happen in the real time in which the history of the given people has developed. The time of the myth transcends historical time. Its time is not prehistoric time, but primeval time, and, in respect to eschatological myths, not the future but the last days, the end of time.

Primeval time comes before all other time; although the time of origins, it has the peculiarity that it can never be actual past. In a certain measure it is constantly present, since the organization and form of existence is rooted in it. If one lives as a hunter or as a farmer in harmony with the changing rhythm of nature or lives within the given social order and condition, he is firmly moored in the primitiveness that the mythical events of the primeval time have established. If one wishes to understand the conditions of existence, he must, consequently, put himself back directly; he cannot proceed to understanding solely through analysis. Explanation is always found in what is behind, in the primeval time that is immediately accessible through myth.

MYTH AND CULT

The dialectic inherent in the circumstance that the mythical happening is always found before every time, and yet is likewise present in every time, forms the background for the proper function of myth, namely, its participation as λεγόμενα (things said) in cult. There can be myths without connection with cult, having become completely detached from cult and given a continued life as stories only. Nevertheless myth, not only in most cases, but also by virtue of its nature as the narrative or history of origins, is so closely connected with cult that its function in cult belongs to its definition. In the cultic action the original event becomes present, and primeval time becomes the now or lives again through repetition. The god performs anew his order-founding act, he fulfills anew his destiny, or takes on anew his sphere of existence.

There is much to justify the view that cult is earlier than myth and that therefore, ordinarily, cult does not form around myth; conversely, myth derives its origin from cult. However, in that case it is impossible to know how the thought, without which the whole cult action is connected, originated. In any event, this special kind of cultural form goes far back in human history, and it may be assumed that it belongs to a time in which man was able to express himself better by other means than language, namely, by dance, gestures, attitudes, and primitive types of music. Therefore, the basic events and experiences that created society were not preserved through linguistic formulations or in memory, but were passed on through a repeatedly new enactment in the institution of cult. When man then attained a cultural level that enabled him, with the help of language, to construct connected formulations of his thought, spoken elements received a constantly increasing role in cultic action. A ἱερὸς λόγος was created. While it participates in a sense in the cult action, the function of the ἱερὸς λόγος is not to inform or to explain, but rather to put an action into operation. It is only at this stage that a meaningful narrative is composed, which, in etiological fashion, explains the individual parts in the cultic action. As the λεγόμενα (things said), it is a parallel structure that accompanies and harmonizes with the δρώμενα (things done) in cult.

Myth, Saga, Legend, and Märchen

Myth, as a special kind of primitive narrative, must be distinguished from other similar narrative forms. However, the distinction can be made only in a general way, for it must be emphasized that the boundary lines cannot always be sharply drawn. The narrative can slip over easily from one form into another, and the same motifs can be found in the different forms. Nevertheless, distinction contributes to better understanding.

SAGA

While the myth is primitive history and is concerned with establishing order in the structure of existence, saga is more closely bound to a locale and is connected with definite historical events and places. The time in which the saga events take place is in the past of the given people, and the persons portrayed are for the most part heroic figures who ostensibly have played a decisive role in great events. Often, but by no means always, an actual historical event underlies the saga, but it is then so embellished or forced to fit such fixed schemata that the separation of what is strictly historical in the content is hardly possible.

If a cult develops around the hero of the saga, he becomes the object of religious worship or his actions are magnified into the deeds of a savior. Saga is thus transformed into myth. In another respect also the creative possibilities of saga are freer than those of myth. Thus, without losing its character as saga, it can be enriched with new features and expanded into a whole saga cycle. It is not connected with cult, but in general serves rather as a form of entertainment; and in this respect it admits additional elements and alterations.

Like myth, saga often has etiological meaning, but the explanation that it gives, in contrast to that of myth, is actually an αἴτιον (cause), and its object is usually a local phenomenon: the giving of a name, a custom connected with a place, a geographical feature, and similar things. The etiological factor, however, is rarely the main concern of saga; it is introduced rather as a supplementary observation of an explanatory addition.

LEGEND

The term legend comes from the period of the early Church when it was customary, especially in monastic communities, to read accounts of the saints or martyrs at divine service or on their feast days. Hence it is clear that legend, as well as saga, is a narrative that is based on historical events and persons, but that enriches and embellishes its material through the free play of the imagination. Hence the special tone of the legend is also clear of itself. Legend is religious in character and is intended in a special way to have an edifying effect. Its characters, accordingly, are always figures ideal in piety, models worthy of reverence, who inspire admiration and imitation.

Accordingly, it is not strange that the various legends have common traits. The similar kind of piety, the same examples of god-fearing actions, holy renunciation, and martyrlike pathos recur in legend after legend. Legend as a kind of narrative is not restricted to Christianity in antiquity and the Middle Ages. A legendary literature was created universally around great religious personalities, and their image was transmitted to later times in the form of the legendary biography (cf. the legendary life of Buddha). Finally, given the religious character of a legend, it can appear also in forms that approach the myth. Furthermore, terminology in this respect is not sharply fixed, and one can employ the expression cult-legend as a synonymous designation for the word myth.

MÄRCHEN

The root of Märchen is entirely different. In contrast to all other kinds of narratives it is not concerned with real persons or events, but establishes its own world and its own time. The Märchen' setting is an indefinite place—"east of the sun and west of the moon"—and its events occur at an indefinite time—"there was once." It has no relation to the world or time in which actuality is the characteristic feature.

Consequently, it operates under other laws than those of the real world. Everything is quite different, yet the Märchen does not abandon itself to confusion and caprice. On the contrary, its happenings are subject to inflexible laws. This fixity finds expression also in its style. The structure of the Märchen is strict, and it is dominated throughout by schematic features, as, for example, repetition, triple groupings, suspense, and similar devices. However, the Märchen and the myth are closely related in their origin. In both forms of narrative the same primitive view of the world and of life is clearly present. But what in the myth takes place in the sphere of reality is, in the Märchen, consciously elevated into the realm of fantasy and its regulated play. Accordingly, the Märchen of its nature is fundamentally harmless, although the most horrible things can transpire in it.

At the risk of oversimplification, it may be said that, while all four narrative forms operate with the same motifs, each operates in a wholly different manner, and in one peculiar to itself in each case. In the saga, the theme is handled usually in tragic fashion; in the legend, to serve the purpose of edification, and in the Märchen, primarily to give pleasure. The myth alone understands its theme to be origin and foundation.

Classification of Myths

The classification of myths can be attempted only in broad lines, and the assignment of specific myths to specific categories is often open to question. Nevertheless, the setting up of a scheme of classification is indispensable if one wishes to get a concrete and clear understanding of myth.

COSMOGONIC MYTH

By definition, this type of myth deals with origins, and by its nature it is always cosmic in scope. The cosmogonic category of myths is the basic group with which the remaining groups are combined in various ways. The cosmogonic myth tells of the origin of the cosmos either through a direct act on the part of the creator or through emanation from a primeval being or nature. The act of creation can be carried out by the High God alone or in cooperation with other mythical beings—or sometimes with the primeval man or with an evil adversary. However, the High God can also withdraw into the background, either because he is outside the myth or because, after his primitive act of creation, he leaves the further work of creation to be accomplished by other powers.

The process of creation can be represented as an intellectual act whereby God alone, through his thought, word, or will calls the world into existence, or it can be conceived also as a craftsman's shaping of preexistent matter. If, on the other hand, the origin of the world is thought of as an emanation process, the cosmogonic myth then speaks usually of a long and highly imaginative development in which a primeval being is divided or split up to constitute a multiform world.

THEOGONIC MYTHS

The creation of the gods is the theme of special myths. These describe how the polytheistic world of the gods originated as a creation of a High God, or how a first divine pair became the ancestors of the subsequent world of the gods. Accordingly, the theogonic myths can be regarded also as a part of a cosmogony, the Theogony of Hesiod being the best known example. The appearance of the gods is itself a part of the general development of the cosmos, and generations of gods can arise that replace each other—often in dramatic ways. The relation of the High God to the world of gods that he has created is never a hostile one. On the contrary, the High God has withdrawn into his heavenly realms, in which he has an un-troubled existence, while other divinities, who may be characterized in some respects as intermediate beings, must preserve and guard the created cosmos.

ANTHROPOGONIC MYTHS

The origin of men frequently plays an important role in mythology. The cosmogonic and theogonic myths then form only the prologue to an anthropogony. But the opposite type of myth is also found, in which the entrance of men into the world does not play even the slightest role and is therefore insignificant. Again, in many other myths, man is portrayed as a special or unique being, either in the form of a powerful primeval man who helped the creator god in his further work, or as a central figure of divine origin who was created to rule over the cosmos. Anthropogony can be emphasized also in a more naturalistic fashion: man, like the plants, has grown out of the earth or has been born of stone, or formed as a figure from clay. In the Orphic myths man sprang from the ashes of the Titans as a dualistic unity of soul and body. Universally, anthropogonic myth, with inventive imagination, depicts the contemporary view of the nature and function of man.

MYTHS OF THE PRIMITIVE STATE OF THE COSMOS AND MAN

Myths dealing with this theme not only describe the original state of the cosmos, but are intended especially to furnish information on the processes that led to subsequent and present conditions. Many myths tell how death came into the world. This happened through a chance event, through disobedience, through some clumsiness or carelessness, or because a command was not observed. With death, evil also came into the world. Man must suffer and work hard; he has fallen from his primitive happy state into evil snares and has become subject to stern conditions. The various cultural spheres have their origin also in events of the mythical primeval time. The structure of society is to be traced back to primeval happenings, the present laws are of divine origin, and the great bearers of civilization founded the patterns and regulations of the various professions, even when they often had to overcome in decisive battles powers threatening them.

SAVIOR MYTHS

The myth of the savior-god is closely connected especially with the mystery cults and is often a further development of earlier agricultural myths. Underlying all differentiating details, there is an extraordinarily widespread and strikingly uniform schema. The god is the object of an evil attack on the part of evil powers and is put to death in tragic circumstances. The good powers, however, inaugurate countermeasures and the god is restored to new life, often in connection with his conquest or dominion over the kingdom of the dead.

ESCHATOLOGICAL MYTHS

Eschatological myths have a much less extensive distribution. They postulate a definite conception of the nature of history and occupy themselves with speculations on its end. They usually portray the final time as a period of dramatic cosmic events that point to the coming of the hero-god and in which judgment will be rendered on good and evil. The events of the final time lead to a new creation and to the establishment of a state of bliss, which is often conceived as the restoration of the happy condition lost in primeval time.

MYTHOLOGICAL SYSTEMS

In origin, myths are short, limited narratives that, according to the occasion, relate an appropriate mythical event. However, if the myth-forming period of a people is approaching its end and the store of myths has become so rich that even contradictory traits or elements are present, theological speculation begins to operate. An effort is made to combine the myths into a system of homogeneous character, and to remove aberrations or disharmonies, in order to give the total myth complex the appearance of a theologically consistent whole. This development is often accompanied by a somewhat depreciatory attitude to the original "naive" form, and the mythological system subjects the content of the individual myths to thorough allegorical interpretation.

The systematization of myth, therefore, is an indication that the myth has lost its proper character. People no longer believe in the literal reality of the myth, but regard it as the expression of "eternal" truths. The myth is transformed into a philosophical theorem; its personal and active forces are now only the cloak for abstract, metaphysical concepts; and the views on the nature of existence and on the nature of man have actually become nonmythical. The realities of existence are no longer ascribed to primeval events. Accordingly, the appropriate form of expression, namely, the visualizing dramatic narrative of myth, is lost also, and its place is taken by metaphysical definition and philosophical argument. In other words, the mythological system is the transitional stage from true myth to metaphysical speculation.

The Origin and Development of Mythology

D. HUME (1711–1766) made the study of myths a field of scientific investigation. As opposed to the Deistic ideas of a "natural religion," he maintained that mythological concepts are a kind of primitive explanation of nature and that their origin is to be sought in the sphere of the emotions. Hope and especially fear are the factors that impel people to formulate mythico-religious concepts.

INFLUENCE OF IDEALISM AND ROMANTICISM

German Idealism and Romanticism, as a reaction against the Enlightenment, rediscovered myths and evaluated them primarily from an aesthetic point of view as poetical or literary creations. The mythical composition was regarded as an independent product of intellectual life, an independent contribution of the creative imagination. On the speculative-philosophical plane, F. W. SCHELLING (1775–1854), especially, raised myths to a position of central importance. The principles that are found in the mind of God as a unity penetrate human consciousness by a kind of metaphysical process. They split apart in opposition and tension, and at this stage they are best called myths.

WUNDT, OTTO, CASSIRER, AND TILlich

The Religio-Historical School in the second half of the 19th century, under the leadership of H. Usener (1834–1905), went back to the ideas of Hume. W. Wundt (1832–1920), however, made a new advance in the investigation of myths. He regarded the emotions as the sources of myths. But the possibility of the emotions' leading to mythical ideas is to be ultimately ascribed to the imagination. Through the apperception of things as persons, it is possible for man to objectify his emotional states. Wundt, nevertheless, did not yet have clearly in view the specific elements in the feelings and imagination that produce myths.

In this regard R. OTTO (1869–1937) made a supplementary contribution. His description of the emotional states, by which man is affected in the presence of the numinous, is characterized especially by his view that religious feeling is something specific. The primary thing is the emotional state. The myths merely cluster about it as creations of the imagination. Moreover, at the same time, they are by-products that can harden into a shell, and the shell can prevent the development of a genuine religious attitude or disposition.

E. CASSIRER (1874–1945) investigated the phenomena of myths more from an epistemological than from a psychological point of view. According to his conception, the myth has its own nature; and beside art, language, and science it constitutes one of the symbolic forms of intellectual life. It builds its world according to its own laws and derives its specific value from the association of meaning inherent in itself. On the other hand, for Cassirer, the symbolism of the myth remained a kind of primitive understanding of life that gave rise to scientific knowledge and its development.

Here P. TILlich opposed Cassirer. Myth, according to Tillich, falls in the category of the unconditioned or of the being other-worldly to which the religious act is directed. The myth chooses its own objects, which it sets up as symbols of the unconditioned. Insofar as the unconditioned is a reality, the myth in its symbolic orientation to the unconditioned is also real. Tillich emphasizes that the myth does not select its symbols arbitrarily. The creation of symbols is governed by the law that the symbol itself participates in what it is to symbolize.

FREUD AND JUNG

Finally psychoanalysis made important contributions to the understanding of the myth. S. Freud (1836–1939) considered myths the expression of suppressed desires. He enunciated a psychological law according to which suppressions precipitate themselves in a symbolic expression, a discovery that has served as a basis for the psychoanalysis of the meaning of dreams. Of considerable influence also has been Freud's idea of the origin of civilization out of primeval events, and of primeval sin, the permanent consequence of which he called the Oedipus complex.

Symbol formations, understood and evaluated on a purely individual basis, are interpreted by C. G. JUNG (1875–1961) as an authentic expression of superindividual truths of life, the starting point for the life of the individual ego. With the help of his concept of the collective unconscious and of archetypes as the forms under which it makes its appearance, Jung attempted to break through the barriers of individual psychology and to make dreams and myths function as the symbols in which hidden transcendence as such manifests itself in the world of human consciousness. Jung's ideas have had fruitful influence on contemporary mythological research.

MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)

The affirmation of the presence or absence of myth in the Bible depends largely on the definition of myth. In the light of modern Biblical research, if the term is correctly understood, there is no reason why it could not be legitimately used in reference to the interpretation of a number of Biblical passages. On the definition and nature of myth, see MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY above.

In the Septuagint the Greek word μῦθος (myth) occurs only in Sir 20.19, where, however, it has the meaning of proverb. The NT condemns myths (μῦθοι) as so many "fables" (1 Tm 1.4), "old wives' tales" (1 Tm 4.7), "commandments of men," incompatible with the truth (2 Tm 4.4; Ti 1.14), and "fictitious tales" (2 Pt 1.16). Consequently, until recently scholars generally tended to exclude myth from the Bible. It was alleged that Israel's staunch monotheism was incompatible with the polytheism essential to myth, that its linear approach to historical phenomena ran counter to the cyclic pattern of myth. Biblical authors had, indeed, sometimes utilized mythical motifs for the sake of poetic ornamentation (Is 14.12–15; Ez 28.12–19); one might even grant that occasional myths had found their way into the Bible together with something of the mythical mentality that had inspired them (e.g., in Gn 2.4b–3.24), but these had been so purged and transformed in the process that they hardly deserved the name of myth.

With a reappraisal of the nature of myth, however, and a growing tendency to consider polytheistic elements as accidental to mythopoeic mentality, more and more authors have begun to affirm the presence of myth, or something akin to myth, in the Bible. They refer to passages such as the YAHWIST'S CREATION STORY and his account of PARADISE and the FALL OF MAN, of the DELUGE, and of the TOWER OF BABEL, the many references to Yahweh's slaughter of, or domination over, the primeval sea monster, etc. (See ABYSS; CHAOS; LEVIATHAN; DRAGON.) These passages, it is argued, are neither historical (i.e., derived from human testimony based on direct observation of the events) nor properly theological (i.e., deduced by discursive reasoning process). They take place in primeval times; their main actors share many of the characteristics of mythical personages; and they constitute an attempt to explain contemporary phenomena. Yet one hesitates to apply, without reservation, the term myth to these passages because of the important differences between them and their counterparts outside Israel. There is no doubt that the purging of all polytheistic traits (and consequently of all theogonies and theomachies) and the incorporation of these narratives into a basically historical pattern make myth in the Bible something quite unique. Furthermore, the existence of a religious festival in Israel that might have served as the cultic context for the reenactment of these myths is doubtful. Recent efforts on the part of the Scandinavian School to make of the Hebrew Feast of the NEW YEAR and the Feast of BOOTHs (Tabernacles) the occasion for the recitation of Biblical myths [see S. Mowinckel, Psalmenstudien (v.2 Kristiania 1922)] have not found general acceptance. However, whether or not one admits the presence of myth in the Bible depends largely on how one defines it. If myth is taken to mean no more than a popular explanation in figurative language of certain natural phenomena, there is no reason why the term cannot be applied to a number of Biblical passages.

MYTH AND REFLECTIVE THOUGHT

Myths as concrete, graphic narratives of the divine and its world are a religiohistorical phenomenon, reflecting also a morphological aspect of cultural development. In their actual existence they point to a datum that must be considered fundamental for solving the general problem of the nature of man.

Although in very different ways, the narratives generally designated as myths furnish basically information on the world as a whole, on the ultimate questions of human existence, on the meaning and end of life, in short, on matters to which only the most concentrated application of reflection gives access. However, the general experience of investigators is “that all questioning of the Primitives for information in respect to reflective thinking is wont to be unsuccessful” [P. Schebesta, Die Negrito Asiens (Vienna 1957) 2.2:35]. Do the myths, then, represent a preliminary form of an, as yet, nonreflective and immediate CONSCIOUSNESS in relation to the world as a whole, to a world view? And if so, to what extent and in what way is this possible?

If one begins with an actual phenomenon, something similar confronts him. In his conscience he chooses the good, that which accords with man in relation to the whole. The concept of the good and the whole is therefore essentially proper to conscience. This means, however, that the concepts proper to conscience, which are revealed in their characteristic content by reflection, are those that presuppose a relation to a whole that is itself first discerned only by reflection. The reality of conscience can be said to refer, therefore, to a spiritual dimension within man, even before reflective thought becomes occupied with a full elaboration of its content and thus makes its reality evident. In this way the possibility arises for a nonanalogical, graphic form of discourse, viz, myth, to become actual. Accordingly, myth is nothing but the immediate consciousness, expressed by language in a state that is still vague and imprecise, of ultimate relations or, in a total way, of human existence as conditioned in matter, life, society, and culture. This grounding of reflective thought in conscience gives the answer to that open and persistent aporia in philosophy regarding the possibility, in respect to content, of the basic relationship or connection that becomes evident in the thinking of thinking, i.e., of the problem that has entered the history of philosophy under the heading of INNATISM (ideae innatae). Mythical thinking reveals itself as a constituent factor of thinking in general.

This indication of the mythical structure of man, however, raises the question of the truth and the manner of appearance of myth. One can examine the truth of the myth directly from the basic data of conscience and indirectly by means of a morphological investigation of the material of the myth's content. Accordingly, the truth in the myth dealing with origins consists in this, that man, whether in nonreflective speech or in silence (silence, insofar as it is of the same origin as speech), possesses the consciousness of his divine origin and of the divine character of the world, mankind, and history as derived from that same origin. However, myth is untrue and defective if its mythical elements are separated from their whole and are made independent—a process that can be discerned by cultural and religio-morphological study of the polytheistic forms of religion and their myths.

Myth as the constituent element of theory immediately connected with consciousness, arising out of the attitude or reaction to the world, is therefore in its truth or untruth—the transitions, at times, are necessarily fluid since there are no obvious boundaries in the defining consciousness—of decisive meaning for every age. For since man has his being in the mythical structure, the given myth is not only decisive for the possibility and truth of theory (the world view interpreted as world outlook) but also for the application that in weal or woe determines history. In fact, one might even say that man always has a world view that cannot be demythologized. In this sense reflection has before it a twofold task: (1) to investigate in what way, being mythically determined and established itself, it can find the true myth and translate it into its reality as a recognition of truth; (2) to discover in what forms myths, withdrawing into veiled silence, brought, and bring, truth and untruth to actuality in history and in the present age.

NACCHIANTI, GIACOMO (NACLANTUS)

Theologian; b. Florence, c. 1500; d. Chioggia, March 6, 1569. In 1518 he joined the Dominican Order and in 1544 was named bishop of Chioggia. During the first phase of the Council of TRENT he intervened vehemently, although not always opportunely. Besides opposing the privileges accorded by the council to mitred abbots, he attacked the propositions of those council fathers who wanted to place simple tradition on a plane with inspired Scripture, describing them as impious. Three days later he submitted with exemplary humility to the final decree. For a time his teaching remained suspect, and an inquiry was conducted in Nacchianti's diocese in 1548 and 1549. After the favorable outcome of the inquiry, Nacchianti played an important role in the 1562 session of the council. He contributed to the disciplinary discussion on the question of bishops' residing in their dioceses and the doctrinal discussion on the Last Supper as a sacrifice. When he returned to his diocese after the council, he applied its decrees zealously. His principal works, printed originally in Venice (1567), are the Ennarrationes in Epist. ad Ephesios, Ennarrationes in Epist. ad Romanos, Sacrae Scripturae medulla, and the Tractationes XVIII theologales variae. Though faithful to St. Thomas, Nacchianti nonetheless fused abundant scriptural material into a synthesis of his own.

NADAL, GERÓNIMO

Jesuit theologian, special emissary of St. IGNATIUS LOYOLA in promulgating the Constitutions of the Society of Jesus throughout Europe; b. Palma, Majorca, Aug. 11, 1507; d. Rome, April 3, 1580.

Nadal studied with Ignatius at Alcalá in 1526 and again at Paris from 1532 to 1535, but refused to make the Spiritual Exercises. He was ordained at Avignon, received his doctorate in theology, and in 1538 returned to Majorca, where he taught theology. In 1542, after reading a letter written by Francis Xavier from India, he began to think about the society in Rome and finally joined Ignatius there in 1545. He entered the society on November 29 of that year. He became so closely associated with Ignatius that he is variously referred to by authors as Ignatius's "voice and soul," "heart," "arm," "second mind," "alter ego," and the "second founder of the Jesuits."

Nadal became the first rector of the first Jesuit college, that of Messina in Sicily, in 1548. His educational program there led eventually to the development of the RATIO STUDIORUM. In 1552, he began a life of travel from one end of Europe to the other, under four successive generals, promulgating the newly written constitutions of the society, acting as vicar-general, assistant, visitor, and peacemaker. Twice rector of the Roman College, he took part in the Diet of Augsburg and was a papal theologian at the Council of TRENT.

Although unknown among spiritual writers, Nadal breathes throughout his many works, in great part unpublished, the special spirit of the Society of Jesus. His teaching on prayer is especially illuminating, particularly on the relationship between prayer and action.

NAGLE, NANO HONORIA

Educator, foundress of the Presentation Sisters; b. Ballygriffin, near Mallow, County Cork, Ireland, c. 1718;

d. Cork, April 26, 1784. She was the eldest of seven children of Garret Nagle and Ann Mathew, members of the remnant of the dispossessed Catholic landowners and JACOBITES in politics. During an unexplained change in family fortunes (c. 1728), she was sent to France. On her father's death (c. 1746), she returned to Dublin with her mother and sister, Ann. Since 1733, Dublin Catholics in addition to struggling against the disabling penal laws had had to contend against a new threat to the faith, the heavily endowed government-supported exploitation of poverty, contrived through the Charter Schools and their proselytizing institutions. The discovery that her sister, Ann, had disposed of a dress-length of silk—Nano liked to be fashionable—to help the poor, followed shortly afterward by Ann's death, fired her determination to devote the remainder of her life to God in the service of the poor. The first step was a return to the family home to begin her apostolate in the immediate district. However, overwhelmed by the immensity of the problem compounded of poverty and ignorance, she entered a convent in France, but not for long. Solemnly advised by her Jesuit director, she returned to begin a school in a mud cabin in Cove Lane, Cork, c. 1754 or 1755. In nine months, at a time when Catholic schools were illegal, 200 girls were attending. In 1757 she was aided by a considerable inheritance, and within two years she was conducting seven schools, five for girls and two for boys, that provided a rudimentary secular education, religious instruction, and an assiduous preparation for the encounter with Christ in the Sacraments. To expand and make permanent this apostolic work for the poor, she introduced the Ursuline nuns in 1771, at great cost to herself. But her heart was set on the specific needs of the Irish apostolate, and so she founded in 1775, with a very few companions, the Society of the Charitable Instruction, "which excluded every exercise of charity, which was not in favour of the poor" (Walsh, Nano Nagle and the Presentation Sisters 1959), and which, after her death, grew into the famous Presentation Order. An inspiration to the men of her time, this small, physically weak woman radiated a Pauline energy in her zeal for the Christian education of youth.

NAGLE, URBAN

Also known as Edward J., dramatist, orator, pioneer in the apostolate of the theater; b. Providence, Rhode Island, Sept. 10, 1905; d. Cincinnati, Ohio, March 11, 1965. After public and parochial schooling, Nagle graduated from La Salle Academy and Providence College and received a Ph.D. (1934) from The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. He was professed as a Dominican friar on Aug. 19, 1925, and ordained on June 15, 1931. Subsequently he served as a professor at Providence College, the editor of the Holy Name Journal, and chaplain for the Dominican Sisters' motherhouse at St. Mary of the Springs, Columbus, Ohio.

Nagle devoted the first 20 years of his priestly life to the drama, while fulfilling other assignments. In 1932, with Thomas F. Carey, OP, he founded the Blackfriars Guild. Five years later they established the Blackfriar Institute of Dramatic Arts at Catholic University that later became the Speech and Drama Department. As one of the cofounders of the Catholic Theatre Conference (1937), Nagle served for 25 years on its board of governors and was honored in 1961 with its Father Dineen Award. From 1940 to 1951 he was the moderator of the Blackfriars Guild in New York City, which operates the oldest off-Broadway theater.

Nagle's principal dramas were Barter (1929), a Longmans Green prize play; Catherine the Valiant (1931); Savonarola (1938), selected as one of the Ten Best Plays of the 1941–42 season by the New York Herald-Tribune; Lady of Fatima (1948); and City of Kings (1949), a Christopher prize play.

NAGOT, FRANCIS CHARLES

Religious superior; b. Tours, France, April 19, 1734; d. Emmitsburg, MD, April 9, 1816. He made his classical studies at the Jesuit college in his native city. In 1753 he entered the Little Community of Saint-Sulpice, Paris. He was accepted as a candidate for the Society of St. Sulpice, and ordained on May 31, 1760. In 1760 he was appointed to teach theology at the major seminary in Nantes, and he earned his doctorate in theology from the University of Nantes, with which the seminary was affiliated. In 1768 he was recalled to Paris and made superior of the Little Company. Two years later he became superior of the Little Seminary of Saint-Sulpice. In 1789 he was appointed vice rector of the Grand Seminary of Saint-Sulpice and named one of the 12 assistants of the superior general. He was sent to London in 1790 to arrange with Bp. John CARROLL for the foundation of a seminary in the new Diocese of BALTIMORE, MD. Nagot, having been designated superior of the group, arrived in Baltimore with three Sulpician priests and five students. On July 18, 1791, they occupied One-Mile Tavern at North Paca Street, on the site of the present St. Mary's Seminary, the first Catholic seminary in the U.S. In 1806 Nagot opened a minor seminary at Pigeon Hill, PA, but in 1809 this seminary closed and the students were transferred to Mt. St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, MD. Shortly after observing his sacerdotal golden jubilee, Nagot resigned as superior of Mt. St. Mary's. He continued to live at the seminary until his death. The best known of his five published works is the Vie de M. Olier (1818).

NAḤMANIDES (MOSES BEN NAḤMAN)

Talmudist, Biblical commentator; b. Gerona, Kingdom of Aragon, Spain, c. 1195; d. Acre, Palestine, c. 1270. According to the acrostic formed by his title and name, Rabbi Moses ben Naḥman, he was called "the RaMBaN," in official non-Jewish documents, "Maestre Bonastrug de Porta," and "Gerondi" from his birthplace.

Life. In addition to his rabbinical duties, first at Gerona and then at Barcelona, Naḥmanides seems to have practiced medicine. He was the father of a family that included, besides his daughters, a son who died early in life, a son named Solomon, and another named Naḥmān. The most noteworthy episodes in his career were his unsuccessful attempt, c. 1232, to conciliate the factions that warred over MAIMONIDES' Guide for the Perplexed, and his celebrated disputation in 1263 at Barcelona with Pablo Cristiá, OP, often styled erroneously "Pablo Christiani."

Fray Pablo, a convert from Judaism, had undertaken to demonstrate the truth of Christianity from Jewish sources and had enlisted the authority of Jaime I of Aragon to arrange a disputation with Naḥmanides. Freedom of speech was stipulated for this debate, but both sides published accounts claiming victory. Naḥmanides' account gave such offense that he was arraigned, sentenced to two years' banishment, and his pamphlet was burned. Attempts were made to increase this sentence; Pope Clement IV intervened on the side of severity, although he forbade the execution or mutilation of Naḥmanides.

On Sept. 2, 1267, Naḥmanides arrived in Jerusalem where he spent his remaining years in exile; he died, probably at Acre, and was buried at Haifa, close to the grave of Jehiel of Paris.

Writings. At 15 Naḥmanides began to write supplements to the Code of Rabbi Isaac Alfāsī and soon followed these with writings intended to defend that master against Rabbi Zerahiah ha-Levi Gerondi and Rabbi Abraham ben David. Naḥmanides is the author of glosses on a long list of Talmudic treatises and of at least three works of halakah. As he had defended Alfāsī in his youth, so in his maturity Naḥmanides defended the 9th-century "Laws of the Ancients" against Maimonides, although, in a letter to the conservative rabbis of France, he praised the merits of Maimonides. His "Letter on the Sanctity [of Marriage]" opposed the disdain for human impulse which, he felt, Maimonides had adopted from "that Greek," Aristotle. Naḥmanides wrote commentaries on the Cantic of Canticles, on the Book of Job, and, in exile, on the Pentateuch; he published a sermon preached in the presence of the King of Castile. Three letters written during his exile have survived. He commented on the Book of Yehirah and possibly on other cabalistic texts. He wrote also liturgical poems and prayers.

Exegetical Postulates. As early as his defense of Alfāsī, Naḥmanides set down in his "Wars of the Lord" a principle Aristotle would not have disavowed: "There is in the art [of commenting] no such certain demonstration as in mathematics or astronomy" (Schechter, 112). The authority of the ancient rabbis, he held, deserved respect: "Though their words are not quite evident to us, we submit to them." Despite his "desire and delight to be the disciple of the earlier authorities," even the "pure wine of their wisdom" must give way to evidence. He was unwilling to be "a donkey carrying books." Hence, "when their views are inconceivable to my thoughts, I will plead in all modesty, but shall judge according to the sight of my eyes" (ibid., 111, 112). One instance of such independence is his rejection of the dictum of Rabbi Simlai that there are 614 precepts in the Law. "How to number the commandments," wrote Naḥmanides, "is a matter on which I suspect all of us [are mistaken] and the truth must be left to Him who will solve all doubts" (ibid., 112). Since Rabbi Simlai's text is merely "homiletical," the solution given is optional—a line of argument to which he had recourse in his disputation with Fray Pablo. Another crucial assertion of Naḥmanides in the course of that debate is that the date of the appearance of the Messiah has less importance for Jews than Christians imagine. In his Date of the Redemption Naḥmanides argued that to be faithful to the Mosaic Law under Christian rule is more difficult, and thus more meritorious, than in the days of the Messiah.

Theological Opinions. Naḥmanides was content to enumerate three basic Jewish dogmas: the world has been created, God exercises providence, and God possesses a knowledge that is also foreknowledge and omniscience. But Naḥmanides' thought is rich in unconventional solutions. God, identical with His Glory and Presence, is the author not only of conspicuous miracles such as the ten plagues of Egypt, but also of miracles so frequent and constant that they escape all notice. The Torah (Mosaic Law) knows that all things are miraculous and attributes “nothing to nature or to the order of the world” (Schechter, 119–120). Apart from the Torah “there would be no difference between man and the lower animate species”; even Christians and Muslims, thanks to translations, are “heirs of the Torah” and this is why they too are civilized (ibid., 122). The soul of man exists before its life in the material body and a soul can animate successively more than one body. Thus in a levirate marriage a child can inherit the soul of his actual father’s deceased brother; and it is with justice that the iniquity of the father falls on his children in whom his guilty soul lives anew (ibid., 118).

Nahmanides deplored his exile in moving terms: “I am banished from my table, far removed from friend and kinsman . . . with the sweet and dear children whom I have brought up on my knees, I left also my soul.” But he knew the solace of the Psalmist too: “The loss of all this and of every other glory my eyes saw is compensated by having now the joy of being a day in thy courts [O Jerusalem]!” (ibid., 109, 110).

NAHUM, BOOK OF

A collection of oracles exulting over the fall of NINEVEH, capital of Assyria, enemy of Yahweh and His people.

Division and Content. The book consists of five literary units, as follows: (1) An alphabetic psalm (1.2–10). The acrostic, however, is incomplete and the order somewhat disturbed. It describes a theophany of Yahweh, destroying His enemies and protecting those who trust in Him. The form and content of this section differ from the rest of the book. Many scholars, accordingly, hold that it is not Nahum’s work; it may be earlier or later. The editor who collected Nahum’s oracles and who is responsible for the present book probably inserted this psalm. As an introductory poem, it provides the proper light for viewing Nineveh’s fall. (2) An oracle of doom against an Assyrian king, probably Sennacherib who invaded the land in 701 B.C. (1.11, 14). (3) An oracle of consolation for Juda (1.12–13; 2.1, 3). The theme common to these verses is hope and comfort for Judah; she will no longer suffer from Assyria. Some scholars regard these verses as additions to Nahum’s poetry. The evidence for this view is not very forceful. (4) Two poems on Nineveh’s fall (2.2, 4–14:3.1–3). The first is a vivid war song that describes with great effectiveness the storming and plundering of Nineveh and the flight of her people. The second poem opens with a cry of woe for Nineveh. The description of the confusion of the stricken city is remarkably effective. (5) Two short satires on Nineveh’s fall. The first (3.4–7) depicts Nineveh as a harlot; she will receive the punishment imposed on a harlot. The second satire (3.8–19) recalls the fate of Thebes (Noh), the ancient Egyptian capital. Nineveh is no better; a similar destruction awaits her. Assurbanipal, the Assyrian king, captured Thebes in 663 B.C. Nineveh fell to the Babylonians and Medes in the late summer (July–August) of 612 B.C.

Composition, Date, and Teaching. The Book of Nahum is a collection of oracles, edited like the other PROPHETIC BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. Nahum’s oral preaching probably took place during the period 626–612 B.C. Some modern authors have proposed a different view of the book; they consider Nahum a cultic work, a thanksgiving liturgy over the accomplished fall of Nineveh or a rogation liturgy praying for its fall. It is likely that Nahum was a temple prophet and perhaps associated with Josiah in the work of reform. But the textual evidence for these interpretations is scant.

Nahum is a thoroughgoing Israelite, a patriot who proclaims Yahweh's fidelity to His vine (2.3). More than once he affirms Yahweh's universal lordship of history. He always relates Nineveh's punishment to the sins of Assyria. Nahum's prophesying coincided with Josiah's reign, the period of great Deuteronomic reform. This may explain the absence of any reference to Israel's sins. Another explanation may simply be that not all of Nahum's oracles have been preserved.

NAILS, HOLY

A term used to designate the nails with which the Roman soldiers fastened Jesus to the cross. Although their history and present location are uncertain, the holy nails are regarded with veneration by Christians because of their connection with the CRUCIFIXION of Jesus.

The Roman manner of crucifixion was by means of ropes or nails or both together. The narratives of the PASSION OF CHRIST in the Bible, with their bare statement of the event, do not specify whether ropes or nails were used in the Crucifixion of Jesus. More informative are the accounts of the resurrected Christ; that of John explicitly states that Jesus' hands carried the mark of the nails (Jn 20.25, 27), while that of Luke, according to the commonly accepted text, states that the feet, too, carried such marks (Lk 24.39). The Septuagint translation of Ps 21 (22).17 (traditionally taken as a messianic psalm) as "They have dug [ὄρυξάν] my hands and my feet" helped to establish the view that the feet of Jesus were also nailed to the cross.

In regard to the feet, the iconography of Christian tradition shows three successive stages: the earliest representations of Jesus on the cross (on the carved door of Santa Sabina, Rome, and the CRUCIFIX in St. Martin's cathedral, Lucca, Italy—both from the fifth century) show only the hands of Jesus nailed to the cross; from the sixth to the 12th century each foot is represented as nailed separately to the cross; from the 13th century onward the image of Jesus on the cross is generally depicted with only one nail piercing both feet, with one foot on top of the other. Yet the witness of iconography, far removed from the actual event, has followed custom based on uncertain traditions. The Holy SHROUD OF TURIN indicates that the feet of Jesus were nailed, but it does not give clear evidence whether they were nailed separately or together. However, it would have been difficult for executioners to pierce both feet of a condemned man with a single nail; hence it seems probable that Jesus' feet were nailed separately.

The history of the holy nails is less certain than their number. St. HELENA is credited with having found the holy nails when she discovered the true cross of Jesus. According to St. GREGORY OF TOURS (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 71:710) two of the nails were used to make a bit for the bridle of Constantine's horse, and another was used to decorate his statue. At present some 30 nails, each purporting to be one of the original holy nails, are venerated throughout the world. Which, if any, of these is authentic will probably never be determined because of the maze of devotion and emotion that has accumulated around them.

NAJRAN, MARTYRS OF

Fifth- and sixth-century Christians put to death in South Arabia. St. Arethas and his companions were martyred in Najran, a town in northern YEMEN and a center of South Arabian Christianity. Before 520 the South Arabian Prince DHŪ NUWĀS MASRUḲ (Dunaan), a convert to Judaism, revolted against the Aksumite Ethiopians who ruled the Arabs and Jews of Yemen. He seized the capital, Zafar, massacred the garrison and clergy, and turned the church into a synagogue. In 523 (or late 524) he blockaded Najran, but impatient of a long siege, he offered an amnesty in return for capitulation. Despite the warnings of the aged Prince Arethas, the people agreed. Dhū Nuwās pillaged the Christians, exhumed and burned the corpse of Bishop Paul, set fire to the church, cast 427 priests and deacons, monks and consecrated virgins into a furnace at the bottom of a ravine, decapitated Arethas and 200 (or 340) others among the chiefs and nobility, and massacred more than 4,000 of the common people who refused to declare that “Christ is a man and not a God.” The atrocities were halted when the Aksumite king Elesbaan and his army defeated the forces of Dhū Nuwās and annihilated the power of the Yemenite Jews; unfortunately he used barbaric cruelty in the process. Though the Najran martyrs were undoubtedly Christians, it is not clear to what extent they may have unwittingly been Monophysites.

Feast: Oct. 24 (Roman martyrology).

NAMES, CHRISTIAN

A person's Christian name is usually the given name added to the family, tribal, or local designation to distinguish one from the other members of the family. The custom of distinguishing a person's first name from the family name is late in development, though many Romans had two or three names paralleling the family name. Ancient and early medieval man usually had one name, and was distinguished from others by reference to his father or to his town or place of origin. Among ancient peoples, generally, a name was considered the identification of the essence, nature, or function of an individual, rather than merely a distinguishing appellation. This is true of biblical names and of those found among non-Hebrew nations. It is exemplified in the name given to Christ by divine order: “You shall call His name Jesus, for He will save His people from their sins” (Mt 1.21); and to Simon, son of Jonah, by Christ: “You are Peter and upon this rock [petra] I will build my Church” (Mt 20.18). This relation between a name and the function or significance of the bearer is illustrated by the use of the word “name” itself to signify the presence or the power of God, whose nature or inner being was unknowable (Ps 20.2; Jer 6.10; Mal 1.6, 11, 14; 2.5), as well as of Christ as the Son of God (Mc 9.38–39; Mt 7.22).

Early Christian Names. There is no evidence that the primitive or early Christians changed their names on receiving baptism; in general they had the names of the people or nation among whom they were born, and in the New Testament there are many names of converts derived from those of the pagan gods or Greco-Roman cult. This fact is further borne out by the Christian names discovered on inscriptions found in the catacombs and cemeteries of Rome and elsewhere, down to the 4th and 5th centuries, and is true likewise of the martyrs, confessors, and bishops mentioned in early Church history.

The first certain evidence of a change of name inspired by Christian belief is supplied by Ignatius of Antioch (d. c. 110), who refers to himself as “also called Theophorus,” or the God-bearer (Epistle ad Ephesus). The claim of Pope Damasus I (366–384) on an epigram (7) that the Apostle to the Gentiles had changed his name from Saul to Paul at baptism is not substantiated by Acts, where he is called Paul in 11.18; but the name Saul is still used in 13.9. CYPRIAN of Carthage (d. 258) speaks of two bishops and a confessor who had changed their names respectively to Peter, Paul, and Moses; and DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA (d. 264) says that many Christians took the names of Peter and Paul, and particularly of John, the well-beloved disciple, out of veneration for the Apostles (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 7.25.14). Eusebius further witnesses to the fact that in Palestine five Egyptian martyrs rejected their pagan names out of hatred for idolatry and called themselves Elijah, Jeremiah, Isaiah, Samuel, and Daniel (On the martyrs of Palestine 11.8). Cyprian of Carthage added Caecilianus to his name in honor of the priest who converted him; and Eusebius of Caesarea, that of the martyr PAMPHILUS, who had been his friend and mentor. Inscriptional evidence shows that this custom was common.

Early Baptismal Names. It is not known when Christians generally began to give their infants Christian names at baptism. The people of Antioch are said to have called their children after Bp. Meletius of Antioch (360–381); but AMBROSE of Milan (On Virgins 3) and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM at the close of the 4th century complained that Christians were giving their children names haphazardly, and suggested that they consider giving them names of illustrious men and women who had earned credit with God (Patrologia Graeca, 50:515). THEODORET OF CYR witnesses to the fact that people gave children the names of martyrs to provide them with protectors (Graecarum affectionum curatio 8.67). The Arabic canon 30 of the Council of Nicaea I (325), however, is a much later falsification; and evidence for a change of name such as that of the martyr St. Balsamus to the name Peter, as recorded in his vita, is questionable.

The name of Mary found in St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans (16.6) and in several early catacomb inscriptions is probably the feminine of the Roman Marius, and does not seem to have been in general usage among early Christians, probably out of special reverence. This seems true also of Joseph. John is found frequently in Italy after the 4th century, but is rare in Gaul and almost unknown during this period in Germany and Spain. Peter and Paul were used widely as Christian names after the 3d century. Gradually, with the recognition of Christianity as the religion of the empire, names connected with the doctrines of the faith, such as Anastasius (resurrection); Athanasius (immortality); Redempta, Reparatus, and Renatus (redemption, rebirth in baptism); and Salutia and Soteris (salvation) appear regularly in Christian inscriptions on tombs and monuments. Likewise, names connected with the Christian feasts are common, such as Epiphanius, Natalio, Pascasius, Pentecoste, Quadragesima, and Sabbatius (H. Leclercq, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 12.2:1513). The name Martyrius appears in the 4th century and is widespread in both Greek and Latin.

Names are taken from Christian ideas, such as Quodvultdeus (God’s will); Theodulus (God’s servant); Deusdona, Deusdedit, and Adeodatus (God’s gift); as well as from virtues, such as Agape (love); Pistis and Fides (faith); and Elpis and Spes (hope); many imitate the names of the martyrs and confessors indicating Christian attitudes as well, such as Irene (peace), Victor and Victoria, Vincentius, Gaudentius and Hilarius, Caelestinus and Felicissimus. Nevertheless, in the lists of bishops attending the early councils and synods, along with specifically Christian names, there are still many pagan names, even those of the gods, indicating that there was no uniformity of practice or tradition in the adoption of Christian names. The continuance of the use of pagan names in late antiquity was based on local usage that included dignified names such as Aequitas, Probitas, Pietas, Melite, Hedone, Jucundus, and Elegans, as well as such inelegant names as Alogius, Fugitivus, Importunus, Calumniosus, Malus, Foedula, Stercus, and Stercorius—in the past opprobrious names given to Christians by pagans in the period of persecution.

Evidence of the changing of names on conversion is clear in the 5th century. For example, Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, changed the name of Athenais to Eudo-cia on her baptism before she married the young emperor Theodosius II (421). St. Euthymius, the 6th-century Palestine monk, changed the name of barbarian chieftain Aspebet to Peter, and Bp. Innocent of Tortona had changed his name from Quintus on becoming bishop. Also, Bede speaks of King Cedwalla being baptized as Peter (Ecclesiastical History 5.7).

Christian Gaul. In Gaul to the end of the 4th century, Christian inscriptions record only Greek and Latin names, but between the 5th and 7th century there is a gradual ascendancy of Germanic names. The historian Gregory of Tours (538–594) illustrates the intermixture of Greco-Latin and barbarian names: his grandparents were George and Leocadia; his parents, Florentius and Armentaria; his brother was Peter, and his sister was married to a Justinus; his uncle was Gondolfus; and his nieces, Eustenia and Justina. The clergy in general seem to have been recruited from Gallo-Roman families and had Roman names, as did many of the officials and administrators under the MEROVINGIANS, since they were allowed to live under Roman law by a constitution of Clothaire (tit. 58. lex 1) attested by the Council of Tours (567). Germanic names prevailed even though at baptism such barbarian princes as Hermegild and Caedual were given the names of Peter and John. Waldo took the name of Berchtramus, and Favo became Allowinus (Gregory of Tours, Historia Francorum, 5.39; 8.32).

With the conquest of the various parts of Europe and North Africa, the barbarian names gradually took preponderance, although among princes and the educated, some Roman and many hybrid names persisted. In the royal families of the Visigoths, Burgundians, Ostrogoths and Franks, Saxons, and Celts similar-sounding names were handed down from one generation to another. Thus in the family of King CLOVIS and the Burgundian princess Clothilde, the first syllable Gund was repeated in the names Guntharius, Gundovaldus, and Guntchramnus; and Chlodo was echoed in Chlodebaudus, Chlotharius, Chlodomerus, and Chlodovaldus; while feminine names ran to Chlodebergis and Chlodesinda, Theodovaldus, and Theodechildis.

Saxons, Celts, and Slavs. In Anglo-Saxon England the prefix “Aethel” in names such as Aethelstane, Aethelbald, Aethelfrith, and Aethelheard is common among bishops and princes, as are the names Aelfred, Aelfhere, and Aelfric; princes and abbesses are Aelfled and Aethelflaed. Aldfrith and Aldgisil vie with Ceolfrith, Ceolnoth, Ceolred, and Ceowulf. Similar combinations are evidenced by Eadbald, Eadbert, Eadburga, and Osgar, Osmund, Oswald, and Wulfhelm, Wulfric, and Wulstan. Saxon names are reflected also among freedmen and serfs, and the changeover to Norman names (11th–12th century) was a political issue.

Although the pagan names were retained among the Celts in Ireland, an attempt was made to reconcile them with similar-sounding Latin names. Thus the pagan Diarmaid became the Latin Jeremias; Seanachan was biblicalized into Jonathan; but names such as Brigid, Ita, and Deirdre were soon Christianized by belonging to native saints. Mary was originally brought into Gaelic as Muirē; but when the Normans came in the 11th century, there was a transfer from Marie to Moira or Maureen. A similar metamorphosis overtook John, which had become Eoin or Owen in Gaelic, but became Sean when the Norman form Jean was introduced, while Sheila was the Irish equivalent Julie.

Among the Slavs similar developments are met after the 7th century when the king of Bosnia, Rudoslav, married a Roman princess and called their son Petroslav, who in turn had a son Paulimir. Byzantine names continued the Greco-Roman tradition and affected contiguous nations as they became Christian. Other Eastern peoples reflect in their first names the Christian names current in the ambience of the apostles who converted them.

Saints’ Names at Baptism. Insistence on the giving of a Christian name at baptism was not regularized before the councils and rituals of the 14th century, when the names in the martyrologies, legends of the saints, translations of relics, pilgrimages, romances and histories of the Crusades, and the morality plays popularized Old and New Testament names as well as those of the martyrs and saints of the early Church. In northern Europe in the 15th century, the names of Joseph and Mary came into common use; in Spain and Greece people had not hesitated to employ the names Jesus and Christ.

With the Renaissance in Europe there was a return to pagan names, and a similar phenomenon is noticeable in the Byzantine world among scholars. The emphasis on Christian names received impetus from the Council of Trent (sess. 25) which insisted on the orthodoxy of the veneration of saints against Protestant denial. The Roman catechism of the council and the Roman Ritual of 1614 strongly urged priests not to allow parents to give their children strange, laughable, obscene, or idolatrous names. The 1917 Code of Canon Law instructed the parish priest to persuade people to give children a saint’s name, and if they refused, to enter both the given name and that of a saint in the baptismal register (c. 761). The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) notes the significance of a person receiving a name in Church at the time of baptism. According to the CCC it can be the name of a saint who “provides a model of Christian charity,” or the baptismal name can “express a Christian mystery or Christian virtue” (CCC, 2156). The CCC quotes the 1983 Code of Canon Law that states, “parents, sponsors, and the pastor are to see that a name is not given which is foreign to Christian sentiment'' (c. 855).

Title Churches and Guilds. Roman title churches took their names originally from the donors or the locations; in the late 4th and 5th centuries these names were canonized as those of saints. Nevertheless, churches that preserved the relics of a saint or in which there was a special connection with a martyr or Christian truth were named after that subject, though the church itself was dedicated to God. Thus churches of the Anastasia or Resurrection, of the Savior, and of the Cross were erected in Jerusalem; and, with some confusion, churches in other cities were given similar names.

Later Christian antiquity and the early Middle Ages saw churches dedicated in honor of the great figures of the Old Testament, of the Apostles, or of other holy persons of the New Testament, usually with a legendary connection such as those of SS. Lazarus, Mary Magdalen, Dionysius (French, Denis). The translation of relics, pilgrimages to Rome and the Holy Land, and the legends of the saints also influenced the selection of patrons for guilds and brotherhoods, as well as the cultivation of special saints by religious orders, such as Mary Magdalen and Peter among the Cluniacs; the Blessed Virgin among the Premonstratensians and Cistercians; John the Baptist by the Templars and Hospitallers; and among the knightly orders appeared the names Lawrence, Ulrich, Vitus, Aegidius, Michael, George, Nicholas, Catherine of Alexandria, Barbara, and Margaret of Antioch. With the regularized process for the canonization of saints, countries, cities, and dioceses, as well as princes, bishops, and republics selected their particular patron saints. Since 1630 most of these patrons have been acknowledged with re-scripts by the Congregation of Rites.

In the second half of the 19th century a systematic collection and historical evaluation of patron saints was begun, but in the selection of patrons for particular activities or assistance, both historical fact and legend still played a part. In contemporary times the popes have appointed certain saints as universal patrons; thus St. Joseph, as the Patron of the Universal Church and of the Laborer; Aloysius Gonzaga, for students; Camillus of Lellis and John of God, for the sick, doctors, and nurses; Paschal Baylon, for Eucharistic societies and sacramental brotherhoods; the Curé d'Ars, for pastors; John Chrysostom, for preachers; Alphonsus Liguori, for confessors and moral theologians; Vincent de Paul, for charitable works; Francis of Assisi, for Catholic Action; Francis de Sales, for the press; Theresa of Lisieux, for world missions; Frances of Rome, for fliers; and Christopher, for automobile drivers. Popular selection still honors St. Barbara for vocations; the Three Kings, for travelers; Margaret of Antioch and Gerard Majella, for the pregnant; Gallus and Sigismund of Burgundy, against fevers; and Lucy of Syracuse and Clare of Assisi, for eye diseases. The universal recourse, however, to patron saints in every aspect of life that pervaded the Middle Ages was destroyed with the Protestant Reformation.

Papal Names. There is no evidence for the change of name on the part of a new pope before JOHN II (533–535), whose original name was Mercurius. Both Roman and Greek names appear almost indiscriminately in the early list of popes. John XII (955–963) changed from Octavian; Gregory V (996–999), from Bruno; Sylvester II (999–1003), from Gerbert; Peter of Pavia took the name John XIV (983–984); and Peter of Albano, Sergius IV (1009–1012). After that, it became the custom for the pope to take a new name, although Adrian VI (1522–23) and Marcellus II (1555), retained their original names.

Religious Names. There is evidence that, from at least the 6th century, aspirants for the monastic way of life changed their names on entrance into religious life. In the Eastern Church, the custom grew of taking the name of a saint whose first initial was the same as one's given name; thus Basil would take the name of St. BESSARION. During his probationary period or novitiate, the candidate would write the life of his patron saint for his menologion, in order to be able to imitate the saint more perfectly. Behind the change of name was the determination to cut oneself off from one's worldly identification and one's former way of life, as well as a complete dedication of the new man to the service of Christ. This custom seems to have influenced the papal change of name, which became the rule in the 11th century.

NAMES, MEDIEVAL

The last traces of the Roman system of personal nomenclature scarcely outlasted the 6th century in the West. Under the empire the "three names" (praenomen, nomen, and cognomen) that had earlier sufficed to designate the citizen were often swelled by the multiplication of cognomina to an unconscionable number. Reaction to this extravagance created a welcome for the principle observed by the barbarian invaders, that the individual had but one name. Even in thoroughly Romanized areas this name itself was, from the 5th century onward, increasingly likely to be of Germanic origin: in Gaul the proportion of Germanic to other names—1 to 3 in the 5th century—had become 3 to 1 by the 7th century, and four centuries later the few Greek and Roman names in use were almost all those of scriptural saints. Though vernacular forms naturally differed from language to language and though local popularity, such as that of Alan in Brittany, Baldwin in Flanders, and Edward in England, might affect distribution, the dominant names were then common to most of the countries of Christian Europe. Their universality was further emphasized by the fact that in written documents the same standard Latin forms translated them everywhere.

Various circumstances combined to restrict the number of names in general use during the Middle Ages. The sources of Germanic name formation had dried up by c. 850, and resistance to other innovating influences was protracted; e.g., the Church generally favored only names with religious associations. Of the names actually current at any given time, fashion concentrated popularity on relatively few: more than half the Englishmen named in 13th-century records are called John, William, Robert, Richard, or Henry. Once a name had gained favor, its success was prolonged by the custom, copiously attested for the English landowning classes but almost certainly not peculiar to them, whereby the name given to a child at Baptism was that of one of the godparents, unless longstanding family tradition or devotion to a particular saint dictated another choice. The continued vogue of the five names mentioned above actually raised to nearly two-thirds the proportion of 14th-century Englishmen bearing one or another of them.

In everyday life people who had received the same name at Baptism might be known by differing hypocoristic or diminutive forms of it, and this must generally have been the case when, as often happened in the later Middle Ages, the same baptismal name was borne by two or more living children of the same parents. However, in documents in which the same Latin form rendered both the baptismal name itself and all the variant hypocoristics, confusion between namesakes could be avoided only by the addition of identifying particulars, or surnames.

Surnames, as thus defined, appear in French documents toward the close of the 10th century. At first they were used only occasionally and as a means of separating persons of the same name mentioned in the same instrument; later they occurred in contexts in which no such need for differentiation is apparent. They fall into four main classes. The first, which identify the bearer by reference to his parentage, are often collectively described as patronymics (a term that does not exclude metronymics); the second class indicate the individual's occupation, status, or nationality; the third are toponymics, or locality names, taken from his place of abode or origin; and the fourth are sobriquets alluding to his personal characteristics, physical or moral.

Early surnames are essentially personal and are by no means constant. The same person might be known at different times and in different places by different surnames, and scribes seem sometimes to have deliberately selected the one that was most apt in the circumstances of the transaction they were recording. The name par excellence of the individual was that he had received at Baptism; it remained fixed throughout his life except in the very rare cases in which it was changed by the bishop at Confirmation.

The processes by which surnames became hereditary are obscure, and generalization is not easy. It seems to be agreed that in all countries a tendency in this direction is observed among the nobility before the humbler classes; in the southern parts of individual countries before the northern; in town before country; and in France (early in the 11th century) and England (among the Norman invaders) before Germany. But one must wait until 1267 for a London jury to declare of a convicted felon, variously known as Cantebrigge and Derby, that he "ought, as they understand, to have his father's surname and thus to be called Roger de Cantebrigge."

It was certainly very slowly that surnames came to be conventionally regarded as hereditary; and in all countries there were long periods of transition during which some members of society had hereditary surnames, some had personal surnames, and some had no surnames at all. The stages in the transition are very roughly marked by changes in scribal practice. At their first appearance surnames are subjected in Latin documents to such Latinization as they will admit; but later there is a growing tendency to leave them in the vernacular. The significance of this, so far as patronymic surnames are concerned, may be deduced from 13th-century decisions of the English court of Common Pleas that Gilbertus filius Stephani and Johannes filius Walteri were inadmissible ways of naming Gilbert Fitz Estevene and John Fitz Wauter, whose respective fathers were not named Stephen and Walter.

NAMIBIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in southern Africa, the Republic of Namibia is bound on the west by the Atlantic Ocean, on the north by Angola and Zambia, on the east by Botswana, and on the west and south by the Republic of South Africa. A long, thin strip of land, the Caprivi Strip, extends the northern border of Namibia east between Angola and Botswana to Zambia. With a terrain consisting of high plateau, the climate is hot and dry, and rain is infrequent. The Namib Desert stretches along the western coast, while in the east is the Kalahari. Namibia is predominantly agricultural, with its main crops millet, sorghum and peanuts, but a large percentage of its income comes from diamonds, other minerals and fish products. Natural resources include copper, uranium, gold, lead, tin, lithium, Zinc and natural gas, as well as unexplored coal, oil and iron ore deposits.

From 1884 until 1920, as Sud-West Africa, Namibia was a German colony, and from 1920 to 1988 it was administered by the Republic of South Africa as a mandate of the League of Nations. In 1966 Marxist revolutionaries began a rebellion and renamed the region, although South Africa fought to retain the territory until the United Nations intervened. Namibia became an independent republic in 1990. Rich in natural resources, it is the fifth-largest uranium producer in the world, although its climate forces it to import much of its food. Most of the country's wealth passes to foreign investors, leaving half the population in poverty, dependent on subsistence agriculture for their survival. The life expectancy of the average Namibian is 42.5 years, in part due to the spread of HIV/AIDS; 38 percent were literate in 2000.

History. The region was originally inhabited by Khoikhoi (Hottentot), San and Herero tribes. Christianity

Capital: Windhoek.
Size: 317,725 sq. miles.
Population: 1,771,325 in 2000.
Languages: English, Afrikaans, German; indigenous languages are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 336,550 Catholics (19%), 903,375 Lutherans (51%), 106,270 Dutch Reformed (6%), 99,765 Anglican (5%), 325,364 practice indigenous faiths.
Archdiocese: Windhoek, with suffragan Keetmanshoop. An apostolic vicariate is located at Rundu.

made its first appearance in 1486, when Portuguese navigators under Bartholomew DIAS landed briefly at Cape Cross and Angra Pequena (Luderitzbucht) and planted crosses. Lutheran missionaries from Germany arrived in 1850. In 1878 Father Duparquest of the HOLY GHOST FATHERS came from Angola and traversed the territory by ox wagon. The Prefecture Apostolic of Cimbebasia was erected in 1879 and entrusted to his congregation. When the Prefecture of Lower Cimbebasia was created in 1892, it was confided to the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE (OMI). The region became a German protectorate in 1884, and in 1896 the new government granted these religious a site overlooking the town of Windhoek that was later termed Roman Hill because of the cathedral, rectory, hospital convent and high school erected there. The OBLATES OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES, who had charge of the Orange River vicariate since 1884, were entrusted in 1909 with the Great Namaqualand, which became a vicariate in 1930; its name was changed to Keetmanshoop in 1949. The second vicariate, which embraces the northern part of the country, is Windhoek, erected in 1926 and confided to the OMI.

Namibia endured a period of violence beginning shortly after the turn of the 20th century. From 1904 to 1907 German forces almost exterminated the Herero and Nama tribes, killing around 80,000 Africans in the aftermath of an uprising against the intruding colonialists. Namibia was captured by South Africa during World War I, and in 1919 the mandate was transferred from Germany to South Africa by the League of Nations. After the demise of the league, the United Nations assumed trusteeship, but this was not recognized by South Africa, which continued its occupation and control of Namibia. The UN continued to demand that South Africa withdraw and the demand was confirmed by a series of World Court rulings. In 1966, the UN General Assembly terminated South Africa's mandate and declared Namibia to be the direct responsibility of the UN.

Independence. A 1971 High Court of Justice at the Hague determined South Africa's occupation of the region illegal; instead the black nationalist South West Africa Peoples' Organization (SWAPO) was deemed the true representative of the Namibian people. SWAPO members were predominately Ovambo people of the north, with fewer members of the Herero tribe. The South African government, responding to the UN declaration and the threat of SWAPO and rejecting a 1979 UN-supervised transition to independence, resorted to draconian emergency regulations: most public meetings were prohibited; police had complete freedom to detain suspects indefinitely for interrogation; arrests, torture and execution were routine methods of discouraging opposition to South African rule.

The Church, together with the Lutheran church and leaders of other Christian faiths, were involved in the push for independence, repeatedly calling for a change in South African policy and the restoration of freedom and human rights. Several religious leaders were expelled from the country because of their efforts on behalf of justice. In 1988 the UN convinced South African leaders to negotiate with SWAPO leader Samuel Nujoma, a Marxist who won the presidency in November of 1989, after South Africa relinquished its claims to all but Walvis Bay. An important port, Walvis Bay was returned to Namibia in 1994.

Namibia promulgated a new constitution on March 12, 1990 that guaranteed freedom of religion to all citizens, although no denomination was subsidized by the state. In 1994 the church hierarchy was established when Windhoek became the archdiocese for the country. While sporadic acts of violence in the country did involve the Church on occasion, such violence resulted from tribal rather than religious conflicts. In 1998 the German government sent a formal apology to the Herero people, calling the 1904 massacres of men, women and children "a particularly dark chapter in our bilateral relations."

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 Namibia had 66 parishes, tended by 13 diocesan and 58 religious priests, although more were needed. Other religious included approximately 36 brothers and 285 sisters. Most of the native children in the country attended the Catholic-run schools, which numbered 27 primary and eight secondary schools by 2000. Many of the country's hospitals, dispensaries, orphanages and hostels were also left to Church care, as the region continued to battle the spread of AIDS. By 2000 one out of every four Namibians were infected with the HIV virus. Church evangelization efforts were enhanced by the publication of an Afrikaans Sacramentary and Lectionary begun in south Africa in the late 1980s by the Afrikaans Apostolate.

NANETTI, CLELIA, ST.

In religion Maria Chiara (Eng.: Mary Clare); martyr, religious of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; b. Jan. 9, 1872, Santa Maria Maddalena, Rovigo, Italy; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, China. Impulsive, intelligent Clelia was born into a loving family of means. Although pious (one brother, Barnabé, was a Franciscan), her parents objected to her religious vocation. She joined the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary on Jan. 24, 1892 and began her novitiate three months later. She was sent to China soon after making her profession, arriving in Shanxi on May 4, 1899. When the Boxers threatened the mission, the bishop prepared to evacuate the orphanage, where Sr. Clelia was working. Clelia and the orphans returned when they found their escape route blocked. She was killed by the sword as she said, "Always forward!" She was beatified with her religious sisters by Pope Pius XII, Nov. 24, 1946, and canonized, Oct. 1, 2000, by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

NANTES, EDICT OF

A proclamation issued by HENRY IV of France, April 13, 1598, providing a measure of toleration, civil rights and liberties, and security for French HUGUENOTS. It contained 92 general articles signed by the king April 3, 1598, 56 particular or secret articles signed May 3, and three brevets. The first brevet gave an endowment of 45,000 crowns annually for the support of the clergy and churches of the Reformed Church; the second gave 180,000 crowns a year for the upkeep of garrisons in the fortified towns; the third distributed 23,000 crowns to certain Huguenot leaders. According to the general and particular articles: Roman Catholicism was restored and reestablished where it had previously been practiced, and any interference with divine service was forbidden; members of the Reformed religion were permitted to live without restriction anywhere in France and were allowed freedom of religious worship wherever they had been permitted to worship publicly by the edicts of 1577, 1596, and 1597, and in two towns in every bailiwick; they could not conduct services within five leagues of Paris, but services could be held in the homes of Huguenot nobles; they were granted complete civil liberties, including the right to hold public office and attend colleges and academies; they were permitted to hold synods and political meetings; special tribunals were authorized to settle disputes between Catholics and Huguenots, the one in the Parlement of Paris to consist of ten Catholics and six Protestants, the provincial parlements to have an equal number of Protestants and Catholics; the salaries of Protestant ministers were paid and some financial aid was provided for their colleges; the Huguenots were given 100 security areas or towns for eight years, the king was to pay the cost of the garrisons, and the governors of these towns were to be nominated by the king with the consent of the churches. The edict was registered in Paris and Grenoble in 1599; in Dijon, Toulouse, Bordeaux, Aix, and Rennes in 1600; but not until 1609 in Rouen.

The edict was a compromise only. The "Politiques," who were particularly responsible for it, asserted that religious toleration was a matter of expediency rather than a matter of principle. The Catholic clergy opposed the granting to the Huguenots of freedom of conscience, civil liberty, the right to ecclesiastical assemblies, and state subsidies for the Protestant Church. The Protestants were unhappy about limitations imposed upon them, and fearful that the edict would be violated after Henry's death. The lease on the fortified towns was renewed in 1611 and thrice more until 1624, but soon after Henry's assassination (1610) there were violations of the edict: discrimination against Huguenots in employment, their exclusion from some professional schools, restrictions on public worship, destruction of some Protestant churches. An uneasy truce developed into open conflict. After the fall of La Rochelle in 1628, Louis XIII, on the advice of RICHELIEU, issued the Edict of Alais (1629), depriving the Huguenots of all political rights and razing fortifications, but preserving religious liberties. After the peace of Alais, however, there was a gradual deterioration of the Huguenot religious position. Restrictions against them were more open under LOUIS XIV, who revoked the edict on Oct. 18, 1685.

NAPOLEON I

French general, emperor; b. Ajaccio, Corsica, Aug. 5, 1769; d. Saint Helena, May 5, 1821.

Early Years. Napoleon was the son of Charles and Laetitia (Ramolino) Bonaparte. His father was thriftless and fickle, but his mother was economical, orderly, morally austere, religious in the Corsican manner, and very severe. The maternal influence over the Christian upbringing of her unruly, taciturn son seems not to have been profound. In 1780 Napoleon received chastisements from his mother when he refused to attend Mass, but this did not increase his devoutness. His great-uncle Lucien, an archdeacon, was more adept in conciliating wisdom with thrift than in preaching fervor. At the military school in Brienne, which he entered in April 1779, the boy was industrious and avid to learn, but quarrelsome and increasingly aloof. He remained attached to Father Charles, who prepared him for First Communion, but was much less edified by the other Minims who taught him and who celebrated Mass in 10 minutes, according to him. In 1784 he transferred to a military school in Paris where the technical training was first class, but the religious formation revolved too much around external practices imposed by school discipline and reflected the 18th-century spirit that penetrated the institution. The young cadet had to attend Mass each weekday and high Mass, Vespers, and catechism class on Sunday; he had to receive Holy Communion bimonthly and go to confession monthly. His independent spirit and his already weakened faith found this conformism irritating. The crisis that caused Napoleon's detachment from the Church was intellectual rather than moral. Pleasure did not attract him. His meager income reduced him to a poor, austere mode of life. On his own testimony books were his sole debauchery; so enticing were they that he often deprived himself of food to purchase them. He nourished himself on the ancient classics and still more on such modern authors as Rousseau, Voltaire, Montesquieu, Mably, and Reynald. As a result the rationalism of the ENLIGHTENMENT penetrated his spirit and displaced his weakly rooted Christian beliefs. During his stay at the artillery school of La Fère, he ceased to approach the Sacraments and received them no more until his deathbed. He subscribed to the principles of 1789 and sided with the FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Napoleon continued to regard Corsica as his true homeland. He reserved for it the first display of his revolutionary fervor in order to install there the new revolutionary regime, which his family supported. His brother Joseph Bonaparte was elected a member of the Directory, and his uncle Joseph FESCH took the oath upholding the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY in order to become vicar to Bishop Guasco; but Napoleon himself failed to obtain a military command. The Bonapartes came into conflict with Pascal Paoli, who opposed the Revolution, and had to flee to France (June 1793).

From 1793 to 1799. The uprising in southern France in favor of the Girondins supplied the young artillery captain with an opportunity to reveal his military genius. Toulon, which had fallen into English hands, was reconquered thanks to a plan devised by Napoleon. This success won him the favor of ROBESPIERRE, the rank of general at the age of 22, and the command of the artillery in the French army in Italy. After July 27, 1794 (9 Thermidor), Napoleon was branded as a follower of Robespierre, stripped of his rank, and arrested. He then offered his services to Paul Barras and subdued the royalist insurrection (October 1795). As a reward Barras named him general of a division and commandant of the army of Paris. Barras, however, distrusted the savior of the Republic and tried to control Napoleon by turning over to him his mistress, the widow Josephine de Beauharnais. Bonaparte became passionately attached to this woman and entered a civil marriage with her (March 9, 1796) once he had been made general in charge of the army in Italy. Both of them could have had recourse to either the refractory or the constitutional priests, but neither of them troubled to do so. Josephine continued to attend the sermons of the constitutional Bishop Belmas at St. Étienne du Mont; yet this woman of fashion regarded morality lightly. Her religion was nothing but vague sentimentality.

Italian Campaign. During the war in Italy Napoleon learned from experience the social realities that he must take into account in formulating his political policies and military strategy. Despite his limited resources he confronted an offensive by new Austrian armies. To protect his rear he had to win the support of Italian Jacobins and at the same time to placate the Catholic populace, which threatened to rise against the French Revolutionary troops. Napoleon was so much impressed by the attachment of the Italians to the Church that he refused to obey the Directory's orders to march on Rome and "smash the throne of stupidity." After a first campaign in Romagna he stopped at Bologna and there signed with the Holy See an armistice guaranteeing papal neutrality while assuring himself of a war contribution of 21 million francs (June 20, 1797). After negotiations at Paris failed to effect definitive peace, a second campaign conquered Romagna and the Legations, but Bonaparte refrained from proceeding farther and informed PIUS VI that he could remain undisturbed in Rome. Napoleon promised also to provide protection for the pope and the Church, because "it is my special concern that no one make any change in the religion of our fathers." On his own initiative General Bonaparte reopened negotiations and concluded the Treaty of Tolentino (Feb. 19, 1797) without conforming to the Directory's instructions. This pact severed from the STATES OF THE CHURCH only the Legations, Ancona, and Avignon. The pope retained sovereignty over the rest of his territories, but paid 33 million francs as war indemnity, which was "equivalent to ten times Rome." This consoled the French government for these territorial concessions.

Religious Policy. No question arose concerning a bull retracting papal condemnations of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy and requiring Catholic support of the revolutionary regime. Napoleon declared that he had not spoken about religion. He was convinced that an agreement on this point could not be reached with the basically anticlerical Directory. On this subject he had already framed his basic policies of inviting priests to preach obedience to the government, consolidating the new constitution, reconciling the constitutional with the refractory clergy, and leading the majority of Frenchmen back to religion. At that moment, however, the situation did not seem to him propitious to put his ideas into operation.

Napoleon's project for Italian unification encountered Catholic opposition because the Jacobins with whom he dealt to create the Cispadine Republic and then the Cisalpine Republic practiced an anti-religious policy contrary to his views. The general sought unsuccessfully to moderate the Cisalpine government and the regional commissioners. But after his departure these men followed their own wishes. The discontent provoked by their anti-Christian action contributed largely to the uprising of 1799, which caused the collapse of a regime imposed by the French invader. Bonaparte heeded the lessons taught by this experience. It was not Catholicism as such that he intended to respect, but popular sentiment. His policy in the Egyptian campaign, during which he favored Islam, was inspired by the same selfish and realistic outlook.

Religious Restoration in France. Religion counted for naught in the coup d'état of Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799), contrived by Sieyès for financial and political motives. But Bonaparte, whose military cooperation had seemed indispensable for the success of this operation, asserted himself as head of the consular government and gave to it a personal orientation. For reasons of domestic and foreign policy he intended to regulate the religious question. Before he could start a campaign to terminate the war then raging, he had of necessity to pacify the Vendée region. Thanks to BERNIER, he succeeded by granting to the Vendéans religious liberty in the Treaty of Montfaucon. Logic dictated that the same freedom should extend to the whole nation. The decree of 28 Nivôse (Jan. 17, 1799) provided it and yet demanded from priests no more than fidelity to the constitution. On the other hand, another decree (Dec. 30, 1799) sought to dissipate the bias against the French Revolution in the papal conclave then meeting in Venice and to combat Austrian influence in the conclave by prescribing exceptional honors for the remains of Pius VI. For the moment these half measures had to suffice, because the First Consul was not yet firmly established in power. He preferred to wait until further military victory strengthened his authority before putting into effect his full program. His discourse to the clergy in Milan (June 5, 1800), which became widely known, indicated that he would discuss with the pope a complete reconciliation between France and the Church. Not until the victory at Marengo, however, did he reveal the plan already matured in his mind and charge Cardinal Carlo Martiniana of Vercelli to transmit his proposals to PIUS VII.

Religious Outlook. Napoleon was undoubtedly more eager to promote his own policy than the interests of the Church, but the extent to which his policy corresponded with his personal dispositions toward Catholicism is disputed. From this time until his exile to Saint Helena, his contradictory statements can be invoked in opposite senses; but since these utterances varied according to the circumstances and the questioners and the effect Napoleon wished to obtain, they cannot be taken literally or interpreted as proof of his religious disquiet. Napoleon was basically an enlightened despot in the 18th-century style, nourished by the philosophers of that period. Like Voltaire, he judged religion necessary for the populace. His Deism, his belief in the immortality of the soul, and his religious sentimentality came from Rousseau and Robespierre. He did not believe in Catholicism as the one true religion. For him all religions possessed some value; all should be admitted in places where they exist; and all should be utilized for the good of the state. He believed in controlling religion but not in imposing it on others. As a son of the French Revolution he was faithful to the principles of 1789. At the same time he was willing to derive from GALLICANISM other principles that permitted the ruler to limit papal interventions. His religious practice remained external, official, and restricted to attendance at Sunday Mass, an obligation from which he excused himself in the army, because the army, which idolized him, had no need of cult or chaplains (see CATECHISM, IMPERIAL).

Concordat of 1801. Napoleon's plan of religious restoration was part of his plan for a general restoration in France. Since the population as a whole clung to Catholicism, he sought to satisfy it while utilizing its religion. He believed that public opinion did not demand the restitution of ecclesiastical goods alienated during the Revolution. As for the clergy, he considered that a subsistence salary would be sufficient compensation. Napoleon judged also that national unity required ending the schism caused by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. His policy of reconciliation aimed to produce neither victor nor vanquished and obliged him to maintain a balance between the bishops of the ancien régime and the constitutional bishops by forcing both groups to resign. Thereupon the First Consul would name the entire new hierarchy. In doing so he planned to select some bishops from the ancien régime prelates and some from the constitutional hierarchy and to amalgamate them with new elements. He wanted to retain from the Revolution the division of dioceses according to civil districts, or departments, while reducing the number of dioceses lest the budget become too burdensome and disaffect the public. The same realism that dictated all these measures obliged Napoleon to have recourse to the pope in order to disavow the error committed by the Civil Constitution in 1790 and to prevent the reappearance of religious divisions. Therefore he recognized Pius VII's authority, but on the condition that the pope recognize the legitimacy of Napoleon's government. He admitted also the pope's authority to remove bishops and to appoint others in their stead. In accordance with the principles of 1789, however, he insisted that all cults must enjoy liberty and that Catholicism must not be the state religion. His plan envisioned finally that the liberty accorded Catholic public cult should be submitted to such police regulations as deemed necessary.

After laborious negotiations Pius VII and Napoleon reached agreement in the CONCORDAT OF 1801. But this text masked rather than dissolved their differences. Quickly the First Consul incorporated the Organic Articles into the Concordat, severely restricting its scope.

Conflict with Pius VII. Much graver than the causes of conflict to which the application of the Concordat gave rise was the fundamental opposition between Napoleon Bonaparte and the pope. The former lacked a spiritual sense; the latter was essentially a spiritual man. Despite their mutual sympathy, even affection, the two men were bound to come into conflict. Conciliating though he was, the Holy Father would not compromise his principles even when his independence was jeopardized. Napoleon perceived this at the time of his coronation as emperor (Dec. 2, 1804). The pope, fortified only by vague promises, agreed to come from Rome to Paris and to allow modifications in the traditional ceremony. On the eve of the event Josephine, who wanted an indissoluble religious marriage lest she be later repudiated, explained to the pope the details of the couple's civil marriage. Pius VII then insisted that this irregular situation be rectified immediately if he were to participate in the coronation the next day. Napoleon had to consent to have his union blessed by the Church, but did so only on condition that Cardinal Fesch, his uncle, officiate at the marriage without witnesses and that this matter be kept shrouded in secrecy similar to that of the confessional. Pius VII returned from his journey to France without obtaining any of the religious advantages he sought, except for some secondary ones.

To the difficulties presented by the French concordat were added those caused by the Italian concordat (1803). In some respects the latter was more favorable to the Church, since it recognized Catholicism as the state religion; but this good feature was offset by the Melzi decrees. Napoleon's coronation as king of Italy (1805) speeded the introduction into northern Italy of French laws and institutions that were inspired by the spirit of the French Revolution. Moreover, Pius VII refused to conclude the German concordat proposed by the Emperor Napoleon for the ecclesiastical reorganization of Germany.

The extension of the French Empire and the resultant wars hastened the crisis, which became acute after 1810, between the pope and the ruler who wanted to be the successor of Caesar and Charlemagne. Although Napoleon invoked his "system," neither his foreign nor his religious policies conformed to fixed, preconceived notions. Instead his ideas were in continual flux and were modified according to the needs of the moment. It was not his ill-defined system that guided Napoleon but the "force of things." At the same time his military victories and the ever-widening scope of his conflicts accentuated his autocracy. In his policy and strategy Italy played a key role. He was attached to the peninsula also because to it he owed his start toward fame and because the memories of imperial Rome were always dear to his heart. The debarcation of the allied forces at Naples previous to the battle of Austerlitz obliged him to hold Italy to protect his rear. Therefore in 1806 he integrated Naples, Venice, and the duchies with the Kingdom of Italy and extended to these regions the provisions of the Italian concordat and the French legal code. This provoked Pius VII's protests.

Imprisonment of Pius VII. Up to this point Napoleon had not occupied the remaining States of the Church. Now he demanded that the pope expel foreign agents and close his ports to the allies. So tense did the situation become that Fesch was recalled from Rome and Consalvi resigned as papal secretary of state (June 17, 1806). Once Napoleon had crushed Prussia and concluded peace with Russia at Tilsit, he increased his demands on the pope. To prevent any opening in the Continental Blockade, whose aim was to ruin England's economy and force its capitulation, Napoleon ordered Pius VII to close his ports to the British. He even asked the pope for military aid against the heretics, "our common enemies." As father to all Christians Pius VII repulsed this ultimatum. Bayane's attempt at negotiation failed. Napoleon then ordered Gen. François de Miollis to occupy Rome (Feb. 21, 1808). He decreed the annexation of the States of the Church to the French Empire (May 16, 1809); and when Pius VII retaliated by excommunicating the perpetrators of this sacrilege, he ordered General Radet in July to remove the pope from Rome and then to conduct him as a prisoner to Savona, in northern Italy.

One last step that remained was to bring the Supreme Pontiff to Paris to make him pope of the Great Empire. But nothing could weaken Pius VII's resistance. When he was deprived of his liberty and his advisers, he refused to exercise his papal powers or to institute bishops canonically. Thenceforth the struggle centered on this last point. As vacant sees multiplied, Napoleon tried vainly to end this impasse by turning to the French episcopate. An ecclesiastical committee was convened in 1809 to find a solution, but it disappointed him.

Second Marriage. To complicate matters still more, Napoleon sought to assure himself a male heir by ridding himself of Josephine and marrying a girl with royal blood. Two decisions of the Parisian diocesan and metropolitan ecclesiastical officials, which were correctly rendered, declared Napoleon's marriage on the eve of coronation null. The first decision was based on defect of form; the second was based on defect of form and also on Napoleon's merely simulated consent to the marriage contract. A controversy followed concerning the competence of these diocesan tribunals. Among the Roman cardinals then in Paris one group was convinced that the solution of this case pertained to the pope and refused to assist at the emperor's marriage to Archduchess Marie Louise of Austria (April 1810). The reprisals against these "black" cardinals did not in any way promote the success of the mission of Cardinals Giuseppe SPINA and Carlo Caselli, who were sent to Savona to work out a settlement with Pius VII.

Institution of Bishops. To circumvent the difficulties caused by Pius VII's refusal to give canonical institution to newly named bishops, Napoleon nominated to the See of Paris Jean MAURY and caused the diocesan chapter to confer on him the powers of vicar capitular. Pius VII ruined this scheme by sending secretly to Paris a brief that declared Maury's powers null. In his fury the emperor ordered the pope kept in closer confinement and began a police persecution against clerical resistance.

The emotion roused by the Maury affair convinced Napoleon of the need to solve the problem. He appointed a second committee to find a solution, but it had recourse to subterfuges. At a solemn gathering (March 11, 1811) Monsieur ÉMERY defended papal authority so courageously that the emperor displayed his admiration. A delegation of bishops to Savona shook Pius VII's resolve for a short time, but it had no lasting result because the pope revoked his concessions concerning canonical institution by a metropolitan. Napoleon then resigned himself to convoking the imperial council of 1811. There the bishops as a group resisted him, but individually they bowed to his will. When another delegation went to Savona, Pius VII conceded to the metropolitan, acting in the pope's name, the power of instituting bishops after six months. Napoleon demanded a change in this last point, but Pius VII refused. The situation thus had arrived at a new deadlock.

Concordat of Fontainebleau. Napoleon had the pope transferred to Fontainebleau, near Paris (June 1812), in the expectation that a victorious military campaign in Russia would permit him to overcome finally the resistance of the "old imbecile." After returning from the disastrous Russian expedition, the emperor was more determined than ever to succeed by extracting from the Holy Father a new concordat. Pius VII signed the so-called CONCORDAT OF FONTAINEBLEAU, but this text was intended only as a preliminary one that would serve as the basis for a later definitive agreement, provided everything were kept secret. When Napoleon in bad faith published this document as if it were a concluded concordat, Pius VII withdrew the concessions envisaged by him as the basis of the accord. As military defeat overwhelmed him, Napoleon freed the pope (Jan. 21, 1814). During the Hundred Days he tried vainly to regain the Holy See's friendship; but Waterloo rendered Msgr. Izoard's mission useless.

Last Years. In writing about Napoleon's religious attitude during his exile at Saint Helena (1815–21), Las Cases, Gourgaud, Bertrand, and Marchand have contradicted one another. Their accounts leave a mixed impression. In his last testament the emperor expressed a desire to die in the Catholic religion that he had inherited from his forebears and to receive before death Viaticum, Extreme Unction, and whatever else was customary in similar cases. According to Bertrand he was motivated solely by a belief that this would "promote public morality." Not all historians accept this interpretation. Napoleon died on May 5, 1821, after receiving the ministrations of Abbé Vignali on May 1. Pius VII was the one responsible for sending a chaplain to Saint Helena after the European powers refused to heed the papal request to mitigate Napoleon's sufferings. The pope had not forgotten that Napoleon had reestablished religion in France. Because of the "pious and courageous effort of 1801," Pius VII had long since forgiven the subsequent wrongs at Savona and Fontainebleau, which he described as mere errors of a spirit carried away by human ambition, whereas the Concordat was a Christian, heroic, and beneficial action.

NAPOLEON III

Emperor of France; b. Paris, April 20, 1808; d. Chislehurst, England, Jan. 9, 1873. He was baptized Charles Louis and was the third son of Louis and Hortense Bonaparte (then king and queen of Holland) and the nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte. He was forced by the Congress of Vienna to spend his early manhood in exile. Educated in a Bavarian Gymnasium, he acquired Swiss citizenship. As a member of the CARBONARI he took part in a local Italian revolution (1830–31) against the Austrian Hapsburgs. The combined efforts of his mother and Cardinal Mastai (later Pius IX) were required to rescue him from capture and possible execution. He afterward attempted two ill-fated coups d'état against the bourgeois government of the Orleanist King Louis Philippe. Pardonned after the failure of his coup of 1832 at Strasbourg, Louis Napoleon visited Boston, MA (1836–37), before going to England to await the death of his mother. The attempted coup of 1840 at Boulogne led to his imprisonment at the Ham fortress near the Belgian border. With the help of Dr. Henru Conneau, he escaped (1846) to England, where he established important political and social connections. In 1848 he served as a constable in London during the Chartist demonstration.

As an intellectual, Louis Napoleon was influenced by the socialist ideology of SAINT-SIMON. He wrote several treatises, two of which foreshadowed his political and socioeconomic policies, which would place him among the first rulers to cope with problems emerging from the industrial revolution. His Napoleonic Ideas advanced a constructive social and economic program for the French people. In The Extinction of Pauperism he advocated a regulated economy and social hierarchy, ideas that led later critics to label him a protofascist.

In 1848 the February and June Revolutions in France spelled the permanent end of monarchy and ushered in the Second French Republic. A constitution was adopted in November, and, assisted by the Napoleonic legend, his own versatile appeal and program, and the fear of socialism, Louis Napoleon was elected president for a terminal four-year term. He had won Catholic support by promising, after negotiations with MONTALEMBERT, to protect religion, grant the Church freedom of education, and guarantee the freedom and authority of the pope, then in exile at Gaeta. As president, he dispatched troops to occupy Rome and permit the return of Pius IX, and he recommended the Falloux Law on education. The constitution enabled the conservative Legislative Assembly to control the executive, but imprudent decisions in limiting the suffrage and in granting presidential power to appoint army and police chiefs made possible Louis's coups of 1851 and 1852. The first coup granted Louis sweeping powers to revise the constitution, while the coup of 1852 established the Second Empire. Montalembert broke with him, but Louis VEUILLOT and Bishop MARET led most Catholics to support his imperial claims. Republican opposition was subdued, and in 1853 the emperor married the beautiful Spanish countess, Eugenie de Teba. Three years later the prince imperial, Louis Napoleon (1856–79), was born, assuring succession to the throne.

The domestic policy of Napoleon III stimulated the progress of the industrial revolution. A network of railroads and a banking system contributed to national unity, while the economy was bolstered by government credit at home and in imperial territory. Banking developed with great vigor. Government banks (the Crédit Foncier and the Crédit Agricole) and the private Crédit Mobilier encouraged industrialization, commerce, urban development, and agricultural growth. The Bank of France centralized the banking structure. The Cobden Treaty of 1860 with England committed France to a policy of free trade. It was less remunerative than expected, but a public works program averted economic dislocation and made possible the prefect G. E. Haussmann's beautification of Paris. In 1864 the government permitted the rise of labor unions with rights of strike and bargaining.

Relative peace and prosperity were conducive to the growth of French culture and the contributions of L. PASTEUR in science, F. M. de Lesseps in engineering, C. P. Baudelaire and G. Flaubert in literature, J. Offenbach and G. Courbet in the arts, and J. Garnier in architecture. Catholicism flourished despite the growing differences between Liberal Catholics and the ultramontanists (see ULTRAMONTANISM). Numerous religious congregations of women were authorized, and French missionaries labored in many parts of the world, especially in southeast Asia. LOURDES became an international shrine of pilgrimage.

Ambitious overextension in the field of foreign affairs led France to disaster. Among Napoleon's imperial ventures, the Crimean War was particularly expensive in lives and money and brought questionable diplomatic gain. The War of Italian Liberation (1859–60) revealed that France alone could not control the balance of power. Theoretically committed to the RISORGIMENTO, Napoleon was fearful of alienating Catholic support, and consequently his maintenance of French troops in Rome deprived the United Italian armies of their most desired prize. Only with the withdrawal of these troops in 1870 was the last remnant of the STATES OF THE CHURCH occupied. The Mexican expedition (1861–67) terminated in the execution of "Emperor" Maximilian, the withdrawal of French troops, and loss of prestige. Imperial expansion into Indochina and Algeria led to a century of tension and eventual expulsion. In 1863–64 Polish patriots waited in vain for French help. Only Romania, which achieved autonomy, profited from Napoleon's idealistic belief that he could act as the arbiter of European destiny. Overconfidence and preoccupation with unsound foreign ventures blinded him to the rise of a powerful Prussia. The French defeat in the Franco-Prussian War (1870–71) resulted in the capture and exile of the emperor and the humiliating Treaty of Frankfurt. France never wholly regained the prestige attained by Napoleon during his 22 years of rule.

NAPPER, GEORGE, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Holywell Manor, Oxford, England, 1550; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Oxford, Nov. 9, 1610. George was the son of Edward Napper (d. 1558) and his second wife, Anne Peto of Chesterton, Warwickshire (the niece of William Cardinal Peto). George endured many things because of his Catholic faith, including expulsion from Corpus Christi College, Oxford (1568). He visited the English College at Rheims (Aug. 24, 1579) for which he was imprisoned the following year at the Wood Street Counter in London (December 1580 until June 1589). Upon acknowledging the royal supremacy, he was released. In 1596, he began seminary studies at Douai. Following his ordination, he set off for the English mission (1603), where he lived with his brother William in the family home. George was found carrying a pyx with two consecrated Hosts and a reliquary when he was arrested at Kirtlington near Woodstock (July 19, 1610). The next day he was sent to Oxford Castle. Soon thereafter he was indicted under 27 Eliz., c. 2 for being a priest, condemned, but reprieved. In prison he reconciled a condemned felon, which added the crime of persuasion to popery. Even then it was expected that he would be banished rather than executed. His refusal to take the oath of supremacy settled the matter. He was permitted to say Mass prior to his death. Some of Napper's relics were retrieved by the faithful and buried in the former chapel of Sanford manor, which later became a preceptory of Knights Templar. Napper was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

NARRATIVE THEOLOGY

Narrative theology adopts the hermeneutical principle that the key to the meaning of a text is found in its literary genre and style. Narrative theology's own genre, as it has come to be understood by practitioners in the late 20th century, is that of story or narratio. As old as religious literature itself, and used as a clearly defined form in classical rhetoric, narratio has become the subject of recent efforts at analysis and systemization. Appreciation of the usefulness of story as a vehicle for theology has grown apace with modern hermeneutical theory (see HERMENEUTICS; HERMENEUTICS, BIBLICAL).

In narrative theology, Biblical stories are commonly held up as paradigms. Though they vary from fully developed scenes with dialogue to brief and sometimes cryptic summaries, Biblical narratives center on action and movement, making verbal forms very prominent. Description (nouns, adjectives) plays a subordinate part in Biblical narrative; nothing, whether character, inner feelings or scenery which does not contribute to the action has a place in the story, and in this the Biblical style differs from the Homeric. The narrator—not an actor in the drama—tells the story from an outsider’s point of view; thus he appears as a reliable, authoritative and objective interpreter of events, able to provide the reader access to privileged information and a correct interpretation of their meaning.

This relatively new approach to theological exploration has proven to be a fruitful endeavor on several counts: first, it challenges head on the traditional view that religious truths are necessarily best expressed in propositional form; second, it lends force to the claim that religion can never be a purely personal quest; and third, it promises to make theology far more accessible to the laity than it has been heretofore. Advocates of narrative theology argue that not only is the Church’s faith fundamentally narrative in structure, but that human experience itself reflects a “storied” character. It therefore follows that full participation in the ecclesial community and the formation of Christian identity assumes access to and knowledge of the Church’s own “story” of salvation.

Narrative Theology. Few if any art forms can be considered more ancient or satisfying than that of the craft of good narrative, but scholarly interest in it seems to wax and wane with the currents of culture. The present very positive attention it is receiving as an important theological category appears to be due to a number of converging cultural and academic factors, particularly a resurgence of interest in Biblical studies, disenchantment with rationalistic and abstract forms of thought, and a corresponding renewed interest in subjectivity, symbol, imagination, and the arts. A further and perhaps even more significant factor has been an increased awareness of historical RELATIVISM. A growing historical awareness and sophistication has resulted in the recognition that narrative structure is an appropriate form for expressing an historically-rooted faith such as Christianity. Narrative permits us to understand “truth” in existential rather than absolute terms. The telling of a story, in effect, suggests a confessional commitment and not (necessarily) universal truth claims.

Interest in narrative theology has blossomed in the last two decades. A general understanding of its special contribution to theology can be indicated by mention of a few seminal works. H. Richard NIEBUHR’s The Meaning of Revelation (1941) is often cited as having provided the initial conceptual groundwork for narrative theology. Niebuhr distinguished between history proper as a factual, potentially verifiable account of events, and a subjective “internal” history—by which he meant personal identity. Niebuhr claimed that in the encounter with the Church’s story, an individual’s “internal” history underwent reinterpretation.

Thirty years later religious philosopher Steven Crites produced a brilliant essay that proved seminal to the development of this approach. In “The Narrative Quality of Experience” (1971) Crites claimed that, far from being ephemeral, cultural forms of expression are neither historical accidents, products of culture, nor the consequence of individual ingenuity. While it is true that cultural forms are still culturally particular, certain persistent cultural forms, such as language, are the mark of what it means to be human and serve as the necessary condition of historical existence. He maintained therefore that in speaking of experience one speaks of a movement through time. Human consciousness grasps its objects in an inherently temporal way insofar as it anticipates the future, attends to the present, and remembers the past. For this reason narrative is not a contrived or foreign form imposed on human experience but an accurate reflection or symbol of the time-bound nature of that experience. This means that stories are not just a human possibility; they are a human inevitability.

Uniquely important experiences occasion the holding of festal celebrations and the telling of “sacred” stories (myths) which are in fact world-creating, i.e., in the first instance they shape consciousness; in the second, they function “not like monuments that men behold, but like dwelling places. People live in them” (Crites 1971). In written form, such stories function as “Scripture.”

Roman Catholic scholar John Shea makes the same point when he observes that the “ambition of myth is not to be one more interesting but forgettable account but to become the structure of consciousness through which human situations will be appropriated” (Shea 1978). The question, according to Shea, is not whether we, as humans, “have” myths but always what kind of myths do we have? A careful probing of autobiographies always reveals a root metaphor that gives unity and coherence to a person’s life. The arguments of Crites and Shea about the fundamental power of myth to shape consciousness and world view lend credence to the claim of narrative theologians that the individual self is best understood as a “story”—a story which must be interpreted by and ultimately “owned” by the community of faith and its Scripture.

The Communal Story. Given the claims made about the inherently narrative structure of human experience and consciousness, it follows that the essential identity of a human community must necessarily be a kind of narration. A connected narrative is at once the most efficient and effective way of remembering; and this common memory is essential to the continued existence of any historical community, including the Church. Theologian George Stroup explains the vital function of narrative in the life of the individual believer and the Christian community. In an ecclesial context, the story of salvation functions as a kind of “glue”: To be a true participant, one must be able to recite the community’s stories and allow those stories to shape personal identity.

The Church has always been concerned to tell its story, first in the context of catechetical instruction, as a means of inviting and inducting newcomers into the community, and second, in liturgical celebration as a means of sustaining Christian identity and faithful witness to God’s word. One of the tasks of narrative theology is to understand the process by which the community’s story is grasped and appropriated by individuals. At what point does the Christian narrative shape consciousness and construct or reconstruct personal history? And does “knowing” the story entail living it? Is it possible for the individual to claim a living faith and not know the community’s story? Stroup argues that the genre of narrative is indispensable to the communication, explication, and personal appropriation of the Christian faith.

Christians have learned the significance of story and its personal appropriation from the Jewish tradition and the Hebrew Scriptures. As an historical, time-bound faith, Christianity has often been referred to as a “religion of the Book.” This is true not only because Scripture contains the authoritative versions of the Church’s sacred stories of origin; it is also true in the sense that Scripture provides the normative model for how, when, and why the stories are to be retold. According to contemporary Biblical scholars, the earliest expressions of Hebrew worship entailed the retelling or recital of past events—events that witness to a history of deliverance and blessing.

This ritual of remembering was not simply a matter of promoting conservative interests or maintaining a romanticized, heroic vision of the past. For Israel, to recount the mighty acts of God was to invoke that same redemptive power as a transforming force in the lives of those who remember. The ritual recital in effect “contemporized” the saving event for each new generation: “The LORD our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. Not with our fathers did the LORD make this covenant, but with us, who are all of us here alive today . . .” (Dt

5:2–3). For centuries Jews celebrating the Passover have reminded themselves that it was they and not merely their ancestors who were delivered at the sea by the mighty hand of Yahweh.

This direct and dramatic form of appropriating the communal story (which scholars term “actualization”) implies a release of power and is therefore best understood as a sacramental action. The Christian Eucharist is likewise a ritual remembering in which a new generation is permitted to participate in the definitive “saving” event, and today the Church is seeking to recover the narrative structure of worship and doctrinal formulations. For example, the category of “story” has become particularly attractive to political and liberation theologians who see in the plight of the Third World and other marginalized classes all the elements of the Exodus drama (see LIBERATION THEOLOGY). They recognize that Biblical narrative is really the only form of theology that is accessible and therefore compelling to the unlettered.

Furthermore, the abstraction of Biblical narrative into formal doctrine blunts the “bite” of these stories. The effect (inevitably) is to rob the Gospel of its potential power to subvert long-established, institutionalized injustices. German theologian, Johann Baptist Metz (1980) argues that all doctrine should have an obvious narrative and “practical” structure. Recognizing that stories, like Sacraments, are “efficacious” and thus able to transform the hearer, he warns against repeated abstractions that eviscerate the performative power of the Church’s stories of salvation. The Church must consciously begin to stress the narrative quality of the Sacraments, to recognize that what Sacraments signify are stories, and that these saving stories reveal truths that would otherwise not be known. The Church, therefore, does not tell stories in order to teach doctrine. The real function of doctrine is to “protect the narrative memory of salvation in a scientific world, to allow it to be at stake and to prepare a way for a renewal of this narrative, without which the experience of salvation is silenced” (Metz 213).

Biography as Theology. The Church’s story is told in yet another context, indirectly yet powerfully, and that is in the lives of faithful Christians. The lives of the saints (hagiography) has always been a popular narrative genre for communicating the faith. The current resurgence of interest in personal life histories as a form of theologizing presents more than a subjectivist preoccupation with psychology and psychotherapy. It is probably best understood as a new variety of hagiography. Liberation theologians such as James Cone (1975) or Robert McAfee Brown (1975) claim that oppressed people have “true” stories to tell and that giving voice to these stories is a form of empowerment. Feminists maintain that as the faith experience of women is not popularly recognized, the Church's story has not yet been fully told. Theologians such as George Stroup (1981) and James W. McClendon (1974), on the other hand, are more interested in linking theological and ethical themes with the genre of biography and attendant hermeneutical issues. They want to know what happens when an individual life story intersects or "collides" with the communal story. In what sense are people's lives governed by root metaphors supplied by Christian tradition? Do the lives of holy people modify or enlarge our understanding of traditional doctrines? Whose story changes and how?

Implications for Liturgy and Catechesis. Although some argue that narrative theologians are not really saying anything new, their message carries a force by virtue of the technical support supplied by their study of literary criticism, linguistics, the philosophy of history, depth psychology, ethics, and social criticism. What this relatively untested enterprise lacks in precision, it more than makes up for in energy and enthusiasm. If what it says about the formative power of the Church's communal narrative is taken seriously, there are several obvious implications for liturgical and catechetical practice.

First, narrative should form the core of both preaching and teaching. Biblical and traditional materials are most effectively presented in narrative rather than propositional form.

Second, the Church has the responsibility to preserve the story faithfully. Faithful preservation implies that the full, and not an idealized, truncated or emasculated version of the Church's story should be told. Biblical material should not be watered down or mercilessly clipped as a strategy for protecting the community from its own mortifying failures or its great successes. Faithfulness further implies that the Bible be permitted to address the community as an objective, history-like story. To allow the Biblical stories to mean whatever the reader wants them to mean is poor Biblical stewardship. It becomes a form of domestication which robs Biblical narrative of its efficacy and transformative power.

Third, the Church needs to recognize and respect the sacramental efficacy of its own narrative. Stewards of the word—preachers, teachers, and theologians—need to tell these stories as expectantly as they pray, and to teach them as intentionally as they teach the Christian creed which itself tells the story of creation and salvation. Stories are channels of power and grace, the rock on which sound doctrine rests.

Fourth and finally, the Church needs to become much more adept and consciously active in the task of supporting the telling or revisioning of personal faith his-stories. Clergy and laity alike need help in developing the skills necessary to reinterpret the experiences of daily life in terms of the Church's collective story of salvation.

NARY, CORNELIUS

Priest, controversialist, translator; b. near Naas, Co. Kildare, Ireland, c. 1660; d. Dublin, March 3, 1738. After being educated locally, he was ordained in Kilkenny in 1684, went to Irish College, Paris, graduated doctor of laws from the University of Paris, and became tutor in London to the Earl of Antrim. He was appointed parish priest of St. Michan's, Dublin, c. 1700, and composed a catechism for the use of his parish (1705), to which he introduced the Dominican and Poor Clare nuns. In 1717 he translated the New Testament with practical liturgical intent. He wrote a "powerful memorial" (Lecky) on the subject of the oath of abjuration, called The Case of the Catholics of Ireland (1724). Nary's literary activity included an ambitious New History of the World (Dublin 1720); translations from the French; writings on UNIGENITUS; and, among others, replies to one George Synge, Charitable Address to All Who Are of the Communion of Rome (1728). An active member of the diocesan chapter, he figured in domestic controversies.

NASCIMBENI, GIUSEPPE, BL.

Priest, founder of the Little Sisters of the Holy Family (Piccole Suore della Sacra Famiglia); b. March 22, 1851, Torri del Benaco, Italy; d. Jan. 21, 1922, Castelletto del Garda, northern Italy.

Giuseppe, the son of Antonio Nascimbeni and Amida Sartori, completed his seminary training at Verona, Venetia. Following his ordination in 1874, he taught and served as priest in the parish of San Pietro di Lavagno. On Nov. 2, 1877, Nascimbeni was sent to the small village of Castelletto, where he remained the rest of his life as a teacher and associate, then as pastor.

He was an exemplary parish priest, created protonotary apostolic by Pius X in 1911, who was active in advancing modernization in the area. He helped establish the local bank and post office, promoted the olive oil industry, urged the installation of modern utilities, and oversaw the construction of the parish church (1905–08), an oratory, a nursery school, an orphanage, and a nursing home.

After trying and failing to persuade several congregations to send nuns to the area, on the advice of his bishop, Cardinal Bartolomeo Bacilieri, he founded (Nov. 6, 1892) the institute of Little Sisters of the Holy Family with four sisters, including Maria Mantovani. The congregation works in hundreds of institutes in Italy and abroad training girls, caring for the elderly, and teaching.

Nascimbeni, who cared for his flock spiritually and materially, died after a stroke (1916) and long illness. His mausoleum is in the chapel of the institute at Castelletto. Pope John Paul II, praising Father Giuseppe as a pastor of consummate charity and virtue, beatified him at Verona, April 17, 1988.

Feast: Jan. 20.

NATHAN

The name of a prophet in the days of DAVID and SOLOMON; the name also of one of David's sons. The prophet Nathan [Heb. nātān, shortened form of a theophoric compound, such as nātān-'ēl, "God has given (a son)"] dissuaded David from building a temple and gave him the important oracle that promised perpetuity to the Davidic Dynasty (2 Sm 7.1–29). He reproved David for his adultery and murder of Uriah (2 Sm 12.1–15). According to the Biblical CHRONICLER, it was with Nathan's concurrence that David arranged the musical service for the sanctuary (2 Chr 29.25). Nathan supported Solomon in his bid for the throne (1 Kgs 1.10–45). According to 1 Chr 29.29 and 2 Chr 9.29 Nathan wrote a history of David and Solomon.

Nathan, son of David (2 Sm 5.14), is probably the ancestor of the family mentioned in Zec 12.12. St. Luke (3.31) traces the lineage of Jesus through this Nathan rather than through Solomon.

NATIONAL APOSTOLATE FOR INCLUSION MINISTRY (NAFIM)

The National Apostolate for Inclusion Ministry (NAFIM), formerly the National Apostolate for the Mentally Retarded (NAMR), is an organization dedicated to including mentally challenged persons in ecclesial life. The new designation took effect in 1997. In the 1960s society at large began to observe a changing consciousness toward those with mental disabilities. Catholics began forging an idea for a national support network. In 1961, interested parties gathered at an Inter-American CCD Congress in Dallas, Texas, formed a core group and, after a series of meetings, a constitution was later approved in West Hartford, Connecticut (1967). In August 1970, also in West Hartford, the first NAMR conference took place. The first president was Reverend Matthew M. Pasaniello of New Jersey.

During the 1970s, NAMR incorporated, established an office at Trinity College, Washington, D.C., and was included in the Official Catholic Directory. It also changed its name in 1974 to the National Apostolate with Mentally Retarded Persons (NAMRP), a name it kept until 1992, when it was renamed as the National Apostolate with People with Mental Retardation (NAPMR). Meanwhile, the organization endeavored to create inclusive ministry across the country by collaborating with like-minded groups.

In accordance with the United States Bishops' pastoral letters on people with disabilities, NAFIM seeks to witness "to the Good News that all persons are created in God's image and likeness" and that the mentally retarded share "virtues like courage, patience, perseverance, compassion, and sensitivity that should serve as an inspiration to all Christians." Therefore, the principle purposes of the NAFIM are: (1) to promote the full incorporation of persons with mental retardation within the life of the Church; (2) to enhance the growth of persons with mental retardation and the entire Church through the prophetic role of persons with mental retardation; (3) to take steps in both the Church and the community at large, on a national and local level, to bring before the public the spiritual, interpersonal, and communal gifts of persons with mental retardation; (4) to foster quality evangelization, catechesis, sacramental preparation, and participation, and ongoing spiritual development of persons with mental retardation; and (5) to provide a forum for those involved in direct ministry with persons with mental retardation.

At the level of education, NafIM has sought to develop appropriate curriculum materials with the goal of mainstreaming children with mental disabilities into Catholic school settings.

Annually, there is a membership conference in various sections of the United States. The members—parents, teachers, chaplains, nurses, administrators, DREs, volunteers, and professionals from other areas—attend workshops, liturgies, and lectures which highlight key areas and future trends in the field of catechesis and mental retardation. All who participate in the spiritual, mental, or physical development of the mentally retarded are eligible for membership. NafIM publishes a quarterly newsletter and provides consulting services. The NafIM is presently based in Riverdale, Maryland.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS

A voluntary association of American Protestant evangelical churches, schools, organizations, and individuals who are united without executive or legislative control on the basis of a commonly accepted statement of faith. The purpose of the Association is to provide national identification for evangelicals, fellowship in cooperative witness, and service in every major field of evangelical concern. The occasion for the foundation of the Association was dissatisfaction among evangelical Protestants with the then Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America (1905–50; see NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A.). They objected that the Council had admitted to its membership a large number of “liberals” who, in their philosophy and theology, were un-Biblical and even anti-Biblical; that it had deliberately omitted or purposely neglected to include provisions for the preservation of all the values inherent in historic Protestantism; and that it had forced evangelicals to take protective measures to ensure their liberty in preaching the Gospel and in carrying out their church programs.

The first organized effort of evangelicals to unite among themselves was the formation in 1929 of the regional New England Fellowship. Its success led to a meeting of evangelical leaders in Chicago, Illinois, Oct. 27–28, 1941, and the unanimous decision to call a national conference in St. Louis, Missouri, April 7–9, 1942. Representatives from approximately 40 denominations agreed at the St. Louis meeting “to organize an Association which shall give articulation and united voice to our faith and purposes.” In May of 1943 at Chicago, a constitutional convention worked out a statement of faith that was built on the Bible as the supreme authority in all matters of belief and conduct. With this creedal basis, the convention then adopted a permanent constitution. The national office is located in Los Angeles, California. Central to the Association is the Office of Governmental Affairs in Washington, D.C., which keeps a watch on legislation, the infringement of religious liberties, religious persecutions, and other matters of evangelical interest. The monthly magazine, United Evangelical Action, is the official publication of the Association.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF PASTORAL MUSICIANS

A national membership organization primarily composed of musicians, musician-liturgists, clergy, and other leaders of prayer devoted to serving the life and mission of the Church through fostering the art of musical liturgy in Roman Catholic worshiping communities in the United States of America. Founded July 1, 1976, NPM has a unique interest in the practical issues facing the practicing musician and the parish clergy. As an association of musicians and clergy, its stated purposes are: (1) to provide support for practicing parish musicians through improved repertoire, through increased knowledge of the role of music in the liturgy, through practical helps for effective participation in parish liturgical-committee planning of music; (2) to provide a forum for advocating musical excellence in liturgical celebrations; (3) to provide a vehicle for disseminating evaluations of new and current musical selections; and (4) to assist diocesan and parish level efforts in improving the quality of and interest in parish music.

Membership is provided for Directors of Music Ministries, Catholic Music Educators, as well as special interest sections for choir directors, cantors, clergy, organists, campus ministers, ensemble musicians, musicians in the military, youth, seminary music educators, eastern Church musicians, and musicians serving Hispanic, African American and other ethnic communities.

Publications include Pastoral Music, Pastoral Music Notebook, Catholic Music Educator, Praxis, NPM clergy Update, The Liturgical Singer, NPM Organists, and NPM Publications. Additional services include Conventions, Schools and Institutes, and NPM Hotline which assists musicians seeking positions and parishes looking for musicians. NPM is affiliated with the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops. Its head office is located in Washington, DC.

NATIONAL BLACK SISTERS' CONFERENCE

Established in August 1968, the National Black Sisters' Conference (NBSC) seeks to provide ongoing support on the formation, education, and support of African-American women religious; to develop resources for the deepening of spirituality and promotion of unity and solidarity among African-American women religious; to facilitate the development of religious education from an African-American perspective; to stimulate the growth of African-American spirituality; to highlight the racism, powerlessness, poverty, and the distorted self-image of victimized African-American people; to promote knowledge and appreciation of the beauty of African-American cultural-religious heritage; to encourage the growth of African-American religious leadership within the church and in religious communities; and to articulate a cohesive African-American identity for African-American women religious. The NBSC holds annual meetings and organizes annual joint conferences with the National Black Catholic Clergy Caucus and the National Black Catholic Seminarian Association. It also provides a ministry clearinghouse for African-American women religious who want to minister within the African-American community, and a resource center for statistical research of African-American women religious throughout the United States. Its regular publications include Signs of Soul and “Tell It like It Is”—Catechetics from the Black Perspective. Its headquarters is in Washington, D.C.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC COALITION FOR RESPONSIBLE INVESTMENT

The National Catholic Coalition for Responsible Investment (NCCRI) was begun in February 1973 as a joint project of the National Federation of Priests Councils, the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, the Conference of Major Superiors of Men, the National Assembly of Women Religious, the Catholic Committee of Urban Ministry, and the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. Coordinators of NCCRI since its foundation have been Reverends Eugene Boyle, Donald Bagen, OMI, and Michael Crosby, OFM Cap. NCCRI has a twofold purpose: to educate Catholic institutions about the desirability and manner of becoming involved in corporate social responsibility; and to facilitate the effort of Catholic institutions in their involvement.

The educational component of NCCRI was given in over 500 Catholic dioceses, religious congregations, schools, and health-care centers in 17 regional meetings since 1973. As a result of most of these seminars, regional coalitions were formed to achieve the second goal of NCCRI, the active effort of Catholic institutions in the corporate responsibility movement. By 1978 ten regions, comprising over 150 portfolio-holding Catholic institutions, became actively involved through membership in the Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility (ICCR) in New York, a joint project of both NCCRI-related organizations and major Protestant denominations and agencies. In 1977, Sister Regina Murphy, SC, was elected the first Catholic chairperson of ICCR. In 2001, ICCR had over 275 Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish institutions that used their investments in the marketplace to promote social change.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC CONFERENCE FOR INTERRACIAL JUSTICE (NCCIJ)

Founded in 1959–1960 at Chicago as a federation of Catholic Interracial Councils, NCCIJ now has its national office at the Josephite Seminary in Washington, DC. It implements the teaching of the Catholic Church on cultural and racial justice and serves to further the Church’s vision of multicultural and multiracial understanding. Bridge-building between the white and black populations was the original rationale for Catholic Interracial Councils (CIC), a movement begun in the 1930s, under the guidance of John LAFARGE, SJ (1880–1963). Both personally and as editor for the Jesuit weekly America, LaFarge hammered home to U.S. Catholics that racism was a sin. The pioneer effort in the New York City area, launched on June 6, 1934 (Pentecost Sunday), led to imitation elsewhere, until a CIC was to be found in almost every large urban area. The NCCIJ was established to coordinate the effort of the Councils, although each maintains its independence. For many years, the New York CIC published the Interracial Review, which reported on items of interest to African-Americans. NCCIJ continues to publish a newsletter, Commitment.

On Aug. 28, 1958, the first National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice was held at Loyola University in Chicago. The leaders of the Chicago CIC had orchestrated this meeting. As a result of this, the NCCIJ sprung up the following year. Shortly thereafter, the American bishops issued a pastoral letter, “Discrimination and Christian Conscience” (Nov. 14, 1958), which said, “The heart of the race question is religious and moral.” No other previous statement of the American hierarchy had described the problem in this way.

Varied and intensive governmental programs, together with the emergence of the Black Power movement of the 1960s, led to less emphasis on maintaining private interracial coalitions of volunteer members and consequently to fewer Catholic interracial councils. During the 1960s, NCCIJ served as catalyst and secretariat for the first National Conference on Religion and Race (Chicago 1963) and for Catholic participation in the widespread demonstrations and other programs designed to achieve the federal Civil Rights acts of 1964 and 1968. In the late 1970s, the Conference’s major areas of concern included full, fair and equal opportunity employment, and Catholic school integration. Special emphasis was put on efforts to have the Church’s own practices conform to the principles of social justice that Catholics accept and proclaim. In 1990, the NCCIJ began its Creating an Inclusive Church program “to assist the Church in addressing the increasing diversity of its membership with justice, unity, and love.” It seeks to address under-representation of minorities in diocesan offices, purchasing, and ministry. The Plan for Parish Action (1992) focuses on building bridges between races and cultures and ensuring that all activities of the parish include all races and cultures. The Conference makes its services available to all, regardless of race, color, religion, or national origin.

NCCIJ is supported by contributions from individual and organization members, general appeals, and foundation grants. The Conference includes bishops, religious, and laity on its policy-making board, but it is an autonomous body, although approved by official Catholic leadership. At the national level, NCCIJ strives to be effective, by itself and in coalition with other civil rights and community groups (esp. NAACP, the National Office of Black Catholics, and those involved in the Spanish-speaking apostolate), in assuring the passage and enforcement of federal legislation guaranteeing equal rights and opportunities for all people, regardless of race, color, or national origin, in the areas of employment, housing, education, welfare, and health care. Two perspectives are aggressively maintained: (1) racial justice is a moral issue, transcending economics and politics; (2) the ministry to achieve interracial justice is not limited to a particular group, but is an obligation shared by all, with special responsibilities on Christians who recognize the universality of redemption and brotherhood in Jesus Christ.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE

The National Catholic Development Conference, Inc. (NCDC) was founded in 1968 to assist its members in developing ethical and successful methods of fund raising. Rev. Richard Drabik, MIC, was the first president. Voting membership is open to those Catholic institutions listed in the Official Catholic Directory. Nonvoting associate and corporate membership is open to those individuals and institutions who are not eligible for active membership. In 2001, it was the largest development organization and included dioceses, religious orders and provinces, hospitals, and educational institutions.

The professional beginnings of the NCDC can be traced back to 1955 when a group of mission procurators and development directors began meeting under the aegis of the Mission Secretariat in Washington, D.C. In the early 1960s members of the Catholic Press Association (CPA) with fund-raising concerns began to hold annual meetings. They called themselves the Catholic Fund-Raising Conference and met in conjunction with the CPA convention. Directly out of this group the NCDC was formed. It was incorporated in New York State, March 5, 1968. The year following its incorporation, the NCDC drew up its Precepts of Stewardship, a set of ethical guidelines for fund raising. Originally nine in number (now six), these include the requirement of official church approval, good stewardship practices, integrity in business associations, and the good taste and sound theology which must be associated with religious fund raising. Conditions for membership include adherence to these Precepts and to the 1977 NCCB Principles and Guidelines for Fund Raising in the United States. The annual highlight of the Conference's activities is its development convention, held usually in September, which attracts several hundred attendees. The Conference's services to members include a continuing education program, a development resource library, and a public-information program, "Giving is an Act of Faith," established to compile and disseminate material on fund-raising institutions and their programs. The NCDC has established six regional planning groups that serve religious fund-raising professionals in designated areas of the U.S. It also offers a Planned Giving Professionals Mentoring Program for its members who have limited experience in planned giving. The Conference also tracks pertinent legislation relevant to development professionals.

The NCDC maintains a liaison with the episcopal and religious conferences of the U.S., and it represents its members on postal-affairs committees and before regulatory and legislative groups. It publishes the periodical called Dimensions, and issues a report called The Monitor, which tracks postal legislation.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION (NCEA)

The largest professional education association in the world, comprising institutional members and educators serving at all levels of Catholic education. Founded in 1904 as the Catholic Educational Association of the U.S. (CEA), it united three separate organizations: the Education Conference of Catholic Seminary Faculties (1897); the Association of Catholic Colleges (1898); and the Parish School Conference (1902). In 1927, the CEA changed its name to the National Catholic Educational Association (NCEA).

Second-grade students at a Catholic school. (©David H. Wells/CORBIS)

Much of the inspiration and organization are attributed to Rt. Rev. Msgr. Thomas J. CONATY, rector of The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, and Rev. Francis W. HOWARD of Columbus, Ohio. Conaty became bishop of Los Angeles in 1903, and his successor at The Catholic University, Most Rev. Denis J. O'CONNELL, became the NCEA's first president general and served from 1904 to 1908.

The following goals characterize the work of NCEA: to promote and encourage the principles and ideals of Christian education and formation; to encourage and provide means whereby Catholic educators and their institutions can work cooperatively and effectively for professional growth; to promote and interpret the Catholic educational endeavor in its contribution to the total national educational enterprise and to the general welfare of the nation; and to seek and foster cooperation nationally and internationally between Catholic educational institutions and agencies which promote the general education of society.

In the beginning, the CEA had only three departments: for seminaries, colleges, and parish schools. These three departments expanded over the decades into the present seven constitutive departments: Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities (ACCU); Chief Administrators of Catholic Education (CACE); Elementary Schools; Secondary Schools; National Association of Boards of Catholic Education (NABE); Religious Education; and Seminary.

The NCEA strives to be a meaningful service organization for all Catholic education. It encourages creative new designs for educational programs and it features strong efforts to assist decision-makers who are charged with keeping Catholic education a vital force. In addition to its publications, it sponsors an annual convention to bring together all Catholic educators.

Since 1929, the headquarters of the association has been located in Washington, DC.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC PHARMACISTS GUILD OF THE U.S.

An association of Catholic pharmacists organized in 1962. Before that date there were some diocesan associations of Catholic pharmacists in various parts of the U.S. One of these, the Catholic Pharmacists Guild of St. James of the Diocese of Fall River, MA, presented to its bishop, the Most Rev. James L. Connolly, a plan for a national pharmacists' organization. With the bishop's approval, and with the cooperation of officers of other diocesan guilds, the St. James Guild sponsored a national membership campaign that resulted in an organizational meeting in New York City on Sept. 19, 1962, with 21 diocesan representatives present. The decision was reached to form a national guild. Today the Guild is based in St. Louis, Mo. The group focuses on ethics, morals, medical missions, and drug donations. Its members periodically contribute to public policy advocacy, especially with respect to pharmaco-therapies and vaccine development.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC STUDENT COALITION (NCSC)

NCSC was chartered in 1982 by 40 college and university students from around the United States. The group is a successor to the National Newman Club Federation (1908–1968) and the National Federation of Catholic College Students (1938–1968). Where the former was responsible to the Catholic student population at non-Catholic colleges and universities, the latter worked on behalf of only Catholic institutions of higher learning. Today, NCSC is a movement for lay undergraduate students in all U.S. colleges and universities and embraces and serves some four million Catholic college students. Students affiliate with the NCSC through student government organizations on the various campuses, usually through campus ministries. As of June 2000, NCSC had a membership of 150 (120 organization/campus ministry memberships, 30 individual student and alumni members). It is the U.S. constituent member of Pax Romana-

International Movement of Catholic Students (IMCS) and it is through the IMCS that NCSC has a voice as a non-governmental organization at the United Nations. IMCS also represents its affiliates to the Pontifical Council of the Laity.

According to its constitution approved for 2001, the NCSC's mission is to form students in the faith, form the Christian conscience, educate for justice, facilitate personal development, and train future leaders. The organization is established to be a voice for Catholic college students in the U.S.; to provide them with resources for information and leadership development; to partner with local campus ministries and other national and international movements; and to provide a network of campus ministry groups and contact persons. It is comprised of an executive board and several regional boards and committees.

The old NFCCS had its first meeting at Manhattanville College in New York City in 1938. The following year it joined the Newman Federation in becoming U.S. members of the International Movement of Catholic Students (IMCS), which had been instituted by the Holy See in 1921. Also in 1939, the two groups hosted the World Congress of Pax Romana-IMCS on the campuses of Fordham University, Manhattanville College, and the Catholic University of America. During their meetings, where participants heard Dorothy Day among others, the second world war broke out, stranding many European delegates in the United States. The Pax Romana-IMCS remained in the U.S. for the duration of the war under the direction of Edward Kirchner, a collaborator of John Courtney Murray, SJ. By the mid-1960s, NFCCS had a membership of 100,000 students in more than 125 Catholic colleges and universities throughout 15 regions. However, upon the dissolution of the Newman Federation and NFCCS in 1968, the reorganization and downgrading of the old National Catholic Welfare Conference's Youth Department after the Second Vatican Council, and a cultural and attitudinal shift that occurred in the 1960s with respect to student movements generally, the Catholic student was left without formal organizational ties. This changed in 1980, when Joseph Kirchner, the son of Edward Kirchner, and Linda Wirth of the IMCS, rallied college students across the country to re-organize. In March 1982, the NCSC was founded in New York City. Each year since 1985, the NCSC has hosted a leadership conference that traditionally draws several hundred student participants.

Today, communications among the various regions are facilitated through the NCSC's official newspaper, The Catholic Collegian. NCSC is also involved in World Youth Days.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE FOR COMMUNITY AND JUSTICE (NCCJ)

Formerly known as the National Conference for Christians and Jews—an organization founded in 1927 to promote cooperation in the social order between Jews and Christians—the National Conference for Community and Justice mirrors its heritage by broadening its mission to combat all forms of social bigotry. The new designation took effect in 1997. The old NCCJ was an attempt to counteract the religious intolerance that marked the 1920s in the U.S. In 1928 the presidential campaign, with its anti-Catholic prejudice, induced members of the Federal Council of Churches to form a committee that later became the National Conference of Christians and Jews. Judge and former Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, financier Roger Williams Straus, and Carlton J. H. Hayes, of Columbia University and a former ambassador to Spain, were the founding co-chairmen; Dr. Everett R. Clinchy was the first executive director.

Some members of the Catholic hierarchy, particularly Archbishop John T. McNicholas of Cincinnati, remained reticent during the 1930s and 1940s, following an interpretation of a letter of Pope Leo XIII that held that intercredal cooperation was a form of syncretism or religious indifferentism. Not all bishops saw the matter in these terms and Archbishop Edward Hanna of San Francisco publicly endorsed NCCJ. In its first decade, many priests, including J. Elliot Ross and T. Lawrason Riggs, worked vigorously on its behalf.

The NCCJ has never been an interfaith movement. As a civic organization of religiously motivated people, it promotes civic good will of all religious, ethnic, gender, and racial groups without compromise of religious beliefs. Its basic philosophy stems from the Judeo-Christian ethic of the equality of all people, while its technique is educational penetration of many heterogeneous groups to bring about better understanding and cooperation in matters of common social concern.

In the 1990s, NCCJ began to sponsor a nationally telecast discussion known as The National Conversation on Race, Ethnicity, and Culture, which became a model for civil conversation for issues such as the impact of race on public education and regional economic development, immigration, affirmative action, and welfare reform.

While headquartered in New York City, NCCJ has offices or affiliates in several dozen major U.S. cities where workshops and symposia are sponsored. Recent programs have included Seminarians Interacting, which brings future religious leaders into contact with one another to learn about their counterparts in other faith traditions. SI also includes Muslim students. Other educational work of the conference has been carried on primarily through up linked workshops and discussion groups.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATECHETICAL LEADERSHIP

The National Conference of Catechetical Leadership (NCCL), which has as its mission to enrich and strengthen the ministry of catechesis in the United States, traces its roots to 1934 when diocesan directors of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) were first convened by Bishop Edwin O’Hara of Great Falls, Montana. The directors successfully petitioned the bishops to establish both an episcopal committee and a national center for the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine. The episcopal committee was formed in November of that same year, and the national center was established in 1935. In 1936, the directors began to meet annually under the aegis of the National Center.

When the directors gathered in New Orleans for their thirtieth annual meeting in April 1966, they decided to form their own organization, independent of the National Center. Episcopal approval for the move was sought and given in September of that year by the Bishops’ Committee for CCD meeting in Pittsburgh for the Twelfth National Catechetical Congress. The National Conference of Diocesan Directors of Religious Education/CCD (NCDD) was formally launched in January 1967. NCDD was organized around the ecclesiastical provinces in the United States with the board of directors consisting of elected officers and a representative from each province.

In 1991, the organization changed its bylaws, structure, and governance to widen its membership and to facilitate decision-making and governance processes. In addition to diocesan directors and their staffs, membership was expanded to include academicians, parish directors of religious education, publishers, and affiliated organizations.

Governance of the NCCL is exercised primarily through two bodies: a Representative Council and a Board of Directors. The Representative Council includes representation from the ecclesiastical provinces and the various membership constituencies. The Council's basic functions are to elect the board of directors, entertain matters affecting the state and direction of religious education/catechesis, and to articulate the values of the Conference. The smaller board of directors supervises, regulates, and directs the affairs of the Conference. Both bodies meet in the fall and spring. The officers of the Conference are elected by the general membership.

The Conference publishes a journal, Catechetical Leadership, five times a year and quarterly update reports. The Conference holds ex officio status on the Bishops' Subcommittee on Catechesis and their Committee on Education. The national offices are located in Washington, DC.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC MEN (NCCM)

A national federation of organizations of Catholic laymen (NCCM), established in 1920 under the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC) and mandated by the American hierarchy to promote and service the development of the lay apostolate and Catholic Action. NCCM celebrated its golden anniversary in 1970 and was briefly merged with the National Conference of Catholic Women (NCCW) to form the National Council of Catholic Laity (NCCL), before both NCCM and NCCL became inactive in 1975.

Membership and Government. The NCCM's member organizations included parish societies, inter-parochial societies, state-wide organizations, diocesan federations, and national organizations. The majority of NCCM's programs and services were channeled to its affiliated organizations through diocesan and deanery councils. Approximately 10,000 men's organizations with a total membership of nearly nine million were affiliated with the NCCM.

The NCCM was governed by a general assembly consisting of the presidents of diocesan councils and national organizations, who in turn elected an executive board composed of 16 members. From the beginning of Vatican Council II, the NCCM's policies were related to the major areas of renewal in the Church's life, namely, liturgy, Scripture, ecumenism, catechetics, and social action.

Objectives and Activities. The major objectives of the NCCM were to federate Catholic men's organizations into a common agency; to develop, promote, and service programs of apostolic action related to contemporary issues; to serve as an informational service link between the NCWC and laymen's organizations; to be a central clearinghouse for information on Catholic laymen's activities; to promote and coordinate lay cooperation in national matters affecting the Church; to help existing Catholic men's organizations to work more effectively in their own localities; to cooperate in furthering the aims of all approved movements in the interest of the Church and society in general; to participate in national and international movements related to its goal; and to bring about a better appreciation of Catholic principles and ideals in the social, economic, educational, and civic life of the U.S.

The major areas of the NCCM's apostolate included: (1) religious activities, such as spiritual and apostolic formation, pastoral assistance, liturgy, and retreats; (2) communications—by means of parish libraries, promotion of the NCCM's radio and television programs, and cooperation with the Legion of Decency and the National Office for Decent Literature (both now defunct); (3) civic and social action—in areas of race relations, migratory labor, employment and problems of the "dropout," urban redevelopment, rural life, cooperation in community affairs, and educational programs on the Church's social encyclicals; (4) legislation—local, state, and national laws relating to current issues such as civil rights, education, the aged, social welfare, labor, and agriculture; (5) family life—family retreats, Cana conferences, family-life institutes, and religious practices and instructions in the home; (6) youth—cooperation with diocesan and parish youth directors, sponsorship of youth leadership training courses, and promotion of recreational and educational facilities; (7) public relations—internal news letters; bulletins; and press, radio, and television releases on organizational programs; (8) international affairs—the fostering of foreign students and visitors; educational programs on the United Nations; study clubs; and meetings on foreign affairs, missions, underdeveloped countries, and world peace; (9) organization and development—training through the NCCM's leaders' course in the lay apostolate in affiliated organizations, and through the speakers' bureau and membership drives.

Four regular publications supplied continuous service to the NCCM's affiliated organizations: Alert Catho- lic Men, Program and Training, Executive Newsletter, and Highlights. In its program of leadership training and weekend retreats, the NCCM provided intensive study and training in the lay apostolate for a small group of lay leaders in an atmosphere of prayer, combined with liturgical and scriptural services. The NCCM maintained a library of Catholic films and was responsible also for all regularly scheduled national Catholic network radio and television programs, the best known of which is the National Broadcasting Company's "Catholic Hour," instituted in 1930.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC WOMEN (NCCW)

A federation of some 6,000 Catholic women's organizations representing millions of Catholic women across the United States. The NCCW was founded in 1920 at the request of the United States Catholic bishops who had seen the work accomplished by the many separate Catholic women's groups during World War I and urged them to unite their efforts by forming a federation. The NCCW eventually was a constituent member of the Lay Organization Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. The NCCW is composed of affiliated parish or area women's groups, and diocesan and national organizations, as well as supporting members. The organization acts through these affiliates to support, educate, and empower all Catholic women in spirituality, leadership, and service.

In 1920 when the NCWC's Department of Lay Organizations was divided into the National Council of Catholic Men (NCCM) and the National Council of Catholic Women, the NCCW had only 90 affiliated organizations. In its early days, the NCCW managed the National Catholic School of Social Service (NCSSS), 1921–1947, for women, prior to its merger with the School of Social Work, for men, at The Catholic University of America. From 1948–1977, Margaret Mealey led the organization as Executive Director. In January 1963, at the invitation of Pres. John F. Kennedy, NCCW representatives met with interdenominational leaders to examine the role of churches and synagogues in eliminating racial discrimination from their own institutions and communities. The NCCW responded by conducting leadership institutes throughout the U.S. to address the race problem. Since 1982, NCCW's respite program has trained over 1,300 volunteers in 15 states to act as temporary surrogate caregivers for people who are caring for elderly or disabled relatives in their homes. There are programs that assist at-risk women and children, as well as women in prison, and children in foster care. The NCCW's interreligious endeavors include working with Jewish women on environmental concerns in several states. Initiatives have included resolutions to ban human embryo stem cell research, to install internet filtering devices in schools, to reject a nuclear missile defense program, and to increase public awareness of the plight of the world's refugees.

As a federation of existing organizations, the NCCW is designed to unite Catholic women's organizations and individual Catholic women throughout the United States; provide a medium for Catholic women to speak and act upon matters of mutual interest; support social action efforts and train Catholic women to become leaders in many areas of life; represent U. S. Catholic women in national and international organizations and programs; collaborate with other organizations and agencies on issues of common concern; and assist Catholic women to act upon current issues in the Church and society.

The NCCW is a service agency. Its programs are implemented through six commissions: Church, Family Concerns, Community Concerns, International Concerns, Legislation, and Organization. These programs reach national audiences as well as those attached to dioceses and deaneries, parishes and local groups. Special cooperation is afforded the CONFRATERNITY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, CATHOLIC CHARITIES, Catholic Relief Services, National Catholic Rural Life Conference.

The NCCW represents U.S. Catholic women at national and international meetings of government and non-government agencies concerned with the welfare of women or the moral and religious welfare of humanity. The NCCW holds membership in World Union of Catholic Women's Organizations (WUCWO) and Women in Community Services (WICS). It is a member of the United States Catholic Conference. Its publications vary, but since 1975, NCCW has published the bi-monthly magazine Catholic Woman. The NCCW is required by its constitution to meet in convention biennially to conduct its business and elect its governing board. In alternate years, regional leadership training institutes are held in strategic areas to give women from all 50 states an opportunity to attend.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A.

Established in 1950 and headquartered in New York City, the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. (NCCC-USA) is a federation of 36 mainline Protestant, Anglican, and Eastern Orthodox churches. Its preamble reads, "The NCCC-USA is a cooperative agency of Christian communions seeking to fulfill the mission to which God calls them. The member communions, responding to the Gospel revealed in the Scriptures, confess Jesus, the Incarnate Son of God, as Saviour and Lord. Relying on the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, the Council works to bring churches into a life-giving fellowship, an independent witness, study and action to the glory of God and in service to all creation."

The NCCC-USA was formed by uniting into one body 12 interdenominational agencies that had hitherto been carrying on cooperative programs among the churches: the Federal Council of Churches (1908), the Foreign Missions Conference of North America (1803 and 1911); the Home Missions Council of North America (1908); the International Council of Religious Education (1922), actually an outgrowth of a national Sunday School Convention (1832); the Missionary Education Movement of the U.S. and Canada (1902); the National Protestant Council on Higher Education (1911); the United Council of Church Women (1940); the United Stewardship Council (1920); Church World Service (1946); Interseminary Committee (1880); the Protestant Film Commission (1947); and the Protestant Radio Commission (1947).

Historical Development. The American counterpart of the world ECUMENICAL movement had two phases: the formation of new churches through organic merger and the cooperative federation of many denominations for the sake of greater efficiency. Since 1900 the principal denominational cooperatives have been the Federal Council of Churches, organized in 1908, and the National Council of Churches, which succeeded the Federal Council in 1950. Among the contributing factors that helped to shape the National Council was the growing interest in social studies, which showed that American denominationalism was often less doctrinal than cultural and ethnic. Its divisiveness, therefore, could be resolved at least partially by active collaboration in the externals of church life without infringing on the creedal autonomy of the different churches.

When the Federal Council was formed in 1908, its 28 member churches included BAPTISTS, METHODISTS, and PRESBYTERIANS, but the number was only a fraction of the total Protestant population. Its basis of union was modeled on the principles of American democracy. According to its constitution, the Federal Council was to express the fellowship and catholic unity of the Protestant denominations, with a view to bringing them into united service for Christ and the world. Although the largest, the Federal Council was only one of several like agencies that sought to bridge the denominational differences in American Protestantism. They had all been founded to make their work more effective, but this was not enough. As the agencies evolved their programs, they found they had overlapping responsibilities in various areas. Closer cooperative action was needed. Further study and negotiation were finally terminated in 1941 at an historic Atlantic City, N.J., conference that recommended "creation of a single cooperative agency to succeed all of the existing national councils." This met with enthusiastic acceptance, and after nine years of planning, the National Council of Churches was established in Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 28 to Dec. 1, 1950. Delegates of 29 Protestant and Orthodox bodies joined forces to express their common faith and witness of cooperation with one another.

The preamble of the constitution they adopted stated, "In the providence of God, the time has come when it seems fitting more fully to manifest oneness in Jesus Christ as Divine Lord and Savior, by the creation of an inclusive cooperative agency of the Christian Churches in the United States of America."

Eleven purposes were specified in the 1950 constitution, of which the most important is to continue and extend the functions of the original merging societies, along with the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT and the United Student Christian Council that joined after 1950. Each of the other ten aims was directed to the more general scope of the Christian religion:

1. To manifest more fully the oneness of the Church of Christ according to the Scriptures and to further the efforts of the member churches in proclaiming the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the end that all men may believe in Him
2. To encourage the study and use of the Bible
3. To carry on programs for and with the churches by which the life of the Church may be renewed and the mission of the Church may be fulfilled
4. To foster and encourage cooperation, fellowship, and mutual counsel among the churches for the purposes set forth in this Constitution
5. To assist the churches in self-examination of their life and witness in accordance with their understanding of the will of God and of the Lordship of Jesus Christ as Divine Head of the Church
6. To further works of Christian love and service throughout the nation and the world

7. To study and to speak and act on conditions and issues in the nation and the world which involve moral, ethical, and spiritual principles inherent in the Christian Gospel

8. To encourage cooperation among local churches and to further the development of councils and other organizations in agreement with the Preamble of this Constitution, and to maintain cooperative relationships with such bodies

9. To establish and maintain consultative and cooperative relationships with the World Council of Churches; other international, regional, and national ecumenical organizations; and agencies related to the churches in the United States

10. To establish specific objectives and to carry forward programs and activities for achieving the purposes herein stated

One passage in the certificate of incorporation reveals the Council's concern not to infringe on the freedom of its constituency. "It shall have no authority or administrative control," the document reads, "over the communions or churches which become its members or its affiliated or co-operating bodies. It shall have no authority to prescribe a common creed, or form of church government, or form of worship, or to limit the autonomy of such communions or churches."

At the beginning of the 21st century, the NCCC-USA comprises 36 member churches from the Protestant, Anglican, and Orthodox traditions:

- African Methodist Episcopal Church
- African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church
- Alliance of Baptists
- American Baptist Churches in the USA
- The Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese of North America
- Diocese of the Armenian Church of America
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)
- Christian Methodist Episcopal Church
- Church of the Brethren
- The Coptic Orthodox Church in North America
- The Episcopal Church
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
- Friends United Meeting
- Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America
- Hungarian Reformed Church in America
- International Council of Community Churches
- Korean Presbyterian Church in America
- Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church
- Mar Thoma Church
- Moravian Church in America Northern Province and Southern Province
- National Baptist Convention of America
- National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., Inc.
- National Missionary Baptist Convention of America

- Orthodox Church in America
- Patriarchal Parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church in the USA
- Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends
- Polish National Catholic Church of America
- Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)
- Progressive National Baptist Convention, Inc.
- Reformed Church in America
- Serbian Orthodox Church in the U.S.A. and Canada
- The Swedenborgian Church
- Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch
- Ukrainian Orthodox Church of America
- United Church of Christ
- The United Methodist Church

The NCCC-USA is actively involved in the scholarly research of the Bible. It sponsored the Revised Standard Version and its successor, the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible. Through the Church World Service (CWS), it carries out relief work in more than 80 countries. Its Washington, D.C. office deals with public policy issues, testifying on the moral, ethical, and other theological implications of proposed legislative enactments and other policy decisions. The NCCC-USA is also actively involved in many ecumenical and interreligious organizations at the local, national and international levels.

Since Vatican Council II there has been a steadily increasing cooperation between the NCCC-USA and the Roman Catholic Church. A Joint Working Committee, made up of designated representatives of the NCCC-USA and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, meets at regular intervals for exchange of information as to plans and projects and for the furthering of mutual understanding. There are Roman Catholic participants in several of the Council's program units, including full membership in the Commission on Faith and Order.

NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR CONTINUING EDUCATION OF ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY (NOCERCC)

A network of diocesan and religious directors of presbyteral continuing education/formation that attempts to educate and motivate clergy for more effective ministry in the Church. It frequently serves as a consultant to the Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. In 2001, there were 257 dioceses, one Ukrainian diocese, and 62 religious congregations and provinces as full members. Full membership is limited to dioceses and religious provinces; affiliate membership comprises universities and agencies offering resources in continuing education.

NOCERCC was founded in 1973 at a meeting of directors of continuing education of priests convened by the National Federation of Priests' Councils. During this meeting at the university of Notre Dame, a Board of Directors was named with representation from each of the twelve (now thirteen) episcopal regions, and the first president was elected. The first representative for men religious was elected to the Board in 1974. There are now two places on the board for representatives from religious congregations. An advisory council is comprised of lay people and clergy. In October 1979, NOCERCC established its national office in Chicago where it remains to this day.

NOCERCC promotes continuing education of priests through current research, resources, and training for continuing education directors of dioceses and religious communities and to committees of the USCCB; encourages supradiocesan and regional cooperation of directors of continuing education; acts as liaison with ecumenical groups; and sponsors an annual convention. NOCERCC has funded research projects and developed programs in: priestly spirituality, preaching, policies on alcoholism, social justice, management and leadership styles, shared ministry, sexuality, seminary training, and models of parish planning. NOCERCC works closely with the Catholic Coalition on Preaching. It also publishes a bimonthly newsletter, News Notes.

NATIONAL SHRINE OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

The Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception is the largest Catholic church in the United States and among the largest churches in the world. Located in Washington, D.C., adjacent to the campus of The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, it honors the Blessed Virgin Mary who, under the title of the Immaculate Conception, was named patroness of the United States by the bishops at the Sixth Provincial Council of Baltimore (1846). Pope John Paul II bestowed on it the honorific distinction of minor basilica.

Bishop Thomas SHAHAN, fourth rector of The Catholic University, conceived the idea of a national shrine, and in 1914 with the approval of Pope Pius X work went forward. The architects under the direction of Charles Maginnis (1867–1955) sought to create a structure that was distinctively American. They settled on a design that was contemporary and original but in the spirit of Byzantine and Romanesque architecture. Eugene F. Kennedy Jr. designed the superstructure.

James Cardinal Gibbons laid the cornerstone on Sept. 23, 1920, and by 1931 the crypt church and some of the crypt areas had been completed. After a period of inactivity, building was resumed at the urging of the newly appointed archbishop of Washington, Patrick O'Boyle, and Bishop John Noll of Fort Wayne. In the years 1954 to 1959 the exterior of the upper church was built, and 10 of the 11 planned chapels added. It was dedicated by Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York, Nov. 20, 1959, while work on the interior continued.

The edifice is in the form of a Latin cross, 459 feet long, 240 feet wide at the transepts. The height is 120 feet to the peak of the roof, 237 feet to the top of the dome, and 329 feet to the top of the bell tower. The seating capacity is 3,500; total capacity is 6,000. It was built without structural steel, entirely of masonry. The Knights Tower (bell tower) adds a strong vertical accent to the overall composition of the shrine. On the tiled dome, huge gold symbols of Our Lady appear against a blue background. The sculpture of the east wall of the exterior illustrates the theme of faith; that of the west wall, charity. The north wall features contemplatives, and the art of the facade centers around Christ and Our Lady. Notable among the 137 separate pieces of sculpture on the exterior are two figures by Ivan Městrovic.

The interior walls of the main (upper) church are covered with Botticino and Travertine marble decorated with bas-reliefs. The entire south wall above the entrance is covered by a large mosaic depicting the "Universal Call to Holiness." On each side of the upper church there is a long row of high Roman arches leading to the sanctuary. A 3,500 square-foot mosaic of Christ in Majesty by John de Rosen adorns the north apse (interior of the cupola/dome), and two smaller domes above the sanctuary have mosaics depicting the Lamb of God and the descent of the Holy Spirit. The flanking east and west apses have images honoring Mary and Joseph, and below are altars dedicated to the 15 mysteries of the rosary decorated with marble and brilliant mosaics. The 176 stained-glass windows include three rosette windows.

The crypt church is a low, vaulted room with massive arches focusing attention upon the main altar, an isolated block of golden Algerian onyx. The crypt's marbles, golden mosaics, and ceramic tiles, rich in doctrinal and historical meaning, emphasize Marian themes. More than 30 devotional and liturgical areas as well as a gift shop, bookstore, and cafeteria are located on the crypt level. The National Shrine is under the direction of a Board of Trustees appointed by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

NATIVISM, AMERICAN

Described by its historian (J. Higham, 4) as "intense opposition to an internal minority on the ground of its foreign (i.e. "un-American") connections." Major nativistic traditions in the United States include anti-Catholicism, antiradicalism, and the cult of Anglo-Saxon superiority; its major historical contribution has been the restriction of immigration.

Historical Beginnings. The ideological elements in U.S. nativism, which account in part for its anti-Catholic tradition, include the Protestant origins of 12 of the colonies; Protestant hostility to early Catholic rulers in Maryland; and the secularist ideology animating revolutionary leaders, most of whom regarded Catholicism as outmoded European obscurantism. Antiradicalism was stimulated by conservative horror at European upheavals, especially the French Revolutions of 1789 and 1870 and the Russian Revolution of 1917, and the resultant desire to preserve the United States from similar disturbances. Belief in Anglo-Saxon superiority was heightened by fear of loss of power through the growth of immigrant political strength.

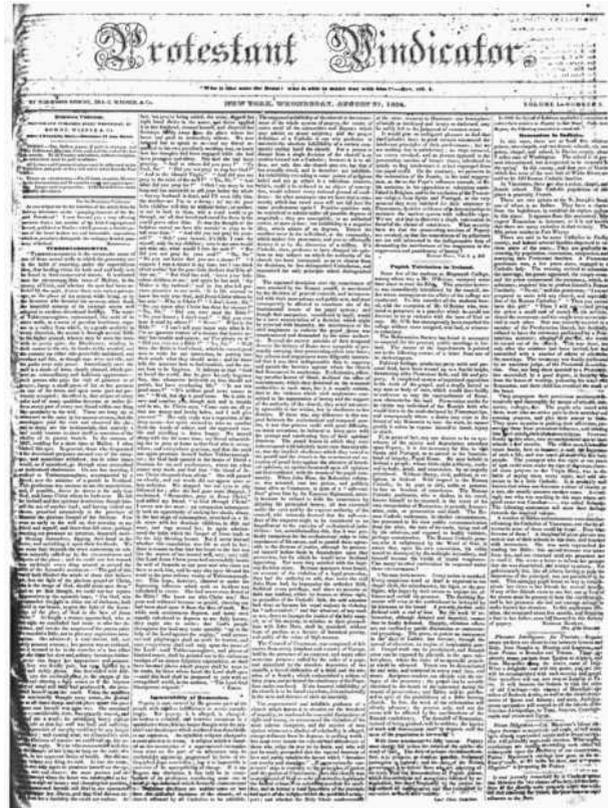

The economic and social aspects of nativism include ethnic rivalries; resentment of immigrant competition for labor rewards; anxiety of older immigrants to increase their standing as Americans by discrimination against newer groups; business fear of unionization, countered by business benefits from immigrant labor; and political expediency, directly through exploitation of popular causes or through readiness to employ any weapon for the destruction of dangerous antagonists, and indirectly, by fabricating nativist issues to divert attention from real and disruptive questions (as the Know-Nothing uproar was used to distract the public from the slavery controversy; see KNOW-NOTHINGISM).

Sectionally, nativism assumed different forms. Easterners in a comparatively rigid social structure both opposed the rise of alien elements and feared immigrant conquest of the cities. The prewar South feared European subversion of American institutions, notably slavery, by English abolitionists and by Catholics who might be expected to obey the renewed papal condemnation of slavery by Gregory XVI. J. L. Chapman's Americanism versus Romanism (1856) is typical of the latter nativist school. The immigrant was welcomed in the West and post-Civil War South, particularly where communities were rapidly expanding or not fully formed, but as the frontier situation disappeared, competition bred hostility. Frustrated agrarian crusaders tended to seek a simple cause for their failure and found in Catholic, Jew, or immigrant a convenient scapegoat as their fears focused on an alien, depraved Europe and the seemingly foreign-dominated East [see, e.g., C. Vann Woodward, Tom Watson (1938)]. Orientals offering cheap labor inspired Pacific coast nativist riots, leading to a 10-year Chinese exclusion act (1882, reenacted 1894, made permanent 1904), the effective commencement of immigration exclusion.

Major Periods of Prevalence. Increasing tensions with revolutionary France, including the expectation of war, led to the imposition of security measures by the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. These included the Naturalization Act, extending the prenaturalization period from five to 14 years (the old system was restored in 1802); the Alien Act, authorizing the president to expel aliens merely on suspicion of treasonable inclinations or belief in their being a threat to the public safety (this expired in 1802); and the Alien Enemies Act, empowering the president in wartime to imprison or deport enemy subjects. Aimed at Pres. John Adams's Francophile Jeffersonian critics, many of whom were of alien origin, the acts endangered Irish exiles in particular, since their forcible return to British dominions could result in their destruction for United Irishmen affiliations. Although the main struggle and prosecutions took place under the Sedition Act, the Federalist regime remained strongly hostile to Irish radicals, and its minister to London, Rufus King, sought to prevent their coming to the United States. The identification of John Adams with restrictionist measures was the more tragic in view of his previous history of friendship for Irish patriotic aspirations (see his Novanglus), but the violent, incendiary tones of the journalists of the day, coupled with his fear of a Paris-style uprising, led him to become one of the champions of alien repression.

1830 to 1860. The swift economic and territorial expansion of the United States brought with it a certain rootlessness and the craving for simple moral solutions. The intellectual simplicity of the religious revivalism that swayed Jacksonian America made for a firmness of moral standard, but it also carried the seeds of intolerance toward faiths alien to itself. The same spirit looked for clear-cut issues in the problems of the day and led to a rapid growth of American conspiracy consciousness that continued for more than a century. The secrecy of Masonic proceedings and of the Catholic confessional became prime targets for the conspiracy seeker, and the anti-Catholicism of the revivalist preachers exacerbated the tendency to see in the Church an anti-American menace. Thus the mob burning of the Ursuline Convent at Charlestown, Mass., on Aug. 11, 1834, was the sequel to three violently anti-Catholic sermons delivered in Boston the previous day by the Presbyterian clergyman Lyman BEECHER.

Anti-Masonry first emerged following the unaccountable disappearance of William Morgan (September 1826), a renegade Mason who proposed to publish the secrets of the order. Anti-Masonry forces organized a political party in New York State (1830) and contested the next presidential election under the banner of William Wirt, who carried only Vermont. Ambitious politicians (W. H. Seward, Thurlow Weed, Thaddeus Stevens) used the party in their own interest and abruptly deserted it when voters lost interest in the issue. After 1836 the party disappeared. The European origins of Masonry were among the aspects of the order under attack, but it was chiefly its role as precursor of nativistic parties that won anti-Masonry its significance in U.S. history.

Even movements of purely American origin, such as Mormonism, suffered persecution at the hands of their neighbors for divergence from the American religious norm and for economic discrimination against "Gentiles" during these years, but the most bitter hostility was reserved for Catholicism. The 1830s saw the emergence of a stream of anti-Catholic propaganda in magazines, newspapers, pamphlets, and books. These included pleas for curbing Catholic immigration, opposition to Catholic schools and officeholders [e.g., “Brutus” (Samuel F. B. Morse), “Foreign Conspiracy against the Liberties of the United States” (1834)], and organs avowedly seeking the conversion of Catholics, of which the American Protestant Vindicator (1834–42), edited by Rev. W. C. Brownlee proclaimed itself the champion. Brownlee and his followers maintained they could save the “wretchedly deluded votaries” of Catholicism only by a zealous exposure of the alleged iniquities of that religion. Such exposés wasted little space on purely doctrinal controversy, but were devoted to revelations of plots hatched in Austria and elsewhere for the enslavement or mass murder of American Protestants by immigrant Catholic hordes, agitation against Catholic schools then becoming popular among many non-Catholics, and allegations respecting the sexual morals of nuns and clerics.

Some anti-Catholic crusaders sought to the best of their ability to keep such charges as they made within the realm of the verifiable, but in popularity and number they were far outstripped by the myth-makers. A craving for pornography without attendant guilt feelings was satisfied by a perusal of many anti-Catholic tracts that in their efforts to attract an audience were an easy prey to the temptation for bawdy improvisation on the themes of convent and confessional, as exploited by priests for purposes of sexual outlet. The most celebrated of these publications, the Awful Disclosures of the Hotel Dieu Nunnery of Montreal (1836) and its sequel, both allegedly the work of an ex-inmate, Maria Monk, branded the institution in question as a nest of debauchery, infanticide, murder, and rape, all described in detail and profusely illustrated. Actually, Maria Monk was an impostor of apparently deranged mind, whose persuasively written work was probably the offspring of overzealous Protestant ministers into whose hands she fell. Her charges were extensively examined and refuted by public-spirited Protestant writers, notably Col. William L. Stone, no friend to Catholicism. But the book, even after the lapse of Maria Monk into drunkenness, prostitution, and theft (she died in prison in 1849), was reprinted many times for dissemination in anti-Catholic crusades.

Clashes between Protestant and Catholic mobs fanned the flames, as did the American renewal of Orange-Catholic hostility originating in Ireland. Catholic protests against reading the King James Bible in public school, and demands for public aid to parochial schools also added fuel to the controversy. Chief areas of anti-Catholic sentiment in this phase were New York City and Philadelphia, Pa., where in the summer of 1844, 20 died and 100 were injured in Orange-Catholic riots. The Irish Great Famine (1845–52) sent 1,250,000 starving Irish immigrants to the United States between 1845 and 1855. Since their destitution prevented migration to the West, they choked the Eastern cities, radically and suddenly altering them. Native American opinion, while philanthropically disposed to assist the impoverished in Ireland, was dismayed at the hitherto unparalleled experience of a pauper immigration on such a scale, and as the political bosses sought to make capital from the new arrivals, anger mounted. The Native American party (founded 1845) and its successor (the Know-Nothing, or American, party of the 1850s) called for drastic changes in naturalization laws. Know-Nothingism reached its greatest strength in 1855, but it split on the slavery issue, with the Southern forces left in control. Former President Millard Fillmore, the party candidate in 1856, carried Maryland alone, after which the party declined. The Civil War, in which many immigrants distinguished themselves, destroyed nativism for a time; war hysteria was turned against “Copperheads.”

The nativistic character of Know-Nothingism was revealingly illustrated by the fact that the Know-Nothings specifically exempted Louisiana Catholic Creoles (some of whom joined the party) from charges of participation in the Catholic conspiracy against the United States. Because the Creoles, unlike Maryland Catholics, had maintained a separate identity in the face of Catholic immigration, their “American-ness”—of which, on the slavery issue, they gave proof—was therefore unquestioned. On the other hand, descendants of English or Irish colonial settlers attracted suspicion because they permitted themselves to be the summit of a Catholic social ladder of which the pauper Irish immigrants were the base.

1886 to 1896. Increased immigration, intensification of the labor-capital struggle, and concern over the strength of Catholic political bosses contributed to a renewal of nativism in the late 1880s. Antiradicalism and anti-Catholicism joined in protest against Cardinal James Gibbons’s championship of the KNIGHTS OF LABOR, which, led by the Catholic Terence V. Powderly, reached its zenith in membership in 1886. The Haymarket bomb-throwing in Chicago, Ill. (May 1, 1886), unleashed a tide of antilabor sentiment not restricted to the anarchists associated with the incident. Foreign-born leadership in labor and socialist and anarchist movements became the focus of protest, while the AMERICAN PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (APA) revived the anti-Catholic issue, utilizing the old methods of propaganda and issues of attack as well as enmity to the Knights of Labor. The APA declined after 1896. Meanwhile, labor unions themselves were swinging toward immigration restriction in their opposition to the challenge of foreign labor. In 1897 the American Federation of Labor (AFL) officially endorsed the demand for a literacy test, thereby joining hands with Boston intellectuals banded together in the Immigration Restriction League, whose most vociferous spokesperson in Congress was Sen. Henry Cabot Lodge. Pres. Grover Cleveland's veto of a bill embodying the literacy provision (February 1897) frustrated their efforts, and nativism suffered a setback following the return of prosperity and the redirection of nationalism by the Spanish-American War and its attendant climate of expansionism.

1905 to 1930. Nativism in the late 19th and early 20th century was marked by a more sophisticated intellectual racism than the earlier crude glorification of the Anglo-Saxon. Social Darwinism was adapted to assign to the immigrant the role of unfittest in his native country; eugenics was employed to assail "degenerate breeding-stocks"; and anthropology, classifying the races under Nordic (fair longhead), Alpine (roundhead), etc., rather than national categories, was pressed into service as part of the nativist's intellectual equipment. Glorification of the Nordic race and lamentation for the corruption introduced by immigrants of "inferior" racial origin were the themes of Madison Grant's The Passing of the Great Race (1916) that, largely ignored at first publication, became widely influential after the war. Such ideas, filtered through to the political world, led to a new departure in nativist attitudes as they were renewed; henceforth hostility was turned chiefly against the Mediterranean peoples, who had been immigrating in substantially increasing numbers in recent years. Ironically, those most bitterly assailed as factors liable to cause degeneration of the American people included Southeast European Jews, Southern Italians, and Greeks, whose ancestors had laid the foundations of western Judeo-Christian civilization.

Anti-Catholicism was kept alive, notably in the South, by such journals as Tom Watson's Magazine and the Menace (whose circulation reached a peak of 1,500,000 in 1915). Aggressive nationalism mounted during the war years against the hitherto largely unassailed German-Americans, and later against pacifists, socialists, anarchists, and radicals of all kinds. In the high tide of retreat from internationalism after the war, the great red scare of 1919 [see Robert K. Murray, Red Scare (1955)] included both a widespread deportation of Soviet sympathizers by Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer and violent physical assaults on left-wing groups, notably the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), by such nativist elements as the American Legion. In 1920, writes Higham (p. 263), "while the redemption of the alien ebbed . . . , the old drive for the rejection of the immigrant passed all previous bounds."

Anti-Semitism, supplanting anti-Catholicism in the nativist response to the radical challenge, found expression in the widely disseminated and fraudulent "Protocols of the Elders of Zion," which laid the Bolshevik successes in Russia at the door of the Jews. The Dearborn Independent (1919-27) was perhaps the spearhead of the anti-Jewish attack. The revived KU KLUX KLAN, however, was indiscriminating in its nativism; African Americans, Jews, Catholics, and the foreign-born of all kinds came literally under its lash. The new motion picture industry gave assistance to the Klan by a production glorifying its predecessor of Reconstruction days based on Thomas Dixon's The Clansman (1905) and entitled Birth of a Nation (released 1915). The anti-Catholic aspect of the Klan first came to prominence in 1920 and flourished thereafter. Its power flowed far beyond the South to the Middle West and Far West, and membership at its apogee reached five million (Indiana and Oregon being areas of outstanding strength). Scandals tore it asunder after 1925; in its heyday the outrages charged against it, including murder, had come to an impressive figure.

This national fever of xenophobia received congressional acknowledgment in the revival of immigration restriction. The AFL, its nativism aggravated by reaction to the IWW challenge, continued to agitate in this cause. Congressmen who enjoyed labor support tried to catch the immigrant vote as well, but rural nativist forces, led by the anti-IWW, anti-Japanese Congressman Albert Johnson of Washington, demanded suspension of immigration. A compromise measure, restricting immigrants to three percent of each nationality in the population according to the 1910 census, became law (May 19, 1921). Thus was born the quota system, a feature of all subsequent restrictionist legislation. The literacy test had been embodied in legislation passed over Pres. Woodrow Wilson's veto in 1917.

The quota was altered to two percent of the 1890 census for each nationality group, and the maximum quota halved from 357,000 (1924); the maximum quota was further reduced to 150,000 a year with apportionment by nationality on the basis of the national population situation in 1920 (a provision of the 1924 law, but not actually effected until 1929). Satiated by this revolutionary alteration in U.S. immigration policy, nativism (or 100 percent Americanism, as it called itself) waned in this postwar phase. The nomination of Gov. Alfred E. Smith of New York by the Democrats for the 1928 presidential election rekindled some of the flames, but without significant effect; the administration candidate, Herbert Hoover, was invincible regardless of his opponent. Smith's nomination was in itself testimony to nativism's losses.

After 1930. Sporadic outbreaks of nativism accompanied the Depression years, notably as an American accompaniment to the rise of European Fascism. The anti-Semitic campaigns of Rev. Charles E. COUGHLIN, whose radio addresses led his superiors to silence him, had their Protestant equivalent in the diatribes of Rev. Gerald L. K. Smith, former follower of Louisiana demagogue Huey Long. An undercurrent of racism was kept alive by the agitators in the South, notably Sen. Theodore G. Bilbo of Mississippi. Publisher William Randolph Hearst, Elizabeth Dilling, and others sought to foment a second red scare in 1934–35, and the sensitive area of education once more became the focus of witch-hunts against alleged seduction of the innocent [see Walter Metzger, Academic Freedom in the Age of the University (1955)]. Meanwhile, the American Civil Liberties Union recorded the greatest “variety and number of serious violations of civil liberties” since the war. Seven state legislatures enacted teachers’ oath statutes, but this was a measure of the failure to fulfill nativist promise, as far more had been debated. The crusade, fascist in character, identifying mild liberals with Communists, proved immediately ugly but ultimately it was somewhat harmless.

World War II destroyed anti-Semitism as a political force in American life, but brought with it much injustice to Japanese Americans, interned for the duration. In a Supreme Court decision [Korematsu v. U.S. (1944)] Japanese exclusion from the West Coast was upheld. The burden of proof of loyalty was thrust upon the unfortunate Japanese Americans, although the court, in Ex parte Endo (1944), denied that a person of proved loyalty could be detained. Many innocent Americans of Japanese extraction suffered socially, as well as from the danger of internment. The House Committee on Un-American Activities, an instrument of nativism by definition, was given permanent status in 1945.

With the advent of the Cold War, nativism obtained a fresh lease on life. The Communist ideology of America’s chief antagonist, the U.S.S.R., offered easy rewards to the superpatriot who chose to confine himself to fighting the Cold War at home. The third red scare shook America to its foundations and culminated in the McCarthy hearings. Sen. Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin attracted perhaps the greatest body of support and opprobrium for his exploitation of the disloyalty issue; the better entrenched Sen. Patrick McCarran of Nevada employed the scare for the preparation of nativist legislation that would outlast it. The Internal Security (McCarran) Act of 1951 forced Communists and Communist-front bodies to register as agents of a foreign power, dedicated to overthrow the U.S. government by violence, thus rendering them liable to imprisonment under the Alien Registration (Smith) Act of 1940. The Smith and McCarran Acts tightened control on aliens, the latter measure excluding from the United States any member or foreign member of a totalitarian organization (in practice this has not been employed against Fascists). The McCarran-Walter Act (1952) codified existing immigration laws, increasing their rigidity; screening measures were introduced to weed out subversives. Both McCarran bills became law over presidential veto.

The destruction of many innocent reputations through congressional investigation and the demoralization of the diplomatic and military arms of government through the same process ultimately brought about McCarthy’s overthrow (1954). The ensuing revulsion and McCarran’s death (1953) ended the most violent phase of latter-day nativism. Many political and social legacies remained, however, and small Fascist organizations (e.g., the John Birch Society) continued to manifest extreme nativism. Anti-Catholic propaganda declined during the Cold War, except among a small, though much publicized, minority. The most celebrated of these was Paul Blanshard, who sought to identify the Kremlin with the Vatican in the public mind. Blanshard’s liberal origins, combined with the antilibertarian aspects of Catholicism cited by him, placed an attractive gloss on what was merely a reassertion of the old charge that Catholicism was un-American; his works fostered a suspicion of Catholics among liberals of shallow mind. Blanshard avoided the usual charges of clerical immorality and Catholic conspiracy for the mass murder of Protestants; this concession to modern standards of objectivity was not imitated by the anti-Catholicism evoked by the Democratic nomination for the presidency of another Catholic, John F. Kennedy. Although nativism may have accounted for some votes against Kennedy, his election and subsequent assassination probably destroyed anti-Catholicism as a force in American life. By the national character of his appeal, in life and after death, Kennedy offered proof of what nativists had so long denied, namely, that a descendant of pauper, “undesirable” immigrants could prove himself a representative and patriotic American.

Effects on the United States. The nativism written on the statute books since 1921 did much to isolate the United States from currents of world opinion and the realities of foreign situations, a particularly perilous contribution in terms of the country’s international responsibilities. It constituted a denial of the freedom and receptivity of American society, two traits whereby the United States came to enjoy her role as a leader in the spread of democracy and liberty. It fostered a negative nationalism, founded on hatred, that continued to corrode a true patriotism; it became an ally of the cause of discrimination against, and segregation of, African American citizens. By making conformity a virtue, nativism immeasurably eroded the force of one of the traditions that had built America—a constant readiness to respond to the challenge of the unknown.

Effects on Catholicism in the United States. Although few Catholics were driven from their faith by nativist outbreaks, a heavily nativist climate probably had more corrosive effects, notably in the South and parts of the West where Catholics lacked numbers to give one another moral reassurance. The Catholic response to nativist attack at times lacked wisdom, but seldom courage. It also had less pleasant features. Thus Catholics failed to unite with other minority groups under attack, e.g., African Americans and Jews, but rather tended, especially in the 20th century, to welcome the turning aside of nativist wrath in other directions. Intergroup hostility among immigrants themselves abetted this tendency. Ultimately, it is to be feared that nativism fostered in American Catholicism an intense zeal to cleanse itself of the un-American stigma at all costs. During the slavery crisis, Catholics, regardless of Gregory XVI's teachings, temporized on the slavery issue and strongly denounced the un-Americanism of the abolitionists. A century later, Catholics had so readily identified themselves with the prevailing impulse to conform to the American attitude, that, for instance, "the American Church," in Richard Hofstadter's phrase, "absorbed little of the impressive scholarship of German Catholicism or the questioning intellectualism of the French Church" [Anti-Intellectualism in American Life (1963), 138]. Moreover, the Protestant nativist, who clamored for further restriction of immigration and saw in every liberal academic a Communist incendiary, found allies among the Catholics, who had formerly been targets for his most bitter bigotry. The tragedy lies in the fact that nativism, taken at its word, was confounded with truly American patriotism even by its former victims.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST

The date of the birth of JESUS CHRIST can be calculated only approximately; the most probable date seems to be about the year 7 or 6 B.C. It is well known that the calculations of DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS upon which the system of determining the year of Christ's birth is based are in error. Matthew 2.1 says that the birth of Christ took place in the days of King HEROD (THE GREAT). It is known from JOSEPHUS that Herod died in the spring of the year 4 B.C. In the 15th year of Tiberius, Jesus was about 30 years old (Lk 3.23); this would be the year A.D. 28–29.

One may date Christ's birth more precisely from the information given by Lk 2.2, that the birth took place at the time of the census under Cyrenus. Cyrenus was Publius Sulpicius Quirinius, who was governor of the province of Syria. During his administration a census took place in Judea previous to the incorporation of that kingdom into the province of Syria upon the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6. This census took place while Caesar Augustus was ruling the Roman Empire (30 B.C.–A.D. 14). The relationship of the census under Quirinius to the imperial census is a matter of perplexity for historians. Perhaps Quirinius inaugurated the census under a special commission in 6 or 7 B.C. after his first term as governor and completed it by a better known census during his second term, A.D. 6 to 12. No further precision of the date can be made, since the date of December 25 does not correspond to Christ's birth, but to the feast of the Natalis Solis Invicti, the Roman sun festival at the solstice.

According to Matthew and Luke, Jesus Christ was born in Bethlehem, a village in Judea about six miles south of Jerusalem, slightly to the west. The place is mentioned in the Gospel account to show Christ's Davidic ancestry, since Bethlehem is the city of David. The fact of the birth at Bethlehem is not stated anywhere else in the New Testament; the account in Jn 7.40–42 implies the ignorance of the people regarding the birth of Christ in Bethlehem. There was no apologetic reason for the Gospel writers to invent the Bethlehem birthplace merely to confirm Christ's Davidic origin, since the popular belief at the time did not suppose that the Messiah would come from Bethlehem. There is no written evidence in Jewish tradition for the Bethlehem birthplace of the Messiah before the third century A.D. The popular thought in Our Lord's time was that the birthplace of the Messiah was unknown, and that when He came, He would present Himself in such a way that no one would know where He came from. Since it would have served no useful purpose for the early Christians to invent Christ's birth in Bethlehem, one must conclude that He was actually born there. Mi 5.1 is obscure.

NATIVITY OF MARY

Sacred Scripture mentions nothing specifically about Mary's conception and birth. What is known of her nativity derives principally from the Apocrypha—books that are generally unreliable historically, but that sometimes incorporate genuine traditions, some of which have found their way into the Church's liturgy.

In the Apocrypha. The oldest (c. A.D. 150) and basic Apocryphon referring to Mary's nativity is entitled Birth of Mary: Revelation of James [Papyrus Bodmer V] or, more popularly (since Postel, 1552), Protoevangelium of James. Its anonymous and probably Judeo-Christian author, indignant at anti-Marian calumnies of the time, glorified the Virgin MOTHER OF GOD in what amounts to a primitive Mariology. The opening five chapters of the work describe the miraculous, though not necessarily "immaculate," conception and birth of Mary. Joachim and Anne, a wealthy couple elderly and childless, beseech God to remove the humiliation of sterility and grant them a child. Each is assured separately by an angel that their prayers had been heard, and Mary is born after seven [nine] months. Some versions and recensions of the Protoevangelium, understanding the angel's assurance to Joachim in a past tense, suggest a virginal conception in Anne's womb. Later pertinent Apocrypha (Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, probably 8th-9th centuries; Gospel of the Birth of Mary, a shortened form of Pseudo-Matthew; a Syriac-Armenian Infancy Gospel; and some Coptic Lives of the Virgin) all rest on and repeat evidence of the Protoevangelium.

Mary's Birthplace and Davidic Descent. According to Lk 1.26 Mary was living at NAZARETH when she conceived her divine Son. In the absence of further scriptural data, some presume that Nazareth would have been her own birthplace. In much later Apocrypha (e.g., Gospel of the Birth of Mary), Nazareth is given as the home of Joachim and Anne. The Protoevangelium of James supposes that Mary was conceived and born in Jerusalem, a tradition supported by later writers and by remnants of a small oratory (c. A.D. 300) in Jerusalem, above which the fifth-century basilica of St. Anne was built.

It is still disputed whether Mary, like Joseph, was of David's line. Some see the genealogies in Matthew ch. 1 and Luke ch. 3 as referring only to Joseph's forebears, not Mary's. They point out that Elizabeth, Mary's relative, was of Aaronitic descent (Lk 1.5), which might indicate that Mary too was of a priestly family. However, a tradition going as far back as Ignatius of Antioch (Eph.

18.2; 20.2; Rom. 7.3; Smyrn. 1.1) and Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 32; Dial. 43.45, 100, 120), based on New Testament texts that seem to refer to Christ's descent from David according to the flesh [Lk 1. (27), 32, 69; Rom 1.3], testify to Mary's Davidic lineage; cf. also Tertullian De carne Christi 22; Augustine Cons. Evang. 2.2.4; Pseudo-James; and Pseudo-Matthew. More probably, then, Mary's parents were descendants of David, and Mary's Son was the Son of David according to the flesh, not merely legally through the putative fatherhood of Joseph.

NATURAL FAMILY PLANNING

Natural family planning (NFP) is a generalized term that refers to methods of self-monitoring natural biological signs and symptoms of fertility. The purpose of NFP is to identify the days of fertility and infertility during a woman's menstrual cycle. Knowing this information enables a couple to either avoid or achieve a pregnancy. Inherent in the use of NFP is that couples abstain from intercourse during the times of fertility if they wish to avoid pregnancy. Natural family planning has also been referred to as "periodic abstinence," "rhythm," and "fertility awareness."

History. Although many previous scientific studies contributed to the development of natural methods of family planning, it was not until the late 1920s that two physician scientists discovered a key ingredient that led to the formulation of the first reliable method of natural birth regulation. Experiments by Dr. Kyusako Ogino from Japan and Dr. Herman Knaus from Germany provided them with information to estimate the approximate time of ovulation in a woman's menstrual cycle and to determine that once a woman ovulates there will be approximately 14 days until her next menses. From this information (and knowing the approximate life span of the woman's egg and man's sperm), they independently developed formulas for estimating the fertile times in a woman's menstrual cycle. These formulas are called the "calendar method" and later simply "rhythm" as adapted from the title of a popular book written on the method by Leo Latz, M.D. (1946) an American physician.

Reproductive scientists have known since the early part of the twentieth century that a woman's body temperature rises about 2 to 4 degrees after ovulation. However, it was not until the mid-1930s that a Catholic parish priest (Fr. Wilhelm Hillebrand from Germany) first applied this knowledge to the use of natural birth regulation. A number of his parishioners became pregnant after using the rhythm method to avoid pregnancy. Concerned about these pregnancies, Fr. Hillebrand instructed women to take their daily waking temperatures along with the calendar formulas to determine their fertile period. This method of natural birth control was later called the basal body temperature method or "BBT."

As early as the ninth century a number of physicians and scientists speculated that the fertile time of a woman's menstrual cycle occurred around the time a watery cervical-vaginal fluid was secreted. However, it was not until the 1930s and 1940s that scientists were able to correlate this stretchy, watery, slippery mucus with ovulation. A few physicians subsequently applied this knowledge as a means of monitoring fertility along with calendar formulas, changes in body temperature, and cervical changes. These methods collectively have been called the Sympto-Thermal methods, "STM" for short (or in Europe the double check or multiple index method).

In the 1960s, a husband-wife physician team from Australia, Drs. John and Evelyn Billings, discovered that monitoring the sensations and changes in cervical-vaginal fluids throughout the menstrual cycle was a simple and accurate means of determining the fertile and infertile times of the cycle. A large five-country study of the Billings Method or what is now called the Ovulation Method (OM) was conducted in the late 1970s by the World Health Organization. The WHO study confirmed the simplicity, accuracy, and effectiveness of the OM.

During the 1970s a number of variations and standardized forms of the sympto-thermal and cervical mucus (only) methods were developed. Most notable in the United States were the Creighton Model (cervical mucus only) system developed by Thomas Hilgers, M.D. (Hilgers 1995) and colleagues; the Family of the Americas cervical mucus only system developed by Mercedes Wilson (Wilson 1998); and the teaching system of the sympto-thermal method developed by John Kippley (Kippley 1996) (in conjunction with Konald Prem, M.D. at the University of Minnesota).

Since Ogino and Knaus developed the calendar formulas, technological devices have also been available to aid women and couples in monitoring their fertility. Such simple devices as beads, fertility wheels, and thermometers continue to be used as simple tracking systems. Recent scientific discoveries now allow women to track their fertility through computers, Internet programs, and with electronic hormonal fertility monitors. Newer methods of NFP that incorporate this modern technology are now being developed and tested.

Scientific Foundations. Recent reproductive research has confirmed that women have a six-day window of fertility during their menstrual cycle, namely, the day of ovulation and the five previous days. Determining the beginning and end of these six days and the peak of fertility is the goal of modern NFP. A woman's fertility begins when an egg (or ovum) in her ovaries starts to ripen in a small vessel called a follicle. The follicle produces a female hormone called estrogen that stimulates cells along the opening of her cervix to produce mucus. The mucus at first appears sticky, tacky, and cloudy but progresses to a very watery, stretchy, and slippery consistency at peak. Once a woman ovulates and the ovum is released from the follicle, the cells of the follicle change and produce another hormone called progesterone. Progesterone heats up the woman's body and causes the mucus to dry up at the cervix. After ovulation, the egg only lives from 12 to 24 hours. Therefore, once a woman reaches her peak fertility and ovulates, she is at the beginning of the end of her fertile window. The reason that a woman's fertility is about six days is because the sperm from a man can live in good cervical mucus for three to five days. If a couple has intercourse when the egg is ripening and the follicle is stimulating good cervical mucus, then the sperm can survive to fertilize the egg three to five days later.

There are a number of natural biological markers used in modern methods of NFP to help couples determine the beginning and end of their fertile period. The most common biological indicators are (1) changes in the characteristics of cervical mucus, (2) changes in the cervix, (3) changes in the daily waking body temperature, and (4) changes in female reproductive hormones. Some modern methods of NFP also continue to use "rhythm" formulas to determine the beginning and end of fertility.

One or more of the following fertility markers indicates the beginning of the fertile time in a woman's menstrual cycle: a change of sensation at the vulva from dry to sticky, tacky or moist; the presence of cervical mucus; the cervix starts to soften and rise; rising levels of estrogen as detected in the urine; and the length of the shortest of the last 6 cycles minus 20 days.

The peak of fertility (i.e., the estimated time of ovulation) is indicated by one or more of the following biological indicators: the last day of clear, watery, stretchy, slippery mucus and/or lubricative sensation; a rise in the resting body temperature of 2 to 4 degrees; the cervix is soft, open, and high in the vagina; peak levels of luteinizing hormone (LH) detected in the urine; rising levels of progesterone detected in the urine.

The end of fertility is determined by counting three (and sometimes four) days after the above biological markers are recorded. The end of fertility can also be determined by the length of the longest of the last 6 to 12 cycles minus 10 days. A more accurate and scientific determination comes from detecting urinary metabolites of the rising levels of the hormone progesterone, confirming that ovulation has taken place. There are many other biological indicators such as salivary or vaginal electrical resistance, salivary ferning, glucose levels, vaginal-cervical mucus volume, and others that have been and continue to be tested as possible self-monitored signs of fertility.

Most of the above self-detected biological indicators of fertility have been tested to validate their accuracy in detecting ovulation and the peak of fertility. The current gold standard of validating the day of ovulation is through the use of serial ultrasound to detect the growing and collapsed follicle. Based on the correlation with this gold standard, the most accurate self-indicators of ovulation are measures of urinary metabolites of LH, estrogen, and progesterone through the use of electronic fertility monitors and urinary (chemical assay) type test strips. Research also indicates that the peak day in cervical mucus (i.e., the last day of clear, stretchy, slippery mucus and/or lubricative sensation) varies around the day of ovulation plus or minus three days 99% of the time. Hence the instruction to count three days after the peak day as the end of fertility.

There have been numerous studies to determine the effectiveness of the various systems of NFP to avoid pregnancy. When systems of NFP are taught and used correctly, they range in effectiveness to avoid pregnancy (based on 100 women over 12 months of use) from 85% with calendar formulas to close to 99% with double indicator methods. The effectiveness in typical use drops to a range of about 75 to 90% largely due to the lack of compliance in following basic instructions. There have been few comparative studies on the effectiveness of the various systems of NFP.

Church teaching. The morality of this method of avoiding conception must be judged within the total context of the modern couple's marriage vocation, in relation to which the practice of NFP constitutes a means to an end.

Morally indifferent means. Considered in itself, the practice of NFP does not constitute a deviation from right moral order in the use of sex. PIUS XI, in the encyclical CASTI CONNUBII, stated that having intercourse during the infertile times to avoid pregnancy is not an act against nature. This teaching was echoed by PAUL VI in the encyclical HUMANAE VITAE. Marriage does not oblige couples to engage in conjugal relations at any specific time. Neither avoidance of intercourse during the fertile period of a cycle nor restriction of its use to sterile periods violates the integrity of the marital act. Profiting from their knowledge of the normal functioning of the female reproductive system, couples may restrict intercourse to those periods that are considered most favorable for either the avoidance or the promotion of pregnancy. In contrast to contraception, which constitutes a deliberate attempt directly to inhibit or impede the normal progress of the physiological process of reproduction voluntarily initiated by the couple when they engage in marital relations, the practice of NFP fully respects the intrinsic natural structure of the conjugal act and in this regard must be considered a morally indifferent means for regulating family size.

Requisite conditions. Because the practice of NFP involves the deliberate restriction of marital relations to limited periods during the menstrual cycle, the conditions required for its morally licit use are determined by the demands of marriage. First, both partners must freely agree to the practice. Second, both partners must be capable of bearing the possible tension and strain that may result from the use of this practice. If the restriction of marital relations to limited periods seriously threatens the growth of mutual love and harmony between husband and wife, the couple must seek adequate means to modify the situation or cease the practice. Third, couples must have sufficient reason for employing this practice. As PIUS XII pointed out in an address to the Italian Catholic Union of Midwives on October 29, 1951 (Vegliare con sollecitudine), marriage is a state of life that confers certain rights and also imposes the fulfillment of a positive work, namely, to provide for the conservation of the human race. This obligation is serious, though in the case of a given couple special circumstances or conditions of a medical, eugenical, economic, or social nature may render its fulfillment inopportune or unreasonable either for a time or throughout marriage. Hence, although it would be seriously sinful for a childless couple to employ NFP throughout marriage without a serious excusing reason, couples who generously accept their obligation to have children may licitly make use of this practice both for spacing pregnancies and for regulating family size in accord with a reasonable estimate of their parental capacities.

Common objections. The practice of NFP has been subjected to criticism on various grounds. In addition to those who reject the Church's traditional teaching regarding the morally licit means of regulating family size, some object to the practice because they judge that its use implies lack of trust in PROVIDENCE and will lead to a "contraceptive mentality." Yet authentic trust in Providence does not free couples from personal responsibility, but requires that they exercise prudent judgment in fulfilling their procreative mission. Granting that the temptation to selfishness is perennial, couples who are serious enough about their vocation to follow the Church's teaching regarding contraception are not likely to reject the privilege of parenthood.

A further set of objections stems from the belief that NFP creates undue anxiety and seriously inhibits the spontaneous expression of marital love. Like all other methods of family regulation short of absolute continence, the practice of NFP does involve some uncertainty and requires consistent foresight and care, though well-motivated couples apparently find this no insurmountable obstacle. The required restriction of intercourse to limited periods obviously inhibits spontaneity in expressing this form of marital love, yet one must carefully distinguish between spontaneity of sexual expression and spontaneity in expressing love. The former is necessarily curbed by the demands of justice and charity as well as by the normal exigencies of social life; NFP inhibits the latter only if the couple has developed no alternate means of expressing love. Acquiring the disciplined control required by NFP does involve personal sacrifice, but marital relations can retain their significance as authentic expressions of love only if they foster the couple's integral development as Christian partners and parents.

Relationship to the vocation of marriage. Like all authentic vocations, marriage is designed to provide for the Christian's full development and sanctification in the service of Christ. It differs specifically from other vocations in its special mission, which is to provide for the couple's mutual, complementary fulfillment in a procreative union. Although all marriage partners accept an enduring commitment to foster their mutual happiness and perfection in Christ by dedicating themselves to the service of life, individual couples may differ widely in regard to both their parental abilities and the conditions or circumstances under which they must live. Because there exists no necessary relationship between procreative capacity and the ability to raise a family, many couples find it difficult to reconcile their normal expressions of marital love with the demands of the moral law. It is precisely in this context that the practice of NFP assumes primary significance. Provided they generously dedicate themselves to having a family, couples now have available a morally licit, reliable means of spacing pregnancies and regulating family size. The method requires sacrifice and self-mastery, yet these traits characterize all authentic expressions of love and are not beyond the strength of couples who have recourse to prayer and the Sacraments.

Prompted by the writings of Pope JOHN PAUL II, the Church in recent years has frequently articulated its understanding of human sexuality in terms of a “theology of the body.” The conjugal act is an act of total reciprocal self-giving of husband and wife. When a couple uses contraception, they no longer are totally giving of themselves but rather are conditional in their love-making. The contraceptive act is in a sense a living “lie” or falsification of the inner truth of the conjugal act. In the 1982 apostolic exhortation, Familiaris consortio, Pope John Paul II reiterated that the differences between artificial contraception and methods of natural birth regulation were irreconcilable. The teachings in Familiaris consortio are reflected in the Catholic Catechism of the Catholic Church, which says “periodic continence, that is, the methods of birth regulation based on self-observation and the use of infertile periods, is in conformity with the objective criteria of morality. These methods respect the bodies of the spouses, encourage tenderness between them, and favor the education of an authentic freedom” (2370). In the 1995 encyclical EVANGELIUM VITAE, John Paul II encouraged all married couples to learn NFP and called for the promotion of centers of NFP as a means to build a culture of life.

NATURAL LAW

A LAW or rule of action that is implicit in the very nature of things. The term is sometimes used in the plural form to designate laws that regulate the activities of nature in both the organic and the inorganic realm. Properly speaking, however, it is exclusively applied to man and designates a prescriptive rule of conduct naturally received by and measuring human reason which enables human reason rightly to measure human action. For St. THOMAS AQUINAS, “natural law is nothing other than the participation of eternal law in rational creatures” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 91.2); thus Aquinas conceives it as the imprint of God’s providential plan on man’s natural reason. This article is divided into three main sections. The first treats of the historical development of the concept of natural law; the second provides a Thomistic analysis of the concept; and the third discusses the place of the concept in contemporary theology and philosophy. (For specific applications of the concept, see NATURAL LAW AND JURISPRUDENCE; NATURAL LAW IN POLITICAL THOUGHT.)

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Although natural law has always been perceived in its basic content by human beings, its concept has been formalized, elaborated, articulated, and systematized only with the growth and development of philosophy. The historical evolution of this doctrine may be conveniently traced through six periods: (1) the pagan period, corresponding to that of the Greco-Roman world and extending from HERACLITUS to St. Paul; (2) the Catholic and scholastic period, extending from St. Paul to Hugo GROTIUS; (3) the Protestant and post-scholastic period, extending from Grotius and S. von Pufendorf (1632–94) to J. Bentham; (4) the period of decline, corresponding to the rise of positivism and extending from BENTHAM and D. HUME to F. GénY (1861–1959) and R. Stammler (1856–1938); (5) the contemporary period of revival, extending from GénY and Stammler to the mid-1960s; and (6) the debates of the late 20th century.

Greco-Roman Period. There is evidence of the idea of a universal divine law binding on man in Oriental literature, such as that of China, long before the rise of philosophy in the West. But the origin of a natural-law doctrine, with its elaboration as an unbroken, continuous development, is first to be found among the ancient Greek poets and historians. Thus Sophocles (c. 497–406 B.C.), Thucydides (c. 460–400 B.C.), and Xenophon (c. 427–355 B.C.) presented a concept of the natural law that is divine, universal, and known to all.

Greek Philosophers. A development of this early Greek notion appears in the writings of Heraclitus, who held that the natural law is eternal and immutable, the foundation of human laws (Fragments 102, 112–116). Other Greek philosophers, such as PLATO, elucidated this doctrine (Laws 715, 884–910; Rep. 419–445). It was left to Plato's student ARISTOTLE, however, to clarify the distinction between natural law and law that is humanly enacted (Eth. Nic. 1134b 18–1136a 9; Rhet. 1373b 1–18). Such Greek philosophers used observation and experience to discover an order in the universe that they associated with a predictable, regular recurrence of events. Traceable to the activity of animate and inanimate matter, this recurrence is in response to an ordering principle or law that rules the cosmos. But man also is part of the cosmos and hence subject to an ordering law, which in his case is the right or just by nature. Morals and human law, for the Greeks, thus have their foundation in the harmony of nature or the natural law. This law exists independently of human will and has universal validity. It provides objective principles and ideals to which human beings must conform, by their very nature, as part of the cosmos. Functionally, therefore, natural law affords a measure for the wise, the good, the just, the prudent, and the happy man. It provides too a basis for an idealized political and social order. It also makes possible the distinction between the category of divine, universal, and unchangeable law and that of human, politically enacted, and variable law.

Whereas Aristotle does not thematize the theological and metaphysical element the definitory relation to eternal law—so strongly as do either earlier figures such as Heraclitus, later authors such as Cicero, or in the Christian era Boethius, Augustine, or St. Thomas Aquinas, it is nonetheless clear that the naturally just and virtuous is a function of conforming to natural order that is derived from its divine origin, and whose entailments in virtue are analogously “divine.” The ordering of human nature to a hierarchy of perfective ends prior to choice is essential to his teaching; hence his strong emphasis upon the truth that strictly speaking the end is not directly a matter of choice. Man is by nature ordered to happiness as his final end, and that which by nature constitutes this happiness is a function of the teleological order of man to contemplation of God and the virtues appropriate to the active life.

Nonetheless, the idea of natural law at this stage of its evolution tends to subordinate the individual to the Greek city-state. Even for Aristotle, individual man achieves the perfection of his human nature through law only in the good order of the city-state, which is analogous to the cosmic order (Pol. 1252a 1 1253a 38). The doctrine of natural law reached its highest development in the PAGAN world within STOICISM, the philosophical movement founded by Zeno of Citium (c. 336–c. 264 B.C.). Characteristic of Zeno's teaching and that of other Stoic philosophers, such as Chrysippus (c. 280 B.C.), was the thesis that man is a citizen of the world. Thus emphasis was placed on the nature of man as such and not merely as related to political society. A broader society consequently results from human nature itself, which is subject to the law of right reason. The individual thus comes to be recognized as a moral unit who is governed by universal law, which prescribes a pattern of conduct that is discoverable by reason. In this way, law and justice are seen as transcending the confines of the city-state.

Roman Thought. After the military conquest of Greece by Rome c. 146 B.C., the Stoic idea of natural law began to infiltrate the Roman world. CICERO played an important role in interpreting and disseminating this idea. For him, natural law is the highest reason implanted in nature, transcending space and time; it is eternal and unchangeable, the same in Rome as in Athens. Coming from God, it commands what is to be done and forbids what is to be avoided. It precedes written law and the state. More specifically, it embodies basic principles (e.g., the right of self-defense against aggression), regulates justice (giving to each his due), and promotes the common good. It also forbids fraud and theft. Among the Romans, natural law came to be chiefly related to the juridical and legal orders. The natural right, or the just by nature, therefore became the ius naturale of the Roman jurists, i.e., a speculative body of universal moral ideas and principles.

The ius civile, or body of legal precepts, was applied exclusively to Roman citizens. But eventually, after Rome became a great maritime and trading center, it became necessary to supplement the ius civile with the ius gentium, or body of law for foreigners. As positive law, the ius gentium was constructed from the common denominator of principles obtaining in the various legal systems of countries from which foreigners came. The policy of using this common denominator was rationalized on the grounds that it was only the implementation of the ius naturale, the expression of universal reason. By the end of the classical age of Roman jurisprudence, i.e., about 300 years after the death of Cicero, hundreds of texts had referred to ius naturale, naturalis ratio, and rerum natura. Thus Ulpian (d. A.D. 228), the great Roman jurist, stated that insofar as the ius civile is concerned, slaves are not regarded as persons; nevertheless, this is not true under natural law because under that law all men are equal (Digest 50.17.32). Ulpian was obviously referring to the natural law when he wrote that the precepts of the law are to live honestly, to harm no one, and to render each his own (Institutes 1.1.3; Digest 1.1.10). Most Roman jurists, such as Gaius (2d century A.D.), oriented the legal order toward the natural law primarily by following the standard of objective right reason as manifested in experience (Institutes 1.156, 158).

Catholic and Scholastic Period. Although the Fathers of the early Christian Church understandably emphasized the “new law” of revelation rather than simply the natural law, nonetheless the conception of natural law was integral to their theology. Among those authors in whom this is clearest are St. PAUL, St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, St. AUGUSTINE, and St. ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, all of whom borrowed Stoic ideas in describing the interrelationship between natural and supernatural laws. The Stoics had been equivocal as to whether the ultimate source of natural law was personal and divine or whether divinity was immanent in nature in the sense of a monist PANTHEISM. It was impossible for them to synthesize natural law with the myths of the pagan religions of their time. In this area, the Fathers of the Church, and later the scholastics, were able to supply new insights based on supernatural revelation.

Early Christianity. St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, wrote that the natural law is inscribed in the hearts of all men, even though all do not have the Law (of Sinai) of divine revelation (Rom 2.12-16). St. John Chrysostom taught that the natural law is promulgated through man’s conscience, which supplies the basis of human law (Ad pop. ant. 12). According to St. Augustine, the ius naturale comes from a personal, all-wise, and all-powerful God, the same God who has authored the Christian Scriptures; hence natural law is not derived from nature in the pantheistic sense (Civ 11.4.2). St. Isidore of Seville held that all laws are either divine or human and that ius naturale is the law observed everywhere by the instinct of nature, such as that ordaining the marriage of man and woman, the procreation and rearing of children, and the like. It is not human positive law (On Laws 4).

Canonists. The canonists, especially as seen in the Decretum of GRATIAN, were chiefly responsible for transmitting the interrelationship between natural and supernatural law that had been worked out by the Fathers to the golden age of scholastic philosophy. According to Gratian, all justice is founded on natural law, which is of divine origin (Decretum 1). This law goes back to the beginning of mankind; its content is to be found in the Ten Commandments and the Gospel, which dictates the golden rule of doing to others what one wishes done to oneself. A decade after Gratian, the canonist RUFINUS referred to the natural law as the divine power that nature implants in man, impelling him to do good and avoid evil (Summa Decretorum).

Thomistic Concept. But it remained for St. Thomas Aquinas to perfect the idea of natural law. This he did by distinguishing in the natural law of the Stoics and in the ius naturale of the Romans the lex aeterna and the lex naturalis. The eternal law is the plan of the divine providence governing the cosmos, man, and matter, both animate and inanimate. It is the ordering wisdom of God. Natural law is that part of the eternal law that is properly applicable to man alone, although it may be spoken of lower creatures by a kind of analogy. All creatures—including human creatures—passively receive their being, natures, and natural ordering to perfective ends from God. But man’s creation as a rational being enables him to receive this ordering of his nature as providing reasons to act and not to act. Human reason takes its measure from the objective ordering of human nature to the order of ends that perfects it.

Natural law is in accord with man’s nature (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 91.2 4). Subrational creatures and inanimate matter must obey the eternal law, but man can disobey it because he has freedom as to moral choice. However, he ought to obey the natural law, for otherwise he violates his nature. Thus did Aquinas correct the error of Ulpian, who is quoted in Justinian’s Digest (6th century A.D.) as having declared that the law of nature is not peculiar to the human race but belongs to all creatures (1.1.1 4). Ulpian had made the natural law (a part) identical with the eternal law (the whole).

According to Aquinas, ius naturale is encompassed within lex naturalis insofar as it relates to man. By this semantic change he gave rationally discovered law a statutory connotation, while insisting that natural law has the same source as supernatural law. But Aquinas did not destroy the rational basis of the pagan, Aristotelian-Stoic doctrine of natural law by substituting the authority of supernatural law, in the sense of truth revealed in the Bible, in its place. Rather, to use a metaphor, he taught that the single coin of divine law is stamped on one side by the supernatural law of Judeo-Christian theology, accepted on faith, through grace, as the word of God, and on the other side by the natural law, perceived by reason. Inasmuch as both laws emanate from a single source, they can never be in conflict. Precisely because man is called to an end surpassing nature, a law higher than the natural law is required to direct him to this end, but the “new law” of grace elevates and perfects nature rather than destroying it. According to Aquinas, natural law is nothing other than a participation in the eternal law. Gradually the emphasis would shift to nature, and then finally collapse into the solitary emphasis upon what law is known first.

Later Thought. In the 14th century, the Thomistic view of natural law was challenged by some. Thus, DUNS SCOTUS wrote that lex naturalis has no intrinsic connection with the essence of God and hence can be different from what it happens to be (Op. Oxon. 1.8.5. 22–23). WILLIAM OF OCKHAM held that natural law is wholly the product of divine will; it is divine positive law, or supernatural law, since God is primarily absolute and omnipotent will (Quodl. 1.10.3; 1.13). Both deviated, therefore, from the Thomistic idea of natural law by eliminating intellect and reason from its authoritative basis. But in the 16th century, reason was restored to the doctrine of natural law by Spanish jurist-theologians such as Domingo de SOTO (De iustitia et iure 1.5.2) and Francisco SUÁREZ (A Treatise on Law and God the Lawgiver 2.6.5). These thinkers affirmed that the ultimate source of the natural law is in the divine will and intellect; and its proximate principle, in the essence of man. They also emphasized a historical-analytical and comparative-empirical approach that gave content to natural law, particularly in the field of international relations.

Protestant and Postscholastic Period. The outbreak of the Reformation in the 16th century initiated a new period in the history of the doctrine of natural law. The term “natural law” had been so long embedded in the thinking of the Western world that philosophers and jurists continued to use it after the Reformation, although they attributed to it an essentially new and heterogeneous content. Insofar as the theology of the Reformation affirmed the private interpretation of the Scriptures, it led to the rejection of the idea of objective truth in the areas of both supernatural and natural law. The conscience of the individual became more than the source of personal moral responsibility; it became the measure of truth in all matters of right and wrong, good and evil. Subjective theories of natural law, detached from the element of experience, began to postulate the existence of a state or condition of nature in which man lived before he constructed politically organized society. In this state of nature, there was a “law of nature.” This myth of the natural state often was a “counter” to the theological account of Eden and the fall of man. Moral and social disorder would be traced, not to original and actual sin, but to natural dynamisms which condition and to some extent war against social order. Unlike the natural law, the law of nature was not related chiefly to conduct in general nor to the legal and theological orders, but rather to political order. This emphasis accompanied the rise of political problems ensuing from cuius regio eius religio (the religion of the state is that of whoever reigns), i.e., the emergence and growth of national states and churches.

Law of Nature School. According to the law of nature school, man perceives the natural law by his subjective faculty of reason, which contemplates human nature as an abstract essence existing in a vacuum, apart from time and place. Man determines the content of the law of nature not by induction but by a purely deductive process. (The scholastics had made use of induction here, studying the standard of right reason in relation to historical and contemporary experience.) The law of nature school exalted the autonomy of the individual faculty of reason; that this led to an excessive subjectivism is evidenced by the basic disagreement within the school over the state of nature, the content of the law of nature in this aboriginal condition, and its fate once man established politically and legally organized society by a social contract.

Grotius. The contributions of Hugo Grotius effected the transition between the scholastic and the law of nature concepts of natural law. Like the scholastics, Grotius believed in the existence of objective right reason, with resulting immutable principles, and in God as the highest source of natural law (De iure belli ac pacis 1.1). Unlike them, he held that the natural law could exist even without a personal and divine Law-Giver, since it had a sufficient basis in reason alone. He also stressed individualism, RATIONALISM, and the social aspect of rational human nature in reference to natural law (ibid. 1.3.8). But he did not go so far as to hold that the social nature of man is the sole source of natural law. Grotius erred in believing that man once lived in a state of nature under a law of nature that could be derived from man’s essence. He taught that it was possible to deduce by strict logic a complete system of principles with universal validity and from these to develop an all-sufficient code of legal rules (ibid. prol.). He thus failed to distinguish the immutable aspects of the natural law, the mutable conclusions that result from the application of immutable principles to changing factors, and the positive law that implements both types of principles. Under his law of nature doctrine, therefore, natural law lost the flexibility and dynamism it had enjoyed in the prior periods.

Pufendorf. Samuel von Pufendorf first articulated the concept of the law of nature in its pure or classical form. For him, the ius naturale is related to God’s will, not to His essence. It is not a rational participation in the eternal law, as Aquinas taught, but is identified wholly with the human impulse toward sociability. The sociable capacity of man is the sole proximate source of natural law, the starting point of speculation in this sphere (De iure naturae et gentium 2.3). Pufendorf considered reason so autonomous that in effect civil law, both substantive and procedural, became natural law, even though in theory he distinguished between natural law and positive law. For him, natural law is only a model law, advisory but not mandatory. Hence the state enacts positive law so that the natural law may be obeyed (ibid.).

Hobbes and Locke. The great divergence among the various adherents of the law of nature school may be seen by comparing the views of T. HOBBS with those of J. LOCKE. Hobbes saw the state of nature as a state of war of all against all, in which the life of man is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short. The basic norm is self-preservation, springing from natural law, which is a dictate of right reason regarding things to be done or omitted for the preservation of life and limb. The first fundamental law of nature is that peace be sought, and all other natural laws are derived from this. Morality is rooted, therefore, in peace; this is the reason why agreements must be kept (Leviathan 13). According to Hobbes, the law of nature prescribes that man should form the civil state in order to preserve the fundamental right to life. In establishing the state, however, man surrendered his freedom, equality, and the right to everything he had enjoyed in the state of nature, physical survival alone excepted. This was done by a covenant. The will of the resulting omnipotent state is based on the fundamental principle that agreements must be kept. Man may not morally resist the state because its enactments are natural law. Indeed the state, as the authoritative interpreter of both natural and supernatural law, was transformed into a mortal god in a literal sense. If there is a conflict between a command of the state and the private moral judgment of the individual, Hobbes advises the latter to go to Christ by martyrdom (ibid. 18). But for Locke, contrary to Hobbes, the historical state of nature was a condition of peace, good will, and mutual cooperation. Man enjoyed the right of freedom and equality, as well as the right to work and own property. The law of nature dictated justice, but the authority of civil society was necessary to enforce it. Politically organized society resulted from a SOCIAL CONTRACT, but the continuing obligation of obedience on the part of the people depends on the proper observance of that contract by the sovereign (Second Treatise on Civil Government 19). For Locke man is not, in the strict sense, under any obligation of law prior to the convening of the state, nor is man obligated to convene such a state. Rather, Locke sees natural law as a dictate of practical common sense a nominalistic symbol for the rights of the individual, reflecting his self-interest. These rights do not emanate from the natural law by intrinsic necessity; rather, they limit the political sovereign and should be enforced by human positive law (ibid. 9).

Others. Conceptions of the state of nature and the law of nature found therein were expressed by J. J. ROUSSEAU (The Social Contract 1.8, 2.6, 4.2), C. THOMASIIUS (Fundamenta iuris naturae et gentium), C. WOLFF (Institutiones iuris naturae et gentium 2), and others. The term "law of nature" became so ambiguous that it was used to justify such divergent theories as enlightened despotism, state absolutism, and the omnipotence of the democratic state. The ultimate position was that each individual's reasoning faculty manufactures natural law, rather than discovers it. These accounts, for the most part, do not situate natural law within a wider metaphysical and theological context.

Kant. The tendency to separate natural law from the foci of eternal law and nature is brought to its consummation in the doctrine of I. KANT, who introduced a new doctrine of objective right which is only equivocally related to classical natural law. He argued that the state of nature was only a historical fiction to explain the foundation of the civil state, since man had always lived in a social state (in this narrow regard, his doctrine shares something with Aristotelian and Thomistic teaching). However, he also maintained that man cannot reach the ideal, or perfect, law by a process of pure reason (The Philosophy of Law 1; Introduction to the Metaphysics of Morals 4.24). Kant argued that the formal, subjective elements of the reasoning process do not come from experience, and that they are valid only insofar as they are referred to some possible experience. Hence Kant denied the very possibility of metaphysical truth, since on his account first principles are not derived from the mind's initial contact with being, but are rather pure emanations of universal human subjectivity. What remains is human experience understood as shaped by universal subjective categories which on the Kantian view cannot be known to pertain to reality as such. Hence causal knowledge of the reality of God, the reasoned understanding of the nature of human freedom as a corollary of the nature of the human intellect, and the proofs for the immortality of the human soul are set aside and become mere subjective postulates of practical reason. Likewise, Kant reduces the ordering of nature to perfective ends to a mere empirical datum that in no way defines moral duty and may even serve as a motive for immoral breach of duty.

Kant projected an individualist idea of natural right. Freedom of will became the ultimate, supreme, immutable value, a natural inborn right that included all natural rights. He reconciled the conflict between the equally free wills of the various individuals in society by a CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE, a universal law directing that each individual should so act that the free exercise of his will would enable him to live without interfering with the like freedom of others. Under this theory, natural law is not a part of an eternal law, although the natural law supplies the immutable ideal of freedom upon which the categorical imperative is constructed. The categorical imperative is imposed by a necessity inherent in the very idea of freedom.

Period of Decline. The Enlightenment accounts of natural law shorn of metaphysics and theology and progressively reduced to immanent nature and finally to Kant's formalism of pure right reached a high degree of prestige at the end of the 18th century, but it gave way in the 19th century to POSITIVISM, which held the authority of the state to be supreme in every sense. The reasons for this decline may be enumerated as follows. First, even before the dawn of the 19th century, D. Hume laid the groundwork for the widespread assault on natural-law doctrine. A skeptic, he proclaimed that the human mind can never attain the essences of things and that it cannot determine what is intrinsically morally good or evil. Morality is not a matter of idealism but is determined by the sentiment of approval, itself related to the useful. According to Hume, the moral law has no basis in the rational and social nature of man and has no connection with immutable truth. Second, positivism was promoted by individualist utilitarians, such as J. Bentham (Treatise on Legislation 13). In place of idealism, Bentham substituted the notion of utility as measured by the greatest good or by the happiness of the greatest number, taking happiness in the sense of personal satisfaction and advantage. Bentham sought consciously to build a new body of law. He was the forerunner of John Austin (1790–1859), who created the analytical school of jurisprudence, a school widely influential among Anglo-American jurists. Third, the historical school, founded by F. K. von Savigny, contributed indirectly to the rise of positivism. It maintained that natural, or ideal, law springs spontaneously from the spirit of a people and is reflected in custom. It is a higher law, found and not made. For this school, customary law, like natural law, limited the authority of the political sovereign to make law. Yet the historical school was positivist in its ultimate philosophy, for it believed that customary law was the result of the will of the people yielding to non-rational impulses and responding to historical necessity rather than to right reason. Fourth, positivism was advanced by the newly emerging science of sociology, which had its origin in the writings of positivist philosophers such as A. COMTE. Assuming a mechanistic view of the physical universe based on mathematically demonstrable laws that control the activity of nature, it regarded moral and social laws as analogous to the law of gravitation. Sociological jurisprudence later abandoned this approach.

Correctives to the Law of Nature. From the viewpoint of the scholastic doctrine of natural law, it is understandable, however, why the analytical, historical, and sociological schools were able to attract a following. Each of these schools in its own way corrected a deficiency of the pseudoconcept of natural law that had been developed in the 17th and 18th centuries. Whereas Aquinas had visualized man as a rational and social animal who relies on both reason and experience and needs a legal order enforced by a temporal sovereign, the law of nature school overemphasized subjective reason in its analysis. These reactions against the law of nature school were therefore quite legitimate, even though they had little to do with the natural-law doctrine of Aquinas. The analytical school focused attention on legal analysis and the logical interdependence of legal rules and precepts; it stressed the fact that law is in the external forum and should be enforced by the sovereign. The historical school restored the factor of experience. The sociological school reintroduced the element of the social status of man and the means-ends aspect of law, as maintained by Aquinas. Each of these schools erred, however, by concentrating on one factor to the exclusion of others and by refusing to accept any immutable moral value, such as the dignity of the individual. Other factors that contributed to the rise of positivism included the search for an explanation to justify absolute political sovereignty in both domestic and foreign affairs, the thrust of moral RELATIVISM related to anthropological studies, the rejection of a priori postulates by the physical sciences, and mistaken ideas about human EVOLUTION, EMPIRICISM, pragmatism, and materialistic psychiatry.

Period of Revival. A reaction against the sterility and ineffectiveness of positivism began with a revival of natural law doctrine. This revival was led by F. Géný, a neoscholastic, and R. Stammler, a neo-Kantian. Both scholars emphasized the sociological aspects of the natural law, an emphasis that has continued throughout the contemporary period. Géný began the revival in France by considering the social life of the individual as a moral phenomenon governed by the natural law as understood by Aquinas. He used the Thomistic doctrine of natural law to provide a much-needed equitable and sociological interpretation for European codes. Géný's notions received great encouragement from Pope Leo XIII, especially through his encyclicals relating to political and social matters, such as LIBERTAS (1888) and RERUM NOVARUM (1891), and by succeeding popes (see SCHOLASTICISM, 3). Renewed interest in the scholastic doctrine of natural law as this relates to the legal and social orders began in the United States in the 1920s and 1930s. Law reviews sponsored by such universities as Fordham, Detroit, Marquette, Georgetown, and Notre Dame became channels for an ever-growing literature. The American Catholic Philosophical Association established a committee on the philosophy of law in the early 1930s that arranged an annual forum for the presentation of papers relating to natural law and the solution of legal and social problems. These bodies expanded further the body of natural-law literature. The revival of natural-law doctrine was enormously accelerated by the experience of two world wars. European emigrés contributed much on the North American continent to the renaissance of natural-law teaching. Jacques MARITAIN, Yves SIMON, Heinrich Rommen, and others, made cogent argument in behalf of the tradition of natural law given classical articulation by St. Thomas Aquinas. Many legal philosophers, recoiling from the horrors of untrammelled state power after the Nazi experience, took up with interest the consideration of a higher law than the positive law of the state. After World War II, it was manifest that such a doctrine alone could provide an authoritative basis for upholding the intrinsic dignity of the individual against ruthless dictatorship. The quest for political and legal justice resulted in the rediscovery that there is a moral order springing from an authority beyond the human will. The theological/metaphysical aspect of the tradition was rekindled in the consideration of the theonomic character of natural law, while concern for the legal/juridic/moral implications of the natural law also intensified. Interest in the doctrine of the natural law was evidenced in the United States by the Journal of the American Bar Association, the Natural Law Forum of the University of Notre Dame, and the Catholic Lawyer, published by the St. Thomas More Institute for Legal Research of St. John's University, New York. Southern Methodist University, Dallas, sponsors an annual symposium on natural law; and Loyola University, New Orleans, houses an institute on natural law as related to the solution of some contemporary social problem. The revival of natural-law doctrine has been widespread in Latin America, especially in Argentina and Mexico; in Europe it flourishes particularly in Italy, Germany, France, and Spain; and it is evident in the Orient.

Nonscholastic Circles. Stammler initiated a revival of the NEO-KANTIAN doctrine of natural right. For him, the content of the natural law is wholly changeable and changing, dependent upon the social ideals and conditions of a particular time and place. Through natural law, all possible individual goals of the community of freely willing men are to be harmonized. He thus reconciled the idea of natural law with the notions of evolution and utility. A later neo-Kantian development in the field of legal philosophy was led by Giorgio del Vecchio. His position is closer to the Thomistic than that of Stammler. Indeed, the position of Del Vecchio represents the tendency to minimize the speculative aspect of natural law theory so as to avoid the antimetaphysical criticisms flowing from Kant and Hume. He admits the existence of a divine Law-Giver who has given man a supernatural law by revelation, but he does not relate this Law-Giver to the natural law. He derives the elements of transcendence and immutability for his juridical idealism from the essence of man rather than deriving them from the divine will and intellect. Other nonscholastic doctrines that deploy the terminology of "natural law" have rejected any immutable, transcendental, objective ideal of conduct to which man should conform his behavior. Exponents of this type of natural-law doctrine, such as M. R. Cohen (1880–1947), accept the existence only of relative ideals for human conduct. But these ideals do exist a priori in an objective order and do not arise solely from facts. For such authors as well as for the neo-Kantians, the "ought" stands in juxtaposition to the "is." This is to say that these theorists embrace a pronounced dichotomy of nature and the good, divorcing practical knowledge from its speculative roots along Humean lines. Other natural-law writers, such as L. L. Fuller and Jerome Hall, deviate more markedly from the scholastic idea of natural law. They believe that there are ideals for the evaluation of man's conduct, but that these are principally generalizations of what will best advance the social interest.

Late 20th Century. The late 20th century has seen substantial work and controversy within all the major areas of natural-law theory, from theology and metaphysics, to natural ontology, to epistemology, to law and jurisprudence. This all-encompassing controversy and research is attributable to four distinct historical influences. First, it is in part due to the engagement of natural lawyers with radical theological pluralism following the Second VATICAN COUNCIL; second, it also flows from reactions against proportionalism on the one hand, and even more fundamentally against Humean and Kantian anti-metaphysical tendencies, on the other; third, it is a result of legal and political pressures and the growing volatility on the North American continent of Church-state legal issues, about all of which the tradition of natural law provides an important context for understanding; and fourth, the general encroachment of such reductionist methods as historicism, relativism, and scientism entails a proportionate response at every level of reasoning (see Pope JOHN PAUL II, FIDES ET RATIO). Out of this dense weaving and interweaving of themes and controversies, three points are clear: the renaissance of natural-law theory, especially in Thomism but also in competing and contrasting accounts such as the new natural-law theory championed by Grisez and Finnis; the special impetus given to the metaphysically founded Thomistic natural-law reasoning by the encyclicals VERITATIS SPLENDOR and Fides et ratio; and the importance of work done regarding both the significance of a normative conception of nature for theology, and of work applying natural law reasoning to jurisprudence and politics.

The New Natural-Law Theorists. During this period of time, the "new natural-law theory" propounded by and John Finnis has gained adherents while undergoing serious criticism from proponents of more traditional Thomistic natural-law theory. Grisez's influential work, The Way of the Lord Jesus, has brought this account to the foreground. Grisez and Finnis argue for a methodological and, as it were, temporary epistemic separation of the precepts of natural law from their speculative context, insisting that the prime precepts of the natural law are in no way derived from speculative truths. They also argue that basic moral goods are simply incomparable and do not exemplify any morally significant order amongst one another prior to human choice—what is called the “incommensurability thesis.” Arguing for the existence of universal moral norms, including negative norms, these authors strongly criticize proportionalism, while also denying the claims of more traditional Aristotelians and Thomists that moral goods or ends exemplify a teleological hierarchy that is morally significant prior to choice.

Thomistic and Aristotelian Natural-Law Theorists. An important school of Aristotelian and Thomistic philosophers has argued that although the transition from knowledge of nature to preceptive norms is not simply a function of definition, nonetheless it is impossible even temporarily to detach epistemic awareness of the natural law from its ontological foundation. Ralph McInerney has extensively criticized the new natural-law theorists’ account of the first precept of law, as well as their denial of the ethical significance of natural teleology. Henry Veatch engaged in a lengthy and lucid discussion with theorists of the analytic tradition, seeking to vindicate natural teleology within ethics from essentially Humean and Kantian criticisms. Russell Hittinger, in particular, has argued that the method of the new natural-law theorists tends toward fideism insofar as it separates natural-law duties to God from the speculative natural knowledge of the reality of God. He has set forth a strong argument that natural law is unequivocally “law”—that, as St. Thomas writes in the prologue to his treatise on law in the Summa theologiae, law is indeed an “extrinsic” principle, since ontologically the law and that of which the law is the norm are not one and the same.

Other Theorists. In addition to the well-delineated Thomistic and New Natural-Law Theory schools, a variety of other prominent authors have persisted in contributing important analyses and discussions. Most prominently, Martin Rhonheimer has set forth an interpretation of Aquinas on the natural law in Natural Law and Practical Reason (New York 2000). Rhonheimer argues, against the general weight of the Thomistic school, that man’s reason is the formal promulgator of the natural law. Like the New Natural-Law Theorists, he seeks to rescue natural law from the claims that it is physicalistic or merely naturalistic, which places his work at the very crossroads of the dispute of the Thomistic School with the New Natural-Law Theorists.

THOMISTIC ANALYSIS

Natural law, as can be seen from its history, has been the subject of much controversy. A partial explanation for this is that advocates of natural law have frequently ignored its ontological basis and adopted as their starting point what they considered the distinctive characteristic of human nature. As each proponent had his own concept of human nature, it was inevitable that each would have his own peculiar philosophy of natural law. Yet when viewed in isolation from its ontological origin, human nature itself furnishes norms that have little more than psychological validity. CONFUCIUS and his early disciples recognized this. Thus the opening sentence of the Confucian classic, The Unvarying Mean, reads: “What is ordained of Heaven is called the essential nature of man; the following of this essential nature is called the natural law; the cultivation and refinement of this natural law is called culture.” The Confucian view is close to that of St. Thomas Aquinas, who held that natural law is a participation of the eternal law in man, and that positive law consists in variable determinations of immutable fundamental principles as these are applied to the varying conditions and circumstances of social life. For both Aquinas and Confucius, positive law, itself an integral part of culture, is a development and implementation of the God-given natural law that man bears within him. This part of the article presents an analysis of the concept of natural law based on the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas. It discusses the relation of natural law to eternal law and positive law, the essentials of natural-law doctrine, the effects of natural law, man's awareness of the law, and its various confirmations in divine revelation and in papal teaching. More recent philosophical positions that are relevant to contemporary developments in theology are discussed in the third part of the article.

Relation to Eternal Law and Positive Law. Eternal law, natural law, and positive law, though distinct from one another, form a continuous series that may be compared to a tree. The eternal law is its hidden root; the natural law is its main trunk; and the different systems of positive law are its branches. All systems of human law contain, in varying proportions, natural principles and positive rules. The former are not made but are merely declared by human authority; therefore they may not be abrogated. In the words of Pope LEO XIII:

Of the laws enacted by men, some are concerned with what is good or bad by its very nature; and they command men to follow after what is right and to shun what is wrong, adding at the same time a suitable sanction. But such laws by no means derive their origin from civil society; because just as civil society did not create human nature, so neither can it be said to be the author of the good which befits human nature, or of the evil which is contrary to it. Laws come before men live together in society and have their origin in the natural, and consequently in the eternal, law. The precepts, therefore, of the natural law, contained bodily in the laws of men, have not merely the force of human law, but they possess that higher and more august sanction which belongs to the law of nature and the eternal law. (Libertas prae-stantissimum, June 20, 1888)

Of the positive rules of law, the same Pontiff said:

Now there are other enactments of the civil authority, which do not follow directly, but somewhat remotely, from the natural law, and decide many points which the law of nature treats only in a general and indefinite way. For instance, though nature commands all to contribute to the public peace and prosperity, still whatever belongs to the manner and circumstances, and conditions under which such service is to be rendered must be determined by the wisdom of men and not by Nature herself." (ibid.)

Thus, positive law is nothing more than an implementation of the natural law that must vary with the changing circumstances and conditions of social life.

Essentials of Natural-Law Doctrine. The eternal law is the plan of the divine providence governing the cosmos, man, and matter, both animate and inanimate. It is the ordering wisdom of God. Natural law is said by Thomas to be "nothing else" than a rational participation of this divine ordering wisdom. This is to say that natural law is defined by its metaphysical and theological character. The preceptive commands of the natural law derive their normativity from being rooted in the perfect being, good, and truth of God which are not admixed or limited by any potency or imperfection whatsoever. For St. Thomas "command" is an act of the intellect; thus, the precepts of the natural law while willed by God always are conformed to the divine wisdom and goodness. Natural law is that part of the eternal law that is properly applicable to man alone, although it may be spoken of lower creatures by a kind of analogy—by "participation and similitude."

Human reason is a "measured measure": it takes its measure from the objective ordering of human nature to the order of ends that perfects it, and thus consequently reason is enabled to be the rule and measure of right action. Yet the natural law is promulgated by God through instilling it in man's mind so as to be known—it is not "self-promulgated" by our knowing, but rather is promulgated by its being divinely instilled in the rational nature of man so as to be naturally known. Hence the natural law meets the requisites of law generally: it is promulgated by God who has authority over the commonwealth of being, and is for the sake of the common good (God being the extrinsic common good of the whole universe). Natural law is natural in several important senses. First, it is said to be natural because we are naturally subject to it, quite apart from any choice. The end, and indeed the whole hierarchy of ends, which perfects human nature is not among those things that are subject to human dominion. We may affect our motion to the end by our choice of means, but we can neither alter our natural ordination to happiness, nor alter that in which this happiness naturally consists. Second, the law is called natural because our initial awareness of the law—as an epistemic matter—derives from our awareness of our natural ordering to ends. For example, we do not choose to be creatures who thirst in the desert, who are lonely when lacking friends, who are confused when lacking truth: we simply are such creatures, and the initial awareness of the ordering of human nature to the whole hierarchy of ends is natural rather than received merely by book learning, or by oral tradition. Third, the natural law is said to be natural as contrasted with the lex nova of supernatural grace that governs the higher ordering of human nature to an end that transcends any natural end, namely, the essentially supernatural beatific vision of God.

Also fundamental to St. Thomas's philosophy of natural law is the distinction between the speculative reason and practical reason (see COGNITION, SPECULATIVE-PRACTICAL). Speculative knowledge pertains to that which cannot change and is sought for the sake of knowing itself, whereas practical knowledge pertains to the changeable (objects of deliberation) and is sought for the sake of action. Yet practical knowledge presupposes prior speculative adequation toward the ends of human living. Though virtuous action is conformed to right appetite, right appetite itself presupposes knowledge of the end. The natural sciences are the work of the speculative reason; natural law, on the other hand, is a "dictate of the practical reason." "The precepts of the natural law are to the practical reason what the first principles of demonstrations are to the speculative reason, because both are self-evident principles" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2). Just as being is what first falls under the apprehension of the speculative reason, so good is what first falls under the apprehension of the practical reason. The practical reason is directed to action, and every agent acts for an end that it regards as good. Hence the first principle of the natural law is that good is to be done and evil is to be avoided. "All other precepts of the natural law are based upon this: so that whatever the practical reason naturally apprehends as man's good or evil belongs to the precepts of the natural law as something to be done or avoided" (ibid.).

Both the speculative and the practical reason attain the same degree of certainty with regard to first principles, but not with regard to the conclusions drawn from these principles. St. Thomas makes a point of this difference: "For, since the speculative reason is concerned chiefly with necessary things, which cannot be otherwise than they are, its proper conclusions, like universal principles, are true without fail. The practical reason, on the other hand, is concerned with contingent matters, which are human actions; consequently, although there is some necessity in its general principles, the more we descend to matters of detail the more frequently we encounter defects" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.4). Thus, for St. Thomas, it is vain to expect the same certainty in judicial decisions as in the physical sciences, but it would be rash to deny altogether the existence of universal principles that constitute the natural law.

Content of Natural Law. St. Thomas defines the natural law as the participation of the eternal law in the rational creature (ibid. 1a2ae, 91.2). It should be noted, however, that the participation to which he refers is limited and defective. "Human reason cannot have a full participation of the dictate of the Divine Reason, but according to its own mode, and imperfectly" (91.3 ad 1). In other words, man's natural participation of the eternal law consists in the knowledge of certain general principles, not of every particular decision relating to an individual case. Since generality admits of infinite degrees, the precepts of natural law cannot be numbered exactly. All such precepts are instantiations of the primary precept that good is to be done and evil avoided. They are not simply deduced from the first precept of law (primum preceptis legis) that good is to be done and pursued and evil to be avoided, because this first premise is insufficiently determinate to serve such a role. This first precept of law embraces the whole dynamic ordering of man to the good and to the entire hierarchy of ends. Thus the natural law is made effective through virtues, the various habitus whereby one acts promptly, joyfully, and well, with respect to the end. As conclusions from the natural law become more and more remote, they shade off into the sphere of human law; therefore, there can be no clear-cut borderline between natural and human law. That is why St. Thomas maintains that the natural law can be changed by way of addition and is capable of unlimited growth (94.5).

For St. Thomas all the moral precepts of the Old Law pertain to the natural law in the sense that all are consonant with reason, although all do not pertain to natural law in the same way (100.1). Of the Ten Commandments the first three (according to the enumeration in common use among Catholics) pertain also to divine positive law inasmuch as man needs instruction by God to enable him to perceive their consonance with reason (it is a matter of natural justice that man owes public worship to God, and hence acceptance of whatever divine revelation dictates may be said to be commanded by the natural law as well as by the divine law). The remaining seven precepts pertain to the natural law not only in the sense that they are consonant with reason, but also inasmuch as this consonance does not require revelation to be known. The latter precepts are among the most proximate conclusions from the primary principles. "Honor thy father and thy mother" is a concretization of "good is to be done," and the remaining six Commandments are concretizations of "evil is to be avoided." All are among those things "that the natural reason of every man, of his own accord and at once, judges should be done or avoided" (ibid.). Other precepts of the Old Law pertain also to natural law, even though their rightness is not immediately apparent. An example is "Honor the person of the aged man" (ibid.), which is among the more remote conclusions. For St. Thomas, the two most immediate conclusions deducible from the primary precept are: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor"; all the precepts of the Decalogue are referred to these (100.3 ad 1).

Besides moral precepts, St. Thomas mentions two other types, namely, the ceremonial and the judicial (or juridical). The ceremonial precepts are determinations of the natural law whereby man is directed to God, whereas the juridical precepts are determinations of the natural law whereby man is directed to his neighbor. Unlike conclusions, determinations belong not to the integral body of the natural law but to positive law, whether divine or human. There is no question that the ceremonial precepts, which deal with the ways and forms of worship, belong to divine positive law. As to the judicial or juridical precepts, although most are determinations of the natural law, some may be conclusions (however remote) of the natural law, and therefore constitute an integral part of it.

Determination vs. Conclusion. The distinction between a conclusion and a determination is clearly expressed by St. Thomas: "The law of nature has it that the evildoer should be punished; but that he be punished in this or that way, is a determination of the natural law" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 95.2). Similarly, it is a conclusion of the natural law that he who injures another should compensate him; but exactly how to compensate him is a determination that can be laid down by positive law and is subject to change. For instance, the following law is found in Exodus: "When a man steals an ox or a sheep and slaughters or sells it, he shall restore five oxen for the one ox, and four sheep for the one sheep" (21.37). Such a prescription is certainly not a part of the natural law because it is not evident to natural reason. The case is different with the following: "You shall not molest or oppress an alien, for you were once aliens yourselves in the land of Egypt" (Ex 22.21). "You shall not wrong any widow or orphan" (22.22). "The innocent and the just you shall not put to death" (23.7). "Never take a bribe, for a bribe blinds even the most clear-sighted and twists the words even of the just" (23.8). Whether these are referred to as moral or juridical precepts, they are conclusions of the natural law whose rectitude is apparent to man's reason.

While determinations form no part of the natural law, their proper function is to implement the natural law. An instance of this is found in the modern law of restitution. The natural law demands that one who is unjustly enriched at the expense of another should restore whatever benefits he has derived from his unjust act. In order to implement this dictate of natural reason, American judges have invented the fiction of "constructive trust." As Justice B. N. Cardozo has put it, "When property has been acquired in such circumstances that the holder of the legal title may not in good conscience retain the beneficial interest, equity converts him into a trustee" (225 N.Y. 380, 386). Judge C. S. Desmond has said that "a constructive trust will be erected whenever necessary to satisfy the demands of justice. Since a constructive trust is merely 'the formula through which the conscience of equity finds expression,' its applicability is limited only by the inventiveness of men who find new ways to enrich themselves by grasping what should not belong to them" (299 N.Y. 27). Here positive law serves the natural law as a faithful and efficient handmaid.

The cases of constructive trust also furnish an apt illustration of the function of SYNDERESIS, CONSCIENCE, and PRUDENCE and their mutual workings with respect to natural law. It is the role of synderesis to perceive the principles of natural law: the principles here involved are that no one should enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another and that, if he does, he should be required to restore the benefits to the latter. It is the role of conscience to recognize that, in this or that particular case, a particular party is unjustly enriched. Finally, it is the role of prudence to devise or choose the best means of implementing the demands of justice. The interworkings of these functions in the jurist are seen at their best in the courts of equity, which had their origins in the English chancellor, who was at the same time "the keeper of the king's conscience." No doubt many of the chancellors were steeped in the Christian tradition of the natural law.

Effects of Natural Law. Among the principal effects of the natural law are its obligation and its sanction. The obligation of natural law arises from two sources: (1) primarily, the ordering wisdom of God; (2) secondarily, the essential order of things as naturally measuring the human reason, which reason is then fitted to be the measure of human acts. Of all creatures, man alone is endowed with a moral law and with reason to discern its obligations. He is aware that it is precisely this ingrained moral law that distinguishes him from the lower animals. It is the badge of his natural nobility. To obey the dictates of this moral law is to be true to his own nature. To play false to his nature, on the other hand, is to fall lower than brute animals, who, although devoid of rationality and a sense of obligation, follow instinctively the laws of their nature.

Regarding the provenance of law's obligation from God, Immanuel Kant observed: "Two things I contemplate with ceaseless awe; The stars of heaven, and man's sense of law." This expresses more than a cosmic emotion that springs from the feeling of harmony between macrocosm and microcosm; the awe of which Kant speaks comes also from an awareness, at least implicit, of God the Supreme Lawgiver. When one is aware that the same God who established the order of the universe also instituted the internal order of man's nature, his vision is like that of David, who saw the whole universe radiant with the glory of God (Ps 18.24). The laws that the Lord has written in man's heart, however, convey more than Kant's categorical imperatives; they are also a perennial delight. This high vision defies all human expression and imagination; yet one sure effect of it is that man's desire and will are "revolved, like a wheel which is moved evenly, by the love which moves the sun and the other stars" (Dante, Paradiso, 33.142).

Sanction. Only a portion of the natural law can be adopted and enforced by human law with its external sanctions. To take a simple instance, human law can forbid adultery with penal and civil sanctions. But Christ said that "anyone who so much as looks with lust at a woman has already committed adultery with her in his heart" (Mt 5.28). This, too, belongs to the natural law; but human law is too clumsy of an instrument to take cognizance of such cases. Does this mean that the natural law is without a sanction of its own? If so, it would be ineffectual. In fact, however, natural law is more effective than human law. In the first place, virtue is its own reward; and vice, its own punishment. One simply cannot be virtuous without being happy, nor can one sin without being miserable.

The end proportioned to man's nature is fulfillment through practical and speculative virtue, although in this ordering of creation, nature is further ordered to the beatific end and hence all natural ends are further ordered to beatitude. Natural law entails being entirely true to the actual ordering of human nature. VIRTUE promotes this cause, whereas VICE frustrates it. As a Chinese proverb has it, "there is no happiness like that of doing good." And it is equally true that there is no hell like sinning. Herein lies the intrinsic sanction of the natural law. Again, natural law is sanctioned by the law of spiritual causality: one reaps what one sows. "Do men gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles? Even so, every good tree bears good fruit, but the bad tree bears bad fruit" (Mt 7.16–17). In saying this, Christ merely restated part of the natural law. For it does not take a special revelation to know that "God's mill grinds slowly but surely," as the Greeks observed. Lao Tze put the same truth in this way: "Vast is Heaven's net; / Sparse-meshed it is, and yet / Nothing can slip through it." Finally, since God is supremely just, real virtue (especially when hidden) will not go unrewarded any more than deliberate and unrepented viciousness will go unpunished. The Christian law of mercy does not abolish this fundamental law of divine justice: on the contrary, it reveals the nature of this justice more fully, gives man a chance to begin anew, calls him to repentance, and enables him to meet its obligations. Christ did not come to destroy the natural law, but to fulfill it (cf. Mt 5.17). As a consequence of His coming, the Christian's obligation to fulfill the law has increased immeasurably. For unless his justice exceeds that of those who know not Christ, he shall not enter the kingdom of heaven.

Awareness of Natural Law. It has already been stated that our inceptive knowledge of the natural law proceeds not merely by book learning or custom, but from natural awareness of the ordering of human nature itself. Its primary precept of pursuing good and avoiding evil and its immediate conclusions are indemonstrable; yet they are self-evident principles of the practical reason. Thus it is not merely or primarily by logical or empirical reasoning that the first precepts of the natural law are known, but by the natural habitus called "synderesis." Synderesis is a habit of the reason; it is not an all-purpose moral intuitionism along the lines of G. E. Moore, but rather a habitus of moral light through whose act nature inclines to good and warns from evil. Its act presupposes that knowledge required for the intelligibility of the precepts involved. Conscience, on the other hand, is the act that applies this general knowledge to a particular situation. If, for instance, a person sees a little child crawling into a well, he sees immediately that it is his duty to hold the child back and save its life, no matter whose child it may happen to be. This awareness is the working of conscience. If, moreover, one fails to rescue the child and it is drowned in the well, he feels remorse. This, too, is the working of conscience, which, having given the command in the first instance, applies its sanction for failure to carry it out. Synderesis is the natural habit whereby we are disposed to know the law, and conscience is the act of its application to particular cases.

Since the elementary principles of the natural law are innate in human nature, evidences of it appear even in primitive law. Yet there is a growth in the content of natural law with the progress of civilization. As the human mind becomes more and more enlightened, it becomes capable of devising new and more effective methods of ascertaining the truth and implementing the natural law. Similarly, the human heart, refined by the developments of arts and letters, grows in sensitivity to new values and needs of humanity; as a consequence, it prompts legislators and judges to draw new conclusions from the first principles of the natural law. In this way, our awareness of naturally just claims has been enhanced in the course of history, as the justice of these claims is recognized but not made by human law. One example is the development of moral consensus regarding the evil of the institution of chattel slavery. Another is the growing moral awareness of the evils that may ensue upon the new technology of biological cloning technologies that applied to man deny the dignity of the human person.

Divine Revelation and Papal Teaching. The natural law is independent of any divine revelation. Its first principles are common to all men and are not the exclusive possession of the Judeo-Christian tradition. However, there can be no question that Christian writers have been greatly aided by revelation in their discovery of the natural law and natural rights. This point was brought out clearly by Chancellor James Kent in Wightman v Wightman (Chancery Court of New York, 1820. 4 Johnson Ch. 343). Pronouncing the nullity of the marriage of a lunatic, Chancellor Kent said: “That such a marriage is criminal and void by the Law of Nature, is a point universally conceded. And, by the Law of Nature, I understand those fit and just rules of conduct which the Creator has prescribed to Man, as a dependent and social being; and which are to be ascertained from the deductions of right reason, though they may be more precisely known, and more explicitly declared by Divine Revelation.”

It is truly characteristic of her catholicity that the Church has persistently “affirmed the value of what is human and is in conformity with nature,” notwithstanding her teaching on original sin. PIUS XII, the greatest jurist among the modern popes, never tired of speaking of the natural law. In his address to members of the International Convention of Humanistic Studies (1949), he observed: “She [the Church] does not admit that in the sight of God man is mere corruption and sin. On the contrary, in the eyes of the Church, original sin did not intimately affect man’s aptitudes and strength, and has left essentially intact the natural light of his intelligence and his freedom. Man endowed with this nature is undoubtedly injured and weakened by the heavy inheritance of a fallen nature, deprived of supernatural and preternatural gifts. He must make an effort to observe the natural law—this with the powerful assistance of the Grace of Christ—so that he can live as the honor of God and his dignity as man require.” Starting from the essential nobility of human nature, the pope went on to say:

The natural law here is the foundation on which the social doctrine of the Church rests. It is precisely her Christian conception of the world which has inspired and sustained the Church in building up this doctrine on such a foundation. When she struggles to win and defend her own freedom, she is actually doing this for the true freedom and for the fundamental rights of man. In her eyes these essential rights are so inviolable that no argument of State and no pretext of the common good can prevail against them. . . . It cannot touch these rights for they constitute what is most precious in the common good.

Pius XII saw that the chief source of confusion and disorder in the 20th century lay in the deliberate abandonment of the natural law. In his very first encyclical, Summi Pontificatus, he asserted: “One leading mistake We may single out, as the fountainhead, deeply hidden, from which the evils of the modern state derive their origin. Both in private life and in the state itself, and moreover in the mutual relations of race with race, of country with country, the one universal standard of morality is set aside; by which We mean the natural law, now buried away under a mass of destructive criticism and of neglect.” This has become possible because in some states, at least, the pernicious doctrine of state absolutism has prevailed, with the result that the state has actually usurped the position of God. When the Author of the natural law is set aside, there can be no room for the natural law, which, as Pius XII insisted, “reposes, as upon its foundation, on the notion of God, the Almighty Creator and Father of us all, the Supreme and Perfect Law-giver, the wise and just Rewarder of human conduct.”

CONTEMPORARY THEOLOGY AND PHILOSOPHY

One distinction that is indispensable for understanding the place of natural law in contemporary theology and philosophy is that between the ontology of natural law, or its existence, and the epistemology of natural law, or the knowledge of principles that may be said to constitute it. It seems from the dissent that takes place in contemporary discussions of natural law that there is more disagreement over the epistemology than there is over the ontology.

Protestant Criticisms. S. E. Stumpf suggests such a distinction when he asserts that contemporary Protestant thought is fundamentally critical of natural-law theory, although it does not repudiate the theory completely. For the Protestant, the disagreement arises from a philosophy that is based on the accessibility of nature to man’s rational powers, an accessibility that he is unwilling to admit. For him the “Catholic” natural law is associated with the Thomistic notion of the analogy of being, ac-ording to which the natural law is defined in terms of the eternal law that exists in God. The promulgation of this law, as has been explained above, is made in the rational nature of man. The application of its principles, whether primary, secondary, or tertiary, to contingent situations is made by the consciences of men in their practical prudential judgments. For many Protestants, this explanation places too much importance on stable natures and rational powers, and not enough upon the ambiguity in every moral situation. Reinhold NIEBUHR's criticism of what he calls "classical, catholic, and modern natural law concepts" proceeds along these very lines. He insists that these concepts do not allow for the historical character of human existence because they are radicated in a classical rationalism that did not understand history. These concepts, for Niebuhr, do not appreciate the uniqueness of the historical situation or the accretions that came into the definition of natural law through history. The general principles are too inflexible, and the definitions of these general principles are too historically conditioned. Niebuhr does not deny an "essential" nature of man, but the profoundest problem for him is the historical elaboration of man's essential human nature, on the one hand, and the historical biases that have insinuated themselves into the definition of that essential human nature, on the other.

A second criticism, for Niebuhr, is the tendency in the classical theory to make the law of love an addition to the law of obligation, with the result that the one deals with the determinate possibilities and the other the indeterminate possibilities of good. In his view, clear lines between determinate and indeterminate possibilities cannot and should not be drawn. Niebuhr illustrates this by saying that justice is an application of the law of love for which the rules are not absolute but relative. All such rules are applications of the law of love and do not have independence apart from it. They would be autonomous only if they were based upon an "essential" social structure, and there is no definition of such an essential structure of community, except the law of love. Stumpf makes this the cardinal point of criticism between the Protestant and Catholic conceptions of natural law. The ground of ethics is love even for the natural man and such love is the fulfillment and completion of the law. Love and grace are not dimensions of the supernatural order only, but justice is infused and transfigured by love. The Protestant conception, then, is fundamentally the confrontation of man with the God of judgment and love commanding him, not through the mediation of abstract primary, secondary, and tertiary principles, but subjecting him to the single imperative of an undifferentiated and naturally indefinable love. No law mediates between man and God—only love—and this love is the natural law for the very reason that love is the law of man's essential human nature, which passes otherwise undefined. The metaphysical structure of reality, and the teleological structure of nature, are each set aside as at best merely provisional and awaiting reformulation in the new law.

Different Views of Reason. It should be seen at once that all Catholic and many Protestant theologians would admit an essential human nature, but even there the word "essential" demands quotation marks and precise refinements of meaning. R. E. Fitch, dean of the Pacific School of Religion, is quoted in a footnote of an article by A. R. Jonsen "Arguing Ethics" (Homiletic and Pastoral Review [Jan. 1964] 302), in which reference is made to two entirely different views of reason that are possible in any discussion of natural law. For the Catholic, the stress is on the reason that is Aristotelian, classical, ordered, and universal; for the Protestant, the emphasis is on the reason that is individualistic, inquiring, and experimental. Fitch says that both are needed, and no one will question that conclusion. The combination of the two stresses might be assisted by the suggestive use of the phrase "prismatic analysis" in connection with the formation of the practical prudential judgments of the individual conscience. It can readily be seen how the most general principles of law passing through this individual human prism receive all the colorations, the ambiguities, the obstacles, and the helps from the particular existential historical moment of their passage. For the person who leans toward a somewhat complete situationalism, no law passes through the human prism but the law of love; anything else that he might designate as law is not exigent and obligatory, but guiding and tentative, provisional and contingent. The position of the moderate situationalist is one that appreciates both the imperative of obligation and the imperative of love, while giving full validity to all the contingent factors in the ambiguous ethical situation. Between the divine transcendence and the ever-changing human situation, J. C. Bennett places the "middle axioms," which seem to be employed to mediate between more general norms and the unique structural situation. Niebuhr speaks of "enduring structures of meaning and value" that must be assured a valid role in the ethical choice. Will Herberg finds some clarification of these conceptions of the "enduring structures of meaning and value" of Niebuhr and the "middle axioms" of Bennett by citing Edmund BURKE, who has this to say about natural rights:

These metaphysical rights, entering into common life, like rays of light which pierce into a dense medium, are . . . refracted from a straight line . . . [and] undergo such a variety of refractions and reflections that it becomes absurd to speak of them as if they continued in the simplicity of their original direction. ("Conservatives, Liberals and the Natural Law, II," National Review, June 19, 1962)

Philosophical Presuppositions. The fundamental disagreement on natural-law theory, therefore, is rooted in philosophical presuppositions on the nature of law, on the nature of man, on the very meaning of "natural." The signification of a theory of natural law for the Roman Catholic, the Protestant, and the secular humanist will be conditioned from the very start by these philosophical presuppositions. In fact, many theological disagreements find their ultimate sources of division in philosophical premises. To those inclined to regard metaphysical knowledge as not so respectable a knowledge as that of the empiro-logical sciences, the intelligibility of nature, of man, of law, and of God will be regarded with increasing skepticism. All these obstacles that are profoundly philosophical will make difficult the acceptance even of the existence of natural law at its barest minimum. When, in addition to the difference in philosophical presuppositions, the differences in theology concerning the nature of original sin and its consequences for the nature of man are studied, it can be more clearly seen why natural law for the Catholic has been a dialectical tool. It stands to reason that he can employ this tool effectively only if he constantly appreciates these philosophical and theological differences.

Catholic Theology. Natural law has understandably been of interest to the Catholic theologian, who has always interested himself in the mutual relation of reason and faith and is convinced that God operates in history through the natures of things and especially through the nature of man. He presumes that man's nature has not been totally deformed by original sin and that his intellect and will are capable of constructing a natural theology and a moral philosophy that are valid and complemented by supernatural theology and a moral theology. In light of this judgment, he does not hesitate to study the essential ordering of human nature and to discover certain conformities and deformities with respect to it. Unfortunately, the principal obstacle to the acceptance of natural law in modern times is the mistaken notion that this law belongs to the Catholic Church and no other. Yet it is undeniably true that the Catholic Church has been the most vigorous defender of natural-law theory in areas ranging from property rights to contraception and from the problems of medical ethics to those of nuclear warfare.

With the gradual lowering of moral standards, however, the Church has given more of her magisterial attention to the claims of nature and justice. J. FUCHS, in Lex Naturae zur Theologie des Naturrechts (Düsseldorf 1955, 9–12), shows that since the reign of Pius IX the term "natural law" has been employed with increasing frequency in the documents of the Church. The term was constantly mentioned in the allocutions and discourses of Pius XII on the issues of peace and war, on political organizations, and on the obligations of the many professions, especially medicine and law. Yet the fact that the Church has been concerned with defending the natural and to relate it to the supernatural does not make the natural itself supernatural. The natural law is the basis and foundation for the supernatural code of ethics found in moral theology, whereas the additional evidence for certain forms of ethical conduct derives from biblical sources and from tradition. At times the papal documents refer to elevated human nature, to human nature supernaturalized by grace; where this is done, however, the texts are clear, and such citations do not permit a reader to conclude that the argument from reason has been so substantially undermined that only Catholic faith provides a valid and cogent ground for ethical conduct. The interrelation between faith and reason on the precise question of the probative value of evidence from natural law is most certainly ground for debate among Catholic theologians, but no one of them would deny completely all probative value and all cogency to a natural-law argument.

This issue has received heightened attention as a result of the discussions of the normative relation of nature and grace ensuing after the publication of Henri de LUBAC's famous Surnaturel (Paris 1946). The issue is whether the integrity of the natural order does not require a natural end for man (granted that this end is no longer actually the ultimate end, and that in the order of divine providence that this end is further ordered to the beatific finis ultimus). De Lubac argued the impossibility of any natural end for man proportioned to human nature itself. This denial has seemed to many Thomists to constitute a denial of the relative integrity and autonomy of the natural order. St. Thomas Aquinas expressly held that man could have been created in a purely natural state, (e.g., Quod, I, q. 4, a.3, resp.) and that if man had been so created, the deprivation of supernatural beatitude would not constitute a punishment as now it does (De malo, q.1, art. 5, ad 15). This clearly implies in St. Thomas's teaching that there is a felicity or end proportionate to man's nature, distinct from the further ordering in grace to which man is now actually called and toward which natural ends are now ordered. In the years following Surnaturel, the works of Hans Urs von BALTHASAR and those by thinkers of the COMMUNIO school who radicalize this position of de Lubac (e.g., David Schindler), as well as of some by Greek Orthodox theologians (John Zizioulas) have brought these questions further into the foreground. The Thomistic teaching persists in exerting a powerful influence over the formulation and understanding of the issue of natural law within Catholic theology.

Charge of Vagueness and Ambiguity. A fundamental criticism, especially from circles outside the Church, points to the difficulties in the presentation of the natural law; the presentation seems to be indeterminate and unsatisfactory, at least as its defenders formulate it. Again, the evidence that the defenders of natural law adduce may not be cogent in the light of differences in moral beliefs and practices at different times and places. N. Bobbio, in “Quelques arguments contre le droit naturel” [Le droit naturel (Paris 1959) 175–190], suggests this criticism when he remarks that philosophers are inclined to deny that the natural law is natural, whereas legal scholars tend to deny that it is a law. The response for the Thomistic supporters of natural law is that it is both natural and genuinely a law, that it is verifiable as natural and valid in an authentic meaning of law. Robert Gordis points out the dilemma of those who stand outside the dominant tradition of natural law but are sympathetic to its value. He refers to Robert M. Hutchins’s observation that natural law appears to many to be “a body of doctrine that is so vague as to be useless or so biased as to be menacing.” For such persons the vagueness and ambiguity of terms such as “nature” and “natural” have always been a part of the history of ideas. For them the opinion of Leslie Stephens may not be the cynical exaggeration that it is for others: “Nature is a word contrived in order to introduce as many equivocations as possible into all theories, political, legal, artistic or literary, into which it enters.” Critics of natural law are ready to add to the catalog of meanings given to “nature.” D. G. Ritchie, in Natural Rights (2d ed. [London 1903] 20–47), has a chapter “On the History of the Idea of Nature in Law and Politics”; Erik Wolf’s Das Problem der Naturrechtslehre (Karlsruhe 1955) gives nine meanings for “nature” in the context of natural law alone; and Philippe Delhaye’s Permanence du droit naturel ([Louvain 1960] 9–21) has an introduction that explains at least 20 meanings of “nature.”

This testimony to the vagueness and ambiguity of the term “nature” was not unknown to the proponents of natural law from their examinations of its meaning for the Stoics, John Duns Scotus, Bishop J. Butler, Hume, and Rousseau. Yves Simon commented on this difficulty in The Tradition of Natural Law. He considers the confusion of ideological aspiration with philosophic contemplation of the natural law to have led to the tendency to suppose that natural law can decide “with the universality proper to essences, incomparably more issues than it is actually able to decide.” He notes the tendency of certain teachers to treat as matters of natural law issues that demand “treatment in terms of prudence” and contends that such exaggerated claims in behalf of natural law will tend to engender “disappointment and skepticism” as well as that contempt naturally felt for sophistry (The Tradition of Natural Law [New York 1992] 23–24).

Yet the proponent of natural law does insist that human rational nature is subject to a normative order in which may be verified the essential features of law: it is promulgated by God from creation, it is prescriptive and preceptive insofar as providing reasons to do and not to do, and it is for the sake of the common good, issued by the One who is the governor of the entire commonwealth of being. That in the order of knowing we are aware of moral truths prior to being aware of these as being law merely establishes a distinction between the order of discovery and the order of being. Accusations of ambiguity arguably betray a deontological tendency that would obviate the role of virtue in the prudential articulation of the implications of the natural law. The study of the human virtues and natural law are essentially complementary, for in its classical formulation natural law is made effective in and through human virtues—active potencies or dispositions for acting strongly and joyfully toward the good.

Contributions of Anthropology. As helps in this analysis, tradition, revelation, and authority are implied by the actual further ordering of nature to grace, as well as by the purely natural calling of human persons to the extrinsic common good of the universe (God), of justice and truth, of the political state, and even of the family. The traditional elaboration of natural law must also be supplemented by materials from cultural anthropology and from all the sciences insofar as they do not stray from their formal objects. Thomistic ethicists have an important function in the incorporation of these contributions. In “Human Evolution: A Challenge to Thomistic Ethics” [International Philosophical Quarterly 2 (1962) 50–80], Charles Fay shows how some of the changes resulting from man’s biocultural evolution may so transform the relation between man and nature (e.g., atomic energy, polymer chemistry) that certain acts may receive a different moral evaluation. R. H. Beis, in “Some Contributions of Anthropology to Ethics” [Thomist 28 (1964) 174–224], considers the several advantages that a knowledge of anthropology holds for the ethicist and discounts the anxiety of those who consider that anthropology supports only ethical relativity. In fact, Beis finds contradictions in the position of anthropological ethical relativity when it attempts to assume values of its own.

The philosopher-theologian, interested in a firm foundation for his natural-law position, is not unconscious of the advances in the contributions of anthropology to ethics. He is encouraged to recognize that anthropology does not scientifically establish ethical relativity. However, it is appropriate to the study of natural law to clarify the distinction between what is universal and invariable in human nature and what is conditioned by the circumstances of cultural development.

Other Disciplines. It may be overly optimistic and naïve to consider that there can be more fruitful agreement on natural law by further clarification of the two aspects of human nature, the absolute and invariable, and the relative and conditioned. If the former has been emphasized in the past, the latter is not being ignored in the present. This is especially so in contemporary discussions of natural-law jurisprudence.

Again, the modern ethicist and theologian who introduces references to natural law in medical morality or in sexual ethics does not ignore scientific facts that are relevant. The discussion of the licit use of ANOVULANTS in certain pathological conditions raises many questions for whose answer the ethicist is ready to accept all the scientific help he can get. The modern ethicist and theologian of natural law takes into account all relevant scientific data and frequently finds the lack of consensus not among ethicists and theologians, but among scientists themselves. Where lack of consensus among practitioners of the sciences flows from an inadequate philosophy of nature that generates confusion about and obscures natural teleology, substantial nature, or other essentially philosophic elements, such lack of consensus implies only that those in question should educate themselves. But where genuine differences within a field itself—as opposed to precursory differences—are at issue, the natural lawyer must await clarification. One necessity thus revealed is that of distinguishing ideologically driven errors and confusions flowing from scientism from the more limited methods of positive science.

Role of the Church. To avoid such confusion, the Catholic Church has always maintained that the natural law is an object of its teaching authority and that its guidance is necessary for an adequate knowledge of the natural law. This is not merely a pragmatic decision, but a clear mandate implied by the further ordering of all natural ends to the beatific finality. Just as the natural law governs man's normative ordering toward the ends proportionate to his nature, so divine law governs the order toward that supernatural end which is disproportionate to any finite nature. Gerald Kelly, SJ, refers to the moral (not physical) necessity of revelation in this regard. In other words, the guidance of the Church is a practical, or moral, necessity for obtaining an adequate knowledge of the natural law. When it is considered that the natural law is sufficiently promulgated, according to its proponents, if there is promulgation of its primary and secondary precepts in such a way that no one can be invincibly ignorant of these, this alone might be thought to leave so much to be discovered by man himself that, without the assistance of some guide and authority, his search would not be very satisfactory. Of course, this by itself might only indicate that the further implications of the natural law are not effortlessly known by all, which is indeed true even of the natural order of the physical cosmos, and hence is all the more true of man's participation in the eternal law. The need for grace is not unique to this area of human striving, either—any integrally right use of human capacities will require grace to be ordered to the due end of beatific finality. Nonetheless, the harm done to human affectivity and inclination by sin, and the higher ordering of all natural ends to the beatific finality, alike indicate the need for guidance from the custodian of divine revelation to assure correct understanding of the natural law.

St. Thomas makes clear (Summa theologiae I-II, q. 85, a. 1, resp.) that nature is, in part, destroyed by original sin. He identifies three senses of human nature: 1) the principles and properties of human nature; 2) the natural inclination to virtue; and 3) that gift of original justice conferred upon the first parents of the human race. He states that the third (the gift of original justice) is destroyed by sin; the second (the natural inclination to virtue) is diminished (but not utterly destroyed) by sin; and the first (the principles and properties of human nature) is neither destroyed nor diminished by sin. Because the root of our natural inclination to virtue is the rational nature, this inclination cannot be wholly extinguished. Knowledge of the natural law and its implications is always in principle naturally possible. The natural tendency of the rational creature to God cannot wholly be eradicated. But because the natural inclination to virtue is diminished by sin, full knowledge of—and robust conformity to—the natural law implies the aid of revelation and grace. This is especially so inasmuch as the diminishment of natural inclination by sin implies diminished natural vigor in the pursuit of the good—whereas it is those who vigorously strain toward the good who are most able to discern its implications.

NATURAL LAW AND JURISPRUDENCE

The philosophy of the NATURAL LAW is predicated upon the existence of an objective moral order, within the scope of human intelligence and the capacity of human virtue, upon which the peace and happiness of personal, national, and international life depend, and to which all human beings, civil societies, and voting majorities are bound in conscience to conform.

According to this philosophy human beings are endowed by their Creator with certain natural rights and obligations to enable them to attain in human dignity their divine destiny. These natural rights and obligations are inalienable precisely because they are God-given. They are antecedent, both in logic and in nature, to the formation of civil societies and the casting of ballots. They are not granted by the beneficence of the state, democratic or otherwise; consequently the tyranny of the state, democratic or otherwise, cannot destroy them. In fact it is the moral responsibility of the state, through the instrumentality of its civil law, to acknowledge their existence and protect their exercise, to foster and facilitate their enjoyment by the wise and scientific implementation of the natural law with a practical and consonant code of civil rights and obligations.

Search for Objectivity. The construction and maintenance of a corpus juris adequately implementing the natural law is a monumental and perpetual task demanding the constant devotion, the clearest intelligence, and the most mature scholarship of the legal profession. For the fundamental principles of the natural law, universal and immutable as the human nature from which they derive, require rational application to the constantly changing political, social, economic, and technological conditions of dynamic civil society.

The application of the natural law postulates change since the circumstances of human existence necessarily change. It is inconsistent with unquestioning complacency in the status quo. It demands a reasoned acceptance of the good and a rejection of the bad, in all that is new, and advocates a critical search for the better. It postulates constant scrutiny of the data of history, sociology, politics, economics, psychology, biology, medicine, and other pertinent human knowledge. It insists that effort toward improvement of the corpus juris be made in the light of the origin, dignity, and destiny of man and in the knowledge of the origin, nature, and purpose of the state.

The relationship between natural law and civil law or, as it is popularly denominated, between morals and law, is the prime problem of jurisprudence. It is a particularly difficult and delicate problem in a society such as the pluralistic American society in which large groups of citizens sincerely differ, theologically and philosophically, about the morality of many activities and institutions and about the proper public policy of the state concerning them.

Americans were once divided upon the moral and legal issues of human slavery. They were later divided upon the moral and legal issues of racial discrimination. They have been divided over the moral and legal issues concerning capital and labor, compulsory military service and thermonuclear weapons, loyalty oaths and flag salutes, prize fighting and gambling, Bible reading and prayers in public schools, the equal treatment of children in private schools, the use of alcoholic beverages, the control of obscenity, and many other moral-legal questions.

Despite their shared reverence for the sanctity of human LIFE, for the sacredness of MARRIAGE, for the holiness of the marriage act, for the dignity of children, the fact is that Americans have been divided over civil laws and public policy respecting marriage and divorce, monogamy and polygamy, adultery and fornication, prostitution and homosexuality, artificial contraception and insemination, abortion and sterilization, the adoption of children, suicide and euthanasia, capital punishment, and even the questions of blood transfusions or medical aid to sick or dying children.

Possibly some of the differences will never be solved to the satisfaction of all, but will be determined from time to time merely by majority vote. Nevertheless the peace and good order of a pluralistic society demand that it sincerely strive to resolve its differences, as best it can, with civil dialogue and mutual respect, on sound moral and legal principles.

Law and Morality. Americans desire a civil society and a legal system founded upon valid principles of morality. The philosophy of the Declaration of Independence epitomizes and expresses this desire. It appeals in express terms to God, the Creator, the Supreme Judge of the World, and expressly commits the young American nation to His divine providence, basing its claim to freedom upon inalienable rights bestowed by God.

Morality Influencing Law. The moral law comes from God. The civil order depends upon the moral order. The good society cannot be based upon police power alone. For it is MORALITY that imposes the obligation in conscience to obey civil law. Without such obedience the enforcement of civil law, the administration of justice, and the preservation of liberty would be impossible. It is a fact of human experience that the majority of people, in the majority of their actions, habitually obey the law of the land, not out of fear of police sanctions, but because they recognize that they are morally bound to do so. The moral obligation to obey civil law is the foundation of a decent and free society.

Civil law, accordingly, must respect the natural law. Man-made law cannot validly command the violation of any God-given obligation, nor can it validly prohibit the exercise of any God-given right. Law must be just. An unjust law cannot, of itself, bind the human conscience. An unjust law is, in reality, no law at all, but merely an act of governmental violence and a species of immoral force. At various times and places men have been forced to submit to immoral laws. For almost 100 years in America the abomination of human slavery was enforced by law. An immoral law contradicts CONSCIENCE. Conscience and the natural law repudiate immoral civil laws.

This is not to say that each individual is sufficient unto himself to determine arbitrarily which laws he will obey and which he will disregard. In cases of genuine doubt, it is reasonable to presume that civil laws, enacted under the safeguards of constitutional processes, are consonant with the natural law. Nevertheless, a palpably immoral law cannot bind the human conscience. There is a moral right to disregard it. There may be a moral obligation to resist it to the death. In the face of a clear and irreconcilable conflict between the natural and the civil law, between morals and law, we must obey God rather than man.

The great body of American law is based upon the natural law. The incorporation of sound moral principles has been the most conspicuous factor in the development and refinement of American common and constitutional law. A simple example is seen in the fundamental axiom of criminal law: that, except for reasonable minor exceptions, the overt act does not make a criminal unless his mental state is criminal—actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea—which was a principle of moral theology long before its adoption by criminal law. Similarly, with understandable exceptions, the moral principle of personal responsibility, based upon the premise of freedom of the will, constitutes the foundation and determines the superstructure of all of American criminal and civil law. The legality of American free society is essentially predicated upon morality.

The refining influence of morals upon American law is evident in the development of equity; in the evolution of the law of contracts and torts; in the explication of the law of theft, from larceny through embezzlement to false pretenses; in the law of sales, from the crude caveat emptor to decent dealing; in the law of agency, from mere authority to fiduciary obligations; in the law of property, from raw power to social duties; in the law of industrial relations, from laissez-faire rugged individualism to fraternal responsibilities; in American constitutional law, from allowance of human slavery to the statutes initiating freedom and equality; in the law of equal protection, from maintenance of racial segregation to the legislation upholding human dignity; in the law of procedural and substantive due process; and so with many other principles and precepts of American common and constitutional law.

Law Encouraging Morality. But the moral order depends upon the legal order also. Civil laws are necessary for the recognition and the implementation of morals in organized society. Without the support and the sanction of civil law, many moral obligations could not be fulfilled, and many moral rights could not be protected against the encroachments of the unscrupulous and the machinations of the malicious. The law and the police power of the state are necessary to protect the vast majority of the people in their fixed intention and obligation to observe the precepts of the moral order.

Furthermore, the law must do more than protect those obvious moral rights and obligations upon which all men easily agree. It must do more than enforce the immediately evident principles of the natural law about which there is a general consensus. The law has an educative as well as a coercive function. The law cannot escape the perplexing task of advancing from the immediately evident and universally conceded principles of morality to the derivative principles that depend upon mediate and empirical evidence. Law is a practical and progressive science. It must specify and apply particular principles of morality by enacting specific and particular rules and standards that do not bask in the sunlight of universal agreement. The law is frequently relegated to the dimmer light of argument and controversy; sometimes, unfortunately, to the semidarkness of strident partisanship and bitter emotionalism. In light or in darkness, the law must relentlessly express, as best it can, the public morality and the common good of society. Moral sensitivity must characterize public opinion, objectivity must prevail in the legislative process, and scholarly wisdom in the judicial process.

Public Morality. Fundamental to the concept and purpose of civil law is the fact that legality and morality, while interrelated and interdependent, are not identical. Their respective fields overlap, but they are not coextensive. Many crimes are sins, and many sins are crimes, but crime and sin are not the same thing. Certain crimes, such as the so-called public-welfare offenses that are penalized as overt acts regardless of the mental state, can be committed without sin; certain sins, such as simple lying or solitary masturbation, can be committed without crime. But lying that involves fraud or libel or masturbation that involves public indecency are both sins and crimes. They are sins because they are immoral. They are crimes because they offend that aspect of the common good of civil society that is properly called public morality. It is not the purpose or function of civil law to prohibit or penalize an immoral act simply because it is immoral. The end or purpose of civil law is the public or common good of civil society. In the field of morals, therefore, the scope of civil law is not the area of purely private morality, but of public morality.

It is not easy to delineate with precision the specific fields of public and private morality. It is difficult to draw a sharp line that will clearly and satisfactorily distinguish those moral actions that properly fall within the legislative competence of the state and those that are properly beyond it. In such a task reasonable men may differ, and their opinions may vary from time to time and from culture to culture. The distinction is certainly not the difference between publicity and secrecy. The publicized lie is not a crime. The secret murder is. The distinction is between those actions that primarily concern the actor as an individual, and those actions that concern the neighbor or the community in such a way as to affect substantially the common good of civil society.

The field of public morality is by no means confined to criminal law; it embraces also the areas of civil law, such as contracts, torts, property, equity, commercial and industrial rights, and especially constitutional law. It is helpful for understanding of public morality to consider a number of obviously immoral actions punished as crimes by mature and civilized states.

Murder, manslaughter, rape, mayhem, assault and battery violate the personal rights of others to life and bodily integrity; kidnapping and false imprisonment violate the personal rights of others to liberty and locomotion; robbery, larceny, embezzlement, and false pretenses violate the personal rights of others to property; arson and burglary violate the personal rights of others to habitation and enclosure; libel violates the personal rights of others to reputation; bribery and perjury pervert the administration of justice and obstruct the preservation of liberty; commercialized vice corrupts the citizenry and offends the public decency; riots disrupt the public peace and order; treason invades the security of law itself. All the above rights and values are essential to a just and ordered liberty, that is, to the common good of organized civil society. All immoral actions, therefore, that militate against such rights and values are in the field of public morality and properly subject to state legislative power.

Private Morality. It is a misleading half-truth to say that the state cannot legislate morality. Every state can, should, and does in fact legislate in the field of public morality. Society could not exist without such legislation. The whole of American law is witness to the fact. But the state should not, and usually cannot, legislate in the field of purely private morality.

Purely internal acts of virtue and of vice constitute a large part of the field of morality, of the good or evil human life, but the state is utterly incompetent to legislate concerning purely internal acts of virtue or of vice and seldom attempts it. Moreover, apart from purely internal acts, the state should not attempt to legislate concerning those overt acts that are in the field of purely private morality. The nature of the state indicates that its legislative competence extends only to that part of morality that affects the common good of civil society and that is properly called public morality. In view of this limitation, and in this sense only, it may be said that it is not the state's business to legislate morality.

The stability of the marriage bond, many rights and obligations of the married, the care of legitimate and illegitimate children, the rights of the unborn, the protection of youth from corruption, the prevention of sexual promiscuity and venereal disease, the curtailing of alcoholism and drug addiction, the safeguarding of the poor from fleecing by gambling syndicates, and the general condition of fundamental socio-moral standards are matters that clearly affect the public or common good of society. For that reason they are properly within the scope of civil law and public policy.

Nevertheless the American states differ substantially in their laws and public policies concerning marriage, divorce, separation, abortion, adoption, adultery, fornication, prostitution, homosexuality, contraception, gambling, alcohol, narcotics, capital punishment, etc. It is submitted that these differences reflect disagreement on one or more of the following three questions: whether the given activity is immoral; if immoral, whether it is in the field of private or public morality; if in the field of public morality, whether this or that public policy is the proper or prudential way to handle the immoral activity.

Inalienable Human Rights. The philosophy of the natural law postulates a number of fundamental human rights and obligations that are absolute and inalienable and that must be protected by civil law. Among such rights are those to life, worship, marriage, property, labor, speech, locomotion, assembly, and reputation. The “absolute” character of such rights creates a difficulty for those who do not understand natural-law philosophy.

Such rights are absolute in the sense that they derive from human nature. They are not mere gifts from the state. The state is bound to protect them and cannot destroy them even though, at times, states have physically prevented their exercise. Legalized human slavery prevented the exercise of these fundamental human rights, but it did not destroy the rights themselves.

Limited. Fundamental human rights are not absolute in the sense that they are unlimited in scope. It is commonplace in the philosophy of natural law that human rights, even the most fundamental, are limited. They are limited in the sense that they are subject to specification, qualification, expansion and contraction, and even forfeiture of exercise, as the equal rights of others and the requirements of the common good reasonably indicate.

Some typical limitations upon the scope of the fundamental human rights enumerated above are as follows. Life may be forfeited upon just conviction of a capital crime (see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT). The right to it is qualified by the right of others to legitimate self-defense, is subject to the right of the state to reasonable prevention of crime, and may be endangered in the waging of a just WAR. The right to worship may be qualified by reasonable restrictions as to time, place, and circumstance; and hence, e.g., prayer meetings may be prohibited at high noon in the middle of Times Square. That to marriage may be specified and qualified by reasonable restrictions as to age and consanguinity—but not by so-called miscegenation statutes that conflict with the essential right. The right to property may be qualified, contracted, or expanded, by reasonable zoning laws, antitrust legislation, wage and hour and safety regulations. The right to labor may be specified and qualified by reasonable licensing requirements, sanitary regulations, wage and hour and safety regulations. Speech may be restricted by reasonable laws concerning incitement to crime, libel and slander, obscenity, and the divulgence of information to the enemy in time of war. Locomotion may be qualified by reasonable passport rules and immigration laws. The right of assembly may be qualified by reasonable requirements in the interest of public health, safety, and order. The right to reputation may be qualified by reasonable laws requiring testimony in public trials, allowing fair comment on public affairs and officials, requiring the disclosure or reporting of embarrassing contagious diseases. These are simply random examples of typical limitations upon the scope of a few obvious, natural and inalienable rights. All such rights are subject to similar limitations.

If the scope of natural rights were subject to unreasonable or arbitrary limitation, either by the fiat of a dictator or a democratic majority vote, then they would be subject to simple extinction and could not be said to be absolute. If, however, the scope of natural rights is subject only to reasonable limitation for the sake of the common good, then indeed they are not subject to simple extinction and can properly be said to be absolute. Reasonable limitation of scope is a proper condition of natural and inalienable rights.

The human person, in his essential nature, is not merely an individual being. He is also a social being living with his fellows in an organized society that is subject to political, economic, technological, and social change. His natural rights—and corresponding obligations to respect the natural rights of others—are both individual and social. To consider him solely as an individual would lead to anarchy. To consider him solely as a social unit would lead to totalitarianism. But his individual-social nature, adequately considered, leads inevitably to the conclusion that his natural rights are absolute, in the sense explained, because he is an individual for whose rights good governments are instituted. Reasonable reflection leads also to the compatible conclusion that his natural rights are limited in scope, in the sense explained, because he is also a social person obliged by nature to contribute to the common good of human society.

Immutable. Confusion is created also by the universal and immutable character of fundamental principles of natural law. Such principles are as universal and immutable as the human nature from which they are derived. When properly understood, they suffer no exceptions.

The four monosyllables, “Thou shalt not kill,” are sometimes used to express a fundamental secondary principle of the natural law. If these four words were to be taken in simplistic literalness, they would not indicate a universal and immutable principle, because there are circumstances in which killing is obviously permissible.

The quoted words merely indicate the natural law principle that is adequately expressed as, “Thou shalt not kill or inflict bodily harm upon any human being unjustly.” This principle is universal and immutable. In its negative aspect, it prohibits the immoral killing or inflicting of bodily harm upon self or other human beings. In its positive aspect, it commands a reasonable preservation of life and bodily integrity. Therefore, acts of legitimate self-defense, defense of others, warfare, executions for crime, corporal punishment, surgery, vaccination, anesthesia, and strenuous sports are relevant to the principle if they are justifiable.

The justification of such acts will depend upon the norm of morality, i.e., conformity with or difformity from human nature individually and socially considered, upon the nature of the act, the circumstances of the action, and the motives of the actor. But the principle “Thou shalt not kill or inflict bodily harm upon any human being unjustly” remains universal and immutable.

This is not to say that the determination of such moral and legal justification is automatic or without difficulty. A particular question of the justifiability of self-defense may be extremely difficult in regard to both morals and law, without the slightest doubt being cast upon the universality or immutability of the principle. The solution of such problems gives rise to the sciences of morality and lawmaking.

A principle of morality or of law is not without value because its application to particular cases is difficult. The American constitutional phrase “due process of law” indicates a legal principle (declaring and enforcing a principle of natural law) that has taxed the judicial mind for centuries. And the development of the legal concept of due process of law has occasioned influences of natural law on jurisprudence. The natural law, which says that a human being may not be deprived of his life unjustly, is recognized and enforced by the civil law, which says that a human being may not be deprived of his life without due process of law. In close cases, moralists and legalists of reasonable but finite mentalities may differ about the application of justice and due process. General principles alone do not decide particular cases; but particular cases cannot be decided without them.

Conclusion. Difficulty is sometimes engendered by a failure to distinguish between a principle of the natural law and a rule of the civil law. The former is universal and immutable, the latter is not. A principle of natural law can be known by man, because he can know his nature and essential relationships; but a principle of the natural law cannot be made, changed, or destroyed by man because he cannot make, change, or destroy his essential nature. Conversely a rule of the civil law must be made and may be amended or repealed by man’s legislative or judicial process. Thus a rule of the civil law lacks the universality and immutability of a principle of the natural law. This is the precise reason why rules of civil law, as they are enacted, amended, and formulated from time to time and from circumstance to circumstance, should always be consonant with the principles of natural law. It is why the natural law constitutes the general norm to measure the justice or injustice of civil law.

Among the changeable and changing rules of civil law are: the rule of consideration in contracts, the rule of hearsay in evidence, the rule of recording in property, the rule of witnesses in wills, the rule of strict liability in torts, the rule of “retreating to the wall” in crimes, and hundreds of others, from the rules governing statutes of limitations to traffic rules and minor procedural regulations. As rules, they have a certain generality, but they are subject to exceptions, and they require change, gradual or drastic, as time, circumstance, and wisdom demand. They are practical and subsidiary means whereby the civil law, more or less efficiently, applies the principles of the natural law to human beings living in the constantly changing political, economic, technological, and social conditions of civil society.

Three factors have contributed to the confusion and misunderstanding concerning the impact of natural law upon civil law. First, the misuse of natural law terminology, in the 19th and early 20th centuries, in support of laissez-faire rugged individualism—seen in many old Supreme Court decisions that piously exalted property and contractual rights to the detriment of other basic human rights and the genuine needs of the COMMON GOOD. Second, the lack of familiarity of members of the legal profession with the writings of the natural law philosophers and reliance upon secondary, unscholarly sources of information. Third, an unfortunate propensity, on the part of enthusiasts of natural law, to claim too much for their philosophy. The naive proposition “All we have to do to solve our practical problems is to apply natural law” is similar to the false panacea “All we have to do is to apply the Constitution.”

The natural law itself is inadequate to solve the complex problems of a dynamic human society. It requires implementation by civil law; and such implementation involves not merely argumentation and research, but validation even by trial and error. The search is for the best civil laws to act for the personal and the common good.

NATURAL LAW IN POLITICAL THOUGHT

NATURAL LAW has been a perennial theme for political philosophers; and even in mid-20th century, after 150 years of critical analysis, it retains an interest and vitality. The concept of natural law originated in the classical period, reached its highest development in late medieval and early modern times, and continues to be significant, especially in legal theory and in the ideology of Christian democracy and other movements of Catholic inspiration. In the course of 2,500 years, the appeal to certain fixed universal principles that can be perceived in NATURE and in human nature has taken a variety of forms and served a number of functions; but as long as men have sought justifications for the political order beyond those of tradition and revelation, the appeal to nature and natural law has remained an element in political thought (see STATE).

Classical Period. It was the breakdown of the traditional order in the period following the Persian Wars and the immediate confrontation of widely varying political systems that first gave rise to the appeal to nature in ancient Greece. In the search for an ethical and legal standard, the participants in the political discussions of 5th-century Athens made use of the concept of nature (physis) that had been used in earlier scientific speculation to explain the ultimate constituent elements of the universe. In Thucydides's history of the Peloponnesian Wars and in the opening pages of Plato's Republic, there are images of the then current Sophist doctrine that by a natural law the strong do and should rule the weak. Surviving fragments of Sophist writings also indicate that some argued that all men were equal by nature and that social as well as moral distinctions were purely conventional. In his Republic PLATO attempted to respond to both these criticisms, arguing for a natural order of reason over the passions in the individual and of the more rational over the less intelligent in society. ARISTOTLE based his defense of slavery on a natural inequality among men and appealed to the nature of man as the basis for government and private property. Equally important for the history of the theory was Aristotle's teleological method, his attribution of an inherent purposiveness and intelligibility to nature. Yet neither Plato nor Aristotle developed a full-fledged natural law theory as such. For Plato law was associated with the rigid and inadequate legal rules of the contemporary Greek city-state; it appeared to be a second-best compromise when the rule of the wise could not be assured. In his Nicomachean Ethics Aristotle wrote of a natural justice invariable among gods but variable among men (1134b); in the Politics he described law as "reason free from passion" (1287a), and in the Rhetoric he alluded to a universal or common law "in accordance with nature" (1373b). Yet it is only in the writings of the Stoics that the term "law of nature" was used, and a systematic theory of a higher law based on nature developed.

Emerging in Greece after the breakdown of the Greek city-state and the triumph of the Macedonian Empire, STOICISM became the dominant philosophy of the ruling classes of the Roman Empire and profoundly influenced the formulation of ROMAN LAW. According to Stoic thought man participated in divine Reason, which permeated the universe; and it was in the common possession of reason, considered both as a moral and intellectual faculty, that all men were equal by nature. Stoic thought on natural law thus departed in theory from the elitism of Plato and Aristotle, although in practice CICERO, whose De republica and De legibus are the principal sources for Stoic natural law theories, rejected democracy and argued for the rule of a rational elite. A similar hesitancy to apply the practical consequences of the theory characterized the attitude of Cicero and the Roman lawyers toward a possible conflict between the natural law and existing legal institutions, such as slavery, that were viewed as contrary to the natural equality of all mankind.

Christian Development. Christianity gave a different basis to the doctrine of equality—the moral responsibility of every man to God—and a different appeal as the basis of political legitimacy—the will of God. Christianity had a higher law, but it was not the law of nature; it was that of divine revelation (see REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF). The early Christian attitude toward nature was ambiguous. On the one hand, nature (and especially human nature) had been corrupted by ORIGINAL SIN. The pagan philosophers without the guidance of revelation were steeped in sin, which would adversely affect their ability to attain moral truth. As Tertullian put it, "not Athens, but Jerusalem" (De praescriptione haereticorum, ch. 7). On the other hand, nature was created by God, who as a purposive and intelligent Being had established an ordered universe. Moreover, St. Paul, who was familiar with Stoic thought, had written, "When the Gentiles who have no law do by nature what the Law prescribes, these having no law are a law unto themselves. They show the work of the Law written in their hearts" (Rom 2.14–15).

In their confrontation with classical culture, the Fathers of the Church ultimately adopted the latter attitude and incorporated the natural-law doctrine as part of the Christian tradition. St. AUGUSTINE himself, despite his emphasis on the opposition of nature and grace, often referred to the natural law in his writings. However, the Stoic teaching about the original equality of all men received a different formulation in Christian teaching. The Fathers saw equality as the condition in the Garden of Eden and attributed all forms of domination and government, property, and slavery to man's fall from grace. As this instance demonstrates, the relation of natural law to revelation was not clear in early Christian writings; and as late as the writings of the canon lawyers of the 12th and 13th centuries, the natural and the divine law tended to be equated.

It was the genius of St. THOMAS AQUINAS in the 13th century to distinguish divine law, in the sense of revelation, from natural law, in the sense of those moral imperatives that man can perceive with his reason in an ordered universe created by God. Aquinas drew on Aristotle to affirm the natural character of government and to relate Aristotelian teleology to the natural law in a hierarchy of ends and inclinations in human nature corresponding to the principal precepts of the natural law. In a famous passage (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2) he described these as existence; self-preservation; the family; and education, society, and (natural) religion.

The appeal to the natural law had more force in the Middle Ages when it was associated directly with God's will than in Roman times when it was simply a philosophical theory. Yet despite Aquinas's argument that human laws contrary to natural law are null and void (ST 1a2ae, 95.2.), it was not widely used for the purpose of invalidating existing laws or practices. Laws were sometimes opposed by referring to natural and divine law (retaining the canonist confusion of the two), but the most common appeals were to the positive law of the Church or to traditional feudal rights. The natural law decreed human equality, but there was no demand for the abolition of slavery; and the belief in a hierarchical universe, derived ultimately from Neoplatonist sources, tended to justify a hierarchical social order as a part of the nature of things. Yet in the late Middle Ages the doctrine of the original natural equality of all mankind was also cited to reinforce the development of representative institutions in both Church and State, and appeals were made in both canon and civil law to the principle that all those affected by governmental decisions have a natural-law right to give their consent, either through representatives or (more often) tacitly.

Modern Period. Aquinas had asserted the limits of human reason and the importance of the divine law as a guide and a supplement to the natural law; but at the same time, in emphasizing the rational character of the moral law and the powers of the human reason to attain truth, he had helped to lay open the possibility of the assertion of a naturalist and rationalist morality without recourse to revelation, or for that matter, to God. The late scholastics had asked whether the natural law was so firmly based in reason that even God himself could not change it, and GROTIUS (1583–1645), the first of the modern theorists of international law, argued in 1625 that the natural law would still exist “even if we should concede that which cannot be conceded without the utmost wickedness, that there is no God” (De Jure Belli ac Pacis, prolegomena). Although one can exaggerate the secularism of early modern theories of natural law, there is no doubt that the medieval link between the natural and the divine law was broken once there was disagreement after the Reformation as to the content of revelation. In fact, it appeared for a time that the reformers' suspicion of reason and the natural man would end all reference to the natural law by Christian writers. However, the need for a common standard in a religiously divided Christendom compelled those who wrote works of political theory to appeal to it and to develop theories as to its origin and content that were less specifically religious than those of the Middle Ages.

In the works of Thomas HOBBS (1588–1679) the term natural law was used to describe a set of maxims for self-preservation, and a hypothetical state of nature replaced the Judeo-Christian Garden of Eden. God entered only as the enforcing sovereign of revealed law, not as the eternal reason of Thomism. John LOCKE (1632–1704) borrowed the state of nature from Hobbes, but combined it with a theory of natural law that was derived from St. Thomas by way of the Anglican divine Thomas HOOKER (1553–1600). Although there are problems in relating Locke's theory of natural law to the empiricism of his Essay Concerning Human Understanding, the recent discovery of a manuscript copy of his Essays on the Law of Nature makes it clear that his theory of natural law was more traditional than Hobbesian. A novel element, however, was his strong emphasis on the right of private property as decreed by the natural law.

In the 17th-century theories, the natural law served the important function of providing a ground for legitimacy in a political theory. For Grotius the requirements of the social nature of man were the source of the binding force of international law. For Hobbes, man's drive to preserve himself made obedience to the sovereign a moral obligation. For Locke, the natural rights of man provided the basis for consent to government and the limits upon the exercise of power. In all three cases, too, the natural law was seen as prescribing a fundamental equality among men that was not simply a characteristic of some earlier lost state—although in Hobbes's theory, this equality was more physical than moral. In the same century, new scientific advances undermined whatever arguments for hierarchy could be drawn from analogy to the structure of the universe. Natural law arguments were drawn from human nature, not from nature in general.

It was as a theory of consent and equality that natural law, as transformed by Locke into natural rights, achieved its most widespread acceptance in the 18th century. In the Declaration of Independence (1776) and the Declaration of the Rights of Man (1789), it became a central feature of the ideologies of the American and French Revolutions; and subsequently it provided the intellectual background for the early court decisions that established the American doctrine of judicial review.

Yet at the very time that it attained its greatest influence the theory of the law of nature was subjected to a series of attacks that led to a rapid decline in its influence. In England David HUME (1711–76) in his Treatise of Human Nature (1740) took issue with the notion that any values could be derived from the facts of nature or human nature, while the utilitarians such as Jeremy BENTHAM (1748–1832) argued that moral and legal principles were better derived from their effects on society than from anything inherent in nature. On the Continent, Immanuel KANT (1724–1804) posited a sharp dichotomy between the facts of nature and the realm of moral obligation, and attempted to draw conclusions about law and morality from the nature of legal and moral obligation rather than from the nature of man. In the 19th century, the positivists attempted to separate legality and morality to the detriment of natural-law theory, which had considered them as closely related (see POSITIVISM IN JURISPRUDENCE). The theory of evolution and new anthropological research also revealed that the nature of man was not as fixed and unchanging as the defenders of natural law had assumed. By the end of the 19th century, the only political theory that made use of natural law was that contained in the papal social and political encyclicals, which continued to speak in terms of Thomistic natural-law theory (see SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL).

Natural Law Revival. In the 20th century, particularly since the 1930s, there has been a marked revival of interest in natural law as it relates to political theory. A variety of different factors account for this. The excesses of the Nazi regime suggested the need for a higher standard beyond that of the positive law, and after World War II the UN Declaration of Human Rights was justified by some as an attempt to set down natural law obligations binding on governments. The neo-Thomist revival, and especially the writings of Jacques MARITAIN (1882–1973), modernized the theory of Aquinas and placed greater emphasis on the development in history of new insights into the implications of the natural law, thus partially coming to terms with the evolutionist critique. In terms of practical effect, the most important development was the organization of Christian Democratic parties in Europe and more recently in Latin America, whose programs are couched in natural-law terms borrowed from the papal encyclicals and the writings of Maritain. Proposals such as family allowances, worker participation in management, guarantees of the right to organize trade unions, and, more recently, religious freedom and a nuclear test ban treaty have been advocated as conclusions from the natural law. In the area of personal morality with implications for public policy, artificial birth control, sterilization, and divorce have been opposed as prohibited by the same law. Among the areas currently in dispute among natural-law theorists of Thomist inspiration are the extent of the limits on property rights that may be imposed by the state, and the morality of nuclear warfare.

Aside from legal theorists, there are few non-Thomist political philosophers who use the vocabulary of natural law. Yet much of the writing about politics and morals is based on an implicit or explicit conception of the nature of man and the prerequisites for the full expression of human potentialities. To speak about the dignity of man or the necessity of human freedom is to assert a goal for society and the political order that is related to certain universal and constant values inherent in the nature of man. That these moral and legal conceptions vary in different societies proves only that the perception and application of these goals and the choice among them in the common situation of conflict of one with another remains difficult. Ultimately the problem remains the one that puzzled the Greeks: how to find the one in the many, a constant principle in a world of change, a measure that is neither too rigid nor too vague to provide a standard for positive law and government and a basis for political obligation. The answer that the Greeks first conceived—a law of nature—continues to appeal to political theorists, among them many who are not aware of the type of argument they are using.

NATURAL ORDER

The terms natural and natural order have been used extensively in modern theology to distinguish as sharply as possible what is meant by supernatural and supernat-ural order. While this contrast and correlation has had a long history in Catholic theology, its modern usage and emphasis appear to stem from the middle of the 19th century. Confronted with the spread of philosophical naturalism as well as various theories of natural religion, the theologians began to make the notion of the supernatural a fundamental category of systematic theology. As used in this context the notions natural and natural order serve to underline clearly the transcendent character of the divine order and the gratuitous character of the order of grace, which they incorporate into the notion of the absolute supernatural. The natural order, therefore, would be defined as a created order in which man would be directed to an end or destiny that is strictly proportionate to his capacities, powers, and exigencies. This end would be God as known through reason. In contrast the absolutely supernatural would be that which completely transcends the capacities, powers, and exigencies of created or creatable nature. The notion of the natural order played a very important role in the systematic treatment of such areas as apologetics, revelation, and grace. It enabled the theologian to bring out clearly the transcendence of the divine order and the gratuity of man's call to the beatific vision as well as his elevation by God's grace.

In recent years, however, there has been considerable questioning and debate over the exact content of this theological notion of natural as contrasted with supernatural. The basis of the criticism lies in the fact that the usage is built upon a more precise, specific, and detailed definition of natural than is legitimately possible. It is argued that historical man is a reality whose total actual nature can be known only through revelation. Revelation helps us to discern some elements proper to the natural order. Rational analysis discloses other elements. Hence while nature and grace are clearly distinct, nothing can be defined in such specific detail that a kind of clear and proven horizontal line could be drawn between the natural and the supernatural.

The theological opinion that gave rise to this critique began with the fact that God has called historical man to the BEATIFIC VISION. From this fact it is argued that this divinely given vocation is not something merely logical awaiting some future actualization. Rather it is a fact; it is real and must have an impact on man that influences the very structure of his nature. Hence the supernatural, while gratuitous, is rooted in man from the very beginning of his existence. By reason of this he has a tendency to the beatific vision and a resonance of it in his very being. It is this situation that Karl RAHNER describes as "the SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL." If, therefore, the supernatural is already present in man in the sense described, there is no element of his nature that is not in some way touched by it. Hence the difficulty or even impossibility of saying what precisely is natural and so belongs to the natural order. In all this it should be noted that the protagonists of this position do not reject the possibility that God could create intelligent beings and not call them to the beatific vision.

NATURALISM

A movement within American philosophy affirming that nature is the whole of reality; that man has his origin growth, and decay within nature; and that nature—defined as that which is amenable to scientific investigation—is self-explanatory. The term is used also (1) for an ethical doctrine teaching that MORALITY consists in living according to nature or to biological impulse; (2) for the aesthetic doctrine holding that art must imitate nature (see AESTHETICS); and (3) for the religious belief that identifies nature with the Godhead (see PANTHEISM). This article is concerned with the philosophical position known as American naturalism, treating of its history and its salient characteristics, and concluding with a critique from the viewpoint of theistic realism.

History. As a philosophical attitude, naturalism is not indigenous to America. Its European roots are evident in British EMPIRICISM and in the POSITIVISM and sociology of August COMTE and Ernst Mach. Nowhere but in the United States, however, has the term naturalism been commonly used to designate a particular set of philosophical views. Yet naturalism arrived relatively late on the American scene. It arose as an alternative to the IDEALISM dominant in American thought during the last quarter of the 19th century and influential during the first two decades of the 30th. By the 1930s, naturalism had clearly replaced idealism as the predominant trend in American philosophical thinking.

The first major expression of the naturalistic temper in the United States is to be found in the Life of Reason (5 v., New York 1905–06) of George SANTAYANA. Other systematic expressions are subsequently to be found in Roy Wood Sellars' Evolutionary Naturalism (Chicago 1921), Frederick J. E. Woodbridge's Nature and Mind (New York 1937), and James B. Pratt's Naturalism (New York 1938). Contributions that also must be mentioned are those of Morris R. Cohen (Reason and Nature, New York 1931), Clarence I. Lewis (Mind and World Order, New York 1929), and William P. Montague (The Ways of Things, New York 1940).

Of American naturalists, however, John Dewey is the most important, not only because of his significant contribution to the doctrinal development of naturalism but also because through him naturalism has come to exert a strong influence on public education and consequently on the American mind generally. The history of American naturalism is strikingly reflected in Dewey's own intellectual development as he moved from an early defense of idealism, confident that the new discoveries in biology and psychology could be incorporated into an idealistic framework, to an outright naturalism, presented as the only outlook compatible with the modern scientific world view. The mature naturalism of Dewey not only is apparent in his later works such as Experience and Nature (Chicago 1925) and The Quest for Certainty (New York 1929), but it is reflected also in the writings of his disciples, particularly in the articles of his co-contributors to the platform volumes, American Philosophy Today and Tomorrow (ed. H. M. Kallen and S. Hook, New York 1935) and Naturalism and the Human Spirit (ed. Y. H. Krikorian, New York 1944). Many of the contributors to these two volumes subsequently developed themes first presented there. Although American naturalism is not to be identified with the authors represented in these symposia, it is evident that they well represent this tendency in 20th-century American thought. Of the contributors to these volumes, three of Dewey's disciples may be singled out as representative of the naturalistic interest and temperament, viz, S. Hook, E. Nagel, and J. H. Randall, Jr.

Sidney Hook (1902–1989), long associated with the Washington Square College of New York University, wrote extensively on social questions. His works include: John Dewey: An Intellectual Portrait (New York 1939), Reason, Social Myths, and Democracy (New York 1940), Education for Modern Man (New York 1950), and The Quest for Being (New York 1961). Ernest Nagel (1901–1985), who taught at Columbia University after 1930, wrote principally in the philosophy of science and did much to refine the naturalist's concept of science. His important works are: Sovereign Reason (New York 1954), Logic without Metaphysics (New York 1957), The Structure of Science (New York 1961). John Herman Randall, Jr. (1899–1980), lectured at Columbia after 1925. Randall was notably influenced by Woodbridge as well as by Dewey. A historian of philosophy and perhaps more metaphysically inclined than most naturalists, Randall's major contributions to naturalism are his volumes Nature and Historical Experience (New York 1958) and The Role of Knowledge in Western Religion (Boston 1958).

At the beginning of the 21st century the naturalistic temperament dominates the American academic scene, representing an unchallenged view of reality. Few philosophers may call themselves "naturalist" or publish works with that term in the title. The idealism to which it was counterpoised in the early decades of the 20th century has long ago disappeared. Most in the naturalistic tradition adhere to a materialism in the order of being and to an agnosticism with respect to the existence of God. Two prominent American philosophers in the tradition of Dewey may be taken as representative of the naturalism of a previous generation: John Rawls (1921—) and Richard Rorty (1931—). Rawl's A Theory of Justice (1971) is mandatory reading for graduate students in philosophy, not only in America but also in Europe. Rorty's Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979) has been influential in literary as well as philosophical circles, advancing a subjectivism that denies that truth can be achieved.

Characteristics. The principal notions that underlie naturalism may be explained by sketching its characteristic teachings, i.e., its method, epistemology, anthropology, pragmatism, empiricism, ethics, and philosophy of value.

Method. Most of the proponents of naturalism present it as a tendency, an outlook, or a frame of mind, rather than as a system. Two basic theses underlie all naturalistic investigation. The first affirms that whatever happens in nature is dependent in some fundamental way on the organization of bodies located in space and time, and the second insists that the "scientific method" is the only means of obtaining reliable knowledge. Naturalists, on the whole, are found to be rather ambiguous in stating the nature of scientific method, but most would admit of its analogical predication. In a broad sense, scientific method is regarded as nothing more than the use of "critical intelligence." Hence the disciplines of sociology and economics, as well as history in some of its phases, are regarded by the naturalist as genuinely scientific.

Epistemology. Epistemologically the naturalist must be considered to be a realist, in the sense that he holds that the objects of knowledge are extramental and that they exist as they are perceived to be, although nominalistic and Kantian tendencies can at times be discerned in some naturalists. Metaphysically, the naturalist presents himself as antidualistic, objecting to the distinctions between the natural and supernatural, between man and nature, mind and body, and appearance and reality. He will accept the designation "materialist" if he is allowed to distinguish between reductive materialism and his own. Reductive materialism, or naturalism, affirms merely that every mental event is contingent upon the organization of certain physical events. The naturalist is careful to avoid suggesting that an idea is nothing but "a potential or tentative muscular response" or that pain and the occurrence of physiological manifestations is a contingent or causal one. As to the existence of God, immortality, separated souls or spirits, cosmic purpose or design, these are denied by the naturalist "for the same generic reasons that he denies the existence of fairies, elves, leprechauns, and an invisible satellite revolving between earth and moon." There is no evidence for any of them.

Anthropology. As to his teaching on man, the naturalist grants that man is unique among animals in ability and accomplishment but denies that he occupies a special place in nature. Between man and his animal ancestors there is only a difference of degree, not one of kind. Consciousness, like the other phenomena, can be described empirically, at least in its effects, and accounted for in terms of matter and the organization of matter. Presupposed by the naturalist is a theory of biological evolution according to which nature in its evolutionary process regularly gives rise to operations and functions on newer and higher levels. Consciousness and thought are regarded as two such higher operations. They have their sole cause in the organism in which they appear. Admittedly, thought and consciousness are distinct from any previous products of an evolving nature, but the factors from which they arose are no different, except for their particular organization, from the factors whence physical, chemical, and biological processes arose.

Pragmatism. By temperament the naturalist is oriented toward the practical. With the pragmatist he agrees that knowledge, if it is to be considered meaningful, must have practical consequences. But whereas C. S. PEIRCE and W. James would be reluctant to identify pragmatism with any one method, the naturalist, particularly in the INSTRUMENTALISM of John Dewey, identifies experimental science as the perfect example of the intimate connection between theory and practice, between knowing and doing. For the naturalist, mind or intelligence exists as a problem-solving power, and this function is regarded as more important than its theoretical employment. Science, insofar as it is the most perfect form of intelligence, takes on the status of instrument par excellence.

Concerned with the application of critical intelligence to the social, political, and economic problems of the times, the naturalist is contemptuous of fixed codes theologically or philosophically derived. He regards religion and traditional philosophy as impediments rather than as aids to social progress. Although he looks upon belief in God as a dangerous drain on social energies, he does not deny a certain sociological value to religion. But he does deny that it produces knowledge that can be subjected to rigorous criticism. What is valuable in religious witness, the naturalist asserts, can be derived from other sources.

Empiricism. Although the naturalist by disposition eschews systems, he has nevertheless, by adopting an empiricist attitude toward the problems of substance, efficient causality, and final causality, produced a consistent metaphysics with consequences in the moral and civic orders. By defining substance as a logical category, as that segment of the process called reality upon which man chooses to fasten his attention, and by adopting D. Hume's analysis of causality, the naturalist has ruled out the question of the origin of the universe. Because situations are always encountered as particular, concrete, and determinable, one can never experience anything that might be called "the Universe." The Universe, or Nature, has no meaning except in the sense that it might be considered a locus for all processes. The meaning of any process, according to the naturalist, is the way it functions in its context. Now what has no context can have no function and hence no meaning. The Universe has no discoverable context, since one experiences it neither as a whole nor as coming to be. Hence the question of its origin is a meaningless question.

Ethics. The implications for ethics are apparent. Since, according to the naturalist, there is no transcendent end for man, values must be found within the social context. As Krikorian has written, "the source of motivation for humanity must be found within the natural setting of its existence . . . rather than in something which is neither verifiable nor approachable." Values are relative because the most one can determine is "how best" he can do something under a particular set of circumstances. What is best absolutely is beyond one's knowledge. Man cannot determine what is best in the ultimate context, because the ultimate context is beyond discovery. Hence the good of a situation has to be determined on the basis of the defeat to be rectified. Each situation will give rise to its own good. There will be no fixed absolutes as the supernaturalist would suppose. The imposition of fixed or transcendent ends is simply a sign of an emotional grappling for certainty where certainty is impossible.

Values. In the realm of values the naturalist has been primarily a philosopher of ethics or an epistemologist, rather than a moral philosopher in the traditional sense. His concern has been with the question of how values ought to be determined. Although all naturalists are agreed that scientific procedure ought to be employed in ethics, there is no general agreement as to what constitutes scientific procedure. The naturalist recognizes that normative propositions cannot be determined by the same procedure employed in verifying questions of fact. He admits also that the use of data derived from the physical and behavioral sciences does not constitute an ethics as scientific. Most naturalists find the problem of how to determine values scientifically a particularly vexing one. Confronted with the problem, many fall back on custom or inclination as a guide in determining what is morally best or resort to some form of utilitarianism. But most naturalist admit that custom or inclination is not a sure guide; the whole point of the naturalist's concern with morals has been to get away from subjectivism. Utilitarianism is likewise found unsatisfactory, because it begs the question as to which of the ends and relationships human beings naturally cherish, or which of the values they normally institute, are desirable in the long run; it also fails to take into account the empirically discernible fact that man acts out of motives of duty. Admittedly naturalistic ethics is incomplete.

Critique. In evaluating the work of the American naturalist, the validity of many of his insights must be acknowledged: for example, his insistence on starting with experience, his interest in social and political questions, his concerns for an enlightened and critical morality, his emphasis on clarity and the useful function that linguistic analysis can perform in achieving clarity, and his demand that the philosopher shun any special witness, such as that which might be provided by intuition or religious faith. The naturalist's attack on idealism, his repudiation of the Cartesian dichotomy between mind and body, his criticism of some prevailing ethical and religious conceptions of nature are features that are not reserved to naturalism but are part of a common REALISM and can therefore be accepted.

But what cannot be accepted is the naturalist's principal thesis that the boundaries of scientific knowledge are the boundaries of certain knowledge. Nowhere does the scientist himself proclaim that his method is the only one productive of reliable knowledge. Science includes no such treatment of epistemology or values as one finds them in naturalism. The naturalist's defense of his position is not a scientific defense but is based on an appeal to common sense and to the data of history.

The naturalist rightly attempts to rule out anything that has no claim to genuine knowledge, but in doing so he has assumed that philosophy has produced no certain knowledge. Also, he has implicitly denied that there is truth or falsity in philosophical knowledge. Again, the naturalist's employment of history is selective. The history of philosophy is not merely a record of discord. It also discloses amid the diversity of opinion and the prevalence of conflict a core of common philosophical experience that exhibits a remarkable unity. Étienne GILSON has clearly shown in his Unity of Philosophical Experience (New York 1937) that similar approaches to perennial problems yield strikingly similar results. It seems, therefore, that the task of "critical intelligence" is not the wholesale repudiation of philosophy but the sifting of diverse opinions to determine what is valuable in them.

The naturalist's thesis that traditional philosophy and theology, especially during their period of ascendancy in the Middle Ages, have exercised a retarding influence on science is belied by developments in the history of evidence, accumulated since the pioneer work of P. Duhem and L. Thorndike, to show that medieval philosophy and theology, far from impeding the development of science and technology, actually laid the groundwork, through discussions of science and scientific method, for the so-called scientific renaissance of the 17th century. Also indefensible is the assumption that the distinction between God and nature inevitably leads to an antagonism in which man's temporal ends are slighted. Although theism in some of its forms may result in a neglect of temporal values, the history of Christianity, in every age, is replete with examples of concern for specifically human ends (see MAN, NATURAL END OF).

From an epistemological point of view, the naturalist's delimitation of reality to nature is a consequence of an uncritically assumed empiricism. In adopting the empiricist's solution to the problems of SUBSTANCE and CAUSALITY, the naturalist has automatically ruled out the possibility of reasoning to a transcendent cause of nature or of recognizing the spiritual component of man. By following Hume, the naturalist opens himself to the same charges that are brought against that 18th-century philosopher, namely, that in atomizing experience he falsifies the fact that things are not given in isolation but in a dynamic interrelation with other things, both conferring and receiving action. Against the naturalist it can be argued that a respect for the empirical origins of knowledge does not oblige one to turn his back upon the generic traits of existence that can be discovered through reflection and by means of inference. Nor does an acknowledgment of the contingent and novel blind one to the unity and connectedness that also are features of nature. Finally, the naturalist's commitment to empiricism has rendered him impotent in precisely the area I which he has most wanted to succeed, the area of values. Naturalistic ethics as yet remains a program rather than an accomplishment. In a certain sense, this last remark can be made of the whole of naturalism, which in its positive character at times seems to be saying no more than "Let us be scientific!"

NATURE (IN PHILOSOPHY)

From the Latin natura (Gr. φύσις), a term with many related meanings in philosophy and with extensive applications in theology. Among philosophers it is commonly taken to mean the essence of a thing as this is the source of its properties or operations; more strictly, however, it is a primary and per se principle of motion and rest that is found in natural things as opposed to artifacts. It is sometimes used in the more restricted sense of human nature, for which meaning see MAN. Theologians use the term in opposition to grace or to supernature, particularly when discussing human nature, and in opposition to person, particularly in Trinitarian theology and Christology.

Since nature is the proper subject of the PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE, the major emphasis in this article is on nature as studied in natural philosophy. Topics treated include the primary meanings of the concept, its development among the Greeks, modifications in it occasioned by the rise of modern science, an Aristotelian analysis of its meaning in natural philosophy, and various secondary meanings.

Primary Meanings. On Nature (Περὶ φύσεως) is the title under which the writings of the pre-Socratics have been handed down to posterity. Some doubt exists as to what precisely was the first meaning, but it is generally admitted that at least an early and important use of the term φύσις was to designate the primordial stuff or underlying substratum persisting through all CHANGE. It is likely that the early Ionian philosophers imagined the world as developing in an orderly fashion from within, somewhat as a living being, and hence the primary substance would have been viewed, though indistinctly, as a source of activity. Thus φύσις was an intrinsic principle that accounted for the ceaseless change or BECOMING of things. Moreover, the very process of becoming, it seems, was itself called φύσις, a term that is etymologically related to φύω, to grow (cf. Lat. natura and nascor). Finally, at some later date the term was applied to the changing things themselves taken in their totality. This is possibly the most common sense of nature in modern usage and was probably the meaning of φύσις intended in the title Περὶ φύσεως. (For Aristotle's account of the etymology and the meanings of φύσις, see Meta. 1014b 16–1015a 19.)

Greek Development. The attempt of the Ionians of the 6th century B.C. to explain all becoming in terms of one material principle (e.g., water or air or fire) reached its logical conclusion in PARMENIDES with the very denial of nature as process. For Parmenides all being must be one and exclude all nonbeing; as such it is perfectly immutable, and only as such is it knowable; all change is but sensory illusion. After Parmenides, there was an attempt to reconcile BEING, stable object of intellect, with the becoming of sensory experience. Fundamental reality remained immutable; it was, however, multiple: the four elements of EMPEDOCLES; the “seeds,” infinite in number, of ANAXAGORAS; the atoms of Leucippus and DEMOCRITUS. These particles, in motion, combined and separated, and as such were principles of change and of a multiplicity of changing compounds. The atomists, with their homogeneous particles differing only in size and shape, interpreted all change in terms of movement in space (“void”) and all sensible qualities, such as color, in terms of quantitative differences (see ATOMISM). They have been considered as forerunners to modern science. So too have the Pythagoreans, who, from the 6th century B.C., had been seeking to explain the world in the light of numbers.

The claim to find the ultimate explanation of reality in the random motions of corporeal elements, i.e., in nature and chance, was strongly opposed by PLATO. If nature means the primary source of becoming, what is truly nature, for him, could only be what is really first, and that is intelligence and art. Thus, with Plato, nature in the commonly accepted sense gave way to divine soul, and chance to divine direction (Laws 888E–899D). Finality, introduced as conscious design, was lodged in a principle (soul) distinct from the purely corporeal. Likewise, the intelligibility of sensible bodies was to be sought beyond them, in the changeless, purely intelligible Ideas, of which they are imperfect imitations (Phaedo; Rep. 449–540). The order of the sensible world could be seen, too, in terms of the a priori principles of pure number. As for the changing imitations considered in themselves, of these there could be no science, but only a likely account.

Nature was reinstated as a true principle and a real source of explanation within the material universe by ARISTOTLE, who thus restored the philosophy of nature to the rank of a SCIENCE (SCIENTIA). Aristotle continued the naturalist tradition of the pre-Socratics, his science being qualitative rather than mathematical, empirical rather than rationalist. It was far from being a mere return, however. After Plato there was form to be reckoned with. In Aristotle the natural world becomes intelligible in itself only because nature is identified with form in matter—with form now seen as the actuality of matter—even more properly than with matter itself (see MATTER AND FORM). This form becomes the origin of activity, and matter, considered in itself, is reduced to a principle of mere passivity and receptivity. The realization of form in matter is the goal of natural activity, and although there are various combinations and separations of elements, it is always for the sake of a form; hence, the teleological view, as opposed to the mechanistic, remains dominant. But purpose is now found in the unconscious workings of form as well as in the conscious activities of rational soul. Although Aristotle conceived the natural universe as impregnated with and illuminated by form, for the ultimate explanation he too reached beyond nature. It is the desire to imitate the fully actual reality of Pure Form that, in the final analysis, explains all the ceaseless processes of nature.

Later Modifications. Both the Platonist and the Aristotelian view of nature extended into the Middle Ages. The early period was largely Neoplatonist, but in the 13th century the commentaries of St. ALBERT THE GREAT and especially of St. THOMAS AQUINAS brought the Aristotelian doctrine of nature into the foreground.

In the 16th and 17th centuries, the rapid development of the new empirico-mathematical science was accompanied by an emphatic rejection of teleology: the conception of natures tending to ends. At first, change was Platonistically explained by an inherent, creative principle (natura naturans) animating and directing the world of nature (natura naturata)—terms that go back to the Latin translation of AVERROËS. See WORLD SOUL (ANIMA MUNDI). Before long, however, under the influence of F. BACON, J. KEPLER, G. GALILEI, R. DESCARTES, I. Newton, and others, the account became thoroughly mechanistic. With the rejection of the geocentric astronomy and the adoption of the universal law of gravitation, the qualitatively differentiated world of Aristotle gave place to a totally homogeneous universe. Purely qualitative differences, such as color, were considered to be functions of quantitative structure, and were soon dismissed as mere appearances to a sentient mind. Matter as potency was replaced by matter as mass and extension. All change was reduced to the motion of smallest parts in space; all causality, to prior events, i.e., to prior motions, identical causes being followed by identical effects. The spontaneous activity of bodies gave way to the idea of force (impact, attraction) and the impulse toward ends was displaced by inertia, the disposition to remain always the same. Nature thus became, for the scientist and the philosopher of nature alike, a mechanical system of inert, homogeneous mass-bodies, situated in space and time, moved by external forces, and utterly devoid of all but quantitative properties. (See MECHANISM.)

In the 20th century, the adequacy of purely mechanistic principles of explanation has been seriously questioned for the biological and psychological sciences. Further, the scientific theories of evolution along with the physicist's conception of matter as energy have made more generally acceptable a view that was already to some degree in evidence in the philosophies of G. W. LEIBNIZ and G. W. F. HEGEL, viz, the idea of nature as internally active and engaged in process. This conception, to which in some instances has been added the idea of aim, has found philosophical expression in the works of such thinkers as H. BERGSON, S. ALEXANDER, and A. N. WHITEHEAD.

Aristotelian Analysis. A fuller presentation of the Aristotelian concept of nature, which has been generally adopted by scholastic thinkers, entails considering his definition of nature, nature as passive, nature as active, end as nature, and related concepts.

Definition of Nature. Aristotle (Phys. 192b 8–32) reached his definition of nature by way of a comparison of the things that exist by nature (viz, animals and their parts, plants and simple bodies) with those that exist by other causes, in particular by art. The former are seen to have within them a tendency to move, i.e., to change. The artifact as such has no such tendency. It has an inclination to change only accidentally insofar as it is made of a natural substance. Nature, then, concluded Aristotle, is the principle or cause of being moved and being at rest in that in which it is primarily, by reason of itself and not accidentally.

“Being moved” implies passivity. Strictly speaking, the principle that constitutes a thing as a mover is a nature only when the mover by its activity is itself moved. Also, MOTION here includes any kind of corporeal change, accidental or substantial; it excludes, however, spiritual operations, such as intellection. “Rest” implies the attainment of the end to which the movement was directed. The phrase “by reason of itself and not accidentally” excludes such cases as the doctor who cures himself. The art of medicine is, in this case, intrinsic but accidental to the one who is being cured, considered as such.

Nature as Passive. Nature, thus defined, was identified by Aristotle first (Phys. 193a 10–30) with MATTER taken as the substratum of change, i.e., as the passive, potential principle of being moved. In opposition to the Pre-Socratics, Aristotle conceived of the ultimate material principle (primary matter) as being of itself bereft of all form, purely passive, pure potentiality. The matter, however, from which becoming proceeds, taken in its concrete existence, is always determined matter. The substantial form currently possessed, determining the matter in a particular way, always limits and defines matter's immediate potentialities. This is true both for the potency of primary matter for new substantial forms and more obviously for the accidental receptivities characteristic of any given being. Furthermore, since the form already possessed by the matter can be the source of certain activities as well, the matter on which a natural agent operates, just as it is never pure potency, need not be entirely passive. Its activity, in fact, may run contrary to the aim of the agent.

Nature as Active. It is especially with FORM, however, that Aristotle is concerned to identify nature (Phys. 193a 30-b 19). The ancients, not distinguishing the two principles of matter and form, had conceived of their primordial stuff as already determined and capable of activity. Once substantial form is disassociated from matter and recognized as principle of essential determination, source of activity, and end of generation, it becomes obvious that form more than matter deserves to be called nature. Nature, then, as active principle of movement, is substantial form. (Note that, although one says “Nature acts,” strictly speaking it is the composite substance that acts in virtue of its nature.)

Form is the source of two different types of activity in nature. First and more obviously, form is the intrinsic source of the vital activities of the living body. As such, it is known as SOUL. And as such it is a nature, since, by these activities, the living being is itself moved. The soul, in fact, is the primary source of activity whereby one part of the heterogeneous composite moves another part. Moreover, all the vital activities are either movements themselves (e.g., growth) or essentially connected with movements (e.g., sensation) or they pre-suppose movements (e.g., intellection). The soul, however, is also the principle of generation, an activity that is essentially directed to another substance. But even as such, it is a nature, insofar as the movement takes place within the same species, if not within the same individual (Meta. 1032a 15–26).

Second, form is the intrinsic source of the spontaneous activities characteristic of a given body, e.g., a chemical element (Gen. et cor. 323b 2–324b 25). Inanimate bodies, not having differentiated parts, do not move themselves. Their activities, on the contrary, are directed to other bodies that in turn may affect them. The forms, in this case, satisfy the requirement of interiority in the definition of nature insofar as they are parts within a system of interrelated active and passive potencies.

In Aristotle’s cosmology, however, there are certain movements of bodies that do arise from an intrinsic source (Phys. 254b 33–255b 31), as in his example of a body falling to the ground—a movement that does not appear to require an external agent (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF). In this case, however, nature functions as a principle of activity without constituting the thing as a mover. The body, in fact, does not move itself, part moving part, as does the living thing. For Aristotle, rather, the movement arises spontaneously from the impulse of the form toward what is appropriate to it, which, in this instance, is a suitable environment. (For a study of this conception in conjunction with the theories of gravity and relativity, see J. A. Weisheipl.)

End as Nature. Whether a movement is natural or not cannot always be determined by sole reference to the active and passive principles. The determining factor is ultimately the END of becoming, and this too is nature (Phys. 193b 13–19, 194a 27–32).

Nature, in one sense, has been identified with the receptive and determinable principle. There are, however, in the world of nature, potencies that are not natural: the capacity of a natural body to take on an artificial form, or the capacity to be altered by some violent action. The natural potency differs from these in that it is a positive inclination to an act that perfects or fulfills the being so inclined, or else contributes to the good of the species or even to the good of the universe as a whole. The passive principle in nature, moreover, is normally related to a natural AGENT, through the activity of which it is brought to act. The activity of natural agents is accounted for by the tendency of the form in nature to actualize and bring to completion what is potential either within the same individual or beyond. The natural agent, then, actively tends to that good or perfection to which the potential principle is passively inclined. Furthermore, the natural agent, fixed in its species by its form, is also determined by this same principle with respect to specific goals, which it attains for the most part. Thus the acts to which it naturally directs matter by its activity are determinate acts. It is in this sense that a nature is said to act for an end. (Obviously, the end as a good is more easily recognized in the activity of living beings than it is in the workings of the inanimate world.) Consequently, it is the act or form, considered as the end to which a natural being tends either actively or passively, that determines whether a process is or is not in accordance with nature. And in those cases where the good of the whole is in opposition to the good of the individual (as in the case of corruption), it is the former that takes precedence as a determining principle. (See FINALITY, PRINCIPLE OF.)

The form considered as end, furthermore, is itself properly called nature. It is a principle of becoming, and one that, in the essential order of things, is prior even to the passive and active principles as such. It is also intrinsic, insofar as natural movements are for the sake of the form (finis cui) from which they spring. In fact, the natural form seeks its own preservation and development within the individual; it tends by generation to its own continuance, as a specific form, in other individuals; and ultimately, by realizing its specific ends, it contributes to the order and preservation of the universe, i.e., to the good of the whole of which it is a part.

Related Concepts. Art, VIOLENCE, and CHANCE are all active principles that presuppose nature but operate outside the order of natural finality. See ART (PHILOSOPHY).

Secondary Meanings. From nature meaning the form or essence that is the end of generation, the word has been extended to signify any essence whatsoever without reference at all to becoming (see Thomas Aquinas, In 5 meta. 5.822–823). This sense, as applicable to any being, material or immaterial, is frequently conveyed by the terms definition and quiddity. A meaning somewhat closer to the original is that of essence as the source of any activity, whether of physical movement or of spiritual operation (De ente 1). This sense, too, is sometimes conveyed by the term substance. For a fuller discussion of these concepts, see ESSENCE; FORM; DEFINITION; QUIDDITY; SUBSTANCE. For a treatment of laws of nature, see PHYSICAL LAWS; NATURAL LAW; and for the principle of the uniformity of nature on which such laws are based, see UNIFORMITY.

NATURE (IN THEOLOGY)

Clarification of the concept nature has enriched the development of theology and the understanding of the Christian faith. It has given a more accurate understanding and depth to the theology of the Trinity, Incarnation, Redemption, Mystical Body, the Church, Mary, and man. Historically, the notion of nature has been focal in every era: from the Trinitarian-Christological controversies of Christian antiquity, through the grace disputes of Pelagianism and Protestantism, to Modernism and existentialism. The term nature is not met in the Old Testament nor does the concrete mentality of the Semites lend itself to an abstract and transcendental concept of nature, predicable of God, angels, man, and irrational creation. Though the word nature, φύσις, is used in the New Testament, its meaning must be determined in each instance from the context. St. AUGUSTINE was hampered in his efforts to preserve the supernaturalism of grace by his notion of nature in its primary etymological sense of natus, born. Although he maintained man's condition prior to the Fall to be "natural," the Doctor of Grace is not calling into question the supernaturalism of that condition but is affirming the "original" characteristic of that state. In the decrees of the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon and in the writings of the contemporary Fathers there is a gradual precisional evolution of the term nature. St. Thomas Aquinas made a major contribution to Catholic theology by clearly distinguishing between GRACE and nature, fixing the boundaries of the NATURAL ORDER and the SUPERNATURAL ORDER. The contribution of current theologians would be their emphasis on the concrete, historical, and social aspects of nature.

In contemporary theology the term nature is used in two senses. (1) In a general sense, nature refers to the created universe (rational or irrational or both) with determined laws of interdependence and God as its source and end. (2) In a specific sense, nature includes not only the philosophical definition as that which determines a being's species and proper activity but a deeper understanding from revelation of the concrete nature of man, angel, and God. The following consideration of nature in theology is divided according to these two senses of the term.

Nature in a Specific Sense. The philosophical understanding of nature has already been treated extensively in the previous article; we may now proceed to a consideration of the contribution of revelation and theology.

Human Nature. Humanity does not know precisely just what human nature is or exactly how far it extends. Philosophy through experience and reflection gives certain definite concepts about nature, but humanity never knows exactly when too much or too little has been included in any concept. Theology goes beyond philosophy and sees nature as being from God and directed to God in special ways, as including SUPERNATURAL and grace-qualified factors, and as being in a historical-social situation where new experiences in humanity's process of realization leads to an understanding of its essence and what is contingent. Humanity is always historically becoming, and therefore the understanding of concrete nature is also permanently in via. Philosophy, then, can give a well-grounded concept of the nature of humanity, but it is for theology with revelation to further consider humanity's nature in its supernatural context.

Three major constants appear in Catholic theological understanding of human nature. (1) Humanity is the IMAGE OF GOD. Because of its special similarity to God, human nature has an immediate ordination to Him. Human nature itself, therefore, will ever constitute a moral principle for judging human behavior. (2) Human-kind is one: it has not only an essential unity by human nature but an even greater unity in Adam and Christ. Therefore, the previously mentioned conformity-with-nature moral principle must be understood not merely of the individual but also of all humanity as one. Moreover, this oneness of humankind offers the natural foundation for the law of love of neighbor and has important consequences for the Church's social teaching. (3) The unity of human nature is one of the most distinctive characteristics of the Judeo-Christian conception of humanity, combining the two apparently heterogeneous worlds of matter and of spirit. History has shown that Christian insistence on humankind's fundamental unity is the sole effective remedy for monism, whether in the form of an idealistic spiritualism or of an empirical materialism. Even the Christian has not found it easy to avoid tendencies that overemphasize now one and now another aspect of humanity's enigmatic nature.

Humanity, in its capacity of incarnate spirit, has a place in the divine plan that surpasses its nature. Even though this human nature considered abstractly is not altered by its history, it must ever be borne in mind that abstract human nature never did nor does exist. The whole spiritual and cultural history of humanity testifies that it continually experiences new modes of realization and understanding of its nature. Theological consideration of human nature must never stop with an examination of human nature as such, but must always include concrete human nature with its history centered in its ELEVATION in Christ.

Angelic Nature. Theology confirms philosophy's stand that human nature, incarnate spirit, crowns the material universe. However, above human nature is the angelic nature: "You have made him [man] a little less than the angels" (Ps 8.6). The existence of created beings of a purely spiritual nature is unknown to philosophy. In fact, the very concept carries with it the connotation of the unreal and the unrealizable to modern thinkers. Catholic theology, seeing the wonderful completion of the material universe in the manifold degrees of perfection, confirms the becomingness of a similar gradation in the spiritual universe. Humanity occupies the lowest place in this universe of spiritual beings, having a more perfect nature than what is purely material but still partially dependent upon matter. In accordance with the general providence of God, governing the inferior through the superior, angels have definite roles to fulfill in the lives of men and in the ordering of the whole material universe (see ANGELS).

Theology of the Trinity and Incarnation. In expressing its belief in supernatural realities, the Church does not bind itself to any particular philosophical system. This is brought out most clearly when it presents its two most fundamental mysteries, the Trinity and the Incarnation, in terms of nature and person. In the formulation of these mysteries, these terms are analogies to be understood only in the light of the revealed reality. The foundation for the analogical application of the terms nature and person to these mysteries rests on a minimal number of philosophical presuppositions. Nature simply refers to that which constitutes the internal unity of anything. Person says nothing more than separateness from everyone and everything else—hence INCOMMUNICABILITY. The precise meaning of these terms in the dogmatic formulas is grasped by the Church only by reflection on the very mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation. Because of the necessarily partial character of any expression of a supernatural reality, faith seeking understanding has always sought, and eventually used, other analogies to complement the nature-person analogy, e.g., those based on mutual relations, human mind, and human love.

The mystery of the Incarnation reveals a concrete, individual, human nature without a human personality. In the presence of this mystery, Catholic theology has been perennially confronted with the yet unanswered question of the relation of nature and person. Philosophy is usually content with the identification of the concrete, individual, existing nature and the person. Some contemporary trends in theology suggest a reexamination of this philosophical position, not only on an ontological, but also on a psychological plane.

Nature in a General Sense. Two questions are raised in theology by nature in a general sense: (1) concerning the relation between the natural and supernatural orders, and (2) concerning the different states of nature.

Natural and Supernatural Orders. By the natural order is meant the natural disposition and relationship of creatures among themselves and to God, the extrinsic author and end of everything within the order. Humanity with its natural faculties seeks to attain a perfect, mediate possession of God. This end could be attained by human activity in the material universe in accordance with the norm of the order—the natural law. By the supernatural order is meant the supernatural disposition and relationship of creatures among themselves and to God, the extrinsic author and end of everything within the order. Jesus Christ, His human nature elevated by the HYPOSTATIC UNION and sanctifying grace, beatific vision and love, is the one mediator between God and humankind and is therefore the intrinsic author and end of everything in this order. Humanity is elevated by a sharing in the divine nature (sanctifying grace) and in the infused divine powers (theological virtues). By union with Christ and corresponding activity in accordance with the norm of the order—the divine positive law—humanity can attain an immediate possession of God through beatific vision and love.

Though the natural order is not a de facto order, still theology is concerned with that order because of its manner of elevation. The supernatural does not imply the suppression of the natural but rather its supereminent realization. Hence the adages: "The supernatural is not opposed to but above nature"; "Grace does not destroy but perfects nature." These principles must, however, be carefully understood, for they contain a certain equivocation. The supernatural is not a perfection of nature within the order of nature. The Christian humanist is often tempted to view the supernatural as though it were simply a supreme realization of natural perfection. Central to the Christian message is the absolute incapability of nature to attain to the supernatural, for the supernatural is a perfection of a higher order than the natural. The supernatural, to be sure, is the full realization of nature but in a perfection that transcends the natural order completely. The Christian way of death-resurrection is one not merely of removing sin but also of transcending the natural for a greater openness to the supernatural received as grace—pure gift. Supernatural grace, therefore, is not some superstructure, imposing itself on human nature and disturbing the order of pure nature. Grace, it is true, is unexacted by humankind's nature, but God created humankind so that it could receive this gift and receive it as such: as an unexpected, unexacted gift.

The point of contact between the natural and supernatural orders is human nature, for only humanity, abstracting from the angels, is capable of being elevated to the supernatural order. This capacity in human nature is referred to as OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY. Theology clearly distinguishes this capacity in human nature for the supernatural, which God alone can fulfill, from all of humankind's other natural capabilities, which humanity itself can carry out. The existence of such an obediential potency in human nature is known only through revelation of the fact of actual supernatural elevation. Still this openness of the human spirit for the supernatural indicates not only a nonrepugnance but even a becomingness for the supernatural elevation. The conception, then, of obediential potency is not to be seen in its purely negative aspect as freeing humankind from the contradiction of a supernatural-natural union, but more positively as an inner, conditional ordination to the supernatural. This openness of spirit is central for the understanding of the scriptural doctrine that man is made in the image and likeness of God.

States of Nature. Even though, historically, nature never existed without the supernatural elevation, nature connotes a perfection complete in itself and hence could exist in a purely natural state. Theologians distinguish five different possible states of nature: (1) PURE NATURE, with no PRETERNATURAL or supernatural elevation; (2) integral nature, with preternatural endowments; (3) elevated nature (the original state of man prior to the Fall), with preternatural and supernatural gifts; (4) fallen unredeemed nature, incapable of attaining its end because of sin; (5) redeemed nature, superabundantly restored to its original elevated state by the REDEMPTION of Jesus Christ. Even though the last is the only actual state of human nature known, there would seem to be no intrinsic impossibility for the actual existence of the other states. In fact, some theologians see a certain appropriate completeness of the universe in positing the actual existence of these other states of nature on planets other than the earth.

God's Glory. "God saw that all He had made was very good" (Gn 1.31). Only the whole of God's creation contains the divinely intended manifestation of His goodness [see GLORY OF GOD (END OF CREATION)]. Every area of human endeavor contributes its proper insight into the glory of God discovered in nature. The scientist encounters the beauty of nature in its manifold variation, generous richness, and prodigious creativity. The philosopher discovers in nature an underlying permanence and unity that preserve a most wonderful order in the whole. Only theology attains to the ultimate harmonization of nature's multiplicity and unity in its Creator, who has revealed Himself to be one in nature and triune in personality. This triune Deity has, moreover, offered to share with all created nature His own harmonious multiplicity in unity. This properly divine beauty is shared in immediately by the more excellent angelic and, through Christ, human natures, mediately by all nature "because creation itself also will be delivered from its slavery to corruption into the freedom of the glory of the sons of God" (Rom 8.21).

NAUCLERUS, JOHN

German humanist and historian; b. probably in Württemberg, c. 1425–30; d. Tübingen, Jan. 5, 1510. Nauclerus (properly Verge or Vergenhans) acted as tutor and counselor for the future Duke Eberhard V of Württemberg from 1450 to 1459, serving also as pastor and canon of Brackenheim. He was provost of Stuttgart (1465–72) and possibly was active at the Universities of Paris and Basel. Nauclerus was instrumental in the founding of the University of Tübingen (1477) and taught Canon Law there, functioning also as rector and then, from 1483 to 1509, as chancellor and provost.

Around 1504 he wrote Memorabilium omnis aetatis et omnium gentium chronici commentarii, covering the years from the creation of the world to his day. The work divides history into ages and counts 63 generations to the birth of Christ and 51 from Christ to 1501. Written in annalistic style, Nauclerus's history reflects the spiritual attitude of the Middle Ages, unaffected by the humanistic spirit of his own age. It shows a strong predisposition for affairs in his homeland, for Church matters and papal proceedings, but it is a valuable resource for the contemporary period. Unpublished until after Nauclerus's death, the history was edited by MELANCHTHON and printed in Tübingen in 1516. It had such great success that nine editions were printed before 1617. Besides his administrative work and his literary undertakings, Nauclerus was a canon lawyer and sought a compromise between local custom and Canon Law.

NAUSEA, FRIEDRICH (GRAU)

Theologian; b. Waischenfeld (hence he is called Blancicampianus), Upper Franconia, c. 1490; d. Trent, Feb. 6, 1552. He studied at Leipzig (1514); Pavia (1518); Padua, where he obtained the doctorate in law (1523); and Siena. He interrupted his theological studies to accompany Cardinal L. CAMPEGGIO on his trip as legate to combat heresy in Germany. On the way, Nausea tried at Bretten to win P. Melanchthon back to the Catholic faith. Named pastor at Frankfurt in 1525, Nausea had to withdraw because of Protestant pressure, and from 1526 until 1533 he labored fruitfully at Mainz as cathedral preacher and as a writer (Centuriae IV homiliarum [Cologne 1530]). Ferdinand I called him to Vienna in 1534 and made him court preacher. There he became coadjutor in 1538 and successor in 1541 of Bp. J. Fabri. In 1540 and 1541 he took part in the religious discussions at Hagenau and Worms. By word and in writing Nausea worked against the spread of the Reformation and sought the reform of the Church, above all through the renewal of the bishops and priests. He ordered the visitation of his parishes (Pastoralium inquisitionum elenchi tres [Vienna 1547]), sought a better training of future priests (Isagogicon de clericis ordinandis [Vienna 1548]), and looked after the catechizing of the people (Catechismus Catholicus [Vienna 1543]). By means of suggestions for reform and an extensive literary and personal activity, he paved the way for the Council of Trent, in which he participated for the first time in 1551. At the council he argued in favor of COMMUNION under both species and marriage of the clergy. Unfortunately, death soon ended Nausea's reforming influence.

NAVAL GIRBES, JOSEFA, BL.

Lay craftsperson, mystic, member of the Third Order Secular of Our Lady of Mount Carmel and St. Teresa of Jesus; b. Dec. 11, 1820, Algemesi (near Valencia), Spain; d. Feb. 24, 1893, Algemesi. Following the death of her mother (1833), Josefa took over the running of her family's household. Five years later, she made a personal vow of perpetual chastity and became a Carmelite tertiary. To provide instruction for girls and young women, she started an embroidery workshop in her home (1850). While teaching them her art, she was able to evangelize her entourage. Josefa reinvigorated the spiritual life of those around her and actively encouraged vocations to religious life. In the course of her ministry to the terminally ill, Josefa display heroic courage during the cholera epidemic of 1885. She achieved mystical union with God at 55. Her mortal remains are enshrined in her parish church, Saint James in Algemesi. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II, Sept. 25, 1988.

Feast: Nov. 6 (Carmelites).

NAVARRE, UNIVERSITY OF

Established in Pamplona, Spain, by OPUS DEI—now the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei—as a center for higher studies, the university was officially inaugurated with the opening of the Law School in 1952. Other schools soon followed: Medicine and Nursing (1954), Humanities (1955), Sciences (1957), Journalism (1958), and Engineering (1960), the last located in the neighboring city of San Sebastian. The Canon Law department opened in 1959. The IESE Business School, located in Barcelona, was incorporated in 1958.

In August 1960, in accordance with the 1953 Spanish Concordat, the university was erected as a Catholic university by the Holy See under the title it bears today, The University of Navarre. The Spanish government, due partly to the establishment of this new university, signed an agreement with the Holy See on April 5, 1962, stating the conditions for the accreditation of degrees by ecclesiastical universities. On Sept. 8, 1962 recognition was granted to all the existing departments. Thus the University of Navarre inaugurated a new era of freedom in education in Spain, bringing an end to the state monopoly in effect since the nineteenth century.

After its recognition as a university, the schools of pharmacy and architecture and the institutes of liberal arts and modern languages were begun. Although the curriculum closely followed other Spanish universities, the board of directors tried to incorporate the best university traditions of other countries.

The grand chancellor of the University of Navarre, who is the prelate of Opus Dei, works closely with the board of governors in supervising the direction of the university. The governing board comprises the president, several vice-presidents, a secretary general, an administrator and the various deans. Each faculty is governed by a board made up of the dean, assistant dean, secretary, and professors; student representatives are also present on the board. The university is financed by student tuition, research contracts, and the contributions from the Association of Friends of the University. It does not receive any funding from the Spanish government.

The university publishes journals on archaeology, architecture, family studies, public relations, law, Canon Law, philosophy, history of the Church, literature, theology and current events. The university press publishes numerous books each year. Departmental libraries have been set up for the humanities, geography, social sciences, medicine, and biology. The schools of medicine, sciences, and pharmacy share departmental offices and work in conjunction the Clínica Universitaria, a highly specialized teaching hospital that has become world-renowned in medical science.

NAVARRETE, DOMINGO FERNÁNDEZ

Dominican missionary, polemicist, archbishop, and primate of the West Indies; b. Castrogeriz, Spain, 1618; d. Santo Domingo (Hispaniola), Feb. 16, 1686. After religious profession at Peñafiel on Dec. 8, 1635, and higher studies at Valladolid, Navarrete volunteered for the Philippines, and arrived there on June 23, 1648. A decade later he transferred to the China field (Macau, July 14, 1658), working in Fujian and Zhejiang provinces until the outbreak, in 1665, of the disastrous Regency persecution. Internment of the mission personnel at Canton (March 25, 1666) made possible a collective conference to adopt uniform directives of pastoral action for the China Church, a program in 42 articles. In an interchange of argumentative briefs with the Jesuit apologists through 1668 and 1669, Navarrete opposed implementation of Alexander VII's permissive ruling of 1656 for the Rites (art. 41), but in the end gave written adherence to an earlier text of the Jesuit practices (Sept. 29, 1669). Three months later, however, he secretly left Canton and set out for Europe, arriving at Lisbon on March 19, 1672. While mission procurator at Madrid, he began composition of a massive trilogy dealing with the culture, peoples, and Christian penetration of the Chinese Empire and characterized by trenchant strictures on Jesuit methods there. Besides its controversial chapters, the first volume, Tratados históricos, políticos, étnicos y religiosos (Madrid 1676), contains a spirited account of the missionary's travels and adventures (Eng. tr., Churchill, 1704); the second, Controversias antiguas y modernas, more combative in spirit, was suppressed by the Inquisition in 1679. Two years earlier its author had left for the Spanish Indies (July 17, 1677), having been nominated to the archiepiscopal See of Santo Domingo. Consecrated on April 4, 1682, he spent the remaining four years of his life in an embattled effort to raise the standard of colonial morals, aided in this struggle for reform by the local Jesuits, whose zeal he praised in successive reports to the Crown. ## NAVARRO MIGUEL, CARLO (CHARLES), BL.

Martyr, priest of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. Feb. 11, 1911 in Torrente, Valencia, Spain; d. Sept. 22, 1936. Carlos was ordained to the priesthood in 1935 and served in Albacete. He sought refuge at his parent's home as the violence against religious increased during the Spanish Civil War. On September 12, soldiers seized him and imprisoned him. Early on September 22 he was shot along with two other priests of the town. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

NAYA, FLORENTÍN FELIPE, BL.

Martyr, lay brother of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. Oct. 10, 1856 in Alquézar, Huesca, Spain; d. Aug. 9, 1936. Felipe lived under house arrest with his confreres for two weeks. Partially blind and in ill health in his advanced age, he devoted himself to constant prayer. Four kilometers from Peralta, on a hill about ten meters from the side of the road, he and Faustino OTEIZA SEGURA were gunned down by anticlerical revolutionaries. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

NAZARENES (BROTHERHOOD OF ST. LUKE)

A group of 19th-century German painters inspired by Christian faith and German nationalism to paint in imitation of the Italian Quattrocento masters. Although they predated the full Romantic movement, their spirit is one of studied return to another age as an ideal, with the additional sentimental confusion of religio-ethical and aesthetic values. The leader of the Brotherhood was Johann Friedrich Overbeck (1789–1869), who as a disciple of Friedrich SCHLEGEL was converted to Catholicism (1813). Protesting the academic instruction at the Vienna Academy, Overbeck, with Franz Pforr and Ludwig Vogel, left Germany for Rome in 1810, intending to revive Christian fresco painting in the "simple and pure" style of PERUGINO and Raphael. They lived a communal life in the convent of San Isidoro, where they were joined by other disciples: W. von Schadow, the Veit brothers, J. D. Passavant, J. Führich, Schnorr von Carolsfeld, and Peter von Cornelius (1783–1867). As a group they produced two murals: a "Joseph in Egypt" cycle (Casa Bartoldi 1816), and a "Dante and Tasso" cycle (Villa Massimi 1817–27). Overbeck and Cornelius are known also for their individual works, e.g., Overbeck's fresco in the Portiuncula, Assisi. Although these two later renounced the ideals of the brotherhood, its spirit lived on in English Pre-Raphaelitism.

NAZARETH

City nestled among the hills of Galilee. It is not mentioned in the Old Testament literature, or in the Talmud, or by Josephus. It is referred to frequently, however, in the New Testament because Jesus came from that city and was known as the Nazarene. Although it is called a city, it is quite small. The name is spelled in different ways in the New Testament. Most frequently it is Ναζαρέτ or Ναζαρέθ, but it occurs also as Ναζαρά, Ναζαράτ, or Ναζαράθ.

It was at Nazareth that the angel Gabriel brought to Mary the message that she was to be the mother of the Savior (Lk 1.26). Mary and Joseph left there to go to Bethlehem, where Jesus was born. Then the Holy Family returned to Nazareth after their flight into Egypt (Mt 2.23). There Jesus spent the years of His hidden life (Mt 2.23; Lk 2.39, 51). During His public life Jesus seldom visited Nazareth because He was not well received there (Lk 4.16–30). That Nazareth was not highly regarded may be inferred from the question of Nathaniel, from neighboring Cana, "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1.46).

During the 1st century Nazareth was inhabited not only by Jews, but also by Christians, some of whom, it seems, were relatives of Our Lord. In the early 4th century Joseph of Tiberias had been commissioned by Constantine to build churches for Christians in the Jewish towns and villages of Galilee. We may suppose that he built a church at Nazareth because of the town's intimate connection with Jesus. In 634 the Muslims occupied Nazareth and made life difficult for its Christians. In the 12th century the Crusaders made Nazareth into an episcopal city, but it did not remain so for long, because the city soon fell back into the hands of the Muslims. The Franciscans established a convent in the city in 1390, but only since 1620 have they been able to remain there permanently. Since 1948 Nazareth has been within the confines of the State of Israel.

Of the many shrines commemorating events of the New Testament, the two most important are the House of St. Joseph and the Sanctuary of the Annunciation. In the preparations for constructing a new basilica over the spot where the Annunciation took place, a systematic excavation was conducted by B. Bagatti. He has shown that here, underneath the church built in 1730 by the Franciscans, which had been removed to give place to the new basilica, there was a church built by the Crusaders. Earlier than this, there was a 5th-century church that in turn had been preceded by a Christian structure from as early as A.D. 200. Numerous graffiti were found on the plaster walls and on the plastered surfaces of loose stones, made by early Judeo-Christians. Of special interest is one of the graffiti containing, in Greek, the opening words of the angelic salutation, "Hail, Mary."

NAZARIUS OF LÉRINS, ST.

Abbot; b. c. 584; d. c. 629. He appears in the abbatial list as 14th abbot of LÉRINS. Little is known about him. Like his predecessors at Lérins, Nazarius labored to root out the remaining vestiges of pagan worship into which the district frequently lapsed. He is said to have despoiled a sanctuary of Venus near the monastery and to have established there a convent for women that flourished until the Saracen raids of the eighth century. His name is inscribed in the Gallican calendar of saints.

NAZIRITES

Nazirites are persons consecrated to God through a special vow. The basic text concerning the Nazirites (Heb. nāzîr, from the root nzr, to separate, closely related to ndr, to vow) is Nm 6.1–21, according to which they have a threefold obligation: to abstain from wine and all fermented drink (see Rechabites: Jer 35.5–8), to leave their hair uncut, and to avoid all contact with dead bodies. The first provision seems to be a reaction of Israel's nomad background against the agricultural life adopted in Canaan, seen as a corrupting influence, and the third is connected with ritual purity; the second provision is undoubtedly a very ancient practice, but one to which it is difficult to assign an explanation.

Although Nm 6.1–21 belongs to the priestly tradition (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL), and is, therefore, a recent text, it is certain that it codifies a very ancient custom. The vow of the Nazirites is mentioned in several historical and prophetic texts of the Bible and seems to have taken different forms in the course of time. The earliest texts that speak of it, Jgs 13.4–5, 7, 13–14; 16.17 (Samson), 1 Sm 1.11 (Samuel), and Am 2.11–12, present the consecration of the Nazirites as lifelong, and as resulting from a divine call. Of the three obligations of the Nazirites given in Nm 6.1–21 only the one concerning the hair is mentioned in the cases of Samuel (1 Sm 1.11) and Samson (Jgs 13.5)—though abstinence from wine is imposed on Samson’s mother—and only the one concerning wine in Am 2.11–12. The practice of the Nazirite vow was certainly still known in the later period of the Old Testament (1 Mc 3.49–51) and in New Testament times; and it is mentioned in Josephus and in the Talmud. St. Paul made a vow of this kind at Cenchræ (Acts 18.18) and offered the prescribed sacrifices along with four others, at the Temple of Jerusalem (Acts 21.23–24). Some think that St. John the Baptist was also a Nazirite (Lk 1.15).

Nazirites are found, therefore, throughout Biblical history. One must see in this practice a particular manifestation of religious asceticism, and also, in the early period of Hebrew history, a symptom of the reaction of Yahwism against the Canaanite influence.

NE TEMERE

The words Ne Temere (lest perhaps) are the opening words of a decree concerning the juridical form of marriage. After consultation with the commission of cardinals, assigned the task of codifying the law of the Church, the decree was issued by Pope PIUS X through the Congregation of the Council on Aug. 2, 1907, to take effect on Easter Sunday, April 19, 1908 (P. Gasparri and I. Serédi, Codicis iuris canonici fontes 1917 n. 4340).

The TAMETSI decree (Nov. 11, 1563) of the 24th session of the Council of Trent had already established a juridical form necessary for the validity of marriage. Tametsi stated: “Those who shall attempt to contract marriage otherwise than in the presence of the parish priest or of another priest authorized by the parish priest or by the Ordinary and in the presence of two or three witnesses, the Holy Council renders absolutely incapable of thus contracting marriage and declares such contracts invalid and null, as by the present decree it invalidates and annuls them.”

Despite the Tametsi decree, and despite further clarifications from the Roman congregations and the wide faculties given to ordinaries and their delegates, there still remained great need for further amplification and legislation in the Church with regard to the form of marriage.

Clandestine marriages continued to be contracted. This often condemned practice presented many moral as well as legal problems. The decree Tametsi, however, had not been published everywhere so that it had not become effective throughout the universal Church. Where it had been published doubts remained concerning the proper pastor before whom a marriage was to be contracted. Finally, the Tametsi decree had made no exemption from the law for baptized non-Catholics. The last difficulty had been somewhat alleviated by the decree Matrimonia quae in locis of Benedict XIV, which exempted baptized non-Catholics from the juridical form of marriage (Nov. 4, 1741). This decree was issued originally for Belgium and Holland only, but was later extended to other parts of the world and then applied to all places where the Tametsi decree had been promulgated.

In his declaration, Benedict XIV referred to the widespread doubts and anxieties that troubled bishops, pastors, and missionaries concerning the validity of non-Catholic and mixed marriages. To settle the various difficulties once and for all while abolishing any contrary law or custom, the Ne Temere decree made the following provisions: (1) All Latin-rite Catholics were bound to the juridical form of marriage when they married Catholics; (2) Non-Catholics were exempted when they married among themselves; (3) The “communication of privilege” admitted by Benedict’s declaration was henceforth abolished, so Catholics were bound to the juridical form when they married non-Catholics, except in Germany and Hungary as a result of the constitution Provida given by Pope Pius X to Germany and later extended to Hungary; (4) The juridical form required the presence of the local ordinary or pastor or a priest delegated by either. These ministers could validly assist at all marriages within the territorial limits of their respective jurisdictions. The presence of at least two other witnesses was required; (5) In imminent danger of death, if neither the ordinary nor pastor nor a delegate of one of these could be present, marriage could be contracted validly before any priest and two witnesses for the sake of peace of conscience or the legitimation of offspring; (6) In places where the local ordinary, pastor, or delegate could not be present and the absence had endured for at least a month, marriage could be contracted before two witnesses without the presence of a priest. Moreover, the Ne Temere decree, in the interest of good order, determined that marriages ought to be celebrated in the parish of the bride.

The legislation on the canonical form of marriage as laid down by the decree Ne Temere was later substantially adopted by the Code of Canon Law, which went into effect on May 19, 1918. The one major difference between the legislation of the Code of Canon Law and the legislation contained in the Ne Temere concerned persons who had been baptized in the Catholic Church but who later lost their identification with the Church. The Ne Temere decree made no exception for these persons with regard to the canonical form of marriage. The Code of Canon Law provided for them in canon 1099.2, exempting non-Catholics who had been baptized in the Catholic Church provided one or both of their parents were non-Catholics and provided they were raised from infancy outside the Catholic Church.

Finally, on Aug. 1, 1948, Pope Pius XII eliminated the exemption afforded by the latter part of the above-mentioned canon 1099.2. This final ruling concerning the form of marriage became effective on Jan. 1, 1949.

NEALE, LEONARD

Second archbishop of the BALTIMORE, Maryland Archdiocese, president of Georgetown College, Washington, D.C.; b. Port Tobacco, Maryland, Oct. 15, 1746; d. Baltimore, June 18, 1817. Neale was born of an old Maryland family, son of William and Anne Neale. At about the age of 12, he was sent to Europe to obtain his education under Catholic auspices, a privilege he could not enjoy in the colony. After his course at St. Omer's in French Flanders, he entered the Society of Jesus on Sept. 7, 1767. At the time of the suppression of the Society in 1773 he was a priest and still engaged in the study of theology. He then went to England and from there to Demarara in British Guiana as a missionary.

In 1783, Neale returned to Maryland and was assigned to the mission of Port Tobacco. When the yellow fever plague of 1793 in Philadelphia took the lives of Lorenz Graessel, who had been named coadjutor bishop of Baltimore, and Francis Anthony Fleming, OP, Neale went to Philadelphia and was soon named its vicar-general by Bp. John CARROLL. During Neale's ministry in that city, he met Miss Alice Lalor and helped her to found the first community of Visitation Nuns in the U.S.

In 1798, Carroll called Neale to the presidency of Georgetown College. While retaining this post, he was selected as Carroll's coadjutor and was consecrated bishop of Gortyna in the procathedral of St. Peter's in Baltimore on Dec. 7, 1800, the first time this ceremony was performed in the U.S. Neale joined Carroll in 1803 in writing to Gabriel Gruber, superior of the Jesuits in Russia, to present the petition of the former Jesuits to be joined with the Society of Jesus still existing in White Russia. Moreover, Neale's support of this project continued until the viva voce restoration was effected in 1806. He likewise rejoiced with the Jesuits at their final and complete restoration throughout the world in 1814.

On the death of Carroll, Dec. 3, 1815, Neale succeeded to the metropolitan See of Baltimore, receiving the pallium from Pius VII the following year. One of his first acts was to request from the Holy See the formal approval of the Visitation community at Georgetown. His episcopate was sorely tried by schisms in Philadelphia and Charleston, South Carolina. Burdened by these troubles, he sought a coadjutor and selected the Sulpician, Ambrose Maréchal. The latter's appointment as titular bishop of Staupolis on July 24, 1817, came about a month after the archbishop's death. Neale is buried in a crypt beneath the altar of the convent chapel of the Visitation Convent in Georgetown, Washington, D.C.

NEAMTU, ABBEY OF

Fourteenth-century Romanian monastery, outside the town of Targu Neamt, northeast Romania, in Moldavia. Targu Neamt was once an important fortress, built in 1210. Later, Neamt Abbey was founded at the site of a hermitage there. The monastery became one of the largest, richest, and most famous monastic foundations in ROMANIA. During its golden age it had two churches, ten towers, and more than 600 monks. It was enlarged and enriched by Stephen the Great, Prince of Moldavia (1457-1503) and became a center for pilgrims and tourists.

NEBO (NABU)

Nebu (Nabu) is one of the more important minor deities of the Babylonian–Assyrian pantheon. The god Nebo (Akkadian Nabû, “the called”) appears in the Code of HAMMURABI in the early 2nd millennium B.C. as son of the national god MARDUK and tutelary deity of the city Borsippa (to the south of the city of BABYLON) and of its temple Ezida. In later documents he is characterized as the divine scribe, writer, and bearer of the “tablets of destiny” that enshrine the decrees of the gods. In accordance with this role, he was considered patron of the scribal art and of human learning.

The cult of Nebo originated and remained strong in BABYLONIA, where it played an important part in the annual New Year Festival at Babylon; during this time, his statue was borne from Borsippa to Babylon, where it was honored together with that of Marduk. It is to this festival that the satirical words of Is 46.1 refer: “BEL [i.e., Marduk] bows down, Nebo stoops, their idols are upon beasts and cattle.” Though the worship of Nebo was adopted in ASSYRIA, the intermittent anti-Babylonian feeling there prevented his attaining the prominence he enjoyed in Babylonia.

The name of the god is found in the Old Testament as a theophoric element in several Babylonian proper names of the period preceding and during the Exile: Nebuchednezzar (Nebo, protect the son, Jer 21.2 and passim), Nabu zaradan (Nebo gave offspring, Jer 39.9 and passim), Nabu-sezban (Nebo, save me! Jer 39.13), and—in a form altered by the piety of Biblical scribes—Abdenago (Servant of Nebo, Dn 1.7 and passim).

NEBRASKA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Nebraska, a largely agrarian Midwestern state situated near the center of the contiguous 48 states, is bounded on the north by South Dakota, on the West by Wyoming, in its southwestern corner by Colorado, and on the south by Kansas. On the east, the Missouri River separates the state from Iowa and the northwestern corner of Missouri. The Platte River flows throughout the state from west to east, separating the Diocese of Lincoln in the south from the two sees to the north—the Archdiocese of OMAHA in the northeast and the Diocese of Grand Island in the northwest.

Nebraska first fell under Catholic ecclesiastical jurisdiction in 1493 when Spain laid claim to North America. France took control of the area in 1682, putting the region under the authority of the bishop of Quebec. Native populations in what would later become Nebraska included the Omaha, Oto, Pawnee, Ponca, and Sioux. The first European Catholics made their appearance in the area in 1720, when Lieutenant Colonel Pedro de Villasur entered with a party of over a hundred, including Friar Juan Mingues, a Franciscan chaplain to the group. The Pawnee attacked their camp near the fork of the Platte and the present-day city of North Platte, killing Villasur, Mingues, and many others. French-Canadian brothers Pierre and Paul Mallet explored and crossed the region in 1739 in search of a passage to New Mexico. For nearly a century thereafter, francophone fur trading developed in the area, particularly near the confluence of the Platte and the Missouri Rivers close to the future towns of Bellevue and Omaha. Many of the fur traders took native women as brides, and their offspring were among the first Catholics in the area to be baptized by later missionaries.

Ecclesiastical authority shifted between the Spanish and the French as often as political control changed, until the United States secured the area as part of the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, when the region thus became the pastoral responsibility of the bishop of Baltimore. The Lewis and Clark expedition, which camped on the west bank of the Missouri near present-day Fort Calhoun in the summer of 1804, opened the region to more intensive fur-trading activities. Among the most prominent and successful of the traders were Manuel Lisa, Lucien Fontanelle, and Peter Sarpy, the latter two of whom befriended and supported missionaries to the region. In 1846, the Mormon peoples on their way to Utah made camp for about a year at Florence, north of present-day Omaha. Ecclesiastically, the region was assigned to the jurisdiction of the bishop of New Orleans in 1815, and then of the bishop of St. Louis in 1827.

In 1827, three Jesuits, Fr. Felix Verreydt, Bro. Andrew Mazella, and Fr. Peter Jean DESMET, established the St. Joseph Mission in what is now the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, in order to minister to the Potawatami. Missionary service to the future Nebraska area commenced when Fr. DeSmet crossed the Missouri River to baptize two Oto infants, Elizabeth Loise and Julia Tayon, in Bellevue on July 6, 1838. These were the first documented baptisms in what would later become the state of Nebraska.

DeSmet's subsequent travels took him to the Great Plains Council, which took place 35 miles down the Platte from Fort Laramie, Wyoming, just inside the current Nebraska border, in 1851. The Council gathered about 10,000 native Americans of various tribes to whom the government offered indemnity for future white incursions through their territories. DeSmet performed the first documented Mass in Nebraska at the Council on September 14. Eleven days later, DeSmet witnessed the first documented Catholic marriage in the area, between Louis Vasquez and Narcissa, at Fort Kearney.

In 1850, Pope Pius IX established the Vicariate Apostolic of the Territory East of the Rocky Mountains (also known as "of Indian Territory"), which included the present-day states of Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma, and those parts of the present-day states of South Dakota, North Dakota, Wyoming, and Colorado which lay between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains. Jean Baptist MIÈGE, S.J., appointed vicar apostolic, was consecrated a bishop and began his ministries to the region in 1851. Miège faced the immense difficulty of administering a huge territory with very few priests. A few offered assistance from the Diocese of Dubuque, and a tiny number of Jesuit missionaries ministered to the western parts of the area. In 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska Bill divided the political region into two distinct territories along the fortieth parallel, and opened the area to white American settlement, meaning that Miège would have to minister to a growing number of whites as well as the native populations. And in 1855, Congress called for the construction of military and wagon roads westward, with Omaha as the eastern terminus, ensuring the town's future as a transportation hub.

In August of 1856, at Eighth and Harney Streets in Omaha, Miège and area Catholics dedicated St. Mary's, the first church building of any denomination in the future state of Nebraska. Many non-Catholics contributed to its construction, in part to attract immigration and to raise real estate values in the city. Fr. Jeremiah TRECZY (1824–88), a priest of the Diocese of Dubuque and an advocate of Catholic colonization efforts, led a group of Irish immigrants into present-day Dakota County to found St. John's City, the first all-Catholic settlement in Nebraska. The colony failed within a few years, largely because of a destructive tornado in 1860. Most of the settlers sought their fortunes as miners in the West, but several relocated to the nearby town of Franklin (which was later renamed Jackson) or retained their farming claims. Daniel Sheehan, archbishop of Omaha from 1969 to 1993, descended from one of the original Dakota County families.

In 1855, frustrated by his inability to minister to such a vast region, Miège asked that a second vicariate be carved out of his territory. The Holy See announced the creation of the Vicariate of Nebraska on Feb. 17, 1857, in a division coinciding with the 1854 political settlement, with the understanding that Miège would govern both vicariates for the time being. In response to his continued pleas, on Jan. 28, 1859, James Myles O'Gorman, a Trappist monk from New Melleray Abbey in Dubuque, was named a bishop and first vicar apostolic of Nebraska. The first communities of religious women in the state were the Sisters of Mercy, who arrived in 1864, and the Benedictine Sisters, who came in 1865.

O'Gorman established Omaha as his see city and shortly thereafter, on June 25, 1859, ordained the first priest of the vicariate, Fr. William Kelly. During O'Gorman's tenure, several factors brought about significant growth in the future state of Nebraska and the town of Omaha. The Civil War closed off other routes west, funneling the traffic to mines in California, the Black Hills, and especially Colorado, where gold had been discovered in 1850, through Nebraska. Irish Catholics among the freighters and outfitters bolstered Church numbers in the Omaha area. After the war, the Union Pacific built its transcontinental railroad, with Omaha as one of its major centers. Becoming a transportation center also served to boost the state's agricultural economy. The Irish immigrants attracted by the availability of railroad construction work swelled the state's Catholic population. Nebraska gained sufficient population to become the 37th state on March 1, 1867.

However, O'Gorman still struggled with the problem of how to administer such a large area with so few priests. By the end of 1860, O'Gorman had only four priests and a Jesuit brother to assist him in ministry, and only nine priests in 1864 to minister to an estimated 50,000 Catholics. O'Gorman oversaw the building of a modest Gothic cathedral at Ninth and Howard Streets, St.

Philomena's, financed in part by Edward and Mary Lucretia Creighton. But because the area's Catholics were often too poor to support their clergy or to build churches, O'Gorman depended significantly on financial support from the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in Lyons, France, as well as the occasional aid of the Leopoldine Society of Vienna and the Ludwig Missionsverein of Munich.

Fr. Emmanuel Hartig, O.S.B., of the Atchison, Kansas, Benedictine priory, was assigned to minister to Catholics in Nebraska City. On July 11, 1862, he dedicated St. Benedict's Church, the oldest standing church in the state of Nebraska. However, Nebraska City also occasioned the earliest ethnic infighting in the Church in Nebraska, as English-speaking Irish Catholics chafed at attending German-speaking services. Such tensions became a greater problem as increased numbers of German immigrants, fleeing the KULTURKAMPF, streamed into the area, and waves of aspiring Bohemian farmers entered the state, in the 1870s. About one of every eight Bohemians living in the United States prior to World War I lived in Nebraska. The majority of these, about 5,000 families, resided on farms in Butler, Colfax, Saline, and Saunders County. Meanwhile, in the 1870s, Irish Catholics continued to establish colonies at O'Neill in Holt County and Greeley in Greeley County. John Fitzgerald, a contractor of the Burlington railroad who moved to Lincoln in the early 1870s, established himself as that city's first millionaire. He financed a convent and an orphanage in Lincoln while at the same time drawing national attention as president of the American branch of Charles Stewart Parnell's Land League, the Irish National League.

O'Gorman died on July 4, 1874. Fr. John IRELAND, pastor of the cathedral of St. Paul, Minnesota, was appointed to succeed him on Feb. 12, 1875, but his ordinary, Bishop Thomas Grace of St. Paul, successfully requested that the appointment be revoked so that Ireland could remain in Minnesota and become his coadjutor. At long last, O'Gorman's successor, James O'Connor, was consecrated as vicar apostolic on Aug. 10, 1876. O'Connor is especially remembered for having been the spiritual director who guided St. Katharine DREXEL, foundress of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for the Indian and Colored Peoples, to pursue religious life and missionary work. Drexel founded St. Augustine's Indian School in Winnebago in Thurston County in 1908. St. Augustine's remains the prime educational facility for Native Americans in Nebraska. In 2000, a delegation of Winnebago students and parishioners attended Drexel's canonization in Rome. It was also O'Connor who invited the Jesuits to direct Creighton University, founded in 1878 with the proceeds of a generous bequest of Edward and Mary Lucretia Creighton.

O'Connor's ecclesiastical territory diminished in geographical size over the course of his episcopate, beginning with the creation of the Vicariate of Dakota in 1880, and the Vicariate of Montana in 1883. Omaha was erected a diocese consisting of the states of Nebraska and Wyoming on Oct. 2, 1885, with O'Connor as its first ordinary. Soon thereafter, on Aug. 2, 1887, the Holy See also established the Diocese of Cheyenne, consisting of the entire state of Wyoming, and the Diocese of Lincoln, consisting of all of Nebraska south of the Platte River, all of which was territory formerly assigned to Omaha. During this period, Italian, Polish, Hungarian, and Ukrainian immigrants joined the Catholic communities in the city of Omaha and in the Nebraska countryside.

Thomas Bonacum, the first bishop of the Diocese of Lincoln (1887–1911), inherited 32 priests, 29 parishes, 74 missions, and 23,160 Catholic faithful. His successors were J. Henry Tihen (1911–17), Charles O'Reilly (1918–23), Francis Beckman (1924–30), Louis B. Kucera (1930–57), James V. Casey (1957–67), Glennon P. Flavin (1967–92), and Fabian W. Bruskewitz (1992–). On Aug. 18, 1965, the Apostolic Delegate, Archbishop Egidio Vagnozzi, presided at the dedication of Lincoln's new Cathedral of the Risen Christ, of distinctly modern design.

O'Connor died on May 27, 1890, and was succeeded by Richard Scannell (1891–1916), whose episcopate was characterized by the economic struggles of the 1890s, poor health, and the commissioning of St. Cecilia's Cathedral, designed by Thomas Kimball. On Oct. 6, 1907, Scannell blessed the cornerstone of this Spanish Renaissance structure, which remains one of the ten largest cathedrals in the country. The cathedral was restored in 2000 to reflect Kimball's original designs for the interior.

On March 8, 1912, the Holy See again divided the territory of the Diocese of Omaha, erecting the Diocese of Kearney out of its western portion and appointing James A. Duffy as its first bishop. The Kearney Diocese, two-and-a-half times the size of the Omaha diocese, featured approximately 40,000 sparsely-populated square miles, including ranch lands, the desolate Sand Hills, and the Scottsbluff National Monument. The assignment of the more populous and prosperous counties of Hall, Howard, Greeley, and Wheeler, on the western edge of the Omaha diocese, however, remained in dispute, until May 13, 1916, when these counties were officially transferred to the Kearney diocese. Subsequently, the see city was transferred to Grand Island in Hall County on April 11, 1917. Duffy resigned in 1931, and was succeeded by Stanislaus V. Bona (1931–45), Edward J. Hunkeler (1945–51), John L. Paschang (1951–78), and Lawrence J. McNamara (1978–). At the time of his death, at the age of 103, on March 21, 1999, retired Bishop Paschang was the world's oldest bishop.

In December 1917, Fr. Edward FLANAGAN, an Irish immigrant priest, housed 12 homeless boys, and founded what would later be known as Boys Town. He attracted substantial philanthropic support with his plan to provide homeless and abandoned youth with vocational and academic education under a program of gentle discipline. A building program in the 1920s marked the creation of a large community to the west of Omaha in order to serve a growing number of young men. During the 1980s and 1990s, the city of Omaha grew around Boys Town's main campus. In 2001, the institution served 2,130 boys and girls, with 18 satellite sites in 15 states serving a total of 35,410 young people. Boys Town began to offer services to girls in 1979, and in August 2000, based upon a referendum of the community's residents, its name was changed to Girls and Boys Town.

Omaha witnessed a succession of notable ordinaries; Jeremiah Harty (1916–27) came to Omaha after 13 years as archbishop of Manila, and Joseph RUMMEL (1928–35) later became the Archbishop of New Orleans, where he courageously desegregated the Catholic school system in the face of bitter opposition. In September of 1930, during Rummel's episcopate, Omaha hosted the Sixth National Eucharistic Congress, a public gathering of thousands of the local faithful, and prelates from across the nation. James Hugh RYAN (1935–47) was transferred to Omaha following his controversial rectorship of the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, where he had tried to reform and improve the academic programs. During his episcopacy, on Aug. 10, 1945, Omaha was elevated to an archdiocese, with Lincoln and Grand Island assigned as its suffragan sees. Archbishop Gerald T. Bergan (1948–69) presided over a program of copious institutional expansion. Archbishop Daniel Sheehan (1969–93), a native of the Omaha archdiocese, worked hard to preserve Catholic education while carrying out the decrees of the Second Vatican Council.

In the postconciliar decades, declining birthrates among farm families, the corporatization of agriculture, and the shift of population from rural to urban areas led to smaller rural congregations. Rather than closing parishes, all three dioceses in the state instituted the modern equivalent of clerical circuit riding whereby a pastor serves up to three parishes or missions.

In the 1990s, economic prosperity in the state brought change to Nebraska Catholicism. In the city of Omaha, the arrival and growth of the communications and agribusiness industries engendered significant suburban expansion. Gigantic megaparishes emerged on the southern and especially the western sides of the metropolitan area to accommodate the abundant growth of Catholic populations there. Low unemployment and needy job markets, particularly in the meat-packing industry, led to a boom in the number of Hispanic immigrants entering the area, especially in the latter half of the decade. The state's Hispanic population grew from 36,969 in 1990 to 94,425 in 2000. Although many of these immigrants could be described as migrant workers, an increasing number of Hispanics began to establish roots in the state by purchasing houses or starting small businesses. As of 2001, 12 parishes in the Archdiocese of Omaha and eight each in the Grand Island and Lincoln dioceses provided Spanish Mass and some form of Hispanic ministry, while Church-based services for immigrants emerged in each of the dioceses. Meanwhile, a growing need arose for Hmong and Vietnamese ministry. Several Nebraska parishes have sponsored refugees in the wake of the Vietnam War, and continued immigration swelled their numbers.

The African American Catholic population in the state has remained small, and is largely concentrated at St. Benedict the Moor and Sacred Heart Parishes in Omaha. Fr. John Markoe, S.J., founded the DePorres Club at Creighton University in 1947 to work toward racial justice. During the 1950s and 1960s, Archbishop Bergan spoke out in support of equal treatment for blacks in education, employment, and housing.

Religious communities of men represented in Nebraska include the JESUITS, with communities at Creighton University and Creighton Preparatory School in Omaha, the BENEDICTINES, who run the Mount Michael High School near Elkhorn, and the COLUMBAN FATHERS, whose national headquarters are in Bellevue. Women's congregations present include the SISTERS OF MERCY, who founded the College of St. Mary for women in Omaha in 1923, the Dominican Sisters, the SERVANTS OF MARY, the POOR CLARES, NOTRE DAME SISTERS, and the Society of the Sacred Heart, who operated Duchesne College prior to its closing.

By the start of the new millennium, the Diocese of Lincoln garnered an international reputation as a diocese with particularly conservative policies and programs. In the mid-1990s, Lincoln was one of two dioceses in the country forbidding the use of female altar servers. In 1996, Bishop Bruskewitz excommunicated Catholic members of 12 organizations whose teachings and policies he judged to be incompatible with the Catholic faith. In 1997, the diocese established St. Gregory the Great Seminary for collegians, the first freestanding diocesan seminary to open in the United States in several decades. The seminary served 19 Lincoln seminarians during the 2000–01 school year, and hoped to welcome seminarians from other dioceses in subsequent years. In 1998, construction began in Denton, Nebraska, on Our Lady of Guadalupe Seminary, the house of formation for English-speaking members of the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter, a group dedicated to providing the preconciliar Latin Mass and other sacraments for the faithful. Also in the 1990s, the diocese welcomed a group of Holy Family Sisters of the Needy from Nigeria and a group of Discalced Carmelite Sisters, who established a new monastery in Agnew in 1999.

Meanwhile, in the Archdiocese of Omaha, a new community of men and women, the Intercrossors of the Lamb, was granted the canonical status of a public association of the faithful in 1998. In 1985, groundbreaking began in Omaha on the Pope Paul VI Institute for the Study of Human Reproduction. The Institute has gained national and international recognition for its Catholic research and education on matters of human reproduction, especially Natural Family Planning. On Jan. 9, 1999, lay Catholics in Omaha began broadcasts from radio station KVSS, which featured material from EWTN and St. Joseph Radio as well as local church programming.

In 2000, the state's three bishops—Bruskewitz, Omaha's Curtiss, and Grand Island's McNamara—united successfully to support a proposed “Defense of Marriage” referendum, which established in state law that marriage could only be contracted between a man and a woman. They also voted to ensure that the ecclesiastical Province of Omaha would remain the only province in the nation outside of the East Coast to maintain the traditional day (i.e., 40 days after Easter) for the celebration of Ascension Thursday rather than moving it to the subsequent Sunday. The bishops' unified efforts reflect a common vision within an increasingly diverse Catholic population in the state of Nebraska.

Total population in 2000 according to Catholic records: 1,634,699.

Catholic population: 364,733. 22.3 percent of total.

Omaha Catholics: 220,179 out of total: 827,608. 26.6 percent of total.

Lincoln Catholics: 89,107 out of total: 516,662. 17.2 percent of total.

Grand Island Catholics: 55,447 out of total: 290,429. 19.1 percent of total.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, KING OF BABYLON

Reigned Sept. 7, 605, to 562 B.C. On the 1st of Elul, upon the death of his father, Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar II ascended the throne of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. The spelling of his name as Nabuchodonosor in the Vulgate and Douai Version has its basis in the Septuagint spelling, Ναβουχοδονοσόρ, which has the vowels of the original name approximately correct but incorrectly has an ‘n’ for an ‘r’ as the third last consonant. The original Akkadian name is Nabū-kudurušur [O Nabu, protect the border (or, the heir?)]. (See NEBO (NABU).) The Hebrew Masoretic Text has the name either as nēbukadreššer (so usually in Jeremiah) or less correctly as nēbukadneššer (so elsewhere).

The Old Testament and several ancient historians, such as Josephus, mention Nebuchadnezzar, as do many dedicatory inscriptions of his buildings; but the details of his reign were unknown until the recent publication of the Babylonian Chronicle by the British Museum. In 608–607 B.C., Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar (then Crown Prince) led the Babylonian forces against the mountainous country north of northwestern Mesopotamia. The next year saw another Babylonian invasion of southern Armenia and of the cities in the vicinity of Carchemish, the city on the Euphrates where Pharaoh NECO had established himself after defeating King Josiah of Judah at MEGIDDO (see 2 Kgs 23.29) and invading Syria. In the late spring of 605, after Nabopolassar had returned to Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar defeated Neco at Carchemish and again at Hamath on the Orontes. Just as Syria lay open to the Babylonian advance, Nabopolassar died in Babylon on the 8th of Ab (August 15), and Nebuchadnezzar returned to the capital city. The following year he was back in Syria, where he subdued Ashkelon and began to make inroads into Judah. An unsuccessful invasion of Egypt in late 601 forced Nebuchadnezzar to return to Babylon to recoup his strength.

At this point King Joachim of Judah (609–598), who had paid tribute to Babylon for three years, rebelled and thus committed a fatal error. After conquering northern Arabia, the Babylonians advanced against Jerusalem in 598–597. Joachim died soon after the siege began, and his 18-year-old son, Joachin, inherited the crown. After three months Jerusalem fell (March 16, 597), and its new king was taken to Babylon. Joachim's brother Sedecia was elevated to the throne by Nebuchadnezzar. His ten-year reign (597–587) was marked by continual agitation and sedition. By 589, inflamed with fierce patriotism and bolstered by promises of Egyptian support, Judah had pushed itself into open and irrevocable revolt. Nebuchadnezzar immediately reacted and besieged Jerusalem in late 588 or early 587. On the 9th of Tammuz (July 30), 587, the city fell. Shortly afterward, it was completely destroyed, and its inhabitants were deported to Babylonia. Judah was organized into the provincial system of the empire, and its population of poor peasants was governed by Godolia (Gedalia), a former chief minister of Sedecia.

Although there is a gap in the Babylonian Chronicle extending from the 11th year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (594–593) to the 3d year of Neriglissar's (557–556), it is known from an inscription that Nebuchadnezzar led his armies in an unsuccessful invasion of Egypt in 568. Nebuchadnezzar's long reign saw Babylonia rise to its zenith as a world power. Temples, public buildings, palaces, and canals were built not only in Babylonia itself, but in the other cities of the realm. The German archeologists of the "Deutsch-Orient Gesellschaft," headed by Dr. R. Koldewey, began excavating the site of the city of BABYLON in 1899. The careful method employed yielded the ruins of the city that was once the capital of a world empire. After a reign of 43 years, Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by his son Evil-Merodach. No historical value is to be attached to the Nebuchadnezzar of the Book of Daniel or that of Judith.

NECESSITY

Necessity signifies something fixed or determined that must be, or be so, and cannot be otherwise. Man cannot think that to be is the same as not to be, nor can he at once both affirm and deny the same of the same. Thus some awareness of necessity is included in the FIRST PRINCIPLES of human thought. However, a more distinct knowledge of necessity and its diverse kinds is attained with the notion of CAUSALITY. A cause is something that influences the being of another, or upon which something must follow with dependence in being. To know in the full sense of genuine understanding is, by common consent, to know the proper cause or necessary reason of being, on account of which something is, or is so, and cannot be otherwise.

When necessity is considered in regard to being or that which is, it is opposed to CONTINGENCY or corruptibility. A changeable thing, as such, is not a necessary being. Considered in relation to knowledge, necessity is opposed to OPINION or PROBABILITY, whereas in action it is opposed to FREEDOM.

Origins in Aristotle. In order to explain the meaning of necessity, ARISTOTLE lists examples according to the different kinds of causes (Meta. 1015a 20–1015b 16). Something may be necessary as a concurrent cause of being and life, as respiration is necessary for an organism. Furthermore, something may be necessary for the attaining of a good or the avoiding of an evil, as a journey may be necessary, or the taking of medicine. Again, force or violence have necessity, and also whatever is effected by force or violence. In general, that is necessary which cannot be otherwise, whether by reason of an intrinsic cause, such as matter or form or intrinsic nature, or by reason of an extrinsic cause, whether final or efficient. Just as in logical demonstrations necessary conclusions follow from necessary premises, so that which is necessary may be either an effect having a necessary cause, or a cause that is necessary of itself and not dependent upon another cause. In ancient times the heavenly bodies were thought to be necessary beings of incorruptible nature, yet dependent upon another cause. The first cause of all is itself uncaused. This is the strictly necessary being, the one that is purely actual and immutable.

Scholastic Doctrine. Considerations such as these, together with many others, were elaborated in the works of the medieval scholastics, among which the teaching of St. THOMAS AQUINAS is most representative. They taught that God is the only necessary being not dependent upon any other cause. God is subsistent being and intelligence. In Him being and essence, or nature, are identical, and so He is, or exists, with the most absolute necessity (Summa theologiae 1a, 3.4).

Necessity in Creatures. Furthermore, the scholastics taught that God created the world of bodies and intelligent spirits by the free exercise of His omnipotence, not from eternity but at the beginning of time, and not by necessity of His nature, or out of need for them, but out of generosity and benevolence (ST 1a, 19.3; 44.1). Hence the world is contingent upon God's good pleasure, and constantly depends in being on the Creator, without whose conserving act it would cease to be. Nevertheless, even in contingent beings there is something necessary, and there is nothing so contingent that it does not have necessary aspects (ST 1a, 86.3). Speaking of creatures as they are according to their own being and natures, spiritual beings together with their essential properties are strictly necessary and cannot be otherwise by any power within themselves. Material beings also are strictly necessary as regards matter and motion in general. Although particular bodies are contingent and corruptible, still in the course of nature they do not come from nothing, nor do they pass into nothing, but the corruption of one is the generation of another. Matter as the primary subject of change can be neither generated nor corrupted, nor can the general principles of motion cease to operate by any defect in themselves. The course of nature is neither chaotic nor perfectly regular; it includes many kinds of events and products that occur with regularity, as well as many that are incidental and accidental. Events and products that occur with regularity have determined efficient and material causes, and they share the necessity of their causes. Incidental and accidental occurrences, although undetermined or casual in particular, are necessary concomitants in the world order. (Cf. C. gent. 2.30.)

Natural Necessity. Because the course of nature is not perfectly regular, and because in particular cases the materials required for a process might be lacking or indisposed, or the agent might be prevented from producing its regular effect, the question was raised about the possibility of a philosophy or science of nature (see PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE). Do natural things have principles, causes, or elements that can be discovered and by which they can be explained scientifically? This question was answered in the affirmative from two points of view. In the first place, it was thought that the various species of natural things are distinguishable empirically by differences that are distinct and irreducible and that occur with sufficient regularity to manifest the definable natures with their consequent properties. These natures are changeable and corruptible as they are found in individuals, but when understood abstractly and according to their essential principles, they are necessary and universal. In the second place, the orderly processes of nature attain great natural advantages that are regularly produced and that are the ends or goals of natural activity. If one supposes that the natural end which is usually attained will in fact be attained, then certain other things are necessary, namely, certain materials to be determined or actualized by certain agents. To this there is no exception, and therefore it was maintained that from this point of view natural science is possible. It was thought that man can attain knowledge of natural things that is necessary and universal, not merely in regard to the general aspects of nature, but also in regard to the distinct species with their parts and interrelations. In order to attain a more detailed knowledge of nature, the scholastics undertook some experimentation and measurement, but progress was slow and few appreciated the importance of quantitative considerations. What was more characteristic of their thought was that while acknowledging that matter and motion are necessary, they sought a reason for this necessity in the end or final cause, which they admitted to be only conditionally or hypothetically necessary. Their cardinal point was that if the end is, or is to be, then the antecedents must be, without exception, in the order of nature. (Cf. In 2 phys. 15.)

Mathematical Necessity. Necessity in the objects of mathematics was held to be clearer and stronger than that in physical things (see MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF). The mathematician abstracted from sensible matter and motion, and considered quantitative beings merely as they are imaginable and intelligible. Mathematical numbers and figures were considered as existing only in the mind of the mathematician, and were constructed in the mind out of their known principles and elements. Hence they were regarded as more clearly and certainly known than physical things, and it was thought that many of their properties could be demonstrated as necessary. For many centuries mathematics was regarded as the paradigm of necessary and universal knowledge. (Cf. In Boeth. de Trin. 5.2; 6.1.)

However, the scholastics did not admit that in either physics or mathematics one considers forms or essences absolutely, according to their strictest necessity. This is the business of the metaphysician, who relates effects to their ultimate causes, whether of being or of truth and goodness, and tries to explain all things in relation to their strictly necessary cause, namely, God. (See METAPHYSICS.)

Moral Necessity. The scholastics pointed out a likeness between the necessity found in physical processes and that found in moral actions (see ETHICS). In a physical process there is unconditioned or absolute necessity on the part of the matter and the agent, and conditioned or hypothetical necessity on the part of the goal that is or is to be attained by determined means. So also in moral action there is absolute necessity in the principle that each man desires to be humanly happy, and hypothetical necessity to choose the reasonable good and avoid evil in order to achieve genuine happiness. The desire for GOOD is naturally determined, not free, but together with reason it is the principle of free CHOICE of the means to happiness. Yet freedom of choice might be impeded or lessened by ignorance and emotion. (Cf. In 6 eth. 3.1142–52.)

Logical Necessity. Necessity was admitted also in the purely logical order of mental operations. The mind begins to function and so must first apprehend its own object, called BEING, and then something opposed to being, which might be NONBEING or this as opposed to that. Then with natural necessity man judges that being is not nonbeing, or this is not that. Thus he attains the first principle of thought, called the principle of CONTRADICTION, which is not a supposition but an axiom, that is, a necessary, self-grounded, or self-evident principle. Likewise, after one knows whole and part, he must judge with natural necessity that the whole is greater than the part. In regard to these primitive concepts and principles the mind is naturally determined by the clearest EVIDENCE, and so error is here impossible. From principles that are known to be true and necessary, one can by valid reasoning draw conclusions that are also true and necessary (see DEMONSTRATION). In formal logic it is sufficient that the consequence or logical connection between the principles and the conclusion be valid and necessary, according to the laws of reasoning based on the axioms or postulates of the system. The necessity in this case is not absolute but hypothetical: if a valid conclusion is to be reached, the premises must be thus or so; and if the premises are thus or so, this conclusion must follow because it is the only one permitted by the axioms, all others being excluded. (Cf. In 1 anal. post. 13; In 2 anal. post. 7.)

Nonscholastic Thought. During the scholastic period there were many thinkers, both Platonists and nominalists, who rejected the moderate REALISM of Aristotle and his medieval followers. Nominalists emphasized the contingencies in sensory experience, and neglected or denied the intelligible necessities of being, with its necessary reasons and causes. Platonists did not look for intelligibility in the sensible world, but rather in the world of transcendent ideas and spiritual realities. (See NOMINALISM; PLATONISM.)

Cartesianism. At the beginning of the modern period, R. DESCARTES endeavored to make a complete break from the methods and principles of ordinary thought and traditional philosophy. He chose to proceed not from knowledge of something that is necessary and universal, such as the principle of contradiction, but from the particular fact of his own thought, which he identified with his own being. Thereafter, he went step by step from one clear and distinct idea to another, without seeking in all cases a rational or intelligible connection between his ideas.

The method and teachings of Descartes resulted in opposing tendencies of RATIONALISM and EMPIRICISM, and of IDEALISM and MATERIALISM, with attempts to unite both tendencies in various forms of MONISM.

Rationalism and Empiricism. B. SPINOZA and G. W. LEIBNIZ developed the rationalist tendencies into a deterministic view of God and the world. According to these thinkers, necessity was opposed to freedom only when it resulted from external domination or compulsion, not from internal determination. God is free because He is self-determined, and all nature is determined by God. Hence everything is necessary and nothing contingent, nor is there genuine freedom of choice in God or man.

T. HOBBS, J. LOCKE, and D. HUME also defined freedom as lack of external compulsion. Hume maintained that everything has a cause, and denied CHANCE, but held that man does not know necessary causes in nature. Kant saw that this restriction of human knowledge to PHENOMENA threatened the validity of physical science as developed particularly by I. Newton. Hence, in order to defend this kind of science, Kant attributed the elements of necessity and universality to the structure of the mind that knows, rather than to the thing known. He held that the mind has necessary ways of knowing, antecedent to all experience of particular things, and maintained that the essences of things and their necessary causes are speculatively unknowable. However, he admitted that the acknowledgement of God and freedom, morality, and immortality are practically necessary for a good life.

Idealism and Materialism. This strain of subjectivism was further developed into idealism by J. G. FICHTE, F. SCHELLING, and G. W. F. HEGEL to the point where the inner necessity of the idea was identified with the outer necessity of historical fact. Communists now interpret the Hegelian dialectic as a determined order of materialistic evolution that eventually and inevitably will favor themselves.

Formalism. Many contemporary logicians and mathematicians profess to have no interest in principles that are true and necessary. They employ terms that are defined only by the postulates of the AXIOMATIC SYSTEM they freely invent, and frankly acknowledge that one cannot know whether the systems in actual use are either complete or self-consistent.

Critique. This brief account shows that modern ways of philosophical thought are far removed from the natural realism of Aristotle and the scholastics. Nevertheless, universality and consistency remain the goals of thought, and these necessarily exclude self-contradiction. It appears impossible to doubt the necessity of the principle of contradiction, or the ability of the human mind to know TRUTH, and to discover in some cases, at least, the necessary reasons and causes of being, without which things cannot be as they are or as they ought to be. In such knowledge of the necessary reasons and causes of being, genuine SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, and WISDOM are commonly thought to consist.

NECESSITY OF MEANS

Something is said to be necessary with the necessity of means when it fulfills the function of means to an end; hence it is intrinsically related to the nature of the subject necessitating it. This necessity belongs to the ontological order.

Necessity of means can be absolute or relative. It is absolute when it excludes the possibility of being supplied by something else; e.g., sanctifying grace is necessary for the beatific vision by absolute necessity of means. Absolute necessity of means is also called metaphysical necessity.

Necessity of means is relative when it does not exclude the possibility of being supplied by something else. Thus Baptism of water is necessary for salvation by a relative necessity of means; in fact, under certain conditions, Baptism of desire (in voto) can remit original sin. Similarly the Church is necessary for salvation by absolute necessity of means, but membership in the Church is necessary only by relative necessity of means, because, if one is invincibly ignorant of the Church and at the same time, through the Church's invisible mediation, one possesses faith and sanctifying grace, one can be saved without being a formal member. Relative necessity of means is also called physical necessity.

In more theological language, absolute necessity of means demands the presence of a thing that is the means in its full reality (in re), whereas relative necessity can be satisfied by the desire for it or VOTUM (IN VOTO).

See Also: NECESSITY OF PRECEPT; SALVATION, NECESSITY OF THE CHURCH FOR.

NECESSITY OF PRECEPT

Something is said to be necessary by necessity of precept when it is required by a positive will of the superior or legislator. Hence the quality or entity in question is not intrinsically related to the nature of the subject requiring it, but only extrinsically, i.e., by the free determination of another subject.

This necessity belongs to the moral order, and not to the metaphysical order; hence it ceases to urge when it is physically or morally impossible to satisfy it. Thus, to hear Mass on Sunday, being imposed by a positive law of the Church under pain of mortal sin, is necessary by necessity of precept. If a dispensation is obtained from the legitimate authority, or if the law cannot be fulfilled except with grave inconvenience, or if it is physically impossible to fulfill it, the law ceases to urge.

The Catholic Church, for instance, is said to be necessary for SALVATION, not only by necessity of means, but also by necessity of precept. Christ set up the kingdom of God on earth, which is the Church, and entrusted it to the Apostles and their successors. All must have the Gospel of the kingdom preached to them and be baptized in order to form part of this kingdom, and those who refuse cannot be saved (Mk 16.16). Similarly Baptism is necessary for salvation, not only by necessity of means, but also by necessity of precept, namely, by the positive will of Christ and by the law of the Church.

NECROLOGY

A list or register in which the names of dead members, associates, and benefactors of religious communities or capitular and collegial bodies were inscribed so that prayers might be offered for their souls on the anniversary of their death.

Though the necrology eventually assumed its own proper form and use, it originated in the DIPTYCHS from which were read the names of those to be commemorated during Mass. In the 7th century the list of the dead, by then become impossibly long, began to be limited to those directly related to the community and was arranged according to the day of death. At first these lists were inserted in liturgical books already in existence, in Sacramentaries, calendars, and MARTYROLOGIES. Then, as the necrology became longer, it was drawn up as an independent register following the plan of a calendar with obits arranged according to the day of the month. This form began to be used late in the 8th century. Eventually the list of the dead was read with the martyrology during the canonical hour of Prime. It is probably for this reason that the register was often called martyrologium in the Middle Ages. Other common names were liber obituum, liber defunctorum, necrologium, and obituarium. In a few cases the name liber vitae was used, though this term usually referred to the living. In its final form, attained by about 1100, the necrology included the names of deceased members of the community, the deceased of communities that had entered a fellowship of prayer, servants, and benefactors.

Of somewhat different form were the Annales necrologici, in which the names of the dead were noted year by year, either as part of the annual notice in a chronicle or in a register especially given to this purpose, e.g., the Fulda Annals 779–1065 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores, 13:161–215).

The necrologies of the Middle Ages have proved a useful source for the historian and the philologist. They are still in use by some religious orders and various charitable societies that commemorate the anniversaries of deceased members.

NECROMANCY

A form of magic employed for calling up the spirits of the dead, or demons, to foretell the future or to accomplish some other act in the natural world that would otherwise be impossible. The practitioners from ancient times to the present have usually belonged to a special class of priests or seers. Necromancy, in various forms, has had a worldwide distribution. It had an important place in the Assyro-Babylonian and Egyptian civilizations, and a well-known example is found in the Old Testament. The Greeks were familiar with it, as is indicated by the elaborate ritual used by Odysseus in calling up the spirits of the dead (Odyssey, 11.23–332), and by the role assigned to the departed in temple medicine. It was current also among the Etruscans and Romans. Although necromancy was severely condemned by the Church, repeated references are made to the practice in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, and a considerable body of writings on the subject is extant. The traditional necromancy was made famous by the Faust legend and its literary treatment by Marlowe and Goethe.

NEERCASSEL, JOANNES VAN

Bishop of Castoria in partibus, and sixth vicar apostolic of the Dutch Mission; b. Gorcum, 1623; d. Zwolle, June 6, 1686. After studies in Cuyck, Louvain, and Paris, where he joined the Congregation of the Oratory, he was ordained in 1648. He became vicar-general of the archbishopric of Utrecht in 1653, coadjutor of Vicars Zacharias de Metz in 1661 and Balduinus Cats in 1662. He succeeded Cats in the next year. His was a brilliant, somewhat capricious personality, formed in the Berullian school and inclined toward Jansenistic rigorism. Of his writings, Amor poenitens (1683) was censured by the Index in 1690; the Tractatus de sanctorum. . . cultu (1675) was criticized for disparaging the cult of the saints; and the Tractatus de lectione Scripturarum (1677) was reproved for allowing the reading of the Bible in the vernacular. Though he signed the anti-Jansenist formula of Alexander VII without restriction, he had relations with the Abbey of PORT-ROYAL and invited Antoine ARNAULD to settle down at Delft.

NEHEMIAH

Jewish governor of Judea under the Persians. He succeeded in having the fallen walls of Jerusalem rebuilt. Before he was governor, Nehemiah (Heb. nehemyâ) was an official at the court of the Persian king, Artaxerxes I (465–424 B.C.). The conditions under which the Palestinian Jews then lived were far from ideal. The defenses of the capital, Jerusalem, lay in ruins and the Jews, themselves, were subject to harassment and oppression by their predatory neighbors. Hearing of these conditions and moved by pity for his people, Nehemiah obtained credentials from the king and set out in the 20th year of Artaxerxes for Jerusalem, where he remained for 12 years (445–433 B.C.) as governor (pehâ in Neh 5.14, 15, 18; 12.26; tiršātā' in Neh 8.9; 10.2; Neh 2.1–8; 5.14).

His first major accomplishment was to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, despite the threats and various stratagems of the neighboring governors, Sanballat of Samaria, Tobiah the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arab, who accused him of rebellion against the king (Neh 2.10, 19; ch. 4; ch. 6). In Neh 7.15 it is said the wall was completed in 52 days, but the period of two years and four months that Josephus (Ant. 11.5.8) allows for is a much more plausible length of time.

During this time, famine and usurious exactions of the upper classes brought the poorer people crying to Nehemiah for relief (Neh 5.1–5). Prompt action by the governor—his request to the assembled leaders, with pointed reference to his own unselfish example—led to the restoration of lands and houses to the indigent (Neh 5.6–13; 5.14–19). Next, Nehemiah resettled a tenth of Judea's population, moving them into the newly fortified Jerusalem (Neh 7.4–5; 11.1–2). The dedication of the city's wall is described (in the Chronicler's style) in Neh 12.27–43.

In 433 B.C., Nehemiah returned to Artaxerxes (Neh 13.6). Sometime after that, but before the king's death in 424, Nehemiah came again to Jerusalem as governor. This time he was noted principally for correcting abuses. He drove Tobiah from a room that had formerly served as a temple storeroom but had been given to Tobiah for his personal use (Neh 13.4–9); reinstated the practice of tithing for the support of the Levites (Neh 13.10–14); enforced observance of the Sabbath (Neh 13.15–22); and prohibited marriages with foreigners, to prevent such marriages from leading the Jews into idolatrous practices (Neh 13.23–27). He also expelled the son-in-law of Sanballat from the Jerusalemite priesthood (Neh 13.28–29).

Comparatively little else is known of Nehemiah. According to Neh 7.2 he placed his brother, Hanani, in charge of Jerusalem. In Sir 49.13 he is praised for restoring Jerusalem's defenses. The “memories of Nehemiah” cited in 2 Mc 1.36 associate him with a discovery of fire-producing  $\nu\epsilon\phi\theta\alpha\rho$  (naphtha), and in 2 Mc 2.13 it is said that he founded a library and collected various books: (1) about kings (the Old Testament books of Joshua through Kings?), (2) Prophets, (3) David's writings (Psalms), and (4) royal letters (of the Persian kings) concerning votive offerings. One Talmudic reference identifies him (incorrectly) with Zerubbabel (Sanhedrin 38a), and another credits him (wrongly) with the completion of the book of Chronicles (Baba Bathra 15a). For the Book of Nehemiah, see CHRONICLER, BIBLICAL.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF

A biblical book whose principal narratives relate: (1) the return of Nehemiah, an official (cupbearer) at the court of the Persian king Artaxerxes I (464–423 B.C.) to the province of Judah; (2) the work of Nehemiah and the Jewish people in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, despite economic difficulties and the opposition of the Samaritan governor Sanaballat and others; (3) the reading of the Law by the priest-scribe Ezra and the renewal of the covenant with God by the Jewish community; (4) the rehabilitation of Jerusalem; and (5) the return of Nehemiah to Jerusalem after an interval at the Persian court and his correction of abuses discovered upon his return. (For a more complete treatment of this book, see CHRONICLER, BIBLICAL.)

NEILL, STEPHEN CHARLES

Anglican missionary bishop, missiology and ecumenist, b. Edinburgh, 1900; d. 1984. Born into a missionary family, he experienced a conversion while in college and followed his missionary parents to India, where he was ordained a deacon. Later, his dissertation at Trinity College, Cambridge, compared Plotinus’ writings with those of Gregory of Nyssa and Gregory of Nazianzen, a work which served as his introduction to Hindu monism. He left the academic life and became a member of the Church Missionary Society in India, where he served for 22 years, evangelizing, traveling, and teaching Indian students in the Tamil language. He eventually learned 14 languages and was a pioneer in teaching theology in the vernacular, both in India and later in Africa. In 1939, he was made bishop of Tinnevely, India, and remained there through World War II, but after a psychological breakdown in 1945, Neill left the country.

From his early years Neill strove toward reconciliation among Christians, first in a united Church in South India, as the associate general secretary at the International Missionary Council and World Council of Churches from 1948 to 1951, and as general editor of World Christian Books for the next ten years. His gift for speaking and writing often appealed to a variety of Protestant groups. Neill was appointed professor of missions and ecumenical theology at the University of Hamburg (1962–1967) and professor of religious studies at the University of Nairobi (1929–1973). He was a prolific writer with over 100 works he edited or authored, many of them related to ecumenism and mission.

NELSON, JOHN, BL.

Jesuit priest and martyr; b. Skelton, Yorkshire, England, c. 1534–35; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Feb. 3, 1578. Three of the five sons of Sir Nicholas Nelson—John, Martin, and Thomas—became priests. John began his seminary studies at Douai in 1573 at about age 40. He was ordained (June 11, 1576) by Abp. Louis de Berlaymont of Cambrai at Bynche, Hainault. Five months later he departed the Continent with four other newly ordained priests to enter the English mission. He labored in London for about a year before his arrest (Dec. 1, 1577) and commitment to Newgate Prison. During his examination by the High Commissioners a few days later, he adamantly denied the authority of the queen in spiritual matters and described Elizabeth as a heretic and schismatic. He repeated these statements at his trial, Feb. 1, 1578. For this he was found guilty of high treason and condemned to execution. Thereafter he was thrown into the Pit of the Tower of London—an underground dungeon, where he prepared for death.

During his imprisonment at Newgate, he wrote to the French Jesuits seeking admission to the Society. Permission was granted; thus, Nelson is recognized as a Jesuit martyr.

On the gallows he witnessed powerfully to the faith for which he was dying. Praying common prayers in Latin, asking and granting pardon for offenses, and seeking the intercession of the faithful. He said: “I die in the unity of the Catholic Church; and for that unity do now most willingly suffer my blood to be shed; therefore, I beseech God . . . to make you, and all others that are not such already, true Catholic men, and both to live and die in the unity of our Holy Mother, the Catholic Roman Church." His last words as his disembowelment began: "I forgive the queen and all the authors of my death."

He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

NEMESIUS OF EMESA

Bishop of Emesa (now Homs), early Christian psychologist; fl. c. 390–400. Apart from his treatise On the Nature of Man, nothing is known of his life, but there is no reason for identifying him with Nemesius, pagan governor of Cappadocia (c. 383 to 389), the friend and correspondent of St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS. Several Greek manuscripts of his work and excerpts quoted by MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR call him a bishop. Nemesius, a man of considerable culture, was acquainted with philosophical and medical literature, and was critical and independent in his judgment of doctrines. Although Origen, Basil the Great, and especially Gregory of Nyssa had written of man and the soul, Nemesius composed the first summa of Christian psychology in the East. The work is a compilation, with extensive borrowings from Galen and the philosophers; but the material is assessed from a Christian viewpoint before being admitted into a remarkable synthesis that is neither Platonic nor Aristotelian, but Christian in character.

The opening chapter criticizes the concepts of man advanced by Plotinus and Apollinaris, Aristotle, and Plato, and then emphasizes the place of man in the plan of creation. Since man bridges the spiritual and the material worlds, he occupies a privileged place and has a corresponding obligation to live up to the dignity God has given him. This requires a correct concept of what the soul is (ch. 2). Here neither Plato nor Aristotle provides an adequate doctrine: one making the soul too independent of the body, the other reducing the soul to little more than a quality of the body. Nemesius concludes that the soul is an incorporeal entity, subsistent in itself, immortal, and yet designed for union with the body, and discovers in Ammonius Saccas and Porphyry the best explanation of that union (ch. 3): the soul is not changed in the union nor does it become corruptible with or through the body, and yet it makes one being with the body. A certain parallel for such a unique union Nemesius finds in the union of the Divine Word and the human nature in the Incarnation. He has no clear statement on the origin of the soul, and seems to believe in a species of pre-existence totally devoid of Platonic myth or of the errors of ORIGEN.

After a detailed study of the powers of the soul, based on Galen's divisions of the brain, and on anthropological doctrines of the Stoics, Aristotle, and others (chapters through which the scholastics became acquainted with much ancient tradition), Nemesius lays the foundation for a Christian philosophy of free will and human acts. Although he depends on Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics for many details, such as the classification of human acts (ch. 29– ), the power of choice (ch. 33– ), Nemesius establishes, as a specifically Christian approach, the fact that free will is a concomitant of reason: "If the creature is endowed with reason, it is master of what it does, or else the power to deliberate and choose is pointless; and if it is master of its actions, it must by all means possess free will" (ch. 41). Changeableness, also, is a mark of the creature, even in its rational nature. The psychology of the human act propounded by Nemesius was perfected by Maximus the Confessor (580–662); as passed on by the Syrian Mose bar Kepha, ANASTASIUS SINAITA, and JOHN DAMASCENE, it became an important part of scholastic doctrine [cf. Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 21 (1954) 51–100; and O. Lottin, Psychologie et morale aux XII<sup>e</sup> et XIII<sup>e</sup> siècles, v.1 (Gembloux 1957) 393–424].

The treatise came to be ascribed to St. Gregory of Nyssa (who had written a work "On the Making of Man"), and was known under his name to the Western scholastics in the Latin translations of ALPHANUS OF SALERNO (d. 1085) and Burgundio of Pisa (c. 1160), although some sentences were also known to the scholastics under the name of Remigius.

NENGAPETE, MARIE-CLÉMENTINE ANUARITE, BL.

Baptized Anuarite (Anawarite or Alphonsine), martyr of the Congregation of the Holy Family; b. Dec. 29, 1939, Matali, Wamba, Belgian Congo, Africa; d. Dec. 1, 1964, Isiro near Kisangani, Zaire. Anuarite was baptized with her mother and sister. In 1954 at the age of fifteen, she entered the Congregation of the Holy Family at Bafwabaka and was professed (Aug. 5, 1959) as Sister Marie-Clémentine. Ten years later the Congo, which had gained its independence four years earlier, was in turmoil. General Olenga's rebels, who had assassinated Bishop Wittehois of Wamba (Nov. 26, 1964), arrived at the convent on Nov. 29, 1964, to conduct the nuns and orphans to Isiro for safety. Soon after their arrival, Sisters Marie-Clémentine and Bokuma were separated from the rest for the pleasure of two colonels. When Mother Kasima protested, Colonel Yuma Deo threatened to kill all thirty-four women and children. Sister Marie-Clémentine offered herself as the victim, but refused the advances of Colonel Olombe. After being brutalized, she was shot in the chest but lingered in pain for another day. She was immediately revered as a virgin martyr and formally beatified at Kinshasa, Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo), by John Paul II, Aug. 15, 1985.

NEOCAESAREA

Three bishoprics bear the name Neocaesarea in the early Church.

Neocaesarea in Bithynia. The exact location is uncertain, but it was probably in the western part of Bithynia mentioned in 1 Peter 1.1. Two of its bishops attended synods in Constantinople: Olympius (c. 381) and Cyriacus (518).

Neocaesarea in Pontus Polemoniaca. Here Origen's distinguished student, St. GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, was bishop c. 240 to 270. According to St. GREGORY OF NYSSA, the Church in Pontus suffered persecution under emperors DECIUS and Galerius. When peace was restored, Gregory Thaumaturgus christianized pagan festivals, gathered the relics of martyrs, fixed days for commemorating their triumphs, and inspired his flock to erect churches. An important synod between 314 and 325 enacted legislation that affected the catechumenate for many years and barred the clinici from the priesthood on the ground that they had received baptism more from fear of death and judgment than from dedication to Christ. Some ruins, fragments of inscriptions, and sculptures remain as witnesses to the once flourishing church.

Neocaesarea on the Euphrates in Northern Syria.

This was a military garrison in Augusta Euphratensis, whose fortifications were strengthened under JUSTINIAN I. THEODORET OF CYR (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, 44:31) mentions Paul, bishop of Neocaesarea, who had suffered for the faith, as being present at the Council of NICAEA I.

NEOCATECHUMENAL WAY

The Neocatechumenal Way, or the Neocatechumenate, is a loosely organized Catholic renewal and catechetical apostolate founded in 1962 in the Palomeras slums of Madrid by Kiko Argüello, who serves as a chief catechist of the movement and is currently a consultant to the Pontifical Council on the Laity. From the start, the Neocatechumenate received the approval and support of the bishop of Madrid at the time, Casimiro Morcillo.

In 1974 Pope PAUL VI welcomed members of Neocatechumenal communities in a general audience and declared that this "way" after baptism would "renew in today's Christian communities those effects of maturity and deepening that, in the primitive Church, were realized by the period of preparation for baptism." Twenty-five years later, in 1990, Pope JOHN PAUL II officially recognized the Neocatechumenal Way as "an itinerary of catholic formation, valid for our society and for our times" and encouraged bishops and priests in the Church to "value and support this work for the new evangelization." Again in 1994, Pope John Paul II praised the Neocatechumenal Way for showing that "the small community, sustained by the Word of God and by the dominical Eucharist, becomes a place of communion, where the family recovers the sense and the joy of its fundamental mission to transmit both natural and supernatural life." In 1997 Pope John Paul II encouraged members of the Neocatechumenal Way in their effort to draft statutes for ecclesiastical recognition.

With the encouragement of Pope Paul VI and Pope John Paul II, the Neocatechumenal Way has spread to di-oces whose bishops welcome it and in parishes whose pastors are committed to it. There are about 200,000 members in more than 100 countries, organized in 300 small communities in 80 dioceses. Giuseppe Gennarini brought the Neocatechumenal Way to the United States in 1975; they are represented in the archdioceses of Denver, Newark, New York, and Washington, as well as on the West Coast and Texas.

Explicitly avoiding the appellations “movement” or “association,” the Neocatechumenal Way is a self-styled program or apostolate of Christian formation. With its stress on exclusive fellowship, intense personal commitment, simplicity of life, communal sharing, and apostolic zeal, the Neocatechumenal Way takes its inspiration from the structure and ethos of the first Christian communities who were known as adherents of “the Way.” The program seeks to recover and replicate the early Christian catechumenal pattern of KERYGMA, conversion, and liturgy as a phased or progressive formation of new Christians: the announcement of salvation that calls for moral decision and thus changes the lives of its hearers and is sealed by participation in the sacramental life of the Church. Proponents of the Neocatechumenal program offer it to Christians who are already baptized but who lack adequate formation in the faith and are thus “quasi-catechumens.” It appeals to committed Catholics who want to deepen their faith and to fallen-away Catholics who want to rediscover it.

Service to Local Church. Although the Neocatechumenate is fundamentally a lay movement, the commitment and leadership of the diocesan bishop and the local pastors are crucial to its organization and activities. The founders and leaders of the Neocatechumenate stress its role as a service to the local church. The Eucharist, celebrated by the pastor with great reverence in homes or in small groups, is the anchor of the Neocatechumenal Way. Participants in the seven-year-long formation program are called “catechumens” in order to signal the fact that even the baptized person may not yet have attained a sufficient level of conversion and knowledge in the life of the faith. While continuing to live at home, catechumens participate in this formation as members of communities of 15 to 30 members who meet at least twice a week for catechesis and to celebrate the Eucharist. Day-long meetings are held monthly, as well as occasional social gatherings and regular “scrutinies” and liturgies to mark the transition to a new stage of formation. Eventually, some members become “itinerants” and move on in order to establish Neocatechumenal communities elsewhere.

Another important aspect of the Neocatechumenate is its dedication to the cultivation of religious and priestly vocations and to the foundation of “missionary seminaries” with formation programs patterned on the principles of the Neocatechumenal Way. The best known of these seminaries is the Redemptoris Mater in Rome. Others have been founded in Madrid, Warsaw, Bangalore, Newark, Medellín, Bogotá, Callao (Peru), and Takamatsu (Japan). The seminaries are distinguished by their combination of Christian initiation and formation for the presbyterate.

In 1990 Pope John Paul II assigned to Bishop Paul Josef Cordes, now president of the Pontifical Council Cor Unum, responsibility ad personam for the apostolate of the Way.

NEO-GUELFISM

The program of Italian Catholic liberals during the RISORGIMENTO who stressed the relation between the Church and civilization and led the reform-unification movement from 1843 to 1848. Some Italians used the term Neo-Gue尔夫ism in derision, but its followers accepted it. These opponents, the Neo-Ghibellines, thought the temporal power of the papacy a hindrance to Italian unification. They were fewer in number and less noted than the Neo-Gue尔夫s, whose ranks included such scholars and writers as Balbo, Capponi, Manzoni, TOSTI, and Carlo Troya.

The leading Neo-Gue尔夫 was Vincenzo GIOBERTI. In his most famous book, Del Primato Morale e Civile degli Italiani (1843), he reminded his countrymen of their former greatness, proposed liberal reforms, and a unification plan that envisioned a federation of the independent states of the peninsula with the pope as president and the king of Sardinia as military defender. The book was popular and influential. It appealed to moderates who disapproved of Mazzini. The book also inspired Balbo to write Le Speranze d’Italia. The future PIUS IX discussed both books with friends. Soon after his elevation to the papacy (1846), he began a series of reforms in the STATES OF THE CHURCH that attracted much attention, and helped the progress of reform in other Italian states.

The effectiveness of Neo-Guelfism quickly subsided after the revolution of 1848, and very little interest was shown thereafter in federation. Even in 1843 not all Neo-Guelfs accepted Gioberti's main notion of the pope as president of Italy. Balbo and others preferred Charles Albert as king. When Pius IX proposed a customs union and a federation with Tuscany and Piedmont, Charles Albert proposed a defensive league, which conflicted with the Pope's position as a spiritual leader. After the decline of Neo-Guelfism, Italians turned to the leadership of Piedmont for the unification of Italy.

NEO-KANTIANISM

A term employed in the history of philosophy to designate the sustained attempt, by a number of groups and from different points of view, to reconstitute the thought of Immanuel KANT as the basis for a philosophy that would meet the problematic and speculative exigencies of the second half of the 19th century. It was primarily a German movement, with centers at a number of German universities; it was not exclusively so, however, for its influence was felt in England, France, Italy, and, with the emigration of Ernst CASSIRER, one of the last great representatives of the movement, in the U.S. Otto Liebmann (1840–1912), in his work Kant und die Epigonen (Stuttgart 1865), is credited both with the decisive initiation of the current and with the coining of its rubric, "back to Kant," for he concluded the studies of the work of J. G. FICHTE, F. W. J. SCHELLING, G. W. F. HEGEL, A. SCHOPENHAUER, etc., which comprise the book, with this phrase. The rubric cannot be taken, however, as indicating a single unitary movement, for there existed a great diversity of opinion as to the doctrines of Kant to which return should be made. Moreover, even when some degree of consent was achieved on this point, various interpretations of the favored doctrines were offered. These interpretations were not always wholly self-consistent or consistent with each other; nor, finally, were they authentic interpretations of Kant that realized all the potentialities of his thought. On the whole, the cultural pressure of POSITIVISM tended to make the Neo-Kantians place an excessively narrow interpretation on Kant's philosophy.

Historical Background. The historical background of the Neo-Kantian movement is provided by positivism, toward which Neo-Kantianism exhibits an ambivalent attitude. On the one hand, its central motive is a rejection of the positivist claims; on the other, it exhibits the influence of positivism in many facets of its doctrines and methods. Thus, it repudiates the attitudes of positivism as dogmatic and antiphilosophical; at the same time, it accepts the central thesis of positivism, i.e., that physicomathematical science provides the paradigm of all valid forms of knowledge. In accordance with this view, it conceives the philosophical task as the critical investigation of the conditions that make this kind of knowledge possible and valid. This conception of the task of philosophy constitutes the real point of contact and reference between Neo-Kantianism and Kant; for Kant had conceived philosophy as the critical examination and determination of the a priori principles and structures that render experience of the physical world and action in the moral sphere possible and provide the basis for scientific, ethical, and preferential discourse. At the same time, Neo-Kantianism devotes considerable attention to the tradition of Romanticism, which it criticized and rejected far more forcibly than it did positivism (see ROMANTICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL). Romanticism had directed sharp criticism against physicomathematical science on the basis of the abstractness intrinsic to it; it had proposed instead a conception of philosophy as concrete knowledge, free from and unlimited by such abstractness. Romanticism had, in its own way, claimed Kant as progenitor; Neo-Kantianism rejected this claim as spurious, pointing out that the essence of Kantian method was scientific rigor, a quality conspicuously lacking among the Romantic philosophers. Its return to Kant was an effort to preserve the positivist ideal of a philosophy as scientifically rigorous as a physico-mathematical discipline and, with this, the Kantian transcendental values. The historical development of the movement is determined by its efforts to realize this ideal in the various areas of speculative interest.

Principal Currents. The principal currents comprising the Neo-Kantian movement, or at least conventionally allied with it, are (1) the realist current, whose principal exponent was A. Riehl; (2) the psychological current, represented by L. Nelson, the follower of the psychologist J. F. Fries; (3) the metaphysical current, a chief representative of which was the same Leibmann who is credited with originating the Neo-Kantian motto; (4) the logical current, called the School of Marburg because its center was at that university, led by H. Cohen and counting as its chief figures P. Natorp and E. Cassirer; (5) the value theory current, called also the School of Baden, including among its adherents such distinguished figures as H. Rickert, W. Windelband, H. Münsterberg, and, by a looser connection, W. Dilthey; and finally, for the sake of completeness, (6) the physiological current, associated with the researches of H. A. von Humboldt and the relativistic current of G. Simmel. The important figure of Bruno BAUCH was dominant in the movement for many years; though formed in the School of Baden and always devoted chiefly to its theoretical interests, he exercised, through his editorship of the important journal Kantsstudien, a guiding influence over all the currents of the movement. From the point of view of theoretical interest, clarity of development, and distinction of achievement, the logical School of Marburg and the value-theory oriented School of Baden are the outstanding elements of the Neo-Kantian movement.

Alois Riehl. The realistic current found its chief exponent in Alois Riehl (1844–1924), whose chief work, Der philosophische Kritizismus (2 v. Leipzig 1876–87), was the basic document of the movement. Riehl strikes a characteristic note of all Neo-Kantians by his resolute rejection of metaphysics as a philosophical science. Philosophy, for him, is a science of experience and what does not fall within experience can find no expression in philosophical discourse. At the same time, he rejects, en bloc, all the idealistic and Romantic interpretations of Kant; these assign an exclusive role to the subject, which, in Hegel's phrase, takes the world onto itself. Riehl returns rather to Kant's original distinction and insists that from the subject can be derived only the form of knowledge; the content of knowledge must come from experience, and ultimately from sense experience. It must be noted that, while returning to this original Kantian distinction, Riehl tends to overlook the many difficulties to which it had given rise and the efforts made, in the idealistic tradition, to meet these difficulties. Riehl is one of those who was forced by the cultural pressure of positivism to impose an excessively narrow interpretation on Kantian thought. For Riehl, the Kant of the Critique of Pure Reason is very nearly the only Kant, and philosophy becomes identical with the theory of knowledge and its adjunct problems. He remains strictly faithful to Kant in that he conceives the theory of knowledge in gnoseological, and never in psychological, terms.

Leonard Nelson. The last-mentioned attitude sets Riehl in contrast with the psychological current, the chief exponent of which was Leonard Nelson (1882–1927). Nelson, professor at Göttingen from 1919 until his death and founder of the Neo-Friesian School, proposed, on the model of Jakob Friedrich Fries (1773–1843), to develop the critical GNOSEOLOGY of Kant on psychological bases and in accord with a strict psychological method. The author of many studies and editor of the journal of the Neo-Friesian School (Abhandlungen der Friesschen Schule) for a number of years, Nelson is best known, perhaps, for his contributions to this journal questioning the possibility of the theory of knowledge—in much the same sense as Riehl had proposed to make such a theory the exclusive concern of philosophy. Nelson's criticism is based on the fact that this theory would presume to offer a criterion for determining the validity of knowledge, while the status of such a criterion would be entirely ambiguous. On the one hand, it could not itself be knowledge; nor, on the other hand, could it fall outside the sphere of knowledge, since a criterion, to be used, must be known. His solution was to return to the simpler and immediate elements of consciousness that could become the object of psychological treatment. The entire process of the Kantian critiques was thus recast in psychologically descriptive terms—and not only the processes of knowledge but such ethical principles as the categorical imperative as well. Nelson enjoyed a considerable influence, but this waned rapidly during the period between World War I and World War II.

Otto Liebmann. The metaphysical current of Neo-Kantianism found its chief exponent in Liebmann. The fame of his early work Kant und die Epigonen tends to place in the shade his more positive and constructive work, precisely the work that establishes him as the leading figure of the metaphysical current of Neo-Kantianism. His avowed purpose was to develop the basic problems of Kantianism in such a manner as to achieve a synthesis between the demands of criticism and those of metaphysics. It might also be said that he sought to carry criticism beyond the point where Kant had left it to build a systematic metaphysics that would be faithful to the conditions laid down by the critical philosophy. An idea of what he meant by metaphysics may be gathered by his assertion that, whereas physics deducts facts from laws, the role of metaphysics is to determine the why of all that happens in nature and experience. Metaphysics in this sense is possible only if it is at the same time critical, by which he meant that it proceeds by a hypothetical consideration of the essence of things. Yet his would be a metaphysics relative to the human mind, since the critical attitude demands that, at every point in the construction of that metaphysics, the conditions of human understanding be taken as limits and terms of reference. Liebmann made a like condition for the unity of ethical theory and the critical attitude. There are no absolute values, since values are relative to the valuing subject; yet, with constant reference to that subject, it is still possible to achieve an ethics of transcendental value.

Marburg School. Equally adamant in its opposition to the “psychologization” of Kant and inclined in an antimetaphysical direction was the School of Marburg, perhaps the most distinguished of the Neo-Kantian groups. It was a school in a very true sense, for it had a physical location, identifiable personnel in constant and explicit communication with each other, and a commonly accepted goal and method. Founded by Hermann Cohen (1843–1918), it retained during its entire career the stamp of his personality and the direction he imparted to it. Cohen also attracted men of high caliber both in their formation and scholarship and in their theoretical capacity. The most eminent of these were Paul Natorp (1854–1924) and Ernst Cassirer (1874–1945), the last-named bringing international prestige to the group by his masterly historical work and his well-researched and carefully articulated speculative efforts. An excellent account of the school and its work is provided by Natorp in his essay “Kant und die Marburger Schule,” Kantstudien 17 (1912) 193–221.

The direction given by Cohen and characteristic of the school throughout its career is logical and methodological; its main link with Kant is the Critique of Pure Reason. The chief concern is the determination of the logical-transcendental conditions of science. Among these, it assigns a prominence to the logical structures that condition experience, tending to dissolve INTUITION into the logical processes and no longer assigning it an autonomous position and function; it thus truncates a goodly portion of the Critique of Pure Reason. The diminishing of the elements of immediacy in experience tends to throw into clearer relief the controlled methodological procedures of science and to reveal science as less and less dependent on the “given” element in experience. The logical processes of thought tend more and more to determine the object completely, though never, in keeping with the notion of the “thing-in-itself,” entirely encompassing it.

Though concentrated in the area of science and pure reason, the attention of the Marburg School also embraced the areas of ethics and aesthetics, achieving notable insights in both. It tended to absorb the phenomenon of religion into the ethical area, a tendency already perceptible in Kant, though not explicit in his intention. The ethical field, in turn, was largely socialized by both Cohen and Natorp and, subsequently, by other members and adherents of the school.

Another notable characteristic of the Marburg School was its constant interrelation of theoretical and historical interests. Its theoretical works exhibit a high degree of erudition and historical sense, and its historical works are distinguished by the way in which they are related to, and made to serve, the clarification of theoretical problems of philosophy. Cassirer especially distinguished himself in this way.

Baden School. No less eminent in its personnel and achievements was the School of Baden. This current of Neo-Kantianism numbered among its representatives the historian of philosophy W. Windelband (1848–1912), the theoretician of value H. Rickert (1863–1936), and the incomparable W. DILTHEY (1833–1911), whose work was predominantly in the theory of history and of culture. In justice to Dilthey, it should be noted that his achievement places him outside the limits of any school and establishes him as an original thinker in his own right.

The general character of the School of Baden may best be indicated by contrasting it with that of the Marburg School. The Baden School was convinced of the necessity of a critical study of culture and values at least as philosophical as that sought for the sciences of nature in the Marburg School. It was convinced, moreover, that the instruments necessary for such a work were present in the critical philosophy of Kant, and especially in the Critique of Judgment. Windelband’s reflections on history and his contraposition of history to the natural sciences as equal areas of knowledge and investigation led him to establish a classification of the sciences into nomothetical and idiographic. The natural sciences are defined as nomothetic because they seek to establish the laws of nature; the sciences of culture are called, by contrast, idiographic because they seek the form of cultures. The natural, or nomothetic, sciences generalize particular facts that are considered typical instances of a single species, whereas the idiographic sciences are individualizing, seeking the form of a particular culture or expressive work.

Windelband's student Rickert continued this line of thought, seeking to advance beyond his teacher by establishing the difference between natural and cultural sciences on a more formal basis; this formal basis was the reference of the sciences of culture to value in the sense in which R. H. Lotze (1817–81) had defined that term. The cultural sciences have value as their formal object. On this basis, Rickert undertook the elaboration of a general theory of value.

This tendency was carried to its culmination by Dilthey both in theory and in practice. For Dilthey the "sciences of the spirit" (i.e., of value, culture, and history) are gnoseologically anterior to the sciences of nature; indeed, all science is a product of historical experience and expression. Dilthey developed a psychological basis for the sciences of the spirit that involved a subtle theory of the hermeneutics of the historical document. He applied his theories with great perception in such works as his Leben Schleiermachers (2 v. Berlin 1867–70), which revealed the potential of biography in the history of ideas and offered a new conception of cultural biography.

Influence. The influence of Neo-Kantianism may be seen in every major figure in German thought to the end of the 19th century. In England a "return to Kant" movement is to be found in Robert Adamson (1852–1902), in France in C. B. Renouvier (1815–1903), and in Italy in Francesco Fiorentino (1834–94).

NEO-ORTHODOXY

A Protestant theological movement, originating in the dissent of such men as Karl BARTH from the liberal Protestant view of religion. To Barth and his associates, to whose thought the name dialectical, or crisis, theology was first given, religion based on experience is no religion at all. Against the religion of experience, therefore, they invoked those tenets of the Reformation that tend to make the qualitative distance between God and man appear infinite and not susceptible of being overcome.

The "orthodoxy" of these positions, then, consists in adherence to themes such as the incompetence of human reason in attaining knowledge of God. In fact, this noetic armature of the doctrine of man's depravity is the rallying point of this school of thought, with a correlative, the absolute need of divine grace for man's salvation. Theologians of this persuasion emphasize also the inflexibility of God's judgment against sin.

The "new" factors of what typifies neo-orthodoxy consist in methods and emphases either not available to or eschewed by Protestant orthodoxy of the 17th and 18th centuries. Adherents of the latter tended to be fundamentalist in their view of the Biblical text, in contrast to the neo-orthodox, who avail themselves of the benefits of modern criticism in their use of the Bible. Even in strictly doctrinal matters the new school could be called "impressionistic," in the sense that some doctrines of the Reformation receive an entirely personal treatment at their hands, e.g., predestination according to Barth. Neo-orthodoxy, essentially a protest against the humanistic elements that had, to the mind of its proponents, spoiled Protestantism and made it "liberal," is unintelligible outside this context. This accounts, for example, for the tendency among these theologians habitually to express the attributes of God in such a way that every "Yes" is balanced off by an equally emphatic "No."

If reaction against creeping ANTHROPOMORPHISM, thought by the neo-orthodox to be the malady of liberal Protestantism, is the point of the movement's origin, it is, paradoxically, also the factor of cohesion—for neo-orthodoxy is by no means a single, carefully articulated thought system. Certain names are, to be sure, identified with it, but not with the rigor of a species to its genus. Each of the two major branches of the Reformation is represented among the neo-orthodox. Among the Calvinists, Barth is most characteristically so. In fact, in the spectrum of neo-orthodoxy Barth holds a place quite clearly distinguishable. Distrust of natural theology as a possible path to God and the correlative suspicion of the theological relevance of the analogy of being were epitomized in his thought. The critical freedom with which the neo-orthodox viewed their progenitors in the Reformation came to a climax in him too, for it was evident throughout his Church Dogmatics that only the Scriptures were, in principle, to be accepted as normative—and this to the exclusion even of the authority of John Calvin. In Barth the transcendent majesty of God and the lightning power of his word were trumpeted to the extent that his critics questioned the possibility of his putting into true focus the doctrines of reconciliation (JUSTIFICATION) and redemption (the term he uses for the final liberation of man in God).

G. Aulén made the most systematic case for neo-orthodoxy outside the Lutheran tradition (he himself belonged to the school of Lund). What Barth shouted from rooftops, however, Aulén, together with others such as E. Brunner, recited in a lower register. The touchstone is the attitude toward the use of reason in gaining knowledge about God. Aulén was not so absolute as Barth; neither was he enamored, however, of any mixing of theology and metaphysics.

P. TILLICH and R. NIEBUHR were sometimes called neo-orthodox; it appears, however, that the United States may not have the right climate for purebred orthodoxy. These two theologians, though they evolved with and in the same direction as Barth for some time, finally came to adopt a position whereby theology was seen as exercising a mediating function between the church and the world. In this case it would have to accord reason an important function in the verifying of theological data.

NEOPHYTE

From the Greek νεόφυτος, meaning newly planted, a term found once in the New Testament (1 Tm 3.6). It came into use in the Church to designate those newly converted from paganism or from any non-Christian sect, and later, by extension, was applied to those recently admitted to the religious or clerical states. The term in its earlier use contained an obvious allusion to the new planting or engrafting of the convert by baptism into the Mystical Body of Christ. The use of the word was extended later to describe those newly admitted to the clerical or monastic life (Gregory I, Patrologia Latina: Epistles; 77:784); and in both senses it passed into Corpus iuris canonici (D.48.1.2). It is also used more generally to refer to someone newly engaged in a particular work or career.

St. Paul cautioned against the laying of hands on neophytes to make them bishops, lest their lack of experience in the faith render them arrogant or deficient; and the Council of NICAEA I (325) formally condemned the ordination or consecration of a neophyte as an abuse that encouraged clerical ambition or promoted the vanity of the people who desired to have a prominent personage as their bishop. JEROME (Patrologia Latina: Ad Oceanum, 22:663); GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (Patrologia Graeca, 35:1090); and GREGORY I (Patrologia Latina, 77:1030–37) also inveighed against this practice, although during the 4th and 5th centuries there were notable exceptions, such as Ambrose of Milan, Augustine of Hippo, Synesius of Cyrene, and Nestorius of Constantinople.

In the 4th century the term covered catechumens who had put off the reception of baptism until adulthood and upon being baptized, usually on the vigil of Easter or Pentecost, were clothed in white garments for eight days, given the traditio legis Christi, the kiss of peace (osculum pacis), anointed for confirmation, and admitted to reception of the Eucharist.

During the Middle Ages special care was paid to converts who through their change in religion were frequently deprived of position. Richard, the prior of Bermondsey, founded a hospital of converts in 1213; this was imitated by the Dominicans at Oxford, and Henry III established a domus conversorum in London for catechumens and neophyte Jews. The Council of BASEL in 1431 prescribed a manner of procedure for neophytes (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Concilliorum nova et amplissima collectio 29:99–101). St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA occasioned the erection of a casa dei neofiti at Rome in 1543, and GREGORY XIII built the house still standing near the Church of the Madonna dei Monti for the same purpose (May 20, 1580).

Local councils in the New World prescribed that after their baptism converts should be given special instructions including the four prayers Pater, Ave, Credo, and Salve Regina (Conc. of Mexico, 1555, c. 1; Synod of Quito, 1570). While the first political junta in Mexico (1524) had apparently forbidden the giving of the Eucharist to native neophytes even as Viaticum, PAUL III declared that the natives were true human beings endowed with reason and should be admitted to the Sacraments (Veritas ipsa, June 2, 1537), and in 1567 the Council of Lima prescribed the giving of Paschal Communion and Viaticum to the neophytes. A similar problem in India was settled by ALEXANDER VII (Jan. 18, 1658). In 1645 and 1656 Propaganda declared that the Chinese neophytes were obliged to observe the Church's law concerning the reception of the Sacraments and fasting. In modern missionary work, special care is given to the postbaptismal formation of neophytes.

In the development of Canon Law the status of a neophyte was considered an irregularity (ex defectu fidei) for the reception of orders; but the Code treated it as merely a simple impediment (1917 Codex Iuris Canonici cc.987n6, 542n2).

NEOPLATONISM

In the strict sense, Neoplatonism designates the particular form that PLATONISM took on at the end of the ancient era, from the 3d to the 6th centuries after Christ. In a broad sense, it designates the currents of thought before or after this period that offer some analogy with one or other of the characteristics of Platonism at the end of the ancient era. The treatment in this article discusses the place of Neoplatonism in the history of ancient thought, the history of Neoplatonism, and the relationships between Neoplatonism and Christianity.

Characteristics of Neoplatonism. Neoplatonism, taken in the strict sense, exhibits three principal characteristics. First it is an exegesis of Plato's Dialogues, coupled with an attempt to systematize even disparate texts by appealing to a hierarchy among levels of reality. Then it is a method of spiritual life. Finally, and notably in the case of PROCLUS, it is a pagan theology seeking to systematize, and attain a rational grasp of, the revelations of the gods.

Recent historical studies seem to conclude that these characteristics are not new and that Neoplatonism existed already at the time of ancient Platonism, indeed even during Plato's life. The interpretations of Plato proposed by A. J. Festugière and Léon Robin authorize such a view. Following W. Theiler's discovery of a form of Neoplatonism deriving from Antiochus of Ascalon and Posidonius, C. J. de Vogel and Philip Merlan found in the ancient Academy, i.e., in the works of Aristotle and of Plato himself, the existence of a hierarchy among the levels of reality and the modes of knowledge (the good, the ideas, souls, nature, and matter). Again, the history of allegorical interpretation has shown that pagan theology was also very traditional. Thus what is called Neoplatonism would quite simply be identified with Platonic scholasticism.

Although this view merits serious consideration, it should not obfuscate what is new and irreducible in late Platonism as compared with ancient Platonism, namely, the desire to arrive at complete systematization and absolute internal coherence. During the 2d century, immediately before PLOTINUS's work, the philosophical tradition was overburdened with heteroclitic and incoherent elements. Even Antiochus of Ascalon added doctrinal elements, borrowed from ARISTOTELIANISM and STOICISM, to Platonic teaching. Moreover, there was a tendency to merge philosophical syncretism with a religious syncretism that made equal acknowledgement of all revelations capable of providing salvation for the soul. This was the epoch of pagan, Christian, and Jewish GnosticisM.

Reacting against such a confusion, Plotinus invited man to interior simplification and unification. In this he was heir to Stoicism, which proposed the attainment of spiritual coherence by way of recollection and conversion to the divine Word, immanent in man, as well as in all other things. The immanence of the Word was assured by a total blending or complete interpenetration of the Word and matter.

Neoplatonism thus transferred the spirit of Stoicism to the Platonic universe. Everything is in all: each level of the hierarchy of things contains the whole of possible reality, but under a different aspect. The One contains all things, as do also the Intellect, the Soul, or the sensible world, but each hypostasis contains the whole of reality in its own way. In the One, all things are potentially present; in the Intellect they are compenetrated in an immediate intuition; in the Soul they are unfolded as in rational discourse; in the sensible world, they are mutually exterior, like sensations. The conversion, then, consists in reascending to a mode of knowledge that is even more unitive, in such a way as to arrive at a coincidence, in mystical ecstasy, with the Absolute from which these levels of reality and these modes of knowledge proceed. The system of things and the life of the soul are animated with the same movement of procession and conversion, unfolding and concentration.

History of Neoplatonism. At the beginning of the 3d century, at Alexandria, Plotinus had pursued the courses of Ammonius Saccas, who was the teacher also of ORIGEN, the Father of the Church. Plotinus was strongly influenced by his teacher and later, in Rome, taught "according to the spirit of Ammonius." In default of precise knowledge of the doctrines professed by Ammonius, Plotinus must remain for us the founder of Neoplatonism, i.e., the movement for interior unification just described.

Porphyry's Influence. With PORPHYRY, a disciple of Plotinus and his successor at Rome, a decisive turning point was reached. While preserving the purely Platonic message of his teacher, Porphyry returned to the earlier traditions and held that religious revelations, too, could make the way of salvation known. He is the first known philosopher to comment upon the Chaldaic Oracles, a long poem composed during the era of Marcus Aurelius. This pretended to expound a divine revelation that, beside theurgic practices aimed at leading the soul to the heavenly world, proposed a theological system inspired by Platonism and Pythagoreanism. It taught that after a supreme, transcendent God, endowed with intellect and will, came a second God, the Demiurge, and a whole hierarchy of astral divinities. Because of Porphyry's influence, these Oracles were to become the bible of Neoplatonism. However, taken literally, their teachings were hardly compatible with the doctrine of Plotinus.

Iamblichus and Proclus. All later Neoplatonism can be defined as an attempt to achieve a systematization among Plotinianism, the Chaldaic Oracles, and the Orphic Hymns. In opposition to Porphyry, with a view to safeguarding the transcendency of the One (strongly maintained by Plotinus), and by taking account of even the smallest details in the text of the Oracles, his successors multiplied the intermediary hypostases and the levels of reality. At the beginning of the 4th century, the Syrian, IAMBlichus, became the initiator of this new exegetical method. Although he taught in Syria, after his death (c. 330) the greater part of his disciples formed a group at Pergamum in Mysia. From this school came the writings of Emperor Julian and the treatise of Sallust entitled On the Gods and the World. The tradition of Iamblichus seems to have been introduced at Athens during the second half of the 4th century.

At the beginning of the 5th century, Syrianus and Proclus, the representatives of this tendency, constructed a vast system which brought Platonism, Chaldeanism, and ORPHISM into unison. Two basic principles dominate this synthesis. The first is the principle of analogy: while developing the unity represented by the immediately higher level of reality, each level of reality imitates this unity; everything is in all, according to more or less unified modes. The second principle is that of mediation: to imitate transcendent unity, each level of reality is endowed with a ternary structure, which, departing from unity, unfolds itself and goes on to return to unity because of conversion; to become itself, it must leave itself. In 529, the Emperor Justinian decided to bring an end to the school at Athens, the last bastion of paganism in the Christian empire. The head of the school, Damascius, then took refuge with his disciples near King Chosroes in Persia.

Damascius was the last great Neoplatonist. His Questions and Solutions Concerning First Principles constitute a profound criticism of Neoplatonism. The notion of the Absolute is for him very problematic. If the Absolute does not have any relation with anything else, it can no longer be the Principle. By the very claim that the Absolute is utterly unknowable and undefinable, the relation of other things to the Absolute is undefinable, and the whole metaphysical edifice of Neoplatonism comes in danger of crumbling.

Effect in the West. If the East was dominated by the tradition of Iamblichus, the Latin West knew only the tradition of Porphyry and Plotinus. This is true of pagan authors—Firmicus Maternus, MACROBIUS, and Martianus Capella—as well as of Christian writers—Marius Victorinus, Ambrose, Augustine, CALCIDIUS, and Claudianus Mamertus. BOETHIUS alone, who wrote at the beginning of the 6th century, came under the influence of the schools at Athens and Alexandria. Even at Alexandria, the influence of Iamblichus's tradition was disseminated slowly and in moderate form. At the beginning of the 5th century, Hypatias and Synesius knew only Plotinus and Porphyry. Only at a later date did Hierocles, Hermias, Ammonius, Olympidorus, and Simplicius follow courses given at the school in Athens; and the Neoplatonism that they professed was always more sober, of a more moral character, and more scientific than that professed by their teachers: Syrianus, Proclus, or Damascius. Moreover, from the 6th century onward, the school became predominantly Aristotelian and Christian.

Neoplatonism and Christianity. From Plotinus to Damascius, Neoplatonism was always anti-Christian. Attacking the Christian Gnostics, Plotinus simultaneously combatted specifically Christian notions, as, for example, that of creation. Porphyry and the Emperor Julian wrote treatises against the Christians that provoked refutations from Eusebius of Cesarea and Cyril of Alexandria.

From the middle of the 4th century onward, however, Christian thought was strongly influenced by Neoplatonic philosophy and mysticism. In the East, Basil of Cesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, Synesius of Cyrene, and NEMESIUS OF EMESA, and, in the West, Marius Victorinus, Ambrose, and Augustine, made abundant use of Plotinus or Porphyry, frequently without citing them. In the 5th century, PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS borrowed his hierarchical universe from Proclus. In the East, this direct influence of Neoplatonism continued throughout the Byzantine period, notably up to Psellus (11th century), Michael Italicos (12th century), Nicephoros Gregoras (14th century), and Gemistos Plethon (15th century). Plethon played a role in restoring Neoplatonism to the West in the course of the Italian Renaissance, at the court of the Medici. In the West, from the high period of the Middle Ages onward, Neoplatonism was accepted through the works of Ambrose, Augustine, Boethius, Calcidius, and Macrobius. In the 9th century, JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA translated the writings of pseudo-Dionysius and Maximus the Confessor, and, in his De divisione naturae, combined the Proclean Neoplatonism of pseudo-Dionysius with the Porphyrian Neoplatonism of Augustine.

Arabian Thought. From the 12th century onward, Neoplatonism entered the medieval West by another route, namely, that of ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY. In fact, the texts of the Greek philosophers had been translated into Syriac by Nestorian Christians at the school of Edessa (431–439), and once they had been propagated in Persia, they were translated into Arabic during the 9th century, after the establishment of Baghdad. Under the influence of these translations, Arabian philosophy became a Neoplatonic interpretation of the works of Aristotle. Once it came into Spain during the 12th century, this Arabian philosophy placed Christian thought into renewed contact with Neoplatonism.

From the 12th century onward, Latin translations from Arabic or Greek gave Christian theologians a direct knowledge of Neoplatonic works, namely, the LIBER DE CAUSIS (translated during the 12th century), the Theology of Aristotle, the Elements of Theology by Proclus, and Proclus's commentary on the Parmenides, translated by William of Moerbeke in the 13th century. Having received a strongly Platonized thought from the Christian tradition, certain theologians of this era, reading these Neoplatonic texts, regarded Platonism as naturally Christian.

Later Mysticism. The influence of Neoplatonism reached its apogee, at the end of the 13th century, in the writings of certain German Dominicans, all disciples of ALBERT THE GREAT, namely, THEODORIC OF FREIBERG, Berthold of Mosburg, NICHOLAS OF STRASSBURG, and especially Meister ECKHART. Under the influence of this current, mysticism in the Rhine region developed also through the writings of HENRY SUSO, TAULER, and RUYSBROECK. This German Neoplatonism was to become one of the sources of modern thought through the work of NICHOLAS OF CUSA, who transformed the metaphysics of Proclus into a method of knowledge that sought an ever deeper vision of the unity of the universe.

All these Byzantine, Latin, Arabian, or Germanic currents of Neoplatonism were united in the Italian Renaissance, which produced the great attempts at religious and philosophical unity by Giordano BRUNO and Tommaso CAMPANELLA. During the modern era, the Platonic tradition was to be perpetuated both in England by the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS and in the Siris of Berkeley (1744), and in Germany by the IDEALISM of SCHELLING and HEGEL.

Evaluation. The encounter between Neoplatonism and Christianity thus conditions the entire history of Western philosophy. During the patristic period, it provided an apt vocabulary for theology. The Trinitarian theology of Marius Victorinus, Basil of Cesarea, Augustine, and Synesius borrowed formulas from Porphyry, enabling it to express the unity of substance in the Trinity of hypostases. The Porphyrian expressions concerning the union of the soul and the body were of equal service in the formulation of the dogma concerning the hypostatic union, that is, a union without confusion of natures. In this regard, Nemesius has been a most valuable witness.

Yet, from the patristic era onward, Neoplatonism has had an influence on Christian teachings concerning the spiritual life that is highly disputable. The ancient tradition went from the humanity of Christ to the knowledge of the Father; it took ecclesiastical experience, i.e., the effect of the Holy Spirit in the Church, as its point of departure to attain God. Neoplatonism, on the contrary, pretended that an immediate and experimental knowledge of the transcendent God is possible. While making the necessary corrections in this matter, St. Augustine and St. Gregory of Nyssa were led to a like doctrine. From this there would result, in teachings on mysticism, a disequilibrium between the doctrine on union with God and the doctrine on the mediation of the Incarnate Christ. Pushed to the extreme, the danger makes its appearance in such writings as those of Meister Eckhart, who held that "the uncreated spark" of the soul is co-eternal with the Ineffable.

NEO-PYTHAGOREANISM

The Pythagorean school of philosophy became extinct in the 4th century B.C., but there continued to be "exoteric" Pythagoreans who cultivated an ascetic way of life modeled on the supposed practice of Pythagoras himself. References to them are found in Middle Comedy (in H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, ed. W. Kranz, 1, no. 58E), and the moralizing tractates preserved in Stobaeus [ed. F. G. A. Mullach, Fragmenta Philosophorum Graecorum 2 (Paris 1867) 1–129]. Pythagoreanism had been originally perpetuated only by oral teaching, and the succession was broken in the 4th century. Therefore, when the school was revived in the 1st century B.C., especially at Alexandria and Rome, it became eclectic, drawing on the doctrines of various schools. Thus, Sextus Empiricus gives two accounts of the Neo-Pythagorean number doctrine, the first of which (10.261–281) is Platonic, and the second (10.281–284), Stoic. Diogenes Laërtius (8.24–33) preserves a good, though brief, statement of Neo-Pythagorean tenets quoted from Alexander Polyhistor. Alexander discusses number symbolism, teachings on souls and daimones, the structure of the world, the kinship of man with gods and animals, and rewards and punishments in a future life. He does not mention transmigration of souls, but this doctrine is attested elsewhere.

Number Symbolism. Number symbolism is characteristic of Neo-Pythagorean thought. Some members of the sect used only the monad (Stoic), while others also introduced the undefined dyad (Platonic). In this and other respects, Neo-Pythagoreanism was not unified in doctrine. It was a movement rather than a well-defined school, and it is therefore not always easy to tell who was a Neo-Pythagorean and who was not. For instance, the work of Pseudo-Timaeus of Locri contains nothing specifically Pythagorean, and Ocellus Lucanus could as easily be regarded as a Peripatetic.

Moral Precepts and Practices. After number symbolism, moral precepts are the most characteristic mark of Neo-Pythagorean writings [e.g., Iamblichus, “Golden Verses,” Vita Pythagorae, ed. A. Nauck (Leipzig 1884)]. The doctrine that all living things—gods, men, animals—are akin led to many practices: abstinence from meat and fish, the use of linen rather than woolen clothing, the cultivation of self-control and friendship, and the careful observance of piety toward the gods. Some members of the school believed that the air was full of souls and divine spirits (daimones), that dreams are a reality, and that burial rites are very important [see F. Cumont, Recherches sur le symbolisme funéraire des Romains (Paris 1942)]. Some advocated an examination of conscience every evening. Agatharchides mentions three ways in which men become better: by making themselves as like the gods as possible; by doing good deeds; and by death, which frees the soul from bodily contamination. It is not surprising that such men looked down upon others with less high ideals and that, like the contemporary early Christians, they were regarded with suspicion, particularly in Rome, where all foreign religions were mistrusted.

Some Neo-Pythagoreans also practiced magic or worse, at least in popular opinion. P. Nigidius Figulus, whose piety Cicero extolled (Ad Fam. 4.13), used boys as mediums in the recovery of treasure (Apuleius, Apol. 42); and Vatinius, whom Cicero accused of sacrificing boys to the Manes (In Vat. 14, and Schol. Bob. ad 1), was a member of Nigidius’s circle.

Apollonius of Tyana. The best-known Neo-Pythagorean is APOLLONIUS OF TYANA, born about the beginning of the Christian Era. According to his biographer Philostratus, he substituted hymns and prayers for blood offerings, forbade the use of meat and wine, ate vegetables, wore linen, never bathed or cut his hair, practiced holy silence and sexual purity, and thus was united to the gods. He acquired magic powers as well as knowledge of the future and the past, including that of his own previous incarnation (Philostratus, Vita Apoll. 3.23; 6.21). The letters ascribed to him reveal Apollonius as he seemed to his immediate followers before the time of Philostratus. Apollonius was clearly a powerful personality living in a believing age, and he appealed to the learned as well as to the simple. Even some Christians respected him, for Sidonius Apollinaris (c. A.D. 432–80), Bishop of Clermont, transcribed for a friend a revised version of a Latin translation of Apollonius’s biography (Epist. 8.3). There were undoubtedly other similar Neo-Pythagorean teachers of whom we know nothing.

Evaluation of Neo-Pythagoreanism. There is little philosophy in all this. Neo-Pythagoreanism was most conspicuously a religious movement, as its general character and concerns make clear. The Neo-Pythagoreans were often at odds with contemporary society, but, at the same time, the movement embodied several characteristic features of the religious life of the Empire: mysticism and occultism, belief in miracles, asceticism, stern morality, and the close union of the believers within their own group.

Neo-Pythagoreanism was absorbed into Neoplatonism, as is evident from the writings of Numenius (c. A.D. 150–250), who regarded the teachings of Pythagoras and Plato as practically identical, and from the lives of Pythagoras by Iamblichus and Porphyry. At an earlier date, it certainly influenced Philo Judaeus’s terminology and it affected Christian thought through Clement of Alexandria. The latter often mentions Pythagoras, but largely as he was known through the Neo-Pythagorean writings.

NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM

Neoscholasticism and neothomism are terms frequently used to designate the revival of THOMISM in the 19th and 20th centuries (see SCHOLASTICISM, 3). Even before AETERNI PATRIS of LEO XIII Catholic scholars eager to promote a CHRISTIAN philosophy tended to identify scholasticism with Thomism and vice versa. The historical studies of M. DE WULF revealed some differences among 13th-century scholastics, but these he dismissed in order to obtain a common body of philosophical teachings, which he and others called philosophia perennis. For De Wulf, philosophia perennis, “elaborated by the Greeks and brought to perfection by the great medieval teachers, has never ceased to exist even in modern times.” Recognizing that Thomism was too narrow a term to designate a perennial philosophy, he preferred to speak of scholasticism and neoscholasticism. For him, neoscholasticism eliminated false or useless notions in 13th-century scholasticism, such as celestial movers, the incorruptibility of celestial bodies, their influence on terrestrial events, the diffusion of sensible “species” throughout a medium and their introduction into the organs of sense. The generally accepted view of neoscholasticism was expressed by De Wulf in his Scholasticism Old and New, tr. P. Coffey (Dublin 1907). It is retained in the titles of certain Catholic philosophical journals, e.g., The New Scholasticism, Revue néoscholastique (1894–1909), Revue néo-scholastique de philosophie (1910–45), and Rivista di filosofia neoscholastica.

Later historical studies, notably by P. MANDONNET and by É. Gilson, revealed profound differences among medieval scholastics that could not be dismissed. Moreover, a single body of philosophical thought called philosophia perennis could not be found to exist among the Greeks, medieval scholastics, and contemporary scholastics. The view of De Wulf and the Louvain school was discredited by Gilson and others. Neoscholastic and Neothomistic thought were frozen in safe manuals during the crisis of Modernism. Instead of using scholastic and Thomistic principles to solve modern problems, as was the wish of Leo XIII, neoscholastic manuals were, for the most part, content to provide a philosophical foundation for the study of theology. Narrowness and lack of vitality helped to give a pejorative sense to the terms neoscholasticism and neothomism.

More profound studies of the texts of St. THOMAS AQUINAS frequently revealed discrepancies between the authentic teaching of St. Thomas and views presented as neothomistic. Thus many Thomists felt that the prefix “neo” could be understood as a negation of true Thomism. For this reason, J. MARITAIN wrote: “I am not a neo-Thomist. All in all, I would rather be a paleo-Thomist than a neo-Thomist. I am, or at least I hope I am, a Thomist” [Existence and the Existent, tr. L. Galantière and G. Phelan (New York 1948) 1].

Neothomism, like Thomism itself, is only one philosophical and theological school within the whole of scholasticism. Moreover, both terms have been used in a favorable and in an unfavorable sense. In a pejorative sense they signify a type of modern thought that is narrow, irrelevant, or unfaithful to the true mind and spirit of the great thinkers of the Middle Ages. In a favorable sense they signify living thought that is both faithful to the great masters of the Middle Ages and relevant to modern problems.

NEOT, ST.

Monk, hermit; d. c. 900. After ordination he moved from GLASTONBURY ABBEY to Cornwall in western England where he lived as a hermit. According to legend he became the friend of ALFRED THE GREAT; the story of the burned cakes and Alfred is first found in a history of the Shrine of St. Neot in Cornwall. He went on a pilgrimage to Rome to pray for Alfred’s victory over the Danes. Neot was buried in Cornwall, but later his body was moved to St. Neot’s in Huntingdonshire. It is possible that there were actually two saints of the same name, one a Celt from Cornwall, the other an Anglo-Saxon.

NEPAL, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the Himalayas, between India and Tibet, Nepal has four distinct geographical areas: a strip of low lying land along the Indian border, the “mid-hills” (up to 10,000 ft.), the Himalayan Range, and in the northwest, a mountainous area which is part of the Tibetan marginal mountains. Climatic zones range from the subtropical to the arctic conditions of the Himalayan Range. Nepal is a constitutional monarchy with a parliamentary form of government and a two-house legislature. The king is the constitutional head of state. It is the only officially Hindu country in the world, and the king must be a Hindu. Nepal is also one of the least economically developed countries in the world, with almost half of the population under the absolute poverty line. Average life expectancy is only about 55 years and few people outside of the urban areas have access to modern health care. The economy is primarily rural and agriculture-based, but few farmers have sufficient land to yield more than bare subsistence. Unemployment is high and underemployment is common with about half of the entire work force working for less than 40 hours a week.

The Catholic Church in Nepal. Christianity first entered Nepal when Jesuit missionaries passed through the country from 1628 onward. In 1703 Nepal became a part of the Italian Capuchin Mission to Tibet. The first Capuchins arrived in Kathmandu in 1715. From 1715 to 1769 the Capuchins were active in the three cities of the Kathmandu Valley: Kathmandu, Patan and Bhaktapur. At that time the present area of Nepal comprised many tiny independent kingdoms across the hills. In 1742 the King of Gorkha, to the west of Kathmandu, united these small kingdoms into a larger country. He conquered the three kingdoms of the Kathmandu Valley in 1769. During that period, the Capuchins faced severe difficulties arising from the closure of their mission in Tibet, a severe shortage of resources, and a hostile Gorkhali king who accused them of being in league with the British who had sided with the former kings of the Valley. Hence, the Capuchins withdrew from Nepal for India with a small group of converts, who settled in the village of Chuhari in north Bihar. In 1786, the Capuchins returned to Nepal. Over the next several years they had a sporadic presence in Nepal. The last Capuchin died in Kathmandu in 1810 and no others were assigned.

In 1814 Nepal fought and lost the war with the British East India Company. As a result, Nepal was forced to accept a treaty which specified, among other things, that no foreigners were permitted to enter Nepal without the specific permission of the governor general in Calcutta, a permission that was seldom granted and only for short visits. This treaty remained in force until 1951 and

Capital: Kathmandu

Size: 54,362 sq. miles.

Population: 25,284,463 (in 2001). Known as “the ethnic turntable of Asia,” Nepal’s population is racially diverse, comprising Newars, Indians, Tibetans, Gurungs, Magars, Tamangs, Bhotias, Rais, Limbus and Sherpas, all of whom have settled in the region over the last 2,000 years.

Languages: Nepali (official; spoken by 90% of the population), about a dozen other languages and about 30 major dialects. English is also widely spoken.

Religions: Nepal is the only official Hindu state in the world. More than 90% of its population are Hindus, about 5% are Buddhists, Muslims number about 3%, and Christians are less than 1%. The Constitution permits Nepalese to practice their traditional religions without hindrance. Conversion from Hinduism to any other religion is prohibited by law and subject to a penalty of three years of imprisonment.

See: Nepal is a Prefecture Apostolic.

effectively closed Nepal to any missionary activity. By 1951 there was no trace left in Nepal of the Capuchin mission. From 1846 to 1951 Nepal was governed by a family of autocratic, hereditary prime ministers, the Ranas. With the overthrow of the Rana regime in 1951 and the return of power to the king, things changed. A new treaty was signed with the now independent government of India, and Nepal opened up to the international community. In 1951 the JESUITS from Patna in Bihar, India, were invited to open a school for boys in Nepal. They were followed in 1954 by the IBVM (Loretto) sisters who opened a school for girls.

Ecclesiastically Nepal was placed under the jurisdiction of the Vicariate Apostolic of Tibet and Hindustan in 1784 and from 1808 was under various Indian jurisdictions. In 1919 Nepal was incorporated into the newly created diocese of Patna, Bihar. In 1984, Nepal established diplomatic relations with the Holy See. Nepal became a Missio Sui Iuris, and was subsequently raised to an Prefecture Apostolic in 1997. Since the opening of Nepal in 1951 various religious groups, both Protestant and Catholic, have been invited to Nepal to help the country in the fields of education, health, social welfare and general development. The Jesuits in Nepal have expanded their work to include four schools, one college and a research center. They also have an extensive social ministry in cooperation with the development efforts of the Nepal government. In addition to the Jesuits there are now four other orders of men and 15 orders of religious women working in Nepal. Their efforts are concentrated primarily in education but also in social work, including a center for women afflicted with HIV, a drug rehabilitation center and non-formal education. The personnel of these religious orders are mainly from India.

Protestant Churches in Nepal. Protestant efforts in Nepal began in 1953 when two American missionary families, Methodist and Presbyterian, were invited to open a hospital. They sought the cooperation of other Protestant groups, and in 1954 founded the United Mission to Nepal (UMN), an inter-denominational organization which functions as the main organ of Protestant efforts. Today UMN has 33 member bodies and 20 affiliated members from various Christian churches that contribute personnel and support. UMN is the largest missionary body with expatriate personnel working in various parts of the country and engaged in a variety of health, educational and developmental works. In addition to the UMN, the SEVENTH DAY ADVENTISTS opened a hospital in 1957, the Evangelical Alliance Mission carries out medical work, and the International Nepal Fellowship is engaged in working with victims of Hansen's disease. There are several native Protestant communities throughout the country. Except for one community affiliated to the Assembly of God, all of these communities are independent with no denominational affiliation. The number of native Protestants considerably exceeds that of Catholics.

NEPOS OF ARSINOË

Third-century Millenarianist and bishop of Arsinoë (modern Medinet El Faiyûm, Egypt); author of liturgical hymns and of a Judaizing view of the Apocalypse called a Refutation of the Allegorists. Though lost, this book is described by Eusebius of Caesarea (Hist. eccl., 7.24, 25) as having been refuted by Bp. DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA (d. 265) in a two-volume tract, On Promises. Nepos propounded a Millenaristic viewpoint in which he interpreted the promises made to the saints in the Scriptures as due to be fulfilled on this earth during a 1,000-year reign of the just, in which man's physical powers would be given full satisfaction. Dionysius first held a three-day conference to dispel the effects of this doctrine among the Egyptian bishops, then wrote his refutation. But the disciples of Nepos apparently initiated several schismatic movements that explain the Church's generally reticent attitude toward allegorical interpretation of the Scripture. Nepos's views also witness to the continuance of Judaistic tendencies in the Church of the third century.

NEPOTISM

The practice of popes and other ecclesiastics (and hence of any person in a position of authority) of showing special favor to relatives or other interested parties. It is associated particularly with certain popes, some of whom understandably placed their relatives in positions of trust in times of crisis. First-degree papal nepotism, or the selecting of a nephew or relative for curial office, goes back to Pope Adrian I (722–795), who made a nephew primicerius, or senior “Judge Palatine.” Examples occur more thickly from the 10th century onward; thus Innocent III (1198–1216) turned to his own family, particularly to his brother Richard, in order to bring the fractious Roman commune to heel. Dante (Inf. 19.31) characterized Pope Nicholas III (1277–80) as “greedily advancing” the ORSINI family; more justifiably, perhaps, he also attacked (Inf. 19.52–81; 27.85–129) Pope Boniface VIII (1294–1303), since Boniface's pontificate was notably preoccupied with the aggrandizement of the GAETANI family and the relentless harrying of the rival Colonna family. Thus in early 1295 he made his favorite nephew Benedetto Gaetani a Cardinal, at the end of the year honoring similarly two other nephews, Giacomo Gaetani Tommasini, a Franciscan, and Francesco Gaetani, a married man separated from his wife, as well as another relative, the curial poet JAMES GAETANI STEFANESCHI. The Avignon cardinals and popes, particularly Clement V and Clement VI, consolidated the tradition [see B. Guillemin, La Cour pontificale d'Avignon (Paris 1962) 156–164, 171–175], to the great disgust of Petrarch [Epistulae sine nomine 11, ed. P. Piur, Petrarcas Buch ohne Namen und die päpstliche Kurie (Halle 1925)]. However, if the development of papal PROVISION aided the popes in beneficent relatives, it must be remembered that one of the less well-known complaints against the system was that it cut across “episcopal nepotism”; as Bp. Grandison of Exeter (1328–69) put it, “I have for many years been unable to provide for my nephews and retainers” [A. J. Bannister, The Cathedral Church of Hereford (London 1924) 182 n.2]. The golden age of nepotism came with the Renaissance popes: Callistus III (1455–58) called the BORGIIAS from Spain; Sixtus IV (1471–84) spread his favors among DELLA ROVERE, Sansoni, Bassi, and RIARIO relatives; the Borgia, Alexander VI (1492–1503), made his son Cesare chancellor of the Church and sought to carve for him a hereditary state in central Italy; Leo X (1513–21) impoverished the Church in attempting to conquer Urbino for his nephew Lorenzo de' MEDICI. The trend was stemmed to some extent by the bull Admonet nos of Pius V (1567), but second-degree nepotism, or the conferring of favors instead of offices, was to continue until the constitution Romanum decet pontificem (1692) put an end to its grosser aspects; in the meantime papal families such as the ALDOBRANDINI, BORGHESE, BARBERINI, and Pamphili had benefited hugely.

NERESHEIM, ABBEY OF

In Württemberg, south Germany; its patrons are SS. ULRICH and AFRA of AUGSBURG. Founded for canons by Count Hartmann of Dillingen (1095), it was settled by Benedictines from PETERSHAUSEN (1106) and ZWIEFALTEN (1119). In 1497 it joined the MELK reform and in 1685 the Augsburg Congregation of the Holy Ghost. In the 17th and 18th centuries it had close ties with the Jesuit University of Dillingen and sent professors to the lyceum in Freising and the University of Salzburg, while it had its own school of philosophy and theology and a gymnasium (to 1806). Secularized in 1803 and awarded to the princes of Thurn and Taxis, it was restored as an abbey in 1920. The baroque cloister (1694–1714) has rich stucco-work; the church (1745–98), B. Neumann's most mature work, has cupola frescoes by Martin Knoller (1769–75). The humanist Abbot Benedikt Maria Angehrn (1755–87), cousin of Prince-abbot Beda Angehrn of SANKT GALLEN (1767–96) and imperial administrator of SANKT ULRICH in Augsburg (1778–82), was opposed by the monk Benedikt Maria Werkmeister (b. 1745; d. 1823), a talented scholar who championed the Catholic Enlightenment and had ties with I. H. von WESSENBERG. The monk K. Nack wrote a history of the abbey (Neresheim 1792).

NERI, PHILIP, ST.

Catholic reformer and founder of the Oratorians; b. Florence, July 21, 1515; d. Rome, May 26, 1595. Philip, son of Francesco, a Florentine lawyer, and his wife Lucrezia da Mosciano (d. 1520), grew up with his two sisters, Caterina and Elizabetta, in the care of a loving stepmother. He was both popular and pious as a boy, and was found often with the Dominicans at St. Mark's, where he talked with the friars and learned to revere SAVONAROLA, who was executed in Florence in 1498.

Apostle of Rome. Philip's family sent him, at 17, to his uncle, Romolo, a merchant of San Germano (now Cassino), who was willing to take Philip into his business and eventually to leave it to him. The prospect of a prosperous commercial career repelled Philip, who wished by then to give his life directly to God. With this intention, he left for Rome (1533), where he lodged with a Florentine, Galeotto del Caccia, whose two small sons he tutored. Already Philip was eating and sleeping little, and praying much. From 1535 until 1538 he followed courses in philosophy at the Sapienza University and in theology at Sant' Agostino, earning high praise as a student. Instead of becoming a priest, as expected, Philip abandoned his studies, and for 13 years followed what was, for that time, an unusual, even idiosyncratic, vocation—that of a layman, entirely on his own, devoting himself exclusively to prayer and the Christian apostolate. He meditated on the Gospels; he prayed, sometimes, it seems, in ecstasy; he frequented the Catacombs (a reflection of his interest in the primitive Church); he persuaded friends and acquaintances to turn to Christ. In 1548 under the spiritual direction of Persiano Rosa, he organized some laymen into the Confraternità di SS. Trinità to assist poor and convalescent pilgrims. This grew into the celebrated hospital of S. Trinità dei Pellegrini. The background of this activity must be remembered: corruption in the Church at Rome, an indifferent clergy, a people paganized by the Renaissance, a Reformation movement in the North attracting the loyalty of whole nations, and a reforming council just convening at Trent.

Father Rosa urged that he could serve the Church better as a priest, and on May 23, 1551, Philip was ordained. He lived for some years at the church of S. Girolamo della Carità with other priests and exercised a distinctive apostolate in the confessional. For the further instruction and sanctification of his penitents he arranged, in the afternoons, informal talks, discussions, and prayers in a room above the church. He also led excursions to other churches, often with music and a picnic on the way. In 1559, his "Pilgrimage to the Seven Churches" brought censure from Paul IV and the temporary suspension of all Philip's works. He aroused jealousy, and he was represented as encouraging plots against Paul IV, fomenting a sect, and holding "conventicles." The more moderate reformer Pius IV succeeded in this same year (1559), and Philip was back in favor.

Development of the Oratory. Several of Philip's followers became priests and from 1564 they lived as a community at the church of S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini, where they prayed and ate together (but took no religious vows) and celebrated the Eucharist and preached regularly. This was the beginning of the Oratory, as it is now known. Its distinctive feature was the popular daily afternoon service of four informal talks, interspersed with vernacular prayers and hymns. The talks concerned the spiritual life, Scripture, church history, and the study of a saint's life. PALESTRINA, one of Philip's followers, contributed musical settings for scriptural readings, hymns, motets, and laudi spirituali (hence the term Oratorio). The multivolume Annales Ecclesiastici of Caesar Baronius, whose standard of critical scholarship was high for his times, grew from his regular talks in the Oratory.

Persecution reoccurred in 1567 when it was reported to Pius V that the Oratory was an assemblage of heretics, where laymen preached and sang vernacular hymns. But the intervention of Cardinal Charles BORROMEO saved the Oratory. In 1575 Pope Gregory XIII, a friend to Philip, formally approved the new "Congregation of the Oratory," as a group of priests living in community without vows, for prayer and preaching. The small, dilapidated church of S. Maria in Vallicella was given to the congregation, and on the site was built a large new one, which has continued to be known as the Chiesa Nuova, and to be the church of the Roman Oratory. Philip was the first provost (superior); he was succeeded by Baronius.

Until Philip died, his advice was continually sought. Visitors, including many cardinals, thronged his room, and (SS.) IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, CAMILLUS DE LELLIS, John LEONARDI, Charles Borromeo, FELIX OF CANTALICE, and FRANCIS DE SALES delighted in his friendship. As an influence in the Counter Reformation Philip has been justly counted with the Jesuits and the Council of Trent, on the grounds that as the "Apostle of Rome" he was foremost in converting to personal holiness many of those most influential in the central government of the Church. Philip has been considered an eccentric buffoon studying to mortify himself and proud Renaissance gentlemen into humility; a suspect leader of an evangelical reform movement; a saint around whom miracles were constantly occurring; a holy founder of 45 oratories now in existence; and an exponent of real, living, personal faith. Invariably Philip's humility, his gaiety, his personal attractiveness, and his fervent attachment to the Person of Christ have been noticed.

John Henry NEWMAN felt his attractiveness, joined the Oratory, and founded the first English-speaking house (Birmingham). Philip was beatified by Paul V (1615) and canonized by Gregory XV (May 12, 1622).

NERINCKX, CHARLES

Frontier missionary, founder of the Sisters of Loretto; b. Herffelingen, Belgium, Oct. 2, 1761; d. Ste. Genevieve, Missouri, Aug. 12, 1824. The son of Sebastian, a successful physician, and Petronilla (Langendries) Nerinckx, Nerinckx was the eldest of seven sons and seven daughters, many of whom entered religious orders. He studied philosophy at the University of Louvain, Belgium, and was ordained Nov. 1, 1785. After a decade as parish priest in Mechlin and Meerbeek, he spent ten years administering the Sacraments from various hiding places, notwithstanding the rigors of the French Revolution.

In September 1803, through Princess Amalia GALITZIN, he offered his services to Bp. John Carroll, arriving in Baltimore in November of 1804. He was sent to Georgetown College (now University), Washington, D.C. to study, then to Kentucky to join Stephen T. BADIN, until that time the only priest in that vast mission field. Nerinckx arrived at Bardstown, Kentucky in July of 1805; he worked for the next seven years with Badin, then alone in various parishes. During his 19 years in the state he built 14 churches. In 1809 he organized the first Holy Name Society in Kentucky, and in 1812, with two young women, founded the Sisters of LORETTO, the first native American community.

Nerinckx made two trips to Europe, returning with valuable paintings and religious supplies. He also brought over the first Jesuits to work in the West, among them Pierre Jean DE SMET. Disagreement with Bp. Guy Chabrat over the rule of the Sisters of Loretto prompted him to withdraw to Missouri in 1824, where death overtook him before he could realize his hope of working with the Indians. In 1833 his remains were returned to the motherhouse he had established at Loretto, Kentucky.

Nerinckx was noted for his great strength and his devotion to duty. Because it took six weeks to cover his mission stations, he spent his days in the saddle and his nights in the woods, often in physical danger. Although regarded as stern, he was gentle when instructing children and slaves. His uncompromising stand against the evil practices of the frontier caused friction, and later critics mistakenly accused him of being prone to Jansenistic tendencies. Several Latin manuscripts indicative of his scholarship and hundreds of his letters have been discovered in the Mechlin diocesan archives; many other letters are preserved in the Baltimore archdiocesan archives.

NERO, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned A.D. 54 to 68; b. Anzio, Dec. 15, 37; d. Rome, June 9, 68. He was adopted in 50 by the Emperor Claudius, who had married his own niece, Agrippina, Nero's mother. In 53 Nero married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius. When Claudius was poisoned in 54 on the orders of Agrippina, Nero was presented to the soldiers as the new emperor. For the first five years his reign was popular, owing to the careful guidance of SENECA and Burrus. In 55 when Agrippina threatened to side with Britannicus, the son of Claudius, against him, Nero had him poisoned, and in 59, weary of his mother's demands, he had her murdered. In 62 he divorced Octavia and married his mistress. In this same year Burrus died and Seneca retired; their place was taken by Ofonius Tigellinus, who converted the last years of Nero's rule into a reign of terror. Nero the Hellenophile surrounded himself with Greeks and Orientals; he was also an enthusiast for the arts and extravagant spectacles, which together with his tendency to autocracy cost him the support of conservative Romans. Despite the relief measures he provided for those left destitute, he was blamed for the fire of July 18, 64, that broke out in the Circus Maximus and destroyed half of Rome. Nero turned the blame on the Christians, according to TACITUS, and many of them were put to death by cruel tortures. Peter and Paul were martyred in Rome under Nero, but the year of their death is uncertain. A conspiracy against Nero in 65 under Calpurnius Piso failed, but in 68 the armies under Julius Vindex at Lyons and Servius Sulpicius Galba in Spain revolted. Deserted by the pretorian guards and condemned to death by the senate, Nero killed himself.

NERSES

The name of many Armenian churchmen and officials, five of whom are discussed in this article.

Nerses the Great, St., 4th-century Armenian catholicos or patriarch; b. Cappadocia, 333 or 337; d. Khakh, on the Euphrates, 373 (feast, Monday after the 4th Sunday after Pentecost). Nerses was the son of Athanakines and Bambish, the sister of King Diran, and a close relative of St. GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR. He was educated in Cappadocia and married a Mamikonian princess, who bore him a son, Isaac the Great, and died a few years later. In the early years of the reign of King Arshak II, he returned to Armenia, served as a royal counselor and custodian of the royal sword, and was chosen the catholicos by popular acclamation after the death of Patriarch Shahak. He was consecrated at Caesarea in Cappadocia, the metropolitan see for ARMENIA, by Eusebius (or possibly Dianos) in 353, and he initiated a reform of the Armenian church with a synod held at Ashtishat. He promulgated decrees prohibiting marriages between close relatives, denounced pagan practices, and introduced positive legislation regarding fasting and monastic life. He also erected schools, convents, hospitals, asylums, and churches in imitation of Cappadocian ecclesiastical activities. King Arshak deposed him for condemning the scandals of the court, and from 360 to 362 he appealed for aid in Constantinople. He returned to Armenia (364 or 368) and was restored as catholicos by King Pap after Arshak had been betrayed to the Persians by members of his entourage. Nerses rebuilt the churches destroyed by the Persians. In 372 he took part in a synod at Caesarea, but he was apparently poisoned at the king's command for denouncing the royal family's evil ways. His career is described by Faustus of Byzantium (History), whose narrative must be used with caution.

Nerses II Astaraketzi, Armenian catholicos from 548 to 557. He called the Synod of Dwin (554–555) at which 18 bishops participated and condemned the Khoujik sect imported into Armenia by merchants infected with both Nestorianism and Manichaeism. The 38 canons of the synod are important for the development of Armenian teaching on the Sacraments and monastic life.

Nerses III, Armenian catholicos from 642 to 661. Endowed with a Byzantine education, Nerses built the patriarchal palace and the church of St. Gregory in Vagarshapat and received the title Schinogh or builder. He attempted to win the Armenian Church to the Chalcedonian viewpoint on the question of the two natures in Christ, but he had to cede before the opposition of Theodore Rschtuni and returned to his original bishopric at Taykh.

Nerses of Lambron, St., bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia; b. Lambron, Cilicia, 1153; d. Tarsus, July 14, 1198 (feast, Monday after 3d Sunday after Assumption). The son of Oshin II (d. 1168), prince of Lambron, Nerses was educated in the Armenian monasteries of Skewra and Siav-Liarn, and spoke Armenian, Greek, Latin, and Syrian. His granduncle Nerses IV ordained him in Hromkla, and he changed his name from Smbat to Nerses and retired to a solitude. At the request of Gregory IV Tegha, he accepted the archbishopric of Tarsus in 1175; he was selected as an ambassador by King Leo II to greet Frederick Barbarossa. Upon Frederick's death in the river Saleph (1190), he took the young Prince Frederick under his protection. He participated in reunion efforts with Rome and Byzantium, gave the opening discourses at the Synods of Hromkla (1179) and Tarsus (1196), and undertook an embassy to Constantinople in 1197. Of his 33 preserved writings, those devoted to the liturgy, biblical commentaries, preaching, and Church discipline are the most significant. He also translated into Armenian a number of patristic works, including the Rule of St. Benedict, the Dialogues of Gregory the Great, and the Ekthesis of Epiphanius of Constantia, as well as the Syro-Roman legal code. Some of his works have been edited and translated into German by Max zu Sachsen, K. Bruns, E. Sachau, and F. Finck.

NERSES GRATIOSUS (ŠNORHALI)

Archbishop (Catholicos) 1166–73, saint in the Armenian Church; b. Cilicia, 1102; d. Hromkla, 1173. Nerses IV Klayeci, called Šnorhali or “the Gracious,” was educated by his uncle Catholicos Gregory II and the great Armenian doctor Stephen Manuk. Nerses succeeded his brother, Gregory III Pahlavuni, as catholicos and had his residence at Hromkla, on the Euphrates. He was a competent theologian and worked (1170–72) with Manuel I Comnenus for the reunion of the Byzantine and the Armenian Churches. Manuel sent the Byzantine theologian Theorianus to Hromkla for theological conferences at which Nerses and several bishops accepted the Chalcedonian formula concerning the two natures in Christ, despite the opposition of Syrian delegates. Nerses also accepted the Byzantine calendar for the main ecclesiastical feasts to convince Patriarch MICHAEL III ANCHIALUS (1170–78) of his orthodoxy.

Nerses became an ardent defender of the traditional doctrines of the Armenian Church against MONOPHYISITISM and was quoted in this context by Pius XII in the encyclical Sempiternus Christus rex (1951). He was one of the early leaders in the Armenian literary renaissance. Among his writings are a complaint about the fall of Edessa (1144), Biblical commentaries, and encyclical letters treating of canonical matters. He was noted as a poet and writer of sacred hymns. His Twenty-four Hour Prayers (the daily prayers of St. Nerses) was translated into 32 languages of the Christian world. Before he died, he named the younger of his two nephews, both bishops, to succeed him. The elder, however, imprisoned his cousin and had himself consecrated catholicos under the name Gregory IV Tegha (For bibliography, see NERSES).

NESTORIANISM

A development of the Antiochene theology as it had been formulated by Eustathius of Sebaste, Diodore of Tarsus, and THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA in reaction to Arianism and Apollinarianism. It is clearly dyophysitic (duo physeis, or two natures in Christ), in contrast with the explanations of Saint CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, who held that in Christ there was one nature (mia physis), in which teaching Cyril's opponents detected Apollinarian echoes.

Nestorian Teaching. The doctrine of Nestorius is known through fragments of his letters and sermons preserved in the Acts of the Council of EPHESUS, frequent citations in the works of Saint Cyril of Alexandria, fragments of a personal apology (Tragoedia) composed after his deposition but before 439, and through the text of another apology, The Bazaar of Heracleides, written toward the end of his life and preserved in an interpolated Syrian version. Further information is offered by such opponents as John CASSIAN (De Incarnatione Domini contra Nestorium of 429–30) and Saint Cyril (Adv. Nestorii Blasphemias of 430), who convinced their contemporaries and posterity that Nestorius was a heretic.

Some modern historians, such as A. Harnack, F. Loofs, J. Bethune-Baker, and L. Duchesne, have sought to reestablish Nestorius's good name, saying that he was not necessarily a Nestorian; and A. Grillmeier believes that underlying the Nestorian formulas, even though these are contestable or plainly heterodox, there are valuable theological suppositions.

Christology. The Christological thought of Nestorius is dominated by Cappadocian theology and is affected by Stoic thought. Although it was not devoid of speculative value, nevertheless, in its attempt to avoid ARIANISM and Apollinarianism, Nestorianism did not reflect the true tradition of the Church. This fact was recognized by the early historians, such as Socrates (Ecclesiastical History 8.29.30); for in his Bazaar of Heracleides, Nestorius asserted that the key word THEOTOKOS had not been used by the Fathers.

Nestorius never spoke of "two sons," nor did he consider Christ as simply a man (purus homo); hence it was improper on the part of Eusebius of Doryleum to accuse him of the ADOPTIONISM of Paul of Samosata, a theology that saw Christ as a man who through his sufferings and virtues attained the dignity of a Son of God (Bewahrungstheologie).

Cyril spoke of one sole nature (mia physis) in Christ, a nature that could be understood in the way that Cyril intended: as a concrete, existent subject. But Nestorius defined a nature in the sense of ousia, or substance, and distinguished precisely between the human nature and the divine nature, applying in his Christology the distinction between nature (ousia) and person (hypostasis), which was currently in use in the trinitarian theology. Remark- ing that "wherever the Scriptures mention the economy [of salvation in the Incarnation] of the Lord," they attribute His birth and Passion not to the divinity but to humanity, Nestorius refused to attribute to the divine nature the human acts and sufferings of Jesus (Epist. ad Cyril- lum). This statement represents the crux of the disagree- ment between Cyril and Nestorius; it makes it probable that if their ideas and vocabulary could have been neatly clarified and defined, the argument as well as the schism could have been avoided.

The Theotokos. Nestorius refused to call Mary the Theotokos (God bearer), which proved to be the starting point for the whole quarrel. He held that to call Mary the Mother of God would be in effect to say that the divine nature had been born of a woman; Mary had begotten only a man, to whom the Word of God was united. Nestorius would agree to say Theotokos (Mother of God) only on the condition that one said at the same time anthropotokos (mother of man); for him the right word was christotokos (mother of Christ).

While distinguishing between the natures, Nestorius still affirmed their union. He would not consent to speak of "two sons"; but he spoke of a conjunction, a voluntary union, or one of accommodation, and gave the impression of believing in a union in the psychological or moral order rather than that of a metaphysical nature. This would be an extrinsic union like that of a temple with the divinity inhabiting it, of clothing and the wearer, or of an instrument (organon) and the user. Certain of these examples, such as that of the temple, are found in the Scriptures and in tradition.

Nestorius affirmed the close union and conjunction of a concrete human nature with the divinity, and the termination of that union is the prosopon or person of Christ, God and man. This involves a central point of difference between the theology of Nestorius and that of Cyril as well as that which the Church made its own at the Council of EPHEBUS and in subsequent tradition.

Saint Cyril. For Cyril, who justly drew support from the Creed of Nicaea, the unique subject is the Word (Logos) incarnate, become man in such fashion that it can be said that it is the Word that is born, lives, suffers, and dies in the flesh; there is no distinguishing between the Word and Christ. Nestorius on the other hand made a distinction between the Logos (the divine nature) and Christ (the Son, the Lord), which he saw as a result of the union of the divine nature and the human nature. Christ for him was like the total of two natures or the expression of their union, rather than the unique divine subject of the Incarnation. Nestorius spoke likewise of a "prosopon of union," the result of the union of the two prosopa, the divine and the human.

There is no doubt that Nestorius used the term prosopon (which meant originally the mask or representation of a person in the Greek theater) in expressions that recall the "communication of idioms," and he used formulas that Cyril might have employed; but the metaphysical foundation behind this use of "nature" and "person" was insufficient to protect the personal unity represented by the "Word Incarnate."

According to É. Amann, Nestorius could not imagine a nature without its own subsistence, or which was not a concrete hypostasis or personality. He did not clearly comprehend the distinction between the concept of real existence and that of independent subsistence. According to G. Prestige, Nestorius was not able to reduce to a unique, clearly differentiated person the two natures of Christ, which he nevertheless distinguished with such admirable realism.

The Nestorian Church. After the Council of Ephesus a strong Nestorian party existed in eastern Syria around the theological school of Ibas of Edessa, who was apparently a convinced Nestorian. After the theological peace achieved in the agreement of 433 between Cyril of Alexandria and John of Antioch, a number of bishops who rejected that agreement drew closer to the Syrian Church of Persia, which officially adopted Nestorianism at the Synod of Seleucia in 486. The Nestorians were expelled from Edessa in 489 by the Emperor Zeno and emigrated to Persia. It was thus that the Nestorian Church broke away from the faith of the Church of Constantinople and the Byzantine Empire.

The Nestorianism of the Persian Church was greatly strengthened at the synod of 612 when it adopted the herodox principles of the catholicos, Babai the Great: two natures, two hypostaseis, one sole prosopon; the term theotokos was formally excluded. This Church continued to flourish in spite of periods of persecution under the Sassanids, and even after the invasions of the Turks and Mongols. Its strength is witnessed by its theological schools at Seleucia and NISIBIS; its monasticism; and missionary expansion in Arabia, India (Malabar), Turkistan, Tibet, and even in China, where the bilingual inscription (in Syrian and Chinese) of Si-ngan-fu attests its presence in 781. The invasion and bloody persecution by Tamerlane (1380) almost destroyed the Nestorian Church, which today is greatly reduced in size in Iraq, Iran, and Syria and has a number of congregations in the United States.

A reunion of the Nestorians of Cyprus with Rome took place in 1445. In 1553 the Nestorian patriarch John Sulaqua professed the Catholic faith at Rome and was recognized as patriarch of Mosul. The union thus achieved continues today. Since 1696 the Chaldean patriarch has the title patriarch of Babylon. The Chaldeans number about 180,000 adherents. The Nestorians of Malabar, reunited with Rome in 1599, have some 1,300,000 communicants and use the old Syrian liturgy of Addai and Mari (see SYRO-MALABAR LITURGY).

NESTORIUS

Patriarch of Constantinople and heresiarch; b. Germanicia in Euphratesian Syria, after A.D. 381; d. Libya, after 451. Of Persian parenthood, Nestorius studied in Antioch and entered the monastery of Euprepios, where he was ordained. He penetrated deeply into the Antiochene theology, although it is doubtful that he became a disciple of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA. An orator, he was selected by THEODOSIUS II to succeed Sisinnius as bishop of Constantinople and was consecrated April 10, 428. A zealous opponent of ARIANISM and PELAGIANISM, he corresponded with Pope CELESTINE I on the Pelagianism of JULIAN OF ECLANUM, then residing in Constantinople.

Nestorius inaugurated a vast theological quarrel by preaching against the title THEOTOKOS, or Mother of God, given to the Virgin Mary, claiming she should be called rather the Mother of Christ. His doctrine was challenged by Eusebius of Doryleum, still a layman, who posted a contestatio, or rebuttal, on the doors of HAGIA SOPHIA in Constantinople, charging Nestorius with the errors of PAUL OF SAMOSATA. Nestorius wrote to Pope Celestine to explain his teaching on the Christotokos, and Eusebius sent the pope copies of the bishop's sermons. Meanwhile CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, disturbed by agitation on the part of Egyptian monks, sent two letters to Nestorius warning him of the heretical implications in calling Mary only the Mother of Christ and not the Mother of God. Cyril finally sent a dossier of the argument to Celestine, who in a Roman synod (August 430) summoned Nestorius to retract within ten days and charged Cyril with executing this sentence. After a synod at Alexandria in which Nes-torius' teaching was condemned (November 430), Cyril wrote a third letter to Nestorius to which he adjoined 12 anathemas (capitula) requesting Nestorius's acquiescence and signature. Nestorius in turn charged Cyril with APOLLINARIANISM and called upon the Emperor Theodosius II to convoke a council to settle the matter. The Council of EPHESUS met in June 431, but Nestorius refused to appear before it when Cyril, charged by Pope Celestine with acting as his legate, took over the presidency. In a session on June 22, 431, Nestorius was condemned as a heretic and despite charges of irregularity in the Council's proceedings, Theodosius deposed Nestorius and relegated him to a monastery from which, at the insistence of JOHN OF ANTIOCH, he was sent into exile to Petra in Arabia (436) and finally to the Great Oasis in Libya, where he died.

In 435 Theodosius ordered the writings of Nestorius to be burnt; hence only fragments of his sermons, letters, and treatises have been preserved. They were edited by F. LOOFS in 1905. His Bazaar of Heraclides, discovered in 1895 in a Syrian translation, is an autobiographical defense of his teaching in which he claims that his doctrine was identical with that of Pope LEO I and FLAVIAN OF CONSTANTINOPLE. Its literary form attests Nestorius' eloquence, and its plea for charity and forgiveness have caused a reestimate of his guilt as a heretic, although the doctrine known as NESTORIANISM took its rise from his preaching. A fragment of an earlier defense, known as the Tragedy of Nestorius, written probably between 431 and 435, has been preserved in Greek, Latin, and Syriac, and a number of his letters and sermons have been published in the literature dealing with the Council of Ephesus.

NETHERLANDS, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Kingdom of the Netherlands, also known as Holland, is one of the Low Countries in northwestern Europe, along with Belgium and Luxembourg. Bound on the west and north by the North Sea, on the east by Germany and on the south by Belgium, the Netherlands has traditionally boasted the highest population density in the world. Since 1815 the government has been a constitutional monarchy and has been noted for its socialist policies; it also led the world as one of the founding member nations of NATO in the mid-twentieth century.

The Middle Ages to 1559

During the early Christian era Batavian and other Germanic tribes inhabited the Low Countries, although regions south of the Rhine, including Maastricht and Heerlen and points to the south and west of the North Sea, were under Roman control. Christianity may have been introduced in the 2nd and 3rd centuries by soldiers, officials, merchants and slaves, but not in any systematic way. The first bishop appeared only in the 4th century: the Armenian St. Servatius (Sarbatus) had his see at Tongeren (c. 346–359) and was buried at Maastricht in the Church of St. Servaas. At the Council of Rimini (359) Servatius was a defender of orthodoxy. However, inroads made by Saxon invaders and the 5th century Frankish occupation and colonization of superficially Romanized frontier regions halted all expressions of Christianity there.

Missions before Charlemagne. Missionary activity in the Low Countries started anew after the baptism of King Clovis in 496 at Reims. Bishop VEDAST (VAAST) labored in the Artois; Falco, in Tongeren; and Eleutherus, in Tournai. Further to the north, St. AMANDUS was the first missionary bishop; he became bishop of Maastricht (c. 649), to which town the bishops of Tongeren, already before Monulphus (558), had moved their residence. From then on Irish, Anglo-Saxon and Frankish missionaries established themselves in newly founded monasteries and devoted themselves to the mission of the north. Between 625 and 730, 21 new monasteries were founded, mostly in the Romanized south. From Maastricht St. LAMBERT (670–705) and, after the translation of the residence, from Liège St. HUBERT (705–727) preached the gospel in Brabant. Christianity did not penetrate Frisia, the region north of the Rhine and the Meuse, before conquest by the Franks between 689 and 719. The isolated efforts of the Anglo-Saxons, St. WILFRID OF YORK (678) and Wicbert (688–689) failed because of the Frisian-Frankish war. However, the Northumbrian St. WILLIBRORD (d. 739) and his companions had started systematic evangelization by 690. Five years later Willibrord was appointed bishop of Utrecht by King Pepin II and was approved and consecrated by Pope Sergius I.

Many Anglo-Saxon missionaries crossed the North Sea, including St. BONIFACE, who became the second bishop of Utrecht (753) before he was murdered by the Frisians at Dokkum on June 5, 754; St. WILLEHAD, who was later bishop of Bremen; Liudger; and St. LEBUINUS. These men were supported in their efforts by the then-dwindling Frankish royal power and were aided by monks already in the region. By c. 800 the Low Countries were fully Christianized. Utrecht became the most important diocese and, like Liège, was a suffragan of the Archdiocese of Cologne. To the north and the east, parts of the newly won territories were brought under the supervision of the Dioceses of Münster and Osnabrück. The southern regions belonged to the Archdiocese of Reims and to the Dioceses of Noyon-Tournai, Cambrai and Terwaan (Thérouanne).

The 9th Century. During his reign CHARLEMAGNE contributed greatly to the growth of the territorial, juridical and financial independence of the Sees of Utrecht and Liège by extending and reinforcing their rights of immunity. The raids of the Normans (810, 834–837, 880–882) wrought wholesale destruction of churches (Utrecht before 858) and monasteries, including EGMOND and Maastricht. Bishops Hunger (854–866), Odilbold (870–899) and RADBOD (900–917) had to live in exile in Odilienberg near Roermond and in Deventer. Bishop Balderik (918–976) was finally able to rebuild the cathedral, chapter-houses and the monastery in the ruined town of Utrecht.

Bishops Gain Secular Power. By 870 most of the Low Country region had come under the political control of Germany, and from 925 constituted a dependency of the Kingdom of Lotharingia. In conformity with the German (Ottonian-Salic) system, during the 10th and 11th centuries the bishops of Utrecht and Liège found themselves endowed with secular rights and privileges; they were even entrusted with the civil rule of counties. These bishops became princes of the empire, trustworthy defenders of the king's power against disgruntled counts and dukes striving to free themselves from royal control. Thus in Utrecht Bishop Ansfried of Hoey (995–1010) received royal territory and judicial rights; Bishop Adalbold (1010–26) a county in Drente and Teisterbant; and Bishop Bernold (Bernulfus; 1027–54) two more counties, demesnes and regalian rights. The secular territories gradually bestowed upon the bishops of Utrecht up to 1054, the so-called “Sticht,” together with all pertinent judicial, political and military rights, were transferred as part of a deliberate imperial program designed to create ecclesiastical secular territories that would serve as powerful institutional counterparts in the political balance of the German empire. Liège arrived at the same stage under Bishop NOTKER (972–1008). In return, several monasteries, such as Thorn and Elten, also became political entities, directly subjected to the empire.

Their increasingly political position forced the bishops to resort to military action against rebellious imperial vassals, such as the prefect Balderik or Count Diederik III of Holland. The interweaving of ecclesiastical and secular interests profoundly influenced the spiritual orientation not only of the bishops, but also of the higher clergy, monks, nuns, common people and nobility. Personal relations to God were now affected by the same political, feudal, juridical and hierarchical factors that dominated everyday life.

Gregorian Reform. Utrecht was one of the acknowledged strongholds of the imperialists during the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE which sought to unite the Christian West under the leadership of the pope. Bishop William (1054–76) signed, as the third important man, the act of deposition of Pope GREGORY VII. Bishop Conrad (1076–99) was as closely connected with the old imperial system as were his Liège confrères Henry of Verdun (1075–91) and Otbert (1091–1119). The abbots of St. Paul's Abbey in Utrecht and of Egmond Abbey, who had not been influenced by the spirit of the CLUNIAC REFORM in its implementation by Pope Gregory VII, were firm supporters of the imperial cause. Egmond was not transferred into the possession of the Holy See by the owner of the monastery, Count Diederick VI of Holland, before 1140.

The northern Low Countries were more interested in the moral rather than the political aspects of the GREGORIAN REFORM. Everywhere a strong enthusiasm was in evidence for the newly discovered evangelical ideals of apostolic life (poverty and preaching). Among the chief promoters of this spiritual renewal was St. NORBERT OF XANTEN (c. 1080–1134), founder of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS. The Canons Regular of St. Augustine (at Rolduc from 1112) and the Benedictines also attracted numerous new members. While there had once been only three monasteries in the northern regions, from this period they multiplied rapidly and effected an enthusiasm for the Christian life among the laity. The heretical preaching of the layman TANCHELM (c. 1100) near Antwerp advocated an extreme moral reform, extending to revolt against the clergy, the liturgy, tithes and the administration of Sacraments by unworthy priests.

Only after 1100 did the archbishops of Utrecht begin to move slowly in the Gregorian direction. Godebold (1114–27), the first to leave the imperial party, wholeheartedly approved the Concordat of WORMS (1122). The concordat, as applied to Utrecht, meant that there would be no more foreigners in the see, no more imperial nominations, but instead free election by the five chapters of Utrecht and by the cathedral chapter of Liège of native candidates, such as Andreas of Cuyk (1127–39) and Harbert (1139–50) for Utrecht, and of natives of Namur, Louvain, Jülich, Leien and other towns of the area for Liège. The rise of new powers was manifested in the ardent struggle among the princes of Holland, Guelders and Cleves and the chapters and the municipal communities of Utrecht and Deventer at the election of Herman of Hoorn (1150–56).

In other respects, however, the period after the Concordat of Worms was not sharply distinguished from the preceding one. The spread of monasteries in the Low Countries continued in a more concentrated form. The Benedictines, for example, founded 17 monasteries between 1122 and 1215. The transition to monasteries with a more severe rule (Canons Regular, Norbertines, Benedictines) indicated an intense interest in monastic life. The 14 CISTERCIAN convents for nuns that were established within 50 years demonstrated the important role of women in this movement. The newly created double MONASTERIES for men and women eventually became independent foundations.

Third Crusade to Western Schism. The religious zeal inspired by the Crusades of the 11th through the 14th centuries led to the birth and spread of new military orders. The Knights of MALTA, the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS and the TEMPLARS founded their own houses in the Low Countries, mostly in the years 1240 to 1260.

In the Low Countries several leading lords, as well as the populace, took an active part in the CRUSADES: Dirk VI of Holland (1139), Floris III of Holland and his son William, and Otto of Guelders were in the army of FREDERICK I, BARBAROSSA (1184). Bishop Otto (1216–27) and his men, and Count William of Holland, together with the Frisians, fought the Muslims at Damietta (1217). But the crusaders were diverted at times to serve secular purposes, as when the Frisian crusaders were employed to fight the rebellious Stedingers, who did not wish to pay tithes to the archbishop of Bremen (1234). Crusaders were also used to capture (1248) the town of Aachen, site of imperial coronations, for the Roman king, William IV of Holland.

Holy Roman Emperor Frederick Barbarossa again appointed bishops (Geoffrey of Rhenen, 1156–78; Baldwin of Holland, 1178–96) who would support his battles against the pope and against the lay nobles. At the time of the double election in Germany (1198), the bishops of Utrecht and Liège, like their Rhenish colleagues, supported the Guelph candidate opposing the German emperor, until finally FREDERICK II was eliminated as a determining factor in ecclesiastical policy. The electoral chapters, however, were to find the emperor's place taken increasingly by the neighboring territorial princes of Holland and Guelders, and later by the popes during the Avignon period. Many secular considerations, such as conflicting international or territorial political interests, now determined the election, appointment, deposition or translation of bishops.

Synodal records and statutes, nevertheless, reveal a continuing interest in liturgy, discipline, administration of Sacraments, celebration of feasts, ecclesiastical organization and monastic life. Around 1350 there were 100 days that were celebrated as solemnly as Sundays, an anomaly in a world which was steadily becoming urbanized and commercialized. The MENDICANT ORDERS began c. 1230 to come to the new towns in Holland, Brabant and Utrecht, and provided residents with appropriate spiritual care. The rise of the BEGUINES reflected the interplay of religious and social factors (a surplus of women). Among the important spiritual phenomena in this period were the Eucharistic miracle at Amsterdam (1345), the hysterical preoccupation with death by the Flagellants and the Dancers (1347), the observantist movement in the convents and the DEVOTIO MODERNA, which at the end of the 14th century found a promoter of European significance in Gerard GROOTE of Deventer (1340–84) (see BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE; WINDESHEIM; THOMAS À KEMPIS; IMITATION OF CHRIST; SPIRITUALITY OF THE LOW COUNTRIES).

During the Middle Ages the Low Countries produced no theologians or philosophers of world fame, but they did supply many scholars who played important roles at the universities of Paris, Cologne, Louvain and Heidelberg. Included among them were MARSILIUS OF INGHEN (d. 1396), HENRY OF GORKUM (d. 1431) and Heymericus de Campo (d. 1460). Only Wessel GANSPORT (1419–89) acquired international importance; his treatises later won the admiration of Martin Luther.

1378 to 1559. During the WESTERN SCHISM the Low Countries supported URBAN VI and the Roman line of claimants against the Clement VII and the French claims, apart from a short period of neutrality at Liège dictated by Philip of Burgundy. The concordat of Pope Martin V with the German nation (1418) following the schism meant, for the Low Countries, a considerable restriction in papal PROVISION and appointments. The estates of Utrecht, the chapters, the nobility and the citizens of the towns of the Sticht thereafter played a primary role in the election of the bishop of Utrecht, their spiritual and temporal lord.

Political differences were the main cause of the first Utrecht schism (1423–1433–1449), in which the western part of the diocese (Nedersticht) supported the cause of the papal appointee Zweder of Kuilenburg, while the eastern districts (Oversticht) followed their elected candidate Rudolf of Diepholt. The whole conflict was essentially a Burgundian affair, since Duke Philip of Burgundy was pushing into the northern territories. Burgundian influence kept growing stronger through the centralization initiated by the duke. His illegitimate son David received the See of Utrecht (1457–96), and his nephew Louis of Bourbon the See of Liège (1455–82). Eventually nearly all the northern regions came under Philip of Burgundy's control. In the same way Frederick of Baden (1496–1517), a grandnephew of Philip the Fair, Duke of Burgundy, was appointed for Utrecht by his uncle the Roman Emperor Maximilian I, who on this occasion received a papal privilege of free appointment. But the Burgundian-Hapsburg family abandoned Frederick when he compromised himself by negotiating with France, and the see was given to another Burgundian protégé, Philip of Burgundy (1517–24). Henry of Bavaria, the next bishop, was not even consecrated. Unable to resist Burgundian pressure, he surrendered in 1528 to Emperor Charles V the temporal territories and rights held by the See of Utrecht since 1054. This marked the end of the Middle Ages in the Netherlands.

From a religious viewpoint the close of the Middle Ages was occasioned by the progress of the REFORMATION. The evangelical, dogmatic-moral orientation of northern HUMANISM supported by the practical mentality of the Devotio Moderna, the aversion against quibbling scholasticism, and the increasing criticisms of ecclesiastical abuses prepared the way for the new doctrines. The new critical philological method of Erasmian theology manifested itself in a series of vehement attacks on the old scholastic system and met with severe resistance at the University of Louvain. Precisely because of his personalistic humanism, Desiderius ERASMUS of Rotterdam (1469–1536) was not the man to reconcile the doctrinal controversies of his age.

The specifically Dutch form of the new theology was not Lutheranism but Sacramentarianism (Hinne Rode, Cornelis Hoen); but the popular spiritualistic movement of the ANABAPTISTS attracted many of the lower classes. Government repression, however, quelled the revolutionary excesses and forced Anabaptism to cease its involvement in public activity (Quiet Baptists; MENNONITES). It was French CALVINISM that caused the separation of more than half the population from the Church by identifying the cause of reformed religion with the struggle for political independence and for the preservation of national rights against the dominating policy of Spain.

1559 to 1795

The most obvious sign of the centralizing, absolutist Hapsburg policy that would eventually culminate in the unification of the Netherlands under Charles V, was the concordat of 1559, which King PHILIP II OF SPAIN, ruler of the Netherlands, extorted from Pope PAUL IV. Already at the secularization of Utrecht, Charles V had acquired an obvious right of episcopal nomination, and Bishops William of Enckenvoirt and George of Egmond were no longer regarded as significant authorities. True power and jurisdiction rested with the higher clergy and the chapters. Since the spread of Lutheranism was not restrained by imperial edict, a more efficient ecclesiastical organization was needed. By the bull Super universas (May 12, 1599) the Holy See created three new ecclesiastical provinces: CAMBRAI (with Arras, Tournai, Namur and St. Omer as suffragans); Mechelen (with Ypres, Ghent, Bruges, Antwerp, Bois-le-Duc and Roermond); and Utrecht (with Haarlem, Deventer, Middelburg, Groningen and Leeuwarden). The nominees of Philip II were far from ideal; the only bishops outstanding for ability and virtue were Nicolas de Castro of Middelburg, Cunerus Petri of Leeuwarden and Wilhelm Lindanus of Roermond.

Origins and Spread of Protestantism. The Netherlands region needed reformation urgently. The number of priests increased considerably in the 15th century. By the end of this century there were about 6,000 secular and 3,000 religious priests with 1,600 parishes and 75 collegiate churches with 1,200 canons; but 25 percent of these priests did not observe the law of celibacy, and most of them had received poor theological training. As a result the parish priests and the regular clergy were unable either to effectively refute the arguments for Lutheranism and Calvinism to hold their flocks together. Young priests with the training advocated by the Council of Trent were lacking everywhere in the Low Countries because of the absence of seminaries there.

Chapters and magistrates, opposed as they were to the new organization of dioceses, delayed the holding of a council of the Archdiocese of Utrecht until 1565. Prelates and chapters accepted the Tridentine doctrinal decrees, but not until 1568 did they submit to the disciplinary measures that would curtail their jurisdiction. The projected new seminary was not erected.

In this unfavorable situation all plans for Catholic reform came to naught even before the rebellious Calvinist minorities invaded Holland and Gelderland in 1572 and in the name of freedom and of reformed religion cut short all organized Catholic life. Subsequently the Calvinists won by military force the remaining northern provinces in which the reformed religion was sometimes introduced with violence (Martyrs of GORKUM and of Alkmaar). In Utrecht Catholicism was liquidated between 1579 and 1580; with the death of Archbishop Schenck (Aug. 25, 1580) the hierarchy in this ecclesiastical province came to an end. The worthy Bishop Govert van Mierlo of Haarlem (d. 1587) had to flee from the Calvinistic terror in May of 1578 and was never able to return to his see. His cathedral chapter continued his work, however, and was an important center of missionary activity as late as 1703. The bishop of Middelburg died in May of 1573; the bishop of Groningen, in October of 1576 and the bishop of Deventer died in May of 1577. Cunerus Petri of Leeuwarden was banished in April of 1578. Philip II nominated others in their places, but these nominees did not receive papal confirmation and were therefore of no importance in the regions where Calvinists were preponderant. Brabant and Limburg did not belong to the rebellious Calvinistic federation until c. 1630. The hierarchy was preserved at Bois-le-Duc until 1632 and at Roermond until 1801. In these two dioceses the Tridentine reforms were introduced with such ease and success that Catholicism has remained strong in these regions to the present time.

Catholic Reform. A solution for the inadequate ecclesiastical organization was found when Sasbout Vosmeer (d. 1614), a secular priest belonging to a patrician family of Delft, was appointed vicar-general for Utrecht (1583) and for Middelburg (1584). In his administration Vosmeer was subject to the newly erected nunciature at Cologne until 1596 and after that, to the nunciature at Brussels. In 1592 Vosmeer became vicar apostolic; he received episcopal consecration in 1602. This appointment indicated clearly that the Holland mission was directly under Roman control. From 1622 until 1908 it was under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Vosmeer's good example stimulated a handful of young priests to devote themselves under very difficult circumstances to missionary work around Delft. Willem Coopal, vicar of the chapter in Haarlem from 1592, was the soul of the missionary activity in northern Holland. Utrecht and Oldenzaal later became important regional missionary centers. As a result of this missionary endeavor many predominately Catholic villages exist today even in regions that are almost entirely Protestant. However, the great shortage of zealous priests allowed regions such as Drente, Groningen and Friesland to become almost completely Protestant. The regular clergy could fill the need only partially; until 1614, for example, there were only 15 Jesuits in the Dutch mission. The situation changed for the better a few years later. By 1630 there were nearly 100 religious and 300 secular priests at work. The increase was due to the newly founded seminaries at Cologne (1602) and Louvain (1617). Later priests also came from Douai. The Vicars Apostolic Philippus ROVENIUS (1614–51) and Johannes NEERCASSEL (1663–86) distinguished themselves by concentrating all their forces on pastoral activity. Rivalry between regular and secular clergy adversely affected the results.

Restrictions on Catholics. The Netherlands has never been subjected to the imposition of Protestantism by force, nor was the Reformed Church an officially established one (see REFORMED CHURCHES). As a religious minority Catholics were excluded from political offices, magistracies and guilds, but judicial officers in nearly every town allowed Catholics to hold religious services in private homes, garrets and barns for a financial consideration. Despite such obstacles, important Catholic artists contributed to the glory of the Dutch golden age: convert and poet Joost van den Vondel, painter Jan Steen, architect Hendrik de Keyser and musician Joannes Stalpaert van der Wielen are only the most famous among a great number. The 17th century was not dominated by a Calvinistic cultural hegemony, but the official repression, the exclusion from social life and from certain forms of trade and industry affected the personal and collective honor and vitality of Catholics more and more. Under the circumstances it is not surprising that Catholicism in the Netherlands declined until it comprised only a third of the population by 1726. Around 1700 the leading merchants, industrialists and intellectuals were Protestants, and the gentry were on the verge of converting to Calvinism (the poverty-stricken and the proletariat had done so from the very beginning). Catholics were to be found in the middle class, among the shopkeepers and artisans. Only in the 18th and 19th centuries did immigration from Westphalia change this pattern. The distilling of gin, the preparation of tobacco and other products, and, later, the manufacture of textiles enabled these Catholic immigrants to acquire enough wealth to position them in the upper classes of Dutch society.

In view of the unfavorable position of Catholicism in the Netherlands, the division in Catholic ranks caused by the Schism of UTRECHT is all the more regrettable. After 1702 the Estates of Holland no longer permitted the presence of a vicar apostolic appointed by Rome. This left Catholics without a legitimate leader. No new bishops were appointed, the Sacrament of Confirmation was not administered, churches were not consecrated and there was only a perfunctory supervision from Brussels by an Italian nuncio acting as vice-superior of the Dutch mission. After the death in 1727 of the vicar apostolic J. van Bijleveldt the only form of ecclesiastical organization was that of nine archpresbyterates: Holland, Zeeland, Friesland, West Friesland, Utrecht, Gelderland, Twent, Salland and Groningen. This organization remained unchanged until 1853.

The Rise of the Modern Church: 1795 to World War I

After Dutch patriots, inspired by the spirit of the French Revolution, turned the Netherlands into the Batavian Republic (1795–1806), the religious situation changed. A decree of the Batavian National Assembly (Aug. 5, 1796) ended the extremely close union of the State with the privileged Reformed Church. In succeeding years the country, once a commercial superpower, would come increasingly under the sway of Napoleonic France, while many of its colonies were lost to Great Britain.

1795 to 1853. The introduction of the principles of the FRENCH REVOLUTION into the Netherlands legally emancipated the suppressed Catholics and gave them the opportunity to become magistrates. In the National Assembly (March of 1796) 25 percent of the members were Catholics. Brabant was admitted to the Batavian Republic, but Limburg and Zeeuws-Vlaanderen were annexed to France. This resulted in the abolition in 1801 of the Diocese of Roermond, the territory of which was divided between Aachen and Liège. The Vicariate Apostolic of Breda was created in 1803. This new freedom profited Catholics. Churches were restored, and new ones could be built. Priests were no longer required to seek government permission in order to function. The construction of seminaries in Breda, Bois-le-Duc, Warmond and 's-Heerenberg (1798–99) made it possible to educate the clergy of the Netherlands on native soil.

King Louis Bonaparte (1806–10), appointed by his brother, the Emperor Napoleon, changed this freedom into a new kind of Gallican servitude by creating a department of cult and by demanding control over such ecclesiastical affairs as the education and payment of the clergy, the administration of churches and the projected reestablishment of the hierarchy. The annexation of the Kingdom of Holland to France (1810–13) was only a brief interlude. During it the Diocese of 's-Hertogenbosch was reestablished, but its bishop could not take possession of his see because of opposition from the local clergy. Breda was annexed to the See of Mechelen. Van Maanen, Goubeau and Van Gobbelschroy, who served as advisers to King William I (1813–39) in a newly independent Holland, learned the ideas of Louis Napoleon and maintained in practice the provisions of the French CONCORDAT OF 1801 and the ORGANIC ARTICLES. P. G. van Ghert, influenced by the philosophy of HEGEL regarding the state, aimed to form a national Church under governmental supervision. To this end he created the college of philosophy at Louvain (1825), where seminarians would imbibe the spirit of FEBRONIANISM before studying theology. These projects caused such a serious conflict that King William I asked for a new concordat (1827). This document abolished the concordat of 1801 for Limburg and established on paper the organization of dioceses. But it was not put into effect fully because Protestants and anticlericals opposed it and because the Catholic clergy disliked any agreement that gave the crown preponderant influence in the nomination of bishops and canons. The northern Netherlands remained a missionary district, the subject of a power struggle among political factions.

King William II (1840–49), who was strongly influenced by Johannes Zwijsen, a priest in Tilburg, favored the Catholic desire to found new monasteries and to start Catholic schools and social care; but he did not succeed in putting the concordat of 1827 into effect. As a result of the secession of Belgium (1830) from the Netherlands the Vicariate Apostolic of Limburg was separated from Liège (1840), Zeeuws-Flanders was annexed to the Vicariate Apostolic of Breda (1841) and the vicars apostolic of Breda, Bois-le-Duc and Roermond received the episcopal dignity (1842). The reestablishment of the Catholic hierarchy had to await the constitution of 1848, which granted freedom of education and of ecclesiastical organization under the country's new parliamentary government.

Catholics cooperated with liberals for the principles of unrestricted political freedom. For a generation the Catholic laity had been stimulated by the publications of J. Le Sage ten Broek, whose periodical De Godsdienst-vriend, begun in 1818, was influenced by Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS in its ultramontane outlook. Also influential were Professors Cornelis Broere and Franciscus van Vree of Warmond, who strove for a Catholic cultural revival by founding De Katholiek (1842) and the Catholic daily De Tijd (1845). Differences in politico-ecclesiastical thought brought into being two groups of Catholic laymen. A conservative group, Gallican in spirit, centered around the department of cult and favored government influence in ecclesiastical affairs. A second group, composed of younger persons, gathered around De Tijd and strove for complete separation of church and state. The latter group received the support of most of the professors at Warmond and of Bishop Zwijsen, the vicar apostolic of Bois-le-Duc.

The conservatives requested the reestablishment of the hierarchy, but the progressives and liberals actually obtained it in 1853 as a logical consequence of the principles of freedom contained in the constitution of 1848. The ideas formulated by Bishop C. A. von Bommel of Liège influenced the papal bull Ex qua die arcano, in which Pius IX restored the hierarchical organization of 1559. The Archdiocese of Utrecht was made the metropolitan see. Its archbishop, Johannes Zwijsen, was made administrator of Bois-le-Duc. Suffragan to Utrecht were the Dioceses of Haarlem, Breda and Roermond. The Vicariates of Megen and Grave, erected in 1801 for the Netherlands sections of the suppressed Dioceses of Roermond and Liège, were associated with Bois-le-Duc.

Protestants joined with conservatives who opposed the Liberal premier Jan Thorbecke. Their vehement reaction caused the fall of Thorbecke (1853) and led to the promulgation of an innocuous decree requiring a bishop to ask for official admission before taking up residence in his see.

1853 to World War I. During the last half of the 19th century Dutch Catholics tended to dwell in cultural isolation. A common past as a religious minority, the increasing centralization of ecclesiastical authority in Rome, and Pius IX's teachings in QUANTA CURA and in the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS (1864) promoted among these Catholics an attitude of separation from the world, modeled on the outlook of the French publications L'Univers and La Croix. Ultramontanism found strong support in the Netherlands. With the exception of Bishop Franciscus van Vree of Haarlem, the hierarchy concerned itself with ecclesiastical administration and pastoral works, and it did not engage in scientific or theological discussions. Original scholarly productions were few. The most important ones were those of Cornelis Broere in theology, W. Nuyens in history, J. A. ALBERDINGK THYM in literature and T. Borret in archeology. Catholics played a more important role in music, architecture and sculpture because of the work of Pierre Cuypers, Louis Royer and the three Strackés.

The Catholic alliance with the Liberals in politics bore good fruit, but it did not endure because of the disinclination of the Liberals to put into effect the results of 1848 and to grant to Catholics complete freedom and government subsidies for Catholic elementary schools (1857, 1878). Hermann Schaepman (1844–1903), priest, poet and politician, was mainly responsible for the conservative direction taken by Catholics. In 1880 he became a member of the second chamber of the Estates-General, and he published Proeve van een Program (1883), which provided the basis for the political organization of Catholics in Rooms Katholieke Staatspartij (1896). In conjunction with Abraham Kuyper, the Protestant political leader, Schaepman established a Catholic-Protestant coalition to oppose the influences of liberalism. By combining the struggle for widening the suffrage with the school issue at the time when the constitution was revised (1887), Schaepman discovered the road that led to the granting of general suffrage and to the equating of public and private education in the distribution of public funds (1917). In his later years Schaepman followed the directives of Pope Leo XIII concerning social problems and collaboration with non-Catholics. Alfons Ariëns, the pupil of Schaepman, founded the Association of Catholic Laborers (R. K. Werkliedenvereniging), which formed the nucleus of the present-day Katholieke Arbeiders Beweging. Henri Poels strove after 1910 for the social emancipation of the workers in Limburg.

After Leo XIII's death (1903) there was in the Netherlands, as elsewhere in the Church, a reaction against appeasement, free scientific research and irenic spirituality. The concentration on purely spiritual matters gave rise to a very intense Eucharistic life and interest in the liturgy. At the same time the reaction against MODERNISM promoted INTEGRALISM. The eager vigilance of Integralists, such as M. A. Thompson, a priest who edited the Rotterdam Catholic daily newspaper De Maasbode (1897–1912), stigmatized all efforts for parliamentary and social democracy and all ecumenical and irenic colloquies as traitorous collaboration with a libertine world.

The 20th Century and Beyond

Since the revolt of 1830 decided the future of Belgium as an independent state, the United Kingdom of the Netherlands has remained under a constitutional form of government. Neutral during World War I, the country relinquished control over several of its remaining colonies during the first part of the 20th century; in 1954 the islands comprising the Netherlands Antilles were granted full partnership in the Kingdom of the Netherlands, and as late as 1975 Suriname was granted political independence. Like many other nations, in addition to political realignments, the Netherlands also experienced a resurgent interest in Catholicism during the century.

The first decades of the 20th century witnessed a remarkable development of efficient Catholic organizations in the spiritual and secular spheres. Throughout the Netherlands parishes were created and churches built. The foundation of the Catholic University of Nijmegen (1923) and of the Catholic School of Economics in Tilburg (1927) were the most outstanding events in the progress of Catholic higher education. Several monasteries were also built, while Catholic hospitals and other charitable works increased in number. Missionary zeal intensified. The apostolate of Christian culture gained a wide following.

This organized Catholicism drew serious criticisms from younger intellectuals, among them Willem Asselbergs (alias Anton van Duinkerken), who fought as hard against the "heresies" of humanism and vitalism as against Catholic attitudes of self-sufficiency and triumph. The generation after Schaepman was so willing to continue his policy of political alliance with Protestants that a Catholic, Charles Ruys de Beerenbrouck, was prime minister in three cabinets (1918–22, 1922–25, 1929–33). To an increasing degree Catholics also sought closer relations with the country's socialist leaders following World War I, blaming other Catholic politicians for conformism to traditional principles that did not offer any solution for mounting economic and social problems at the national and international levels. The decline of effective democracy led some Catholics to look with favor on Italian Fascism and, to a lesser extent, on German National Socialism, and to form De Nieuwe Gemeenschap and Zwart Front.

World War II reunited all elements in a common resistance to the German occupation of the country. Johannes de JONG, Archbishop of Utrecht and later cardinal (1945), was recognized universally as the leader in the resistance to the ideology of National Socialism. In 1941 membership in the National-Socialistische Beweging was forbidden. It was during the German occupation that Catholics and Protestants began the colloquies that would eventually effect a healthful change in the spiritual climate and promote the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. The ideals of political cooperation after World War II tried to break through the bastions of confessional parties and formulate a comprehensive national policy. The Catholic bishops, however, while preferring to retain existing Catholic organizations, also revealed an awareness of the shortcomings of isolationism (Episcopal Mandate, 1954).

An ecumenical spirit began to grow within the country during the early 1950s, as Catholics became more active participants in national, political and cultural life. Religious discrimination began to decline. Important historical syntheses by L. J. Rogier destroyed the remnants of the former ghetto mentality and stimulated Dutch Catholicism to a self-conscious thought and action described as “progressive.” At Vatican Council II Cardinal Bernardus Alfrink and others gave evidence of the vigor and forward-looking outlook that would be characteristic of Netherlands Catholicism during the second half of the 20th century. However, a synod held in Rome in January of 1980 yielded little progress in improving the internal stability of the Church in the Netherlands.

Moving into the New Millennium. By the 1990s the influence of religion on secular life was continuing its downward trend, the Netherlands’ socialist political policies often running counter to Church doctrine. As had been predicted at Vatican Council II, Dutch Catholics were becoming polarized over both religious and social issues. Ministries for women and celibacy among priests were among those Church-related issues that found Catholics on both sides, while other concerns, such as assisted suicide and sexual morality, were debated in the political arena as well as in the Church. In 1995 the Katholiek Politieke Partij (K-P-P) was founded as a means to provide like-minded Catholics with a conservative voice in social policy issues, such as abortion, divorce, drug use, euthanasia, immigration and others. The Katholiek Nieuwsblad (newspaper) was also established to serve Catholic interests.

Within one of the most politically liberal nations in the world, a strong, united Catholic presence remains crucial if Church doctrine is to have an effect on Dutch social policies. Such organizations as the Federation of Catholic and Protestant Employers Associations and other trade unions representing Catholic workers have actively lobbied the nation’s First and Second Chamber representatives. The 1998 Dutch Bishops’ conference ended with a pastoral letter calling on Catholics to lobby the government to stop turning away asylum-seekers from countries such as Iran, citing as “a particular responsibility for churches, politicians, and others” to change existing closed-door immigration policies. In September of 2000 the Dutch parliament’s approval of same-sex marriage legislation prompted the Vatican to dub the policy “a insult to reason,” a criticism in line with Pope John Paul II’s stated objection to such legislation.

The Catholic Presence. In 1650 nearly half the population of the Netherlands was Catholic, but in 1726 that number had dropped to about one-third. According to the 1809 census, 38.1 percent were Catholics, that number holding relatively steady into the 21st century.

Like other parts of Europe, the Netherlands received an influx of Muslims from Morocco, Turkey and Indonesia beginning in the 1960s, resulting in the construction of over 300 mosques throughout the country. In contrast, by 2000 there were 1,683 parishes, 1,664 secular and 2,599 religious priests, 214 major seminarians, 1,712 religious men and 13,216 religious women administering to the Catholic faith.

Catholic elementary and secondary schools, which receive financial support from the government, account for 35 percent of all schools at these levels and enrolled 40 percent of all students. The pontifical Catholic University of Nijmegen and the School of Economics at Tilburg continued with student enrollments in the thousands. The nation’s 120 Catholic hospitals had over 25,000 beds, while Catholic presses published over 20 newspapers appearing at least once a week and numerous books and periodicals of a religious, cultural or scientific character.

NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH

The Calvinistic Reformed Church in the Netherlands, Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk (NHK), came into existence at a general synod convened by King William I in 1816 shortly after the political restoration of the country. The roots of this Church go back, however, to the 16th-century Reformation. Synods between 1571 and 1619 established the doctrinal alignment and discipline of the Reformed Church in Holland. Accordingly the NHK inherited as its confessional literature the Confessio Belgica (1561), the Heidelberg Catechism (1563), and the canons of Dordrecht on predestination (1619). See CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT. At this time the NHK adopted a presbyterian form of ecclesiastical government, with an annual synod to enact legislation. Synodal decrees had to be submitted to the monarch for approval. Greater autonomy was granted in 1852, and all controls were removed in 1876.

Internal troubles, which plagued the NHK from its inception, corresponded to some extent to the current political controversies between liberals and conservatives. Thus, in reaction to the liberal interpretation of the binding force of confessions, a revival movement arose in the 1830s. Under Hendrik de Cock (1801–42) a group of these revivalists separated in 1834 from the NHK and formed the Christian Reformed Church, Christlijke Gereformeerde Kerk (CGK). Much more serious was the break that resulted from a long-standing controversy between the “modernist” and “orthodox” parties. The latter group, led by Abraham Kuyper, professed fidelity to the original tenets of the Calvinist reformation and protested the corruption of these beliefs by the “free-thinkers.” Kuyper founded the Free University of Amsterdam (1880) and formed, with his disciples, the Reformed Mourning Church, Gereformeerde Kerk (1886). When many of the CGK joined Kuyper’s movement in 1892, the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, Gereformeerde Kerke in Nederland (GKN), originated. Within the NHK, meanwhile, tensions between the “ethical” party under A. J. T. Jonker and the “free-thinking” party of Niemeyer led to further divisions. All efforts to achieve real unity before World War II proved fruitless, but the shared experiences during the Nazi occupation created an entente that culminated in a new church order (1951).

In 1965 the NHK had some three million members, about one-third of the country’s population. The GKN, with somewhat less than 700,000 followers, represented about seven percent of the inhabitants. The CGK had about 60,000 adherents. All three groups are Calvinist in theology and are organized in the traditional synodal manner. Each congregation elects a consistory composed of elders and deacons, and each local congregation has the right to call a minister to serve it. Synods are of three kinds: (1) synods of various classes, (2) provincial synods, and (3) general or national synods. There are also committees to coordinate the missionary, social, and other activities of the Churches. BARTHIANISM had a great impact, especially in the NHK.

NETTER, THOMAS

Carmelite theologian, generally known as Thomas Netter of Walden; b. Saffron Walden, Essex, England, c. 1370; d. Rouen, France, Nov. 2, 1430. At an early age he entered the CARMELITE order at London where he was ordained in 1396. His subsequent studies at Oxford brought him into contact with Wyclifite teaching, the logic of which at first attracted him. He soon discovered, however, that J. WYCLIF was “an open counterfeiter of Scripture” and devoted much of his energy to refuting Wyclif and eliminating Lollardy. His main work on this subject, Doctrinale fidei catholicae contra Wiclevistas et Hus-sitas, was written c. 1421 at the request of Henry V. He was present at the trials of J. Oldcastle and other LOLLARDS and is reputed to have criticized Henry V for not proceeding more vigorously against Lollards; the same issues led him into controversy with Peter PAYNE at Oxford. At the councils of PISA and CONSTANCE he served as a delegate for his order, of which he was elected provincial for England in 1414. In 1419 he was sent by Henry V as envoy to Vladislav, King of Poland; Alexander, Duke of Lithuania; and Michael, Grand Master of the Teutonic Knights. Three years later he attended Henry V on his deathbed and preached the sermon at his funeral. Appointed confessor to the young Henry VI, Netter accompanied the king to France in 1430, and died in Rouen, where he was buried. Though Netter is notorious in English tradition as the hammer of the Lollards, he is remembered among the Carmelites as a distinguished scholar and restorer of the order’s discipline.

NEUMANN, JOHN NEPOMUCENE, ST.

Bishop; b. Prachatitz, Bohemia, March 28, 1811; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 5, 1860. He was the son of Philip and Agnes (Lebis) Neumann. He was educated in Budweis, Bohemia, at the gymnasium of the Pious Workers, and entered the diocesan seminary in 1831. Two years later he transferred to the school of theology at the Charles Ferdinand University, Prague, Bohemia. Upon completing his seminary studies in 1835, he was not immediately ordained because the Diocese of Budweis was sufficiently staffed with priests. Having resolved to become a missionary in the U.S., he decided to set out even before ordination. He landed in New York with but one suit of clothes and a dollar; he was accepted into the Diocese of New York and ordained by Bishop John Dubois June 25, 1836. After serving four years in the region of Buffalo, N. Y., Neumann entered the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer and took his vows at Baltimore, Md., on Jan. 16, 1842. He was the first Redemptorist to be professed in America. Following appointments as assistant parish priest in Baltimore and pastor of St. Philomena's parish in Pittsburgh, Pa., he was named viceregent, and later vice provincial, of all Redemptorists in the U.S. During his two years in these posts (1847–49), he placed the Redemptorists in the forefront of the parochial school movement. He subsequently served as consultant to the vice provincial and pastor of St. Alphonsus parish, Baltimore.

Neumann was named bishop of Philadelphia by Pius IX, and was consecrated in Baltimore by Abp. Francis Patrick Kenrick on March 28, 1852. During Neumann's episcopacy, over 80 churches were constructed in the diocese. He organized the parochial schools into a diocesan system and increased the number of pupils almost twentyfold within a few years. He established the Forty Hours devotion on a diocesan basis and made yearly visitations that took him into every parish and mission station. Among the teaching orders he introduced into his diocese were the Holy Cross Sisters, the Holy Cross Brothers, the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur, the Immaculate Heart Sisters, and the Christian Brothers. He founded the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis in Philadelphia and the preparatory seminary at Glen Riddle, Pa. The construction of SS. Peter and Paul Cathedral, Philadelphia, was begun by him. Neumann wrote many articles for Catholic newspapers and periodicals but did not always sign his writings. Among his published works were Kleiner Katechismus (1846), the larger Katholischer Katechismus (1846), and Biblische Geschichte des Alten und Neuen Testaments zum Gebrauch der katolischen Schulen (1849). His heavy burden led Pius IX to give him a coadjutor, Bp. James F. Wood, in 1857.

Neumann, small of stature and humble in manner, possessed organizing ability and a knowledge of six modern languages. Many openly admired his saintliness during his lifetime. After his death, stories of his hidden virtues and of favors obtained through his intercession led the Philadelphia diocesan authorities to examine his life history. This ordinary process was succeeded by the apostolic process in 1897. On Dec. 11, 1921, Benedict XV solemnly declared the heroicity of Neumann's virtues. On Oct. 13, 1963, Neumann became the first American bishop to be beatified.

NEUMANN, THERESA

Mystic and stigmatic; b. Konnersreuth, Bavaria, April 9, 1898; d. there, Sept. 18, 1962. Her parents were simple country folk, who gave their daughter a thoroughly Christian education. Father Naber, the pastor of Konnersreuth and her spiritual guide, noticed nothing remarkable about her in childhood. In her early years she suffered an illness that left her somewhat irritable and nervous, and she was, moreover, subject to frequent attacks of vertigo. After completing her elementary schooling, she was employed in 1912 as a servant by a neighbor, Max Neumann. On March 10, 1918, a fire broke out on the adjacent farm. This terrified Theresa, but she was capable of taking part in the activity organized by Neumann to keep the flames away from his home. For two hours she handed up pail after pail of water to dampen the buildings. Then a pail suddenly slipped from her hand. She could "do no more." Her legs became numb; in her back she felt a pain as if something had pinched her. This condition continued so that she was able to undertake only lighter tasks on the farm. However, in April she was compelled by her employer to resume heavier work. While she was mounting the stairs of a cellar, carrying a sack of potatoes, her legs suddenly gave way and she fell backward, striking her head against a stone ledge. Unfit for strenuous labor, she returned to her mother's home, where she helped with the housework.

Her sufferings, however, did not cease, and at this time her character underwent transformation, and she became melancholy and irritable. Everything seemed to annoy her, and she was frequently provoked to such fits of temper that she became unbearable to her family. In April 1918 she entered the hospital at Waldsassen, but she left after a stay of seven weeks without showing any improvement. On the contrary, her symptoms were noticeably aggravated; her violent spasms became stronger and more frequent. Her sight weakened until May 17, 1919, when she found upon emerging from a severe convulsive attack that she was "blind." About this time Theresa also suffered anaesthesia of the entire left side of her body, and was deaf in her left ear. For three months she was subject to paralytic attacks in her left arm. Toward Christmas 1922 she experienced a violent pain in her throat that made it impossible for her to swallow solid food. After October 1918, when she became bedridden, her body was often covered with sores and abscesses. In November 1925, she had appendicitis, and a year later, pneumonia. From all these illnesses she was cured without medical help, a circumstance that she and her friends attributed to the miraculous help of God.

Phenomena. The Lent of 1926 marked a new stage in Theresa's life. At that time she began to have "Friday ecstasies" in which she saw in vision the Passion of Christ, with many details not mentioned in the Gospel. This vision did not constitute a continuous spectacle, but was broken down into about 50 separate episodes (stations). The duration of these varied from two to 15 minutes. In the intervals between particular stations she would fall first into a state of "absorption," in which her mind resembled that of an infant and the simplest notions were unintelligible to her. This was regularly followed by a state of "exalted repose," in which Theresa might speak, perhaps using unaccustomed turns of phrase, or she might communicate Christ's counsels and orders to others or announce future events. The Friday ecstasies were associated with the stigmata on her hands and feet and left side.

Interpretation. The cause of the strange phenomena in Theresa's life can be discussed without calling into question the possibility of her sanctity, and there has, in fact, been a long and heated controversy on the subject.

Theresa's marvelous recoveries from her various illnesses could have been miraculous, but the certain judgment that they were seems unwarranted, especially if they are considered in the light of the principles followed by the Congregation of Rites in examining miracles. There is insufficient evidence either that alleged organic illnesses existed or that their cure could not have been effected by natural forces. Regarding her Friday ecstasies, their supernatural character cannot be confidently affirmed according to the rules laid down by Benedict XIV and by mystical authorities such as SS. TERESA OF AVILA and JOHN OF THE CROSS. It is for this reason that a number of ascetical theologians, such as Professor Westermayr, Dom Mager, OSB, Father Bruno, OCD, and others, have vigorously opposed what they called the mysticism of Konnersreuth.

Again, stigmatization carries with it no guarantee of its miraculous origin. It could well have been, it seems, a natural effect of her "ecstatic emotion." The first appearance of her stigmata, their gradual slow evolution, their changing shape, their strict dependence upon the emotion, the manner in which Theresa treated them, etc., all seem to favor this theory. Moreover, an impressive number of modern theologians believe that STIGMATIZATION as such can be explained without a direct miraculous intervention on the part of God. Her visions also are susceptible of a natural psychological explanation, and indeed there are elements in their content that give rise to theological objections to attributing a divine origin to them.

Her prolonged fasting provides a greater difficulty. It is claimed that from September 1927 until her death she took no nourishment. Unfortunately, Theresa's family never allowed the thorough examination of this point that the Catholic hierarchy insistently demanded. The refusal to cooperate with the Church on this decisive point created serious suspicions. The observation of Theresa's fasting by four Franciscan nuns for a two-week period during July 1927 was accomplished in conditions that make it impossible to regard it as a guarantee that Theresa's fast was absolute.

NEURURER, OTTO, BL.

First priest martyred by the Nazis; b. March 25, 1882, Piller, Oberinntal, Austria; d. May 30, 1940 at Buchenwald concentration camp near Weimar. Otto, the youngest of twelve children of peasants, attended the Vincentian minor seminary and diocesan major seminary in Brixen (Bressanone), South Tyrol. He was ordained priest on June 29, 1907 by Archbishop Altenweisel. His first assignment was in Urdens (Zillertal), then he served in parishes in Fiß (Oberinntal), Kappl (Paznaual), and Innsbruck, among others.

During Neururer's final assignment at SS. Peter and Paul in Götzens, the Nazis occupied Tyrol and subjected the Church to persecution. Neururer was arrested for interfering with a "German marriage" after he advised a girl against marrying a dissolute, divorced man who was a friend of the Tyrolean Gauleiter, the highest local Nazi official. He was tortured in Dachau concentration camp, then sent to Buchenwald, where he catechized other inmates, despite severe prohibition. A camp spy reported the priest's actions, and Neururer was hanged by his ankles.

His cremated remains are enshrined under the altar of his parish church at Götzens. In his beatification homily (Nov. 24, 1996), Pope John Paul II praised Neururer for "defending the sanctity of Christian marriage in the most difficult and dangerous circumstances." He is the patron of preachers, marriage, and priestly service.

Feast: May 30.

NEVADA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The formal beginning of Roman Catholicism in the territory that would eventually become the State of Nevada dates back to Aug. 16, 1860, when Archbishop Joseph Sadoc ALEMANY of San Francisco sent the Reverend Hugh GALLAGHER to establish a mission at Carson Valley. There is inconclusive evidence, however, that Franciscan missionary explorers Atanasio Dominguez and Silvestre de Escalante passed through the area in 1776 seeking a new route from Santa Fe, New Mexico to Monterey, California. Another Franciscan, Fray Francisco Garcas, following the Colorado River, is credited with having said the first Mass near what became Laughlin, Nevada, that same year.

The whole region was nominally a part of Mexico, but the Mexican government did little to colonize or govern it because it seemingly had little economic value. During the first decades of the 1800s, American trappers and explorers began to enter the area. The Old Spanish Trail was opened through Las Vegas in the 1830s. In 1848 the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was signed and Mexico formally ceded to the United States the territory that included what are now the states of California, Nevada and Utah, most of Arizona as well as parts of New Mexico, Colorado and Wyoming.

Thousands of emigrants traveled through the deserts of the Great Basin en route to California, but the first permanent settlements in the Nevada territory date from 1851 when both Mormon Station (Genoa) and Gold Canyon (Dayton) were established. In 1854 Carson County was created in Western Utah Territory. By 1857 the residents of Carson County were petitioning the federal government to allow them to create their own government as Nevada Territory. The Nevada Territory was established in 1861, and three years later in 1864 it was admitted to the Union as the 36th state. Nevada might not have come into existence so soon had it not been for the discovery of silver. The Sierra passes had been explored prior to the Gold Rush, and after 1848 the Humboldt River route, long known to trappers, became a highway for gold seekers journeying to California. Rich silver deposits were discovered during the following decade leading to the famous Comstock bonanza of 1859.

In 1866 the eastern boundary of Nevada was moved one degree of longitude east giving Nevada additional territory from Utah. The final change in the state's territory came in 1867 when land was taken from Arizona Territory and added to Lincoln County in southern Nevada.

Shifting Boundaries. The shifting of political and ecclesiastical boundaries impacted on the development of the Church. The Nevada territory was a part of the diocese of Sonora, Mexico, until 1840 when it was placed under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the Two Californias, GARCIA DIEGO Y MORENO. After occupation by Americans, it became necessary to bring the territory into the diocesan structure of the United States. The territory of Upper California, including Nevada, was placed under the jurisdiction of the newly created diocese of Monterey, California. Three years later, in 1853, Nevada was transferred to the archdiocese of San Francisco when Bishop Joseph Sadoc Alemany became the first prelate of that new archdiocese. During this time the population was sparse and care of souls in this vast territory was of little concern, nor was there any missionary outreach to the native peoples who lived in the area. The discovery of the valuable mineral deposits brought about a dramatic change to the territory in general and to the Church.

In 1858, given the increase in numbers of people, Archbishop Alemany sent the brothers Joseph and Hugh Gallagher, the first priests assigned to Carson County. Father Joseph Gallagher (1821–87) began service in Genoa, Carson City and Virginia City in 1858 but probably traveled from Bodie, California. His brother Hugh (1815–87), later settled in the territory and built churches in the town of Genoa in 1860, in Carson City, and in Virginia City, the last directly on the Comstock Lode, center of Nevada's mining riches.

In 1860 when the Vicariate Apostolic of Marysville, California, was created it included Carson County. All the territory from the Pacific Ocean to the Western Boundary of Utah and north of the 39th degree of latitude was assigned to the new Vicariate Apostolic under the jurisdiction of Right Rev. Eugene O'Connell who was consecrated bishop Feb. 3, 1861. All the territory in Nevada south of the 39th degree of latitude was left in the archdiocese of San Francisco. At this time the population of Nevada was centered mostly around the area of Carson County. The division of the territory of the State of Nevada between two ecclesiastical jurisdictions was to continue for 70 years.

In 1862 Bishop O'Connell sent newly ordained Patrick MANOGUE, a former miner, to serve the Church in Nevada. From the time of his arrival at the end of June 1862 until 1884 when he became the bishop of Grass Valley, Patrick Manogue was the driving force of the growth of the Catholic Church in Northern Nevada. His parish was all of the Nevada territory north of the 39th parallel, and St. Mary's in the Mountains in Virginia City became the center of Catholic life in Western Nevada. The parish church that Manogue built in 1877 continues in use.

With substantial support from Mr. and Mrs. John Mackay, Comstock mine-owners, in 1864 Manogue constructed a school and orphanage. The Daughters of Charity led by Sister Frederica McGrath came from San Francisco to staff these institutions. In 1875, again with financial support from the Mackay family and the Miners Union, he began construction of a hospital. The Daughters of Charity operated the hospital until 1897 when it was sold to Storey County and the sisters left.

Alone at first, and later with the aid of assistants, Manogue was responsible for ministering to the Catholics in the far-flung mining camps and ranches. Little by little new parishes were cut off from the parish of St. Mary's in the Mountains. Divide and Gold Hill were established in 1863; Austin, 1864; Carson, 1865; Reno, 1871; Eureka, 1872; and so on through the years. Manogue was made coadjutor bishop of the Diocese of Grass Valley, California in 1881 but he spent a great deal of time in Virginia City until he succeeded to the see in 1884. With the erection of the Diocese of Sacramento (1886), eight counties of the state of Nevada were included in the California diocese.

The rise and fall of the mining camps shaped the early formation of the Church in Nevada. The coming of the railroads helped to stabilize some portions of the population. Among the early immigrants who came into the state were Italians and Basque peoples from the Pyrenees Mountains. Many Italians first came to Northern Nevada to work for the railroad but soon began to purchase land and focus on truck farming and ranching. Nevada's geography lent itself to sheep herding. The Basque people were first brought to Nevada as shepherds, a trade for which they were noted. These two groups along with the Irish who originally came to the mines made up the bulk of the early Catholic population of northern Nevada.

The southern portion of the state developed more slowly. The territory below the 39th parallel remained under the jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of San Francisco until 1887 when it was detached and ceded to the Vicariate of Salt Lake. Father Lawrence SCANLAN whom Archbishop Alemany had sent to establish a parish in Pioche in 1870 was appointed the first Vicar Apostolic of Utah and Nevada. At the time that Salt Lake City became a diocese in 1891, the ecclesiastical jurisdictions of Nevada were again reorganized. It was more practical to divide the state along a north-south line rather than the previous east-west line. The eastern and southern counties of Elko, Lander, Eureka, White Pine, Nye, Lincoln and eventually, Clark, were attached to Salt Lake. The western counties of Washoe, Humboldt, Storey, Ormsby, Douglas, Churchill, Lyon, Mineral, Esmeralda and later, Pershing were assigned to Sacramento.

By 1871 the little town of Reno located along the banks of the Truckee River had grown sufficiently to support a parish that became the center for the Washoe County Missions. St. Mary's parish included much of northern Nevada up to the Oregon border and parts of eastern California as well. In 1879 a group of Dominican nuns from Delaware opened Mt. St. Mary's Academy for young ladies. It flourished for 10 years, but by the turn of the nineties as the mines began to fail it fell on hard times. Two of the sisters stayed on in Reno and as their number grew they opened a small hospital. In 1912 on the advice of Bishop Thomas Grace, they affiliated with the Congregation of the Most Holy Name of Jesus in San Rafael, California. The coming of the sisters from California was a milestone in hospital care in Reno. St. Mary's Hospital received full accreditation in 1922, and in 1930 a more modern facility was built.

Meanwhile in 1904 the Southern Pacific Railroad moved their shops and divisional headquarters from Wadsworth to a site four miles east of Reno. A new town came into being almost overnight, and the parish of the Immaculate Conception was founded.

An Eventful Year. In 1931 two events occurred that were to shape the future of the Church in the state of Nevada, the one directly and the other indirectly. On March 27, 1931, the Holy See detached all the territory within the State of Nevada from the dioceses of Sacramento and Salt Lake and created the diocese of Reno. It was the first time the Catholics of the state of Nevada were contained in one ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Rev. Thomas K. Gorman, a priest of the diocese of Los Angeles, was installed as the first Bishop of Reno on Aug. 19, 1931. The creation of the diocese was occasioned almost by chance. Chicago's Cardinal George Mundelein during a train ride through Nevada en route to San Francisco asked who served as bishop of this vast expanse. He was astonished to learn that of all the 48 states, Nevada was the only one without its own bishop. Upon his return to the archdiocese of Chicago, Cardinal Mundelein took steps to rectify the situation.

From the time of Bishop Patrick Manogue to the formation of the diocese of Reno, the part of Nevada belonging to the diocese of Sacramento had been governed by Bishop Thomas Grace from 1896 to 1921; by Bishop Patrick Keane from 1922 to 1928; and by Bishop Robert Armstrong from 1929 to 1931. The portion of Nevada within the jurisdiction of Salt Lake had, since the death of Bishop Scanlan in 1915, been governed by Bishop Joseph Glass, 1915 to 1926, and by Bishop John MITTY from 1926 to 1931.

Las Vegas. Even as Bishop Gorman began to structure the new Diocese of Reno, another event occurred that would radically change Nevada. In 1931 the Nevada legislature legalized gambling, and the first casino opened on Fremont Street in Las Vegas.

The history of Las Vegas was much like that of other dusty, desert towns in Nevada. Because it had an artesian well, however, it was a regular stop for travelers. Sometime between 1830 and 1848, Vegas ("meadows") as shown on the maps was changed to Las Vegas. Mormon settlers had come to the area in 1855, but they abandoned the valley in 1858. By 1890 railroad developers had decided that this water rich valley would be a prime location for a railroad stop facility and town. By 1904 a tent city had sprung up to support the construction of the first railroad grade into Las Vegas. In 1905 the San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad made its inaugural run from California to points east. That same year the Union Pacific auctioned off 1,200 lots in a single day in an area that today is known as Glitter Gulch: Fremont Street in Las Vegas. In 1908 Bishop Scanlan of Salt Lake established St. Joan of Arc Parish, the lone Catholic parish in Las Vegas for the next 34 years.

The Las Vegas economy was only slightly effected by the Depression. The construction of Hoover Dam, begun in 1930, gave rise to Boulder City and the parish of St. Andrew (1931). The development of the Union Pacific Railroad and legal gambling ensured a fairly steady stream of income. With World War II the federal government found sites in Nevada attractive for military and other uses. Nellis Air Force Base expanded, and a major titanium plant was built in Henderson. The well-known Area 51, the secret flight testing base, was in mid-Nevada as was Mercury Test Site, used for atomic weapons. Casinos, though often small and simple, were to be found in every city, town and hamlet throughout the state, but it was after World War II that the state began its amazing development.

When Bishop Gorman was transferred to the diocese of Dallas-Fort Worth as coadjutor bishop in 1952, his successor was Robert J. Dwyer, the rector of the Cathedral of the Madeleine in Salt Lake City. Nevada was experiencing great growth particularly in the Las Vegas area, and Bishop Dwyer continued the task of providing parishes and schools. He convened the first Diocesan Synod in 1957. In an effort to support the missions, newly developing parishes, and to build schools, he developed the Frontier of the Faith newsletter and traveled extensively throughout the country to raise funds. He invited sisters from Ireland, Cuba and the Philippines who joined with American religious to staff the schools.

At the time Bishop Dwyer arrived in Nevada the total population was about 160,000 including about 25,000 Catholics. By 1960 the population of the state had risen to slightly more than 285,000, and the Catholic population more than doubled. Much of the growth occurred in southern Nevada and was indicative of a trend that continued to the end of the century.

Bishop Dwyer was appointed Archbishop of Portland, Oregon, in December, 1966, and Bishop Joseph Green, auxiliary bishop in Lansing, Michigan, became the third Bishop of Reno. Installed in May of 1967, Bishop Green's main task was the implementation of the reforms of Vatican Council II. He instituted the Catholic Services Appeal to provide support for the necessary diocesan programs that served parishes statewide. He also traveled extensively to encourage vocations to the service of the Church in Nevada and fostered a spirit of ecumenism toward other religious groups. Even as the population boomed, Bishop Green maintained a steady focus on renovating and upgrading existing parishes and the development of the Church as envisioned by the Fathers of Vatican II. A series of illnesses, aggravated by a severe financial crisis, caused Bishop Green to retire in 1974.

Bishop Norman F. McFarland, auxiliary in San Francisco, who first came to Nevada as Apostolic Administrator in 1974 was appointed Bishop of the Diocese of Reno in February, 1976. With the collegial assistance of the American hierarchy, McFarland managed to put the diocese on a firm financial footing. The same year he was appointed bishop of the diocese, McFarland petitioned and Pope Paul VI agreed to redesignate it as the Diocese of Reno-Las Vegas with Guardian Angel Shrine in Las Vegas as the co-cathedral. In the midst of the financial crisis, the growth of the diocese continued unabated.

In August 1987 Bishop Daniel F. Walsh, auxiliary of San Francisco, succeeded McFarland who had been named bishop of Orange, California. His installation was celebrated at Guardian Angel Cathedral in Las Vegas where he would also establish a Chancery Office and a residence in order to be more available to the needs of the Church in southern Nevada where 58 percent of the Catholic population now lived. Las Vegas had become a major destination city for people from all around the world. The thousands of visitors to the mega-resorts, entertainment and convention centers required the services of the Church. Bishop Walsh put an increased focus on ministry to the Hispanic population in the state.

The need to minister to the Catholic community scattered across 110,800 square miles of desert and the travel between Reno and Las Vegas, almost 500 miles apart, taxed the health and stamina of Bishop Walsh as it had Bishop Green. It became increasingly clear that this could not continue. By 1995, the population of Nevada had risen to nearly 1.5 million people with nearly 450,000 Catholics. Recognizing the situation, the Holy See announced on March 21, 1995, the division of the Diocese of Reno-Las Vegas into two separate dioceses. The Diocese of Reno was to consist of 12 northern counties with 25 parishes and 11 missions. The newly created Diocese of Las Vegas was to consist of five southern counties with 23 parishes and eight missions. Bishop Phillip F. Straling of San Bernardino, California was appointed sixth Bishop of Reno and Bishop Daniel F. Walsh was appointed first Bishop of Las Vegas.

In May 2000, Bishop Daniel Walsh was installed as Bishop of Santa Rosa, California. Monsignor Joseph A. Pepe, a priest of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia serving in Santa Fe, was appointed the second Bishop of Las Vegas. He was installed at Guardian Angel Cathedral on May 31, 2001.

The story of the Church in Nevada in the 20th century comprises a history of growth. Despite their small numbers in a heavily unchurched state, Catholics were visible and successful in a variety of political, economic and community endeavors. They held elective offices on both the state and national levels and were very active in every aspect of the civic life. At the beginning of the 21st century the Church's charitable outreach is without equal in the state. In small communities across Nevada the faith is lived out much as it has been for many years, but in the larger cities there is an urgent need to assimilate newcomers made more difficult by the shortage of priests. Being without priests is not a new experience in Nevada. In the formative days of the Church small communities were visited by a priest on an infrequent basis. It is the laity, assisted by a small cadre of zealous clergy and religious, who will be responsible for keeping the faith strong in the years ahead as was so often the case in Nevada history.

NEVIN, JOHN WILLIAMSON

American Protestant theologian; b. Upper Strasburg, Pa., Feb. 20, 1803; d. Lancaster, Pa., June 6, 1886. He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, N.Y. (1821), and entered Princeton Theological Seminary, N.J., where he studied under Archibald Alexander and Charles Hodge. Through Hodge he became interested in the works of August Neander and began the study of German. In 1830 Nevin became professor of biblical literature at Western Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pa., where he was noted as an extreme abolitionist. Differences with the administration led to his resignation in 1840 to accept a professorship at the German Reformed Seminary, Mercersburg, Pa. Nevin's historical studies and sympathy for the German tradition, as well as his Old School background, made him a champion of the doctrine and liturgy of the Heidelberg Catechism against the "new measures" of revivalists. In 1844 he published The Anxious Bench, the first appeal of the Mercersburg theology, which emphasized the heritage of the Reformed Church from Catholicism. The following year he and Philip Schaff were codefendants before the Synod of Pennsylvania on charges of Puseyism. In 1846 Nevin published his best-known book, The Mystical Presence, an attempt to restore the traditional Reformed understanding of the Lord's Supper against prevailing Zwinglian views. His important works on The History and Genius of the Heidelberg Catechism and on The Church followed in 1847. With Schaff he founded in 1849 the Mercersburg Review, which became the chief organ of their movement. Nevin established a tradition of doctrinal loyalty, liturgical renewal, and ecumenism; but the Mercersburg movement was never wholly accepted by his church. In 1861 he left the seminary to become a professor at Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa.; he served as its president from 1866 to 1876.

NEW ABBEY (SWEETHEART)

Former Cistercian abbey, situated seven miles south of Dumfries, Scotland, in the Diocese of Galloway. It was founded April 10, 1273, by Dervorgilla, the widow of John de Balliol, and dedicated to St. Mary, and was the last CISTERCIAN abbey to be built in Scotland until 1946. The monks called it Sweetheart (or Dulce Cor) because the foundress, a grandniece of two Scottish kings and the mother of another (John Balliol 1292–96), had her husband's heart embalmed after his death and kept in her presence; and this, following her own death in 1289, was buried with her in the new abbey she had founded. The abbey was colonized from DUNDRENNAN, and like its nearby motherhouse, suffered badly in the Anglo-Scottish wars of independence (1296–1306). After the disaster of Flodden in 1513, the monks placed themselves and their property under the protection of Lord Maxwell, which action undoubtedly saved the buildings from destruction by the reformers in 1559–60. Its last abbot, Gilbert Broun, was forced into exile when the abbey with its revenues was annexed to the crown in 1587, but he returned twice to defend the old religion, was finally arrested, and died in exile in 1612. In 1624 the abbey was erected into a temporal lordship for Robert Spottiswoode, who styled himself Lord New Abbey. It is now a ruin.

NEW AGE MOVEMENT

The New Age (NA) Movement is a variegated cultural phenomenon. In its broadest sense, the term refers to a configuration of Eastern and Western esoteric psychologies, philosophies, and religious traditions that have been brought into convergence with new paradigms in science and modern psychology. The New Age Movement has links with the Eastern and Western occult and mystical/metaphysical traditions. In the United States, the movement is the inheritor of the Aquarian "new religious consciousness" of the 1960s and 1970s.

New Age cultural referents include health food stores, parapsychology research organizations, psychic development groups; interest in REINCARNATION, ASTROLOGY, WITCHCRAFT, tarot cards, the I Ching, out-of-body experience, channeling, and in the “healing powers” of crystals and pyramids; “transformational” techniques ranging from MEDITATION to martial arts; alternative or “holistic” medicine, body therapies, and a melange of other “consciousness raising” techniques.

While there is no hard-line NA gospel per se, nor unanimity of NA beliefs, the conviction that humanity is on the threshold of a radical spiritual transformation is a central motif. New Age thinking also embraces eclectic and syncretistic healing strategies and spiritual disciplines, reasserts various forms of supernaturalism and sacramentalism, and promotes the full realization of human potential. Themes of “transformation,” “consciousness raising,” “self-realization,” “higher self,” the “god within,” and “global unity” are standard NA parlance. New Age thinking also animates elements of the contemporary environmental movement, notably in relation to ECO-FEMINISM and creation theology.

Growth of the Movement. The spread of NA thinking in modern society has been propagated through movement literature and through a multitude of seminars and training programs focused on human potential and self improvement. Various teachers, empowerment practitioners, and assorted SHAMANS have facilitated such programs. These include cultural celebrities as diverse as Baba Ram Dass (Richard Alpert), a former professor of psychology at Harvard; the actress Shirley MacLaine; and David Spangler, formerly a co-director of a Scottish community at Findhorn and author of Revelation, The Birth of a New Age (1976). New Age perspectives have also been popularized by Marilyn Ferguson’s book, The Aquarian Conspiracy: Personal and Social Transformation in the 1980s, an impassioned discussion of the need to create a new society based on a “turnabout in consciousness” and a vastly enlarged concept of human potential.

New Age visionary dressed as a Native American spirit, Mount Shasta, California, 1994. (©Catherine Karnow/CORBIS)

Cultural historians have emphasized the continuity between current NA ideas and earlier American interest in metaphysical, occult, and non-Western spiritual traditions (viz., TRANSCENDENTALISM, SPIRITUALISM, THEOSOPHY, NEW THOUGHT). They have also pointed to NA affinities with the long-standing American utopian tradition and the quintessential American dream of transcending one’s background by reinventing one’s self.

Social and behavioral science perspectives link the appeal of the NA to the cultural crisis of post-1950s America. From this perspective, the NA is a cultural response to the weakening of structures and institutions that integrate society. The contradictions of late capitalism’s commodity culture and the spiritual poverty of the technocratic state, characterized by massive bureaucracy, depersonalization, aesthetic sterility, and the dominance of instrumental rationality compounded this crisis. Other factors facilitating the spread of NA thinking include the decline of mainline religions, the expansion of comparative religion courses, the increase in Asian immigration, and mass marketing techniques by NA spiritual entrepreneurs. The high media visibility of Hollywood celebrities promoting NA concepts and theories also contributed to the cultural visibility of the movement.

During the last four decades, a large part of the recruiting ground for religious and spiritual experiment has been among the relatively privileged and social elites. In this context, the spread of the NA Movement is attributable, in part, to structural characteristics of demographic and generational shifts associated with an emerging cohort of “baby boomers” whose affluence and greater discretionary time have freed them for diverse spiritual and cultural pursuits.

Criticism of the Movement. Criticism of NA therapies and philosophies comes from two main sources: left-leaning cultural critics and academics and conservative Christians. Cultural critics and academics censure the movement for its assault on the heritage of the ENLIGHTENMENT and for sowing doubt about the trustworthiness of rational thought. Accordingly, NA devotees promote alchemist-like spirituality, superstition, pseudoscience, incipient totalitarianism, a dangerous ahistoricism, and, in some cases, outright fraud.

Cultural critics also asserted that exotic NA interests such as crystal gazing and “harmonic convergence” are contrived, artificial phenomena that actually point to the triviality of spiritual matters in modern society. From a psychological perspective, some NA devotees manifest narcissistic and obsessive self-fixation traits that mirror the powerlessness, alienation, and atomistic individualism endemic in society. New Age “higher consciousness” is, therefore, little more than a misguided initiative to rescue the modern American “minimal self.” In addition, NA practitioners have been accused of mimicking liberalism’s idioms of globalism, cooperation, and tolerance. However, because some currents in the movement reject or minimize reformist political struggle, they implicitly promote apolitical escapism and reinforce the status quo.

The most aggressive assault on NA thinking comes from fundamentalist and conservative Christians who link NA spiritual effervescence with exotic “cults,” with secular HUMANISM, and with the emergence of a “false” and “one world” religion. “Bible believing” Christians denounce NA apologists for distorting and/or rejecting the Bible’s message of sin and salvation, for promoting the “occult” and “demonic,” and for contaminating the Christian tradition with false spiritual ideas. The New Age Movement is construed as the shadow of the anti-Christ and another cultural barometer of the apostate age.

More moderate Christian critics point to the latent GnosticisM in much NA thought and to the movement’s promotion of magic-like ritualization and its co-option of traditional religious symbolism. These critics have also reproached the NA Movement for failing to address the reality of evil (or for viewing social and structural oppression as merely a state of mind), for failing to link “self-realization” with moral guidance, and for extolling forms of self-exploration that too readily degenerate into self-promotion. In addition, both secular and religious critics criticize certain NA currents for amoralism, for the degradation and blatant commercialization of piety, and for the tendency to reduce religion to psychology.

The spread of New Age thinking has also been interpreted in more positive ways. First, the phenomenon shows that people do not respond to new social and cultural problems by abandoning religion as much as by developing new religious innovations and orientations on the ruins of the old. What is “new” about much NA thinking is not the content, per se, but the unexpected spread of such ideas in the face of assumptions regarding the alleged inexorable triumph of secularization.

Second, the NA Movement points to the continuing problem of the bifurcation of religious and scientific orientations that has long afflicted Western civilization. In response to this situation, people often compartmentalize their meaning systems. The privatization of religion is one aspect of this; the idolatry of technique another. New Age thinking with its call for “holistic” and “integrated” living is both symptomatic of this cultural problem and a creative and contemporary response to it.

Third, while the spread of NA theories and practices can be seen as an indictment of organized religion’s failure to respond in creative and dynamic ways to new cultural trends, the movement has also stimulated a renewed interest in mysticism, meditation, and spiritual renewal within the Christian tradition. New Age ideals have also converged with a new stress on eclectic approaches to spirituality in many mainline churches.

The most positive aspects of NA ideals are those that encourage consensus decision making, integrated living, the emphasis on freedom for positive growth, creative action, and the call for human solidarity. Certain NA motifs are also highly relevant to aspects of the emerging ecological ethos and for the need for a new cosmology relevant to environmental concerns.

In its overall composition and visibility, the NA Movement gives expression to the dynamic and ongoing realignment of religion and culture. In reference to the Christian tradition, the NA Movement provides another opportunity for both spiritual revitalization within the tradition and for a new and creative discernment of the vibrant relationship between the Gospel and culture.

NEW AMERICAN BIBLE

The origins of the New American Bible (NAB), which was first published in 1970, began with what was previously called the Confraternity Version.

Confraternity Revisions Catholics were becoming increasingly aware of the need of revising the Douay-Rheims-Challoner Bible. There were discrepancies in its numerous editions introduced by private typographers and publishers; there were instances of lack of identification of the ecclesiastical authority approving the editions. The need of revision was intensified by the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine’s (CCD) promotion of Bible instructions and study clubs throughout the U.S. Accordingly on Jan. 18, 1936, the chairman of the Bishops Committee of the CCD, Edwin V. O’Hara, proposed to Biblical scholars meeting at the Sulpician Seminary in Washington a revision of the Douay-Rheims-Challoner Bible. The meeting resulted in a twofold decision: to undertake the revision of the Catholic English Bible in use and to form an association of Catholic Biblical scholars that would promote scientific and popular Scripture studies and publications. The Bishops’ Committee of the CCD offered its patronage to the association and its work. Oct. 3, 1936, was the founding date.

New Testament. At this time the principles of revision for the NT were drawn up. It was agreed to adhere to the Latin Clementine Vulgate and to render its sense exactly and in clear and simple English. Recourse to the Greek was made for the sense of the Latin but not for deviation from the VULGATE. Variants between Latin and Greek were treated in footnotes. Diction, style, and rhythm of the current text were retained as far as possible; mistakes were corrected; obsolete words modernized; and words introduced for sense were italicized. “Thee” and “thou” were retained; first words of sentences, rather than of verses, were capitalized; long and involved sentences were broken up without detriment to sense. The text was arranged in paragraph form; chapter and verse numbers were indicated in the margin. Cross-references were placed between the text and footnotes; poetic passages were printed in verse form. Divisions, subdivisions, and boxed paragraph headings enhanced the format and readability of the text. The names of the revisers and editors appeared on the final page.

The NT revision was completed in 1941. It was published by the St. Anthony Guild Press of Paterson, N.J. The Holy Name Society undertook the task of distribution. More than one million copies were sold in the first year. Though the work had been planned as a revision, the amount of independent translation was such that it was aptly regarded as a new translation.

Old Testament. The revision of the OT Vulgate presented its own special problems. Not all the books were translated by St. Jerome from the original languages into a uniform Latin version. The Psalter of the Vulgate is Jerome's revision of the Old Latin version from the LXX. Sirach, Baruch, Wisdom, and 1 and 2 Maccabees are from the revised Old Latin. The principles governing the revision of the OT [see Catholic Biblical Quarterly 1 (1939) 267–269] followed those for the revision of the NT as far as they could be applied. Proper names translated by St. Jerome were restored.

Sample portions of the OT revision were printed, not published; e.g., the minor Prophets and the first 40 Psalms. Though the OT revision was well under way by 1944, the project was abruptly terminated in favor of a complete change of plan, as explained in the following section.

Confraternity Version. A response of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION (Aug. 22, 1943) favored translation of the Bible from the original into modern languages [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943) 270]. The encyclical of Pius XII DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1943) urged the study of Oriental languages and literatures and recourse to the original texts. These directives caused the committees for the OT and NT translations to choose the original texts of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek as the basis of an entirely new translation called the Confraternity Version (CV). The Bishops' Committee of the CCD was in agreement with this. Edward Arbez, SS, notified the Catholic hierarchy of the change in a letter dated April 22, 1944.

Old Testament. The new principles of translation of the OT [see Catholic Biblical Quarterly 6 (1944) 363–364] prescribed the use of the Kittel-Kahle edition of the Hebrew and Aramaic texts for translating the protocanonical books and the Swete edition of the OT in Greek for the deuterocanonical books except for the parts of Sirach that have been preserved in Hebrew. Textual corrections were made on the basis of the ancient versions. Conjectural emendations were kept to the minimum. St. Anthony Guild was the publisher. The final board of editors consisted of Louis F. Hartman, CSSR, Msgr. Patrick W. Skehan, and Stephen J. Hartdegen, OFM, all members of the Catholic Biblical Association. These were authorized to pass final judgment on all the OT books. In harmony with the ecumenical spirit of VATICAN COUNCIL II, some outstanding non-Catholic scholars were engaged to edit 1 and 2 Samuel (F. M. Cross) and 2 Kings (J. A. Sanders) and to revise Genesis (D. N. Freedman). In the interest of uniform Bible usage, the completed OT adopted the Hebrew name forms instead of the Vulgate forms previously used.

New Testament. The CV NT, translated from the original Greek, was entrusted to a separate committee headed by Msgr. Myles M. Bourke, assisted by R. E. BROWN, SS; D. Stanley, SJ; J. A. Fitzmyer, SJ; R. Kugelman, CP; T. Halton; E. F. Siegman, CPPS; B. Vawter, CM, J. Quinn, and the Protestant scholars W. D. Davies and John Knox. The first portions appeared in the form of scriptural readings in the Roman Missal. The OT translation principles also guided the NT translation as far as applicable. The same applied to its external form. Confronted with the variety of style of the various books, the translators strove to reflect this variety and to render the text faithfully, even in its informal, conversational, and derogatory nuances. Before publication of the entire NT, the work was submitted to the critical examination and judgment of a literary editor.

The final volume of the CV OT appeared in 1969. The following year saw the completion of the NT, translated by a separate group of scholars. After some revision of the OT, both were published together in 1970 under the name New American Bible (NAB).

The New American Bible Revised. A project to revise the New American Bible began with the New Testament books. In 1978 a five-member steering committee chaired by Rev. F. T. Gignac, SJ, undertook to formulate principles to guide the revision, assembled collaborators, and subsequently served as the editorial board. About a dozen translators submitted initial drafts of revised translations together with introductions, notes, and cross references. The editorial board devoted six years to a careful review of this material to insure consistency and accuracy, in dialogue with the translators, other consultants, and an episcopal committee chaired by the Most Rev. John F. Whealon. The revised NT was approved both for publication and for liturgical use in 1986 and was issued early in 1987 by several publishers.

In reality, this thorough revision constitutes a new translation. The introductions, notes, and cross references are almost all new, and are much more extensive and consistent than in the first edition. The original threefold purpose of the NAB (liturgical use, private reading, and study) was maintained, but special attention was given to its suitability for public proclamation. The revision is more literal than the first edition, reflecting an approach to translation that tends more to formal equivalence. The language is more traditional, seeking a dignified level of speech appropriate to liturgical usage, though without archaisms. The editors were concerned to maintain lexical consistency wherever appropriate, thus responding to a frequent criticism of the 1970 version, especially in regard to parallel passages in the Synoptic Gospels.

The revised NAB NT takes a moderate approach to the contemporary concern about discriminatory language. Care was exercised to avoid expressions in English that could be taken as tendentious or offensive to any minority. The editors tried to render gender-inclusive expressions by similar terms in English to the extent that this could be done without violation of other principles.

In 1986 a project was initiated within the Catholic Biblical Association of America to produce a translation of the psalter more suitable for liturgical use. The revision committee finished the project in 1991. After some changes recommended by the episcopal committee, the translation was approved by the Administrative Conference of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) in September 1991 and was approved for liturgical use by the full body of the NCCB at the November 1991 meeting. In May 1992, the lectionary which included the revised psalter was approved and sent to Rome, where its approval was confirmed by the Congregation for Divine Worship. But the confirmation was revoked by the same congregation in June 1994 because of concerns over inclusive language.

In 1990 the Catholic Biblical Association of America passed a resolution to produce a revision of the rest of the Old Testament of the New American Bible. The reasons for this were the length of time since the Confraternity version was originally completed (1952–69), the fact that the notes were very sparse in the Old Testament sections and often in need of complete rewriting, the list of inaccuracies noted in the Old Testament translation, the discovery of new Hebrew texts for many of the individual Old Testament books, and a concern for the integrity of the version in view of the revised New Testament translation and the recent revision of the psalter. It was noted that the New American Bible represents a significantly different version from other translations such as the New Revised Standard Version (which remained rooted in the tradition ultimately of the King James Version). As a fresh translation from the original languages into contemporary English, it represents a cross between formal and dynamic equivalency. And as the only American Old Testament translation done exclusively under Catholic auspices, it allows the Catholic Church in the United States to have a translation of its own. The project was formally approved by the Administrative Conference of the NCCB in 1993.

NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH

Created in 1863 as the result of a schism within the CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH. About four-fifths of its members lived in Germany, but there were also members in England, Canada, Switzerland, Holland, France, Australia, South Africa, the U. S., and South America.

Some members of the Catholic Apostolic Church in North Germany began to be concerned about the survival of the church when six of its 12 apostles had died by 1860. They rallied around Heinrich Geyer, who believed that the deceased apostles should be replaced by new ones; when he began to choose such successors, he was excommunicated by the parent body. The dissenters organized the Universal Christian Apostolic Mission whose name was changed to the New Apostolic Church in 1906. The leading role in the new sect was soon filled by F. W. Schwartz, who supplanted Geyer as head of the organization in 1878. Influenced by the CALVINISM of the Dutch Reformed Church, Schwartz reversed the Catholic tendencies of the original Catholic Apostolic Church. His successor, Fritz Krebs, appointed himself chief apostle (Stamm-apostel) and reduced the authority of the other apostles. He chose his own successor, Hermann Niehaus, who served as chief apostle for 25 years after Krebs' death in 1905. The sect sent missionaries throughout the world and reported 300,000 members by 1932. The number of apostles was increased beyond 12 so that there would be one apostle for each administrative area. J. G. Bischoff became chief apostle after the death of Niehaus, and despite some schisms, the New Apostolic Church almost doubled its membership during his administration. He died in 1960 and immediately after his death 27 apostles elected Walter Schmidt chief apostle.

The New Apostolic local congregations are tightly organized through a hierarchy headed by the chief apostle. In addition there are apostles, bishops, district elders, and local pastors and evangelists. As in Mormonism, the New Apostolic Church allows the reception of baptism, communion, and sealing by proxy for the dead. Only an apostle can confer the sacrament of “sealing,” which is known also as the baptism of fire. Those who are sealed can share in the first resurrection and participate in the rule by Christ during the millennium. Worship services in the New Apostolic Church are austere and resemble the Calvinist order of worship. Almost all traces of the Catholic liturgical emphasis of the parent body have disappeared. The church is adventist, authoritarian, and aggressively mission-minded. A schism by 11 apostles in 1956 claimed 50,000 adherents. These dissenters reject baptism for the dead and have tried to restore a more Catholic liturgy. There are several smaller dissenting groups, such as the Apostolate of Jesus Christ and the Dutch Apostolisch Genootschap.

NEW HAMPSHIRE, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of the Thirteen Colonies, New Hampshire was admitted to the Union (1788) as the ninth state. It is bounded on the north by Canada, on the east by Maine and the Atlantic Ocean, on the south by Massachusetts, and on the west by the Connecticut River and Vermont. Concord is the state capital; and Manchester, the largest city, is the episcopal seat of the only diocese in the state. In 2001 there were 477,997 Catholics, about 27 percent of the state’s population of 1.2 million. Manchester is a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of Boston.

Early History. Originally a dissenting offshoot of the Massachusetts Bay colony, New Hampshire became a separate royal colony in 1680 and in the aftermath of the Revolutionary War established itself as a sovereign state, always retaining its Protestant bent. Under the revised constitution of 1784, the state imposed a religious test that excluded Catholics from the major offices in the state government. The constitution also authorized towns to support “public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality” (art. 6).

Abenaki natives, converted by Jesuit missionaries from Quebec, were the first Catholics of New Hampshire. The first Catholic Masses in New Hampshire were celebrated in July 1694 by a pair of French Jesuit priests who had accompanied a war party that raided an European settlement at Oyster River near Durham. During the colonial wars they were forced back into Maine and eventually into Canada. Beginning with the last decade of the 18th century, missionaries, including Francis A. Matignon and Jean A. Cheverus, stopped in New Hampshire, particularly at Portsmouth, on their way to and from Maine, a far more promising mission field. When Boston became a diocese (1808), Bishop Cheverus was given jurisdiction over all New England, including about 100 Catholics in New Hampshire. In 1816 Virgil BARBER, an Episcopalian minister from Claremont, NH, entered the Catholic Church with his wife and five children. Later he became a Jesuit, was ordained in 1822, and founded a church and an academy at Claremont, the first Catholic institutions in the state. Financial and family problems forced his removal in 1827, causing the abandonment of about 100 converts, who for the most part lapsed from the faith.

The first parish was founded at Dover in 1828 by Rev. Charles French; two years later Michael Healy was established as resident pastor. Also serving the area were itinerant missionaries, such as John B. Daly, OFM, who spent 19 years there. By 1835 there were 387 Catholics, two churches, and two priests in New Hampshire. The number of Catholics in the state remained negligible until the influx of Irish settlers in the wake of the famines of the mid-1840s. Their presence was resented; in 1855 Gov. Ralph Metcalf, elected by the Know-Nothing (nativist) party, made a vigorous anti-Catholic speech to the legislature. But the agitation died down quickly, and the Know-Nothings quietly disappeared as the newly founded Republican party solidified its ranks for the election of 1860. In 1877 constitutional changes abolished substantially all the religious qualifications for public office.

In 1853 Maine and New Hampshire were separated from the Boston diocese to form the new Diocese of Portland. At the time the only three parishes in New Hampshire were at Dover, Claremont, and Manchester. By 1858 increased immigration led William McDonald, pastor of St. Anne’s, Manchester, to invite the Sisters of Mercy to open the first Catholic grammar school. From 1863 to 1869 the municipal school board took complete financial responsibility for this institution. After the Civil War, French-Canadian immigration predominated, resulting in the creation in 1871 of the first national parishes—St. Augustin at Manchester and St. Aloysius of Gonzaga at Nashua. In 1884 New Hampshire was split off from the Diocese of Portland, ME, and Manchester became the seat of the new diocese.

Manchester Diocese. After Manchester became a separate diocese in 1884, the Most Reverend Denis M. BRADLEY who, though Irish-born had grown up in Manchester, was named the first bishop (1884–1903). Bradley increased the number of churches, chapels, mission stations, and parish schools. The Catholic population swelled from 45,000 to over 100,000, the clergy from 40 to 107, and the children in Catholic schools from 3,000 to 12,000. Bradley's successor, John B. Delany, served only 21 months before succumbing to appendicitis. He was followed by George A. Guertin (1907–32), a native of Nashua of French-Canadian descent.

Bishop Guertin, who stressed the building of parochial schools, had to contend with the nationalistic controversies of the 1920s. A segment of the French-Canadian clergy and faithful opposed certain policies of the bishop as being contrary to their "national" rights and interests, which led to deep divisions among the clergy. Bishop Guertin, because of his heritage and his position as bishop, found himself squarely in the middle of the controversy. Elsewhere in the state, Polish congregations were experiencing similar types of conflict that led to the establishment of the Polish National Catholic Church. The stress of these controversies, plus a nine-month strike at the Amoskeag Mills, the major employer in Manchester, and the onset of the Depression led to Guertin's retirement to a sanitarium in New Jersey in 1931. He died a few months later at the age of 62, and was succeeded by John B. PETERSON (1932–44), who had been an auxiliary bishop in Boston. The fourth bishop of Manchester proved himself a skilled administrator by guiding the diocese through the Depression and maintaining harmony in the diocese by establishing a balance between English-speaking and non-English-speaking clergy and administrators.

The Catholic Church in New Hampshire experienced considerable growth in the years immediately following World War II. Bishop Matthew F. BRADY (1944–59) established 30 new parishes, built 17 churches, and added 11 elementary schools, 14 convents, five high schools, three homes for the aged, and two large summer camps for children. Early in 1959 the newly elected Pope John XXIII called for an ecumenical council. Bishop Brady, who was suffering from heart problems, did not live to participate. He died on Sept. 20, 1959 and on December 2, Bishop Ernest Primeau was named as his successor.

Bishop Primeau (1960–74) was known in Rome from his time as rector of the residence for Chicago priests working the curia. During the preparatory period (1960–62), he was a member of the Commission for the Discipline of the Clergy and Faithful. Later in Rome, Bishop Primeau played an active role in the Council itself, serving as a U.S. representative on the International Committee of Bishops and in the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity. Back in New Hampshire, Bishop Primeau took steps to implement the directives of the Council. He began by convoking a diocesan synod. The first general session opened on Nov. 3, 1965 at Immaculata High School in Manchester, and three years later, the synodal acts were promulgated after a Mass at the Cathedral on June 3, 1968. On the administrative side, the diocese consolidated all of its departments into a new administration building, which was dedicated on Aug. 9, 1964.

Bishop Primeau resigned in January 1974 (died June 15, 1989) and was succeeded the following year by Bishop Odore Gendron (1975–90). Gendron was a native of Manchester and served as pastor of a number of prominent ethnic French parishes. It was during this period that a shift began in the state's Catholic population. As the state's ethnic population assimilated, loyalty to the ethnic churches decreased. This led to the decline of ethnic parishes in the cities. At the same time, population growth in the southern part of the state, which is less than one hour from Boston, resulted in new parishes being established in southern suburban locations.

In the world that followed the Second Vatican Council, changes in the Catholic Church and new opportunities for women in the secular world led to a significant decrease in the number of women religious in the state. In the decade that followed, the loss of these women, many of whom staffed the state's Catholic schools, led to the consolidation and closure of many schools throughout New Hampshire.

By 1990, when Bishop Gendron retired and was replaced by Bishop Leo E. O'Neil, the situation was exacerbated by the declining number of priests available to serve as pastors. Bishop O'Neil began a system of "twinning," whereby two small parishes share the same pastor. Bishop O'Neil also sought to invigorate older parishes by assigning new immigrant groups to them as a home parish. Two examples are St. Louis Gonzaga Church in Nashua, which had been predominantly French, and St. Anne Church in Manchester, which was Irish. Both churches are now home parishes for Hispanic and Vietnamese Catholics. Other recent immigrant groups include Portuguese, Sudanese, Bosnian and Croatian.

Upon his death in 1998, Bishop O'Neil was succeeded by Bishop John B. McCormack. McCormack was born and raised in Massachusetts and served both as a pastor and administrator for the Archdiocese of Boston before coming to New Hampshire. Bishop McCormack continues to oversee the consolidation of older parishes in the cities and the construction of new ones in the suburbs. For example, in 2000 four parishes in Berlin, NH, an industrial city in the northern part of the state, were combined to create one new parish. At the same time suburban communities in the southeastern part of the state have found themselves in the position of building larger churches or establishing new parishes.

Education. Catholic institutions of higher learning in New Hampshire include St. Anselm's College, founded (1887) in Manchester by the Benedictines, Notre Dame College in Manchester (sponsored by the Sisters of the Holy Cross), and Rivier College in Nashua (sponsored by the Sisters of the Presentation of Mary).

NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY

Also known as Taylorism, refers to the 19th-century New England theological system that originated with Nathaniel William TAYLOR, professor at Yale Divinity School, New Haven, Conn. (1822–58). An exposition of Puritan theology, it was the most influential and controversial since that of Jonathan EDWARDS. Using rational philosophy, Taylor devised a system that dealt with human responsibility and featured freedom of the will. Taylor, called "the Pelagianist" by some Calvinists, taught that there is a native sinlessness in man, an ability in him to renovate his own soul, and self-love, or the desire for happiness, is the source of all voluntary action. Although he considered himself to be in the Edwards tradition, Taylor's views represented a serious departure from strict Puritan Calvinism (see GREAT AWAKENING). His teaching that man's acts are not necessitated, but free, because man may act "in a contrary way at all times," was interpreted by many as a denial of Calvinism's cardinal tenet on the absolute sovereignty of God. Moreover, his belief that man may be motivated to a conversion of life seemed contrary to the Calvinist doctrine on "Divine Benevolence." When resistance to these ideas mounted, a fellow Congregationalist, Bennett Tyler, led the opposition, founding a new divinity school in Hartford, Conn., to teach "traditional Puritanism."

In addition, Presbyterian opposition was strong and even more consequential. Charles Hodge of Princeton Divinity School wrote vehement attacks against "the novelties of New England Theology"; those who agreed with him became known as the "Old School" within Presbyterianism. Many younger clergymen and revivalists who found Taylor's teachings appealing and useful in their work were referred to as the "New School." The two groups exchanged accusations of heresy; disagreements on other issues arose frequently, especially on the missions where cooperation with the Congregationalists was fostered and a plan of eventual union drawn up. Here the Old School charged that the New School and Congregationalist influences had subverted Presbyterian order and that innovations had crept into their worship. By 1837, when a general assembly was held in Philadelphia, Pa., the controversy had reached its peak. The Old School dissolved completely the plan of union with the Congregationalists and cut off several New York New School synods. When these asked for readmittance and were refused, they formed their own assembly, to which all the New School group affiliated themselves, causing a schism that lasted 32 years. By 1880 Taylor's views were generally rejected by all. However, his insistence that divine governance must be understood in a way that includes man's moral responsibility paved the way for the later transition from rigid Calvinism to "Liberal Orthodoxy" in America.

NEW JERSEY, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A Middle Atlantic state, one of the Thirteen Colonies, admitted to the Union as the third state on Dec. 18, 1787. Bordering on New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and the Atlantic Ocean, New Jersey is heavily urbanized and the most densely populated of the states. Newark is the largest city, and Trenton is the capital. The population in 2001 was 7.6 million, of whom 3.4 million, about 44 percent, were Catholic. They are served by the Archdiocese of Newark and its four suffragan sees, Camden, Metuchen, Paterson, and Trenton.

Catholicism in the Colonial Period. After the English assumed control from the Dutch in 1664, New Jersey was divided into West Jersey, a Quaker stronghold, and East Jersey, whose fortunes were tied to New York City. Proprietary government ended in 1702, when the Jerseys were united as a royal colony. In 1738, New Jersey was established as a separate legal entity under Lewis Morris, the first Royal Governor. Its geographic position and large Tory population gave it a leading role in the American Revolution, and it was an important defender of the small states in the Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787.

For much of New Jersey's early history, Catholics were neither numerous nor significant. Catholic immigration was discouraged by legal and social conditions. In 1668, the first general assembly of the Province of East Jersey was held in Elizabeth. William Douglas of Bergen, who had been elected, was refused his seat because, as a Catholic, he was not able to take the required oath.

The first known Catholic resident of West Jersey seems to have been John Tatham, also known as John Gray, a former monk of Douai Abbey in England, who left the monastery (possibly absconding with some funds in the process) and settled first in Pennsylvania and then in the area of Trenton in New Jersey. The inventory of his estate shows that he possessed a number of Catholic books, and items for the celebration of the Eucharist. There is some evidence that he served as Governor of West Jersey for a time.

In 1683, the Catholic King James I appointed an Irish governor of New York, Thomas Dongan, who brought with him a Catholic priest, later to be joined by two more, who occasionally would go to Elizabeth and Woodbridge to administer the sacraments. When James was overthrown, the anti-Catholic sentiment returned.

In 1698, the East Jersey Assembly promised religious tolerance, but not for those of the "Romish" religion. When New Jersey became a Royal Colony in 1702, Queen Anne, writing to her representative, Lord Cornbury, said that he should give liberty to all "except Papists." She went on to express fear of the "dangers which may happen from popish recusants." Under George II, an oath was administered to civil and military officers, which contained anti-Catholic sentiments. In 1758, religious toleration for all "except papists" was again reiterated.

Meanwhile Catholic settlers came to New Jersey in some numbers, especially as the glass and iron industries were developed, and their settlements were tended by Jesuit missionaries working out of St. Joseph's Church in Philadelphia and "riding the circuit" through New Jersey. Theodore Schneider, S.J., cared for the spiritual needs of Catholics in New Jersey, especially in Salem County, where a number of Catholics had settled. He was followed by Ferdinand Steinmeyer, who adopted the English name FARMER. Farmer made twice-yearly trips through New Jersey to visit the communities of Catholics. His mission stations included Ringwood, Basking Ridge, Charlottenburg, Pilesgrove, Cohansey, Long Pond, Mount Hope, and Springfield. Catholics had come to Ringwood in 1764 to work in the mines. Farmer spent a total of 21 years ministering to the scattered Catholics of New Jersey. His registers include Irish, English, German and French names. While New Jersey officially remained anti-Catholic, the ministrations of the Jesuits from Philadelphia, which were frequent enough surely to bring notice, were tolerated, although Farmer did report some instances of anti-Catholic prejudice.

Another known Catholic of the period, Patrick Colvin, who operated a ferry on the Delaware river near Trenton, is said to have supplied some of the boats that George Washington used to ferry his troops from Pennsylvania on Christmas Eve, 1776, when he was on his way to attack the British troops at Trenton. A number of Catholic officers from France who had come to help the cause of the revolution, settled at war's end in Madison.

They were soon joined by other French Catholics who fled the French Revolution. Although these Catholics worshiped in the Presbyterian Church because of the lack of a Catholic Church, they remained staunch Catholics, and their descendants were among the founders of Saint Vincent Martyr Church in Madison.

This anti-Catholic atmosphere continued in New Jersey into the post-colonial period. The state constitution, adopted in 1776, excluded an established church and guaranteed to everyone "the inestimable privilege of worshipping Almighty God in a manner agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience," but it guaranteed only that "no protestant inhabitant . . . be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles" and that "all persons professing a belief in the faith of any protestant sect . . . shall be capable of being elected into any office of profit or trust or being a member of either branch of the legislature." These provisions were not removed until a new constitution was drafted in 1844.

Nineteenth-Century Growth. The ecclesiastical status of New Jersey changed several times in the 19th century. When the Diocese of Baltimore was erected in 1789, the state was included in its jurisdiction, and there is a record of a visit paid to Trenton by Bp. John CARROLL in September 1803. When the Dioceses of Philadelphia and New York were established in 1808, New Jersey was divided between them. Belonging to New York was "the eastern part of the province of New Jersey closest to" it. Attached to Philadelphia was "the western and southern part of the province of New Jersey." Following the recommendation of the Second Provincial Council of Baltimore (1833), the Holy See, on June 18, 1834, redefined the boundaries of all the dioceses in the U.S.; New Jersey, however, remained divided between New York and Philadelphia.

The years following the War of 1812 were a time of rapid industrial and commercial development in New Jersey. Catholic immigration, especially from Ireland and Germany, increased with the railroad and canal building that began in the 1830s. By 1814 the number of Catholics in Trenton had increased sufficiently to build a small church, which was dedicated to St. Francis by Michael Egan, first bishop of Philadelphia. In 1820 the Catholic community in Paterson received its first pastor, Rev. Richard Bulger. Newark's first parish, St. John's, was established in 1826, and its church dedicated in 1828.

When NEWARK became a diocese in 1853, encompassing the whole state, James Roosevelt BAYLEY, a former Episcopalian, and nephew of Mother Seton, was named first bishop. At the time, the city of Newark had three churches, the original St. John's; St. Mary's, for the Germans; and the new St. Patrick's. In Trenton there were two: St. John's and St. Francis of Assisi (the original St. Francis) for the Germans. In the entire state there were 30 churches, with at least as many mission stations, all tended by 30 priests.

The rapid growth of the foreign Catholic population caused concern among the mostly Protestant population and gave rise to a new wave of anti-Catholic sentiment. The Know-Nothings were particularly prominent in New Jersey. The trouble culminated in an attack on St. Mary's Catholic Church on Shipman Street in Newark, which was a German ethnic parish. Tension had been building up ever since a fire in the nearby Halsey and Taylor factory, whose workers were mainly Irish and German immigrants, was ignored by the Protestant fire brigades nearby. During an Orangemen parade in September, 1854, an exchange of words and rocks led to a riot that destroyed the church and led to the deaths of two Irishmen "at the hands of persons unknown" according to the coroner's report, but who had certainly been shot by some of the marchers.

Despite opposition, the number of Catholics in New Jersey continued to grow. In July 1881, Pope Leo XIII divided the diocese of Newark. Fourteen counties in central and southern New Jersey were split off to form the diocese of Trenton. The Most Reverend Michael J. O'Farrell of New York was named the first bishop.

Twentieth Century. Immigrants continued to come. Their numbers and place of origin changed the composition of New Jersey Catholicism. Italians came in large numbers at the end of the 19th century, and eastern Europeans came in the first quarter of the 20th century. In order to address their religious and cultural needs the bishops created national parishes, notably in urban areas. The national parishes were also a source of tensions when their members felt their customs and practices were not understood or appreciated. Sometimes the tension was a question of authority pitting clergy against the bishop. In a few cases it led to the establishment of independent church bodies as among the Poles in 1987, and the Ruthenians in 1936.

In 1937 the Holy See once again rearranged the ecclesiastical map of the state. The counties of Passaic, Morris, and Sussex were separated from Newark to form the Diocese of Paterson. Bishop Thomas H. McLaughlin, to that point an auxiliary bishop in Newark, was named Paterson's first bishop. The counties of Camden, Atlantic, Cape May, Cumberland, Gloucester and Salem were split from Trenton to form the Diocese of Camden. Most Reverend Bartholomew Eustace of New York was named its first ordinary. Newark was raised to the rank of archdiocese with the new dioceses as its suffragan sees. In 1981 the Holy See again divided the Diocese of Trenton forming the counties of Warren, Hunterdon, Sommerset, and Middlesex into the Diocese of Metuchen with Most Reverend Theodore McCarrick who had been an auxiliary in New York its first bishop. Bishop McCarrick served in Metuchen until 1986 when he was promoted to the archdiocese of Newark.

New Jersey has a goodly number of Eastern Catholics and is the home of two of eparchies of the Eastern Churches. The Eparchy of Passaic, embracing Byzantine-Ruthenian Catholics living in New Jersey and eastern Pennsylvania, was established in 1963. More recently, the Eparchy of Our Lady of Deliverance of Newark for Syrian Catholics was established in 1995.

New Jersey is home to six Catholic institutions of higher learning, the most prominent of which is Seton Hall University, founded in 1856 in Madison as Seton Hall College, and now located in South Orange. It is a diocesan university, staffed by the priests of the Archdiocese of Newark. The major seminary for the Archdiocese of Newark, Immaculate Conception Seminary, serves as Seton Hall's graduate school of theology. The minor seminary, Saint Andrew's, is also part of Seton Hall. Other Catholic colleges in the state include Caldwell College (sponsored by the Sisters of Dominic), St. Peter's College in Jersey City (sponsored by the Jesuits), Georgian Court College in Lakewood (sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy), Felician College (sponsored by the Felician Sisters), and College of St. Elizabeth in Morristown (sponsored by the Sisters of Charity of St. Elizabeth).

NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH

Known also as the New Church or the Swedenborgian Church, organized in London, England, in 1787 by students of the theological writings of Emanuel SWEDENBORG (1688–1772). Swedenborg himself never organized a church or even a group. The first organizer in London was Robert Hindmarsh, a Methodist. Subsequently ministers were ordained and other groups recognized; in 1789 the first general conference of the New Church met in the chapel at Great Eastcheap.

Swedenborgian doctrine was introduced into the U.S. in 1784; the first congregation was organized in Baltimore, Md., in 1792. By 1817 the number of existing societies was sufficient to form a General Convention of the New Jerusalem, which met that year in Philadelphia. A separate body of Swedenborgians was formed in 1890, and in 1897 took the name of the General Church of the New Jerusalem with headquarters in Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania. This group considers itself more faithful to the ideas of Swedenborg, has its own school system, and in government is similar to the EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The General Convention churches are more liberal in doctrine, more active in ecumenical cooperation, and are congregational in church polity.

A distinctive characteristic of the Swedenborgian churches is their unusual doctrine on God: He is One and is "the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, in whom is the Father, Son and Holy Spirit" (Adoramus, a non-creedal formula used in many churches). This seems to be a Trinity of Person, not of Persons. Other distinctive doctrines are derived from Swedenborg's spiritual writings, although local option determines the selection for any individual congregation. Some consider him the heaven-sent revealer of the true spiritual meaning of Scripture; others look upon him much as Lutherans consider Martin Luther or Roman Catholics regard the Greek Fathers. Swedenborgian doctrines more commonly held include the belief that Sacred Scripture is God's Word, revealing Jesus Christ as the "Divine Human" by faith, in whom humanity is saved; the New Jerusalem is a symbol of a new spiritual era, heralded by Swedenborg's spiritual interpretation of the Word; and humans are free spirits temporarily clothed with a material body; death releases them into the world of God and angels, where they make their final free choice of heaven or hell.

Thus a Swedenborgian is a Christian who finds in the writings of Swedenborg a meaning of life that points the way to growth of mind and spirit, resulting in a life of loving service to others. Membership in a Swedenborgian congregation is by baptism or confirmation, or simply with a letter of transfer from another Christian church. Many Swedenborgians enroll in other local churches where no local Swedenborgian church exists.

NEW MEXICO, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

New Mexico, located in southwestern United States, was admitted to the Union in 1912. Bordered by Arizona on the west, Colorado on the north, Oklahoma and Texas on the east, and the Mexican states of Chihuahua and Sonora on the south, New Mexico is a “triadic” state — three geographic areas, three cultures, three flags, three congressional districts, three dioceses. The land area of 121,364 square miles (5th largest) is roughly divided into the Great Plains in the east, the Rocky Mountains in the center, and high plateau in the west. The state is bisected by the Rio Grande, known in Spanish times as the Rio Bravo del Norte, which is a major source of irrigation. The state’s major cities are Albuquerque (448,607) a major transportation and commercial hub of the Southwest; Las Cruces (74,267) the major city in the southern part of the state; and Santa Fe (62,203) the capital.

In 2001 New Mexico’s population numbered 1,935,430 (37th largest) of which is 40.7 percent claimed Hispanic ancestry (highest proportion in the U.S.) and 9.5 percent Native American (highest after Alaska). The Hispanic population ranges from families who have been present in the state for nearly four centuries to recent immigrants. The Native American population includes the Pueblo people, whose historic villages dot the Rio Grande valley, and the Navajos, whose enormous reservation occupies much of northwestern New Mexico into Arizona. The 473,107 Catholics, about 24 percent of the state’s population, are served by the Archdiocese of SANTA FE, and the dioceses of Gallup and Las Cruces. The Province of Santa Fe also includes the dioceses of Tucson and Phoenix in Arizona.

New Mexico is a study in contrasts. Acoma Pueblo is the oldest occupied town in the United States, dating perhaps 1,000 years before the English settlement at Jamestown. Santa Fe is the oldest capital city in the country, the Palace of the Governors the oldest public building, and San Miguel in Santa Fe the oldest continuously functioning church in the United States. But in the 20th century New Mexico ushered in the atomic age. The Manhattan Project which developed the first atom bomb was housed at the government laboratories at Los Alamos, and the first bomb was detonated at Trinity Site on the White Sands National Monument near Alamogordo.

The Colonial Period. Early attempts at exploration and evangelization went hand in hand under the Spanish. A Franciscan friar, Marcos de NIZA (c. 1495–1558), assisted by a Moorish survivor of a previous expedition under Cabeza de Vaca, led a small expedition north from Mexico in 1539. The Moor was killed by the inhabitants of Zuni Pueblo, and the friar retreated south. Fueled by the friar’s descriptions of Zuni, coupled with legends of the wealthy “seven cities of Cibola,” a major expedition was mounted in 1540 under Francisco Vasquez de Coronado. For two years Coronado explored the present American Southwest, wintering twice along the Rio Grande. Although it failed to locate any wealthy cities, Coronado’s expedition, wandering from the Grand Canyon to the Kansas plains, added immeasurably to the geographic knowledge of the Southwest.

When Coronado withdrew in 1542, several of the FRANCISCANS stayed behind and established a mission on the Rio Grande. All were eventually killed. Fray Juan de PADILLA (c. 1500–1544), the protomartyr of the United States, was probably killed somewhere in western Kansas. Fray Juan de la Cruz became the first martyr of New Mexico. Over the next half-century New Mexico languished on the back burner of the Spanish colonial empire. Religiously, there were forays into the area by several Franciscans, moved both by a missionary spirit and a sense of the millennial possibilities of the area. In political and geographic minds, the area began to take shape as the frontier against possible southern expansion by the English.

Finally in 1598, a serious colonizing expedition was mounted under Don Juan de Onate. Initially Onate established his capital at a pueblo called Ohkay Owingeh on the east bank of the Rio Grande which he christened San Juan de los Caballeros. Two years later the capital was moved to a new settlement named San Gabriel on the west bank of the Rio Grande at its confluence with the Rio Chama. In 1608 Onate resigned the governorship under pressure, and was replaced by Pedro de Peralta. In 1610 Peralta supervised the establishment of a new capital, La Villa Real de la Santa Fe de San Francisco de Asis, some 30 miles southeast of San Gabriel.

The early Franciscan missionaries were members of the Province of the Holy Gospel in Mexico, and although thinly spread among a growing number of missions, they were, by and large, dedicated, and in some cases talented, missionaries. Nonetheless, the friars were hampered by difficulties of personnel and resources. In addition, the reliance of the friars on presenting Christianity in the terms of a western European cultural milieu often placed them at odds with the neophytes, especially in the areas of language, societal relations, and cosmology.

After the departure of Onate, the friars moved their headquarters from San Gabriel to the more centrally located pueblo of Santo Domingo. In 1616, New Mexico was designated a semi-autonomous Franciscan “custody” of the Conversion of Saint Paul. Fray Estevan Perea, the first custos, reported 11 missions, 20 friars, and some 10,000 Christianized natives. The needs of the missions were provided for by a triennial supply train from Mexico. Significant among the friars in this period was Fray Alonso de BENAVIDES (c. 1580–1636), appointed custos in 1623. He arrived in Santa Fe late in 1625 bearing with him the image of the Blessed Virgin Mary, still venerated today in the Santa Fe Cathedral as La Conquistadora, Our Lady of Peace, the oldest Marian image in the country. Returning to Spain in 1630, he wrote a “Memorial” to the king and the Franciscan minister general, detailing the state of the province and the missions, and asking for the appointment of a bishop for New Mexico.

Isolated at the very edge of the Spanish colonial empire, the early years of the New Mexico colony were neither prosperous nor peaceful. The colony failed to produce much material wealth either for the colonists on the scene, or for the governments in Mexico City and Madrid. In most times the friars were at odds with the governors over the support of the missions and the treatment of the natives. When the friars and the governors were in agreement, it was often at the expense of the native peoples.

On Aug. 10, 1680 the pent-up rage among the Pueblo people, coupled with several years of agricultural failure, erupted in a full-scale revolt, remarkable for its ferocity and for the unity it produced, albeit temporarily, among the Pueblos. Under the leadership of a man named Po-pe, from San Juan Pueblo, the natives mounted a successful coordinated offensive despite language barriers. The missions were desecrated, 21 friars and 400 Spaniards were killed, and the rest took shelter at Santa Fe, which soon came under siege. On August 21, under the watchful eyes of the natives who were content to see them go, the Spaniards abandoned Santa Fe and trekked southward to El Paso, where they remained for the next dozen years.

In 1692, concerned about an unprotected border, and about the bad example the revolt presented to other natives, Spain commissioned Don Diego de Vargas to reconquer the province for Spain. Leading a contingent of friars, soldiers, and colonists north from El Paso de Vargas re-entered Santa Fe on Dec. 16, 1693. The pueblos were, for the most part, peaceably restored to Spanish and Christian hegemony—but with a difference. The cultural and religious sensibilities of the natives were treated with more respect than previously, and gradually a more authentically New Mexican spirituality began to emerge from the convergence of cultures. During the next century this spirituality flowered in several areas. Creating the only truly American form of religious architecture, the New Mexicans constructed churches of adobe and woodwork which seemed to blend in with the landscape. Native santeros developed an indigenous religious devotional art, both primitive and highly evocative. Finally, devotional sites, pilgrimages, celebrations, and confraternities, such as La Fraternidad Piadosa de Nuestro Padre Jesus Nazareno (better known as the Penitentes), evolved which combined aspects of the different cultures present in the province.

For almost the entire colonial period, New Mexico theoretically came under the jurisdiction of the vast Diocese of Durango, founded in 1620, which was for many years the largest diocese in New Spain. But at a distance of 1,500 miles from Durango, Santa Fe only experienced an episcopal visitation a handful of times over the course of two Spanish centuries, notably by Bishop Benito Crespo in 1730. In reality, the Franciscans were in almost exclusive control of the New Mexican church. However, they were not assiduous in developing native vocations in the province, relying instead on missionaries from Spain and Mexico.

Santiago Roybal (1694–1744), ordained a secular priest in Durango around 1730, was the first in a thin line of native New Mexicans, who, at considerable difficulty, left the province to be educated and ordained in Mexico, and then returned to serve as priests in the northern kingdom. Born near present-day San Ildefonso Pueblo, Roybal is presumably the first native of what is now the United States to be ordained a priest. During his priestly ministry he was the bishop's vicario in Santa Fe, but also the sole non-Franciscan in the province.

Nineteenth Century. The early 19th century was, in general, a time of decline for church structures in New Mexico. The emergence of independence movements in various areas of Spanish America diverted funds from the missions which were still supported by the Spanish crown. Once Mexico achieved independence from Spain in 1821, New Mexico was theoretically no longer as remote from the national government. But in reality, the struggling newly independent government was even less likely to be generous with remote ecclesiastical outposts, and indeed was seeking money from the Church. In addition, the Mexican Congress ordered the expulsion of all Spanish citizens from the country with the result that by 1848 there were no friars left in New Mexico. And finally, Mexican Independence was not immediately recognized by the Holy See, resulting in a standoff over appointments to vacant sees. By 1827, there were no bishops in Mexico, resulting in no ordinations.

This combination of a lack of leadership, clergy and money was most painfully felt in New Mexico, at the fringe of the newly independent country. At the beginning of the 19th century, there were subsidized provisions for 22 priests in New Mexico. In the first three decades of the century, the Spanish settlements grew more numerous and more widespread, and the population itself grew in size and diversity as trade routes opened up with Missouri to the northeast. At the same time the bishops in Durango began to secularize the larger Spanish parishes beginning in 1816. But the changes brought by independence were quickly felt, and by 1829 there were only 12 priests in the province, mostly native New Mexicans, caring for a growing population with dwindling resources. As a result of these conditions, many churches fell into disrepair and ruin, and the sacraments were celebrated in the more remote missions less frequently or hardly ever. And in many of these missions the spiritual life of the mission was left to the leadership of lay groups, such as the Penitentes. Prominent among the New Mexican priests of this era were Juan Felipe Ortiz in Santa Fe, Jose Manuel Gallegos in Albuquerque, and Antonio Jose Martinez in Taos.

In 1832, Durango received a new bishop, Jose Antonio Laureano de Zubiria. Over the next 20 years, he would make pastoral visits to New Mexico (in 1833, 1845 and 1850). Zubiria appointed Father Ortiz in Santa Fe as his vicar for the area, and authorized Father Martinez in Taos to establish a rudimentary preparatory seminary. Over the next dozen years, a dozen young men who had initially been trained at Taos would return to serve as priests in New Mexico, raising the number of clergy in the province to 17 by 1851.

The Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848, ending the two-year Mexican-American War, brought New Mexico under the aegis of the United States. This change in civil control rather quickly resulted in a change in ecclesiastical government as well. The question of a bishop for New Mexico, which had been bandied about in Mexico City and Madrid for over two centuries, was decisively answered by the American bishops meeting in the Seventh Provincial Council of Baltimore in 1849. In addition to asking for new archdioceses and dioceses, the bishops requested a vicariate to be established for the vast territory between California and the Rocky Mountains recently acquired from Mexico. Pope Pius IX responded on July 19, 1850 by establishing the Vicariate Apostolic of New Mexico with the seat at Santa Fe. A few days later, the pope named Jean Baptiste LAMY (1814–1888), a French diocesan priest working in the Cincinnati Diocese, as titular Bishop of Agathonica and first Vicar Apostolic. A native of Lempdes in the French Puy-de-Dome, Lamy was serving at Covington, Ky. at the time. He was consecrated on Nov. 4, 1850 at Saint Peter in Chains Cathedral in Cincinnati, and, together with Joseph MACHEBEUF, a comrade from France, arrived in Santa Fe on Aug. 10, 1851.

Lamy's new vicariate contained, by his own count, 68,000 Catholics, 8–9,000 Catholic natives, 26 churches, 40 chapels, and 12 native priests. At its height, Lamy's jurisdiction extended to all of New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado and part of Utah. Lamy's first concern was to build up the Church in New Mexico by means of a more numerous and better educated clergy and Catholic schools. Lamy recruited the Sisters of Loretto from Kentucky (1852), the Brothers of the Christian Schools from France (1859), the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati (1865), the Jesuit Fathers from Naples (1867), as well as numerous secular priests and seminarians from France and elsewhere. This growth was recognized by subsequent institutional development. The vicariate apostolic was erected as the Diocese of Santa Fe in 1853; Arizona and Colorado were erected as separate vicariates apostolic in 1868 with Machebeuf and another French missionary, Jean Baptiste Salpointe as first vicars; and Santa Fe was advanced to a metropolitan archdiocese in 1875.

Lamy's 35 years as bishop in New Mexico were not without difficulties. His struggle with the bishops of Durango over boundaries and jurisdiction went on for two decades. He was disappointed several times in his dealings with the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs over education for the natives. And his dealings with the native clergy, particularly Father Martinez of Taos, remain controversial, sometimes resulting in suspension, and, in Martinez' case, excommunication. Lamy saw these priests as poorly educated and lacking in clerical discipline, at times to the point of scandal. On their part, the priests saw his introduction of European clergy, religious, and customs as disdainful of their own indigenous culture and religiosity. The gradual rise of the walls of Lamy's new French Romanesque cathedral (1869–1884) around the existing adobe parroquia of Santa Fe was perhaps emblematic of their sense of Lamy's supplanting the native faith.

As leader of the established Catholic faith of the Spanish inhabitants, but at the same time having been deeply steeped in Catholic European culture and thoroughly Americanized during his decade as a missionary in Ohio and Kentucky, Lamy was an important figure in 19th-century New Mexico, helping the area to mature religiously, and to transform its self-understanding from the northern frontier of an old kingdom to a part of the great American West. Lamy was memorialized by Willa Cather in her 1927 novel Death Comes for the Archbishop, and by Paul Horgan in his 1975 Pulitzer-prize-winning biography, Lamy of Santa Fe.

Twentieth Century. Lamy was followed by a succession of French archbishops: Salpointe (1885–1894), Placide Louis Chapelle (1894–1897), Peter Thomas Bourgade (1899–1908), and Jean Baptiste Pitaval (1909–1918). Salpointe prevailed upon Katherine DREXEL to send her Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament to Santa Fe in 1894 to staff St. Catherine's Indian School. In his retirement he wrote a history of the Church in the Southwest, Soldiers of the Cross, often used by later historians. While Bishop of Tucson, Bourgade reintroduced the Franciscans to New Mexico, inviting the brown-robed friars of the Cincinnati Province (not the blue-robed friars of colonial times) to staff the vast Navajo Reservation. When promoted to Santa Fe, Bourgade brought the friars to Pena Blanca in 1900, and gradually from there to many of the ancient pueblos, and other parishes in the state. Bourgade also helped found the Catholic Church Extension Society, and during his episcopate St. Joseph's Hospital was established in Albuquerque.

By 1918, with the outbreak of World War I, the availability of priests from France had ended, and with that in mind, Archbishop Pitaval resigned and suggested to the Holy See that a Franciscan be named to replace him since they would have the best likelihood of securing much-needed priests for the diocese. In 1919 Rome complied with his request and appointed the pastor of Pena Blanca, Albert T. Daeger, O.F.M. (1919–1932) as archbishop. In 1929, after a draught of many years, Archbishop Daeger had the joy of ordaining three New Mexican priests.

Daeger was succeeded by Rudolph A. Gerken (1933–1943), Edwin V. Byrne (1943–1963) and James P. Davis (1964–1974). Gerken had been the first Bishop of Amarillo, Texas; Byrne and Davis had previously served as bishops in Puerto Rico. The Byrne years witnessed the tremendous post-war growth in New Mexico including the establishment of the atomic energy laboratories at Los Alamos. To meet the growth, Catholic colleges developed in Santa Fe and Albuquerque, and numerous new parishes and schools were opened, including 16 in Albuquerque alone. Byrne fostered native vocations by establishing a minor seminary at Santa Fe. Archbishop Byrne was also instrumental in the founding of three religious communities, the Servants of the Holy Paraclete, who work with troubled priests, the Handmaids of the Precious Blood, a contemplative community, and the Little Brothers of the Good Shepherd, who care for the destitute. Archbishop Davis presided over the implementation of the Second Vatican Council decrees, and in 1967 moved the archdiocesan headquarters from Santa Fe to Albuquerque.

The growth of the Santa Fe metropolitan province is indicative of the religious, geographical, political and demographic developments in the Southwest during the past century. When Santa Fe was made a metropolitan archdiocese in 1875, it had two suffragans, the vicariates apostolic of Colorado and Arizona, which later evolved into the dioceses of Denver (1887) and Tucson (1897). A third suffragan was added in 1914, when the Tucson Diocese was divided and southern New Mexico and the West Texas Panhandle were formed into the Diocese of El Paso. The growth across the Southwest in the early decades of the 20th century was reflected in a series of ecclesial changes that affected the area in 1936–1941. In 1936 Los Angeles, Calif. was raised to a metropolitan see, and Tucson was placed in this new province. In 1939, northern Arizona was detached from Tucson and northeastern New Mexico was detached from Santa Fe, and a new diocese established at Gallup. Finally, in 1941 Denver was made a metropolitan archdiocese and at the same time divided with a new diocese at Pueblo. Thus from 1941 to 1969 Santa Fe had just two suffragans, El Paso and Gallup, and the province included New Mexico, west Texas, and northern Arizona.

In 1969, with territory taken from both Tucson and Gallup, a new diocese was created at Phoenix, Ariz. As a result of this division, Gallup lost most of its Arizona territory with the exception of the Navajo and Hopi Reservations. Since three new dioceses were created in southern California in the same decade, both the new diocese at Phoenix, as well as Tucson, were returned to the Santa Fe Province. Finally, in 1982, southern New Mexico was detached from El Paso, and a new diocese established at Las Cruces. With its territory reduced to the West Texas Panhandle, the El Paso Diocese joined the other Texas sees as part of the San Antonio Province. This marked the first time that El Paso was not ecclesiastically joined to Santa Fe since the late 16th century. Thus the Santa Fe Province today comprises all New Mexico and Arizona, with the four suffragan sees of Gallup, Las Cruces, Phoenix, and Tucson, and a Catholic population of 1.2 million.

In 1974, with the retirement of Archbishop Davis, the archdiocesan vicar general, Robert F. Sanchez, became the tenth Archbishop of Santa Fe. A native of Socorro, he was the first New Mexican to head the archdiocese. Sanchez initiated a number of programs to better preserve the ancient culture of the archdiocese, especially its churches, and to better integrate the Hispanic, Native American, and Anglo cultures present in the state. In 1992–1993, a series of scandals compromised Sanchez' ability to provide leadership for the archdiocese. He resigned in 1993, and was succeeded by the Bishop Michael J. Sheehan of Lubbock, Texas. Sheehan has successfully led the archdiocese through a time of financial and morale crisis.

On the Threshold of the Third Millennium. At the beginning of the third Christian millennium the Santa Fe Archdiocese spanned 15 and part of an additional four counties in northern and eastern New Mexico with 275,955 Catholics in 90 parishes. The Gallup Diocese covered four full and four partial counties in western New Mexico, as well as two full and one partial county in northeastern Arizona with 54,258 Catholics in 58 parishes. The territory of Las Cruces Diocese consists of New Mexico's ten southern counties, with a Catholic population of 127,370 in 45 parishes. The first bishop of Gallup was a Franciscan friar, Bernard T. Espelage, O.F.M. (1939–1969). He has been succeeded by Jerome J. Hatcher (1969–1990), and Donald E. Pelotte, S.S.S. (1990–). Bishop Pelotte, a member of Maine's Abenaki Tribe, is the first Native American bishop in the United States. The Las Cruces Diocese has been served since its inception by Bishop Ricardo Ramirez, C.S.B. (1982–).

Several religious communities are important to the fabric of religious life in New Mexico. The Benedictines have two prominent abbeys—Christ in the Desert at Abiquiu with its striking church, and Our Lady of Guadalupe at Pecos with its extensive ministry in the Charismatic Movement. The Premonstratensians, or Norbertines, also have a monastic foundation at Albuquerque at Santa Maria de la Vid Priory. Since 1985 the Franciscans once again have their own Southwest jurisdiction in the Province of Our Lady of Guadalupe headquartered in Albuquerque. Among the Franciscan ministries is Father Richard Rohr's Center for Action and Contemplation at Albuquerque. The Conventual Franciscans staff Holy Cross Retreat Center in Mesilla Park in the Las Cruces diocese. The Christian Brothers staff the College of Santa Fe, St. Michael's High School, and the Sangre de Cristo refoundation center for priests and religious at Santa Fe. The Servants of the Holy Paraclete have their headquarters at Jemez Springs, and the Augustinian Recollects have a provincial delegate house in Mesilla.

Women religious have been present in New Mexico since the advent of the Sisters of LORETTO in 1856. Originally introduced to open schools and hospitals, today sisters from many different congregations are present in the state in parochial, educational, and healthcare ministries. There are cloistered Carmelite monasteries at Santa Fe and Gallup, a Poor Clares monastery at Roswell, and a Benedictine priory at Abiquiu. The Handmaids of the Precious Blood have their motherhouse and novitiate at Jemez Springs. The Canossian Daughters of Charity have a provincialate at Albuquerque, and the Felician Sisters at Rio Rancho.

The adobe churches of New Mexico—from Cristo Rey in Santa Fe, the largest adobe structure in the country, to the small village moradas of the Penitentes—constitute a distinctive and cherished artistic patrimony of the state, and a significant architectural contribution to the United States. Among the most-photographed are San Estevan in Acoma Pueblo, San Jose de Gracia in Trampas, San Miguel del Vado in Ribera, San Francisco de Asis in Ranchos de Taos, and the famous pilgrimage Santuario of El Senor de Esquipulas in Chimayo.

NEW-MOON FEAST, HEBREW

In ancient Israel the first day of each month, i.e., the day after the new moon was sighted, was a feast day with ordinances similar to those of the SABBATH, with which it is linked in several passages (e.g., 2 Kgs 4.23). It has not been demonstrated, however, that the two were in fact originally connected. The monthly feast is not mentioned in the festival calendars of the Pentateuch, but in Nm 28.11–15 the sacrifices for it are prescribed in detail. The antiquity of the feast is clear, however, from allusions in the Prophets (Is 1.13–14; Hos 2.13; Am 8.5), and a New-Moon dinner at the royal court, requiring ritual purity for participation, is described in 1 Sm 20.5–29. Like the Sabbath, it was a day of rest from work.

The New-Moon Day was observed throughout Old Testament times (e.g., Ezr 3.5; Neh 10.33) and in New Testament times as well (Col 2.16), but it gradually lost its importance and disappeared from Jewish life. In later Biblical times only the first of the seventh month, Tishri, retained its prominence (Lv 23.24–25; Nm 29.1–6) and was observed with special solemnity: rest, trumpet blasts, a holy convocation, and sacrifices. This solemnity may reflect an earlier time when this day was a new year’s day. The much later Hebrew Feast of the NEW YEAR, Rosh ha-Shanah, retained the characteristic trumpet blast of the first day of Tishri. But the New Moon Day of Tishri is never mentioned in the Bible as a new year feast.

NEW NORCIA, ABBEY OF

A Benedictine abbey nullius (Novae Nursiae), in Western Australia, about 80 miles north of Perth, of which it is a suffragan. It was founded (1846) by a Spanish monk, Rosendo Salvado, for the evangelization of Australian aborigines. After living three years among these primitive nomads, Dom Salvado (1814–1900) visited Europe (1849) in search of missionaries. While in Rome he was appointed bishop of Port Victoria (now Darwin). Before he could return, his entire flock abandoned the region for southern goldfields, whereupon the pope permitted him to return to New Norcia. Bishop Salvado and his young Spanish community built a monastery, and cleared the land for agriculture. They established schools, built cottages for married natives, and introduced them to farming and handicrafts. In March 1867 Pius IX made the monastery an abbey nullius and a prefecture apostolic. On a visit to Rome (1900), Bishop Salvado arranged for its affiliation with the Spanish province of the Subiaco Congregation of BENEDICTINES. His successor, Dom Fulgentius Torres (abbot 1902–14), found a changing social situation. With the coming of European settlers and a decline in the number of natives, the abbey had to provide for the spiritual needs of a white, rather than a nonwhite, population. In the north, however, Abbot Torres established a new mission to aborigines in 1908 on the Drysdale River.

NEW ORLEANS, ARCHDIOCESE OF

(Novae Aureliae) Metropolitan see erected April 25, 1793, as the Diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas by Pius VI upon the application of King Charles IV of Spain. The vast territory of the original diocese, except for the area under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Baltimore, stretched from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. The territory, detached from the See of Havana, was previously part of the older Diocese of Santiago de Cuba, under whose jurisdiction the Louisiana colony had passed in 1762. Before that date, Quebec had spiritual jurisdiction over French colonial Louisiana. After the 1849 Provincial Council of Baltimore recommended additional ecclesiastical jurisdictions, Pius IX on July 19, 1850, raised New Orleans to the rank of metropolitan see. The first suffragan dioceses were those of Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Natchez, Miss.; and Little Rock, Ark. In 2001, the province included the Archdiocese of New Orleans and six additional Louisiana dioceses: Alexandria, Baton Rouge, Houma-Thibodaux, Lafayette, Lake Charles, and Shreveport. The archdiocese covers 4,208 square miles and includes eight civil parishes (counties), namely, Jefferson, Orleans, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. Tammany, and Washington. The Catholic population numbers about 490,000 or 36.8% of the total population.

Early History. The parish church with the longest uninterrupted history is St. Louis Basilica, whose origin extends practically to the founding of New Orleans in 1718. The first Mass in what is now the archdiocese was offered nearly 20 years earlier, on March 3, 1699, by Rev. Anastase Douay, a Franciscan missionary, with the expedition of Pierre Le Moyne, Sieur d'Iberville, who established the power of France in the Lower Mississippi Valley. On a later expedition to Louisiana with Iberville, the Jesuit Paul Du Ru put to use his fragmentary knowledge of the tribal languages of the Bayagoula, Ouma, and Natchez tribes by preparing a rudimentary catechism for their instruction. By early spring of 1700, du Ru was supervising the construction of a small church in a native village in Iberville parish.

The Council of the Marine in 1717 recommended turning the colony over to John Law's Company of the West and its successor, the Company of the Indies (or Mississippi Company). In accordance with the charter issued by the regent, Philip II, Duke of Orleans, religious affairs were included in the activities of the Company of the West from 1717 to 1731. Occasionally priests, known as concession chaplains, were among the personnel assigned to the land grants in the colony. More important than the concessions, however, was the founding of New Orleans as the new capital of the colony by Jean Baptiste Le Moyne, Sieur de Bienville, brother of Iberville, in 1718. The plan for the city, laid by Adrien de Pauger, provided for a church and presbytery. Divine services were held in improvised and inadequate quarters until April 1727, when the first substantial St. Louis parish church was finally completed.

Carmelite, Jesuit, and Capuchin priests labored in the colony during its formative years. The first Capuchins were Bruno de Langres, who arrived in New Orleans towards the end of 1722, and Philibert de Vianden, who took charge of the district from the Chapitoulas, a few miles above the original boundaries of the city, to Pointe Coupée, including Les Allemands, the German Coast, and the intervening concessions. Les Allemands had a chapel, dedicated to St. John, on the west bank of the Mississippi as early as 1724. In April 1723, Bruno was replaced as superior of the Capuchin missions in Louisiana by Raphael de Luxembourg, who was also vicar-general of the bishop of Quebec. Raphael established, in 1725, the first school for boys in New Orleans, but it lasted only five or six years. Nicolas Ignace de Beaubois, founder of the Jesuit missions in New Orleans, induced the Ursulines of Rouen, France, to establish a military hospital and school for girls. The pioneer group of Ursulines reached New Orleans on Aug. 6, 1727, and began the educational enterprise that has continued without interruption to this day. In 1722, the Jesuits, who contributed notably to the spiritual and economic well-being of the area, undertook the spiritual jurisdiction of the native peoples of the colony, a responsibility entrusted to them by Bp. Louis Duplessis-Mornay of Quebec. Their endeavors were supported in large measure by an extensive indigo and sugar plantation adjacent to New Orleans. In July 1763, while Michael Baudouin was superior, the Jesuits were dispossessed of their property and banished from Louisiana. Their departure, some 10 years before the society was suppressed, seriously hampered and retarded the growth of the Church in colonial Louisiana.

After 1772, Church affairs in New Orleans bore a definite Spanish stamp. Cirillo de Barcelona, chaplain of the Spanish expedition against the British in West Florida, was consecrated auxiliary bishop for the Louisiana colony on March 6, 1785. Shortly before leaving for his consecration in Cuba, he appointed his assistant Antonio de SEDELLA temporary pastor of St. Louis. For decades thereafter, Sedella, known as Père Antoine, was the center of controversy in the area.

First Bishops. When the Diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas was created in 1793, Luis Ignacio de PEÑALVER Y CÁRDENAS was consecrated as first ordinary and arrived in New Orleans on July 17, 1795, marking the beginning of home government in Church affairs. Peñalver noted in a report to the Spanish government that of the 11,000 Catholics in New Orleans, only about 400 performed their Easter duty. He instituted a number of necessary reforms, combated religious indifference and Voltaireanism, and established parishes in such places as the Poste des Avoyelles, Many (Neustra Señora de Guadalupe at Bayou Scie), and Monroe. Meanwhile, the parish church in use since 1727 had been destroyed in the great fire of 1788 and a new structure, the future Cathedral of St. Louis, was completed in 1794. Renovated several times, it was elevated to a minor basilica in 1964.

In 1801 Peñalver was transferred to the Archdiocese of Guatemala and jurisdictional quarrels, interdiction, and threats of schism marked the next 15 years in New Orleans. Père Antoine was at odds with Rev. Patrick Walsh and Canon Thomas Hassett, who attempted to administer the diocese during the episcopal vacancy; the wardens of the cathedral (marguilliers), after assuming control of church temporalities in 1805, waxed more and more arrogant; and, to complicate matters further, Spain ceded Louisiana back to France, which, in turn, sold it to the U.S. in 1803. Aware of the territorial transfer, the Holy See decided not to send Bishop-elect Francisco Porro y Peinado to Louisiana, and on Sept. 1, 1805, placed it temporarily under the spiritual supervision of Bp. John Carroll of Baltimore, Md. Carroll in time named the chaplain of the Ursulines, Jean Olivier, his vicar-general, but the latter's authority was openly challenged by Père Antoine and the cathedral wardens. Finally, on Aug. 18, 1812, Rev. Louis William DUBOURG, president of Georgetown College and founder of St. Mary's College in Baltimore, was named administrator apostolic by Archbishop Carroll. It was Dubourg, complying with Andrew Jackson's request, who officiated at a Te Deum in St. Louis Cathedral following the U.S. victory over the British at the Battle of New Orleans on Jan. 8, 1815.

On Sept. 24, 1815, Dubourg was consecrated in Rome, and Louisiana finally had a bishop, after an interregnum of nearly 15 years. Dubourg, however, remained in Europe for the next two years, enlisting priests and seminarians, as well as the services of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, and helping in the formation of the organization that eventually became the Pontifical Society for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. Upon arriving in the U.S., Dubourg went to St. Louis, Mo., and returned to New Orleans only in late 1820. The next year he called a synod, which was attended by 20 priests. On March 25, 1824, Joseph ROSATI, CM, was consecrated as Dubourg's coadjutor, but his administration of the Church in New Orleans amounted to supervision at a distance, since he resided in St. Louis. A significant event of the period was the arrival of the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., to staff the Poydras Asylum in New Orleans. Dubourg resigned in mid-1826 and died in 1833 as archbishop of Besancon, France.

Dubourg's resignation left the lower end of the Mississippi Valley without a resident bishop and was the signal for further disorders, which the annual visits of Rosati could not completely control. Rosati, appointed bishop of St. Louis in 1827, in time recommended a fellow Vincen-tian for the See of New Orleans, and Leo Raymond de Neckère was consecrated in St. Louis Cathedral on June 24, 1830. His regime was brief, for he was stricken with yellow fever and died on Sept. 5, 1833. A few months before (April 21, 1833), he had established New Orleans's second parish, St. Patrick's, to accommodate the Irish immigrants and other English-speaking people of the city. He had also invited to the diocese the Sisters of Our Lady of Mount Carmel from Tours, France, but they arrived after the bishop's death, and settled in Plattenville on Bayou Lafourche.

A remarkable period of Church expansion coincided with the growing importance of New Orleans as a center of commerce and expanding population. The city, emerging as fourth largest in the nation, increased in population from 29,737 in 1830 to 102,193 in 1840. The diocese covered the entire state, and had a total population approaching 300,000, served by 26 churches and 27 priests, when Anthony BLANC became fourth bishop, Nov. 22, 1835.

Blanc. During the 25 years Blanc administered the see, the number of churches increased to 73, and priests to 92. He established Assumption Seminary on Bayou Lafourche, two colleges, nine academies and schools, four orphanages, a hospital, and a home for girls. Under the guidance of Etienne Rousselon, vicar-general, the Sisters of the Holy Family were founded (1842) as a diocesan African-American religious congregation to teach, care for orphans, and tend to the aged of the African-American community. The cause for the canonization of their foundress, Henriette Dehille, was introduced in 1988. Blanc invited five communities of nuns to the diocese: the Sisters Marianites of Holy Cross (1848); the Sisters of St. Joseph of Bourg (1856); the School Sisters of Notre Dame (1856); the Sisters of Our Lady of the Good Shepherd (1859); and the Dominican Sisters, who, however, did not arrive from Cabra, Ireland, until four months after his death. The Redemptorist fathers established themselves (1843) in nearby Lafayette, where German, Irish, and French immigrants had settled. The Jesuit fathers opened the College of the Immaculate Conception in 1849 on a plot of ground that had once formed part of the plantation of which they had been defrauded in 1763. The Congregation of Holy Cross came (1849) to stabilize St. Mary's Orphan Boys' Home, which had been opened by Adam Kindelon, first pastor of St. Patrick's. Rev. Cyril De la Croix organized the first conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul after a layman, William Blair Lancaster, brought a manual of the society to New Orleans (1852).

Blanc called two diocesan synods and two provincial councils. A long and severe struggle with the church wardens culminated in the withdrawal of the clergy from the cathedral (1843). During the recrudescence of NATIVISM, he was the target of polemics and abuse in the press, but a loyal laity, represented by the Catholic Temperance Society, rallied to his defense. In litigation with the wardens, the Louisiana supreme court upheld the position of the bishop (1844). Three years after Blanc became archbishop of New Orleans in 1850, his jurisdiction was reduced about 22,000 square miles by the erection in the upper part of the state of the Diocese of Natchitoches, but the Catholic population of the archdiocese was decreased by only 25,000. After his death on June 20, 1860, the archdiocese was administered by Father Rousselon until the arrival of Archbishop-elect Jean Marie ODIN from Galveston, Tex.

Odin. The second archbishop took possession of his see only a few days after the bombardment of Ft. Sumter on April 12, 1861, Louisiana having already seceded from the Union and joined the Confederacy. During the Civil War, the archbishop's position was an extremely delicate one, calling for infinite tact and diplomacy. The times grew more trying after the city was occupied by federal troops on May 1, 1862. Union forces wrought considerable damage on Church properties in such places as Pointe Coupée and Donaldsonville, and the war years witnessed a disruption of religious and educational work in Thibodaux, Convent, Plaquemine, Grand Coteau, and elsewhere. Reconstruction was no less trying, but Odin continued, within limitations, the expansion program of his predecessor.

During the archbishop's visit to Europe in 1863 in search of men and money for his diocese, the Marist Fathers accepted his invitation to labor in Louisiana. In 1867 the OBLATE SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE, a Baltimore community of African-American nuns, began staffing a home for dependent children. The LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR opened their home for the aged poor after a committee of pious women, called Les Dames de la Providence, asked for their help in maintaining a home for the aged founded in 1840. The Brothers of the Sacred Heart came to New Orleans from Mobile in 1869. The archbishop invited the SISTERS OF MERCY, who began their visits to the parish prison, city workhouse, boys' house of refuge, and the mental hospital in 1869. The first Benedictine convent in the archdiocese was opened (1870) in the German national parish of Holy Trinity, New Orleans. The nuns arrived from Covington, Ky., and later established a motherhouse in Covington, La.

After numerous request for assistance, Odin finally obtained a coadjutor with right of succession. He was Napoléon Joseph Perché, who had been chaplain of the Ursulines for many years, founder (1842) of the first Catholic newspaper in Louisiana (Le Propagateur Catholique), and vicar-general of the archdiocese. He was consecrated in St. Louis Cathedral on May 1, 1870, and succeeded to the see when Odin died in France, May 25, 1870.

Perché and Leray. Like his predecessors, Perché invited several communities to the archdiocese: the Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, now known as the SISTERS OF THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT, who arrived at Waggaman in 1872; the Sisters of Christian Charity, who established themselves at St. Henry's convent, New Orleans, in 1873; and the Discalced CARMELITE Nuns, who arrived in 1877. In addition, Archbishop Perché approved the founding of a diocesan community, the Sisters of Immaculate Conception, organized on July 11, 1874, in Labadieville with Elvina Vienne as first superior. Soon after his installation as head of the see, Perché also inaugurated a costly program of church building, school construction, and parish foundations that contrasted sharply with the record of his predecessor. These expenses, plus financial aid to families impoverished by the Civil War, caused the archdiocesan debt to soar to $590,925, of which $257,080 was due European bondholders.

Weakened by age and infirmities, and overwhelmed by the tremendous debt, the archbishop asked for a coadjutor. The Holy See appointed Francis Xavier Leray of Natchitoches, who became archbishop upon Perché's death on Dec. 27, 1883. Leray's chief concern as coadjutor and as ordinary was the reduction of the archdiocesan debt, so his administration was practically without building or expansion programs. The only new community established in the archdiocese was that of the Poor Clare Nuns (1885). Upon his death on Sept. 23, 1887, Leray was succeeded by Francis Janssens, the Dutch-born bishop of Natchez.

Janssens. The new archbishop received the pallium from Cardinal James Gibbons on May 8, 1889, although he had actually taken possession of the archdiocese on Sept. 16, 1888. He invited the Benedictines of ST. MEINRAD'S ABBEY in Indiana to open a seminary for the training of priests. Luke Grüwe, OSB, established (1890) what later became St. Joseph's Abbey (St. Benedict, La.), and Janssens dedicated the seminary on Sept. 3, 1891. The archbishop welcomed Mother Frances Xavier CABRINI to New Orleans and encouraged her to establish (1892) a house primarily to assist Italians who had begun to migrate in large numbers to the city. In 1893, he asked the Sisters of the Holy Family to care for dependent or neglected African-American boys, and thus started the present Lafon Home for Boys, one of several institutions named for, and supported by, a bequest from the local black philanthropist Thomy Lafon.

Janssens was greatly esteemed throughout the archdiocese, which numbered 341,613 in the centennial year of 1893. He encouraged spiritual ministrations to patients at the leprosarium at Carville, La. When the hurricane of 1893 swept the Louisiana Gulf Coast, Janssens went among the Italian, Spanish, and Malay fishermen in the island settlements in a small boat to comfort them; he later helped them to rebuild their homes. He promoted devotion to Our Lady under the title of Prompt Succor. The corporate structure of each parish, as it exists today, was determined in 1894 when each parish was legally incorporated with the archbishop, the vicar-general, the pastor, and two lay directors as board members. Janssens was the first ordinary to promote native vocations on a large scale; his predecessors generally had depended on priests and seminarians from Europe, and had leaned heavily on religious to staff new parishes. He sponsored the Catholic Winter School, opened parochial schools, and launched a dozen new parishes. Alarmed at the defections from the faith among the African-Americans, he established St. Katherine's (1895) as a black parish, but on a temporary basis, since he did not wish to promote racial segregation. He died June 9, 1897, while en route to Europe in the interest of the archdiocese.

Chapelle. Placide Louis CHAPELLE, sixth archbishop of New Orleans, was transferred from Santa Fe., N. Mex., in February 1898. In concern over the archdiocesan debt, he ordered the annual contribution of 12 percent of the revenues of each parish for five years. This helped in the eventual liquidation of the longstanding debt, although it aroused the displeasure of some pastors. Chapelle's relations with his priests, many of them born and educated in France, were hardly improved by his extended, though necessary absences as apostolic delegate extraordinary, to Puerto Rico and Cuba, and later as apostolic delegate to the Philippine Islands. It was evident that he needed an auxiliary and one was provided when the pastor of Annunciation Church in New Orleans, Gustave Rouxel, was consecrated on April 9, 1899. In 1898 the archbishop, in his anxiety to economize, withdrew aid from the preparatory seminary at St. Benedict. On the other hand, he opened a theological seminary (1900) in an existing building next to St. Stephen's Church, New Orleans, with Fathers of the Congregation of the Mission as professors. Some 12 parishes and missions were established during Chapelle's regime and the Dominican fathers began (1903) their ministry in the archdiocese. Chapelle died a victim of yellow fever, on Aug. 9, 1905.

Blenk. The next ordinary, James Hubert Blenk, SM, was well known to the archdiocese long before his appointment on April 20, 1906. He had served as bishop of Puerto Rico, former auditor and secretary to the apostolic delegation to the West Indies, rector of Holy Name of Mary Church, and president of Jefferson College, Convent, La. Blenk, an ardent promoter of Catholic education, set up (1908) the first archdiocesan school board and appointed the first superintendent of schools. The preparatory seminary was again placed under the care of the Benedictine fathers of St. Joseph's Abbey (1908), but the theological courses were discontinued (1907) at the seminary opened by Chapelle. Most major seminarians of the archdiocese matriculated at Kenrick Seminary in St. Louis and St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore, or studied abroad. In September 1904 the Jesuits started a small college in New Orleans, which in 1911 was amalgamated with the College of the Immaculate Conception and became Loyola University. Blenk designated (1908) St. Mary's the normal school for women religious engaged in teaching in the archdiocese. In time St. Mary's Dominican became an accredited Catholic woman's college.

French Benedictine nuns, forced to leave their country, settled (1906) in Ramsay under the guidance of Paul Schaeuble, OSB, who had become first abbot of St. Joseph's in 1903. The Sisters Servants of Mary, having left Mexico during the Carranza revolution, found refuge also in the archdiocese and inaugurated (1914) their ministrations among the sick and bedridden in the city. The sisters of the Society of St. Teresa of Jesus, likewise refugees from Mexico, began teaching at St. Louis Cathedral school in 1915. That same year, the archbishop urgently requested Mother Katharine Drexel, foundress of the Sisters of the BLESSED SACRAMENT, to undertake the education of African-American youth in New Orleans. In 1917 the sisters opened a normal school and the following year they were authorized by the state legislature to conduct colleges and confer degrees. The sisters launched XAVIER UNIVERSITY OF LOUISIANA in 1925. For further ministration to the African-American population, the archbishop solicited the services of St. Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart (Josephites) and the Holy Ghost Fathers, assigning six parishes to the former and one to the latter. In 1911 the Brothers of Christian Schools purchased St. Paul's College, Covington, from the Benedictine Fathers. In 1912 the Ursulines, under the supervision of their chaplain, François Racine, moved from their third convent building to a new site on State Street where, 10 years later, the national shrine of Our Lady of Prompt Succor was erected.

Early in his administration, Blenk strengthened lay groups. He organized (1906) the State Board of Holy Name Societies, the Louisiana State Federation of Catholic Societies (1909), and the Federation of Catholic Societies of Women of Louisiana. He promoted the Catholic Order of Foresters, the Knights of Columbus, and the Knights of Peter Claver. The growth of the population in the archdiocese, especially in southwest Louisiana, made a division expedient. Partition was effected Jan. 11, 1918, shortly before Abp. John William Shaw was promoted to the New Orleans see. Jules Benjamin Jeannard, administrator of the archdiocese following the death of Blenk (April 15, 1917), was named first bishop of the new Diocese of Lafayette. The area of the archdiocese was reduced by about 11,000 square miles, 40 church parishes, and a population of about 300,000.

Shaw. One of Shaw's first actions was to invite the OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE, with whom he had worked closely as bishop of San Antonio, Tex., to administer St. Louis Cathedral and to take charge of the churches and missions in Livingston parish. In 1919 the Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word, from San Antonio also, came to teach at St. Francis de Sales parochial school. In 1920 Archbishop Shaw, with his chancellor August J. Bruening, began to lay plans for a financial campaign for the erection of a major seminary. With the help of laymen, the campaign realized close to $1 million and Notre Dame Seminary, staffed by Marist Fathers, became a reality in September 1923. In Baton Rouge, the Sisters of St. Francis of Calais opened Our Lady of the Lake Hospital (1923). Franciscan fathers returned to the archdiocese on July 21, 1925, when they took charge of the newly established parish of St. Mary of the Angels in the city, and missions of the Lower Coast. The Sisters of the Holy Ghost and Mary Immaculate arrived from San Antonio in September 1926 to teach the African-American children of St. Luke's School, Thibodaux. Shaw encouraged the endeavors of Catharine Bostick and Zoe Grouchy in the establishment of the MISSIONARY SERVANTS OF THE MOST HOLY EUCHARIST of the Third Order of St. Dominic, a community intended for religious instruction of the children in public schools and for social relief work. In 1928 the Society of the Divine Word took over the mission stations on both the east and west bank of the lower Mississippi River. In 1931 the Jesuits purchased the old Jefferson College in Convent and converted it into Manresa House for laymen's retreats.

Father (later Bishop) Maurice Schexnayder began Newman Club work in 1929 at Louisiana State University, one-third of whose student body was Catholic. Monsignor Peter M. H. Wynhoven established (1925) Hope Haven for orphaned and abandoned boys, later placed under the Salesian Fathers of St. John Bosco. Opposite Hope Haven, Madonna Manor for small boys replaced St. Mary's and St. Joseph's Orphanages. Wynhoven, in addition to many other assignments, also reorganized the social services and charities of the archdiocese by setting up (1924) Associated Catholic Charities. In 1922 Shaw convoked the sixth synod, the first in 33 years. In 1932 he launched the official diocesan paper, Catholic Action of the South, with Wynhoven as first editor in chief. It replaced the Morning Star, which had been published between 1878 and 1930.

Shaw's last years were burdened by problems of the financial depression of the 1930s. Some archdiocesan funds were frozen in local banks and several parishes found it difficult to meet the high interest due on monies borrowed during the 1920s. Nevertheless 33 new parishes were opened between 1919 and 1934. After a brief illness, Shaw died on Nov. 2, 1934, and Jean Marius Laval, who had been consecrated auxiliary (1911) to Blenk, became administrator.

Rummel. Joseph Francis RUMMEL (1876–1965) became the ninth Archbishop of New Orleans; he was born in Germany and immigrated to New York City with his parents in 1882. Rummel studied at seminaries in New Hampshire, New York and Rome, where he was ordained to the priesthood in 1902 and received his S.T.D. in 1903. He took an early interest in social problems, leading the relief work for Germans. In 1928 he was ordained Bishop of Omaha, Neb. On March 9, 1935, he was appointed Archbishop of New Orleans. Rummel guided the archdiocese during a period of rapid Catholic growth that saw the establishment of 48 new parishes and several schools.

The increasing participation of the laity in Church life became more evident during this period. The most tangible evidence of this participation was the growth and multiplication of many local units of national organizations such as the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (1935), the Archdiocesan Council of Catholic Women (1936), the Catholic Youth Organization (1936), Christian Family Movement (1953), and Young Christian Workers (1954). The most striking example of the changing nature of Louisiana Catholicism during this period was the Eighth National Eucharistic Congress, held in New Orleans on October 17–20, 1938—the first National Eucharistic Congress to be held in the South.

With the bombing of Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, the U.S. became a nation at war. Louisiana Catholics again entered wholeheartedly into conflict. Archbishop Rummel immediately issued "A Nation at War," urging Catholic support for the war effort. Young men and women enlisted; the local work force reoriented itself to a wartime economy; while Catholic parishes, schools, and institutions participated in the many patriotic drives to support the war effort.

After the war, the archdiocese encouraged generous support for relief efforts, worked for a temporary extension of rent control, and established a local resettlement bureau to assist (and sometimes resettle) more than 33,000 displaced persons who entered the U.S. via New Orleans between 1949 and 1952.

The post-war years were a time of rapid demographic growth and change. In 1945, the Catholic population of the archdiocese was estimated at 385,000. By 1962, the number increased to 630,000. The G. I. bill provided many with an opportunity for a college education, a better job, and a new home. Whole sections of New Orleans and its surrounding areas witnessed rapid development as new home construction boomed. Undeveloped suburban land was rapidly transformed into populated neighborhoods.

In 1935, 43,411 children were being educated in 122 Catholic elementary, secondary, and special schools. There were two Catholic universities—Loyola and Xavier—in the archdiocese. By 1965, more than 92,600 students were attending 197 Catholic elementary and secondary schools in the Archdiocese of New Orleans and the recently established Diocese of Baton Rouge. High school programs were rapidly expanding; teachers and principals were increasingly degreed and state certified; curricula were becoming more diversified as science and mathematics programs expanded; and the proportion of lay teachers grew steadily. The guiding force for much of this period was Msgr. Henry C. Bezou, who served as superintendent of archdiocesan schools from 1943 to 1968.

Rummel labored patiently for over a quarter century to create a community atmosphere conducive to full racial equality, to foster the growth of church organizations, facilities, and activities among African-American Catholics and, eventually, to achieve integration of Catholic parishes, schools, organizations, and institutions. In 1939, Xavier University in New Orleans began a Catholic Action School for African Americans. In 1951, the archdiocese's first secondary school for young black males—St. Augustine High School—was established. Many national and local black leaders received their secondary education at St. Augustine.

The 1954 Supreme Court decision in Brown vs. the Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, marked the legal end to segregated public schools. Louisiana, like the other southern states, resisted desegregation. Legislative attempts to prohibit integration, even in Catholic schools, were eventually declared unconstitutional. Archbishop Rummel was the first Catholic bishop in the South to accept African-American students into his minor and major seminaries. On March 15, 1953, his pastoral letter, "Blessed are the Peacemakers," ordered the desegregation of all Catholic parish activities and organizations. He suspended all Catholic services at Jesuit Bend mission (1955–1958) after an African-American priest was prevented from celebrating Mass there. In his pastoral letter of Feb. 11, 1956, he declared racial segregation morally wrong and sinful. He was also influential in preparing and gaining support for the 1958 U.S. Catholic bishops' statement condemning racism. He believed, however, that the process of integration had to proceed slowly to be successful. Not all shared his patience.

Rummel encouraged local clergy to educate their parishioners in social justice issues and consistently supported their efforts to implement social programs. In 1940, the South's first Catholic Conference on Industrial Problems was held in New Orleans. Rummel vigorously supported the rights of the working class. He publicly opposed Louisiana's right to work laws and actively supported the efforts of Louisiana agricultural workers, particularly sugar cane workers, to organize in the 1950s. He supported the unsuccessful 1953 sugar cane workers' strike.

Rummel turned over administration of the Archdiocese of New Orleans to Archbishop John P. Cody on June 1, 1962. He passed away in New Orleans on Nov. 8, 1964.

Cody. John Patrick CODY (1907–1982), a native and priest of St. Louis, was ordained in Rome in 1931, ministered in the Vatican Secretariate of State and Archdiocese of St. Louis, and served as Auxiliary Bishop of St. Louis, Coadjutor Bishop of St. Joseph, Mo., and Bishop of Kansas City-St. Joseph before his appointment as Coadjutor Archbishop of New Orleans on July 20, 1961. He was named apostolic administrator on June 1, 1962, and became archbishop on Nov. 8, 1964.

Cody oversaw the rapid expansion of parishes and schools; initiated an extensive building program, particularly for high schools; initiated new programs for the needy and handicapped; expanded programs for Catholic students in state universities and colleges; reorganized archdiocesan administration and finances; promoted greater lay participation through the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine and Family Life Bureau; and encouraged closer relations with Protestant and Jewish communities through Operation Understanding. Twenty-five new parishes were established during his brief tenure.

On March 27, 1962, at Cody's insistence, the desegregation of all Catholic schools for the 1962–1963 school year was announced. As Msgr. Henry Bezou later recalled, Archbishop Cody "made it clear . . . that neither gradualism nor tokenism could remain the New Orleans policy." The desegregation order unleashed a storm of protest. The Catholic school in Buras was set on fire. A small, vocal group attacked archdiocesan officials in Citizen Council meetings, mimeographed sheets, newspaper advertisements, and press releases, and staged public demonstrations. Three protesters were eventually excommunicated, not for their outspoken opposition to integration, but for their public disobedience. One, Judge Leander Perez of Plaquemines parish, was later reconciled. Despite some student withdrawals, Catholic school enrollment steadily increased in the first three years of desegregation.

Cody also implemented the initial reforms of the Second Vatican Council. Changes in liturgical practices, parish administration, lay involvement, and social outreach were soon evident. He also established new archdiocesan offices to assist an increasingly complex ministry: the Vocation Office, the Family Life Office, the Cemeteries Office, and the Building Commission. In 1965, Cody was transferred to Chicago; he died in 1982.

Hannan. Philip Matthew Hannan (1913–), a native of Washington, D.C., was ordained a priest in 1939, became Auxiliary Bishop of Washington in 1956, and was named eleventh Archbishop of New Orleans on Sept. 29, 1965. In the same year, Harold R. Perry (1916–1991), a native of Lake Charles, Louisiana, and former provincial of the Society of the Divine Word, was appointed Auxiliary Bishop of New Orleans, the first 20th-century African-American Catholic bishop.

During his episcopate, the archdiocesan social services programs grew at a tremendous rate. Christopher Homes, Inc. was established in 1966 to provide safe and affordable housing. Catholic Charities sponsored a massive refugee resettlement program for the Cubans and Vietnamese. In 1983, Second Harvesters was established to distribute food to the needy. By the late 1980s, the archdiocese was the largest single private provider of social services in Louisiana.

Parish expansion continued at a rapid rate. Thirty-one new parishes were established between 1966 and 1988: eight in New Orleans and 23 in the seven surrounding civil parishes. Eastern New Orleans, St. Tammany Parish, the west bank of Jefferson Parish, and St. Charles Parish were the centers of Catholic parish growth.

Existing archdiocesan offices were expanded and new offices such as the Office of Black Ministries and Latin American Apostolate were established. The new consultative process was evident in the establishment of an archdiocesan pastoral council, a priests' council, an elected archdiocesan school board, and several other major advisory boards. A series of town hall meetings led to an archdiocesan-wide RENEW program. The Eighth Archdiocesan Synod (1987), culminating seven years of consultation and review, promulgated a new set of policies, procedures and norms to reflect the new vision of the Church and to "renew the life of the People of God by setting forth regulations accommodated to the needs of the times."

The first archdiocesan formation program for permanent deacons began in 1972; the first class was ordained two years later. By 2001, there were 192 permanent deacons in the archdiocese. Permanent deacons minister in a variety of programs in parishes, prisons, hospitals, the Stella Maris Maritime Center, Ozanam Inn, and Project Lazarus (hospice for AIDS patients) among others.

In 1975, 80,000 attended the Holy Year Celebration in the newly built Superdome. In 1984, Vatican Pavilion was part of the Louisiana World Exposition held in New Orleans. On September 12–13, 1987, Pope John Paul II made his historic visit to the city.

Schulte. Francis Bible Schulte (1926–), a native of Philadelphia, was ordained priest in 1952, ordained Auxiliary Bishop in 1981, appointed Bishop of the Diocese of Wheeling-Charleston, West Virginia, in 1985, and elevated to the twelfth Archbishop of New Orleans on Feb. 14, 1989.

Almost immediately, Archbishop Schulte undertook a comprehensive study of archdiocesan schools. The study recommended the strengthening of the office of superintendent, the establishment of a strong middle-school program, the need to subsidize needy schools, higher and uniform teachers' salaries, uniform registration and activity fees, and the development of a marketing strategy for parochial schools. In 1991, the archdiocese's many ministries, apostolates, programs, and services were reorganized. Six departments—Clergy, Religious, Christian Formation, Community Services, Financial Services, and Pastoral Services—were created to direct and coordinate the ministries of archdiocesan offices and programs. In 1992, a new mission statement was promulgated, one that emphasized the multi-cultural composition of the archdiocesan family as well as the Church's commitment to proclaim and embody the Good News of Jesus Christ, to build a peaceful kingdom, and to be a servant to all regardless of social condition or religious affiliation.

The rapid expansion of archdiocesan parishes, schools, and social programs, the centralization and growth of administration, and the resultant growth of lay employees had placed new financial demands on the archdiocese. In 1989, the archdiocese had a $12 million external debt. In 1990, a finance council of local business leaders was established. Central accounting procedures were standardized. Departmental budgeting, reporting, and accountability were put in place. Regular internal audits of parishes and schools were initiated. A decade later, the archdiocese's external debt was eliminated, despite continued, though restrained, expansion.

In 1993, the archdiocesan bicentennial celebration included a special Mass; the publication of a volume of historical essays; an exhibit at the New Orleans Museum of Art; and a capital campaign to establish a $20 million endowment for Notre Dame Seminary, needy Catholic schools, and retired and infirm priests. The campaign surpassed its goal and was the most successful in archdiocesan history.

In 1996, the archdiocese began a five-year parish re-evaluation and planning program called Catholic Life: 2000. Each parish undertook a detailed, broad-based self-study, assessing its strengths and weaknesses in worship, word, service, and resources. These were reviewed and coordinated at a deanery and then an archdiocesan level. Catholic Life: 2000 was promulgated in 2001, charting the future of parish revitalization, transformation, and restructuring to better serve the Church and the wider community with available resources.

New Orleans has always been a cosmopolitan city; the archdiocese was no different. African Americans formed the core of the city's political leadership. More than a dozen Catholic parishes were predominantly African American. Hispanic membership was increasing in many parishes. The archdiocese's fastest growing immigrant community was the Vietnamese. In 1983, the first Vietnamese parish was established; in 1995, St. Agnes Le Thi Thanh Parish for Southeast Asians was founded in Marrero. In 2001, two national parishes and three missions served the vibrant and fast-growing Vietnamese Catholic community in the archdiocese. In 2001, Hanmaum Korean Catholic Church was opened in Metairie.

NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS

New Religious Movements is a label covering a broad spectrum of world-wide spiritual ferment that has been especially pronounced since the 1960s. Use of the expression has partially superseded the terms “sect” or “cult” in reference to non-mainline religious movements—although the latter (more pejorative) terms are still widely used in public discourse.

The discussion of new religious movement (NRMs) in this article is restricted to North America. However, NRMs are a world-wide phenomena by no means confined to the United States. A wide variety of both indigenous and imported NRMs have flourished globally in the post–World War II era, especially in Latin America, Africa, and Japan. While it is not possible to gage accurately the total number of individuals involved in these movements, the scale on which they have emerged since the 1960s is unique.

NRMs in North America vary considerably in size, in theological and organizational characteristics, and in their spiritual techniques, therapies and rituals. They can be grouped into three broad categories:

1. Movements of a non-Christian, non-Western derivation: Buddhist groups (Zen, Nichiren Shoshu, Tantrism), HARE KRISHNA (International Society for Krishna Consciousness), TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION (Science of Creative Intelligence), Meher Baba, and other Hindu-derived guru groups.

2. Christian or Neo-Christian groups: Charismatics/neo-Pentecostals, the UNIFICATION CHURCH (Moonies), groups associated with the Jesus Movement (Alamo Foundation, Children of God), the Way Ministry, the conservative/fundamentalism New Religious Right, televangelist ministries, Roman Catholic Traditionalists.

3. Religio-therapeutic self-help groups derivative of transpersonal psychology and the human potential movement that syncretistically combine traditional and eclectic elements of religious language, symbolism, and discipline (SCIENTOLOGY, est, Arica, Eckankar and various NEW AGE groups).

Aside from the above categories, NRMs have also been grouped according to leadership style, organizational characteristics, and whether or not their theologies are monistic or dualistic, world rejecting, world affirming, or world accommodating.

Although it has been common practice to refer to the above groups as “new” religious movements, many were neither new as religious phenomenon nor new to the American culture. The Hare Krishna movement was brought to the United States in 1965 by A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada. The beliefs of the movement, however, derive from a bhakti tradition founded by Sri Caitanya in Bengal, India, in the 16th century. Other Buddhist and Hindu-derived movements popularized in the 1960s had earlier penetrated American culture through the initiatives of individuals such as Swami Vivekananda, Madame Blavatsky, Soyen Shaku, Shiget-su Sasaki, Parannahansa Yogananda, and others. Ethnic-based Eastern religions had also taken root in American society long before popular interest in these traditions surfaced during the 1960s and 1970s. The New Religious Right also had clear historical lineage in early 20th century Protestant fundamentalism.

The “new” aspects of NRMs in the 1960s and 1970s applied to their unexpected growth in the face of secularization (especially the assumption that supernaturalism was outmoded and dying); the fact that many such movements—especially the counter-culture and quasi-therapeutic groups—appealed to a youthful constituency, which was predominantly middle-class, affluent, college-educated and which had not been traditionally associated with marginal religious movements; the manner in which NRMs offered religious cosmologies with unique combinations of theological or cultural elements that in themselves were familiar; and where NRMs were based on religious forms of another culture or where they expressed a radical shift in American cultural values.

Two aspects of NRMS have received widespread attention. The first concerns assessment of the social and historical factors that facilitate the rise of such movements. The second concerns explicating the dynamics of recruitment and commitment by which NRMs form and sustain their membership.

The Rise of New Religious Movements. Religious movements seem to arise where dominant religious institutions are internally unstable, where theological innovation is possible, where charismatic leadership is present, where the socio-political climate fosters religious liberty and expressiveness, and where the normative meaning and plausibility structures of a society have been weakened.

Historians generally interpreted the proliferation of NRMs in the 1960s and 1970s as a manifestation of the religious enthusiasm that periodically alters the American religious landscape. These outbreaks of religious effervescence (“Great Awakenings”) give expression to the realignment of religion and culture brought about by revitalization tendencies within religious traditions themselves, and by socio-cultural adjustments attending modernization.

The rise of NRMs has also been linked to the dynamics of secularization. According to this view, religious history is dominated by cycles rather than by a linear trend toward increasing secularity. The staying power of religion lies in the fact that individuals continue to need supernaturally based “compensators” for rewards that are scarce, inequitably distributed, or materially unattainable. Thus, most individuals do not respond to new social and cultural problems by abandoning religion, but by developing religious innovations or new religions on the ruins of the old, especially where mainline religions have moved in the direction of secularization and cultural accommodation. Viewed from this perspective, secularization is a self-limiting process that actually stimulates the rise of NRMs.

A different interpretation, more in keeping with the traditional assessment that secularization has a corrosive effect on religion, holds that NRMs are a manifestation of, rather than a response to, secularization. Counter culture and religio-therapeutic groups in particular are derided as contrived, artificial, and bizarre phenomena that point to the triviality of religion in modern society. These movements give expression to the structural differentiation of religion and to its reduction to the status of a packaged and marketed consumer item in contemporary culture. Such groups are said to manifest ritualized traits of narcissistic and obsessive self-fixation. In so doing, they mirror the powerlessness and alienation endemic in modern society. They have no formative influence on the larger culture, either because their sources of inspiration are esoteric and highly subjective, or because participants see themselves in exclusive terms and withdraw from “worldly pursuits” in an individualized quest for salvation—thus reinforcing the status quo and testifying to the waning social significance of religion in modern society. This interpretation of the rise of NRMs vis-à-vis secularization theory is not applicable, however, to movements that stress moral constraints, self-discipline, and social altruism.

Cultural Crisis. A widely accepted perspective on the rise of NRMs is the cultural crisis hypothesis. This interpretive framework focuses on the socio-cultural conditions conducive to religious change. It does not explain the appeal of particular NRMs nor differential growth rates among them.

The culture crisis hypothesis holds that NRMs flourish in response to fundamental alterations in the social and meaning structures that integrate a society. Because religious values and forms are enmeshed with the historical, cultural, and social structures through which religious self-understanding is expressed, strains and alterations in these dimensions of social reality necessarily produce strains and alterations in the religious sphere. According to this hypothesis, the rise of NRMs in the United States was functionally related to a broad value crisis and mass disaffection from the common understanding of American culture that occurred between the election of President John F. Kennedy and the collapse of the American regime in Vietnam in 1975. The trauma of the Civil Rights Movement, the atrocities in Vietnam, assassinations, and the spread of post-Watergate political cynicism, eroded core American cultural values and the structures by which they were upheld, including institutions responsible for conveying moral and spiritual values. These cultural shocks polarized Americans, delegitimized institutional authority, eroded the politico-moral ideology of American civil religion, and brought about a decisive break with the meaning of the past, especially among many idealist youth.

NRMs grew fruitfully in this cultural vacuum. In one manner or another, most NRMs emphasized the primacy of experience over creed and dogma, access to spiritual and personal empowerment, unifying values in the form of a pragmatic, success-oriented, or a syncretistic theology proposed as a new revelation, and more meaningful expressions of social solidarity and community-oriented lifestyles.

Movements such as the Unification Church and the New Religious Right responded to the culture crisis with a revitalized synthesis of political and religious themes. The "Moral Majority" and kindred groups, such as Christian Voice, Religious Roundtable, and National Christian Action Coalition, called for a restoration of moral traditionalism, a renewed sense of national order and purpose, and a reassertion of values and myths associated with the gospel of wealth, patriotic idealism, and the messianic understanding of American life and national identity.

The rapid proliferation of NRMs during the 1960s has also been interpreted as a consequence of social experimentation (not directly related to a cultural crisis) stemming from demographic and generational shifts and the new lifestyles and social arrangement flamboyantly popularized by the "hippie" counter-culture. By the 1960s, the "baby boom" and the post-World War II transformation of the American class structure had produced a burgeoning youth population whose affluence, social posture, and greater discretionary time facilitated experimentation with a wide variety of living arrangements and life styles. Widespread psychedelic drug experimentation provided an important link between the youth-oriented counter-culture and the rise of NRMs. In some instances, drug experimentation altered spiritual frames of reference and/or broke down normative perceptions of everyday reality, thereby facilitating movement into NRMs that emphasized meditative or "mystical" religious experience. In other instances (especially the Jesus Movement of the late 1960s), NRMs provided participants with a therapeutic means of kicking a drug habit.

While the precise relationship between the presence of cultural fragmentation and crisis and the rise of NRMs remains subject to debate, it is clear that the proliferation of NRMs is both stimulated and facilitated by strain in value, meaning, and plausibility structures that undergird a social order. The presence of outmoded or discredited myths, ideologies, and institutional arrangements, and the absence of meaningful community experience are key factors conducive to religious ferment.

Conversion Recruitment. Prior to the 1960s, social and behavioral science theories about participation in "sects" and "cults" focused almost exclusively on the lower-class origins of such movements and on the psycho-economic relationship between their ideology and alleged deprivations of neophytes. Sociological and anthropological studies consistently linked the rise of "sects," "revitalization movements," "cargo," and "crisis" cults to severe social and cultural dislocation. Participation in such movements was viewed as compensatory behavior that arose in response to unrest, privation, and maladjustment. Although the concept of deprivation was broadened to include social, organismic, ethical, and psychical tensions, the operating assumption continued to hold that converts to "sects" and "cults" were individuals who experienced some form of personal or cultural trauma. This assumption animates the culture crisis hypothesis discussed earlier.

Although deprivation/motivation theory remains an important insight into religious affiliation, the understanding of conversion/recruitment on the basis of the analysis of NRMs is now more nuanced, interactive, and process oriented. Deprivation/motivation has come under serious criticism because of its conceptual vagueness, reductionism, and failure to give adequate attention to the active role played by religious groups and organizations in the conversion/recruitment process. While it is true that some people will find a particular world-view more appealing than another because of their psychological or emotional state, closer attention has been drawn to issues of structural availability, to how conversion/recruitment works as a funneling process, to the role of social interaction and interpersonal bonds, to the role of participants as active seekers, and to the specific strategies by which groups mobilize resources and seek participants to achieve their objectives.

Conversion/recruitment dynamics vary across groups and among individuals. However, most studies of conversion/recruitment vis-à-vis NRMs have focused on two levels of analysis: predispositional and situational factors.

Predispositional factors are internal variables related to a convert's motivational state and prior socialization. They include the presence of "felt needs" and/or tensions in the individual, the holding of a religious problem-solving perspective, and religious-seeking incentives.

Many participants in NRMs were geographically unsettled, subjectively dissatisfied with their lives, alienated from dominant institutions, and lacking strong communal ties. Many had participated in or experimented with several NRMs before actually joining a specific one. Participants also tended to be drawn from the ranks of young adults previously socialized in mainline (and more liberal) religious traditions, but who were unchurched at the time of their NRM affiliation.

Situational factors are external variables related to the individual's interaction with the proselytizing organization. They include encountering the NRM at a "turning point" in one's life, the development (or pre-existence) of affective bonds, intensive encapsulation, and the weakening or neutralization of affective ties outside the movement.

Studies have consistently shown that NRMs that employed the establishment of affective bonds in the service of proselytizing grew more rapidly than those that did not. Movements that recruited individuals who were social isolates before joining had slower growth rates because their members failed to provide a new network for movement growth. NRMs that isolated their participants from society, or that required the severance of non-movement interpersonal ties, also grew less rapidly than those that were more fluid and open.

Studies of conversion/recruitment dynamics in NRMs also suggest that some individuals assume movement roles and participate in group activities prior to actual commitment to or knowledgeable understanding of the specific belief system. Social pressures and group encapsulation then work to intensify commitment. Conversion/recruitment under these circumstances is a socially structured event arising out of role relationships and the necessity of legitimating behavior at variance with the individual's normal social intercourse. The fact that some individuals joined NRMs quickly and with only sketchy knowledge about the group gave rise to questions about group manipulation and deception.

Other theories explain conversion to NRMs as rational choice process in which individuals assess their needs at the time and determine the balance of rewards and costs associated with a particular movement. Ambiguities over gender role identity and relationships have also been linked with NRMs involvement.

Deprogramming Controversy. Not unlike controversies surrounding new religions in earlier eras, contemporary NRMs have met with varying degrees of public hostility and opposition. Conflicts over groups such as the Children of God (The Family), the Unification Church, and the Hare Krishna movement have generally focused on allegations of financial exploitation, misrepresentation, political intrigue, authoritarian leadership, sexual impropriety, and charges that such groups utilize "brainwashing" and "mind-control" techniques both as strategies for recruitment and as a means of retaining individuals against their will. The tragic mass murder/suicide of over 900 followers of the Rev. Jim Jones in Guyana in 1978—along with other well-publicized controversies surrounding NRM leaders—stimulated anti-cult initiatives at the time.

In response to the above factors, and to youth behavior that violated parental perceptions and expectations and the cultural values of MATERIALISM, occupation competition, and achievement, anti-cult groups, such as the American Freedom Foundation, the Citizens Freedom Foundation, and the Spiritual Counterfeit Program, began forming in the early 1970s. These organizations consisted primarily of parents, NRM apostates, and professional "deprogrammers" who viewed many NRMs as dangerous expressions of intense religious commitment, zealotry, or dogmatic sectarianism.

To secure the goal of freeing individuals from "destructive cults," anti-cult organizations established informational networks, monitored NRMs, sought to educate the public through published and media material, and lobbied to gain support for their activities and legislation to curb NRM activity.

Coercive action against NRM participants was initiated under the aegis of seeking temporary guardianships and conservatorships through the legal system. More controversial extra-legal initiatives included forcible abductions and intense “deprogramming” sessions. Courts have generally been reluctant to prosecute coercive deprogramming on the grounds that such episodes involve family or parental matters.

Although anti-cult groups have had only limited success in mobilizing other institutions against new religions, they have been more successful at achieving symbolic degradation of NRMs. However, there has been little empirical evidence to show that the vast majority of NRM participants are recruited through “brainwashing” or coercive tactics, or that they were kept in movements by Orwellian-like mind-control techniques. The perception that NRMs engage in “brainwashing” has repeatedly been called in question by scholarly research and by many religious leaders. The small number of actual recruits relative to contacts and the extremely high dropout rates among groups against which such charges have been directed belie such allegations.

Religious Response to NRMs. The attitude of mainline religious bodies toward NRMs varied from active opposition, to indifference, to qualified endorsement.

Protestant conservative/fundamentalist groups took the most active role in developing a coherent and largely negative response. Literature published by these organizations assert Christian claims of exclusivism and alert individuals to the “dangers” of cults as the work of the anti-Christ.

A second approach is a more benign rejection of NRMs as a resurgence of GNOSTICISM—especially those groups that emphasize “knowledge,” mystical experiences, and freeing the divine within. These NRMs are held to be incompatible with Christianity and, in the case of those Eastern-derived religions, unlikely to become socially significant outside their own cultural milieu.

A third approach looks positively on NRMs as legitimate religious phenomena, as presenting new opportunities for inter-religious dialogue, as a challenge for self-evaluation, and as a stimulus for spiritual and ecclesial renewal within mainline religions.

On May 4, 1986, the Vatican released a report on “Sects or New Religious Movements: Pastoral Challenge” in response to mounting episcopal concern over the dramatic growth of NRMs among Catholic populations. According to the document, the spread of NRMs is not to be viewed as a threat but as a stimulus for spiritual and ecclesial renewal. Such movements are to be approached with an attitude of openness and understanding reflecting the principles of respect for the person and religious liberty laid down by Vatican II. At the same time, Catholics are cautioned against being “naively irenic.” The Church’s response to NRMs is acknowledged to extend beyond the “spiritual” to the social, cultural, political, and economic conditions from which NRMs draw their constituents. Community and parish patterns that are more caring and relevant are encouraged. Special attention is to be paid to the role of Holy Scripture, catechesis and evangelization. Forms of worship and ministry are to be relevant to cultural environments and life situations. Creativity in the liturgy, diversified ministries, and lay leadership are also called for in response to NRMs.

NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS

The New Testament, comprising 27 books, forms a unit of literature that complements the Old Testament and completes the written record of God’s revelation to mankind (see OLD TESTAMENT LITERATURE). The present division of New Testament writings is by no means chronological. Under the influence of the Old Testament division of historical, didactic, and prophetic works, a similar division was made in early Christendom for the New Testament writings, and this became stabilized at the Council of Trent (Enchiridion biblicum 59). Thus, for the historical section there are the four Gospels and Acts; for the didactic section, the 14 Epistles of Paul, the 2 Epistles of Peter, the 3 of John, the Epistle of James, and the Epistle of Jude; and for the prophetic section, the Book of Revelation (a.k.a., the Apocalypse) of John.

NEW TESTAMENT SCHOLARSHIP

Shortly after the First World War the application of the various form-critical methods to the New Testament by Karl Ludwig Schmidt, Martin DIBELIUS and Rudolf BULTMANN led to a trend in New Testament exegesis in which particular attention was paid to the different literary genres of the 27 books of the New Testament. An intermingling of historico-literary study with philosophical and theological interpretation led some interpreters to be hesitant about adopting the new methods, but their hesitancy was generally overcome in subsequent years. Within Roman Catholicism PIUS XII'S encyclical, DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1943), warmly endorsed the FORM-CRITICAL method of Biblical interpretation and supported the use of the method by Roman Catholic Biblical scholars. Shortly after World War II, within the Biblical guild itself, reservations began to be stressed about the ultimate utility of the new methods, particularly with regard to the SYNOPTIC GOSPELS where their application was most heavily concentrated.

Historicity. Some of the early form critics had suggested that the oral tradition of the Church had become so fixed and stylized that it was impossible for the traditions to say very much about the historical Jesus himself. Some of Bultmann's disciples, the so-called post-Bultmannians, also expressed a real concern for the historical Jesus. In 1953, Tübingen's Ernst Käsemann raised the issue of "the continuity of the gospel in the discontinuity of the times and the variations of the kerygma." From this concern was born a "new quest for the historical Jesus." The new quest admitted that it was virtually impossible to recover the specific details of Jesus' life and ministry, but suggested that the application of newer methods pointed to realities in his life and ministry which served as the basis for the KERYGMA, the development of the oral tradition, and subsequent theological reflection.

In addition, the radical historical skepticism of some early form critics eventually gave rise to the development of a series of criteria for determining the basic historicity of events and realities relating to the historical Jesus. The law of dual exclusion implied that the narration of events which neither served the narrow interests of the later Church nor were part of the general Jewish culture must have occurred because of historical reminiscence. The criterion of multiple attestation invoked the attestation of a tradition in different sources or in different literary forms as an indication of the essential historicity of the tradition.

Redaction Criticism. In some form-critical analyses, the stress on the formative role of tradition and the internal constraints of the literary genres themselves almost reduced the synoptists to the role of being mere collectors of community traditions. Bultmann, for example, had not included a study of the Synoptic Gospels in his classic two-volume work on the theology of the New Testament. A reaction to the potential one-sidedness of the results of form-critical study developed with the emergence of redaction criticism.

The method essentially concentrates on the role that individual authors have in shaping the oral traditions which have been handed down, as well as the editorial work done on written source material. It deals with an author's selection of material from all that is available to him, the adaptations made on the material that is used, its arrangement, as well as the material that results from an author's own creativity. Since the method concerns how an author uses material that is received, both emendation criticism and compositional analysis are part of the discipline. Its application to a given text highlights the literary uniqueness and specific thought of the text and leads to the affirmation that it was written by a person who must be considered as a real author and a true thinker (theologian).

In the study of the Synoptic Gospels, the pathfinder in the application of the new method was Willi Marxsen. His 1954 doctoral thesis, presented at the University of Kiel, Germany, examined the Gospel of MARK. Marxsen highlighted Mark's understanding of "gospel" as well as the fashion in which Mark used geographical categories (e.g., Galilee, the desert) with symbolic or theological reference. In the same year, a German professor at the University of Zurich, Switzerland, published a new study on LUKE. Translated into English, Hans Conzelmann's work had as a title The Theology of Saint Luke, but the literal translation of the German title was "the middle of time" (Die Mitte der Zeit). Conzelmann's thesis held that it was inaccurate to consider Luke, the author of the Gospel and of the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, principally as an historian. Rather Luke should be considered as a theologian with a singular vision of history. According to this vision, JESUS CHRIST stands at the center of history, with the history of Israel as His precedent and the history of the Church unfolding in the period which follows.

Life Situation. In the study of the Gospels, the use of the tools of redaction criticism required scholars to examine three life-situations in the development of the gospel tradition: the life situation of Jesus, the life situation of the Church, and the life situation of the evangelists. The new and refined concern for the historicity of the Jesus-event led scholars to consider with particular seriousness such singular events as the Baptism and death of Jesus, as well as His typical activities, e.g., casting out demons and preaching in parables. Application and development of the form-critical method itself, along with a study of the history of traditions, further clarified the life situation of the Church as the milieu which was both conservative and formative with regard to the traditions about Jesus.

The proponents of redaction criticism concentrated their greatest attention on the life situation of the evangelists. While the Gospel writers were considered to be authors and theologians in their own right, the composition of their respective Gospels was not done in a vacuum. The situation of the local churches was the milieu in which the literary-theological works of MATTHEW, Mark, and Luke were produced. Their respective Gospels were produced within specific communities, to whose problems the Gospels responded and whose theology was reflected in them.

Since redaction criticism focused on the manner in which an evangelist worked with his tradition and edited his sources, redaction critics needed to identify the literary sources utilized by the synoptists. The basic working hypothesis, even among Roman Catholic authors, who for the most part no longer held to the traditional view that Matthew was the first of the written Gospels, was that of Markan priority. Mark's Gospel was considered to be the major extant literary source for Matthew and Luke. Both of these evangelists also made use of a collection of Jesus' sayings. Q, the Sayings Source, is no longer extant, but it can be reconstituted on the basis of a comparative study of the discourse material in Matthew and Luke. Redaction criticism's interest in the editorial process thus led to a concentration of study on the Gospel of Mark and the Q source.

Perhaps the most significant features of the results of redaction-critical analyses of the Synoptic Gospels were the attention paid to the uniqueness of each Gospel and the specific theological insights of each of the evangelists. Ruled out of consideration are homogenized narratives which group together in a single construct two or more evangelical accounts of a tradition, thereby obscuring or passing over the singularly rich witness of each evangelist. In this way the traditional designation of the Synoptic Gospels, that is, "the Gospel according to Matthew (Mark or Luke)" took on a new significance.

Although the redaction-critical method was initially developed in the academic circles of the German Lutheran tradition, it was widely adopted in the world of Biblical scholarship. Within Roman Catholicism the use of the method was essentially endorsed by Sancta Mater ecclesia (April 21, 1964), the Instruction of the Pontifical Biblical Commission on the Historical Truth of the Gospels. The instruction spoke of the evangelists' selection of material, its adaptation, and placement in the respective Gospels. VATICAN COUNCIL II's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation likewise endorsed the method, especially when it stated that "the sacred authors wrote the four Gospels, selecting some things from the many which had been handed on by word of mouth or in writing, reducing some of them to a synthesis, explicating some things in view of the situation of their churches . . ." (Dei Verbum, n. 19).

The similarities that exist among the Synoptic Gospels point to some form of literary interdependence among them and provide a context for a comparative study of traditional materials. The absence of extant sources and the relative lack of possibilities for comparative study of the other New Testament texts have resulted in the methods of redaction-critical analysis being principally applied to the Synoptic Gospels among the New Testament texts.

Acts and Paul. In principle the redaction-critical method is not lacking in possibilities for fruitful analysis of the other New Testament books. The literary and historical insights gleaned from a study of Luke provide a key for a redaction-critical analysis of Acts. The possibility of comparing New Testament epistles with Hellenistic epistolary literature have highlighted the particularity of the Pauline letter and the development of an epistolary tradition, with dependence on PAUL, within the early Church.

Redaction criticism requires scholars to be particularly sensitive to the peculiarities of an individual author's thought, style, and vocabulary. Attention to these elements in the study of the Pauline corpus (Rom, 1-2 Cor, Gal, Eph, Col, Phil, 1-2 Thes, 1-2 Tim, Ti, Phlm) has led to significant developments in regard to the authorship of the epistles. The new trend is particularly apparent in the commentaries of the 1980s. Since that time a study of various thematic, stylistic, and linguistic considerations has led the majority of scholars to consider (in declining order according to the size of the majority) 1–2 Tim, Ti, Eph, Col, and 2 Thes as pseudepigraphal compositions. The remaining seven letters (Rom, 1–2 Cor, Gal, Phil, 1 Thes, Phlm) are commonly accepted as Pauline. These Pauline homologoumena constitute a critical Pauline corpus within the canonical collection of Pauline writings.

John. Elements of tradition and redaction are also to be discerned in the Johannine corpus (Jn, 1–2–3 Jn, Rv). Compositional analysis has also been usefully applied to both JOHN and REVELATION. The relationship between each of these writings and their respective ecclesial situations, especially the separation between church and synagogue, has been a major focus of attention in recent scholarship.

Manuscripts and Text. Many of the recent developments in New Testament scholarship have therefore been due to refinements in the methods of literary analysis. Alongside the methods of textual criticism, source criticism, form criticism, and the history of traditions, redaction criticism is now an integral part of the historical-critical approach to the Biblical text. Further insights into the meaning of some New Testament texts, particularly John and Revelation, have come as a result of the discovery of two major groups of ancient manuscripts.

By providing scholars with significant comparative material, the discovery of manuscripts at Nag Hammadi in 1945 and of others at QUMRAN and nearby Wadi Murabba'at in 1947 to 1956 has had significant influence on the understanding of the New Testament in recent years. The Nag Hammadi finds generally shed considerable light on the early gnosticism within which early Christianity developed and suggest possibilities as to how some Christian trajectories or trends of thought tended to develop. The Palestinian finds have clarified the real diversity of the religious situation of first century Palestine and have provided scholars with significant new insights into Jewish apocalyptic thought and ESCHATOLOGICAL expectations.

Since we do not possess any autograph copies of books of the New Testament, a first task in the historical-critical approach to the New Testament is the establishment of a Greek text of the different books. Nag Hammadi's Gospel of Thomas, a fourth-century Coptic manuscript of a text which dates from the second century, has proved to be a significant addition as a witness to the textual development of the sayings of Jesus. Other than the publication of the Bodmer papyri in the mid-20th century, there has been no discovery and publication of a New Testament manuscript to rival Tischendorf's discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus in the late 19th century.

One new development with regard to the Greek text of the New Testament has been the publication of a virtually standard edition of the text. An international committee, under the leadership of Kurt Aland of the Munster Institute for Textual Research, has produced a popular edition. The editors intended that this Greek text should serve as a basis for the various translations of the New Testament into the modern languages. Originally appearing as The Greek New Testament (London 1966) it has since been published as the fourth revised edition of The Greek New Testament (London 1993) and as the 27th edition of Nestle-Aland's Novum Testamentum Graece (Munster 1993), with but minor changes in later printings.

The historical-critical method of New Testament interpretation is the model within which most scholars work. These interpreters seek to make an "exegesis" of the text. They try to determine what an author said and meant within his own context as he wrote his texts. The several different methodologies subsumed under the historical-critical rubric attempt to elucidate an author's intended meaning by studying his language, his method of writing, and the historical, cultural, and literary circumstances within which he wrote.

The PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION'S "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church" (1993) endorsed the historical-critical method as "the indispensable method for the scientific study of the meaning. . . its proper understanding not only admits the use of this method but actually requires it." This document also offered an overview, and occasionally some criticism, of various other approaches to the study of the New Testament including the history of the interpretation of the text, its Wirkungsgeschichte.

Rhetorical Criticism. Parallel with the development of the historical-critical method is the emergence of rhetorical criticism. Depending on one's point of view, rhetorical criticism can be identified as an adjunct to the classic historical-critical method or as a particular approach within the general category of specific disciplines belonging to the historical-critical method. Rhetorical criticism is an approach that is attentive to the fact that "it is the creative synthesis of the particular formulation of the pericope with the content that makes it the distinctive composition that it is" (James Muilenburg). It concentrates on the ability of New Testament passages to persuade or convince.

Most New Testament texts were intended to be read aloud to an audience (see 1 Thes 5:27). In rhetorical-critical analysis, three levels of style are typically distinguished, according to the author's intention in communicating with his audience. The orator teaches in plain style, praises or condemns in a middle style, and moves the audience in a grand style. One element of style is lexis, the author's choice of words and his use of various figures of speech. The other element is synthesis, composition. This is concerned with the way that words are formed into phrases, phrases into clauses, and clauses into sentences.

Many New Testament scholars believe that rhetorical criticism is of limited value since it seems to reduce the various New Testament texts to the level of one-time events, thereby obscuring their meaning for modern readers. Proponents of the method retort that this charge can be leveled against form- and redaction-criticism as well. Their use of the categories of Hellenistic rhetoric draws attention to an element of the various literary forms used in the New Testament generally neglected by classic form-critical analysis, namely its ability to make an impact upon the audience. Rhetorical criticism is applied to both the literary micro genres [the Magnificat, (Lk 1:46–55), for example, can be characterized as epideictic] and the literary macro genres found in the New Testament. By the turn of the millennium, rhetorical criticism has become a sine qua non for the study of Paul's letters.

Hermeneutics. While the various form-critical methods are generally employed in academic treatments of the New Testament Scriptures, considerable reaction to the exclusive use of the historical-critical method has developed in academic and other circles. Essentially the reaction focuses on a criticism that the historical-critical method concentrates too much on the past. Its approach is diachronical, that is, it indicates how a text came into existence. It indicates what a text meant in the past, but does not indicate what a text means at the present time. Indeed there are authors who question whether it is possible to speak at all about what a text means, as if there were but a single meaning of the text, and as if this meaning were the meaning intended by the author.

This criticism is voiced, among others, by those who approach the New Testament from the standpoint of the hermeneutical theories developed by Paul RICOEUR and Hans-Georg GADAMER. There are significant differences between the hermeneutics of each of these authors, especially between Ricoeur's theory of the nature of textuality and Gadamer's dialectical hermeneutics, but there is some significant similarity in their views. Ricoeur stresses that a text enjoys a certain semantic independence, especially vis-à-vis its author. Gadamer uses the dialogue as an important analogue for the interpretation of a text.

In the view of both authors the interpretation of a text is always an historical, linguistic event. Each of them considers that a text conveys meaning insofar as it opens up a world of meaning for the reader. The understanding of a text results from the coming together of the reader's own horizon and that of the text on the basis of a shared tradition of concerns. From this point of view, the real focus of New Testament scholarship is the contemporary meaning of the text, rather than the somewhat hypothetical rediscovery of what the text meant in the past. At the very least, one must distinguish various levels of meaning of the New Testament texts.

Structural Analysis. Other critics of the exclusive use of the historical-critical methods of New Testament interpretation proposed the method of structural analysis as a useful approach to the New Testament texts. In fact "structural analysis" is an umbrella term used to cover a variety of literary methods used in an attempt to understand how a text conveys meaning. "A text does not have meaning, a text is meaningful" is the premise of the structural analytic approach.

These various methods are akin to the methods used in the contemporary study of secular literature. One stress is on the identity of a text as anything that is written. Another is on the function of language as both informative and metaphorical. Still another is the importance of paradigms as tools useful for the understanding of texts. There is no single method of structural analysis, but significant structural analytic approaches to the New Testament have been developed in France, Germany and the United States. In France, concern with the function and nature of narrative has proved helpful for an understanding of the Gospels and PARABLES OF JESUS. In the United States, the parables have frequently been studied with the aid of the newer literary methods, but Daniel Patte has demonstrated the broader applicability of the method with studies on Paul's epistles as well as the Gospel of Matthew. With the advent of the new millennium the use of structural analysis in New Testament study had receded in favor of literary approaches and various pointed readings of the text.

Narrative analysis has come to the fore as a useful method for understanding the New Testament, especially, Matthew, Mark, Luke-Acts (to be considered as a single two-part work), and John since these books are stories. As the method has been developed and used in the United States, narrative analysis draws the reader's attention to the plot, setting (time and place), and characterization that each of the New Testament authors employ. These elements serve to create a "narrative world" which the reader of the story is implicitly invited to adopt. The story conveys its meaning to the extent that a contemporary reader, the "real" reader can identify with the audience for whom the text was originally intended, the "intended" reader.

To some lesser degree narrative analysis is less fruitful for the study of the epistles, where epistolary criticism has come to the fore. Modern technology has allowed New Testament scholars to have access to many non-literary letters written about the same time as the epistles. Analysis of these letters enables scholars to better the form, function, and idiom of letters in the Hellenistic world. A. J. Malherbe's work has a major role to play in the development of epistolary criticism.

Sociological Reading. Other reactions to the historical-critical method have come from those who ask whether its presupposition that historical and literary categories provide the best entree to an understanding of the New Testament texts. Are not sociological categories equally useful? John G. Gager's Kingdom and Community: The Social World of Early Christianity (1975) was the first full-scale application of sociological concepts to early Christianity.

Contemporary sociological reading of the New Testament is quite different from the sociological approach to the Scriptures developed by the Chicago school during the early part of the 20th century. Elements of social theory and cultural anthropology are often incorporated into a sociological approach to the text. Some of the newer approaches are, even from the historian's viewpoint, relatively bias-free. Within this parameter can be considered the work of Gerd Theisse on Jesus and his disciples, using the sociological category of the wandering charismatic, and his social analysis of the church at Corinth, as well as Wayne Meeks' work on early urban Christians. What, for example, was the significance of the early Christian structural organization according to house churches? On the other hand, the Jesus Seminar has used sociological readings to portray what many scholars considered to be an extremely biased picture of Jesus.

Some sociological readings of the New Testament are, by design, engaged interpretations of the texts. To this category of sociological readings belong the materialistic, often Marxist, readings which point to elements of class struggle attested by the Scripture. Closely related would be the pastorally engaged reading of the text by proponents of liberation theology. Frequently this type of approach emphasizes the importance of the poor as a particularly significant group for whom the gospel of Jesus was intended.

Feminist Hermeneutics. During the 1980s, a FEMINIST HERMENEUTIC of the New Testament was developed. Drawing attention to the fact that the role of women seems to have been downplayed in the male-dominated cultural circumstances in which the New Testament was written, proponents of this approach take a variety of tacks. For some, the important thing is to develop a prophetic stance, thereby criticizing the neglect of women from within the Biblical tradition itself. For others (e.g., Phyllis Trible), it is a matter of drawing attention to texts overlooked or misinterpreted by male-dominated hermeneutics. A more radical, revisionist approach was taken by Elisabeth Schlusser-Fiorenza, especially in In Memory of Her (New York 1983). Schlusser-Fiorenza goes beyond the canon of the New Testament in an endeavor to show that the real situation of the early Christian faith allowed a greater role for women than the canonical New Testament texts seem to reflect. The most radical form of feminist hermeneutics rejects the authority of the Bible as the biased product of a patriarchal society.

Psychoanalytic Reading. From quite a different vantage point is the reading of the New Testament by those who approach the text from a psychoanalytic point of view. The psychoanalytic reading developed in French-speaking Europe in the 1970s and has remained basically confined to continental Europe since then. The underlying principle of the psychoanalytic reading is that nothing results from chance. Everything that is written proceeds from a definite motivation, even if this motivation lies at pre- and un-conscious levels.

The psychoanalytic reading essentially approaches a New Testament text with four different, but related, questions: How do the structures of an author's psyche relate to the production of the text at hand? What psychoanalytic categories are useful for portraying the characters, for example, in the narrative about Judas or that of the prodigal son? What is the relationship between a text and meaning, for example, in the passion and Resurrection narratives? Finally, how does the reader identify with the text; to which aspects of his psyche does the text appeal? Although the psychoanalytic reading of the New Testament has generally been limited to one or another relatively short pericope, some psychoanalytic readings of longer texts (e.g., Mk) have appeared.

Canonical Criticism. Yet another approach to New Testament scholarship is to be found in work of those who pronounce themselves in favor of canon criticism. The approach has principally developed in the United States, where a pioneering statement was made by Brevard Childs in The New Testament as Canon: an Introduction (Philadelphia 1984). The approach concentrates on a discernment of how the various materials contained in the individual books and the books themselves were rendered into Scripture. Of particular interest is a concern to deal with the effect of the canonical collection on the individual parts. It lays emphasis upon a holistic reading of the text in which the whole is the canonical collection as such.

In the hermeneutical circle of classic expositions of New Testament texts according to the historical-critical method, the whole which clarifies the parts is the entirety of an individual work or the collection of an individual author's work. In the hermeneutical circle of canonical criticism, it is the canonical collection which clarifies the significance of the parts (the individual books and their component parts). In turn, these parts help to clarify the meaning of the New Testament canon.

NEW THOUGHT

A movement embracing any form of modern belief in the practice of mental healing other than those associated with traditional Christianity. The name came into vogue in 1895 and was used as the title of a magazine published for a time in Melrose, Massachusetts, to describe a "new thought" about life, based on the premise that knowledge of the real world of ideas has marvelous power to relieve people of various ills.

History. The movement began with the work of Phineas P. Quimby (1802–66), of Portland, Maine, who practiced mental and spiritual healing for more than 20 years and greatly influenced Mary Baker EDDY, founder of CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. At first Quimby practiced unqualified mesmerism; the client would sit opposite the doctor, who then held the person's hands and looked him intently in the eye. As the patient went into a mesmeric sleep, Quimby spoke to him and talked him out of his ailment, often manipulating the affected part with hands that were moistened for greater efficiency. Later, Quimby became convinced that disease was simply an error of the mind and not a real thing, so that mesmerism could be dispensed with and equal, or even better, results assured. In time he claimed that his only power consisted in the knowledge he had that sickness is illusion and in the ability to communicate this assurance to others. In a circular addressed to the sick, Quimby thus described his own system: "My practice is unlike all medical practice. I give no medicine, and make no outward applications. I tell the patient his troubles, and what he thinks is his disease; and my explanation is the cure. If I succeed in correcting his errors, I change the fluids of the system and establish the truth, or health. The truth is the cure. This mode of practice applies to all cases."

Quimby organized no society, but persons whom he had helped adopted his method, passing it on to others with additions and changes of their own. Two of his followers, Warren F. Evans and Julius A. Dresser, gave systematic form to his ideas; they are regarded as the intellectual founders of New Thought and its allied movements. Evans published six books on the subject, of which the most significant were The Mental Cure (1869), Mental Medicine (1872), and Soul and Body (1875). According to Evans, disease has its roots in wrong belief. Once that is changed, disease is cured. A devoted Swedenborgian, he had long been familiar with the writings of G. BERKELEY and other idealists (see SWEDENBORG, E.). His own character and personal experiences further led him to a point where he was ready to apply an extreme form of idealism to the healing of disease. Dresser, cured by Quimby in 1860, began his major work in mental healing in 1882 in Boston, where Dresser and his wife, Annetta, were competing with Mrs. Eddy. When Dresser's clients were curious to learn how they had been healed, he obliged with a series of 12 class lectures, which included a study of the divine immanence and a consideration that the spiritual life is continuous, that men already live in eternity. "To realize that our real life is spiritual was to overcome the illusions of sense-experience with its manifold bondages." Dresser's son and biographer popularized his father's teaching.

Evans and Dresser remained faithful to the memory of Quimby, whereas Mrs. Eddy disclaimed all dependence on her benefactor, whom she called "an ignorant mesmerist." Mrs. Eddy's followers became organized in a tightly knit society, the Church of Christ, Scientist; the disciples of Quimby founded numerous small groups under different names, such as Divine Science, Unity, Practical Christianity, Home of Truth, and the Church of the Higher Life. Before the turn of the century, these came to be known as New Thought and in 1894 the first national convention was held. In 1908 the name National New Thought Alliance was adopted and six years later the organization became international. Its membership was extended to all the major countries of the world.

Basic Principles. Although New Thought did not substantially change after the time of Quimby, Evans, and Dresser, there was an expansion of scope to cover a broader perspective than healing sickness. The Declaration of Principles, adopted by the International Alliance in 1917, begins by affirming "the freedom of each soul as to its choice and as to belief." Accordingly no creedal profession is necessary. "The essence of the New Thought is Truth, and each individual must be loyal to the Truth he sees. The windows of his soul must be kept open at each moment for the higher light, and his mind must be always hospitable to each new inspiration.”

Allowing for a monistic interpretation of the universe, the declaration states, “We affirm the new thought of God as Universal Love, Life, Truth and Joy, in whom we live, move, and have our being, and by whom we are held together; and His mind is our mind now, that realizing our oneness with Him means love, truth, peace, health, and plenty.” In the same strain, taking monistically Christ’s words about the kingdom within us, New Thought asserts that “we are one with the Father” (see MONISM).

In keeping with Quimby’s theory of the mind’s influence, it is held that “Man’s body is his holy temple. Every function of it, every cell of it, is intelligent, and is shaped, ruled, repaired, and controlled by mind. He whose body is full of light is full of health. Spiritual healing has existed among all races in all times. It has now become a part of the higher science and art of living the life more abundant.”

Consistent with its stress on present well-being, New Thought believes that “Heaven is here and now, the life everlasting that becomes conscious immortality, the communion of mind with mind throughout the universe of thoughts, the nothingness of all error and negation, including death, the variety in unity that produces the individual expressions of the One-Life.” All this is to be understood against the background of an idealism that some have traced to G. W. F. HEGEL and others to Berkeley. “We affirm,” the declaration concludes, “that the universe is spiritual and we are spiritual beings.”

New Thought considers itself a form of Christianity, while denying the Trinity, original sin, and the divinity of Christ. It proposes instead a cosmic hypostatic union that reflects the Christology of David STRAUSS. “Every man is an incarnation of God,” New Thought teaches, “anyone who recognizes this and lives in conscious and harmonious union with Spirit, automatically becomes Christ.”

Unlike other denominations that emphasize mental health, such as Christian Science, New Thought permits dual membership; many of its adherents are active church-goers in the more liberal Protestant denominations.

NEW ULM, DIOCESE OF

Established Nov. 18, 1957, the Diocese of New Ulm (Novae Ulmae), a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS, comprises a 15-county area in western Minnesota. Alphonse J. Schladweiler, the first bishop, served for 18 years from Jan. 30, 1958, until his retirement on Dec. 23, 1975. He died at the age of 93 on April 3, 1996.

The first church in New Ulm, begun in 1858, was destroyed before completion during the Sioux uprising in 1862. Alexander Berghold became the first resident pastor (January 1869). In 1870 a second edifice was blessed in honor of the Holy Trinity. Construction of the third church (later the cathedral) was begun in 1890; the Romanesque structure was blessed in 1893. The diocese is distinctly rural. Most of the parishes are in small towns with numerous farm parishioners; some parishes are totally rural. At the time it was made a diocese, the only two cities, New Ulm and Willmar, had a combined population of more than 10,000 (1960 census).

In addition to creating the foundation for the new diocese, Schladweiler was one of the first of the U.S. bishops to respond to the appeal from Pope Pius XII to establish missions in South America. Under his leadership, New Ulm assumed the responsibility for staffing the parish of San Lucas Toliman in Guatemala. Later Schladweiler participated in all the sessions of the VATICAN COUNCIL II in Rome from 1962–1965, and after the council he was active in implementing its decrees.

His successor, Raymond A. Lucker, brought with him a national reputation in the field of religious education and pastoral ministry. Born in 1927 and ordained a priest in 1952 for the Archdiocese of St. Paul, Lucker earned a doctorate in theology (S.T.D.) from the University of St. Thomas in Rome and a doctorate in education (Ph.D.) from the University of Minnesota. He served first as assistant director, then as diocesan director of the CONFRATERNITY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE (1958–1969), and in 1966 he was named Superintendent of Education for the Archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis. In 1969 he was named Director of the Department of Education for the United States Catholic Conference in Washington, D.C., a post he held until 1971 when he was appointed auxiliary bishop in the Archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis.

In his almost 25 years as bishop of New Ulm, Lucker shaped the structures of the diocese. He shared his own vision of the modern Church through active promotion of renewal movements such as RENEW, adult faith formation, pastoral planning, and lay involvement in the life and ministry of the Church. He was the first bishop in the United States to appoint lay men and women as pastoral administrators in parishes, beginning in March, 1981. Lucker brought the diocese into the national spotlight. He attended the International Catechetical Congress in Rome in 1971, and was elected by the Bishops of the United States as a delegate to the Synod in 1977 that dealt with catechetics; he was an alternate delegate to the Synod in 1987. A pioneer in the American catechetical renewal and a strong advocate of involving laity, including women, in ministry, he was much sought after by national organizations as a speaker. He was a leader in the nationwide development of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine and was advisor to the National Conference of Diocesan Directors (later renamed the National Conference of Catechetical Leaders). He was one of the founders of the Catechetical Forum, an association of catechetical writers, professors, directors and other leaders, and was an active member of the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA. An indefatigable worker, Bishop Lucker served on the National Conference of Catholic Bishops' Administrative Committee and the committees on Latin America, Evangelization, Diaconate, Laity, Catechetical Directory, and Charismatic Renewal.

Afflicted with melanoma, Bishop Lucker resigned the see in November 2000. Less than a year later he succumbed to the disease, Sept. 1, 2001, and was buried in New Ulm.

On Aug. 6, 2001 the Most Reverend John Clayton Nienstedt, S.T.D. was installed as third bishop of the Diocese of New Ulm. Ordained a priest in 1974, he was appointed an auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of Detroit in 1996.

NEW YORK, ARCHDIOCESE OF

(Neo-Eboracensis) Metropolitan see, 4,717 square miles, comprising the boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, and Richmond, in New York City, and the counties of Westchester, Putnam, Dutchess, Rockland, Orange, Sullivan, and Ulster. The diocese was created April 8, 1808; the archdiocese, July 19, 1850. The dioceses suffragan to New York included Albany, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Ogdens-burg, Rochester, Rockville Centre, and Syracuse. These, along with Newark, Paterson, and part of Trenton, in New Jersey, made up the territory of the original see. In the first division (1847), the creation of the Dioceses of Albany and Buffalo cut off the northern and western sections of the state; in the second (1853), the new Sees of Brooklyn and Newark removed Long Island and New Jersey. Since 1861, when the boundary between Albany and New York was readjusted, the limits of the archdiocese, with the exception of the period from 1885 to 1932, when the Bahama Islands were under the jurisdiction of New York, have remained unchanged.

Colonial Period

From the time that Giovanni da Verrazano discovered New York Bay (1524), the area has had Catholic associations. The explorers Estevan Gomez and Samuel de Champlain preceded Henry Hudson in sailing both the southern and northern waters of the state.

Dutch. The Dutch settlement of New Amsterdam was only a year old when the Franciscan Joseph d'Aillon, probably the first priest to enter the state, visited the Niagara region (1627). Thereafter Jesuits established missions among the Iroquois. René Goupil became the first martyr within the confines of the state (1642); his companion, Isaac Jogues, suffered martyrdom in 1646, with John de Lalande, at Ossernenon (Auriesville). See NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS. Fathers Claude Dablon and Pierre Chaumonot built a chapel where Syracuse now stands (1655). Two years later Father Simon Le Moyne came downriver to minister to a few Catholics, both Dutch and French, in New Amsterdam, and probably to offer Mass there, on a French ship and in the settlement.

English. Apart from the converts made by the Jesuits among the indigenous peoples, Kateri TEKAKWITHA being the most famous example (1676), very few Catholics were to be found in the colony when the Dutch ceded it to the English in 1664. The former, while establishing the Reformed Church, had been mildly tolerant; the latter, especially under the Catholic governor, Thomas Dongan (1683–88), were for a time even more generous. Dongan's Charter of Libertys and Privileges granted religious freedom, thereby enabling the Jesuits who arrived about this time—Fathers Thomas Harvey, Henry Harrison, and Charles Gage—with two lay brothers to assist them, to celebrate Mass and to set up a short-lived Latin school near the present Trinity Church.

The overthrow of King James II in England and Jacob Leisler's rebellion in New York put an end to such tolerance. Penal laws, similar to those in Britain, thereafter specifically excluded Catholics from the rights of citizenship and banned their priests from the colony under pain of perpetual imprisonment and of death upon escape and recapture. In 1709 the Jesuits were forced to abandon their missions among the Iroquois, and barely a trace of Catholics, native or white, is discernible for the rest of the colonial period. John Ury, a nonjuring Protestant clergyman, suspected of being a Catholic priest and a leader of the "Negro Plot" of 1741, was executed, along with several Spanish Catholic African slaves. A number of exiled French-Acadian Catholics entered New York in 1755 but were scattered through the colony under indenture and soon lost to history as Catholics. A band of Scottish Catholics settled in the Mohawk Valley (1773) under Father John MacKenna, the first resident priest since Dongan's time. As loyalists they moved to Canada in the course of the American Revolution. Probably as early as 1775 Father Ferdinand FARMER, SJ, began periodically to visit New York City to say Mass secretly for a handful of Catholics in a loft on Water Street. Father de la Motte and other French naval chaplains, one with Washington's troops on the site of the present archdiocesan seminary in Yonkers, celebrated Mass for Catholics of the area during the Revolution. It was not, however, until the state constitution of 1777 guaranteed religious liberty and the British evacuated New York that Father Farmer could openly enter the city in 1784.

In October of the same year Charles WHELAN, an Irish Capuchin, arrived in New York where he began to say Mass in the house of José Roiz Silva, a wealthy Portuguese merchant; he became the nucleus of a congregation of about 200 Catholics. In the whole state, so the prefect apostolic, John Carroll, estimated (1785), there were about 1,500 Catholics. New York was, until 1800, capital of the republic, and the small Catholic body was augmented by official representatives of Catholic European powers, in whose houses chaplains also celebrated Mass, and by the few Catholic members of Congress. Led by Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur, the French consul, and taking advantage of a state law of 1784 permitting any religious denomination to organize as a body corporate, they set up The Trustees of the Roman Catholic Church in the City of New York. Crèvecoeur, with £1,000 advanced by Thomas Stoughton, the Spanish consul general, and the latter's business partner, Dominick Lynch, bought the unexpired leases of five lots of the Trinity Church Farm. There, on Oct. 5, 1785, the Spanish ambassador, Don Diego de Gardoqui, officiated at the laying of the cornerstone of the mother church of New York, Old St. Peter's, on Barclay Street. In the very method of its establishment, St. Peter's was to be the prototype in a half century of trustee difficulties for the American Church.

With the arrival in late 1785 of another Capuchin, Andrew Nugent, the possibility of gross abuse in the system became apparent. Nugent, with a group of trustees and parishioners, soon created a faction against Whelan which, despite a hurried visit of Carroll to New York, caused the first schism in the American Church and the departure of Whelan from the city. Although Nugent had the satisfaction of opening St. Peter's on Nov. 4, 1786, he in turn antagonized the trustees and was suspended by Carroll, who made a second visit to the city in 1787. Nugent lost his post through legal action by the trustees and was succeeded by a Dominican, William O'BRIEN.

For a decade thereafter O'Brien maintained harmony. He toured Cuba and Mexico to collect funds and furnishings for the infant church. In periodic yellow fever epidemics he ministered heroically to victims. In his time a second church, St. Mary's in Albany (1798), was built. St. Peter's free school was opened (1800), the first of its kind in New York and the recipient of public funds after 1806. Elizabeth Ann Seton, later foundress of the Sisters of Charity, was received into the Church in 1805.

Diocese

On April 8, 1808, Pope Pius VII created the Diocese of New York and appointed Richard Luke Concanen, an Irish Dominican resident in Rome, first bishop.

Concanen. Concanen, destined owing to the Napoleonic Wars never to reach his see and to die in Naples

(June 19, 1810), empowered John Carroll, now archbishop of Baltimore, to appoint a vicar-general for New York. Thus, in October 1808, Anthony KOHLMANN, accompanied by a fellow Jesuit, Benedict FENWICK, and four scholastics, arrived from Maryland as administrator. Although the two priests found St. Peter's congregation to be composed mainly of Irish-Americans, they preached in French and German as well as in English and soon attracted a flock so numerous (14,000) that on June 8, 1809, Kohlmann laid the cornerstone of the second church in the city, St. Patrick's, intended as a cathedral for the first bishop. In the same year he founded the New York Literary Institution, a college that prospered until the recall of most of the Jesuits to Maryland in 1813. In 1812 three Ursuline nuns from Ireland opened an academy and free school. In 1813 a group of exiled French Trappists started an orphan asylum in the building vacated by the Literary Institution. Again promise was abortive: the Trappists returned to France in 1814, and the Ursulines sailed for Ireland two years later. Meanwhile Kohlmann was recalled to Maryland (1815), two years after winning, in a celebrated case before the Court of General Sessions, a favorable decision respecting the seal of Confession which set a precedent in American law. On May 4, 1815, old St. Patrick's Cathedral, Mott Street, was dedicated by Bishop Cheverus of Boston.

Connolly. Six months later John CONNOLLY, who had been an Irish Dominican living in Rome at the time he was consecrated second bishop of New York on Nov. 6, 1814, arrived in his see. He found about 15,000 Catholics in a population of 100,000, only three churches, and four priests in a diocese covering the whole of New York State and the northern half of New Jersey. Compelled to act as bishop, parish priest, and curate, he succeeded in opening another free school in the basement of St. Patrick's (1816). He also introduced Mother Seton's Sisters of Charity to the city (1817), made long visitations of his diocese (1817 and 1820), and established nine additional churches. New York State was growing rapidly, becoming after 1820 the most populous in the Union. Construction of the Erie Canal (1817–25) attracted thousands of Irish laborers for whom the bishop could not provide priests. He had no seminary and noted sadly what he considered the repugnance of American youth to the ecclesiastical state. His problems multiplied when public aid for church schools was ended in 1824 on account of alleged misuse of funds by the Bethel Baptist Church corporation. Moreover, he lost probably his ablest assistant when Benedict Fenwick was withdrawn from New York by his Jesuit superiors (1817). He also had to contend with strained relations with some of his clergy, and especially with the trustees who controlled the churches. Fathers Charles French and Thomas Carbry, supporting the bishop, were in open and sometimes scandalous opposition to Fathers Peter Malou and William Taylor, who were on the side of the trustees. So acrimonious did the debate become that the trustees sent Taylor to Rome to complain against and possibly to supplant the ordinary. Bishop Plessis of Quebec was directed by the cardinal prefect of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide to visit New York (1820) and report on the trouble. The departure from the diocese of the priests who led both factions and the suspension of Malou brought an uneasy peace; but it further depleted the ranks of the clergy.

When Bishop Connolly died, Feb. 6, 1825, the diocese fell to the care of his vicar-general, John POWER, who, since his arrival from Ireland in 1819, by his moderation of the trustee dispute and by his ability generally, had won the affection of all parties and the expectation that he would succeed to the see. In the 21 months of his administration he reinstated Malou, founded New York's first Catholic newspaper, the Truth Teller (1825), built a new orphan asylum under the care of the Sisters of Charity (1826), and dedicated a third church in the city, St. Mary's (1826). The appointment, therefore, of John DUBOIS, president of Mt. St. Mary's College and Seminary in Emmitsburg, Md., as third bishop in 1826 came as a somewhat unwelcome surprise to the preponderantly Irish congregations in New York. They viewed him as a Frenchman, incapable of fluent English, and seemingly, as a former Sulpician, imposed on them by Archbishop Maréchal of Baltimore and the Sulpicians there. The new bishop's first pastoral letter (July 1827), in which he sought to refute such suspicions, got a cool reception.

Dubois. In the summer of 1828, when Dubois made a 3,000-mile tour of visitation, there were only 18 priests in his vast diocese to minister to a population of nearly 150,000 Catholics. Shortly thereafter (1829), in order to secure both priests and funds for a seminary, he journeyed to Rome and Paris. Two years later, having been unsuccessful in recruiting additions to his clergy but with about $18,000 in financial aid from the Congregation of Propaganda and the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, he was able to lay the cornerstone of a seminary at Nyack, N.Y. (1833). Within slightly more than a year the building was destroyed by fire, uninsured and a total loss. Subsequent attempts to establish a seminary in Brooklyn and in Lafargeville were equally disappointing. The trustees of the cathedral frustrated Dubois's effort (1829) to set up a school for boys under a religious brotherhood, and in 1834 they refused to accept a successor to their pastor, Thomas Levins, whom he had suspended. They even threatened to withhold the bishop's salary.

Distracted by such internal dissension, the Catholics at the same time became targets of a renascent bigotry. Already in 1824 the recently introduced Orange Society had provoked an anti-Catholic riot in Greenwich Village. Ten years later, in the same neighborhood, men of St. Joseph's Parish guarded by night the work of building their church, and in 1835 armed parishioners prevented a threatened attack on the cathedral. Editorials in the Protestant, the Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, William Brownlee's "American Protestant Association," and Samuel Morse's "Native American Democratic Association" all fomented hatred. Bishop Dubois shunned controversy, but his priests were not so reticent. John Power and Felix Varela in the Truth Teller, Thomas Levins and Joseph Schneller in the Weekly Register and Catholic Diary, and Constantine Pise in the Catholic Expositor vigorously rebutted the Protestant press. In Philadelphia, Father John Hughes was making a public mark in debate with a Presbyterian minister, John Breckenridge.

In 1837 Dubois, debilitated by his struggle with the trustees, by age, and by crippling attacks of rheumatism, accepted the appointment of this same John HUGHES as his coadjutor, with right of succession, and consecrated him in St. Patrick's Cathedral on Jan. 7, 1838. From the outset the coadjutor proved master of the situation. Long familiar with the abuses of trusteeism in Philadelphia, he successfully appealed to the congregation of the cathedral against their truculent trustees (1839) and thus dealt the system a blow from which it was never to recover in New York. In the same year Dubois resigned diocesan management to his coadjutor and entered a reluctant retirement. He died on Dec. 20, 1842. Despite the travail of his administration, the Catholic population of his diocese had risen by one-third, the number of clergy had tripled, and there had been a fourfold increase in churches. To care for German immigration, rapidly increasing after 1830, he had welcomed the Redemptorists into the diocese, encouraged the building of St. Nicholas's Church in the city, and provided a superintendent of the scattered German communities in the person of Father John Raffener.

Archdiocese

Under Hughes the See of New York, like the city itself, was to gain preeminence in America. In the two decades after 1840 about 70 percent of the more than four million immigrants to the U.S. entered through the port of New York. Many of them, Irish and Germans uprooted by famine and revolution, were Catholics who settled in the city or were drawn along the Hudson and Mohawk valleys to the cotton and woolen mills, iron and tanning industries, and construction on the Croton Aqueduct and the Hudson River railroad. In 1851 alone, 221,213 Irish landed in New York.

Hughes. For the protection of these immigrants, Hughes encouraged the formation of the Irish Emigrant Society, the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, and an immigrant commission of the state legislature. He denounced the importation of Irish secret societies, the foreignism of Young Irelanders and their radical press, as well as the too-swift Americanization advocated by such native converts as Orestes BROWNSON. He fought sectarian proselytism preying upon the immigrants' destitution, and, controversially, Catholic projects to settle them on western lands. They so swelled the population of the diocese that it was split in 1847 by the erection of the Sees of Albany and Buffalo. New York was raised to an archdiocese in 1850, and restricted again in 1853 by the creation of Brooklyn and Newark. Yet at the time of Hughes's death in 1864, the churches and chapels in this now reduced territory outnumbered by over 20 those for the whole area of 1840, and the number of priests had more than tripled. The archbishop had established St. Joseph's Seminary (1840) and St. John's College (1841), both at Fordham, N.Y., promoted the founding of the North American College in Rome (1859), welcomed the opening of Manhattan College, New York City (1853), and planned a provincial seminary at Troy.

Bishop Hughes's reputation as a formidable controversialist, already proved in the Breckenridge debate, was further publicized in sharp and sometimes bitter exchanges with Mayor James Harper, Colonel William Stone, "Kirwan" (the Reverend Nicholas Murray), Horace Greeley, James Gordon Bennett, Senator Lewis Cass, Erastus Brooks, and Orestes Brownson. In 1840, the bishop led a campaign to regain for the eight Catholic free schools of New York City a proportionate share of the common school fund. His argument before the Common Council, while unavailing, drew attention, as did his endorsement of a slate of candidates favorable to the Catholic claims in the state election of that year, to the injustice of a situation whereby the professedly nonsectarian, but actually Protestant and privately controlled, Public School Society received state funds at the same time that Catholic schools were excluded from such benefit. Two years later the state legislature, by extending the common school system of the rest of the state to the city, spelled the eventual demise of the Society. The apparent failure of the Catholics forced them back upon their own meager resources. Led by Hughes, they established 38 new free schools and academies before the end of his episcopate.

The aggressiveness of their bishop, while inspiring his socially inferior, largely immigrant, and hitherto rather supine flock, excited nativist alarm. A mob smashed the windows of the cathedral and of the bishop's house in 1842. Two years later, armed Catholics, with Hughes's encouragement, again had to defend the cathedral and themselves from a repetition of the nativist riots in Philadelphia. Anti-Catholic sentiment also accounted for the election in 1844 of James Harper as mayor on the Native American ticket, and for the origin in New York in 1852 of the Know-Nothing party (see KNOW-NOTHINGISM). The city, while fervently greeting the revolutionist Louis Kosuth in 1851, treated shamefully a papal nuncio, Archbishop BEDINI, two years later. National absorption in the issues leading to the Civil War helped to dissipate prevalent bigotry. Archbishop Hughes, who in 1846 had declined a request of President Polk that he intercede with the Catholic Mexicans at the outset of the Mexican War, readily accepted in 1861 a commission of his friend William Seward, Secretary of State, and of President Lincoln to visit Europe and there represent the Union cause. The Catholic laity of New York, largely Irish, while deprecating abolitionism, as did their archbishop, contributed impressive numbers and valorous service, particularly in New York's famous 69th Regiment, to the Union forces. Their religious communities, especially the Sisters of Charity and the Sisters of Mercy, were among the first nurses of the battlefield. Moreover, it was mainly the personal appeal of the archbishop himself, at the request of Governor Horatio Seymour, that quelled the notorious New York draft riots of 1863.

John Hughes died on Jan. 3, 1864, leaving a well-ordered archdiocese and ecclesiastical province. Improvements had been effected through the legislation of the first two New York diocesan synods (1842 and 1848) and three provincial councils (1854, 1860, 1861). Hughes had organized a diocesan chancery (1853), patronized 10 new religious communities, and rescued church property from the mismanagement of lay trustees. His flock had increased in numerical strength and by the accession of notable converts in what appeared to be an American counterpart of the Oxford movement. They had an articulate press as represented by Brownson's Quarterly Review, the Freeman's Journal, the Metropolitan Record, and Father Isaac HECKER's Catholic World. Archdiocesan charities were advanced by the founding of a pioneer conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul and the opening of St. Vincent's Hospital. A local branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith was established. The cornerstone was laid for the boldly conceived new St. Patrick's Cathedral, and the archbishop had come to be recognized as a figure of national prominence.

McCloskey. The importance of New York in the nation and in the universal Church received recognition during the next episcopate (1864–85) in the elevation of its archbishop to the cardinalate. John MCCLOSKEY—a native of New York, consecrated coadjutor to Hughes in 1844, transferred to Albany as its first bishop in 1847, and installed as fifth bishop and second archbishop of New York on Aug. 21, 1864—became America's first prince of the Church in 1875. The ceremonies of investiture of the new cardinal, and the dedication, four years later, of the new cathedral received unprecedented publicity, attesting the change in public sentiment toward the Church. This was further evidenced by the election in 1880 of William R. Grace as first Catholic mayor of the city. The cardinal, unlike his predecessor, mild-mannered and benign, stood as a public figure mainly on account of his rank. During his irenic administration the archdiocese experienced more than a double growth in the number of churches, clergy, and schools. Significantly, as immigrants raised the Catholic population of towns along and east and west of the Hudson, 58 of the 90 new churches were built outside New York City. Holy Rosary Mission was founded (1884) to minister to the large proportion of Catholics among the more than six million immigrants who debarked at Castle Garden between 1861 and 1890. To provide for Catholic Italians, arriving in steadily increasing numbers after 1880, the first church exclusively for their use was entrusted to the Pallottine Fathers (1884).

The national complexion of the clergy was also changing. Hitherto, although 107 priests had been ordained from St. Joseph's Seminary in Fordham (1840–61), a major proportion of the New York clergy was recruited in Europe, especially in Ireland. With the opening of St. Joseph's Provincial Seminary in Troy (1864–96), the 741 priests ordained there for the various dioceses of the ecclesiastical province were almost all native Americans. From 1864 to 1885 approximately 16 religious communities of priests, sisters, and brothers arrived to assist them. Charitable works increased proportionately, notably with the opening of the New York Foundling Hospital under the Sisters of Charity, the first institution of its kind in the U.S., the New York Catholic Protectors for delinquent children, Father John DRUMGOOLE's Mission of the Immaculate Virgin for homeless waifs, and a rapid multiplication of conferences of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. Elsewhere signs of confidence and maturity appeared in the founding of Hecker's Catholic Publication Society, P. J. Hickey's popular Catholic Review, and John Gilmary SHEA's United States Catholic Historical Society. Although the third and fourth diocesan synods (1868 and 1882) and the fourth provincial council (1883), which the cardinal convoked, did not effect all the executive reorganization and pastoral adaptation necessary in a fast-changing archdiocese, his untroubled administration stands in contrast to those of his predecessor and successor. Enfeebled in his last years, he relied increasingly upon the assistance of a coadjutor archbishop until his death on Oct. 10, 1885.

Corrigan. The coadjutor (since 1880), Michael A. CORRIGAN, immediately succeeded to the archbishopric. One of his first acts was to convoke the fifth New York diocesan synod (1886), the decrees of which, in 20 titles and 264 numbers, were so thorough and brought such efficiency into diocesan administration and discipline, that the four subsequent synods of his episcopate (1889, 1892, 1895, 1898) could add little to them. The Catholic population almost doubled during Corrigan's administration (1885–1902). Over five million immigrants entered the country between 1881 and 1890, followed by almost four million in the next decade, the majority now coming from Catholic sections of Europe. As early as 1886 the archbishop, in a report to Rome, noted among the foreign-language-speaking Catholics in New York City some 60,000 Germans, as many Bohemians, 50,000 Italians, 25,000 French, 20,000 Poles, and lesser numbers of French-Canadians, Spaniards, Greeks, and Lithuanians. By 1902 non-English-speaking Catholics in New York had the services of over 100 priests of their respective nationalities and more than 50 churches. The Italians alone, the largest group among them, had 50 Italian priests and 20 churches and chapels, as well as the ministrations of the recently arrived Pallottine sisters, Mother Cabrini's Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart, the Scalabrinian fathers, and the Salesians. The Blessed Sacrament fathers came to work among the French-Canadians and the Assumptionists among the Spanish-speaking. During the same period the total number of churches and chapels again more than doubled, as did the number of diocesan and regular clergy. Eight new religious communities of men and 16 of women, two of them, the Sisters of Divine Compassion and the Dominican Sisters of St. Rose of Lima, founded in New York, began work in the archdiocese. Despite the severe depression of 1893 to 1896, a model seminary, the new St. Joseph's in Dunwoodie was built. Corrigan also inaugurated a trend toward specialization in the work of the clergy by establishing the New York Apostolate, a Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, a superintendent and an association of diocesan charities, a diocesan superintendent of schools, examining boards for teachers, and school commissioners for the various districts of the archdiocese.

Catholic education was a hotly debated issue of the day. The archbishop had the satisfaction of promulgating in his synod of 1886 the instructions of the Third Plenary Council of BALTIMORE (1884) on the necessity of parochial schools. He doubled the number of such schools within his own jurisdiction and rallied New York patronage as the main support of a national Catholic summer school (1892). He viewed with distrust, as harmful to the concept and growing system of Catholic schools, such compromise solutions as the Faribault-Stillwater experiments of Abp. John Ireland of St. Paul and the POUGHKEEPSIE PLAN in operation in his own archdiocese since 1873. His conservative position on this question, and on others such as membership of Catholics in secret societies, Irish nationalism, the Catholic University in Washington, and the prevalence of a heterodox AMERICANISM, led to disagreement with other members of the American hierarchy, particularly Archbishop Ireland, and to an ecclesiastical cause célèbre in New York. Edward MCGLYNN, rector of St. Stephen's Church and long an opponent of separate schools, in 1886 actively associated himself with the mayoral campaign of Henry George, to whose radical land and tax theories he publicly subscribed. Refusing to obey the archbishop's prohibition of such political engagement, McGlynn was repeatedly suspended and eventually removed from St. Stephen's. Subsequently excommunicated for failure to account in Rome for his insubordination and his adherence to the Georgian economic theories, he and his supporters bitterly denounced the archbishop and the Roman authorities. The affair, exploited by a sensational newspaper press, focused unwarranted attention on personalities and withdrew it from more substantial and positive elements of growth of the Church in New York. Despite the furor the archbishop, characteristically, held to a routine of efficient diocesan administration. He oversaw construction of the seminary in Dunwoodie, completed the spires of his cathedral and projected its Lady Chapel, and planned, before his death on May 5, 1902, a preparatory seminary.

Farley. His successor, John M. FARLEY, auxiliary bishop since 1895, was installed as fourth archbishop of New York on Oct. 5, 1902. Astutely pursuing a policy of conciliation, dramatically emphasized in his returning from Rome in 1904 with the nomination to monsignorial dignity of eight of his priests (an unprecedented number and some of them former partisans of McGlynn), he soon overcame the residue of disunion in the ranks of the clergy. The beginning of monthly days of recollection for priests in the same year, the opening of Cathedral College as a preparatory seminary in 1903, and a doubling of the number of priests of religious communities were also to add vigor and numbers to the clergy, so necessary to cope with a still mounting population. Although before the end of his administration (1918) the trend of older residents away from Manhattan toward Brooklyn and New Jersey had begun, immigration was still to account for a rise of about 200,000 in Catholic population. In a decade (1901–10) that greeted nearly 9,000,000 immigrants, of whom 1,285,349 came in 1907, the peak year in American immigration history, Italians continued to constitute the largest segment of Catholics. Only a few months after his accession the archbishop presided at a meeting of his Italian clergy to discuss the problem. Of the slightly more than 100 new churches he established, over a third were for the care of Italian-Americans. The Holy Ghost fathers began their ministry among the African Americans of Harlem, and in 1912 Mother Drexel's Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament opened their first school for black children there.

The era also saw the ebbing of debate over Catholic education. The archbishop, created a cardinal in 1911, strongly supported the rather precarious fortunes of The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, the infant National Catholic Educational Association, and the organization of the College of New Rochelle, the first Catholic college for women in the state. While the Catholic population of the archdiocese rose by about 20 percent, church schools and their enrollments doubled in number; two priests were appointed superintendents of parochial schools. Approximately 2,000 Catholic teachers in the public schools were united in an association called The Workers for God and Country. Other signs of vitality appeared in the publication, under the auspices of Dunwoodie Seminary, of the highly respected New York Review (1905–08), the first scientific Catholic theological journal in the U.S., and the Catholic Encyclopedia (1907–14), largely under the cardinal's patronage. These years also marked the corporate conversion of the Anglican Friars and Sisters of the Atonement, the beginning of the laymen's retreat movement, and public celebration of the centenary of the diocese. The Lady Chapel of the cathedral was completed and the entire edifice solemnly consecrated. The Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (MARYKNOLL) established its headquarters and seminary in the archdiocese; and the local Society for the Propagation of the Faith was reconstituted and contributions to the missions rose from a few thousand dollars annually to over a quarter of a million by 1918. An attempt to coordinate all other charities of the archdiocese in an organization known as the United Catholic Works was arrested by the outbreak of World War I.

Before Cardinal Farley died, Sept. 17, 1918, the entrance of the U.S. into the war tested the resources of the archdiocese. The cardinal founded the New York Catholic War Council, which sponsored a soldiers' and sailors' club, a women's Catholic patriotic club, and a Catholic hospital for shell-shocked patients. His auxiliary bishop (since 1914), Patrick J. HAYES, was appointed by the Holy See bishop ordinary of the U.S. army and navy chaplains (1917). He so effectively recruited and organized the corps of Catholic chaplains that by the end of the war there were 1,523 priests, in five vicariates, under his jurisdiction. Of the 1,023 Catholic chaplains already commissioned by Nov. 11, 1918, the 87 from New York formed a contingent more than twice as large as that from any other diocese. Bishop Hayes also made personal appeals in behalf of the Liberty Loans and was a director of a Knights of Columbus drive that raised nearly $5 million for work among servicemen.

Hayes. On March 10, 1919, in the same year that a fellow native of New York's lower East Side, Alfred E. Smith, became the first elected Catholic governor of the state, the former auxiliary was named to the See of New York as its fifth archbishop. Five years later he received an enthusiastic reception, replete with tickertape parade from the Battery, when he returned from Rome a cardinal. During the 19 years of his administration the Catholic population of the archdiocese fell from over 1,250,000 to about 1,000,000. This was the result of the gradual decline in immigration during the 1920s and a sharp drop during the Depression years of the thirties, as well as an accelerated exodus of Catholic families to metropolitan areas beyond his jurisdiction. The number of churches, nevertheless, increased by one-sixth; schools, by one-half; and the clergy, by one-third. Charitable institutions and services had continued to multiply, often with overlapping and duplication of activity and at the expense of economy and efficiency. Three months after his accession the new archbishop announced a detailed survey of the more than 200 welfare agencies of the archdiocese, and in the following year he coordinated them all under a secretary for charities, at the head of a corporation entitled Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New York. The new organization was commended by the New York State Board of Charities (1920) as “the most significant and important event of the year in the field of charitable work.” It quickly assumed a position of leadership among private welfare organizations throughout the country and served as a model for other dioceses. Supported by a special gifts committee of the laity and an annual parish appeal that soon netted over $1 million yearly, Catholic Charities successfully met the challenge of the severe financial depression following the stock market collapse of 1929 and earned for its founder the popular title Cardinal of Charity.

Never a dynamic public figure, the cardinal spent the last years of his life in semiretirement. He did, however, introduce the Catholic Youth Organization to the diocese (1936), patronize the literature committee that bore his name, and promote a Catholic theater movement. The heart ailment which seriously restricted his activities eventually resulted in his death, Sept. 4, 1938.

Spellman. The appointment of Francis J. SPELLMAN, the auxiliary bishop of Boston, as the sixth archbishop of New York on April 15, 1939, shattered two precedents. He was the first archbishop of New York in 100 years who had not been closely associated with his predecessor, and he was a significant figure in the American hierarchy even before his appointment to New York. As a result of his friendship with both Pope Pius XII and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, as well as his own intelligence, energy and ambition, Spellman became the most important archbishop of New York since John Hughes and the most influential American prelate since James Cardinal Gibbons. As expected, he received the Cardinal’s red hat at the first postwar consistory on Feb. 18, 1946.

Once installed as archbishop on Sept. 8, 1939, Spellman moved quickly to modernize and centralize the organizational structure of the archdiocese. He immediately refinanced the diocesan debt of $28 million through bankers in New York and Boston, saving the archdiocese $500,000 per year in interest payments. In short order he introduced a central purchasing agency, a diocesan insurance office and a diocesan building commission. He also reorganized the chancery office, matrimonial tribunal and administrative offices of the archdiocese, housing them in an elegant mansion across the street from St. Patrick’s Cathedral. Spellman’s centralizing policies ended the autonomy that pastors had enjoyed under Hayes. Although

Spellman compensated them with a lavish bestowal of papal honors, he deliberately remained an aloof and impersonal figure to his priests. For the day-to-day administration of the archdiocese, he relied heavily on the services of James Francis McIntyre and later John Maguire, both of whom in turn were appointed coadjutor archbishops without the right of succession.

Spellman played an important role on both the national and international scene. He was instrumental in persuading President Roosevelt to appoint a “personal representative” to the Holy See on Dec. 23, 1939. Spellman’s responsibilities as Military Vicar for the Armed Forces (an appointment he received on Dec. 11, 1939) increased dramatically following the entry of the United States into World War II. Thereafter the Military Ordinariate became one of the largest dioceses in the world with several million military personnel and their families and some 5,000 full- and part-time chaplains. Throughout the era of the Cold War Spellman remained an outspoken foe of Communism both at home and abroad. His ecclesiastical influence was further enhanced because New York City was the headquarters of important national agencies such as Catholic Relief Services, the Catholic Committee on Refugees, the Bishops’ Resettlement Committee for Refugees, the Catholic Near East Welfare Association and the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.

The advent of World War II forestalled any large-scale building projects in the archdiocese, but, even before Pearl Harbor, Spellman managed to establish two new parishes, install a new main altar in St. Patrick’s Cathedral, relocate the minor seminary and begin a system of diocesan high schools. After the war the archdiocese embarked upon a major expansion of its infrastructure. Between 1939 and 1967 enrollment in Catholic schools almost doubled on the elementary level (to 179,052) and almost tripled on the high school and college levels (to 49,842 and 27,949 respectively). Spellman spent several million dollars renovating St. Joseph’s Seminary, adding a new library and gymnasium. Catholic Charities also experienced a major expansion of its 200 member agencies as well as the construction of a dozen new hospitals, homes for the aged and child-caring centers. The New York Foundling Hospital, one of Spellman’s favorite charities, was moved to a modern facility, and St. Vincent’s Hospital developed into a full-fledged medical center.

After declining during the 1920s and 1930s, the Catholic population of the archdiocese almost doubled during the Spellman years from c. 1,000,000 to 1,848,000. Much of the increase was due to the influx after World War II of over 600,000 Puerto Rican immigrants, who transformed many of the traditional Catholic ethnic neighborhoods into solidly Hispanic enclaves while the older residents joined the flight to the suburbs. To meet this major pastoral challenge, Spellman established an Office of Spanish Catholic Action and made a major commitment of diocesan clergy. By 1961 the archdiocese had over 200 Spanish-speaking priests and approximately one-third of the parishes were providing religious services in Spanish.

After Vatican II (1962–1965), Spellman dutifully implemented the liturgical changes although he deplored them privately as “too many and too soon.” He also divided the archdiocese into six vicariates, established an elected Senate of Priests and agreed to the creation of two experimental parishes headed by a team of priests. One of Spellman’s proudest moments occurred on Oct. 4, 1965, when Pope Paul VI made a one-day visit to New York City and celebrated Mass in Yankee Stadium before a crowd of 92,000 worshippers. In the fall of 1966 (at the age of 77) he offered the pope his resignation, but it was refused. During the 1960s the Civil Rights movement and the Vietnam War, together with the impact of Vatican II, led to a period of unprecedented turmoil for American Catholics. By the time of Spellman’s death on Dec. 2, 1967, the successful synthesis of Catholicism and Americanism that he once epitomized no longer seemed adequate to the needs of the day.

Cooke. The appointment on March 8, 1968, of Terence J. COOKE as the seventh archbishop of New York was a surprise to many knowledgeable observers. A native New Yorker only 47 years old, Cooke was the youngest of the 10 auxiliary bishops and (with the exception of Hughes and Corrigan) the youngest ordinary ever appointed to New York. His selection was widely attributed to the influence of Spellman with whom he had been closely associated for the previous 10 years. Like Spellman, Cooke was also appointed Military Vicar for the Armed Forces (April 4, 1968) and was made a cardinal (April 28, 1969).

Cooke received his baptism of fire on the day of his installation, April 4, 1968, when the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., touched off riots throughout the country. That evening Cooke went to Harlem to plead for racial peace. He played little role in national or international affairs, except as chairman of the U.S. Bishops’ Committee on Pro-Life Activities where he worked vigorously to combat abortion. However, he concentrated his attention on his own diocese, providing two much needed skills, managerial ability and pastoral sensitivity. An affable man who preferred conciliation to confrontation, he was also the master of the soft answer that turns away wrath but concedes nothing. A born micro-manager, he used his detailed knowledge of the inner workings of the archdiocese to administer carefully the available financial resources. Critics complained that his financial expertise was not matched by long-term vision, but his non-confrontational style of leadership spared New York the ideological polarization among the clergy that occurred in some other dioceses.

During Cooke’s years as archbishop, the population of the archdiocese remained virtually the same, but only because Catholic immigrants, predominantly Hispanic, continued to replace the dwindling number of middle-class white Catholics. The sacramental statistics indicated an abrupt decline in religious practice. Infant baptisms fell from 50,219 in 1967 to 32,168 in 1984, and church weddings declined from 15,511 to 10,208. For the first time in history there was a sharp drop in the number of both diocesan priests (from 1,108 to 777) and diocesan seminarians (from 501 to 238). Under Spellman the number of parishes had increased by 34; under Cooke there was a net gain of only four parishes. In order to utilize better the diminishing resources, Cooke established the Inter-Parish Finance Commission, which levied a tax on all parishes and then used the income to subsidize the poorer parishes. By 1979 the total funds disbursed amounted to a whopping $26 million. As a result only 49 of the 305 parish elementary schools were forced to close despite a massive decline in enrollment (from 179,052 in 1967 to 89,853 in 1984) and the mass exodus of 3,257 of the 4,130 sisters from the classrooms.

Cooke consolidated the administrative offices of the archdiocese in a new Catholic Center on the East Side of Manhattan, established the Office of Pastoral Research, opened the St. John Neumann Residence for seminarians, founded the Archdiocesan Catechetical Institute, and organized the Inner-City Scholarship Fund, which provided subsidies of over one million dollars per year to minority students (two-thirds of them non-Catholic) in parochial schools. Sensitive to the demographic changes in the archdiocese, he appointed the first black and Hispanic auxiliary bishops, created the Office of Black Catholics and supported the Northeast Center for Hispanics. As Military Vicar he discreetly defended U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War and also continued Spellman’s practice of frequent visits to troops overseas.

Not all of the leadership in the archdiocese came from the top. In South Bronx, the poorest Congressional district in the United States, as crime, arson and the abandonment of buildings engulfed 20 square miles of the borough in the early 1970s, parish priests and religious organized community action groups and sponsored urban renewal projects to stop the decline. Jill Jonnes, the historian of the Bronx, wrote in 1986: “The Catholic Church quietly emerged as the institution most committed to preserving and resurrecting the benighted South Bronx. Not one church or Catholic school was closed.’’ In 1979, when the newly-elected Pope John Paul II made a two-day visit to New York City, he overrode the security concerns of the police and stopped in both Harlem and the South Bronx before celebrating Mass in Yankee Stadium.

On Aug. 26, 1983, after a secret eight-year struggle with cancer, Cooke revealed to the public that he was terminally ill. After his death on Oct. 6, 1983, large crowds filed past his bier and attended his funeral in tribute to the inspiring way that he had faced death. The New York Daily News commented: ‘‘[He] showed us all how to pass from time to eternity with courage and grace.’’

O’Connor. Cooke’s successor was John J. O’CONNOR, a native of Philadelphia, who was appointed the eighth archbishop of New York on Jan. 31, 1984. He had served in the Military Ordinariate as auxiliary bishop to Cooke from 1979 until 1983 when he became the bishop of Scranton. Prior to that, he had spent 27 years as a navy chaplain, rising to Chief of Chaplains with the rank of Rear Admiral. O’Connor was made a cardinal on May 25, 1958. On that same day the Military Ordinariate was separated from New York, ending a personal connection that had existed under the three previous archbishops since 1917.

Despite his 64 years, O’Connor adopted a busy schedule that he maintained almost to the end of his 16 years in New York. He preached virtually every Sunday in St. Patrick’s Cathedral and made frequent pastoral visits throughout the archdiocese as well as numerous trips to Rome. Unlike Cooke, he adopted a high profile and signaled his intention to give New York the same national prominence that it had enjoyed under Spellman. Unlike Spellman, however, who relied on personal political and business connections, O’Connor made deft use of his communications skills to influence public opinion through the media. An admirer of the feisty John Hughes, the first archbishop of New York, O’Connor seemed to welcome public confrontation over controversial issues like abortion. The New York Times, often a critic of O’Connor, grudgingly admitted in 1998 that he was ‘‘perhaps the one person in New York with a platform to rival that of the mayor’’ and shortly before his death acknowledged him as ‘‘the de facto leader of American Catholics.’’

Between 1984 and 2000 the Catholic population of the archdiocese increased from 1,839,000 to 2,407,393, constituting 45% of the total population. However, the number of baptisms remained virtually the same and the number of marriages declined by a quarter. The ethnic, economic and social diversity of the archdiocese was remarkable. One rural parish in Dutchess County contained 50,000 acres of private land for fox hunting, while in one Bronx parish 58% of the people lived below the poverty level. Mass was celebrated in at least 22 languages every Sunday with 135 of the 413 parishes providing Mass in Spanish. Hispanic Catholics included not only Puerto Ricans, but also Dominicans, Mexicans, and natives of many Central and South American countries. A new phenomenon was the influx of Asian Catholics from Korea, China, Vietnam and the Philippines. Immigrants from Albania, Palestine, Portugal, Haiti, and even an increase in immigration from Ireland, added to the ethnic mix.

The enrollment in the 303 Catholic elementary and high schools remained steady at around 100,000, with almost half of the students (many of them non-Catholics) coming from minority groups. The archdiocese also remained a major provider of health care and social services with 17 hospitals, three health care facilities, 17 homes for the aged, 14 child-caring institutions, and 129 social agencies operated by Catholic Charities. ‘‘They provided the best social services that were available,’’ said Mayor Edward Koch. The staffing of parishes and schools became increasingly difficult since O’Connor in his later years was reluctant to close or consolidate them despite the decline in the number of diocesan priests (from 777 in 1984 to 563 in 2000), teaching sisters (from 873 to 236) and teaching brothers (from 93 to 60). On a more positive note, two new religious communities were founded, the Franciscan Friars of the Renewal and the Sisters of Life, and the number of permanent deacons increased to 310.

O’Connor offered his resignation to the pope upon reaching 75 in 1995, but it was refused. That year Pope John Paul made his second visit to New York and celebrated Mass in Central Park with 125,000 people in attendance. In late August 1999 O’Connor underwent surgery for a brain tumor from which he never recovered and died on May 3, 2000.

Egan. The appointment of Edward Egan as the ninth archbishop of New York was announced on May 11, 2000, only eight days after the death of Cardinal O’Connor. A native of Oak Park, Illinois, Egan was ordained in Rome as a priest of the archdiocese of Chicago on Dec. 15, 1957. He returned to Rome to earn a doctorate in canon law and later to serve as a judge of the Roman Rota from 1971 until 1985. In that year he was appointed auxiliary bishop of New York where he served as the Vicar for Education until his appointment as the bishop of Bridgeport on Nov. 8, 1988. He was installed as archbishop of New York in St. Patrick’s Cathedral on June 19, 2000, and was made a Cardinal on Feb. 21, 2001.

The bloody event of Sept. 11, 2001 made a lasting impact on the people of New York City, when Islamist terrorists in two hijacked commercial airplanes attacked the twin towers of the World Trade Center with a tremendous loss of lives. Every parish church held impromptu services and more formal services on September 14, a national day of mourning. Some parishes in New York City and the suburbs suffered the loss of dozens of parishioners and celebrated memorial Masses for victims whose bodies were never recovered. An estimated 90% of the almost 400 police officers and firefighters who lost their lives in the collapse of the twin towers were Catholics. Among them was Fr. Mychal Judge, OFM, the fire department chaplain, who was killed by falling debris while ministering to the dying. For weeks afterwards the crowded churches testified to the searing impact of the atrocity on the souls of all New Yorkers.

Like Spellman in 1939, one of Egan's main priorities was the restoration of the financial condition of the archdiocese, a task that he had already accomplished in the diocese of Bridgeport. In keeping with his goal of reducing the debt by $20 million over a two-year period, he consolidated the seminary faculties, streamlined the administrative offices of the archdiocese, closed a few ailing schools, reduced the weekly diocesan newspaper to a monthly, and gave clear indication of the need for further economies.

NEW YORK, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The eleventh of the original 13 states to ratify the U.S. constitution (1788), New York is bounded on the north by Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River, and Canada; on the east by Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut; on the south by New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Atlantic Ocean; and on the west by Pennsylvania, Lake Erie, and the Niagara River. New York's capital city is Albany; other major cities, in addition to New York City, the most populous metropolitan area, are Buffalo, Rochester, and Syracuse. In 2001 New York's population was 18,589,886, second largest in the nation, of whom 7,396,485, about 40 percent, were Catholics. There were eight dioceses. In addition to the metropolitan see of NEW YORK CITY, they were Albany and Buffalo, Brooklyn and Ogdensburg, Rochester and Rockville Centre, and Syracuse.

Early History. Long before New York became known as the Empire State, it was the home of a mighty confederacy of Native American tribes made up of the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas. This union of tribes was known to the French as the Iroquois and to the English as the Five Nations (later Six when the Tuscaroras joined in 1715). Successful in dominating the other Native American tribes of the area, they also terrorized European settlers and missionaries and exercised an important influence on the colonial history of this area.

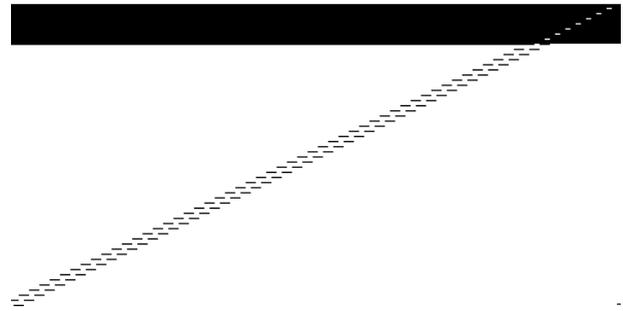

The first Europeans to come into contact with the Five Nations were the French, who occasionally sent vessels up the Hudson to trade with the Native American after the discovery in 1524 of New York Bay and the river by Giovanni da Verrazano, a Florentine in the service of Francis I of France. By July 1609 French efforts to lay the foundations of New France and to spread Christianity had penetrated to Lake Champlain, thereby arousing the hostility of the Iroquois, who for years thereafter held the balance of power between the English and the French in America.

In September 1609, Henry Hudson, an English mariner employed by the Dutch East India Company to search for a new passage to the East Indies, entered New York harbor in the Half Moon and followed the river that bears his name as far north as the present site of Albany. On the basis of this claim, the Dutch colony of New Netherland was founded in 1624, when the first permanent settlers consisting of about 30 families, mostly Walloon, arrived. The population had grown to 200 or more by 1626, when the government of the province was fully established with power vested mainly in a director-general and council. Soon after, Manhattan Island was purchased from the Native Americans for 60 guilders ($24), and Ft. Amsterdam was erected at its lower end and the settlement there made the seat of government. Although the charter of 1640 declared that “no other Religion shall be publicly admitted in New Netherland except the Reformed . . . ,” these Dutch Calvinists were less virulent in their opposition to Catholicism than their New England brethren. In fact, Isaac Jogues, SJ, was rescued from the tortures of the Iroquois by the Dutch at Ft. Orange and brought to New Amsterdam in the fall of 1643, where he was kindly received by Gov. William Kieft (see NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS). Nevertheless, the paucity of Catholic settlers—Jogues found only two in the town—continued during the entire period of Dutch rule despite the fact that the total population of the province increased from 2,000 to 10,000 between 1653 and 1664.

Colonial Period. New Netherland passed into the hands of the English when, in March 1664, Charles II erected it with additional territory into a province and awarded it to his brother, James, Duke of York, who became its lord proprietor. The conquest of the Dutch colony was completed without fighting when, on September 8, Gov. Peter Stuyvesant formally surrendered to the English. This marked the beginning of brighter prospects for Catholic settlement in the province henceforth to be known as New York. The conversion to Catholicism in 1672 of the royal proprietor, the future James II, was soon reflected in the directives he issued for the government of his American domain. In 1682 he appointed a Catholic, Col. Thomas Dongan, as governor and instructed him to accede to the long-standing demand of the colonists for a representative assembly. When the new governor arrived in New York in August 1683, his party included an English Jesuit, Thomas Harvey, who was later joined by two other priests and two lay brothers of his society.

Dongan, an administrator of considerable ability, lost no time in summoning the assembly that in October 1683 passed the bill of rights that he had proposed. This Charter of Liberties and Privileges, containing a guarantee of entire freedom in religion, placed the Catholic governor of New York with Roger WILLIAMS, the CALVERTS, and William PENN as the chief promoters of religious freedom in colonial America. During the remainder of Dongan’s term of office, the various denominations had their respective houses of worship, and the little Catholic chapel in Ft. James was the first site where Mass was regularly offered in New York by the Jesuits who ministered to the relatively few Catholic settlers. It was Dongan’s plan to counteract the influence of French missionaries by seeking additional English Jesuits to take up work among the Native Americans to the north, an area that he felt rightly belonged to the British crown. But his official career was brought to an end before the English Jesuits could carry out the policy regarding the Native Americans of New York.

After the English revolution of 1688 and the accession of William and Mary, the American colonies were thrown into a ferment of excitement. In New York, the German-born Calvinist Jacob Leisler led an armed rebellion in May 1689, which ushered in a reign of terror. The policy of religious toleration in New York was soon replaced with restrictive measures against Catholics; the former Governor Dongan was hunted as a traitor, and the Jesuits were compelled to flee the colony. With the establishment of the Church of England by law in four of the leading counties of New York in 1693, the long dark night of penal legislation descended upon the few Catholics who were courageous enough to remain in the province. Although Leisler was removed and executed in 1691, anti-Catholic legislation continued to be multiplied under Henry Sloughter, the new governor, and his successors. An act of 1700 made it a crime for a priest to be found in New York, and anyone who harbored a priest was subject to a fine of 200 pounds. Perhaps no other single incident better illustrates the intensity of colonial anti-Catholic rancor than the reception accorded the Acadians, or “French Neutrals,” expelled from their homes in 1755 and distributed among the colonies from Massachusetts to Georgia. Of the quota sent to New York, the adults were bound out as indentured servants and the children assigned to Protestant families. Unquestionably this persecution and proscription of Catholics in the colony not only sufficed to keep their numbers from increasing but also tended to discourage any who might have possessed the faith from announcing the fact. These dismal conditions were to obtain until after the Revolution, and Mass was not celebrated in a public manner until offered by the chaplains of the French troops who were sent to aid the colonies in their struggle. Meanwhile, affairs in the colony generally were concerned chiefly with the defense of the northern frontier and the rising disaffection of the colonists with the English government's colonial policy.

Revolutionary War. The quickening spirit of rebellion against the mother country's political and economic measures undoubtedly drew increased strength from the prejudice aroused by the passage of the QUEBEC ACT in June 1774. In colony after colony, pulpit and press warned that the "popery act" that secured for Canada freedom for the exercise of the Catholic religion was a serious menace to colonial Protestantism. The first colonial flag run up in New York in place of the English colors bore on one side the inscription "George III-Rex. and the Liberties of America.—No Popery." It is small wonder, then, that Catholics found their position a difficult one, faced as they were with the dilemma of deciding on which side to cast their lot as the colony moved to make common cause with the revolutionists. On July 9, 1776, the delegates to the New York provincial congress adopted the Declaration of Independence and formally committed the province to the rebel cause. Undoubtedly the Catholic colonists were aware that many of the most vigorous opponents of the British policy of coercion had been the bitterest persecutors of "papists." On the other hand, their experience with the British government offered little hope for religious liberty or anything like political and social equality. In the end the greater number of Catholics chose to cast in their lot with the revolutionists and only a few of them joined the loyalist group. The patriotic part played by American Catholics in the revolutionary struggle and the aid of Catholic France and Spain marked a weakening of the anti-Catholic bias. However, when Congress advised the several states to adopt constitutions, the New York convention meeting for that purpose at Kingston on March 6, 1777, adopted an amendment to the naturalization clause, proposed by John Jay, which effectively excluded foreign-born Roman Catholics from citizenship. Not until 1806 was this offensive clause abrogated. Nevertheless, the period of Catholic proscription was drawing to a close; and when on Nov. 25, 1783, the British forces finally evacuated New York City, such Catholics as were in the city at the time began to assemble once again for the open celebration of their religion.

Institutional Growth. In the years that followed the War for Independence, and especially in the early 19th century, remarkable gains were made in the social and economic fields, the extension of agriculture, the development of manufactures, the growth of commerce and transportation, and the improvement of educational facilities. Companies that acquired land grants from the state encouraged systematic colonization of the Iroquois country, drawing settlers from Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and elsewhere in the state. The need for laborers to build the great inland waterways, the Erie and the Champlain-Hudson canals, in the time of Governor De Witt Clinton (1817–21; 1825–28), brought a flood of immigrants from Ireland, Scotland, England, and Germany. Their descendants settled the towns and cities that grew up along the canals, and in turn drew others into the region. Thus the population of the state grew from 340,120 in 1790 to almost two million in 1830, and there were a goodly number of Catholics among the new immigrants, notably the Irish.

When Baltimore was raised to the status of an archbishopric in 1808, New York was one of the new suffragan sees. Its territory included all of New York state and the upper half of New Jersey. The first division of the diocese was made in 1847 when the northern and western sections of the state were cut off to create the dioceses of Albany and Buffalo. Bishop John MCCLOSKEY, then coadjutor bishop in New York, became the first bishop of Albany (1847 to 1864 when he returned to New York City as archbishop). The Reverend John TIMON, Superior of the Congregation of the Mission (Vicentians) and sometime missionary in Texas, was named the first bishop of Buffalo. In 1850 Pope Pius IX made New York a metropolitan see and named Bishop John HUGHES as the first archbishop. Boston, Hartford, Albany, and Buffalo were its suffragans. Two more dioceses were carved out of the archdiocese of New York in 1853, Brooklyn and NEWARK, New Jersey. The Reverend John Loughlin was named the first bishop of Brooklyn, and the Reverend James Roosevelt BAYLEY (a nephew of Elizabeth Bayley Seton), the first bishop of Newark (and later, the eighth Archbishop of Baltimore). The diocese of Rochester was separated from Albany in 1868 with Bishop Bernard J. MCQUAID the first ordinary. Four years later in 1872 Ogdensburg was made a diocese. About the time that Syracuse was made a diocese in 1886, the Bahama Islands were placed under New York's jurisdiction because access was thought to be easier than from Charleston, South Carolina, which formerly had jurisdiction. The diocesan structure of the state of New York remained unchanged from 1886 until 1957, when Rockville Centre was separated from Brooklyn.

For much of the 19th century, the Church in New York depended on priests from Europe to staff the national parishes that were being established to serve different ethnic groups, but early on the bishops of New York endeavored to establish their own seminary. Bishop Dubois built a seminary at Nyack-on-Hudson in 1833, but it burned down just as it was ready to open. After several other abortive attempts, Bishop John Hughes opened St. John's Seminary in 1841 at Fordham, then a village outside the city. In 1864 the students were moved to St. Joseph's Provincial Seminary in Troy, New York. Before it closed in 1896 it educated more than 700 priests. The poor living conditions at the Troy seminary caused Bishop McQuaid to open St. Bernard's Seminary in Rochester in 1893, and in 1896 Archbishop Corrigan established St. Joseph's Seminary in the Dunwoodie section of Yonkers. The Dunwoodie seminary gained a reputation as an intellectual center of American Catholicism. From 1905 to 1908, its faculty were major contributors to the New York Review, the leading Catholic theological publication in the country, and to the Catholic Encyclopedia (1907–12).

Immigration picked up momentum again after the Civil War. Beginning in the 1880s immigrants from Italy and Slavic lands came in increasing numbers. By the turn of the century, there were an estimated 400,000 immigrants in the archdiocese of New York alone, and Buffalo had a number of large Polish parishes. French-Canadians emigrated from Quebec to settle in upstate New York around Cohoes and Plattsburg. But the flood of immigrants also stirred a new wave of anti-Catholic bigotry. In the 1850s Archbishop John Hughes openly confronted the Know-Nothing movement so that it did not have the impact in New York that it had elsewhere in the country. In 1855 the state legislature passed a statute that prohibited Catholic bishops from holding title to property in trust for the churches and ecclesiastical institutions, but it was quietly repealed after the Civil War began. Later in the century, however, the National League for the Protection of American Interests (N.L.P.A.I.) made an effort to deny government funds to Catholic schools and charitable institutions.

The legacy of the N.L.P.A.I. continued. Several city and state investigative committees submitted Catholic social agencies to close scrutiny in the years before World War I. In 1916 the bishops organized the New York Catholic Conference, the first such organization in the U.S. It provides a forum for the exchange of information between dioceses on social issues and matters of concern to the Church. The Conference enables the dioceses of the state to present a unified position with regard to existing legislation and public policy. After the war Archbishop Patrick J. HAYES (1919–38) took steps to reorganize Catholic Charities and set professional standards for social welfare that were widely imitated by other dioceses.

Despite restrictive laws in the 1920s, immigration continued during the years between WWI and World War II. As Catholics increased in numbers they came more and more to exercise political influence and public policy. Alfred E. Smith, the first Catholic presidential nominee of a major party, was known for his efforts to bring about reforms during his four terms as governor of New York (1919–20; 1923–28). Catholic social agencies collaborated in welfare programs during the depression, and individual Catholics like Dorothy and John LAFARGE were prophetic voices speaking against war and racial discrimination.

In the wake of World War II, the Church experienced many changes. There was an influx of Puerto Ricans into the city of New York. The GI Bill created a whole new clientele for colleges and universities, and thus caused Catholic institutions to expand both physical plants and academic programs. The growth of the suburbs, at the expense of the size, economy, and social make-up of the urban centers, impacted on the Church in the cities. As the urban congregations dwindled in size and number, dioceses were forced to build new parishes and schools in the suburbs. The Diocese of Rockville Centre was an example of the change. The Catholic population, predominantly white middle class, almost tripled between the time it was split off from the diocese in Brooklyn in 1957 to 2001 growing from 497,000 to 1.4 million.

Catholic Education. Alongside the free elementary schools, provided as early as 1633 during the period of Dutch control, and higher education that had its beginning with the founding of King's College (Columbia) in 1754, the Church gradually developed an extensive network of elementary schools, high schools, and colleges. At the beginning of the 21st century, there were 29 Catholic universities and colleges in the state, many of which were located in the metropolitan region of New York City. Jesuit-run Fordham University (1841) was the first Catholic institution for higher education in New York, and the College of New Rochelle (established 1904 by the Ursulines) was the first Catholic college for women chartered in the state. Other prominent Catholic universities in the state include ST. BONAVENTURE UNIVERSITY (sponsored by the Franciscans), St. John's University in Jamaica, NY and Niagara University (both sponsored by the Vincentians), Manhattan College in Bronx (sponsored by the De La Salle Brothers), Iona College in New Rochelle (sponsored by the Irish Christian Brothers), and Canisius College in Buffalo (sponsored by the Jesuits).

NEW ZEALAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located 1,180 miles south of Australia, New Zealand, which forms part of OCEANIA in the southwest Pacific Ocean, comprises two major islands—North Island and South Island, separated by the Cook Strait—as well as smaller islands that include Stewart, Chatham, Bounty, Antipodes, Auckland, Campbell and Kermadec islands. A mountainous region, the islands also contain areas of low plains at the coast. The climate is temperate, although conditions vary throughout the islands. Mild earthquakes are commonplace occurrences and volcanic activity infrequently occurs. Natural resources include natural gas, iron ore, coal, gold and limestone, while agricultural products consist of wheat, barley, potatoes, fruits, vegetables and wool.

The region was discovered and named by the Dutch explorer Abel Tasman in 1642. Captain James Cook visited and mapped the area from 1769. New Zealand, which became a British colony in 1840, was granted responsible government in 1856. In 1907 it became a self-governing state in the British Commonwealth. The southern sections were settled systematically from the British Isles, and in recent years the government has made efforts to address the mistreatment of Maori natives during and since the region's colonization. In 1994, the government began paying compensation to Maori tribes whose lands were seized after the Waitangi Treaty of 1840. Approximately 80 percent of the population live in urban areas.

Catholic Origins and Growth. The original people of New Zealand were the Maori, called tangata whenua, or “the people of the land,” who inhabited the islands from 800. By the time the first British colonists arrived c.1800, there were some 100,000 Maori on the islands. British Protestant missionaries began working with success among the Maoris in 1814. By 1830, 1,000 Europeans, mostly of British origin, lived in the region. The Vicariate Apostolic of Western Oceania, created in 1836, included New Zealand and was entrusted to the MARIST FATHERS (SM), and Bishop Jean Pompallier became the first vicar apostolic. After Pompallier learned from Bishop John Polding of Sydney, Australia that Thomas Poynton, his family, and about 20 other Catholics were living in the far northwest of New Zealand, he traveled to Poynton's house on the Hokianga. In 1839 he transferred his headquarters to Kororareka, the chief port for whaling ships.

In February of 1840 the Treaty of Waitangi signified the agreement of 46 Maori head chiefs to recognize the suzerainty of Queen Victoria, in return for the preservation of land and tribal rights. Despite the treaty, land was illegally seized from the Maori throughout the next century, leading to the Anglo-Maori wars from 1860–72. Many Maori also lost their hunting and fishing rights, leaving them without a means of support. Meanwhile, French Marists made progress among the Maoris, and by 1843 there were 12 mission stations in the country.

The Vicariate of Western Oceania was divided in 1842 to create the Vicariate of Central Oceania, including New Zealand. In 1846 Philip Viard, SM, was consecrated coadjutor to Pompallier and laid the cornerstone of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Auckland, where Pompallier made his headquarters after Hone Heke's rebellion in the far north (1845–46). Pompallier's differences with Marist superiors led Rome to divide New Zealand in 1848 into the dioceses of Wellington and Auckland. Viard and the Marists were given Wellington, the southern region. In 1850 Pompallier returned to Auckland from Europe with ten clerics and eight Sisters of Mercy from Carlow, Ireland.

From 1859 North Island suffered from land disputes between Europeans and Maoris, followed by warfare in Taranaki and the Waikato. During and after these wars British soldiers, among them many Irish Catholics, were demobilized and settled in the country. The ensuing Hau Hau outbreaks, extending to the east coast, lasted until 1871, when they were crushed with the aid of friendly tribes. The Maori missions went into an almost total eclipse until their revival in 1881 under the Marists in the south and the MILL HILL MISSIONARIES in the north. Bishop John Luck of Auckland (1882–96), an English Benedictine, reorganized the Maori mission in his diocese.

Gold discoveries in 1861, combined with the absence of hostile Maoris, led to the rapid development of Otago and Southland. Many of the numerous immigrants were Irish miners who came from Australia. D. Moreau, SM, founded the Dunedin mission on South Island in 1861. In 1869 Otago and Southland were formed into the Diocese of Dunedin. The first bishop was Patrick Moran (1869–96), former vicar apostolic of the Eastern District on the Cape of Good Hope, South Africa, who arrived in 1871 with a priest and ten Dominican sisters from Dublin. When Moran encountered strong anti-Catholic sentiments in heavily Presbyterian Otago, he took the offensive. During his episcopate he created a Catholic school system, began construction of a Gothic cathedral and started The Tablet, a Catholic weekly that flourished through the 20th century.

The diocese of Christchurch on South Island received its first resident priest c. 1840 at the French settlement of Akaroa. The town of Christchurch, colonized in 1850 as an Anglican settlement, lacked a resident priest until 1860. Catholics opened their first primary school in Auckland in 1841 and their first secondary school in Northcote, Auckland, in 1849. In 1887 the diocese of Christchurch was created; it included the provinces of Canterbury and Westland, the latter province being transformed by gold discoveries after 1865. John Grimes, an English Marist, became the first bishop (1887–1915). He was notable for his organizing ability and devotion to the liturgy. Besides establishing a good Catholic school system, he completed a new cathedral by 1905. Holy Name Seminary was opened in Christchurch in 1947.

The Modern Church

On Sept. 26, 1907, New Zealand became an independent nation under the British Commonwealth. Under a series of liberal governments from 1891–1911 and again during World War II, the region became increasingly known for its socialist policies and its state-administered education and social welfare programs. In the mid-1970s the government began a program to quasi-nationalize selected parochial and other private schools and in 1984 began a major economic restructuring in an effort to build a globally competitive free market economy. By the 1990s the region entered an economic downturn that resulted in social welfare cutbacks, the end of free education and the end of free socialized health care, although by the end of the 20th century New Zealand boasted a strong international market for its goods and low inflation.

Catholic Basilica viewed from cemetery, Wellington, New Zealand. (©E.O. Hoppi/CORBIS)

Since the time of its founding in the 19th century and through the 20th century, the Church experienced steady if unspectacular growth. In 1980 the dioceses of Hamilton (carved off the southern portion of Auckland Diocese) and Palmerston North (carved off the northern portion of Wellington Archdiocese) were established, thus creating five dioceses in the country. When New Zealand acquired Tokelau as an overseas territory, these Pacific islands were placed under the Archdiocese of Wellington, but were later made a mission sui juris.

The Effects of Vatican II. In the years following the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) the bishops implemented the Council's decrees. The participation of laity in programs of adult formation, including those of the National Center for Religious Studies, teaching in Catholic schools and in other social support groups, was conspicuous. On the other hand, some felt that Catholics lost a depth of devotion as a result of Vatican II, citing a decrease in Sunday Mass attendance, the lack of regular devotions such as the rosary and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, the increased number of mixed marriages and irregular unions, and the growing indifference of the New Zealand population in general. Some who feared the loss of Catholicism joined local chapters of Catholics United for the Faith, while others joined the St. Pius X Society and were served by priests of that society (see LEFEBVRE, MARCEL).

After Vatican II the Church entered into a theological dialogue with the National Council of Churches and worked with it on the Interchurch Commission for Immigration and Refugee Resettlement and the Ecumenical Secretariat on Development. From these flowed ecumenical endeavors, often in industrial, prison and other chaplaincies. The Church was a founding member of the new Conference of Churches of Aotearoa-New Zealand in 1987, and established bilateral dialogues with the Anglican, Presbyterian and Methodist churches, as well as annual meetings.

While some changes in the Church were responses to Vatican II, others were the result of a decrease in number of priests and religious, particularly in urban areas. Priests under age 40 were rare by the end of the 20th century and priests under 50 a significant minority. Vocations to the priesthood also fell off to a great degree. Religious shared the problems of old age and scarcity of vocations with the general clergy. Age and the integration of schools removed many from the classroom, and some turned to ministry as pastoral assistants in parishes, counselors, youth directors, visitors of the sick and other apostolates. Several Catholic hospitals closed down, but the involvement of the religious in rest homes for the elderly remained a fruitful and needed apostolate. Over 300 New Zealand missionaries, clergy, religious and lay people worked abroad helping in evangelization, working in the Pacific, as well as Asia, the Americas, and Africa.

The Church and the Maori. A national resurgence within Maoridom dating back to the early 20th century received new impetus after World War II, especially as the Maori became more urbanized and educated. The injustices suffered by the Maori since the Treaty of Waitangi were revisited, and a reinterpretation of that treaty made with the intention of righting legal wrongs, especially with regard to land and fisheries dispossession. The Church remained at the forefront of this movement through episcopal statements and peace and justice commissions, as well as in work done in conjunction with other churches.

The New Zealand bishops encouraged the appointment of the first Maori bishop, Takuira Mariu of the Society of Mary, to a Maori congregation in 1988. The bishops also established a national Maori runanga, or council, with representatives of Maori lay, religious and clergy. The council supported and advised the New Zealand Catholic Bishops' Conference on all matters relating to the pastoral care of Maori people.

Besides the indigenous Maori people, new immigrants added much to the New Zealand Catholic identity. Many immigrants after World War II were European Catholics. In the late 20th century an influx of Pacific Islanders, especially from Samoa, created the need for special chaplaincies similar to those required for other ethnic groups after World War II.

Evolving Church-State Relations. While New Zealand was organized in provinces, most provinces subsidized denominational schools. After the abolition of the provinces in 1876, the central government canceled this aid and organized a national system of free, secular and compulsory schools, in 1964's Education Act noting that while teaching should be of a secular character, religious instruction and observances were allowed in state schools. Under the constitution, Catholic-run primary and secondary schools received no support from the state except for a few fringe benefits. With passage of the Integration Act of 1975 the government integrated financially troubled Catholic schools into the state system, providing staff salaries, equipment, general running costs and maintenance while allowing the Church the freedom to run the schools as they chose. Much effort was put into managing the massive debts contracted to bring over 250 of the country's schools up to the maintenance standard demanded by the state before obtaining the designation of an "integrated school." In addition, lay teachers, now the majority, required formation in theology and spirituality in order to preserve the special character of Catholic schools. Financially sound Catholic schools continued to operate as before.

The government's efforts to socialize the economy and social system led to an increase in unemployment and a reduction of state pensions and resulted in the greatest disparity between rich and poor since the 1930s. In 1993 the bishops questioned the government's economic and social policy in the "Statement of Intent." In addition, the Church worked to alleviate the misery and hunger of many through social agencies and parish foodbanks.

In November of 1986, Pope John Paul II visited New Zealand, receiving a traditional Maori welcome in Auckland, and participating in an ecumenical service in Christchurch. The pope addressed the country repeatedly in the following decade, warning the New Zealand Church to avoid becoming corrupted by modern secular culture. However, the New Zealand Bishops' Conference continued its tradition of liberal positions, in 2000 advocating both contraception use for teens who insisted upon being sexually active and a government plan to grant homosexual couples the same legal rights as married couples. Both positions drew strong opposition from conservative Catholics in New Zealand, as well as from the Vatican.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 279 parishes tended by 369 diocesan and 250 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 180 brothers and 1,185 sisters, many of whom participated in operating the 192 primary and 47 secondary schools run by the Church, as well as aiding in other social service endeavors. Most numerous among male orders were the Marist Fathers, Marist Brothers, the Redemptorists and the Trappists. Women religious included the Sisters of Mercy, the Congregation of Our Lady of the Missions, and the Sisters of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart. As the New Zealand Church looked toward the future, its major concerns included the increasing ill effects of a secular society, the incursions made by Pentecostal and other evangelist sects and the treatment of the Maori people. Despite their reported church affiliation, a poll taken in 1997 reported that one fourth of all New Zealanders admitted actively adhering to no religion.

NEWARK, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Also known as Novarcensis; a metropolitan see comprising Essex, Hudson, Bergen, and Union counties in the northeastern part of New Jersey. It is the smallest of all the dioceses in the 50 states (513 sq. miles). The archdiocese is divided into 235 parishes and missions. Catholics comprise about 50 percent of the total population of 2.8 million, placing Newark as the seventh largest U.S. see in population. The Province of Newark, coterminous with the state of New Jersey, includes the suffragan dioceses of Trenton, Paterson, Camden, and Metuchen.

Administration. Before the erection of Newark as a separate diocese suffragan to New York in 1853, Catholics of the northern counties of New Jersey belonged to the New York archdiocese, while the southern half of the state was included in the Diocese of Philadelphia, PA. The religious history of New Jersey in the colonial period and the early republic was largely Protestant, although small groups of Catholics were ministered to by Jesuit missionary priests, among them Ferdinand FARMER, Lorenz GRASSEL, and Leonard NEALE, and six parishes were established in various parts of the state in the period between 1814 and 1827.

With the advent of thousands of German and Irish Catholic immigrants into New Jersey towns, the Holy See erected Newark as a diocese on July 29, 1853, and included in its jurisdiction the entire state of New Jersey with its 40,000 Catholic inhabitants. In 1881, 14 central and southern counties were detached from Newark when the Diocese of Trenton was erected. On Dec. 9, 1937, Pius XI divided Trenton into the Sees of Trenton and Camden, and the two northern counties of Passaic and Morris were removed from the Newark jurisdiction and assigned to the newly erected Diocese of Paterson. The following day, December 10, Newark was raised to the status of an archdiocese.

Bayley. James Roosevelt BAYLEY, a convert to Catholicism, served as first bishop of Newark from 1853 to 1872, when he was named archbishop of Baltimore. His episcopate in Newark was devoted largely to the founding and staffing of religious institutes of every kind. The diocesan priesthood was augmented, and the beginnings of an educated Catholic laity were provided by the establishment of Seton Hall College (now University) in South Orange, NJ in 1856. This institution included the major Seminary of the Immaculate Conception from 1862 to 1927. The Benedictines, Passionists, Conventual Franciscans, and Jesuits were the earliest men's orders brought into the diocese to assist the diocesan clergy. A new community of Sisters of Charity was formed by Bayley in Newark in 1859, moving its headquarters to Convent Station the next year. Other early communities of sisters who engaged in teaching, hospital, and orphanage work were the Benedictine Sisters, the School Sisters of Notre Dame, the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of St. Joseph, and the Dominican and Franciscan Sisters. The Brothers of the Christian Schools entered the diocese to conduct boys' classes in a number of the parish schools.

Corrigan. The second bishop, Michael Augustine CORRIGAN, was vicar general of the diocese when he succeeded Bayley in 1873 and served until 1880, when he was transferred to New York. Faced with numerous financial problems at Seton Hall and in the parishes, Corrigan raised funds and donated large sums from his family estate. He introduced additional religious communities, including the Second Order Dominican Sisters, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, and Franciscan Brothers.

Wigger. A native of New York, Winand Michael WIGGER, was ordained for the Newark diocese and engaged in parish work until he was named third bishop of Newark in 1881, a position he retained until his death on Jan. 5, 1901. During his administration he unsuccessfully backed a school aid bill in the assembly (1892–93) to give state aid to parochial schools. Under his direction, work was begun on the new Cathedral of the Sacred Heart, on ground purchased by Bayley. By 1901 the number of Catholics had increased to 300,000 and priests totaled 265; of these 75 were religious.

John Joseph O'Connor. Having been born in Newark, June 11, 1855, and ordained in 1877, the fourth bishop taught at Seton Hall and at the seminary, and served as seminary rector, vicar general, and pastor, until his appointment to the episcopate in 1901. He headed the Diocese of Newark until his death there on May 20, 1927. During his 26-year episcopate, additional funds were raised to continue work on the new cathedral. In 1926, the major Seminary of the Immaculate Conception was moved to Darlington.

Thomas Joseph Walsh. Newark's fifth bishop and first archbishop was born Dec. 6, 1873, at Parker's Landing, PA, and was ordained for the Buffalo, NY diocese in 1900, where he was chancellor until appointed bishop of Trenton in 1918. He was transferred to Newark in 1928 and served as its first archbishop from Dec. 10, 1937 until his death on June 6, 1952. He initiated a campaign for a new seminary building and chapel at Darlington (1936), organized the Mt. Carmel Guild to supervise social work, and in 1951 founded an archdiocesan newspaper, the Advocate. He also began a drive in 1950 for funds to complete Sacred Heart Cathedral and initiated work on the building's interior.

Thomas Aloysius Boland. The second archbishop was born in Orange, NJ, in 1896 and ordained in 1922. He taught at Seton Hall and the Darlington seminary and served as chancellor, auxiliary bishop (1940), and bishop of Paterson (1947–53), before being installed as archbishop of Newark on Jan. 14, 1953. Under him, Mt. Carmel Guild was reorganized in 1954 and its work extended to aid the blind, the deaf, and other handicapped groups. Serra International was introduced in 1954 and the sodality movement organized on an archdiocesan level in 1957. The Cathedral of the Sacred Heart, which is French-Gothic in design, was consecrated on Oct. 19, 1954. In 1961 a development campaign was inaugurated to provide eight new high schools, four homes for the aged, and a philosophy house at the major seminary. By 1964 there were 1,177 priests, including 358 religious, serving the archdiocese, as well as 3,244 sisters and 205 brothers.

Peter Leo Gerety. Gerety was named the third archbishop on April 2, 1974. He was born in Shelton, CT in 1912; both of his parents were natives of New Jersey. He studied theology at St. Sulpice Seminary in Issy, France, and was ordained in 1939. After serving in parish and hospital ministry, he became director of an interracial social and religious center from 1942 to 1956, when the center became St. Martin de Porres parish and he was named pastor. He was involved in the Black Apostolate for 24 years, chairing the Hartford Archdiocesan Committee on Human Rights as well as the Ecumenical Commission. In 1966 he was ordained co-adjutor bishop of Portland, ME, and succeeded Bishop Feeney there in 1969. When he became archbishop of Newark in 1974, he faced the challenge of a $26 million dollar debt inherited from his predecessor. By January 1984 this debt was paid, and new structures were put into place to assure the proper administrative and financial support of the pastoral ministry in the archdiocese. Some programs begun under his leadership, such as RENEW and Ministry to Divorced and Separated Catholics, became national models. Archbishop Gerety retired in July, 1986.

Theodore E. McCarrick. McCarrick was appointed the fourth archbishop of Newark in July 1986, after serving as the founding bishop of Metuchen, NJ since 1981. He grew up in New York City and was educated at Fordham University and St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie. After his ordination in 1958, he was assigned as an assistant chaplain at Catholic University of America, where he proceeded to earn a doctorate in sociology in 1963. He became president of the University of Ponce in Puerto Rico in 1965, and returned to New York in 1969 to head the Office of Catholic Education and serve as personal secretary to Cardinal Cooke. In 1977 he was named auxiliary bishop in New York, and in 1981 he became the first bishop of the diocese of Metuchen, NJ. In 1990 he successfully conducted a $50 million dollar capital campaign which helped to endow a number of archdiocesan programs. He also invited the neocatechumenate to start Redemptoris Mater House of Formation to train seminarians for the missionary-diocesan priesthood. Most of the archdiocesan offices were brought together in a new archdiocesan center at a site across from the Sacred Heart Cathedral in Newark, which was named a basilica by Pope John Paul II at the time of his visit in October 1995. In 1999 Archbishop McCarrick launched a campaign for stewardship in every parish to encourage individuals to give their time, talent and treasure in a spirit of discipleship. The results of this campaign are being shared with needy parishes. In November 2000, Archbishop McCarrick was named archbishop of Washington, DC, and was made a cardinal by Pope John Paul II on Feb. 21, 2001.

John Joseph Myers. Myers became the fifth archbishop of Newark on Oct. 9, 2001, after serving 11 years as bishop of Peoria, IL. He was raised in the Peoria diocese and was ordained after his theological studies in Rome in December 1966. He served for a year in the United States Catholic Conference and completed his studies for a doctorate in Canon Law at Catholic University in Washington, DC. After serving in various parish and chancery ministries, he was ordained co-adjutor bishop in 1987 and acceded to the See of Peoria on Jan. 23, 1990.

Institutional Development. In addition to Seton Hall University, conducted by the archdiocesan clergy and lay faculty, the archdiocese contains St. Peter's College, Jersey City, conducted by the Jesuit Fathers, Caldwell College, conducted by the Dominican Sisters of Caldwell, and Felician College in Lodi, conducted by the Felician Sisters. Besides its main campus at South Orange, Seton Hall also operates the School of Law in Newark.

The archdiocesan major seminary was relocated from Darlington, near Ramsey, to the campus of Seton Hall University in October 1984. A pre-theology program and four years of theological studies are provided for seminarians from the archdiocese, including those in the neocatechumenate, and for several other dioceses and religious orders. The minor seminary, Seton Hall Divinity School, has been located on the South Orange campus of Seton Hall since 1862.

In 2001 there were 37 secondary schools in the archdiocese, with a total student enrollment of 16,047. Parish elementary schools numbered 132 with an enrollment of 40,474. There are eight Catholic hospitals in the archdiocese: St. James's and St. Michael's, in Newark; St. Elizabeth's Hospital, in Elizabeth; St. Mary's, in Hoboken; St. Francis's, in Jersey City; St. Vincent's, in Montclair; St. Mary's, in Orange; and Holy Name, in Teaneck. There are seven homes for the aged, and 114 health care centers.

Catholic Community Services includes among its activities the Mount Carmel Guild Behavioral Healthcare System with offices in all four counties. C.C.S. also coordinates the Apostolate with the Developmentally Disabled and the Deaf, along with the Prison Ministry and Ministry to People on the Move (Airport and Seaport Chaplaincies).

NEWBATTLE (NEWBOTTLE), ABBEY OF

Former CISTERCIAN abbey in the county of Midlothian, old Diocese of Saint Andrews, Scotland (Neubottle, i.e., a new dwelling). It was founded by DAVID I and his son Henry, Nov. 1, 1140, and dedicated to St. Mary; it was the first daughterhouse of MELROSE. Its later acquisitions included a coal mine and a quarry, which provided the monks with a useful source of income. The abbey was badly damaged by the English in 1385, 1544, and 1548. In 1560 its abbot, Mark Ker, subscribed to the reformed religion and secured the abbey's properties for his son. The east range of the abbey is now incorporated into Newbattle Abbey College.

NEWDIGATE, SEBASTIAN, BL.

Carthusian priest, martyr; b. Harefield Place, Middlesex, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), June 19, 1535. Sebastian was the well-born younger son of the king's sergeant John Newdigate and the heiress of John Nevill of Sutton in Lincolnshire. After completing his education at Cambridge, he joined Henry VIII's court and became an intimate of the king. After the death (1524) of his wife, he placed his daughter Amphelys in the care of others and entered the London Charterhouse of the Carthusians. On June 6, 1534, he signed the Oath of Succession with the addendum "in as far as the law of God permits." He was arrested (May 25, 1535) for denying the king's supremacy, and bound in irons in a standing position for 14 days at the Marshalsea Prison. There Henry made a personal plea for Sebastian to conform in exchange for riches and honors. Following his refusal, Newdigate was brought before the Privy Council, then sent to the Tower, where Henry again visited him. After his trial (June 11), he was returned to the Tower. He was executed with BB. William EXMEW and Humphrey MIDDLEMORE. Newdigate was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY

Apologist, theologian, cardinal; b. London, Feb. 21, 1801; d. Birmingham, England, Aug. 11, 1890.

Life

He was the eldest of the six children of John Newman, an unsuccessful London banker, and Jemima Foudrinier, the daughter of a well-to-do middle-class French Protestant paper manufacturer. The other children in order of birth were Charles Robert (1802), Harriet (1803), Francis (1805), Jemima (1807), and Mary Sophia (1809). Newman entered the private boarding school at Ealing in 1808. Although his life at home had been warm and happy, in 1816 the bank with which his father was associated failed, and from then on the family was in reduced circumstances. Newman's sisters were sent to their grandmother, but he continued at Ealing. This event profoundly affected the entire family; the father died in 1824.

As a Protestant. Newman's early religious orientation was toward Calvinism and Fundamentalism. In 1816, however, shortly after the failure of the bank and the subsequent catastrophe at home and apparently in connection with an illness that profoundly disturbed him, Newman went through a five-month period that he later referred to as conversion. At that time a friend introduced him to Thomas Scott's The Force of Truth and Milner's Church History. The first convinced him of the divinity of Christ, and the second introduced him to the Fathers of the Church of the 4th and 5th centuries. He concluded that God willed him to lead a life of celibacy. There was apparently a complete change in the vision he had of himself. The nature of this spiritual crisis is somewhat obscure, but he emerged from it as a different person. He considered the experience to have been a turning point in his career. He gained a profound awareness of the presence of God. The beginnings of an intellectual foundation for his moral convictions stem from this period. He emerged with a love for the Fathers of the Church and a fear and abhorrence of Rome and the papacy, which seem to have come from his reading of Newton's On the Prophecies. His new insights produced certain basic contradictions that would engage him for the next 30 years.

University Life. Newman matriculated at Trinity College, Oxford, in December 1816 and took up residence there the following June. While there, he made the acquaintance of John William Bowden, who was to be his close friend and frequent support until Bowden's death in 1844. He and Bowden undertook the publication of a literary magazine called The Undergraduate in 1819. Newman won a scholarship at the end of his first year and gained a reputation as a student. In the schools examination in November 1820, to the surprise of all, he failed to achieve honors in either the mathematical sciences or the classics. He retained his scholarship, however, and determined to stay on at Oxford until he would take Holy Orders.

Newman tried the schools examination at Oriel in 1822 and was elected a fellow at Oriel on April 12 of that year. It was there that he met Edward Bouverie PUSEY, Richard WHATLY, Edward Copelston, Edward Hawkins, and Thomas Arnold. He was ordained deacon on June 13, 1824. The following October his father died.

Newman accepted the curacy of St. Clement's, which he retained until his appointment as public tutor of Oriel in 1826. He was ordained as an Anglican priest May 29, 1825. He served as public examiner in classics in the B.A. degree for the university in 1827–28 and was given the vicarage of St. Mary's, the university church, in 1828. He served as the university select preacher (1831–32) and that same year relinquished his college tutorship.

When Richard Hurrell FROUDE was elected to a fellowship at Oriel in March 1826, he and Newman became close friends. In 1832 Newman accompanied him on a Mediterranean cruise needed for Froude's health. Then, while traveling alone through Europe, Newman was beset by long and dangerous illness in Sicily. During his convalescence he made several trips to Catholic shrines and churches in Europe; it was on his return to England that he wrote his famous poem "Lead Kindly Light."

Oxford Movement. Shortly after his return (July 1833) to England the question of disestablishment of the Anglican Church was introduced before Parliament. Newman, Froude, John KEBLE, and William PALMER threw themselves into the task of writing tracts and dissents of the church. The following December the Tracts for the Times began to appear. Of these, there were eventually 90, of which 26 were written by Newman.

The Tractarian movement, with Newman at its head, evoked considerable criticism on the part of both the bishops and the priests of the Church of England. Hurrell Froude took as active a part in the movement as he was able, suffering as he was from tuberculosis, which forced him to live away from England. Froude died in the beginning of 1836, a serious loss to Newman, who depended on him for support in the OXFORD MOVEMENT, as the Tractarian movement came to be called, as well as for his spiritual insights and warm friendship.

The next few years were a time of tremendous intellectual activity for Newman. He was engaged in writing the tracts as well as preparing the sermons he preached at St. Mary's, later published as the Parochial and Plain Sermons. In 1838 he became the editor of the British Critic, a magazine that was a platform for expression for those members of the Anglican Church who had Catholic sympathies. It was at this time too that Newman began his serious studies of the Fathers of the Church. Following his famous Tract 90, which was an attempt to interpret the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England in a Catholic sense, he was censured by the authorities of the University of Oxford as well as by 24 bishops of the Anglican communion. As a consequence, in 1841 Newman retired to Littlemore, part of the parish of St. Mary's. Having refurbished a small stable and several outhouses, in which he and several companions lived according to a daily rule of life, he began a life of prayer and fasting for the purpose of clarifying his opinions about the Church Catholic. In 1845 he wrote his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine and made the decision to become a member of the Roman Church. He was received into the Roman Catholic Church by Dominic BARBERI, an Italian Passionist, on Oct. 9, 1845, in the small private chapel at Littlemore. Many of the companions living with him in Littlemore became Catholics at the same time, but Keble, Pusey, and Newman's own family remained members of the Church of England.

As a Catholic. Newman and his convert companions left Littlemore in February 1846. They took up residence at the old Oscott College, renamed Maryvale by Newman. It was near the residence of Bp. Nicholas P. WISEMAN, who was then living at the new Oscott College not far from Maryvale. Wiseman took on the direction of the new community, and through his encouragement Newman decided to become a priest of the Roman Catholic Church. He and Ambrose St. John, one of his Littlemore companions, left England for the College of Propaganda in Rome in September 1846. There they had their first introduction to systematic Catholic theology, which lasted for about one year. Newman was ordained priest on Trinity Sunday 1847. He offered his first Mass on the Feast of Corpus Christi 1847.

Founding the Oratory. Before returning to England, with the encouragement of several of his Roman friends and of Pope Pius IX as well, Newman and his companions went to the Oratory of St. Philip Neri at Santa Croce to learn the rule and customs of the Oratory.

After returning to England on Christmas Eve 1847, Newman established the first Oratory in England at Birmingham the following February 2. His influence among the Catholics and recent Anglican converts was very great. He was joined in the Oratory by Frederick W. FABER and other converts from the Church of England. After a falling out of no great consequence, Newman encouraged Faber to open an Oratory in London. This he did in May 1849, while Newman stayed behind to undertake the instruction of the factory workers of Birmingham.

Rome's restoration of the English hierarchy in 1850 gave rise to a wave of antipapal feeling among the members of the Church of England. The no-popery campaign was assisted indirectly by the return of Wiseman to England as the cardinal archbishop of Westminster, preceded by his famous but misunderstood pastoral letter From Out the Flaminian Gate. Newman wrote a number of letters of explanation to newspapers under the pen name Catholicus. The ORATORIANS came under severe attack by the no-popery forces, perhaps because during this time a new house for the Birmingham Oratorians was under construction at Edgbaston. The Protestant Alliance fomented the antipopery campaign in England by providing a chapel for Giacinto Achilli, a married former Dominican priest, who came to London in 1850 after refusing to do penance for his scandalous behavior in the previous positions he occupied in Italy. He published a book, Dealings with the Inquisition, which was popular and widespread in the Anglican communion. In an article in the Dublin Review, Wiseman criticized Achilli and exposed a number of his previous sexual irregularities; he also encouraged Newman to make a more direct criticism in the sermons he was preaching in Birmingham (later gathered together as The Present Positions of Catholics in England). With the support of the Protestant Alliance, Achilli brought a case of criminal libel against Newman. Convicted of libel in June 1852, Newman, through his lawyer, moved for a new trial. Although the move was not granted, the delay provided time for the public's temper to cool so that Newman was released after he paid a fine of £100 plus trial expenses amounting to approximately $60,000. The costs of the trial were borne by Newman's friends in England, Europe, and America. It was a moral victory for Newman.

An Irish University. Throughout this troublesome period Newman was developing his idea on the nature of education. He delivered a series of lectures on university education in London in 1852. They were delivered to fulfill a promise he had made in 1851 to Dr. P. CULLEN, Archbishop of Armagh, and later Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin, that he would accept the rectorship of a new Catholic university that Cullen was determined upon for Ireland. Disappointed over his failures to begin the new university in Ireland, he tendered his resignation to the Irish bishops. The university lectures that he had delivered in London six years earlier were amplified and completed during his stay in Ireland and were eventually published as his The Idea of a University.

Papal Authority. During his stay in Dublin there was also anxiety at home because of several differences of opinion that arose between the Oratories of London and Birmingham. Newman was accused of trying to dominate the London Oratory and thereby reduce its autonomy; his reputation suffered because of the disputes between himself and Faber. Faber became more and more identified with the ultramontane movement among English Catholics. Because of his criticism of Faber's handling of the London Oratory and of his peculiar, perhaps saccharine, attitude toward spirituality, Newman not only was accused of disapproving ULTRAMONTANISM but was held suspect of disloyalty toward the prerogatives of the pope himself.

Partly as a theological conviction and partly by way of reaction to the antipopery movements in England, a number of Catholic intellectuals expressed the belief that the temporal power of the pope was essential to the constitution of the Church. There had been an increasing centralization of authority in both disciplinary and doctrinal matters in the person of the pope during the 19th century. In the 1850s there was a growing movement in favor of a strong formal declaration of papal INFALLIBILITY. Although Newman did not publicize his grave reservations about the direction of this movement, he did refuse to participate in the demonstrations that were organized to support it.

Upon his return from Ireland in 1858 he was asked by the English hierarchy to take over the editorship of a Catholic periodical entitled The Rambler. Shortly after he assumed its editorship, he prepared an essay of his own entitled On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine. This essay was delated to Rome, and subsequently Newman had to resign from the editorship of the magazine. The matter was not finally cleared up, nor was Newman finally exonerated, until 1867.

In 1864 Charles Kingsley attacked the Roman clergy in general and Newman in particular, alleging that both held the view that truth has no value. Newman felt the attack totally unjustified and undertook a defense of himself and the Roman clergy. Writing in weekly installments for publication in a newspaper, Newman defended his own conversion in a series of essays later published together as the Apologia pro vita sua. It caught the public interest and reestablished Newman's significance and importance in the religious life of England. The entire work was completed in two months.

After his plans to found a Catholic center at Oxford failed, Newman set his mind to preparing a statement on the relationship between faith and reason to be valid not only for the intellectuals but for the common man as well. His thoughts on this crucial topic were finally published as The Grammar of Assent (1870). It was designed to justify the faith of the ordinary man who was often unable to formulate his faith for himself.

The year that the work appeared in print VATICAN COUNCIL I was holding its sessions. There was a growing eagerness on the part of H. E. MANNING and W. G. WARD, together with the ultramontane faction in England, to see the doctrine of papal infallibility defined in the strongest possible terms. Newman's position on papal infallibility was that, before being defined, such a doctrine should be given more time to mature. He asserted that he believed in papal infallibility from the day he became a Catholic and was never opposed to the definition of the doctrine as such, but felt the definition to be inopportune. He asserted, however, that should the Council adopt a definition, he would be the first to conform.

Newman was personally invited by PIUS IX to attend the sessions of the Council, but he asked to be excused. His request to be excused was misunderstood, but it was based on his desire to remain in the Oratory and to avoid the pomp necessary to such large ecclesiastical gatherings.

The result of the Council was a definition of infallibility in precisely the way that Newman had always believed it, and far less rigoristic than was desired by Manning and Ward. Subsequent to the definition there was enormous political criticism raised by conspicuous lay members of the Anglican church. William Ewart GLADSTONE launched an aggressive attack against the dogma of infallibility as well as against the Catholic Church as a whole. It was felt that his criticism voiced the opinion of many members of the Church of England. Since Manning's defense of the dogma was unconvincing, Newman wrote one of his own, his famous Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, which was warmly received by both the Church of England and the Roman Church, and won the approval of Manning and Ward. A faulty translation was forwarded to Rome, however, and was misunderstood by Cardinal A. Franchi, who asked Manning to have Newman make some corrections. But Manning wrote Franchi a heated defense of Newman, which brought the two men together in friendship. After Manning's vote of confidence, Newman's prestige in Rome increased considerably.

Cardinalate. After suffering one of the most severe trials of his later years in the death of Ambrose St. John in 1875, Newman experienced one of his greatest vindi-cations in 1879, when Bp. W. B. ULLATHORNE informed him that the new pope, Leo XIII, wished to bestow on him the dignity of cardinal and would permit him to continue to live in his Oratory. Though Newman was then 78 and in precarious health, he made the trip to Rome to receive the honor. The previous year, 1878, his old college, Trinity of Oxford, had made him its first honorary fellow. He paid another visit to Oxford as a cardinal and preached in St. Aloysius Church there.

Newman continued to live at the Oratory in the simple manner to which he had become accustomed. He suffered an illness in 1888 and was weakened by several falls. He offered his last Mass on Christmas Day 1889. Until then he was alert and shared the community life with the other fathers of the Oratory. He presided over the close of the school term of 1890. Shortly thereafter he died quietly. The words engraved on his memorial stone were of his own choosing: Ex Umbris Et Imaginibus In Veritatem.

Doctrine

It is not easy to characterize any one of the principal doctrines that go to form the Newman corpus. The principal contribution of Newman to religious thought is his extraordinary ability to gather insights and express them in so complete a way that no aspect of them is left untouched. His thought is developmental. He was not schooled in the traditional scholastic method, nor was he attached to pure speculative reason, which, he often feared, had a tendency to outstrip the facts on which it exercised itself. His principal orientation from his earliest days was formed mainly by his daily reading of Sacred Scripture. Later in his career, especially in the Oxford days, he developed an intense interest in the Fathers of the Church. His doctrine reflects the scattered notices of doctrine that are characteristic of both Scripture and the Fathers. Whatever systematization they enjoy in his writings is due largely to the necessity of polemics or in rare cases to his truly unified and well-articulated theory of the development of doctrine. The doctrines discussed below have been selected as perhaps more characteristic of his thought than others upon which he has made observations, but which seem to be less central to his principal religious thought.

Scripture. Apart from Tract 85 (Holy Scripture in its Relation to the Catholic Creed) and certain articles published in 1884, Newman's thoughts on Scripture are scattered throughout all his works. Two problems seemed to form the basis of his doctrine on Scripture: the inspiration of Scripture and its interpretation. Against the rejection of inspiration and inerrancy that characterized Anglican Scripture study after the time of A. P. Stanley and B. Jowett (1855) and the difficulties raised by the rapidly advancing positive sciences, Newman taught (at least in 1861–63) that the Scriptures were all inspired, as were their authors. In his writings at that time (collected by J. Seynaeve from the Birmingham Oratory archives and published in 1953 as Newman 1861–1863 Inspiration Papers), he examined the documents of the magisterium, the internal scriptural evidence, and the testimony of the Fathers and theologians on scriptural inspiration and concluded (before Vatican Council I) that the books of Scripture are directly inspired but that there was no formal definition by the Church making their inspiration a dogma of faith. Subsequently he said that one is bound to believe in the inspiration of the sacred authors (Trent) and of the books themselves (Vatican I). For him, the Church's magisterium is the unique and infallible interpreter of the Bible. As a matter of fact, the gift of inspiration requires as its complement the gift of infallibility. Inspiration, however, pertained only to those sections dealing with faith and morals. There are some grounds for believing that there was a direct but implicit condemnation of Newman's view on this in Providentissimus Deus, but that Leo XIII refrained from mentioning his name out of respect for him.

Newman felt that the whole of Scripture, in all its parts (Vatican I), is inspired, but not all the elements in each of these parts (totaliter sed non tota). Possibly obiter dicta were included in the books by the human author; these may not be inspired, according to Newman. The final interpretation of Scripture and its sense, however, must be left to the Church's magisterium. Two principles seem to dominate Newman's method of exegesis: the first is the conviction that Scripture is essentially a work of religion, not of science or history; the second is his "sacramental principle" based on the belief that all the works of God are one and that less important elements of these works (the visible world) are shadows, figures, types, signs, and promises of the more important elements (the invisible world). It may be in terms of this latter principle, as a matter of fact, that he interpreted the theory of instrumental causality in the exploration of his theory of inspiration, rather than in terms of the developed scholastic notion, which he may never have fully accepted or, perhaps, understood.

Newman taught the unity of the two Testaments and the progressive fulfillment of the Old through additional revelation finally to be completed by the New, resulting in a unity founded on Christ. He preferred the mystical or allegorical interpretation of the Alexandrian Fathers to the literal interpretation of Antioch, but later in his life he found it necessary more frequently to use critical-literary methods. For him, Scripture may contain several senses, but the identification of them may not be left to the personal taste or intellectual disposition of the interpreter. He rejected polysemia, or metasemia, i.e., the theory that there may be a multiplicity of literal senses in a single text. Two scriptural senses are distinguishable in Newman's theory: the literal sense and the mystical sense. The latter, in turn, contains two other senses: the typical sense founded on the facts, events, and persons described, and the sensus plenior that belongs to the words themselves. Newman did not regard Scripture as a teaching instrument but rather as a standard of orthodoxy against which the catechesis of the teacher is compared and to which the apologist appeals for the proof of his doctrinal formulations.

Tradition. Newman's doctrine on tradition is developed within the theological context of the continuity of churches that he sees to exist between the pagan, Jewish, and Christian dispensations. There have been "revelations," at times to pagan poets as well as to Jewish Prophets, which are finally summed up in Christ. The initial revelations God made to mankind gradually became part of the deposit of faith and may be found within the structure of the Church Catholic. The Church is not always fully conscious of all the elements of its deposit of faith but is always under its influence by way of what might be called vacant vision. It is the vision the Church has of those aspects of its doctrine that are not completely formulated but yet exist within its life. The Christian revelation that found its summation in Christ is somewhat the same as but somewhat different from the general revelation that was given to mankind under both pagan and Jewish dispensations. Even amid the varieties of Christian traditions that now exist, it is possible to perceive the true tradition that was in existence at the beginning and still exists. The basic link that exists between the Christian and Jewish dispensation is the link of prophecy. Prophecy is uttered in the Old Testament and fulfilled in the New. The continuity between the Jewish dispensation and the Christian is so close that the one can be said to have become the other. Within the dispensations is a continuity of tradition.

Tradition is a variety of uniform custom. For Newman it is something silent but living. It is similar to a river before the rocks intercept it. There seems to be no definite shape or form given to the waters until the stream is intercepted by obstacles, at which time it comes to life. Tradition is a habit of opinion in the Church. It is something the Church reflects upon, masters, and expresses, depending on the emergency it faces. It is something that is necessarily unwritten. It is too much alive and too much part of the Church's very nature to be able to be committed entirely to writing. Tradition would seem, then, to be identified almost with the life of the church itself.

Types of Tradition. In the early Church it was unnecessary and even undesirable to formulate the elements of tradition into doctrines. As the ages of the Church followed each other, as the distance from apostolic times increased, and as the fervor and devotion of later times began to wane, there was need for a gradual and ever more sophisticated formulation of the belief of Christians. With the rise of heresies and attacks on the Church from both friends and enemies, an additional reason for the formulation of doctrine arose. It soon became necessary to develop a means of testing whether a given formulation of doctrine being spread among the Christian people was in fact part of the apostolic tradition. The test that applies to determine whether or not a given aspect of tradition is apostolic is the following: "Whatever doctrine the primitive ages unanimously attest, whether by consent of Fathers, or by Councils, or by the events of history, or by controversies, or in whatever way, whatever may fairly and reasonably be considered to be the universal belief of those ages, it is to be received as coming from the Apostles" (Via Media 1:50). For Newman there are two kinds of tradition: episcopal tradition and prophetic tradition. Episcopal tradition is the definite set of beliefs that have been passed on from bishop to bishop and have been called to the attention of each Christian. It is surrounded by a body of explanations of its meaning. On the other hand, prophetic tradition cannot be contained in a code or a treatise, but is rather a body of truth that pervades the entire Church like the atmosphere. Sometimes it is the same as episcopal tradition; other times it develops into legend or fable. It is partly written and partly unwritten, partly the interpretation and partly the supplement of Scripture (ibid. 1:249). The obligation to believe the content of the creed and tradition is wider than the development of the creed and tradition itself. The Christian's duty of obedience to the creed is far wider than the extension that can be given to the meaning of the creed.

True tradition is to be perceived not by purely historical methodology, since historical evidence reaches only part way in the determination of what the Church's doctrine is. It is not history that makes a person a Catholic, but rather the Church's dogmatic use of history in which the Catholic believes. The dogmatic use of history involves the use of Scripture, tradition, and the ecclesiastical sense. No doctrine can be disproved by history, but by the same token no doctrine can be proved simply by history. There is a standard of Catholic doctrine and it is to be found in the early Fathers of the Church. The ultimate test of whether or not a doctrine is apostolic is whether the early Fathers believed that it was part of the tradition of the Church in their own age. True tradition can be recognized if there is an unbroken line of testimony in its behalf from Father to Father. True tradition will be ancient tradition. The Church's use of history will show with regard to a true tradition that whenever the past ages have spoken at all they have spoken in witness to it. Tradition is not wholly identified with the creed or with Scripture but is the system of faith and ordinances each generation receives from the preceding one.

With regard to the existence of a body of doctrine separate and independent from the Scripture, i.e., the question of constitutive tradition, Newman's final belief was that there is a formulated creed that existed from the beginning apart from Scripture and that Scripture itself is part of a wider concept, which he finally came to call tradition. Scripture takes for granted certain sanctions, doctrines, and messages necessary for salvation that, if not found in Scripture, must be sought outside of it. Scripture by its structure and its own teaching presumes the existence of a tradition outside itself. Newman did not enter into the question of whether the truths that are contained outside Scripture are substantive additions or whether they are simply developments that come from the early Church's commenting on Scripture. He left open the question whether there are matters of faith contained in the extrascriptural deposit or simply matters of conduct or discipline. However, it does seem from the notes added to his published works, in the editing he did toward the end of his life, that throughout the major part of his writing career he had the belief that all revealed doctrine is contained in Scripture. It is clear from the autobiographical writings that Newman had read St. Robert BELLARMINE and had a clear notion of what theologians today call constitutive tradition. His final stance on the question of constitutive tradition was that there is a body of doctrine not contained in Scripture, not indeed opposed to it, but independent of it and separate from it.

Both the Church and tradition are considered by Newman to be interpreters of Scripture. Both tradition and Scripture, in turn, are interpreted by the infallible magisterium of the Church. Tradition, however, is not limited by Scripture or by the creed. It is wider than either, is developmental in nature, and requires an assent of faith that is coextensive with its entire developmental capacity.

There was at the beginning a definite lack of formulation of doctrine in the ante-Nicene Church. This is in no way an indication that the doctrines later formulated did not exist in the first four centuries, nor does it indicate that such doctrines were not part of the tradition or were not recognized as part of it. An explicable silence with regard to doctrine in the early Church is not an evidence either for or against the doctrine. Especially because of devices such as the Disciplina Arcani and the three modes of the Economy identified by Newman it is reasonable to expect that there would be a lack of formulation of doctrine in the early Church. The modes of the Economy according to Newman are as follows: (1) in some cases, concealing the truth when it could be done without deceit; (2) in some cases, stating the truth only partially; and (3) in some cases, representing it under the nearest form possible when an inquirer could not possibly understand it exactly. The Disciplina Arcani is an example of the first mode of the Economy; the answer that Christians believe in only one God to the question "Do Christians believe in the Trinity" would be an example of the second mode; and the representation of angels with wings would be an instance of the third Economical mode, designed to fit the context of the knowledge of a people to whom Christianity was preached for the first time.

Newman takes notice of certain cautions to be employed in interpreting the Fathers as sources of tradition. Complexity, with the attendant possibility of misunderstanding, follows from the very nature of the Church as king, prophet, and priest. Its simultaneous exercise of this threefold function is often confusing to the uninitiated. In addition to this, one should be aware that the Fathers often speak the truth in a context of their own age and culture; one should avoid the danger of confusing actual mistakes on the part of the Fathers in interpreting Scripture with their true traditional teaching. Newman stresses the danger of oversystematizing tradition to the point where reason exceeds the positive evidence. Finally, he cautions against the danger of reading the words and thoughts of the expositors of tradition within the context of a later age.

Sources of Apostolic Tradition. According to Newman the several sources of apostolic tradition may be divided into negative and positive sources. As negative sources, Newman singles out heresies and the influence they have had on the formulation of doctrine. He points out that an attack on an aspect of the Church's life usually results in the formulation of a doctrinal statement to display the orthodox attitude. Silence is another negative source. It is the peculiar reticence of certain past times with regard to important doctrines. The reticence must be explained, often by a later formulation.

There are several positive sources of evidence mentioned in Newman's writings: the testimony of individuals, of theologians, and of the schools, the literary expression of an age, and the testimony of the Fathers, of the bishops of the Church, of the magisterium, and finally of the popes.

The diversity of sources of information concerning tradition led Newman, in his structured thinking on tradition, to formulate what he took to be the basis of the proof from tradition. The basis of any proof from tradition, however, must be that the early Church thought that such a thing was correct, and the early Church must have known (Discussions and Arguments 149). The certitude possible from a study of tradition is nonhistorical certitude. One must not expect irrefragable proof for all the points of doctrine now existing in the Church, since many of these were formulated only gradually.

In the attempt to implement such a proof, Newman formulated the argument from convergence of evidence. This argument is based partly on Butler's theory of analogy. There is a significant original contribution made by Newman based in part on Butler and in part on the rule of Vincent of Lérins: Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est. Although it is impossible in practice to apply the rule of Vincent of Lérins absolutely, it is possible to observe a center toward which a number of independent pieces of information gravitate. It is inconceivable that this center to which they converge could be error; it must be truth. There is a metaphysical element in the argument from convergence of evidence that transcends the elements of the argument itself. Whereas the final certitude that may be arrived at from an array of testimony is moral-historical, the convergence of independent testimonies introduces a metaphysical element into the proof. Whereas moral certitude may be gained from the facts of the case, the convergence of the facts must be explained on a metaphysical basis that is wider than the historical evidence alone.

Nature of Belief. Newman's doctrine on how Christians give reasonable belief to the doctrines of Scripture and tradition is to be found partly in the Oxford University Sermons and fully developed in The Grammar of Assent. The context within which his theory of belief was articulated was the problem raised for the large numbers of uneducated Christians, who give their assent to the doctrines of Christianity, by the theory enunciated by John Locke that the real lover of truth will not admit any proposition with greater assurance than will be warranted by the logical proofs on which it is built. Newman recognized that in practice the vast majority of Christians do not base their assurance of faith on a well-reasoned body of logical propositions or proofs. The question he asked was how the assent of faith that characterizes these Christians is a rational and therefore reasonable act of faith.

Newman gathered the factors involved in the solution to this question from a close analysis of the mental acts involved in holding propositions of any kind, including religious. He described these acts as three: doubt, which is interrogative in form and asks a question; inference, which is conclusionary in form and conditional since it rests on premises; and assent, which is assertive in form and is categorical, since it implies the absence of conditional premises. He further distinguished between notional and real assent. Notional assent is given to propositions that are abstract and general and contain terms that refer to things that do not exist as such. Real assent, on the other hand, is given to propositions that are made up of singular nouns and of terms that stand for things that are external to man. Real assent is more vivid and forceful than notional. Notional assent is given to propositions of profession, credence, opinion, presumption, or speculation. Notional assent contemplates its own creations instead of really existing extramental realities. With regard to giving assent to dogmas, a real assent given to them results in an act of religion; a notional assent given to them results in a theological act. Every religious man is to a certain extent a theologian, and no theology can exist without the presence of religion.

The key to the understanding of Newman's theory of belief is the distinction he made between the acts of assent and of inference. Inference is conditional and is based on conditional verification. Assent, on the other hand, is to some degree independent of inference. The strength or validity of the act of assent does not depend directly on the strength or validity of the conditional inferences that precede it. This distinction establishes the possibility of a strict assent to a proposition that is not inferentially verified by correspondingly strong inferences. Assent is either simple, when it is exercised unconsciously, or complex, when it is made conscious and arrived at deliberately. Both forms, however, are to some degree independent of the inferences that precede them.

Inference deals always with comparisons of propositions so that the conclusions drawn are abstract and can be applied to concrete matters only with probability, not with certain proof. Assent, however, is unconditional and is applied unconditionally to concrete reality. The question arises how it is possible to pass from inference to assent. In this Newman depended heavily on Bp. J. BUTLER's theory of analogy. From it he established an argument that is somewhat different from Butler's and transcends it: the argument from the accumulation of probabilities that are each independent of the other and perhaps too tenuous to lead to assent separately or perhaps too subtle and circuitous to be able to be converted into syllogisms or too numerous and various for such a conversion even though it is possible to convert them. It is the unconscious working together of the various parts of a mosaic gradually taking form before one's mental eye, rather than the strict Aristotelian logical deduction characteristic of other epistemological approaches to the problem of assent. Drawing conclusions from such probabilities and giving the assent of belief to the pervading conclusion contained within them, but never consciously formulated, requires the operation of a special sense that Newman called the illative sense. It is by means of this illative sense that the ordinary uneducated man can have a real certitude of the fundamental truths of religion without demonstrative proofs. To prove that the doctrines to which Christians give assent are part of the authentic tradition of the apostolic age, it must be shown that current Christian doctrines have developed from the apostolic age in such a way that they are identical even though they have undergone change.

During his Anglican years Newman was eager to establish the identity between the Anglican communion and the Church of the first four centuries. To do this he undertook a serious historical study of the Fathers. At the time of his conversion in 1845, he was in the final page proofs of An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine. It was an attempt to explain both the fact of change in the Church and its direction as well, with the result that the Anglican Church could be identified with the ante-Nicene Church. It led Newman to quite an opposite conclusion, however: that the Anglican Church was not the same as the Church of the first four centuries, but that the Roman Church was. The Essay is divided into two parts, the first having to do with doctrinal developments in themselves, and the second with doctrinal developments relative to doctrinal corruptions. Newman's theory of the development of doctrine is based on his belief that it is characteristic of an important and vital idea to live in the mind that has received it and to become an active principle that leads to a number of self-reflections and applications of the idea to other ideas as they develop. He listed five kinds of development: political, logical, historical, ethical, and metaphysical. A Christian idea is no less an idea because it is Christian. There is, accordingly, an antecedent argument in favor of the development of Christian ideas and therefore of Christian doctrine. There is need for an infallible guide to determine the direction of the development, but development there must be.

The essential characteristics of true development of a doctrine within Christianity are the following: preservation of type, continuity of principles, power of assimilation, logical sequence, anticipation of its final configuration, conservative action on its past, and lasting vigor.

The significance of Newman's doctrine of development cannot be overemphasized in modern theology. Attempts at formulating theories of development of doctrine in the 20th century draw heavily on Newman's original insights. His theories on tradition and the nature of belief underlie much modern speculation in fundamental dogmatic theology. The religious insights of Newman have never been exploited fully. In the 20th century it has become possible, because of the availability of his published writings and the 20,000 or more letters he wrote during his life, to come to a better understanding of his religious genius and the meaning it has for the present time.

Literary Influence

Newman exercised a profound influence on the literature of the English-speaking world and on the whole Western literary community. His works not only survive; they are also actively studied. The collected edition has been reprinted often. Important single works, such as The Idea of a University, Apologia pro vita sua, and The Grammar of Assent, are available in numerous editions in many languages. New collections of his letters, memorabilia, diaries, and notes continue to appear regularly. Learned articles, monographs, and full-length studies of Newman's views on theology, philosophy, church history, education, and literature testify also to the quality of enduring vitality found in his writings.

Newman has been classified chiefly as a didactic or apologetic writer, and his specifically literary achievement is often described as the fashioning of a style perfectly suited to his rhetorical intentions. Recently, however, literary scholars have studied the aesthetic elements of the structure and style of his books and of individual sermons, essays, and poems. Thus, in the symposium Newman's Apologia: A Classic Reconsidered (New York 1964), it was pointed out that the Apologia is more than an objective history of Newman's religious opinions and a reasoned argument supporting the validity of his doctrinal claims. It is also, and just as importantly, a spiritual autobiography marked by aesthetic distance, dramatic structure, a delicate handling of perspective and tone. In short, in his Apologia Newman also creates an image of a soul working out its eternal destiny. Similar studies of The Idea of a University and of individual sermons such as "The Second Spring" emphasize the point that Newman's art is, in Dwight Culler's phrase, "a mediatorial form," that is, one that infuses imagination and intuition into the world of fact and reason.

Poetry and the Novel. Newman's reputation as a writer of expository prose has overshadowed his valuable contributions to poetry, the novel, and literary theory. Despite their Victorian accent, his verses and hymns, particularly "Lead Kindly Light," still appeal to the meditative reader. His long poem, The Dream of Gerontius (1866), is greatly admired for its fervor and sonority as well as for the accuracy with which it expresses the Christian theology of death. Newman's novels were closely related to the experiences of his own conversion. In Loss and Gain (1848) Charles Reding, in part at least the alter ego of the author, is shown in his pilgrimage toward the Catholic Church. Here, Newman's sensitive rendering of the Oxonian atmosphere, his unerringly accurate psychological observation, his power of dramatizing religious argument, have earned for him the distinction "of being the only eminent Victorian who could write a confessional novel of spiritual autobiography in high spirits as well as high seriousness" (Margaret Maison, The Victorian Vision, 1961). Callista (1856), a historical fiction set in 3rd-century North Africa, also explores the psychology of conversion, but with special attention to the pagan milieu. Alfred Duggan characterized Callista as "unique, like the mind that composed it: unique, astringent, remorseless, unforgettable," a view that sums up the book's 20th-century reputation. In both novels aspects of Newman's religious experiences that were later to be revealed more directly in the Apologia are encountered.

Theory of Literature. Newman's writings on literature, most of them delivered as lectures contained in The Idea of a University (3rd edition), offer pregnant theories about literary style and literary history in the plan of a liberal education. "Thought and speech are inseparable from each other," he wrote. "Matter and expression are parts of one: style is a thinking out into language. . . . The style really cannot be abstracted from the sense. . . ." He regarded literature as the book of man, just as science was the book of nature, and theology the book of God. Thus for Newman the study of literature was a study of natural man in his historical processes. In making this point Newman redirected Catholic higher education toward a humanistic rather than utilitarian path.

Newman's greatest influence, however, is the action of his own personality on readers and, particularly, on writers. H. Belloc and G. K. Chesterton, Graham Greene and Evelyn Waugh, Ronald Knox and Christopher Dawson, each according to his temperament, has experienced the shock of Newman's commitments and reflected the light of his intuitions.

NEWMAN APOSTOLATE

The work of the Church on the campuses of secular universities and colleges. While its first objective is the religious education, pastoral care, and apostolic formation of Catholic students attending secular colleges, it is deeply concerned with the presentation of Catholic thought and culture to the whole university community. This article gives a brief history of the origins and development of the Newman movement and of the national organizations that have been established to promote its growth.

Beginnings. The first Newman Club was formed at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia in 1893. Timothy L. Harrington, a medical student at the university, was primarily responsible for its organization. In his undergraduate days at the University of Wisconsin in Madison, he had belonged to the Melvin Club for Catholic students. Finding no similar organization at the University of Pennsylvania, Harrington elicited the interest of others in the medical and dental schools, and after receiving the approval of P. J. Garvey, pastor of St. James Church, in whose parish the university was located, proceeded with its organization. It was Harrington who suggested the name Newman Club in honor of Cardinal John Henry NEWMAN, the English scholar and churchman who had died just three years before. Harrington became the first president of the Newman Club. Of the first officers of the Newman Club, Harrington and two others, James J. Walsh and his brother Joseph, later became men of such prominence in Catholic affairs that they were listed in the American Catholic Who's Who.

In addition to establishing an organization for Catholic collegians under the direction of a chaplain, these pioneers began a threefold program—religious, intellectual, and social—that still remains basic to the Newman Apostolate; they chose Cardinal Newman as their patron. The accusation has been made that Newman has been patron of this apostolate in name only. But in fact Newman's spirit, ideas, and ideals have had a continuing influence on the development of the movement; and he has often provided the one source of unity in an apostolate carried on in diverse circumstances and at differing stages of development.

For almost 50 years after this first Newman Club, the work of the Church for those attending secular colleges was carried out almost entirely within the framework of similar student organizations, more and more of which came to be called Newman Clubs. At times and in some places these clubs might not even have an officially recognized chaplain. Carlton J. H. Hayes, recalling his early days at Columbia University, observed that a classmate of his "did found a Newman Club, but it was a strictly lay organization; and what outside clerical instruction we occasionally got was bootlegged to us, so-to-speak, by a brave Jesuit and scholarly editor of the Catholic Encyclopedia, the late Father John Wynne." Hayes further noted that a metropolitan federation of clubs, formed by faculty advisers, was "without benefit of clergy." Usually, however, a chaplain was appointed by the bishop, though in many instances only by a casual general directive to "look after the students at the college."

The year after its foundation, the Newman Club at Pennsylvania sponsored a lecture by Bp. John J. Keane, then rector of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. The lecture, "The Outcome of Philosophic Thought," was given in the university chapel to a large audience that included a professor of philosophy (an Episcopalian minister) and many of his friends. A few years later the Penn Newman Club sponsored a lecture by Cardinal James Gibbons. Then gradually the social program grew, and after the middle of the 20th century Newman Clubs were said by a national secular magazine to be noted more "for tea-dances than theology."

Early Developments. Although the Newman Club was the sole Catholic program in most places until after World War II (and still is at small schools), as far back as 1906 other patterns began to develop. In 1906 Henry C. Hengell was appointed by Abp. Sebastian G. Messner of Milwaukee to serve the Catholic students at the University of Wisconsin in Madison as full-time chaplain. That same year, Abp. Patrick W. Riordan of San Francisco asked the Paulist Fathers to provide a full-time chaplain for the University of California at Berkeley. In 1910 St. Paul's Chapel at the University of Wisconsin and Newman Hall, with its St. Thomas Chapel, at Berkeley, were built. Student organizations were maintained on both campuses and the scope of the Newman work was greatly enlarged. There was, for all practical purposes, a university parish at Wisconsin and California. The chaplain gave his full time to the Newman Apostolate and became acquainted with the university. He found some of the faculty anxious to cooperate with religious groups for the welfare of the students. He came to be viewed as the Catholic chaplain of the university, rather than as restricted to the group of students who belonged to the Newman Club.

Question of Religious Education. The appointment of full-time chaplains led to other developments. As priests came to understand better the religious needs of the campus community and developed a better perspective of the role of the Church and the Church's responsibility in this community, they saw that the apostolate was an educational one. Pastoral concern would in one sense always be first; Catholic students' salvation was to be achieved through the sacramental grace and liturgical worship of God in His Church. But their salvation and Christian perfection would normally be attained only if the knowledge and understanding of their faith was commensurate with their secular knowledge. Formal educational programs were imperative; and given the circumstances, credit courses in religion were a practical necessity if many students were to take them.

In 1915 arrangements were made by the Paulists in charge of the Newman Foundation at the University of Texas to teach Bible courses for which university credit would be received. Protestant groups at the University of Texas had been offering such courses for a number of years; and after a full-time Catholic chaplain arrived, similar arrangements were approved for a "Catholic Bible Chair."

A similar plan, developed in 1919 at the University of Illinois, was initiated by the Catholic chaplain, John A. O'Brien, in cooperation with Protestant chaplains. The university senate, petitioned to allow university credit for religion courses, gave approval, but with the stipulation that each religious foundation be chartered by the State of Illinois as a school of religion and that certain standards regarding facilities and personnel be met. Having purchased a frame house on campus with borrowed money, O'Brien obtained the charter from the state and in 1920 offered three courses for Catholic students. In his efforts to provide adequate and permanent facilities, however, he precipitated a controversy that affected the development of the Newman movement for many years to come.

Catholic Foundation Controversy. O'Brien's project for the Catholic educational foundation at the University of Illinois had the approval not only of Bp. E. M. Dunne of Peoria, the diocese in which the university is located, but also of Abp. George W. Mundelein of Chicago and the other bishops of Illinois. In an address before the state convention of the Knights of Columbus on May 12, 1925, appealing for financial help to build the Catholic foundation at the university, O'Brien stressed the educational role of the foundation as a supplement to the secular education offered by the university. A few months later (Aug. 22, 1925) appeared the first of a series of articles in the Jesuit weekly America that continued periodically for the next several months to attack secular education, Catholics attending secular colleges and universities, and, in a particular way, O'Brien's concept of the Catholic foundation. The attitude of America was perhaps summed up in an editorial comment on March 20, 1926:

America has repeatedly gone on record as heartily in favor of ministering to the spiritual needs of Catholics at secular colleges and universities. What America opposes is undue extension of the Newman Club idea into the educational field of those institutions.

This attitude was shared by many at that time and for many years to come. Archbishop Michael J. Curley of Baltimore was particularly outspoken against the Catholic foundation plan and openly stated that those who were backing it "are waging a secret hypocritical warfare against the best interests of the Church in America. . . . The whole movement is decidedly inimical to the Church of Jesus Christ. It matters little who the authors are. Luther and Arius were both priests."

As a result, bishops who shared such an evaluation (and it seems that for years, most did) merely tolerated Newman Clubs as a necessary evil, as something purely remedial—much like prison chaplaincies—and made it clear that their only purpose was to safeguard the faith of students who should not have been at secular colleges anyway. Any efforts to provide a positive program of religious education was considered as calculated to attract to secular colleges students who would otherwise have gone to a Catholic college. The few studies made during those years had consistently shown there were three primary reasons for Catholics' attendance at secular schools: financial necessity (particularly in publicly supported institutions), proximity to home (financial considerations often entering in again), and availability of courses not offered in Catholic colleges. It could, of course, be shown that many Catholics were in secular colleges for less worthy reasons, though these were actually in the minority. Nevertheless, the conviction persisted that a Catholic foundation at a secular university would be harmful to Catholic colleges—and so they were not established until the second half of the 20th century. It is noteworthy that, except for priests directly involved in the Newman movement and an occasional layman, the Jesuit editors of America were the first to speak out openly to urge reversal of the stand taken by their predecessors 35 years earlier. In May of 1960 they wrote:

Some way must be found to insure that Catholic students on secular campuses share to the greatest possible degree in the positive benefits of Catholic higher education. . . . What is required is a new kind of Newman Club, more on the scale of a Catholic Institute. This would be complete with library, lounges, study facilities, lecture halls, seminar rooms, and above all, a faculty competent to create the scholarly climate of Christian culture that attracts and challenges students.

The official acceptance of the educative role of the Newman apostolate came in 1962, when the college and university department of the National Catholic Educational Association (NCEA) amended its bylaws to provide associate membership for Newman educational centers. Since that time Newman concerns have been an integral part of the annual NCEA convention, and the Newman Apostolate is seen as an important arm of Catholic higher education.

The America editorial and the acceptance of Newman by the NCEA were symbolic of a more general change in attitude toward the Newman movement. Several factors brought about this change. The most obvious was the fact that every two out of three Catholics were enrolled in secular institutions, while most Catholic colleges had capacity enrollments. Other factors also played a part: bishops' awareness that many vocations were coming from the secular campus; assumption by Catholic faculty of secular colleges and former Newman students of prominent roles of lay leadership in parish and diocese; an increase in the number of priests, brothers, and sisters doing graduate work at secular universities. Each in its own way served to break down the prejudice that the secular university was totally inimical to Catholic life and values. Along with this, and perhaps even more important, was the general change that had taken place in the social status of Catholics and of the Church in America, and the resulting weakening of the earlier ghetto mentality of the Catholic community and the more positive evaluation of facets of American culture and of American institutions. Another factor was the impact of the national organizations formed to promote the Newman Apostolate. Helping in a variety of ways, these national groups helped most, perhaps, just by being national rather than local, and thus bringing the importance of the Newman Apostolate to the attention of the whole American Church. The first of these got its start in the early 20th century.

Federation of College Catholic Clubs. In the spring of 1915 representatives of five Catholic clubs from New York City colleges gathered to discuss the formation of a federation of such clubs. The clubs included the Barat Club of Hunter College, the Newman Club of the College of the City of New York, the Newman Club of Columbia College, the Craigie Club of Barnard College, and the Catholic Club of Teachers' College. The purpose of the federation was to join for mutual assistance in preserving and strengthening the Catholic faith of club members. On Oct. 28, 1915, students and faculty members of these colleges met at the New York home of Mrs. Jacob L. Phillips, formally organized the Federation of College Catholic Clubs (FCCC), and elected its first officers: president, Prof. James A. Kieran of Hunter College; vice president, Prof. Alexis I. DuPont Coleman of the College of the City of New York; and secretary, Frank W. Demuth, a graduate student at Columbia College. At the first annual conference, held the following July at the Catholic Summer School at Cliff Haven, N.Y., 50 delegates from 11 college clubs were present. In addition to the original five, there were delegates from Smith College, Northampton, Mass.; New York University; Adelphi College, Garden City, N.Y.; Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute; Princeton University, N.J.; and the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. A similar federation, organized earlier (1908) at Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind., made up mostly of Catholic Clubs in the Middle West—the Catholic Students' Association of America—remained in existence until World War I. Its member clubs later joined the Federation of Catholic College Clubs.

In June of 1917, the professorial leaders of the young federation published the first issue of Newman Quarterly. It was intended "to hasten the growth and expansion" of the FCCC, to promote "inter-club cooperation and national unity," and to serve as "the expression of intellectual Catholicism." In 1926, Newman News replaced the Newman Quarterly. Until its demise in 1946, it supplied the clubs each month with articles and items that addressed the interests and needs of the members.

Another significant event of 1917 was the appointment of John W. KEOGH as chaplain general of the FCCC. Keogh had been the first full-time chaplain at Pennsylvania, and remained chaplain of the federation until 1935. He traveled from one end of the country to the other urging the formation of Newman Clubs and the appointment of chaplains. Where Newman Clubs were already established, he urged affiliation with the federation. He was a man of priestly integrity and orthodoxy, and his concern for the Church and the salvation of souls could never be questioned. When he relinquished the post of national chaplain, the federation had withstood its greatest period of opposition and was ready for a new period of development.

For more than 25 years after its organization, this federation of Newman Clubs had at best been tolerated by the ecclesiastical authorities. In several instances the local ordinary refused to appear at an annual convention held in his diocese. On one occasion the bishop agreed to meet the student officers at his home—and then proceeded to excoriate them for attending secular colleges. Then, in 1941, with the formation of the National Council of Catholic Youth at the behest of the Holy See, the Newman Club Federation was accepted as a full member of the college and university section, and thus finally received the formal approbation of the American bishops. Permanent headquarters were established at the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC) building in Washington, D.C., and a part-time executive secretary had a desk in the NCWC Youth Department. Eventually a full-time executive secretary was engaged, and in 1952, Thomas A. Carlin, OSFS, was appointed as the first priest to direct the national office.

John Henry Cardinal Newman Honorary Society.

The 1938 convention of the Newman Club Federation in Washington occasioned the formation of another national organization related to the Newman movement. For several years a special honor key for outstanding service to the Newman movement had been conferred by the federation. Now it was decided to bring these honorees into a permanent society, to form, as it were, an elite group devoted to the furthering of the Newman movement, as well as to provide local groups with a means to confer special recognition for outstanding service. After 1950 the John Henry Cardinal Newman Honorary Society brought national attention to the Newman movement by conferring annually the Cardinal Newman award on a distinguished lay Catholic. This award recognizes an individual for some special contribution to the work of the Newman Apostolate or for that individual's special exemplification of its goals and ideals. Among those who have received this award are Clare Booth Luce, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Sheed, Dr. Jerome Kerwin, Sen. Eugene McCarthy, Dr. Carlton J. H. Hayes, Dr. Helen C. White, Benjamin G. Raskob, and Dr. George Shuster.

National Newman Chaplains Association. Following World War II, the number of full-time chaplains increased rapidly. In 1950, at the Mid-Century Newman Convention held in Cleveland, eight of them organized a professional association for Newman chaplains. Recognizing the voluntary character of affiliation with this group (as with all affiliation to the national Newman movement), the association sought, in the words of its brief charter, "to set standards for educational and pastoral programs by discussion and agreement; and to implement them by mutual assistance." By 1960, over half the estimated 500 priests assigned to work with Newman Clubs belonged to the Chaplains' Association.

Through the regular meetings of the association's advisory board and executive committee, a consensus developed on a number of points regarding the basic philosophy of the Newman Apostolate. A number of publications and (since 1962) a training school for new chaplains, as well as an institute for new chaplains during the annual meeting, made it possible to assist newly appointed chaplains and to guide them by commonly accepted principles of operation. The importance of the educational function of the Newman Apostolate and the educational role of the chaplain in his work on the secular campus was stressed, but always within a framework of the basic pastoral ministry of the Newman chaplain.

Role of the National Chaplain. Following Keogh's long term as national chaplain, the tenure of this post has varied. Until 1942 voting delegates at the national convention elected the national chaplain, much the same as other officers in the federation. After the inclusion of the Newman Federation in the NCWC in 1941, the episcopal chair of the youth department appointed the episcopal moderator for the Newman Federation, and he, in turn, appointed the national chaplain. For several years, the term of office was only a year; but on petition of the Chaplains Association in 1951, it was approved that the term of office should be two years and that the Chaplains Association should present a preferential list of names to the episcopal moderator.

Over the years many outstanding priests gave leadership to the Newman movement through the office of national chaplain. Donald Cleary of Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y., chaplain from 1940–44, wrote the first Newman Club manual and played a key role in gaining official recognition for the Newman Federation through its affiliation with the NCWC. Edward Duncan, of the Newman Foundation at the University of Illinois, nurtured a vision for the future of the Newman Movement that earned him election as the first president of the Chaplains' Association.

During the 1950s, 11 priests who had been Newman chaplains became bishops. Three active chaplains, made bishops within 18 months, proved to be of special benefit to the movement: Leonard P. Cowley of the University of Minnesota, Minn., became auxiliary bishop of St. Paul; Paul J. Hallinan, director of Newman Clubs in Cleveland, became bishop of Charleston and was later named first archbishop of Atlanta; Robert E. Tracy of Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, became auxiliary bishop of Lafayette, La., and later first bishop of Baton Rouge; and Maurice Schexnayder, who became the auxiliary bishop of New Orleans. They worked hard to forge closer ties between the Newman Club Federation and the Bishops' Conference.

In addition to being informal episcopal witness for the Newman Apostolate, Bishop Hallinan became episcopal moderator of the national Newman work in 1960 and gave decisive leadership to the movement for three years.

In 1965 the role played by the national chaplain was assumed largely by the priest in charge of the national office at the NCWC, when the one holding this position became assistant director of the youth department and director of the National Newman Apostolate.

National Newman Alumni Association. At least as early as 1920 Newman Alumni Clubs had been formed to offer a program of continuing religious education to its members and to support the work of the Church on campus. For many years these clubs belonged to the national federation on the same basis as the campus clubs, and their members were a strong force in the leadership of the federation. In line with the policy to make the federation truly a student organization, these alumni clubs withdrew from the federation in 1957 to form the National Newman Alumni Association as an affiliate organization to the federation. Provision was made for individual memberships in the association as well as club membership. The alumni attempted to promote the work of the apostolate, particularly by assisting in the national public relations program.

National Newman Foundation. In an effort to obtain funds for the many needs of the Newman Apostolate, to ensure responsible control of such funds for the welfare of the Church, and to prepare for the growing financial needs of the future, the Chaplains Association petitioned the bishops of the NCWC administrative board in November of 1959 to approve a plan to set up a national foundation as a nonprofit corporation. This proposal was approved and a charter for the foundation was issued by the District of Columbia in May of 1960. For several months it was directed by a temporary board of trustees made up of Newman chaplains. In December of 1962 control of the foundation was turned over to a permanent board of 20 lay Catholics and six clerics who held official positions in the National Newman Apostolate. Besides seeking funds from individuals and corporations, the National Newman Foundation also appealed for grants from other foundations to fund special projects.

National Newman Association of Faculty and Staff. Recognizing that many contributions can be made to the Newman Apostolate by the Catholic faculty members and others on the administrative staffs of our secular colleges and universities, a national association for such persons was begun in 1959, primarily as a means of communication with the Catholic faculty in secular institutions. Governed by a desire to keep organization to a minimum, the development of this segment of the apostolate has proceeded slowly, though on a local level there were many instances of strong faculty participation in the local Newman program.

National Newman Apostolate. Six national organizations were established over the years to further this work of the Church on the secular campus. Except for the special approval given to the foundation, for many years only the National Newman Club Federation had the formal approval of the American hierarchy. When the federation was first organized in 1915, it was technically a federation of student clubs. In fact, it was an organization run by faculty, alumni, and chaplains; it was not until 1938 that the federation constitution allowed an undergraduate student to hold national office and not until 1942 that a student could become president of the federation. When formally recognized by the bishops, the federation was placed in the youth department of the NCWC, and for 20 years the work of the national Newman movement was carried on under the fiction that this was an exclusively student operation. The welfare of Catholic students was indeed the principal concern of the Newman movement, but as has been seen, there were certainly other than student organizations set up to promote this apostolate.

Recognition of these developments led Abp. John F. Dearden of Detroit, as episcopal chairman of the NCWC youth department, in consultation with Bishop Hallinan, as episcopal adviser to the Newman movement, to reorganize the national Newman work under the umbrella title of the National Newman Apostolate, and to give formal approval to these six national organizations as component units of the national apostolate.

In April of 1962 this recognition was formalized by Abp. John J. Krol, who succeeded Archbishop Dearden in the youth department post, and who established the National Newman Apostolate as a full section of the youth department. Charles Albright, CSP, who served as executive secretary for the federation, became the first coordinating secretary of the national apostolate. A former student officer of the federation was named his assistant as executive secretary for the student federation.

Thus, from clubs of Catholic students, arising at the Universities of Wisconsin and Pennsylvania and similar places around 1900, and from a struggling but ever expanding federation of these clubs, a major Apostolate of the American Church developed in the 1950s and 1960s. It focused on every aspect of the secular university community and, commissioned by the Roman Catholic Bishops of the country, boldly went forth to carry out the work of the Church there: the National Newman Apostolate.

Starting around 1970, the Newman Apostolate underwent dramatic restructuring. It once again became diocese-centered and reflected a number of features from those days before 1910, when a handful of bishops set up "Catholic Halls" with full-time chaplains to celebrate Mass and to teach Catholicism on a regular basis in the university setting. Over 200 diocesan directors continued to lead the ministry with the aid of their own national organization. Meanwhile, Newman Centers and university parishes replaced Newman Clubs as the primary source of institutional Catholic identity on the secular campus. In 1969 the Newman Chaplains' Association reorganized itself into the Catholic Campus Ministry Association (CCMA). Its membership has grown to include women religious, and lay men and women. By then it had taken on many of the functions delegated to the youth and educational offices of the former NCWC. Finally, also in response to the Second Vatican Council, a new ecumenical spirit among chaplains (both men and women) and students manifested itself towards members of other religious traditions. In a similar spirit, Catholic college leaders showed a new readiness to cooperate with the Newman Apostolate.

In 1873 John Henry Newman asserted that the elementary principle of the "new philosophy" was that "in all things we must go by reason, in nothing by faith." A century later and more, those laboring in the milieu of the secular campus, who revere him as the patron and inspiration of their apostolate, faithfully continued to bring to those campuses the pastoral ministry and religious literacy that give salvific meaning to academic study.

NEWTOWN MANOR SCHOOL

About 1653 Ralph Crouch, a layman, established a school at Newtown, St. Mary's County, Md. Crouch, who had been in the Novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Watten, Belgium, for some time, around 1640 came to assist the Jesuit Fathers in the Maryland Mission. The school, which opened in 1653, was made possible by a provision in the will of Edward Cotten: "I doe give all my female cattle and their increase forever to be disposed of . . . unto charitable uses . . . the stocks to be preserved and the profits to be made use of to the use of a Schooll." He expressed his desire that "if they shall think convenient . . . the Schooll [shall] be kept at Newtown" (Maryland Land Records, Liber 1, 46–48). In a letter dated Sept. 4, 1662, Crouch stated, "I affirme boldly alsoe that on my part I did (as appeared to all my neighbors) as much as lay in mee, fulfill the will of the deceased [Cotten], in remoueing my teaching of schoole to the New Towne: and there was ready some years to teach, eyther Protestant or Catholikes" (Archives of Maryland, 49, 20–22).

Crouch returned to Europe in 1659 and was readmitted into the Jesuit Novitiate at Watten as a coadjutor brother. He died at Liège Nov. 18, 1679. The school, however, was still in operation in 1662, when it was mentioned in the trial of Francis Fitzherbert, SJ, and perhaps until at least 1667, since an item in the estate of Robert Cole, of Newtown, contains provision for "the Childrens Schooling" (Archives of Maryland, 41, 566–567; 57, 206).

In 1668 William Bretton and his wife Temperance sold Newtown Manor to the Jesuits, who in 1677 opened a school for humanities at the site. In a 1681 letter of the English Provincial, John Warner, reference is made to a school opened four years earlier under the direction of the Jesuits Francis Pennington and Michael Forster, who were assisted by Brothers Gregory Tuberville and John Berboel. That the school was more than a "Three R's Academy" is indicated by the fact that the pupils were admitted into European colleges. Two boys sent to St. Omers, Belgium, from this school in 1681 were Robert Brooke, the first native-born Marylander to become a Jesuit, and Thomas Gardiner. Thomas Hothersall, a Jesuit scholastic who used the alias Slater in the Maryland Mission, taught grammar and humanities at the school from 1683 until his death in 1698. Although the school at Newtown Manor seems never to have fully developed, it kept alive the idea of an education under Catholic auspices and maintained, as it were, the franchise for later and fuller developments.

NICAEA I, COUNCIL OF

The first general council of the Christian Church, convoked by Emperor CONSTANTINE I, probably toward the close of 324, and lasted from May 20 or June 19 to c. Aug. 25, 325.

Background. After his victory over Licinius (September 324), Constantine, Emperor of the East, found his provinces seriously disturbed by religious controversy, spearheaded by the Alexandrian priest ARIUS and his bishop, ALEXANDER. The dissension apparently began about the year 318, or somewhat later, when Arius was publicly rebuked by Bishop Alexander for teaching that the Word was not coeternal with the Father but had a beginning of existence; otherwise, Arius said, there would be two "unbegotten" principles. If, then, the Word had a beginning, He could not be of the same nature as the Father; He must, like other creatures, have been made from nothing. Nor can He be called the true and natural Son of God; at best He is the adopted Son. It follows that the Word, as a creature, is in fact the first and most perfect of creatures and is subject to change and sin. He did save mankind, but because He was utterly faithful to God's grace. Arius seems to have denied that the Incarnate Word had a human soul. The deep roots of his doctrine are discoverable in his master, LUCIAN OF ANTIOCH, and it is understandable that Arius's fellow disciples at Antioch, called Collucianists were among the first fervid promoters of ARIANISM.

Unwilling to change his position, Arius had to appear before a synod of almost 100 bishops of Egypt and Libya convoked by Bp. Alexander c. 320. Remaining unmoved, he was excommunicated by the synod, as were his followers, Bps. Secundus of Ptolemais and Theonas of Marmarica, and some of the Alexandrian clergy and virgins. As usual, Alexander sent encyclical letters in the synod's name to the more distinguished bishops, explaining and refuting the errors of Arius, notifying them of his excommunication and requesting them to avoid communion with him. These letters affirm, especially on the basis of John ch. 1, that the Word is coeternal with the Father, truly God, God's only begotten Son.

Expelled from Alexandria, Arius went to Coelestria to fellow disciples, prominent among whom were Paulinus of Tyre and Theonas of Laodicea. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA gave him a friendly welcome. In Nicomedia, whose bishop, EUSEBIUS, lent him unfailing support, he wrote the Thalia (Banquet), a long rhapsody, at least partly in metric form, in which he incorporated his theological ideas. With his growing number of supporters he held a synod, which issued encyclical letters against Alexander. This situation continued during the persecution waged by Licinius against the Christians (321–324) and was of serious concern to his conqueror, Constantine.

Captivated by Christianity, Constantine wanted to give it the protection of the state; for, in line with the old Roman idea, he regarded himself as Pontifex Maximus of Christianity, “bishop in matters external” (Vita Const. 4.24). As such, he thought it his task to settle a controversy that was upsetting the politico-religious unity of his Christian empire. Theologically incompetent despite the assistance of his adviser Bishop Hosius of Córdoba, Constantine wrote to Alexander and Arius enjoining silence in this nuanced matter, which seemed to him to have no relation to Christian dogma. Hosius, who took the emperor’s letter to Alexander, returned unsuccessful. When another synod in Antioch late in 324 failed to effect the desired unity, the emperor decided to settle the controversy by a general synod of the more important bishops of the world. He hoped that such a synod would also solve the paschal controversy concerning the date of EASTER. There were still QUARTODECIMANS who followed Jewish custom; and although most of the bishops celebrated Easter on Sunday in honor of the Resurrection, even some of these, to determine the lunar cycle, consulted the Jews, who did not follow the astronomical computation as did the Christian churches. Constantine wanted to eliminate these differences by establishing the date of Easter independently of the Jews.

The Council. The council opened at Nicaea in Bithynia (modern Iznik, northwestern Turkey in Asia), in Constantine’s palace, with an address by the emperor. About 300 bishops were present (the number 318 reported by AMBROSE of Milan and HILARY OF POITIERS is symbolic: cf. the 318 servants of Abraham, Gn 14.14), and almost all were from the eastern half of the empire; more than 100 came from Asia Minor, about 30 from Syria-Phoenicia, fewer than 20 from Palestine and Egypt. Prominent figures were Hosius of Córdoba (who presided with the delegates of Pope Sylvester, the Roman priests Vitus and Vincentius), Alexander of Alexandria (accompanied by his secretary and future successor, the deacon Athanasius), EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, MARCELLUS OF ANCYRA, Eusebius of Caesarea in Palestine, Leontius of Caesarea in Cappadocia, MACARIUS OF JERUSALEM, Eusebius of Nicomedia, Caecilianus of Carthage, and some “confessors” who had suffered in the persecution of Licinius. In the beginning at least, Constantine was honorary president and even intervened to ensure peaceful discussion.

Doctrinal Definition. Doctrinal issues were the council’s first concern. Arian-minded bishops proposed a formula of faith (contents not extant) that was indignantly rejected by the vast majority. Then Eusebius of Caesarea proposed the baptismal creed of his own Church, the oldest eastern creed now known. Its orthodoxy gained it general approval, but a majority of the bishops insisted on certain additions that would counter the Arian errors more clearly and explicitly. The first, ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς, directly contradicted the Arian affirmation that the Son, not genuinely begotten, did not proceed from the very essence, or nature, of the Father, but only by the Father’s will, like other creatures. The second addition, γεννηθέντα οὐ ποιηθέντα, confronted Arius’s statement that the Son is not so by nature, but is “made” by the Father. The third addition, ὁμοούσιον τῷ πατρὶ, comprised the most significant word of the creed, the sword of division for decades after the council.

Not a biblical word, ὁμοούσιος appears for the first time in Gnostic literature: they are ὁμοούσιοι who belong to the same category of nature. Since in strict generation the son has the same nature as his father, there is always ὁμοουσία here; this the Arians denied to the Word with understandable logic because they denied His generation. The word “ὁμοουσία” affirms that the Word is God as the Father is God, and this because He is the Father’s true Son. And if this affirmation is linked with the first article of the creed, “one God Father,” it is clear that the Nicene Creed proclaims numerical identity of the Father’s nature and the Son’s. The creed does no more than mention the Third Person, for the divinity of the Spirit was not at issue. (See HOMOIOUSIOS.)

The Nicene Creed was the first dogmatic definition of the Christian Church and through the ages has served as a tessera of orthodoxy. Almost all the expressions used are scriptural, with the addition of certain words that are philosophical in origin. The meaning of Scripture is made clear in the light of tradition. The Son’s divinity in its strict sense is defined.

Easter Question and Canons. As for Easter, the Fathers decreed (1) that all Christians should observe it on the same day, (2) that Jewish customs should not be followed, and (3) that the practice of the West, of Egypt, and of other Churches should remain in force, namely, of celebrating Easter on the Sunday following the first full moon after the vernal equinox.

Nicaea promulgated 20 disciplinary decrees (cf. Conciliarum oecumenicorum decreta 5–15). In later times certain Syriac and Arabic canons (pseudonicaeni) were falsely attributed to the council. Canons 15 and 16 forbid bishops, priests, and deacons to involve themselves in the affairs of another diocese or locality. Canon 4 orders that bishops be appointed by all the other bishops of the province, and in case of difficulty, by at least three; the appointment was to be ratified by the metropolitan bishop. Canon 5 declares that provincial synods are to be held twice a year, presumably under the metropolitan, to examine excommunications inflicted by bishops. The famous canons 6 and 7 ratify the traditional prerogatives of Eastern Churches.

The bishop of Alexandria has power over Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, after the fashion of Rome's quasi-patriarchal authority. Here is the seed of the patriarchate: the patriarch has under him all the metropolitans of the entire region. The age-old privileges of Antioch, Aelia (rebuilt as Jerusalem), and other Churches are ratified, but it is not clear whether the privileges in question are merely honorary.

Some canons have to do with the dignity of the clergy: the ordination of eunuchs (c.1), of those insufficiently tested since baptism or proved unworthy (c.2), of those who have denied the faith in persecution (c.10), and cohabitation of clerics with other than relatives or women beyond suspicion (c.3). Canon 13 confirms the ancient practice of giving Communion to penitents at the hour of death. A twofold criterion is set up for the admission of heretics (c.19): those who have not erred on the doctrine of the Trinity, such as the Novatians, are to be reconciled without repetition of their baptism; the followers of PAUL OF SAMOSATA, however, are to be rebaptized, since it is not clear that they confess the Trinity. Deacons are warned (c.18) to give precedence to bishops and priests. On Sundays and the days of Pentecost, the faithful are to stand for the liturgy, not kneel (c.20).

Aftermath. It is not certain how long the council lasted, though it was probably for several weeks, at the close of which Constantine bade the fathers farewell. Only two bishops, Secundus of Ptolemais and Theonas of Marmarica, refused to sign the creed and the accompanying anathema. With Arius, they were exiled to Illyricum. Constantine confirmed the decrees of Nicaea, proclaimed them laws of the empire, and wrote a letter to the bishops of Alexandria and other absent bishops expressing his joy that harmony in faith had been achieved. While Constantine lived, none of the friends of Arius who were dissatisfied with the doctrine of Nicaea dared to attack the Symbol directly. The Eusebians (Eusebius of Nicomedia and his supporters) maneuvered rather to remove the more influential representatives of Nicaea from the scene by political strategy; conspicuous proof of their success is discoverable in the exiling of Eustathius of Antioch and Athanasius even under Constantine.

Of the Acts of the council, there are preserved only the Symbol with the added anathema against the Arians, the disciplinary canons, lists of the bishops in attendance (extant in different languages and not always consistent), and the synodal letter notifying the Alexandrian Church of the excommunication of Arius and his followers.

Although Nicaea's judgment on Arianism was clear and conclusive, it was a sign of contradiction and cause of serious division in the East until 381, primarily because of the word "ὁμοουσιος." In their opposition to the council and to the expression, Arians and Semi-Arians were in agreement.

The so-called Acta of Nicaea used by Gelasius of Cyzicus (Patrologia Graeca, 85:1191–1360) and the Coptic Acts edited by E. Revillout, Le concile de Nicée d'après les textes coptes et les diverses collections canoniques (2 v. Paris 1876, 1898), are apparently spurious. The extant documents of Nicaea have been edited by H. G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke 3.1 (Berlin-Leipzig 1934). ## NICAEA II, COUNCIL OF

The seventh ecumenical council of the Church, and the last to be recognized by the Eastern Church, August to October 787.

History. When Emperor Leo IV died prematurely on Sept. 8, 780, any hope of ever restoring the veneration of IMAGES—a practice forbidden in Byzantium for more than a century and a half—appeared impossible. The entire state machinery and the high offices of the Church were in the hands of men committed to ICONOCLASM; the army, which Emperor CONSTANTINE V Copronymos, the most passionate iconoclast of all, had so often led to victory, remained jealously devoted to his memory. Yet when Empress IRENE assumed power in 780 in the name of her son, Constantine VI, who was still a minor, she was determined to restore the veneration of icons throughout the Empire. A plot, vigorously repressed, enabled her to get rid of ministers and other personages hostile to iconoduly. She then contacted Pope ADRIAN I (sacra of Aug. 29, 784), informing him of the intention of the Byzantine government to convoke a general council and requesting him to send duly empowered representatives. Furthermore, to remove the main obstacle to such a council, Patriarch PAUL IV was replaced as patriarch by the Empress's own secretary, TARASIVS.

The order convoking the council was promulgated throughout the Eastern Empire at the beginning of 786. Rome had welcomed this step on the part of the Greeks and sent a delegation of two members of the Roman clergy: a secular cleric and a religious, namely, the archpriest Peter and the hegumen Peter of the Greek monastery of San Saba. There were no other representatives from the West. The Byzantine episcopate sent 350 of its members. On Aug. 1, 786, the Council opened in Constantinople itself, in the basilica of the Holy Apostles, in the presence of the sovereigns, but elements of the imperial guard broke into the church, forcing the Council's temporary dissolution. But Prime Minister Stavrakios transferred or disbanded all regiments that had mutinied, and the Empress transferred the Council to Nicaea in Bithynia, where it opened on Sept. 24, 787.

The sessions, eight in all, lasted three weeks, and all except the last were held at the church of Hagia Sophia in Nicaea. Patriarch Tarasius, not the papal legates, presided, but the legates signed all documents first and were always listed first.

The Council had to decide immediately about the iconoclastic bishops, of whom many were present. Could the Council recognize their right to be seated? It took the first three sessions to dispose of this burning question, for the monks—numerous and active—opposed with determination the Council's decision to recognize the iconoclasts once they had abjured their heresy before the assembly. The next two sessions (October 1 and 4) established the legitimacy of the veneration of icons through an examination of scriptural and patristic tradition. The sixth session (October 5 and 6) dealt with Rome's demand that the great synod held at Hieria in 754 be condemned. The seventh session (October 13) climaxed debate by fixing the terms of the dogmatic decree (ῥοϋς) that proclaimed belief in the efficacy of the intercession of saints, in the legitimacy of the veneration of icons or statues, i.e., veneration or relative cult as opposed to the cult of latria (see WORSHIP) which is the highest adoration, and due God alone. Twenty-two disciplinary canons were appended to this dogmatic definition. The Empress—not without ulterior political motives—wished to associate the people of the capital city with the decisions of the Council and therefore decided to close the Council by a sort of apotheosis, having all the fathers come to Constantinople for an eighth session in the Magnaura palace itself. On October 23 all gathered before the sovereign, who addressed the assembly herself and then had the decree of faith proclaimed; she then signed it, even before her son, Constantine VI, and the Roman legates. The Acta of the Council became the law of the state; their strict enforcement was to assure the Byzantine Church, despite some harassment by the old heresy, a respite of some 30 years. The Council thus marked the end of the first period of iconoclasm.

Acts of the Council. Though the East was virtually restored to peace by the Council, the appearance of the Acta in the West caused considerable uproar. It is not very probable that the actual text of the proceedings had been submitted to Pope Adrian I for approval, even though Patriarch Tarasius had reported to him on what had transpired at the Council. The Acta themselves reached the Holy See in a translation containing grave errors on essential points, even going so far as to represent the fathers of Nicaea as saying the opposite of what they had actually defined. CHARLEMAGNE, kept in ignorance of what had occurred in the East and still smarting from the wound to his self-esteem caused by the rupture of the engagement of his daughter Rotrude with the young Emperor Constantine VI, submitted to the theologians of his court, including ALCUIN, the translation of the Acta that the Pope had sent him. The astonishment of his experts was so great that the monarch—who was more interested in condemning the Byzantine emperor, whose rank and title within Christendom he coveted—commissioned a refutation in a work called the Capitulate de imaginibus, or the LIBRI CAROLINI. Charlemagne then convened a great council at Frankfurt of 350 bishops who, in the presence of papal legates, condemned the Council of Nicaea. A special embassy brought to Rome an extract of the Libri Carolini, as well as a letter in which Charlemagne adjured the Pope to deny approval of the Council of Nicaea. In 794 the Pope replied in a memorandum that refuted in detail the complaints of the Frankish court, though with moderation. But the Holy See still did not give immediate approval to the Acta in question, for Constantinople refused to give Rome satisfaction in other matters, e.g., restitution to Rome of those Italian and Illyrian territories and patrimonies transferred to the Patriarchate of CONSTANTINOPLE by Emperor Leo III in 733. Even in the East the Council was not recognized until 843; its ecumenical status was not actually confirmed until the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE IV in 869 to 870. Moreover, the Patriarch PHOTIUS was able to complain in the synod of 879 to 880 that Rome had still not recognized its authority. However, Nicaea II was recognized almost immediately by the legates at the session of Jan. 26, 880, and soon after by Pope JOHN VIII in person, as a result of his reconciliation with Photius. The insertion of the Council of Nicaea II, after 880, into the formula of the papal profession of faith was the Western Church's seal of recognition of its ecumenical status.

NICARAGUA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The largest Central American country, the Republic of Nicaragua is located approximately 375 miles from the Panama Canal and 375 miles from Mexico. It is bound on the north by Honduras, on the east by the Caribbean Sea, on the south by Costa Rica and on the west by the Pacific Ocean. Nicaragua's population is concentrated along the Pacific coast; its major cities are Managua, León and Granada, and its chief port is Corinto. The climate is generally hot and humid except in the mountainous region and its Caribbean coastline has earned the name the “Mosquito Coast.” Nicaragua has two great lakes and a number of rivers which flow into the Atlantic. The volcanic chain near the Pacific coast is always active but not dangerously so. Nicaragua is an agricultural and cattle-raising country whose largest exports are cotton, coffee, sugar, bananas and beef; it also has gold and copper mines.

Church History. Nicaragua was first inhabited by South American natives, who settled the coastal regions, and by the 10th century the region experienced an influx of immigrants from Mexico. Christopher Columbus, on his fourth voyage to the New World, “discovered” the Atlantic portion of Nicaragua on Sept. 12, 1502; Gil González d'Avila discovered the Pacific portion 20 years later. In 1524 the conquest of the region by Spain was accomplished by Francisco Hernández de Córdoba, who founded the cities of Granada and León; the monetary unit of the country, the cordoba, was named after him. During the colonial period Nicaragua suffered from the depredations of English pirates; in defense against them Rafaela Herrera became a national heroine.

Catholicism came to Nicaragua with Columbus and was established with the conquest by Córdoba. The first chaplain arrived with Avila in 1522, and in 1524 the first Franciscan church was founded in Granada. The first bishop for the province of Nicaragua was named in 1527. However, Fray Pedro de Zúñiga died in Cádiz before setting out for his see and was succeeded by Diego Álvarez de Osorio, who took possession of the bishopric in León in 1532. Bartolomé de LAS CASAS first visited Nicaragua in 1530 and returned in 1532 with four other Dominicans to found the convent of San Pablo at the request of Bishop Osorio. During the colonial period the JESUITS also established themselves in Nicaragua, and accomplished much of the missionary work through the 18th century.

Nicaragua remained a part of the captaincy-general of Guatemala until 1821, when along with the rest of the provinces of Central America (except Chiapas, which was annexed to Mexico), it became independent and joined the United Provinces of Central America. In 1836 that federation was dissolved, and after many vicissitudes Nicaragua became an independent republic in 1845. In 1855 it was taken over by an American buccaneer William Walker, who, after seizing the country, made himself president before being driven out by Nicaraguan and Central American troops in 1857. When his new attempt to invade Central America failed, Walker was shot in Honduras in 1860. After his death, the country enjoyed a peaceful period under conservative rule that lasted until the early 1890s.

Protestantism was introduced along the Atlantic coast in the mid-19th century by Englishmen from Jamaica. Not until the 20th century did Catholic missionaries begin intensive work in that area. Protestant sects would penetrate the Pacific area after World War I and increased their activities after World War II. The most active groups were Baptists, Evangelists, Seventh-Day Adventists, Mormons, Anglicans and Moravians.

In 1892 a military coup d'état brought to power General José Santos Zelaya, a man of liberal ideas, educated in Europe. Despite the beneficial reforms he introduced, Zelaya governed Nicaragua for 17 years with a dictatorial iron hand before revolutionaries ousted him with U.S. backing. Upon his fall, Nicaragua went through another convulsive period until a new armed rebellion brought the Liberals back to power in 1929. The United States played an important role in Nicaraguan politics from 1909 until the occupation forces were finally withdrawn in 1933.

The Modern Church. In 1937 Anastasio Somoza gained dictatorial power and held it until his assassination in 1956. From 1957 to the late 1970s Nicaragua continued to enjoy relative tranquility under the rule of first Somoza's son Luis (1957–63) and then his nephew, General Anastasio Debayle Somoza. During General Somoza's regime the Sandinista guerilla group came into being, composed of landless peasantry, and over time they gained in power. Civil war broke out in 1976, and on July 17, 1979 Somoza was forced to flee the country. Nicaragua's Sandinista government quickly set about confiscating property from the wealthy classes, who retaliated by forming the Contra army.

The socialist policies of the Sandinistas—particularly with regard to land reform and redistribution of wealth—were popular with many less-affluent Catholics, while certain priests supported the regime within the context of a quasi-Marxist “liberation” as opposed to “salvation” theology that had begun to take shape at the Latin American Bishop's conference in 1968 (see LIBERATION THEOLOGY). During his visit to the region in 1983, Pope John Paul II surprised audiences by shaking his finger at the kneeling Father Cardenal, one of four Catholic priests who took positions in the Sandinista government in opposition to Vatican orders. More conservative Catholics sided with the former elite class in their opposition to the government and welcomed the CIA-sponsored Contra's efforts to unseat them. By the late 1990s Nicaraguan bishops advocated in favor of compromise between the socialist and U.S.-backed government factions. The nation's economy failed after the United States instituted a trade embargo in 1981; poverty increased, hand in hand with terrorism and human rights abuses, into the 21st century. The Church-supported coalition government elected in 1996 confronted an economic disaster, as well as the potential for renewed violence.

In November of 1998 another tragedy struck the region in the form of Hurricane Mitch, which left 2,500 Nicaraguans dead and many others homeless. Recognizing the people's confidence in the Church, the government allowed Catholic officials to distribute much-needed drinking water and other relief supplies to hurricane victims. Two years later the loss of crops in the outlying Eteli region threatened famine, and the Church, through Caritas, again responded with needed aid.

Moving into the 21st Century. At the close of the 20th century relations between Church and state remained amicable. As had been the tradition for centuries, leaders from the Church met routinely with Nicaraguan government officials and were often consulted by the government when appropriate. Pope John Paul II made his second visit to Managua in February of 1996 by encouraging Nicaraguans to revitalize their moral traditions. The pope also praised the arrival of peace, adding: “you have recovered your sovereign humanity—Christian and national.” The coalition government’s continued opposition to abortion and family matters was championed by the Church, although it became increasingly problematic on the international level as wealthy nations liberalized their social policies. In 2000, when financial assistance was requested from the Scandinavian nations in the wake of Hurricane Mitch, such aid was almost denied because Nicaragua’s Minister of the Family, Max Padilla, refused to acknowledge homosexual relationships as a legitimate basis of the family unit. At home, flare-ups also began to occur, as in 1998, when Sandinistan politicians tried to eliminate the teaching of the Catholic catechism in public schools. Still, the Church’s role as the religion of the majority remained so entrenched by the beginning of the 21st century that evangelical Protestant leaders urged their ministers to enter the political realm, even if it meant giving up their congregations.

The Jesuit, SALESIAN, Christian Brothers and PIARIST orders continued to operate much-needed primary and secondary schools, which received government funding. In 1960 the Jesuits had founded the first Catholic university in Central America, and the Universidad Cen-troamericana, in Managua, still maintained imposing credentials in civil engineering, electrical engineering, veterinary medicine, law and business administration. A national university was located in León, and in 1999 the Managua campus of the former Baptist University was transformed into a Catholic university through the funding of U.S. businessman Tom Monaghan. Several Catholic presses also operated in the country, and Managua was home to a Catholic-run radio station.

By 2000 Nicaragua contained 223 parishes, 235 secular and 176 religious priests, 93 brothers and 922 sisters. Among the religious orders were the Spanish Franciscans, Italian Franciscans, Dominicans, Jesuits, Capuchins, Salesians, Christian Brothers, Redemptorists, Piarists, Benedictines, Augustinian Recollects and the order of Jesús Divino Obrero, which runs a reformatory in Managua. Secular priests from Canada had charge of the national seminary, which was originally founded by the Dominicans in León and transferred to the capital in 1950. Religious orders of women included four native congregations founded after 1950: the Doctrineras, the Siervas Misioneras de Cristo Rey, the Misioneras Catequistas Lumen Criste and the Siervas de Nuestro Señor. Among the foreign congregations serving in Nicaragua were the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of the Assumption, Josephites, Sisters of Charity of the Blessed Virgin of Mercy, Oblate Sisters of Divine Love, Oblates of the Sacred Hearts, Franciscans and others. They served in primary and secondary schools and cared for the seminary, an orphanage, a sanitarium and almost all the hospitals located in the country. Among the charitable institutions operating in Nicaragua were Cáritas, Catholic Action and the Congregación Mariana.

Nicaragua contained a number of shrines to which pilgrimages were made: Nuestro Señor de Esquipulas in La Conquista, Carazo; San Jerónimo in Masaya; Santo Domingo de Guzmán in Managua; La Virgen de la Inmaculada Concepción in El Viejo, Chinandega; Nuestro

Señor de Esquipulas in El Sauce, León; and La Virgen de la Purísima Concepción in Granada.

NICENE CREED

A profession of faith agreed upon, although with some misgivings because of its non-biblical terminology, by the bishops at NICAIA I (325) to defend the true faith against ARIANISM. It is basically a baptismal creed of Syro-Palestinian origin into which have been interpolated anti-Arian clauses, including the word HOMOUSIOS (at the urging of Hosius of Córdoba and CONSTANTINE I), and to which have been appended four anathemas. Structurally, the creed (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 125, 126) is a brief, tripartite Trinitarian statement, stressing the CONSUBSTANTIALITY of the Son, His INCARNATION, redeeming death, and RESURRECTION. It concludes simply with "and in the Holy Spirit" followed by the anathemas that condemn typical Arian slogans oft repeated in ARIUS's Thalia, e.g., "There was when He was not." Though scholars previously maintained that the Creed of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA was the model of the Nicene, it is now generally admitted that Eusebius's creedal profession at Nicaea I was motivated by his desire for rehabilitation and was not intended to be a proposal of a basis for a conciliar creed.

The first witness to what is popularly known as the Nicene Creed, sometimes called the Niceno-Constantinople Creed (Enchiridion symbolorum 150), is found in the acts of the Council of CHALCEDON (451). Herein the Niceno-Constantinople Creed is attributed to the bishops of CONSTANTINOPLE I (381), whose amplification of the Nicene produced the Niceno-Constantinople. But careful literary analysis reveals the impossibility of the latter's dependence on the former. There are significant omissions in the Niceno-Constantinople, while there are also additions doctrinally insignificant in light of the errors of the day, together with minor differences in word order and sentence structure pointlessly made if the Nicene-Constantinople is the Nicene expanded. Furthermore, the Niceno-Constantinople contains longer sections on the Person of Christ and the Holy Spirit, as well as articles concerning belief in the Church, baptism, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal life. The majority of scholars until recently either denied any connection of the Niceno-Constantinople with Constantinople I or opted for a purely accidental association through supposed creedal professions made by CYRIL OF JERUSALEM or Nectarius at the Council. For those adhering to the traditional explanation of the Niceno-Constantinople Creed's connection with the second ecumenical Council, the creed found in Epiphanius of Constantia's Ancoratus (374) would surely be the Niceno-Constantinople's paradigm did not some scholars with good reason suppose that the Nicene, rather than the Niceno-Constantinople, stood in the text. The antinomies seem best resolved by the fact that before Chalcedon, creeds other than the Nicene were referred to as Nicene because of their basic fidelity in doctrine to the Nicene. Thus Constantinople I may be said to have adopted and promulgated the Niceno-Constantinople, already in existence in the baptismal liturgy, not as a new creed or as the Nicene literally expanded, but as the Nicene faith in substance, better adapted to combat the errors of the day.

The Niceno-Constantinople's recitation at the Eucharist began apparently at Antioch under the Monophysite Patriarch Peter the Fuller (d. 488); its use in the West dates from the third Council of TOLEDO (589), when possibly the FILIOQUE was inserted. The Niceno-Constantinople's place in the Roman liturgy is due to the efforts of Emperor HENRY II, who persuaded Pope BENEDICT VIII to enjoin its recitation on Sundays and on feasts of which mention is made in the Creed.

NICEPHORUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Patriarchate April 12, 806 to March 13, 815; Byzantine theologian and historian; b. Constantinople, c. 758; d. in exile near Chalcedon, June 2, 828. Nicephorus stood in the forefront of the battle against ICONOCLASM. His father, Theodore, of noble lineage and an imperial secretary to Emperor CONSTANTINE V, had twice suffered torture, degradation, and banishment in defense of the veneration of images and had died in exile. Under TARASIVS, his predecessor in the patriarchate, Nicephorus became, like his father, an imperial secretary (770–80) and as such took part in the Council of NICAIA II (787). He later retired to a monastery, although he did not become a monk, possibly because he had fallen out of favor at court or wanted leisure for study. He was chosen head of the largest poorhouse in Constantinople, perhaps by Emperor Nicephorus I at his accession (802). Four years later, he was made patriarch against the advice of THEODORE THE STUDITE, but he soon joined forces with Theodore against Emperor Leo V in the controversy over iconoclasm. In 815 he was deposed and exiled near Chalcedon. He used his time to produce anti-iconoclastic treatises (see BYZANTINE CHURCH, HISTORY OF).

Two of his principal dogmatic works about the iconoclastic horos and florilegium of patristic texts of 815 are still unedited. His Apologeticus major and minor and three Antirhetikoi or Diatribes (813–820) are important because they preserve excerpts of Emperor Constantine's writings favoring iconoclasm. Nicephorus's works are important for the critique of patristic sources that he introduces into his theological arguments. He also wrote a history, the Breviarium or Historia syntomos, covering the years 602–769. The authenticity of several canonical and poetical works attached to his name is disputed.

After his death his bones were translated to Constantinople by Methodius (847) and interred in the church of the Holy Apostles on March 13.

Feast: March 13 (Latin and Greek Churches); June 2 (Greek Church).

NICEPHORUS BLEMMEYDES

Byzantine monk, theologian, and advocate of reunion; b. Constantinople, 1197; d. Emathia, near Ephesus, 1272. In 1205 he left Constantinople, soon after its fall to the Crusaders (1204). In the course of several years he acquired encyclopedic knowledge through his studies at Prusa, Nicaea, Ephesus, Smyrna, and other cities. In 1223 he became a member of the clergy of Nicaea. In 1232, at Nicaea, and in 1234, at Nymphaeum, he took part in the theological discussions with the Latin legates. He composed a tract defending the Greek position, which occasioned the failure of the negotiations then and again in 1250. He was entrusted with the education of the future Emperor Theodore II Lascaris and of George Akropolites, founded the monastery of Emathia near Ephesus (1248), and refused the bishopric of that city as well as the patriarchate of Nicaea offered to him by his former pupil Theodore. Toward 1256 he accepted the conciliatory attitude toward the Latins adopted by the emperor, apparently influenced by the Dialogues on the Procession of the Holy Spirit written by Nicetas of Maronia, and he interpreted the phrase "per filium" in an anti-Photian sense. However, in his autobiography, written in 1264, he repudiated any compromise with the Latins.

Preserved in two recensions, the autobiography is the chief work of his abundant literary production, which included two controversial tracts on the procession of the Holy Spirit, a testament for his monks "Against the Filioque," commentaries, scholia on the Psalms with an interesting introduction (προοίμιον) on ecclesiastical chant, an encomium of St. John the Evangelist that is a dogmatic dissertation on Johannine theology, and several manuals of philosophy.

NICETAS CHONIATES

Incorrectly called Akominatos, younger brother of Michael Choniates, theologian important Byzantine historian; b. Chonae (Phrygia), 1140; d. Nicaea, 1213. As a child, Nicetas went to Constantinople to study under the guidance of his elder brother. Entering civil service, he became governor of Philippopolis, where he witnessed the destruction caused by armies of FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA on the Third CRUSADE. He served as imperial secretary under Isaac II Angelus.

After the sack of Constantinople by the Crusaders in 1204, Nicetas fled to the court of Theodore I Lascaris in Nicaea, where he turned to writing. Nicetas proved to be one of the better theologians of the time. As a model for his "Treasury of Orthodoxy" he used the "Panoply of Dogma" by Euthymius Zigabenes. Nicetas's chief work is a Chronicle of 21 books covering the period from 1118 to 1206. In this work he used the treatise of Eustathius of Thessalonica in describing the capture of that region by NORMANS in 1185.

Because of his power of vivid description, he was considered the most brilliant historian of medieval Byzantium after Psellus; Nicetas was a fervent Greek patriot, reflecting the rising tide of Byzantine nationalism. He was unusually objective and reliable despite his experiences with the Crusaders' armies. His works helped to make the epoch of the Comneni one of the most brilliant and flourishing periods of Byzantine historiography.

NICETAS DAVID

The Paphlagonian tenth-century disciple of Arethas, rhetor and prolific writer of encomia on Apostles, saints, and martyrs. Nicetas main work is the life of the Byzantine Patriarch IGNATIUS, which was probably composed in 907. In opposition to PHOTIUS, Nicetas presents his hero as a true saint who never yielded to the pressure of civil authorities or became unfaithful to his principles. Nicetas considered the patriarchs who succeeded Ignatius as unworthy because they shared Photius's lust for power: Stephen, Anthony, Nicholas, and Euthymius. He branded the last three as almost heretics because they had sanctioned the third and fourth marriages of the Emperor LEO VI.

As a radical opponent of tetragamy (fourth marriage), Nicetas composed a treatise against the Patriarch Euthymius and the Emperor and, disgusted by the fact that even his teacher Arethas had been induced to approve the tetragamy, retired to a hermitage near Media on the Bulgarian frontier. Suspected of espionage, he was arrested and brought to Constantinople. Because of his writings against the Patriarch and the Emperor, he would have been severely punished had he not been saved by the intercession of the Patriarch Euthymius, who allowed him to become a monk in his monastery of Agathos.

As a monk, Nicetas chose the name of David; he stayed in the monastery until 910. He devoted the rest of his life to the writing of homilies and encomia. These writings were attributed to another Nicetas, called the philosopher, but this attribution is wrong. Nicetas, the rhetor and philosopher, should be identified with the author of the life of Ignatius. The opinion that he was bishop of Dadybra is likewise false; this error was caused by a misinterpretation of the abridged form of his monastic name, David, in a manuscript. Nicetas seems to have written most of his compositions between 913 and 963. His life of Ignatius was later introduced into the anti-Photian collection and used by the opponents of Photius in their campaign against the second patriarchate of Photius and the repudiation of his immediate successors.

NICETAS OF REMESIANA

Bishop and distinguished ecclesiastical writer; b. place and date unknown; d. after A.D. 414. Remesiana has been identified with the site of the modern Yugoslavian village of Bēla Palanka, east of Nish (the ancient Naisus). Although of Greek origin according to his name (the Latinized form of Νικητής), he was entirely Western in outlook and temperament and wrote excellent Latin. In 398 and 402 he visited his friend PAULINUS OF NOLA, and the latter's Propempticon (Carmen 17), written on the occasion of his departure following the first visit, is the chief source for his life. According to a reference preserved in St. Hilary (Frg. hist. 15) he was already a bishop in 366–367, and the mention of his name in the letter of Pope Innocent I to the bishops of Macedonia (Innocent I, Epist. 22) dated Dec. 13, 414, indicates that he was still living at that time. Gennadius (De viris illustribus 21) furnishes valuable data on his writings, although his account is very brief.

Nicetas's chief work, the Competentibus ad baptismum instructionis libelli sex, a manual of instructions for baptismal candidates, is preserved only in fragments, but, fortunately, the sections covering De ratione fidei, De potentia Spiritus Sancti, and De symbolo are rather long. Basing himself solidly on the teachings of the Council of NICAEA and making full use of the Catecheses of St. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, he defended the consubstantiality of the Son against the ARIANS and the consubstantiality of the Holy Spirit against the MACEDONIANS. His commentary on the Creed employs the term communio sanctorum for the first time, and it has an important place in the history and exposition of the symbol.

The sermons, De vigiliis servorum Dei and De psalmodiae bono (or De utilitate hymnorum), were already recognized as genuine by the Maurist Luc D'Achéry in 1659. The first deals with the celebration of the vigils of Saturdays and Sundays, and the second stresses the importance of the singing of psalms or hymns at these vigils. In the second work, the Magnificat is assigned to St. Elizabeth (9, 11).

Nicetas is probably the author of the little treatise De diversis appellationibus Christi, but the arguments adduced to identify the Ad lapsam virginem libellus, assigned to him by Gennadius, with the pseudo-Ambrosian De lapsu virginis consecratae are not convincing. Paulinus of Nola praised Nicetas as a writer of hymns and said that he taught the barbarian Bessi and Scythians to glorify Christ in song, but no hymn has survived with his name. Despite the advocacy of Dom G. Morin and A. E. Burn, there is no solid evidence for making him the author of the TE DEUM.

NICETAS STETHATOS

Byzantine controversialist and mystical writer; b. c. 1000; d. c. 1080. He received his epithet of stethatos or pectoratus (the lionhearted) when he openly rebuked Emperor CONSTANTINE IX Monomachus for his immorality. When Nicetas was 14 years old, he became a monk of STUDION monastery, where he became a devoted disciple of SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN. He was driven from the monastery for a time when he honored Symeon as a saint after his death. In the conflict (1053–54) between MICHAEL CERULARIUS and HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA (see EASTERN SCHISM), Nicetas played a leading part in support of Cerularius but was forced by the emperor to an insincere recantation of his attacks against the Roman Church. Of his polemic on this occasion, the Dialexis and Antidialogus became the nucleus of a later comprehensive compilation on the azymes, or unleavened bread, and the Synthesis against the Latins, which attacked the FILIOQUE, was later to be included in NICETAS CHONIATES' Thesaurus of Orthodoxy. Stethatos' principal contribution to mysticism was his Life of Symeon the New Theologian, written to establish Symeon's sanctity against his detractors, but incidentally setting forth Nicetas's own ascetical and mystical views. Along this same line he published Symeon's works with an introduction, and composed Against the Saint's [i.e., Symeon's] Accusers. Independent writings on mysticism included a treatise on the soul and the Spiritual Paradise. These and his other essays on mysticism and miscellaneous subjects reveal an ascetical and mystical system that followed very closely that of his master.

NICETIUS OF TRIER, ST.

Bishop; b. probably Limoges, France; d. Trier, Germany, December 5, 566. A BENEDICTINE monk and abbot, Nicetius was called to Trier c. 525 by the Frankish King Theodoric I (d. 534). He renewed his diocese by reform of clergy and promotion of monasticism, and by rebuilding churches that had fallen into disrepair, especially the cathedral. He is considered one of Trier's greatest bishops. Nicetius was active at several MEROVINGIAN synods, taking part in those of Clermont-Ferrand in 535, Orléans in 549, Toul in 550, and Paris in 551. He fearlessly denounced the transgressions of Kings Theodebert I (d. 547) and Clotaire I (d. 561). Clotaire banished him for his outspoken criticism in 560, but he was restored with honors the following year by King Sigebert I (d. 575). His correspondence with the Lombard Queen Clodiswind (d. 570) and the Byzantine Emperor JUSTINIAN I is evidence of his wider influence. He is buried in the church of St. Maximin in Trier.

NICHOLAS, STUDITE ABBOT, ST.

Byzantine abbot and anti-Iconoclast; b. Kydonia, Crete. 793; d. Constantinople, 868. Nicholas joined his uncle Theophane, a Studite monk in Constantinople, at the age of ten and was sent by the Abbot Theodore (see THEODORE THE STUDITE, ST.) to study in a school under the jurisdiction of the monastery. He became a monk and priest, and followed his abbot into exile during the iconoclastic persecution (see ICONOCLASM). After being flogged and ill-treated, he was imprisoned for three years at Smyrna. In 821 he was freed, and, aided by his brother Titus, he rejoined the monastery after the invasion of Crete by the Saracens and the massacre of his family (c. 826).

Exiled anew in 829, he took refuge on the outskirts of Constantinople. In 846 he succeeded Naucratus as abbot and was forced out of the monastery again, but he returned to office in 853. In 858 he was among the first to oppose the depositions of the patriarch (St.) IGNATIUS and the nomination of PHOTIUS. There followed a new exile, deposition, and imprisonment. He died at the age 75, shortly after being reinstated (867).

As was the practice, his biography emphasizes the miracles he had accomplished. It was written in 916 under the fourth successor to Nicholas and is a most interesting document of the period aggravated by the later iconoclastic struggles and the affair of Photius. It is also a valuable source of precious information concerning the customs of the times.

NICHOLAS I, EMPEROR OF RUSSIA

B. Tsarskoe Seloe, Russia, June 25 (O.S.; July 7, N.S.), 1796; d. St. Petersburg, March 2, 1855. Nicholas, the son of Czar Paul I and Sophia Dorothea of Württemberg, succeeded his brother ALEXANDER I as ruler in December 1825. His motto during his three decades as sovereign was “Orthodoxy, Russianism, nationalism.” To put his policy into effect, he sought to crush liberalism and maintained a rigid censorship and control over education. Yet these years witnessed a flowering of Russian literature, graced by the writings of Pushkin, Gogol, Dostoyevsky, Tolstoy, and others. The czar’s expansion efforts won most of Armenia and the area at the mouth of the Danube, but it involved Russia eventually in the disastrous Crimean War (1853).

In his dealings with the Orthodox Church, Nicholas professed to restore harmonious relations, but he actually increased its dependence on the state. Catholics of the Latin rite who belonged to traditionally Catholic ethnic groups were tolerated, but Stanislaw Siestrzencewicz-Bohucz, who had been Alexander I’s chief instrument for controlling Latin Catholics, was deposed as metropolitan of Mogilev (1826). Catholics belonging to the EASTERN CHURCHES saw their union with Rome destroyed by Nicholas, who disapproved the continued existence of Catholic Ukrainians and Byelorussians. Joseph Semashko, an Eastern-rite priest, drew up the plan to incorporate his coreligionists into the Orthodox Church. After the Union of BREST was declared void (1839), the Ukrainian rite Catholics were subjected to the schismatic HOLY SYNOD.

The uprising in Poland (1830) caused Nicholas to contact GREGORY XVI, who condemned the violence of the revolution and urged Catholic Poles to be submissive to legitimate authority (February 1831). When the emperor expressed dissatisfaction with this admonition as too weak, the pope dispatched a stronger brief to the Polish bishops, Superiori anno (June 9, 1832). Previously Gregory XVI had complained about Russia’s treatment of Catholics. In 1847 Pius IX concluded a concordat with the emperor.

NICHOLAS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Constantinople patriarchate, March 1, 901, to February 907, and c. May 15, 912, to 925; b. Constantinople, 852; d. there, May 15, 925. Nicholas was born of an Italian slave on the private estates of Patriarch PHOTIUS and entered a career in the civil service; but, as a close friend of Photius, he was involved in his fall (886) and became a monk. Having been chosen as secretary (Mysticus) by Emperor LEO VI, he was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 901. Nicholas's correspondence reveals the finer side of his complex character, his charity and forbearance in appeasing the strife over the emperor's four marriages, the so-called tetragamy; his prudence in dealing with abuses; and his zeal for converting the barbarians of Cis- and Trans-Caucasia. He was deposed in 907 either for opposing Leo VI's fourth marriage or for treasonable dealings with a rebel—eyewitness sources differ. Recalled either by Leo shortly before death or by Emperor Alexander (912–913), Nicholas headed the board of regency for the minor Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus, but experienced great difficulties. By taking a savage revenge on EUTHYMIUS I, who had replaced him as patriarch, he alienated many among the clergy, and he was opposed by the party in the state loyal to the Macedonian dynasty and the Queen Mother Zoë, who had been forced into a convent with Nicholas's connivance. Thus the Byzantine state was disturbed by conflict between the Nicholaites and Euthymians.

During the rise of Romanus Lecapenus (920–944), Nicholas used his position as regent to arrange a marriage between his ward, Constantine VII, and Romanus's daughter Helen, and conducted a diplomatic correspondence with the Bulgarian Czar Symeon in favor of a peace treaty. He achieved a reconciliation with Euthymius before the latter's death (917) and undertook a campaign to restore unity to the Church. In a synod (920) he issued a decree of union, settling the question of more than one marriage by legislating that a second marriage was on a par with a first, that a third was subject to stringent regulations, and that a fourth was equivalent to living in sin. However, an influential group demanded the intervention of the Holy See, and Nicholas requested the pope to send legates to reassert the original decision of Pope SERGIUS III (904–911) on Leo's fourth marriage, which, Nicholas said, had then become the decision of all (Grumel, Regestes, 675), namely, that a fourth marriage was against Byzantine law and the Byzantine sense of propriety, yet a dispensation was granted for the good of the state, the need of a settled succession in a legitimate heir. Pope JOHN X (914–928) complied, and thus in 923 he ended the schism between the Euthymians and Nichol-aites. Nicholas was canonized by the Byzantine Church. His literary remains consist of sermons on notable occasions, the decree of union, and his diplomatic letters.

NICHOLAS III, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned from 1084 to 1111. Of unknown origin, called Grammaticus, Nicholas became a monk in the urban monastery of Prodromos and in 1084 succeeded the deposed Eustratius Garridos as patriarch. His career was devoted to intense administrative and canonical activity. He attempted to regulate the difficult questions, raised by the Metropolitan Leo the Chalcedonian (1084–86), who opposed the employment of sacred objects for other than a religious purpose as a form of ICONOCLASM, including the use of the Church's jewels to supplement urgent needs of the imperial treasury as requested by Emperor Alexius I. Nicholas opposed imperial attempts to promote bishoprics to the rank of metropolitan sees, and he frequently intervened in strengthening monastic discipline, as in the case of the Wallachian shepherds on Mt. ATHOS. He condemned the monk Nilus (1094) and the Bogomil heretics of Constantinople, as well as their leader, the physician Basil (1110).

He was probably the author of a monastic Typikon, adapted from that of St. Sabas and attributed to Nicholas of Constantinople, and he laid down canonical responses for baptism, marriage, confession, fasting, and established a rite for the Proskomide, i.e., the preparation of the holy gifts at the beginning of the Liturgy. Despite his original antiunion convictions, in a synod held in September of 1089, and in a letter to Pope Urban, he went on record as favoring a resumption of relations with the papacy, but he proved intransigent in the controverted questions regarding the FILIOQUE, unleavened bread, and the Roman primacy.

NICHOLAS I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: April 24, 858 to Nov. 13, 867. The son of an important Roman official, Nicholas entered the papal administration after receiving a good education. Made subdeacon by Pope SERGIUS II and deacon by Pope LEO IV, he served as chief adviser to Pope BENEDICT III. The efforts to extend the authority of the papal office made by these pontiffs, especially Leo IV, played a role in shaping Nicholas' concept of that office. His election had wide support, including that of Emperor Louis II, who was to remain a challenging presence throughout Nicholas' pontificate.

The first few years of Nicholas' reign passed quietly. But then a variety of appeals reflecting many of the tensions of the later Carolingian period began to reach Rome. Nicholas was seldom reluctant to become engaged. The result was an almost frenzied outburst of activity proceeding simultaneously on several fronts, which was to occupy Nicholas during the last five years of his pontificate.

One such case pitted Nicholas I against the eastern emperor and the patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE in an encounter in which jurisdictional primacy in the religious realm and the relationship between church and state were at issue. That clash began when Patriarch IGNATIUS was deposed in 858 by Emperor MICHAEL III for political reasons and replaced by PHOTIUS, an experienced figure at the imperial court who, because he was a layman, was canonically ineligible for the patriarchal office. Ignatius' deposition produced two factions in Constantinople, each of which turned to Rome. Photius was first to do so, joining Michael III in requesting papal confirmation of his election. Nicholas declined to do so, partly because he received news that raised questions about Ignatius' deposition. Rather he decided to send legates to Constantinople to gain more information about that matter and to renew the papacy's claims to jurisdiction over Illyricum and to revenues from papal patrimonies in Sicily and southern Italy, both of which Emperor Leo III (717–741) had taken from the papacy. The papal legates overstepped their fact-finding commission and became parties to a synod in 861 which confirmed Ignatius' deposition. Nicholas responded in 863 by deposing Photius and declaring Ignatius restored to office. Despite the emperor's refusal to comply, Nicholas stood by his decision, letting the emperor know in strong language of the primacy of St. Peter's successor. But he left the case open by inviting the parties to present their cases once again, this time in Rome.

Perhaps Nicholas' leniency was a consequence of a new development affecting relations between Rome and Constantinople: the Christianization of Bulgaria, already in progress through the efforts of missionaries sent from Constantinople by Photius. But then the recently converted Bulgar king, Boris, irked by Photius' refusal to sanction an autonomous ecclesiastical establishment in Bulgaria, decided in 866 to turn to Rome. Welcoming the opportunity to become a party in the expansion of Christendom, Nicholas promptly summoned his own missionary party to Bulgaria along with his famous "Responses" to a series of questions Boris had posed about the conduct of Christian life; some of Nicholas' answers attacked Greek teaching and practices. The Roman newcomers immediately established themselves in Bulgaria at the expense of Greek missionaries who were expelled. Prompted by what he considered Rome's usurpation of his patriarchal jurisdiction and concerned about the threat to the Empire posed by a hostile Bulgar state allied with Rome, Photius now decided to take the offensive. He dispatched an encyclical to the eastern patriarchs summoning them to a council to be held in Constantinople in the summer of 867 to discuss Rome's intrusion into Bulgaria. At its meeting the council outlined a long list of irregularities in doctrine, liturgy, and moral usage sanctioned by the Roman Church and ended by excommunicating and deposing Nicholas, a move that posed a direct challenge to the pope's claim of primacy. Photius also took steps to rally Nicholas' many enemies in the West, including Emperor Louis II, against the pope. Although Nicholas was dead before the council's official acts reached Rome, he did have some inkling of what had happened. One of his last acts was to issue a call to western leaders to join in refuting the charges made by the Greeks against the Roman Church and its practices. While the excommunicated pope seemed to have met his match in Photius, events soon proved otherwise. Just before Nicholas' death, a palace revolt produced a new emperor, Basil I, and soon thereafter Photius was deposed and Ignatius reinstalled as patriarch of Constantinople. Nicholas' successors were left to take the necessary actions to end the Photian schism and resolve the Bulgar issue, but he had defined the principles upon which that settlement was based.

While Nicholas was engaged in the Photian affair, he became embroiled with another ruler and his subservient clergymen. This case involved King LOTHAIR II of Lotharingia, who in 860 put aside his wife, Theutberga, and sought to marry his mistress, Waldrada. While passion may have been involved, Lothair was driven by a more urgent consideration: assuring an heir to protect his realm from the clutches of his uncles, Charles the Bald and Louis the German. Theutberga was unable to produce a child, but Waldrada had already borne Lothair II a son. In order to sanction the dissolution of his marriage, Lothair enlisted the services of the Lotharingian episcopacy; under the leadership of Archbishops Gunther of Cologne and Theutgaud of Trier the bishops sitting in council accommodated the king by declaring his marriage to Theutberga invalid on the basis of a trumped up charge of incest against Theutberga and authorized Lothair's marriage to Waldrada.

Upon receiving word of the case in the form of appeals from both Theutberga and Lothair II, Nicholas was faced with the issue of where according to canon law lay final authority in marriage cases. His first step was to announce in November 862 that a synod was to be held in the presence of papal legates to settle the issue; the synod's decisions were to be submitted to Rome for approval. In the meantime, Lothair II married Waldrada with Archbishop Gunther's blessing; in the eyes of Nicholas the king had by this act violated canon law and opened himself to ecclesiastical sanction. The synod met at Metz in June 863 with papal legates (probably bribed) present; it decreed that Theutberga was guilty and that Lothair's marriage to Waldrada was valid. Gunther and Theutgaud were commissioned to carry the synod's decisions to Rome for papal confirmation. There they received a rude shock. Nicholas summoned them before a Roman synod which not only voided the decisions taken at Metz but also excommunicated and deposed the archbishops. This unprecedented action prompted Archbishops Gunther and Theutgaud to mount a counterattack. They circulated their case widely, charging that Nicholas acted as if he were “emperor of the whole world” and urging that his tyranny be resisted. Their cause gained some support from Louis II, but little elsewhere, partly because Nicholas continued pursuing the case, writing letters to kings and major prelates seeking support for his position and to Lothair threatening him with excommunication. The pope finally decided to send another legate to enforce the papal decision. The mission, carried out in 865, succeeded in compelling Lothair to restore Theutberga as his legitimate wife and in arranging for the removal of Waldrada to Rome for judgment. But Nicholas’ seeming victory was far from decisive. Waldrada fled Italy and renewed her liaison with Lothair; Nicholas responded by excommunicating her. Theutberga appealed to the pope, saying that she wished to come to Rome to have her intolerable marriage annulled; Nicholas refused her request, charging that he suspected that she had been forced to make her appeal by a husband still persisting in his defiant ways. And he continued to seek support in many quarters to bring pressure on Lothair II to abide by the papal decision. Nicholas also refused to restore the archbishops of Cologne and Trier to their sees. However, the situation remained uncertain. Only a few days before his death Nicholas wrote a series of letters indicating that he was not sure that Lothair had taken Theutberga back and insisting on canonically elected replacements for the sees of Cologne and Trier.

Nicholas’ concept of the place of the papacy in the ecclesiastical hierarchy was demonstrated even more precisely in his involvement with two of the most powerful ecclesiastical figures of the era, Archbishops John VIII of Ravenna and Hincmar of Reims, both holders of metropolitan sees. As a result of the Carolingian religious reforms, metropolitan bishops steadily increased their authority over the bishops and other clergy of their provinces to the point where curbing their claims became a critical issue in the eyes of many, including the pope.

Archbishop John VIII was one of the more aggressive and capable in a long succession of prelates of Ravenna who sought by whatever means to resist submission to Rome and to carve a position of independence for their see. Immediately upon his succession in 850 John took actions that provoked many of his clerical and lay subjects to appeal to the pope for relief from his alleged tyranny. Between 861 and 863 Nicholas responded with a series of summons to John to appear in Rome, a sentence of excommunication, and a papal appearance in Ravenna. None of these measures constrained John, chiefly because he enjoyed the support of Emperor Louis

II, until the emperor finally commanded him to make peace with Rome. Nicholas then compelled John to appear before a Roman synod which restored him to communion but required him to accept conditions that severely limited his powers over his suffragans and magnified his subservient position with respect to the bishop of Rome.

A more formidable adversary was Archbishop HINC-MAR OF REIMS, who after his election to that see in 845 established himself as a potent force in the religious affairs not only in his own province but also everywhere north of the Alps. Hincmar was a dedicated prelate, seriously concerned about maintaining the right order in the Church, but he was also particularly aggressive in expanding and enforcing his metropolitan authority. That effort led to a long and complex confrontation with Nicholas. The issues at stake emerged most clearly in two cases involving Hincmar’s rights over clergy under his metropolitan authority.

The first centered around Bishop Rothad of Soissons who earned Hincmar’s enmity by resisting what the archbishop claimed were his metropolitan rights over his suffragans. With the support of a provincial synod Hincmar finally deposed Rothad. When he learned of the case, Nicholas immediately raised the issue of Hincmar’s authority in such cases. After an extended exchange with Hincmar, Nicholas finally ordered that Rothad be restored to his see, arguing that Hincmar had failed to recognize that all bishops had a right to appeal to Rome before being sentenced, that the pope had final jurisdiction over all cases involving bishops, and that the actions of all councils were subject to papal confirmation.

The second case involved a group of clerics, including a certain Wulfrad, who had been ordained by Archbishop Ebbo of Reims before his second deposition in 843. One of Hincmar’s first acts as Ebbo’s successor was to suspend the clerics ordained by Ebbo, a decision approved by a synod held at Soissons in 853; the synod’s acts were confirmed by Pope Benedict III and by Nicholas himself. In the interval Wulfrad became a favorite of Charles the Bald and with the king’s support was elected archbishop of Bourges, a move opposed by Hincmar. Wulfrad’s eligibility for election hinged on whether he was a cleric or a layman, thus posing once again the question of the validity of Hincmar’s deposition of the clerics ordained by Ebbo. The case eventually came to Nicholas’ attention. He launched an effort to compel Hincmar to reverse his earlier decision on the clerics ordained by Ebbo. In the ensuing duel the combatants played ecclesiastical politics to secure their positions and exchanged letters, often vituperative, in which both parties sought to justify their actions in terms of their canonical rights. Their cases depended heavily on their exploitation of traditions defining the relationships between various officials in the ecclesiastical system and upon newly minted forgeries which produced texts supporting one or another cause. The most famous such forgery, known as the False Decretals of Pseudo-Isidore, consisted of a collection of pronouncements on ecclesiastical governance purportedly made by various authorities (popes, councils, Church fathers, emperors) in the distant past which sanctioned the ultimate authority of the bishop of Rome but which were actually fabricated in the mid-ninth century as a means of defining an authority that could protect the Church from intrusion into its affairs by secular authorities and their clerical supporters. Eventually Nicholas with the support of Charles the Bald was able to compel Hincmar to accept the consecration of Wulfrad as archbishop of Bourges and to admit that cases involving bishops were reserved to the pope, but the pope also accepted Hincmar's explanation of his action in deposing the cleric ordained by Ebbo. That act of reconciliation, taken just before Nicholas' death, came at a time when the pope needed the archbishop's support to rally opinion in the West against the charges brought by Photius against the Roman Church in the council held in Constantinople in 867. Nicholas had certainly not defeated the redoubtable archbishop, but his efforts had placed clear boundaries around the authority of metropolitans in the affairs of their provinces.

The dramatic encounters described above in which the extent and the nature of papal, episcopal, conciliar, and secular authority were at stake by no means occupied all of Nicholas' attention. He was actively involved in directing the activities of his own suffragans in Italy. He dealt with numerous other appeals from everywhere in the West involving a wide range of problems concerning doctrinal matters, Church governance, and discipline. He acted to promote Christian expansion not only by supporting the activity of his missionaries in Bulgaria but also that of Anskar in Scandinavia and of Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs in Moravia. He interacted constantly with the Carolingian rulers of his time, acting chiefly as an arbiter in their increasingly tangled and embittered relationships but almost never seeking a directive role in secular affairs. However, he was always quick to remind kings of their duties toward the Church and of the pope's right to judge their conduct as Christians. He maintained firm control over the governance of the Papal State and its resources, a policy that on several occasions led to confrontations with Emperor Louis II, who took seriously his rights and responsibilities as protector of the people and the lands of St. Peter. In short, through his numerous activities the papal presence was felt in a wide range of matters affecting all Christendom.

The significance of Nicholas' pontificate cannot be measured simply by a triumphant cataloging of his confrontations with various foes. In fact, his victories were limited; his death left his successors with major conflicts still unresolved. In several instances the success or failure of Nicholas' clashes depended on the support or lack of support from political leaders seeking to achieve ends that had little to do with the pope's goals. Nicholas was never reluctant to seek out the support of rulers willing to further papal causes. But after all these factors are taken into account, there still remains a distinctive and unique dimension to his pontificate that made him the most significant pope between GREGORY I THE GREAT (590–604) and GREGORY VII (1073–1085). That special feature was provided by the conceptual framework that motivated and guided his actions in the face of situations arising in the world in which he found himself.

The foundation stone of Nicholas' position was his firm conviction that all who were Christians constituted a single, God-ordained body, which required a single head to guide it. Acting through Jesus, God commissioned St. Peter and his successors as bishops of Rome to fill that role. As monarch of the Christian community, the bishop of Rome was responsible before God for the spiritual welfare of every Christian and was endowed with certain powers assuring that that responsibility was met. The pope had the final say in defining what constituted true faith and right conduct. He was obligated to take whatever steps were necessary to judge and correct all whose behavior threatened orthodox belief and violated right conduct. The pope's power to serve as final judge extended over all other ecclesiastical officials, including patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops, and over the acts of all Church councils. Papal judgments had binding power, so that in effect they became authoritative legislation defining how the affairs of the Christian community were to be conducted. Anyone, especially bishops, who felt maltreated by higher ecclesiastical officials or by the decisions of councils had a right to appeal to the bishop of Rome for judgment, but there was no appeal beyond that; only God could judge the pope's discharge of his pastoral duties. Nicholas had a place in his concept of the cosmic order for secular rulers. God had ordained separate spheres in human affairs: the spiritual and the secular, the former superior to the latter. Rulers in the secular sphere enjoyed the power to command in matters pertaining to that sphere, but they were obligated to promote the welfare of the religious community and to conduct their lives in accordance with right faith and morals as defined by spiritual authorities. If by their actions in these matters they failed to demonstrate their fitness for office, then they were subject to judgment and correction by ecclesiastical authorities, including ultimately the bishop of Rome.

Nicholas in no sense invented these concepts nor were any of them new; his position was solidly grounded in tradition. What was new was the coherence given to traditional concepts, the clarity with which they were articulated, and the relevance attached to them by the manner in which they were applied to real situations involving genuine clashes of interest. There remains the question of whether the ideas set forth so powerfully in his many letters and exemplified so dramatically in his actions were those of Nicholas himself. It has been argued, for instance, that the real mind behind his letters and actions was that of ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN, a learned master of Church history, an astute ecclesiastical politician, and a highly effective writer who served as Nicholas' secretary after 862. Others have sought to demonstrate that Nicholas' ideas on papal authority were derived from a document that he knew was a forgery: the False Decretals of Pseudo-Isidore; consequently, Nicholas was little more than a dishonest manipulator of situations bent on gathering power into his own hands. Neither of these arguments has met the test of modern scholarship. Nicholas was his own man, piecing together from an almost inchoate body of traditional texts a consistent set of concepts that laid down the outlines of an ecclesiastical order that moved away from the caesaropapist and conciliar concepts that had held sway since the days of Constantine the Great toward a monarchical, hierarchical concept of ecclesiastical governance. For that reason, he found eager supporters in his own time when the unity of the Christian community was increasingly jeopardized by the fragmentation of authority, and he provided guidance for future generations of canonists and theologians in their efforts to shape the concepts of papal theocracy that so influenced the history of Western Christendom for several centuries to come.

NICHOLAS II, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 6 (?), 1058 (at Siena), to July 20, 1061 (at Florence); b. Gerard in French Burgundy, date uncertain. He became bishop of Florence before 1045 with the support of Duke Godfrey III the Bearded of Lorraine, husband of Beatrice of Tuscany who was the mother of Mathilda of Canossa and Tuscany. At the urging of Hildebrand (later Pope GREGORY VII) and PETER DAMIAN, the cardinals who had fled to Siena elected Gerard to the papacy with the approval of the German imperial court. After the condemnation of Gerard's opponent BENEDICT X at a synod at Sutri, the troops of Duke Godfrey escorted Nicholas to Rome where he was solemnly enthroned and crowned in January 1059. Outstanding events of his pontificate are 1) the Easter synod of 1059 held at the Lateran in Rome and 2) the council of Melfi held in August 1059, where the Norman leaders Robert Guiscard and Richard of Capua became vassals of the Roman Church. On the latter occasion Nicholas completely reversed papal attitudes toward the Normans in southern Italy. Instead of pursuing war against the invaders, he invested them as feudal suzerain with their earlier conquests, which were thus legitimized. Moreover, he enfeoffed Robert Guiscard with territories that were still in the hands of Byzantines or Saracens. The text of Robert's oath of fealty has been preserved in the canonical collection of Cardinal Deusdedit. Robert promised to protect the papacy, to aid in future elections, to abstain from further attacks on the lands of St. Peter and to make regular census payments.

The Lateran synod of April 1059 is famous for its decree regulating the procedures for papal elections in the future by way of sanctioning the unusual circumstances of the election of Nicholas II in retrospect. Future popes were to be determined by deliberations of the Cardinal-bishops who subsequently were to consult the other cardinals and Roman clergy and laity. The ill-defined rights of the German emperors were not abrogated. The decree embodies a significant reduction of the influence of the Roman clergy below the rank of bishop as well as of the laity, in particular of the old Roman nobility who had conspired in the election of Benedict X. Other decrees issued by the synod of 1059 promoted the aims of the reform: clerical celibacy, strict prohibition of the acquisition of ecclesiastical offices and property through payments (simony), and a common life for cathedral canons. The faithful were ordered to boycott the masses celebrated by unchaste priests, a revolutionary measure designed to enforce obedience to papal decrees.

The reputation of Nicholas II in the sources as well as in historical writings has always been overshadowed by that of his powerful contemporaries, Peter Damian, HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA, and Hildebrand. It is therefore impossible to determine his personal share in the major events of his reign, but there can be no doubt about its far-reaching importance. His reign ended for unknown reasons with a serious disagreement with the German court overshadowing the minority of the later Emperor Henry IV and favoring the schism of Cadalus of Parma.

NICHOLAS III, POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 25, 1277, to Aug. 22, 1280; b. Giovanni Gaetano Orsini, Rome, between 1210 and 1220; d. Soriano nel Cimino, near Viterbo. The ORSINI family was one of the most powerful Guelf dynasties in Rome. His father, Matteo Rosso, as senator of Rome, had defended the city against FREDERICK II and was a close friend of St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, whose Third Order or Tertiaries he joined in his old age. Grateful for the father's services to the Holy See, Pope INNOCENT IV appointed the son, Giovanni, cardinal-deacon of St. Nicholas in Carcere Tulliano (May 28, 1244) and provided him with benefices in York, Laon, and Soissons. In 1252 Giovanni participated in the papal mission to Florence to mediate between GUELFs AND GHIBELLINES. URBAN IV nominated him rector of Sabina and protector of the FRANCISCANS (1261) and, a year later, general inquisitor. As cardinal-deacon, he played a significant role in papal diplomacy, participating in the commission of cardinals that invested Charles of Anjou with the crown of Sicily (June 28, 1265). Giovanni also took part in the papal delegation to the German king, Rudolf I of Habsburg, which sought to negotiate the implementation of the imperial coronation and a settlement with Charles of Anjou in Sicily (1276).

Elected pope in Viterbo after a six-month vacancy, Nicholas III initiated a number of administrative reforms in the Church and the Papal States (see STATES OF THE CHURCH). He supported reforms in the papal curia, the most important of which concerned procedures in the chancery. He also sought to enhance the College of Cardinals, to which he appointed nine new members, among whom was his own brother, Giordano ORSINI, and his nephew, Latino Orsini. As bearer of an illustrious Roman lineage, Nicholas was eager to restore papal rule over the city, while preventing external control. To this end, he issued the Constitutio super electione senatoris Urbis (July 18, 1278), which forbade entrusting the government of Rome to foreign senators, a measure specifically designed to end the Angevin dominance. On a practical level, however, Nicholas refrained from renewing Angevin Charles of Anjou's rank as imperial vicar of Tuscany and senator of Rome. He further induced Rudolf I of Germany to acknowledge papal rule over Romagna (1278), a recognition endorsed by the German princes. The pope sent Cardinal Latino Orsini to take possession of the province and nominated another nephew, Berthold, Count of Romagna. Cardinal Latino Orsini also led the papal mission to Florence, which was intended to reorganize the rule of the city while terminating Angevin ascendancy (1279).

Nicholas's pontificate was marked by a number of attempts to resolve longstanding disputes. The union of churches decreed at the Second Council of Lyons (1274; see LYONS, COUNCILS OF) had not yet materialized because of the eastern emperor's failure to enforce its clauses (see EASTERN SCHISM). Nicholas demanded its strict enforcement and the use of stronger means to secure clergy obedience. The preservation of the Greek ritual was allowed only subsequent to papal approval and so long as it was not in contradiction to the unity of the faith; those prelates who opposed the union were forced to ask for absolution from the papal legates, sent to Constantinople for that purpose. The desired union, however, did not materialize, because of the great opposition it met among the Eastern Christians and the utilitarian approach of the emperor himself; furthermore, it brought about the postponement of the great crusade to the Holy Land, which never materialized.

As the spiritual leader of the Church but also because of his close links with the order, Nicholas was asked to settle the long internal struggle among the heirs of St. Francis, between Conventuals and Spirituals, who had brought the order as a whole to the verge of anarchy. The papal verdict was articulated in the decree Exiit qui seminat (Aug. 14, 1279), which confirmed the rule and provided the basis of Franciscan observance for the years to come. The pope revoked the concessions made by Pope Innocent IV in regard to the use of money and clarified apostolic rule over all possessions of the order, except those reserved by the donors. The papal document further declared that the religion of the Friars Minor "is founded upon the Gospel and strengthened by the teaching and life of Christ and His Apostles, rooted in poverty and humility by the gracious confessor of Christ, Francis. . . . The Rule obliges the abdication of the jus domini (dominion) and the retention of the usus facti (use)." The pope further established how this was to be observed, specifying the clothing to be worn. In the concluding paragraph, Nicholas forbade any change, interpretation, or addendum to the constitution, which was "to have perpetual validity and is to be published."

In the political sphere, Nicholas continued the policy of Pope GREGORY X, who tried to restrain the influence of Charles of Anjou in the Italian peninsula. In an attempt to end the conflict over Sicily and to restore equilibrium between the sovereign dynasties, the pope arranged a marriage treaty between the Angevin and Habsburg lineages, but was careful not to infringe upon the rights of the papacy (May 1280). The papal plans, however, proved short-lived, and the conflict broke out once again shortly after Nicholas's death. Nicholas's efforts to conclude a lasting peace between France and Castile remained futile, as well. The pope was more successful in Hungary, where King Ladislaus IV submitted to the apostolic dictates. Against the background of devastations perpetrated by the Cumani, Nicholas strengthened Christian influence in the area and appointed worthy prelates to the highest Church offices. At the request of the khan of the Mongols, he sent five Franciscans eastwards, whose mission set the first seeds of Christianity in Persia and China.

Nicholas established the permanent papal residence in the VATICAN and enlarged its palace and gardens. A political realist of great diplomatic skill, he was well known to his contemporaries for his integrity and impartiality. These characteristics were given public recognition when King LOUIS IX OF FRANCE asked for his services, as cardinal, to endorse the peace treaty that had been concluded between England and France (1258). In this regard, DANTE's accusations of simony, nepotism, and misconduct in Nicholas's dealings with Charles of Anjou (Divine Comedy, Inferno, c. 19) seem rather unfounded. The pope was buried in the Chapel of St. Nicholas, which he had built in St. Peter's Basilica.

NICHOLAS IV, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 22, 1288, to April 4, 1292; b. Girolamo Masci in Ascoli in the March of Ancona, Sept. 30, 1227; d. Rome. Son of a clerk of humble origins, he joined the FRANCISCAN Order in his youth. After studying at Assisi and Perugia, Girolamo became provincial minister of the order in Dalmatia (1272) and two years later succeeded St. BONAVENTURE as minister general (1274–79). As such, he participated in a papal mission to Constantinople (1272) whose objective was to assure the participation of the Eastern clergy in the Second Council of Lyons (1274; see LYONS, COUNCILS OF). When he was on a peace mission to France, Pope NICHOLAS III appointed him cardinal priest of Sta. Prudenziana (1278). Three years later, Martin IV promoted him to the rank of cardinal-bishop of Palestrina, the last step before his accession to the Holy See.

Following an 11-month vacancy, Nicholas was unanimously elected pope as a compromise candidate. At first reluctant to accept, he consented to his election only after a second vote, thus becoming the first Franciscan to reach the See of Peter. The long interregnum reflects the split in the College of Cardinals between the pro- and anti-French factions, which was to worsen in the years to come. The many troubles in the city prevented the pope, though elected senator of Rome for life, from permanently residing in his see. Faced with unrest in other areas of the Papal State (see STATES OF THE CHURCH), as well, Nicholas allied the papacy with the powerful family of the Colonna. He appointed Pietro COLONNA cardinal and elevated other members of the family to high Church positions. Convenient as it was in the short run, Nicholas's policy submerged the papacy in the endless vendettas that affected Italian politics; contemporaries criticized it in terms of surrender and portrayed the pope as enclosed in a column (the Colonna's insignia), with only his tiara-crowned head emerging.

Nicholas left a positive mark on the administration of the papal curia, whose functions he regulated and supervised in a most proficient way. Aware of the growing importance of the College of Cardinals and the many challenges facing apostolic authority, he issued a decree, Celestis altitudo potentie (June 18, 1289), which assigned one-half of papal revenues to the cardinals. Nicholas's decision—the roots of which can be found in 13th-century practice—reflected the increasing importance of the college. It also encouraged the involvement of the highest members of the Church in the administration of the Papal State, which provided a large proportion of apostolic revenues. Nicholas allowed the cardinals to take part in the administration of the funds under the control of the cardinal chamberlain and to make appointments, upon papal agreement, to rectorates and other offices in the Papal State.

Like his immediate predecessors on the papal throne, Nicholas, too, attempted to find a suitable agreement in regard to the Kingdom of Sicily, where papal suzerainty had been seriously jeopardized as a result of the Sicilian Vespers (March 30, 1282). The brutal massacre of the French had led to Charles of Anjou's loss of the kingdom, the crown of which was bestowed on Peter III of Aragon as Manfred's heir. Nicholas favored the Angevin party and annulled the treaty of Champfranc (Oct. 28, 1288), which had confirmed Aragonese rule in Sicily. The pope, furthermore, crowned the destitute Charles of Salerno king of Naples and Sicily (May 29, 1289). Still, having learned the problematic lessons of Angevin influence, Nicholas forced the new king to pay him homage as overlord and to condition his obtaining any office or rank in Rome and the Papal State upon specific papal authorization. Nicholas accompanied his political gestures with generous benefices, which aimed at providing the needs of the military campaign. Notwithstanding papal efforts, however, the Angevin cause was lost in Sicily, whose destiny remained in the hands of the Aragonese kings and their affiliates.

Papal policy in Germany did not meet with much success, either: Nicholas conducted an intensive correspondence with Rudolf I of Habsburg, the emperor-elect, in order to resolve all discords between the empire and the papacy; but the king died in 1291, before his much-delayed coronation materialized. The pope also challenged the German plans in Hungary. When Rudolf appointed his son Albert to succeed Ladislaus IV of Hungary, Nicholas claimed the realm as a papal fief and conferred the crown upon Charles Martel, the son of his faithful ally, Charles II of Salerno. The pope succeeded in bringing an end to the lasting conflict between France and Aragon. After Alfonso III of Aragon acquiesced in the establishment of a triple entente with King Philip IV of France and Charles of Salerno—the main target of which was his own brother, James of Sicily—the pope annulled the excommunication of the Aragonese king. Ambitious as it was, however, the papal plan did not materialize. James of Sicily successfully attacked southern Italy and became king of Aragon himself after Alfonso's death (June 18, 1291). He then appointed his youngest brother, Frederick, as vicegerent of the island.

The crusade caused the pope still another setback. Following the sack of Tripoli (April 1289), Nicholas called for a CRUSADE and dispatched 20 ships eastwards. The papal appeal, though, did not find favor among the Christian princes, who were preoccupied with their own conflicts in Europe. Two years later, the fall of Crusader Acre (May 1291) ended the agonizing existence of the Christian strongholds Outremer. The appeals of Il-Khan Arghun of Persia, who asked to create a joint front against the Muslims, did not engender much interest in the West, either. Up to the end of the Middle Ages, the plans for the "Recovery of the Holy Land," though an integral part of the political agenda of Christendom, never materialized.

Nicholas was much more successful in his missionary work. Faithful to the Franciscan ideals, he enlisted the papacy in the service of the mission in the Balkans, the Near East, Persia, China, and Ethiopia. He sent the friar Giovanni da Montecorvino to the court of Kublai Khan (1289), thus establishing the first seeds of the Catholic faith among the Mongols (in 1307 Pope CLEMENT V appointed the same Giovanni the first archbishop of Beijing). In parallel, Nicholas renewed the persecution of the sect of Apostolici of False Apostles, whose members desired to live according to the precepts of the primitive Christian community in Jerusalem in order to effect a literal observance of continence and poverty, but in open challenge to ecclesiastical norms.

Pious and learned, a benefactor of art and architecture, Nicholas brought eminent artists to Rome, such as Arnolfo di Cambio, Pietro Cavallini, and Giacomo Torriti. This led to the restoration of the basilicas of St. Giovanni in Laterano and Sta. Maria Maggiore, where the pope was later buried and where Pope Sixtus V constructed an impressive tombstone to Nicholas's memory.

NICHOLAS V, POPE

Pontificate: March 6, 1447, to March 24, 1455; b. Tommaso Parentucelli, Sarzana, Nov. 15, 1397; d. Rome. Thomas, the son of a doctor, had to abandon his studies at Bologna on being orphaned. Thereupon he acted as tutor in two wealthy Florentine families, and was thus influenced by the humanistic and artistic ferment of that city. After finishing his studies at Bologna, he entered the household of Bp. Niccolò ALBERGATI OF BOLOGNA, whom he served faithfully for 20 years, accompanying him to Rome, Florence, and elsewhere, profiting by the example of his saintly patron. After Albergati's death (1443), EUGENE IV first made Parentucelli bishop of Bologna, which being in revolt refused him entry; Eugene then sent him on missions to Germany. There he successfully mitigated antipapal opposition and was made cardinal in December 1446.

On Eugene's death (1447), Parentucelli was elected pope. Proclaiming a policy of peace, he dismissed the mercenary troops; conciliated by concessions various Roman families, even allowing the rebuilding and partial refortification of Palestrina; and granted Bologna practical independence. Poland was attached to the Holy See by further concessions; Frederick III of Austria was won to Nicholas's cause by the Concordat of Vienna (1448) and a promise of imperial coronation, fulfilled in 1452. Frederick consequently withdrew his safe-conducts from the rump council of Basel, which then went to Lausanne. Nicholas agreed to extremely generous conditions for its dissolution, letting it accept the antipope Felix's resignation, "elect" Parentucelli pope, and decree its own dissolution. With the end of the council, Nicholas rehabilitated all its members in their dignities and made Felix cardinal with a pension (1449).

In 1450 Nicholas proclaimed a Jubilee, which drew pilgrims from all Western Christendom, and served at once to strengthen devotion, to reestablish the papacy as the center of the Church, and to improve both papal and Roman finances. The occasion was marred by an outbreak of plague, during which Nicholas left the city, and by a traffic disaster on the Ponte Sant'Angelo in which at least 172 people were trampled to death. The few, but worthy, cardinals he created included NICHOLAS OF CUSA, the promoter of reform in Germany.

The pope's chief claim to fame is the impulse he gave to the RENAISSANCE in Rome. He made, and in great part carried out, elaborate building plans (including a renovation of the Leonine city) in a Rome that was in ruins after more than a century of neglect. The stational churches, various palaces attached to basilicas, bridges, and roads, as well as the city's fortifications, were rebuilt, and in many parts of the Papal States fortresses were erected. To decorate his buildings he invited artists from many nations, especially from Florence. The best known was Fra Angelico, some of whose work still remains in the chapel of S. Lorenzo in the Vatican. The pope's commissions encouraged the art of tapestry, the ornamentation of rich vestments, and gold and silver work.

However, his principal interest was books. His agents searched for rare codices in many countries, an army of copyists was employed to multiply them, and some of the most celebrated humanists labored in their correction and translation. The writings of Herodotus, Thucydides, Homer, Polybius, Strabo, and other authors of Greek antiquity, as well as many works of the Greek Fathers, were rendered into Latin, and thus made available to those who did not read Greek. In his literary pursuits Nicholas spent vast sums of money and was generous to a fault to the humanists, several of them Greek refugees, who thronged to the papal court. At his death Nicholas left a library of 807 Latin and 353 Greek MSS, a very large collection for that day (see VATICAN LIBRARY).

The year 1453 was disastrous for the pope. In January he forestalled a plot against his life, becoming in consequence more timorous than ever; he had all the ringleaders executed. In May the Turks captured Constantinople, and the fleet of papal and Venetian ships (the latter with orders not to annoy the Turks) was too late to help. His health also deteriorated. He tried to rally Western Christians to a crusade, but the effort was ineffectual. With the same objective, he invited the Italian States to meet in Rome to arrange a treaty of peace. The meeting failed, but prepared the way for private diplomacy, leading to the peace of Lodi (1454), in which Nicholas and finally all the States acquiesced. The States, however, were not willing to risk their wealth for the protection of Christendom.

Nicholas, a man of unstained life, vivacious, but simple in manner, had the artistic spirit to appreciate all forms of art and to harmonize them, giving architecture the first place. His importance in the arts and in literature cannot be overestimated. In a deathbed speech he claimed that he had patronized the arts, not for personal fame but, by making Rome outstanding, to strengthen religious allegiance. His policy of "peace by concession" was breaking down as his reign ended, for the princes did not share his ideals.

NICHOLAS V, ANTIPOPE

May 12, 1328, to Aug. 25, 1330; b. Pietro Rainalducci, at Corvaro (Rieti), Italy; d. Avignon, Oct. 16, 1333. The details surrounding Pietro's life are scarce. He was from humble origins and was married for five years to Giovanna Mattei. He left his wife and joined the Franciscans at Aracoeli in Rome in 1310. The reports of his character are varied and range from admiration to disapprobation. On May 12, 1328, Emperor Louis IV of Bavaria had Pietro elected to the papacy as part of a campaign to dislodge the reigning Pope JOHN XXII. Using the name Nicholas V, Pietro found some popularity among Augustinian and spiritual Franciscan sympathizers. For example, in the early part of his reign Nicholas enjoyed support from such notables as William of Ockham and Michael of Cesena. When Louis IV was forced to retreat to northern Italy on April 11, 1329, however, Nicholas broke with his protector. Having also lost the support of his fellow Franciscans, Nicholas took temporary asylum in the castle of Burgaro under the care of Count Bonifacio of Doronatico. In order to keep him safe from an approaching Florentine army, Count Bonifacio secretly moved Nicholas to Pisa. Nevertheless, Pope John XXII discovered this new location and began negotiations for Nicholas' arrest. An agreement was eventually reached and on Aug. 25, 1330, Nicholas appeared in Avignon, renounced his office, and submitted to Pope John. Pietro Rainalducci received a small pension and pardon in exchange for his abdication but he was kept under house arrest until his death.

NICHOLAS HERMANSSON, ST.

Bishop, hymnographer; b. Skäninge, c. 1326; d. Linköping, Sweden, May 2, 1391. Having studied in Paris and Orléans, Nicholas (Nils or Nikolaus) was canon in Uppsala, Sweden, 1350; archdeacon in Linköping, 1360; and bishop of that diocese in 1374. He had educated BRIDGET OF SWEDEN's sons, and in 1384 Vadstena, the motherhouse of the Bridgettines (see BRIGITTINE SISTERS), was founded in his diocese. He is regarded as the greatest of the hymnographers of medieval Sweden. He was an important and stern churchman and at times opposed the royal power. The cult of St. ANSGAR became popular in Sweden through his efforts. In 1414 his canonization was attempted without result, but in 1499 Rome gave permission for his relics to be translated; the translation was carried out in 1515.

NICHOLAS OF AARHUS, BL.

Danish ascetic; b. Jutland, c. 1150; d. Aarhus, Denmark, 1180. Nicholas, or Niels, was a bastard son of King Canute V Magnusson (d. 1157). He spent some years at the Danish court but later retired to his estates near Aarhus, where he led a simple and saintly life. Legend praises his chastity and charity. He was regarded as one of the patron saints of Aarhus although he was probably never formally canonized or beatified. There was an unsuccessful process initiated in Rome in 1254, and in connection with this a number of miracles were recorded.

Feast: Now unknown.

NICHOLAS OF AUTRE COURT

Scholastic theologian; b. Autrecourt (Ultricuria), near Verdun, France, c. 1300; d. Metz, shortly after 1350. Having obtained his degree in arts at Paris, he became a bachelor of theology. In 1340 BENEDICT XII cited Nicholas to the papal court at Avignon on suspicion of teaching erroneous doctrines. On May 19, 1346, CLEMENT VI condemned Nicholas and ordered his works to be burned in public. His surviving writings are nine letters to Bernard of Arezzo, of which only two are complete; one letter to Giles of Medonta; a question, Utrum visio creaturae possit naturaliter intendi; and an important treatise, Ad videndum an sermones Peripateticorum fuerini demonstrativi, usually designated by the opening words, Exigit ordo or Satis exigit ordo. The complete treatise is extant in one manuscript only. In the prologue he states clearly that he does not intend to establish any positive teaching but only to examine the main Averroist doctrines and to test the validity of their demonstrations. He asks that the reader not accept as a fact the eternity of the world or atomism or any of the statements he makes in proving that the peripatetic conclusions are, at best, only probable and, at worst, quite false. He also asks that men not spend their whole life investigating the sayings of Aristotle and his commentators; rather, let them adhere to the sacred Christian law and the articles of faith. The judges at Nicholas's trial for heresy rejected such assertions as mere subterfuge (excusatio vulpina).

In his attack on ARISTOTELIANISM and Averroism, Nicholas began with two principles: that all knowledge comes from sensation and that there is only one valid criterion of certitude, namely, the basic principle that contradictories cannot at one and the same time be true. However, the senses do deceive man, and it is often difficult to reduce arguments to the principle of contradiction. Therefore, in most cases, one must be satisfied with probabilities. Nicholas applied these principles in criticisms of Averroist-Aristotelian physics, of the theory of knowledge, and of causality. Concerning physics, generation and corruption as described by Aristotle cannot be proved; atomism, which Aristotle rejected, is just as probable an explanation. Nicholas's method was either to prove a doctrine contrary to that held by Aristotle or to prove an Aristotelian argument to be insufficient. Concerning knowledge, Nicholas first proves that there is not a single intellect for all men (see INTELLECT, UNITY OF). He then shows that man is certain of his sensations, of his feelings, and of principles known by means of terms. He is aware of the objection that evidence and truth are not identical. In reply he asserts that, since the intellect desires truth, deprivation of truth would be a violation of universal goodness and man's desires would be in vain. Nicholas did not deny CAUSALITY, but he did deny its de-monstrability. The doctrines expressed by Nicholas were not unique: JOHN OF MIRECOURT, a contemporary, taught many of them. It is difficult to assess the influence of Nicholas because of the condemnation of 60 of his theses in 1346 and his abjuration in 1347 (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. Denifle and E. Chatelain, 4. v. [Paris 1889–97], 2:576–587). After his condemnation he is supposed to have fled to the court of Louis IV, the Bavarian.

NICHOLAS OF BASEL

Layman, heretical Beghard; d. Vienna, c. 1395. Preaching in the Rhine region near Basel (see BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS), he proclaimed himself inspired and insisted that he was endowed with authority to govern the use of episcopal and priestly powers. He taught that submission to his direction was necessary for attaining spiritual perfection and that his followers could not sin even though they committed the worst crimes and disobeyed both Church and pope. K. Schmidt considered him the author of the Bericht von der Bekehrung, Taulers (ed. Strasbourg 1875), which attributed the conversion of Johannes TAULER (1300–61) to the Gottesfreund vom Oberland (Friend of God of the Upper Rhine), whom Schmidt identified as Nicholas of Basel. This theory has now been generally abandoned. Nicholas was burned at the stake with two of his followers.

NICHOLAS OF CLAMANGES

Christian humanist and theologian; b. Nicholas Poillevillain, Clamanges (Champagne, Diocese of Châlons), c. 1360; d. Paris, 1437. At the age of 12 he entered the College of Navarre in Paris, where he pursued literary and theological studies. He quickly won renown and made many lasting friendships in the circle of the humanists at court—John of Montreuil, James of Nouvion, Gonthier Col, and later Nicholas of Blaye; and at the papal court in Avignon, John Muret and John of Moccia. In 1393 he became rector of the University of PARIS, where his friends and colleagues included PETER OF AILLY and Jean GERSON. Urged by his friends, he went to Avignon, where in 1397 he became papal secretary under the anti-pope BENEDICT XIII. Having escaped death during the plague of 1398, he returned to Langres. Although he was deeply involved in the political pressures surrounding the AVIGNON PAPACY, Nicholas nevertheless seriously promoted measures for ending the WESTERN SCHISM. After Benedict's escape from Avignon, Nicholas rejoined him until the second withdrawal of obedience of 1408. He then returned to France permanently, residing in Langres, Valprofond, and Fontaine au Bois. In 1432 he returned to the College of Navarre in Paris; he engaged in writing till his death.

Above all Nicholas was a distinguished man of letters, an authentic Christian humanist. His was not a combative temperament; he never took sides directly in the factions that tore France asunder or the parties that divided the Church. It was by his letters and treatises that he intervened in the affairs of his century. Of his 151 extant letters, 138 were edited by J. Lydius, the others by A. Coville. Of his treatises, De fructu eremi and De fructu rerum adversarum were written c. 1408 at the time of his trials. Literary works include a tale and several poetic pieces, e.g., Descriptio et laus urbis Januae, Deploratio calamitatis ecclesiasticae, Descriptio vitae rusticae, Descriptio vitae tyrannicae. His other works treat of the internal strife in France (De lapsu et reparatione justitiae and the Oratio ad Galliarum principes) or deal with the Schism and the misfortunes of the Church, especially his De ruina et reparatione ecclesiae and De praesulibus simoniacois.

His vehement but justified criticism of the morals of ecclesiastics has sometimes caused Nicholas to be considered a precursor of the REFORMATION. But such was not the case. His critiques were no harsher than those of Peter of Ailly or Dietrich of NIEHEIM. He was neither a revolutionary nor a pagan. Although greatly influenced in his style and arguments by the ancient writers whom he cited abundantly, he always returned to the Scriptures and his reflections and counsels are authentically Christian. Also extant are several beautiful prayers, a commentary on Isaias, De filio prodigo, De novis festitatibus non instituendis, and De studio theologico, in which he voices his deep conviction: We must not belabor the word of God; with it we must nourish our souls and give it abundantly to others.

NICHOLAS OF CUSA

Cardinal and bishop of Brixen (Bressanone, Italy), ecclesiastical politician, philosopher, theologian, and mathematician, also known as Cusanus; b. Kues (Lat. Cusa), part of the town Bernkastel-Kues on the Moselle, Diocese of Treves (Trier), Germany, 1401; d. Todi in Umbria, Italy, Aug. 11, 1464.

Life. After studies at Heidelberg and Padua, Cusanus took the doctorate in Canon Law in 1423. He probably taught for a few years at the University of Cologne after 1425, and in 1428 and 1435 refused calls made upon him by the recently founded University of Louvain. His period of greatness began in 1432, when he went to the Council of BASEL to defend the claims of Ulrich of Manderscheid to the archdiocesan See of Trier against Bishop Raban of Speyer, who was named to the see by the pope. Although he lost the case, the publication of his work on ecclesiastical law, De concordantia catholica, in which he supported the superiority of the general council over the pope, caused him to become one of the most respected members of the council. In the course of the year, relations between EUGENE IV and the council became worse. Finally a break came over the question of a site for a proposed council for reunion with the Greeks. One of the presidents, Cardinal Giuliano CESARINI, led a minority group, which included Nicholas, in endorsing the pope's choice of a place in Italy; when Eugene moved the council to FERRARA, Cusa left Basel. His leaving the conciliar radicals and joining forces with the pope was a decisive point in his life. It was not, as many of his former friends claimed, a change of party based on convenience, but rather a genuine change of attitude stemming from his newly acquired understanding that the unity of the Church could be guaranteed only by the papacy.

In the winter of 1437–38, he was a member of the papal legation to Constantinople to win the Greek emperor and the hierarchy of the Greek Church over to the papal plan and to bring them to Italy. From the early summer of 1438 on, he worked so indefatigably in Germany for the cause of Pope Eugene at meetings with emperors and princes—until the concluding of the Vienna Concordat (1448)—that A. S. Piccolomini, later PIUS II, referred to him as the "Hercules among Eugene's followers." In acknowledgment of his great services, Eugene's successor, NICHOLAS V, created Cusa a cardinal. In March 1450, the pope gave him (in disregard of the recently concluded concordat) the Diocese of Brixen, and himself consecrated Cusa, who had become a priest between 1436 and Oct. 11, 1440.

Toward the end of the Jubilee Year, the pope made him his legate to Germany with a threefold task: to invigorate the religious life of the people by preaching the Jubilee indulgence; to reform the religious and diocesan clergy; and to work for peace. This official journey, lasting from Dec. 30, 1450, to March 1452, was the high point of Cusa's life. The legate visited many cities and cloisters in a circle tour of Vienna, Magdeburg, Haarlem, and Trier, preached often to clergy and laity, held provincial and diocesan synods at which he published his reform decrees, made visitations, and disposed authoritatively of questions placed before him. Utilizing competent coworkers, he conducted his journey as a gigantic parish mission (cf. J. Koch, Nikolaus von Cues und seine Umwelt, Heidelberg 1948, 116–148).

Around Easter, 1452, he took over his diocese, and he held office until his death. During the five years he actually reigned, he not only established the finances and holdings of the diocese on a sound basis, but strove to make it a model diocese through such measures as frequent episcopal sermons, diocesan synods, and visitations of parishes and cloisters. If he met opposition here, he encountered even more when he attempted to regain his land rights as a prince, in accordance with the medieval practice. Since Duke Sigmund of Austria, who as Count of Tyrol was protector of the Church in Brixen, would allow no encroachment on his own property rights, a conflict ensued, and the cardinal was eventually defeated. Fearing that the duke intended to kill him, Cusa fled from the episcopal city in June 1457 and took refuge in the fortress of Buchenstein in the Dolomites. In the fall of 1458 he left his diocese altogether. His attempt to return after the Congress of Mantua (1459) ended, after the duke’s short siege of Cusa’s castle at Bruneck in the Puster valley, with Cusa’s promise to meet all his adver-sary’s demands. Pius II regarded the actions against the cardinal as an insult to the Holy See and began ecclesiastical proceedings against Sigmund. Since the latter would not relent, he was excommunicated and the province of Tyrol placed under interdict. Only after the death of Cusa and that of his papal benefactor was the long and bitter feud terminated and the papal censure finally removed.

The last years of the cardinal, however, were by no means solely occupied by this unfortunate strife, for the pope assigned him many important tasks. Without enumerating these, one may say that Nicholas was an influential adviser of Pius II. Nicholas’s body was buried in his titular church of St. Peter in Chains, but his heart reposes in the hospital for the poor that he, his father, and sister built in his native Kues. According to a letter to the archbishop of Trier (Brixen, Dec. 14, 1453), in which he made known his intention to give to the poor whatever God gave him, he used the income from his benefices toward the hospital’s construction, completed in 1458 (deed for the foundation: Rome, Dec. 3, 1458). Whereas much that the cardinal wrote and accomplished was short-lived, this institution endures to the present. Since the hospital contains his library, which is still priceless despite the losses it has suffered, it is a center for scholarly research.

Works. It is amazing that with all his extraordinary activity in ecclesiastical affairs Nicholas still found time to write. He had the singular gift of being able to concentrate on the tasks that confronted him and yet to be completely relaxed in his leisure, reading the Fathers, as well as contemplating philosophical, theological, and mathematical problems—often writing down his solutions with remarkable facility. Only his most important works can be mentioned here. On Feb. 12, 1440, in Kues, he finished his first philosophical work, De DOCTA IGNORANTIA (On Learned Ignorance). This document presupposes the Christian faith and proposes to show that man's knowledge of God is only ignorance. His second work, which was purely philosophical and was written about 1442, examines the extent of possible knowledge for man and is entitled De coniecturis. Since in his view an exact concept of truth is not possible for man, Nicholas calls every positive statement about truth "conjecture." In the summer vacation of 1450, Nicholas wrote four dialogues under the general title of Idiota—including De sapientia (2 books), De mente, and De staticis experimentis—and two mathematical treatises. The fall of Constantinople (1453) inspired him to write the religious treatise De pace fidei, and in his involuntary retreat in the castle at Buchenstein (1457–58) he wrote an essay concerning the problems of human knowledge, De beryllo. The works penned in Rome in the last years of his life—De non aliud (1462), De venatione sapientiae (1463), De ludo globi (1464), and De apice theoriae (1464)—reflect, for the most part, conversations in the household circle of his friends and young associates. In addition to these there are approximately 300 (mostly dated) sermon outlines and notes (1430–59). (See index by J. Koch, Cusanus-Texte I. Predigten 7. Heidelberg 1942, 48–194.) Separately handed down are the sermon the cardinal gave on June 5, 1463, at the investiture in the Benedictine convent at Monte Oliveto (Umbria, Italy), and the moving letter he wrote a few days later to the novices (G. von Bredow, "Das Vermächtnis des Nikolaus von Kues," Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Heidelberg 1955, 2 Abh.).

Thought. Nicholas's writings are, in their entire approach, non-scholastic; thus he cannot be located in any theological school of his time. He relies on the Neoplatonic Christian tradition, which originated with PROCLUS and PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, and came down by way of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA and the School of Chartres to Meister ECKHART, without identifying himself with any school. Nicholas rejects the scholastic method of questions, arguments pro and con, etc., and develops a new style of philosophical essay. This itself is the expression of Cusa's firm conviction that all human knowledge is inaccurate and that truth can be attained only by "infinitely many steps." The medieval ideal of the Summa, in which each question and answer has its determined place, no longer exists for him. A factor that played a decisive role in Cusa's mathematical as well as his philosophical essays was the idea—which occurred to him on his voyage from Constantinople to Venice (1437–38) and seemed to him like a "gift from above"—that contradictions will be resolved in infinity (coincidentia oppositorum). With the aid of this principle he believed that he, though a mathematical dilettante, could solve the twofold problem of the quadrature of the circle and the transformation of a circular arc into its length by simple construction.

Learned Ignorance. The discovery of this principle, above all, led him to his new method of "learned ignorance." Nicholas developed this first in the light of man's knowledge of God. He began with the Neoplatonic concept of God as an absolute unity. He preferred this concept to others, because the notion of the Triune is the fundamental concept of Christian theology. Absolute unity is infinite. Since no relationship between the infinite and the finite permits a comparison, and man's discursive thinking depends upon comparison, God is inaccessible to such thought. Is God so remote from man's knowledge that all statements made by Christian philosophers and theologians about Him are empty of content? According to the teaching of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, the analogy of being furnishes concepts that help man overcome the infinite chasm that separates him from God. This method Nicholas did not adopt as his own, because he did not accept its supposition, viz, the philosophy of being.

The method Cusa developed was a method of investigation through symbols (symbolice investigare). A symbol by its very nature relates to something it symbolizes. It does not represent a concept, but rather an image. Where does one get symbols? Nicholas answers: The human intellect either conceives symbols in itself or it creates them. An object is known to be as it is only when it owes its existence to the human intellect. It is for this reason that Nicholas chooses his first symbols from geometry. From a given straight line, a triangle, a circle, and a sphere are "unfolded." These are already contained potentially within the line itself. Thereupon, Nicholas asks one to make a double transcendence, i.e., a double venture beyond the finite. With the first step he arrives at the infinite straight line—there is only one—that does not contain within itself a potentiality for triangle, circle, and sphere, but rather, simultaneously, is really infinite triangle, infinite circle, and infinite sphere. This infinite geometric formulation is not only unimaginable but also beyond rationality, since the contradictions, straight and curved, are resolved in it (coincidentia oppositorum). In the second transcendence one must abstract from all quantity and raise himself to the absolute, simple infinity of God. He stays with this in “ignorance,” but it is “learned ignorance,” because, in symbols, one somehow touches God’s infinity. It is as if he sees through a mirror darkly (1 Cor 13.12). The symbol points out that God’s infinity in this way is unity, a unity that is simultaneously absolute fullness and that contains within itself implicitly (complicite) all opposites in absolute simplicity. Yet, in his De coniecturis, Cusa changed this doctrine by holding that God is infinitely above the coincidence of opposites.

The Cosmos. Although Cusa’s development of geometric symbols is open to criticism [see M. Feigl, Divus Thomas 22 (1944) 321–338], symbolic theology, to which Nicholas devoted much thought to the end, is itself worthy of study. Especially profound and penetrating is the insight contained in De ludo globi. When God created the world He “unfolded” Himself, but in otherness, in such a way that all creatures are somehow images of God, although they have only a “contracted” being. The universe participates in God’s infinity insofar as it has no given limits in space and time. It is also a unity, although not an absolute unity like God, but rather a contracted one that contains a potentially infinite variety and differentiation that is all implicitly within it. The “self-unfolding” of the universe can be seen in two ways. First, it develops step by step. This idea of a stepwise, hierarchical cosmos Nicholas could have taken from tradition. What was new was the thought, which G. W. LEIBNIZ was later to systematize, that all steps are so connected with each other that the world displays an uninterrupted continuity from the least elements to the highest spirits. The second consideration begins with the idea that everything that really exists is individually determined. If the universe is evidenced in the individual, the latter is similarly representative of the universe.

Nicholas breaks fundamentally, as one can see, with the ancient and medieval concept of the world. If the universe is infinite in space, then it has no immovable center. Earth is a planet among planets and not inferior to the others. It has a special place in that it is the habitat of man, whose nature is more perfect than that of other inhabitants of the visible world.

Man. Human nature is a world in miniature, a microcosmos—an idea first expressed in Greek natural philosophy. Nicholas, however, went further, speaking of man as a “human god” and a “second god.” This is not for him the expression of a proud Renaissance consciousness, but rather the interpretation of the words God used to create man according to His own image (Gn 1.27). Nicholas sees this likeness above all in the creative power of the human intellect. Just as God is the Creator of the real world, so is man not only the creator of his world of concepts (including mathematical concept), but also the inventor of many things for which he does not find a pattern in nature but only in his own intellect. Also, in this regard, he is like the Creator who encompasses all things within Himself. Man is finally like God in that he possesses freedom of will, although unlike God in that this freedom includes the possibility of choosing evil. Man can make of himself an angel or a beast; both are contained potentially in human nature. His moral responsibility is to develop within himself a likeness to the triune God.

Other Contributions. Nicholas was a universal thinker who illuminated and contributed to many areas of scientific endeavor without being a specialist in these fields. His contributions to astronomy and mathematics were significant. Through his “thought experiments” with the balance, he earned himself a place in the history of scientific methodology. The first geographical map of central Europe was inspired by him. So, too, can the first catechetical chart in the German language be traced to him. Above all he was an important legal historian who recognized the illegality of the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE and the Pseudo-Isidorian decrees; he wished to have the ancient sources of Germanic law compiled in a unified German law, and he was able to support his claims for the restoration of his rights as a prince-landowner through an exact knowledge of the documents in his episcopal archives concerning the development of the territory of the Church in Brixen. His all-embracing spirit set as a lifetime goal the reestablishing of a complete harmony in everything, but this grand scheme was destined to remain an unaccomplished ideal.

NICHOLAS OF DINKELSBÜHL

German theologian; b. Dinkelsbühl, Germany, c. 1360; d. Vienna, Austria, March 17, 1433. He attended a good Latin school, probably in the Carmelite monastery of his native town, and in 1385 he went to the University of Vienna, which had only the preceding year been staffed with a theology faculty. He was awarded the master of arts degree and the licentiate in 1389 and began theological studies while lecturing in the arts faculty. From 1392 to 1393 and again in 1397, he was dean of the arts faculty. He received his licentiate in theology in 1408 and the degree of master of theology in 1409. For more than 40 years he lectured in Vienna; he was made rector of the university from 1405 to 1406 and was dean of the faculty of theology in 1418, 1425, and 1427. He continued brilliantly, if with little originality, the tradition of his more famous teachers HENRY HEINBUCHÉ OF LANGENSTEIN and Henry of Oyta. Nicholas was celebrated as the lux ex Suevia, and Peter of Pirchenwart (d. 1436) called him in his obituary "a veritable second founder of our University." In 1405 he became canon of St. Stephen's and in 1425, confessor to Duke Albrecht V (d. 1439) of Austria, whose ecclesiastical policy he had successfully supported. As an ambassador of the duke, Nicholas was active from 1414 to 1418 at the Council of CONSTANCE, where he greeted Emperor SIGISMUND upon his entry into the city on Dec. 24, 1414. He represented the German nation at the assembly that elected MARTIN V pope in 1417, ending the WESTERN SCHISM. In an oration addressed to Martin V, he begged especially for Martin's support of the reform movement initiated by the Abbey of MELK, a reform of which Nicholas was one of the founders and pioneers. As a member of the Holy Office, he was especially involved in the trial of JEROME OF PRAGUE. The testimonial he compiled on the "scandalous tenets" of the Dominican John of FALKENBERG nevertheless reveals Nicholas's natural disposition to be a mediator. In 1427 he was commissioned by Martin V to preach to the HUSSITES. Nicholas not only came out in favor of CONCILIARISM, as his class and rank would dictate, but he was a voluminous writer of important sermons on the subject, aside from his academic lecturing and research activity. His manuscripts have been preserved in Vienna, Munich, Melk, Klosterneuburg, Graz, and Vorau; and although they number more than 1,000, only a few have been edited. He wrote the usual commentaries on the Sentences, among which the Quaestiones Mellicenses are outstanding, and also commentaries on the Scriptures. Here he was following the scholastic tradition, which likewise set the style for his general sermons. He showed an original talent in his treatises and sermons on the ecclesiastical policy questions of his time, the Hussite heresy, and conciliarism. His Avisamenta vel Reformationis methodus deals with monastic reform; and another group of manuscripts includes various works, such as De praeparatione ad missam. Nicholas's remains are buried in the Cathedral of St. Stephen in Vienna.

[H. WOLFRAM]

NICHOLAS OF FLÜE, ST.

Farmer, politician, father of ten children and then hermit, whose influence saved Switzerland from disruption in 1481; b. at what is now Flüeli, near Sachseln, Obwalden, Switzerland, March 21?, 1417; d. in the Ranft, a nearby ravine, March 21, 1487. The first child of a devout and relatively wealthy couple, Klaus (as he was usually called) was a remarkable lad, given to praying unostentatiously, and early influencing his companions. As a youngster he fasted every Friday, and this was increased to four times a week, probably soon after a vision he had at the age of 16. This vision of a tower rising up from the Ranft deeply impressed him and made him long for a solitary life. In the fifteenth century there was already conscription among the Swiss, and Klaus was drafted into the army for the Zurich wars (1440-44) and the Thurgau War (1460). A fellow conscript recorded that Klaus "did but little harm to the enemy, but rather always went to one side, prayed, and protected the defeated enemy as best he could." During the Thurgau campaign he put a stop to the burning of the Dominican convent of St. Katharinental near Diessenhofen, where an Austrian garrison had taken refuge. Probably not long after the Zurich War, Klaus married Dorothea Wyss from Oberwilen. His longing for the life of a hermit had seemingly become quiescent, but it was still latent and caused an inner conflict that became acute about 20 years later. Owing to gaps in the Obwalden archives, most of Klaus's political and judicial activity must remain unknown, but, on his own admission, he had considerable authority as a judge and councilor. He said he did not remember ever having been unjust. Despite his obvious ability, he despised temporal honors and contrived to prevent his election as Landman. About 1463, family life became a burden to him and, advised by a priest friend, he found temporary relief in devoting much time to meditation upon the Passion. Troubled by irremediable events, which were proving obstacles to his peace of mind, he withdrew from politics about 1465. The longing to become a hermit made itself felt ever more acutely; and, convinced that it was what God wanted of him, Klaus wrested the permission from Dorothea to leave her. Three and a half months after the birth of their fifth son, Nicholas, who was to become a priest and doctor in theology, Klaus left home, on Oct. 16, 1467. Fearing local opposition, he set off to cross the frontier, but near Liestal a seemingly supernatural intervention made him retrace his steps. His first attempt at heremetical life was made on the forsaken Klisterli Alp in the Melchtal. This came to nought, thanks to the curious, scoffing visitors who came to see him. Klaus repaired to the Ranft, to the site of the tower of his youthful vision, quite near his home. For the remaining 19 ½ years of his life, he abstained completely from food. Neighbors helped him build a log cabin; a year later, however, it was the local authorities, who, after having set guards to watch him and convince themselves that he and his fast were genuine, constructed a hermitage and an adjoining chapel. In 1469, Thomas Weldner, auxiliary bishop of Constance, came to test Klaus and to consecrate the chapel. Churchmen and politicians came to ask his advice, and people in great numbers consulted him in their troubles. Even his wife, with whom he had clearly a deep understanding, was among the visitors to the hermitage. Friendly, affectionate, and thoughtful, he had a remarkable gift for encouraging the sad and depressed. To all he was known as "Bruder Klaus." Owing to his efforts, the quarrelling cantons came together at the Diet of Stans in December of 1481; and when, during the assembly, they were on the point of returning home to settle matters by arms, his advice to the delegates, transmitted by Heinrich am Grund, the parish priest, restored peace. Nicholas was buried at Sachseln, where his body still lies. He was canonized in 1947 and is venerated by Catholics and Protestants alike. His importance as a figure of peace and brotherhood can hardly be exaggerated. Owing to his unique visions and prodigious memory, he has attracted the attention of psychologists as well.

Feast: March 21; Sept. 25 (Switzerland).

NICHOLAS OF MYRA, ST.

Bishop of Myra in Lycia, first half of the fourth century, but often called Nicholas of Bari (Italy). No historically trustworthy evidence of his ancestry or the events of his life exists, except for the fact of his episcopate. Legends have him born in the Lycian town of Patara, imprisoned in the Diocletian persecution, and present at the Council of Nicaea I, and fix his death date at 345 or 352. JUSTINIAN I built a church in his honor in the early sixth century (Procopius, De aedificiis 1.6), and Basil the Macedonian, an oratory in the imperial palace about 870. In the West, the first pope to bear his name built a basilica in his honor in the Lateran (c. 860). His cult was brought to Germany by the Byzantine Princess Theophano, wife of Otto II (973–983). It came to Italy with the theft in 1087 of his body by Italian soldiers and its "translation" to Bari. More than 2,000 churches are dedicated to him in France and Germany, and about 400 in England. Russia, Sicily, Lorraine, and Greece honor him as patron. The principal miracle-legends deal with his liberation of three unjustly imprisoned officers; his secret provision of dowries for three poor girls; and his deliverance of three innocent youths condemned to death. The oldest documentary evidence of the Nicholas legends is an eleventh-century manuscript in Karlsruhe Library. The dowry legend was combined in Germany with local folklore to make St. Nicholas into the bringer, on the eve of his feast, of secret presents for children; in the English-speaking countries his name was corrupted into Santa Claus, and the legend became associated with Christmas Eve.

Feast: Dec. 6; May 9 (translation of relics to Bari).

NICHOLAS OF PRUSSIA, BL.

Benedictine monk; b. Prussia, c. 1379; d. monastery of San Niccolo del Boschetto, near Genoa, Italy, Feb. 23, 1456. He made his vows on Feb. 6, 1414, under Abbot Louis Barbo (d. 1443) in the reformed monastery of Santa Giustina in Padua. Subsequently, he lived for a time in San Giorgio, Venice, and in SAN BENEDETTO DI POLIRONE near Mantua before going to Genoa, where he was made prior and novice master by 1430. He was noted for his zealous observance of the monastic rule, his holiness of life, and his gift of miracles. His relics are at San Giuliano d'Albaro, near Genoa. His cult is not approved.

NICHOLAS OF STRASSBURG

Dominican theologian and mystic; fl. 1323 to 1329. A member of the German province, he was a contemporary of JOHN OF STERNGASSEN, Gerard of Sterngassen, and Meister ECKHART. He may have studied theology in Paris. Before 1323 he wrote a Summa philosophica (5 bks.; MS Vat. lat 3091), in which he synthesized the doctrine of ALBERT THE GREAT and THOMAS AQUINAS. Between 1323 and 1329 he was lector at the priory in Cologne and vicar of the master general in reforming the German province. During the process against Eckhart in 1326 he defended his confrere and exonerated his doctrines. When the archbishop of Cologne renewed charges against Eckhart in 1327, Nicholas was also implicated. During the crisis he was excommunicated, possibly out of revenge, by a confrere, Hermann of Höchst; but the pope absolved him completely that same year. His best-known work is De adventu Christi, written about 1323. Some scholars have called it a plagiarism because it is a compilation drawn from two treatises by JOHN (QUIDORT) OF PARIS. Although he was a popular preacher, only 13 of his German sermons are extant; they reflect a practical approach and a sound theological piety.

NICHOLAS OF TOLENTINO, ST.

Augustinian friar; b. 1245, Sant'Angelo in Pontano; d. Tolentino, Sept. 10, 1305. He was named after St. Nicholas of Myra, whose shrine at Bari was visited by his parents before his birth. He entered the Augustinians around the time of the order's final stage of formation in 1256. After ordination to the priesthood, he served in various houses of the order in the region of the Marches until he received his final appointment to Tolentino around 1275. The main sources of information are a Life by Peter of Monterubbiano (dated 1326 by the Bollandists) and the documents collected in the investigation (1325) conducted for his canonization. Peter presents Nicholas as a model religious, favored by God with visions, able to work miracles, combating demons, observing severe fasts, nightly vigils and strict poverty, yet compassionate towards others, living and dead. Recent studies have paid greater attention to the contemporary testimony collected in the canonical investigation. The witnesses emphasize his apostolate as a kindly confessor, a prudent counselor, an advocate and helper of the poor and sick, and a powerful intercessor before God. After many delays in the process, Pope Eugene IV canonized him in 1446. Nicholas was the first member of the Augustinians to receive this honor. Devotion to him spread in Italy, Spain, France, Belgium and Germany and later in the 16th and 17th centuries in Latin America. In the United States several parishes as well as some institutions of the Augustinians bear his name. He is revered as the patron of the souls in purgatory. He is usually represented wearing his habit with a star on his chest and holding a lily or a book. Magnificent 14th-century frescos adorn his richly decorated shrine at Tolentino.

Feast: Sept. 10.

NICHOLAS ORESME

French theologian and a founder of modern science and mathematics; b. Normandy, Diocese of Bayeux, c.

Page from a manuscript of "Nicomachean Ethics," written by Aristotle, translated by Nicholas Oresme: Oresme presenting his translation to King Charles V of France.

1320; d. Lisieux, July 11, 1382. A student of theology at Paris in 1348, he was grand master of the Collège de Navarre by 1356. In 1362 he was canon of Rouen and in 1364 dean of the cathedral. Some time before 1370 he became chaplain of King Charles V. He was consecrated bishop of Lisieux in 1378.

There are recent editions of some of his writings, but others are extant only in manuscripts and early editions. He wrote both in Latin and in French. At the request of Charles V he translated into French the Nicomachean Ethics, Politics, and De caelo of Aristotle and the pseudo-Aristotelian Economics. These translations were important in the development of the French language. Oresme's theological writings include Contra astronomos judicarios, with a French adaptation Livre de divinacions, in which he argues against astrology and the magic arts, and a Christological treatise, De communicatione idiomatum in Christo.

Oresme is best known as a scientist, mathematician, and economist. His most original scientific ideas are contained in two French works, Traité de la sphère and Livre du ciel et du monde. Against Aristotle he held, on the ground of the omnipotence of God, the possibility of many universes and the movement of man's universe in space. He questioned the Aristotelian theory that the earth is at rest while the heavens rotate about it, pointing out that motion is relative to the observer: the heavens appear to revolve around the earth, but the opposite may appear to an observer in the heavens. He was a precursor of Copernicus in holding that the appearances are explained more simply by supposing the daily motion of the earth than the motion of the heavens. Although Oresme saw no obstacle to this theory in Scripture and answered objections to it, he did not hold it as certain; in the end he accepted the traditional opinion.

Oresme's contributions to mathematics include the notion of fractional powers and rules for operating them. He prepared the way for analytical geometry by his use of graphs and algebraic functions to represent variations in the intensity and extension of qualities, such as heat and motion. Oresme's De origine, natura, jure, et mutationibus monetarum was the first scientific study of the problem of money.

NICHOLAS PAGLIA, BL.

Disciple of St. DOMINIC, preacher, founder of priories at Trani, Perugia, and, perhaps, Todi; b. Giovinazzo, near Bari, Italy, 1197; d. Perugia, Italy, Feb. 11, 1255. While studying law in BOLOGNA, he heard Dominic preach (1218) and joined the Dominican Order. He was twice provincial of the Roman province (1230-35 and in 1255). In 1231 GREGORY IX appointed him to reform the overly strict Benedictine monks of SANT' ANTIMO. He was present (1233) at the translation of Dominic's body. Prudent, charitable, and compassionate, especially to fellow religious, as superior he preached fraternal charity and joy and asked for willing, loving obedience. His relics repose under the high altar in Perugia. LEO XII beatified him on March 26, 1828. He is pictured, once by Fra Angelico (see FIESOLE, GUIDO DA), with rods (authority), a book (learning), and church models (founder).

NICHOLAS TREVET

Dominican theologian, historian, humanist; b. Somerseset, England, c. 1265; d. after 1334. The son of a justice in eyre, Sir Thomas Trevet (d. 1283), he entered the DOMINICANS, studied at Oxford before 1300, and succeeded WILLIAM OF MACCLESFELD, OP, as regent master at the university (1303–07). His Quaestiones disputatae, Quodlibeta I–V, and commentary on Genesis and Exodus belong to this period. In 1307 the general chapter of his order at Strasbourg gave special commendation to these Biblical commentaries and the master general, Aymeric, urged him to complete his commentary on the Pentateuch. Later he wrote a commentary on Leviticus and sent it to Aymeric. Between 1307 and 1314 he lived in Paris, gathering material for his Annales sex regum Angliae (1135–1307), for his future Latin Historia, dedicated to Hugh of Angoulême, archdeacon of Canterbury, and for his last work, the Cronycles, written in Anglo-Norman (one version being dedicated to Princess Mary, sister of Edward II who was a nun of Amesbury Abbey). Returning to England, he resumed teaching at Oxford (1314–c. 1317) and developed a humanistic interest in the ancient classics. He commented on Seneca's Declamationes (Controversiae)—which he dedicated to John of Lenham, OP, confessor to Edward II (before 1314)—as well as on Boethius, Cicero, and Virgil. At the request of Nicholas of Prato, papal legate to England and dean of the College of Cardinals, he wrote a commentary on the Tragedies of Seneca; he was commissioned by Pope John XXII to write a commentary on Livy. He wrote also the earliest commentary on St. Augustine's De civitate Dei, later replaced in popularity and excellence by the work of his junior contemporary THOMAS WALEYS. In 1324 he was lector of the Dominican priory in London. He must still have been alive in 1334, since he mentions in the Anglo-Norman Cronycles that the reign of John XXII was 19 years.

Although not an original or speculative thinker, he was a pioneer in Biblical theology, historical accuracy, classical philology, and Christian humanism. His commentaries on Scripture revived Biblical studies in the Order of Preachers, and his interest in classical authors stimulated the renaissance of humanism in Europe. The popularity of his writings, which include approximately 30 works, is attested to by the more than 300 MSS that are extant.

NICHOLS, GEORGE, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. c. 1550 at Oxford, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered there, July 5, 1589. George Nichols (also given as Nicolls or Nicholas) studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, then was assistant master at St. Paul's School, London. He arrived at Rheims with Bl. Thomas PILCHARD, Nov. 20, 1581, but went on to Rome. He was ordained priest (1583) at Rheims by Cardinal Louis de Guise. During his six-year ministry in and around Oxford, he was responsible for many conversions, including that of a celebrated highwayman during his confinement at Oxford Castle. After his arrest at Catherine Wheel Inn by the university officers, he proved to be a stout controversialist. Nichols was sent to Bridewell Prison, London, together with BB. Richard YAXLEY, Thomas BELSON, and Humphrey PRITCHARD. On June 30, all four were sent to Oxford for trial and were condemned. The heads of the priests were set up on the castle, and their quarters on the four city gates. They were beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

NICLAES, HENDRIK

Founder of the “House of Love,” or NICOLAITES or Familists; b. Münster, Westphalia, 1502; d. 1580. In Münster, Niclaes (Nicholas) attended Latin school and worked in his father’s business. At the age of 27, when he was suspected of Lutheran beliefs, he moved to Amsterdam, where he was under suspicion of being a “Münsterite.” In 1541 he established a business at Emden, East Friesland, and gathered some followers. He was imprisoned, but escaped and went to the Netherlands, London, and Cologne. He wrote more than 50 pamphlets dealing with his prophecies and mystical pantheism and also carried on a literary dispute with David JORIS. About his relationship with the latter, an opponent said: “David George layed the egg and Henry Niclaes brought forth the chicken.” He does not seem to have had any other Anabaptist connections. Niclaes emphasized an actual righteousness and holiness, which was practiced in the “House of Love.” Connected with this was an attempted degree of enlightenment and divinization. He had some followers in England and the Netherlands, among whom was the printer Christoffel Plantijn of Antwerp. By the end of the 17th century the Nicolaites had disappeared.

NICODEMUS OF MAMMOLA, ST.

Calabrian-Greek ascetic, monastic founder; b. Cirò, c. 900; d. Mammola, March 25, 990. While still a youth, he became a Basilian monk in the famous monastic eparchy of the Mercurion, under the spiritual guidance of St. Fantino (d. c. 980), who also directed St. NILUS OF ROSANO. Later on, he withdrew to Mt. Cellerano, where for many years he lived a strict ascetic life. His virtue attracted many disciples, so that the hermitage of Cellerano became a large monastic community. About 975 he moved to the region of Gerace. Subsequently he built in the woods near Mammola a monastery that after his death in 990 was dedicated to his memory. His relics are venerated in the principal church of Mammola, whose patron saint he has been since 1630. A life, written by the monk Nilus at the end of the 12th century, is the principal source for his biographers.

NICODEMUS THE HAGIORITE

Monk; b. Naxos, 1748; d. Mt. Athos, July 14, 1809. He was baptized Nicholas; he made his studies at Smyrna and retired to Naxos in 1770 to escape Turkish reprisals. In 1775 he entered MOUNT ATHOS, where he took the name Nicodemus. An encounter with Macarius of Corinth in 1777 confirmed his scholarly aspirations and he was persuaded to prepare an augmented edition of Macarius’s Philocalia, or collection of oriental patristic texts dealing with mental prayer. This edition had a great influence on the revival of HESYCHASM and the JESUS PRAYER. His revised edition of Macarius’s work on frequent Communion was condemned by Procopius of Smyrna in 1785, but his position was accepted as orthodox by the Synod of Constantinople in 1819.

Nicodemus, a prolific writer, contributed to the development of hagiographical, liturgical, scriptural, mystical, and canonical interest in the Oriental churches. His most important work, the Pedalion, or Rudder of the Ship of Knowledge, is a commentary on Greek canon law, which manifests certain anti-Roman tendencies. These are usually attributed to interpolations by its editor, the monk Theodoritus, though Nicodemus elsewhere manifests obvious prejudices against Roman ecclesiastical institutions. Nevertheless, to stimulate the cultivation of mental prayer he published, in modern Greek, adaptations of both the Spiritual Combat of Lorenzo SCUPOLI and the Spiritual Exercises of IGNATIUS LOYOLA. His Philocalia (Venice 1782), or collection of writings on spiritual sobriety, and his Enchiridion of Counsels (Venice 1801), or doctrine of the custody of the five senses, the imagination, and the heart are of major influence in the contemporary Greek spirituality.

Nicodemus was solemnly canonized a saint of the Greek Church on May 31, 1955. A third edition of the Philocalia (Athens 1958) caused a considerable revival of interest in his writings.

NICOLA DA GESTURI, BL.

Baptized Giovanni Angelo Salvatore, called "Giovanni Medda," Capuchin; b. Aug. 5, 1882; Gesturi, Cagliari (archdiocese of Oristano, Sardegna), Italy; d. June 8, 1958, Cagliari. Giovanni Medda, the sixth child of a poor family, felt called to religious life but lacked the means to pursue it. He was raised by his eldest sister following the death of his parents, Giovanni Messa Serra and Priama Cogoni Zedda. After completing his primary education he worked on the farm. With the help of his parish priest, he entered the Capuchin convent of San Antonio Gesturi as a tertiary oblate (1911) and took the habit and name Fra Nicola (Oct. 30, 1913). He pronounced his first vows the following year on November 1 and his solemn vows on Feb. 16, 1919. During his first ten years of religious life, he served as cook in several Sardinian monasteries (Sassari, Oristano, and Sanluri). For the next 34 years (from 1924) Nicola was entrusted with collecting alms for the monastery in Cagliari and nearby Campidano. He developed an attitude of constant prayer, which animated all his actions. His spirituality and wisdom attracted others to him for counsel and comfort; however, he became most renowned as a miracle worker, especially for the sick. His body was buried in the cemetery of Bonaria. The ordinary process for his beatification was conducted from 1966 to 1971 and introduced in Rome in 1977. The declaration of Fra Nicola's heroic virtues came 18 years after his death (June 25, 1996). Pope John Paul II beatified him, Oct. 3, 1999.

Feast: June 8.

NICOLAITES

Members of a libertine sect of the early Church, also known as Nicolaitans. John praises the church of EPHESUS for detesting "the works of the Nicolaites" (Rv 2.6); he scores the church of PERGAMUM for harboring "some who hold the teaching of the Nicolaites," and describes them as adherents of the teaching of BALAAM (Rv 2.14–15; cf. Nm 31.16 with 25.1–2; 2 Pt 2.15; Jude 11). The same tendency is doubtless meant in Ap 2.20–24: the church of Thyatira is blamed for tolerating a self-styled prophetess whom John calls Jezabel (2 Kgs 9.22), since she led Christians astray with her teachings about fornication and the eating of meat offered to idols (see Acts 15.20–29): these were two of the points on which James enjoined Gentile Christians to follow Jewish practice (see also 1 Corinthians, ch. 8–10). The Nicolaites seem, acordingly, to represent an excessively liberal or even antinomian outlook, possibly abusing the teachings of St. Paul on freedom (1 Cor 10.23), appealing to an esoteric knowledge that John sarcastically called "the deep things of Satan" (cf. 1 Cor 2.10). One of the serious problems that faced Christians at this time was precisely to what extent they might participate in the social and economic life of the Roman Empire, which involved attending sacrificial banquets and easily resulted in immoral practices (though the "fornication" of the Nicolaites might here mean metaphorically faithlessness to the true God).

There is no reason to link the Nicolaites with the deacon Nicholas (Acts 6.5), as Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 1.26.3; 3.11.1) and other Fathers have done; Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 2.20; 3.4) reports a story that a saying of Nicholas was misinterpreted by the Nicolaites in appealing to his authority. The existence of the Nicolaites (antinomian Gnostics) mentioned by these and other Fathers and their relationship to the Nicolaites of the Book of Revelation are problematic.

In the Middle Ages advocates of clerical celibacy, e.g., Cardinal Humbert (C. Nicetam 25), called their opponents Nicolaites.

NICOLANTONIO, MARIANO DA ROCCACASALE, BL.

Baptized Domenico, Franciscan lay brother; b. Jan. 14, 1778, Roccasale (Aquila), Abruzzi, Italy; d. May 31 (Feast of Corpus Christi), 1866, Bellegra, Italy.

Mariano's life was characterized by simplicity and poverty. He was one of six children of Gabriel de Nicolantonio and Santa de Arcángelo. In tending the family flocks in the Morrone mountains as a young boy, he grew to love silence and reflection.

He entered Saint Nicholas Friary at Arischia, Abruzzi, took the name Mariano (Sept. 2, 1802) and pronounced his solemn vows the following year. For 12 years he engaged in prayer and work, as a carpenter, gardener, cook, and porter, at Arischia. In 1814, Mariano asked and received permission to transfer to the more austere Saint Francis Friary at Bellegra, where he served as porter for forty years, welcoming pilgrims, other travelers, and the poor. Among those he greeted and inspired was Diego ODDI, who later became a Franciscan in the same friary.

A miracle attributed to Blessed Mariano's intercession was approved by Pope John Paul II, April 6, 1998, opening the way for his beatification Oct. 3, 1999.

Feast: May 30 (Franciscans).

NICOLAS, JEAN JACQUES AUGUSTE

French lay Catholic apologist; b. Bordeaux, Jan. 6, 1807; d. Versailles, Jan. 17, 1888. He was a lawyer in Poitiers and Bordeaux, then head of a division under the minister of cults Frédéric de Falloux (1849–54), inspector of public libraries (1854–60), judge in the tribunal of the Seine (1860–67), and counselor at the court in Paris (1867–77). After this he lived in retirement at Versailles until his death. Almost all his numerous writings were in the field of apologetics and were inspired by contemporary circumstances. His principal work, Études philosophiques sur le Christianisme (4 v., 1842–45; 26th ed., 1885), was composed to resolve the doubts of his father-in-law, who desired to return to the faith; it was very successful, brought the author to the attention of Falloux, and was honored with a letter from Pius IX. In reply to the Méditations by the Protestant François Guizot, Nicolas wrote Du Protestantisme et de toutes les hérésies dans leur rapport avec le socialisme (1852). After the cure of his daughter, which he attributed to the Blessed Virgin, he published an original work, Nouvelles Études philosophiques sur le Christianisme (4 v., 1855–60), whose three parts examined Mary's role in the divine plan, in the Gospels, and in the Church. When RENAN wrote his Vie de Jésus, Nicolas published in refutation La Divinité de Jésus-Christ (1864) and L'Art de croire (2 v., 1866). After the Franco-Prussian War he denounced the social evils of his homeland in L'État sans Dieu (1872). As a remedy he proposed the alliance of throne and altar in La Révolution et l'ordre chrétien, Jésus-Christ, introduction à l'Évangile étudié et médité à l'usage des temps nouveaux (1875), La Raison et l'Évangile (1876), and Études sociales sur la Révolution (2 v., 1890). Subsequent to a visit to Rome, he defended papal temporal sovereignty in Rome et la papauté (1882). His final work, Étude historique et critique sur le P. Lacordaire, was not at all favorable to the celebrated Dominican. The writings of Nicolas were not notable for theological profundity or critical historical sense, but their popularity made him one of the century's leading apologists.

NICOLE, PIERRE

Jansenist theologian; b. Chartres, Oct. 19, 1625; d. Paris, Nov. 16, 1695. Nicole studied philosophy at Paris where he took his master's degree in 1644 before turning his attention to theology. He received his baccalaureate from the Sorbonne in 1649. His relatives among the nuns at PORT-ROYAL arranged for him to join the group who shared the ideas of the recently deceased Abbé Saint-Cyran (see DUVERGIER DE HAURANNE, JEAN) and operated a school for boys near the convent. Nicole taught literature and formed a friendship with the brilliant Antoine Arnauld, younger brother of Mère Angélique (see ARNAULD), Abbess of Port-Royal, and spiritual director of the nuns. Nicole collaborated with Arnauld on many writings, although often Arnauld's part was merely to give his approval. These writings are published among the 43 volumes of the collected works of Arnauld (Lausanne 1775–83).

Nicole was a close collaborator with Pascal and was so highly regarded as a writer that many read him despite their lack of interest in his generally religious subjects. His writings are chiefly polemical and were often published under pen names. He wrote much in defense of JANSENISM and against the Jesuits, although his posthumously published writings on grace are far from Jansenistic. Despite its good qualities, his writing against the quietists, produced at the request of Bossuet, goes to extremes in the rejection of mysticism. He also defended the position of the MAURISTS on monastic studies against A. J. de RANCÉ, founder of the Trappist reform.
