Period of Joshua and the Judges. A picture of the division of the land among the twelve tribes of Israel is given in Joshua ch. 13–21. (See JOSHUA, BOOK OF). Despite the apparent details that are presented, it is, nevertheless, difficult to determine the precise boundaries of each of the tribal allotments. East of the Jordan, half of the tribe of Manasseh (specifically, the clan of Machir) occupied the districts of Bashan and part of Gilead (Jos 13.8–14); Gad, the rest of Gilead between the Jabbok and Heshbon (13.24–28); and Reuben, the land between Heshbon and the Arnon (13.15–23). West of the Jordan, JUDAH received the greatest portion—from the Valley of Hinnom (see GEHENNA) at Jerusalem to Kadesh-Barnea) and the Wadi of Egypt in the Negeb (15.1–63). Part of this territory was allotted to Simeon—cities in the general vicinity of Beer-sheba (19.1–9). North of Judah were the smaller possessions of BENJAMIN (18.11–28) and Dan (19.40–48). Central Palestine was occupied by EPHRAIM (16.4–10) and the other half of Manasseh (17.1–13). In the district of Galilee, Naphtali (19.32–39) was in the north, Zebulun (19.10–16) and Issachar (19.17–23) in the south, and Asher (19.24–31) along the coast.

The division of the land is presented as the outcome of the Israelite conquest under the leadership of JOSHUA, son of Nun. But the Book of JUDGES gives a different story (Jgs 1.1–36). The two accounts seem to be but two aspects of a much more complicated history. Probably some of the tribes had been there since the time of Jacob and were already in possession of land. In the course of time these tribes made attempts to increase their territorial possessions. With the coming of Joshua and the tribes under his command, the conquest reached its full proportions. The complete picture, therefore, would be one of occupation and settlement in different stages over a long period of time culminating in the invasion led by Joshua. The land thus became the possession of tribes who were related by common ancestry and eventually united by the bond of a religious COVENANT with YAHWEH, the God of their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God who had brought deliverance to those Israelites who had been enslaved in Egypt. But this bond was a very loose one, and there was little lasting unity. It was only when a common danger, the extension of PHILISTINE power, threatened all the tribes that unity was achieved by the establishment of the monarchy (1 Sm 4.2–10.27). But even this would turn out to be of relatively short duration.

Period of the Monarchy. With the establishment of the monarchy the tribes in fact gained control of the land to which they had laid claim. Israel's first king, Saul, began the offensive and began well, but in the end was far from successful (1 Sm 11.1–15.9; 31.1–6).

It was up to DAVID to lead a united Israel to victory. This warrior king began by reducing the Philistines to subjection, so that they were never again troublesome to Israel (2 Sm 5.17–25; 8.1). He continued the conquest by subduing the Canaanite city-states of the land and taking Jerusalem, making it the political and religious capital of the kingdom (5.6–10). His dominion eventually included the ARAMAEANS in the north and the Ammonites, MOABITES, and EDMITES in the east and southeast (8.2–14; 10.6–19; 12.26–31). Thus the kingdom reached its greatest limits, the extent of which was never again to be seen by any subsequent king of Israel. From the frontier of Hamath in the north to the Gulf of Aqabah in the south, from the Mediterranean Sea to the desert—all the land was subject to Jerusalem.

This was the inheritance of SOLOMON, a kingdom of peace and prosperity. His task was to keep it intact. It was, indeed, the golden age. However, while the royal court grew in size and splendor, the condition of the people grew worse. To maintain his court Solomon divided the country into 12 administrative districts (1 Kgs 4.7–19), the boundaries of which ignored the old tribal divisions. Moreover, in all of this, Judah seemed to have enjoyed a privileged position. The result was a widespread dissatisfaction that eventually, after the death of the king, brought about the dissolution of the empire and the division of the kingdom.

Two independent kingdoms emerged: Israel in the north and Judah in the south, with the border between the two of them in the tribal territory of Benjamin. During their joint existence they were sometimes hostile, sometimes friendly, and at times even allied in a common cause. But whatever the internal problems, the greatest dangers were from without.

Israel remained in existence a little more than 200 years before the power of Assyria brought about its destruction. An initial Assyrian conquest (734–732 B.C.) resulted only in a reduction of territory to central Palestine; the districts of Dor, Megiddo and Gilead became provinces of Assyria (2 Kgs 15.29). However, ten years later (722 B.C.) Samaria was invested and annexed to the Assyrian kingdom as a province, and Israel ceased to exist.

Judah alone remained, by choice, a vassal of Assyria. With the rise of Babylonian power, the might of Assyria was crushed, and the end of the southern kingdom was near. The first Babylonian capture of Jerusalem (597 B.C.) was accompanied by deportations (2 Kgs 24.10–16), but the kingdom was permitted to survive. A second onslaught (587 B.C.), however, ended it; and a governor was put in charge of the territory (2 Kgs 25.1–22).

From the Exilic to the Roman Period. Little is known about events during the exilic period. In the 6th century the Nabataeans occupied the land of Edom, forcing the Edomites to move into the Negeb, subsequently known as Idumea. From there they caused trouble for the people remaining in the land of Judah and left bitter memories of these years. In Babylon the exiles cherished the hope of returning, a hope that was fulfilled with the rise of Persian power.

The Persian conquest freed the exiles and permitted them to return to their own land (538 B.C.; Ezr 1.1–4). It also saw the organization of the empire into satrapies. Palestine was in the fifth satrapy, called Abar Nahara (Beyond the River, i.e., west of the Euphrates). It was composed of various provinces, each under the jurisdiction of a local governor. The province of Judah was called Yehud, and its people Yehudim (Jews). The other provinces of Palestine were: Idumea, to the south of Judah; Samaria, Galilee, Dor, and Ashdod, to the north and along the coast; Gilead, Ammon, and Moab in Transjordan.

The conquest by Alexander the Great (333 B.C.) brought Palestine under his dominion. But after his death, it changed hands five times during the struggle of the Diadochi (323–301 B.C.). Eventually the kingdom of the Ptolemies in Egypt and that of the Seleucid dynasty comprising Asia Minor, Syria, and Babylonia were established. Palestine at first fell to the Ptolemies, but in fact it remained a bone of contention and the cause of conflicts for a century (301–198 B.C.). In the end it fell to the Seleucids.

Seleucid policy of Hellenization caused the Maccabean uprising (166–135 B.C.), resulting in independence for Palestine [see MACCABEES, HISTORY OF THE]. A kingdom came into existence, ruled by the descendants of the Maccabees, the HASMONAEANS. The extent of this kingdom reached proportions almost as great as that of the time of David; it included Idumea, Judah, Samaria, Galilee, and Transjordan. But internal affairs brought its downfall, and in 63 B.C., Pompey, who had already annexed Syria as a Roman province, intervened and annexed most of Palestine in the same way, Judah, Galilee, Perea, and Idumea alone remaining semi-independent vassal states.

For a brief period Palestine was reunited under HEROD THE GREAT (40–4 B.C.). At his death it was divided among his sons. Archelaus received Judea, Samaria, and Idumea; HEROD ANTIPAS, Galilee and Perea; and Philip the Tetrarch, the northern districts of Transjordan. In A.D. 6 the territory of Archelaus was added to the imperial province of Syria and a procurator was put in charge; in A.D. 34 the same fate befell the territory of Philip. In

A.D. 37 Herod AGRIPPA I was given the territory of Philip. To this was added the territory of Herod Antipas in A.D. 40, and shortly thereafter, Judea, Samaria, and Idumea—initiating another short period of unity until A.D. 44, when Palestine once more became a Roman province under a procurator. Northern Transjordan and parts of Galilee and Perea formed the kingdom of Herod AGRIPPA II. But after the turbulent uprising of A.D. 70, which saw the destruction of Jerusalem, all of Palestine passed under Roman rule, to remain so for more than half a millennium. During this time Palestine enjoyed a period of relative peace and prosperity, undisturbed by outside aggression. Internally the revolt of BAR KOKHBA (132–135) caused some disturbance, but it was quickly suppressed by the Romans with widespread destruction. Jerusalem was rebuilt as a Roman provincial city by the emperor Hadrian, who called it Aelia Capitolina. Then in 313 CONSTANTINE I, the Great, having embraced Christianity, proclaimed its liberty, and his mother, HELENA, converted it into a Christian city and restored its name.

From the Byzantine Period to Modern Times. With the division of the Roman Empire into West (Rome) and East (Constantinople) toward the end of the 4th century, the welfare of Palestine was bound to Byzantine rule. It was a time for pilgrimages, and the years that followed were tranquil.

This period of internal development was shattered in 611 when the Persians under Chosroes swept through Palestine, wrought havoc, and established themselves there for about 15 years. Byzantine rule came to a definitive end with the coming of the followers of Muḥammad in 636. By 640 the Arab conquest was complete. Palestine was divided into two provinces: Al-Urdunn in the north and Filistin in the south. It was ruled successively by the Umayyad, 'Abbāsīd, and Fatimid Caliphs.

The devastation caused in the Holy Land by the Seljuk Turks in 1071 was followed by the turbulent era of the Crusades beginning in 1099. Under crusader rule, Palestine became the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and the country was divided into various baronies. The crusaders were followed by the Mamelukes of Egypt in 1250. Then, in 1517, the conquest of Palestine by the Ottoman Turks brought it under Turkish rule until the 20th century.

The beginning of the 20th century saw the growth of Arab nationalism, the rise of Zionism, and World War I. When the allied troops led by General Allenby entered Palestine in 1917, Turkish rule came to an end, and Palestine was under British mandate until 1948. It was indeed the modern period, but the events were only a repetition of past history. It was a time of warfare and territorial division, hardly a new occurrence for the land of Palestine.

Bibliography: H. HAAG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:1362–63. G. E. WRIGHT and F. V. FILSON, eds., The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible (rev. ed., Philadelphia 1956). J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959), good bibliog. J. W. PARKES, A History of Palestine from 135 A.D. to Modern Times (New York 1949), excellent bibliog. S. RUNCIMAN, A History of the Crusades, 3 v. (Cambridge, England 1951–54), excellent bibliog.

[F. SEPER]

4. Natural History

The study of the natural history of Palestine is limited here to botany and zoology of the Holy Land, therefore, to a description and classification of its flora (or plant life) and its fauna (or animal life).

FLORA

After a description of the plant life of the Holy Land in the biblical period, an account is given of the flora of modern Palestine according to its phytogeographic areas.

Plant Life in the Biblical Period. It is accepted by most modern scholars that no radical change has occurred in the climate of the Holy Land since the beginnings of recorded history. This conclusion is based upon evidence from many sources. In the literary realm, the descriptions of the land found in the Bible, the MISHNAH, and the TALMUD show that the seasons and agricultural variations were identical then with those of the present day.

Forests. Contrary to the commonly accepted theory, studies have shown that the forest was not an important factor in the biblical landscape. Even before the conquest by JOSHUA, son of Nun, the land was settled in noticeable density, and the major portion of the regions suitable for agriculture was seeded or planted and cultivated intensively. These conditions precluded the existence of forests. In the rocky mountainous regions there were, indeed, woods, but these were not protected from man or beast. In the Biblical and Talmudic descriptions of the land there is very little mention of forests. Individual trees that served cultic purposes or had been associated with important events are noted. Yet, since the Bible mentions the existence of wild animals, it can be deduced that the land of Israel was forested to some extent. These animals inhabited the deserts, the Jordan Valley, and the forests of Bashan and Mt. Hermon, and from these regions they came out to the settlements. Widespread forests existed principally in Bashan and in Lebanon, and these regions supplied lumber for palaces, temples, and other large buildings. Extensive woods called the Forest of Ephraim existed in Gilead, where the war between David and Absalom took place (2 Sm 18.8). Perhaps this was the forest referred to by Joshua when he advised the landless sons of Joseph to clear the forest and settle there (Jos 17.15). The accepted interpretation, however, is that the reference is to the forest on the mountains of Ephraim in Samaria.

The development of a forest in a region of sufficient rainfall usually follows the destruction of agriculture there. This idea is expressed several times in the Scriptures (e.g., Hos 2.14; Mi 3.12; Jer 26.18), and actually, during all the periods of settlement on the land, there was continual struggle between the sown and cultivated tracts on the one hand and the forest and wasteland on the other. During periods of war and postwar destruction the cultivated areas were deserted, and wild grasses, bushes, and trees thrived; but in peacetime these areas were reclaimed by agricultural settlement.

Grazing Lands. Following Joshua's conquest of Canaan and during the period of the early Judges, the cultivation of the terraced hills was destroyed, and in its place the wild flora flourished, as the Bible had warned (Dt 7.22; see also Is 17.9), and as a result of the destruction of agriculture, the grazing lands were extended (see also Is 7.28). This process recurred repeatedly during the various periods of peace and war in biblical times. The major wealth of the Holy Lands consisted of fruits and grains. Although it was described as a "land of milk and honey," one cannot assume from this that the pasture land ("milk") exceeded in extent the land used for cultivation. From the Scriptures it is evident that, while extensive pasture lands existed on the east side of the Jordan and in Bashan, on the west side of the Jordan livestock-raising existed only on a small scale, and the herds were fed mostly from the stubble of the grain fields.

Dependence on Rainfall. The agriculture of the Holy Land depended on natural rainfall; this fact is emphasized in the Bible by comparing the land of Israel (at the south of Mt. Hermon), of the Yarkon (at Aphek, which "drinks in rain from the heavens,") with Egypt, which is completely dependent on irrigation (Dt 11.10–12). In this connection came the warning regarding the withholding of rain as a consequence of sin (Dt 11.17). Years of famine caused by lack of rain are often noted in the Bible. One verse describes Israel as a "land of streams of water, with springs and fountains welling up in the hills and valleys" (Dt 8.7). From this some might conclude that there have been changes in the land since those days, but there is no basis for such a conclusion. There are still many springs there (about 800 of them having been counted), but most of them have a very limited flow. Only the sources of the Dan Rās el-'Ain, and of the Na'aman (at 'Ayūn el-Başş seven miles southeast of Acco) supply in normal years more than a cubic meter of water a second. Some 40 others supply between 100 to 1,000 liters per second (the majority of them being in the Huleh and in the Beisan Valley); all the others are minor. The author of the Letter of ARISTEAS exaggerates in evaluating the Jordan as the most important factor in the agriculture of the Land of Israel. Flavius Josephus heaps praise on the irrigation of Jericho (Bell. Jud. 4.8.3) and the Plain of Genasar (ibid. 3.10.6), but he is correct in his conclusion that the most fertile part of the land of Israel is the ‘‘land of thirst [for rain] according to its nature’’ (ibid. 3.3.4). Indeed, farming that depends on rainfall has to a large extent determined the landscape of Israel.

The cultivated areas in ancient times were not different from those of today. The deserts described in the Bible include in their boundaries the areas of desert and wasteland of the present day. The Negeb was a grazing land, though in rainy years its northern parts could be seeded (Gn 26.12). Here and there in the Bible is mentioned the growth of certain wild trees in specific localities: sycamore trees in the foothills (1 Kgs 10.27); willows along the brooks (Is 44.4); tamarisks in the desert (Jer 17.6); wild jujubes in swampy jungles (Jb 40.21); etc. Of forest trees, mention is made especially of the oak, the terebinth, and the storax. The conifers grew especially in Bashan and Lebanon; cedar, juniper, pine, and cypress are mentioned in Isaiah as species that will bloom in the desert and wasteland in the time to come (Is 41.19; 60.13).

The praise of Israel in Dt 8.8 refers to its seven basic farm products: it is a ‘‘land of wheat and barley, of vines and fig trees and pomegranates, of olive oil and of honey.’’ Three groups are included: of the grains are wheat and barley, of the fruits are grapes, figs, and pomegranates, and of important produce from trees are oil from olives and honey (i.e., syrup) from dates.

Plants of the Bible. The Bible mentions about 100 names of plants, most of which grew in Israel, and it is relatively easy to identify almost all of them by studying the descriptions of them as given in the Scriptures, the Mishnah, and the Talmud, as well as by philology, etymology, and a comparison with the flora of modern Palestine. There are names of flora in the Bible that identify whole groups, šāmîr wešayit (thorn bushes of all kinds: Is 5.6; 9.17) and qôš wedardar (thistles of all kinds: Gn 3.18; Hos 10.8). The Bible mentions mainly plants that either have economic importance or that suitably illustrate a parable. Doubtless there were other important plants and trees that the Bible had no occasion to mention, such as the carob, which is referred to only in Lk 15.16.

Flora of Modern Israel according to Phytogeographic Areas. Israel is very rich in plant species, their number reaching to more than 2,000. The abundance of species is due to several causes: the variegated history of the flora, dating back to early geologic periods, the variation in topography, and, above all, the fact that the country provides a meeting ground for three vegetation belts—the Mediterranean, the Irano-Turanic, and the Sahara-Sindic.

Mediterranean Vegetation. Included are areas on both sides of the Jordan, where the amount of rainfall is more than 350 millimeters (13.8 inches), which makes cultivation of the land possible either summer or winter. In this zone the flora of the mountain areas differs from that of the seashore.

The mountain area was the most important for ancient agriculture. Cultivation of the land pushed back the forests that had abounded there in prehistoric times. At present there still remain forests and groves containing such trees as the Aleppo pine (Pinus halepensis) and its oft-associated species, the common oak (Quercus calliprinos), and the Palestine terebinth (Pistacia palaestina), several other species of trees, as well as many bushes and shrubs. This type of forest is still widespread in Gilead, and its traces remain in Upper Galilee, the Carmel Range, Samaria, and Judah. Such forests develop well on soil developed from Cenomanian and Eocene limestone.

Another type of Mediterranean forest is that of the Thabor oak (Quercus ithaburensis), with which is associated the Atlantic terebinth (Pistacia atlantica). This type is found in the western part of Lower Galilee, in Golan, and in the Huleh Valley. Such a forest was formerly in Sharon, but it was destroyed to make way for agriculture and pasture land.

Most of the groves in the land consist of the common oak (Quercus calliprinos) and the Palestine terebinth (Pistacia palaestina). As a result of the cutting of timber and the gnawing of goats, the trees are in the form of bushes. Such woods are spread on the mountains at an altitude of 1,000 to 4,000 feet.

On the foothills at the west range of the mountains of Galilee and on Mt. Carmel are spread the carob (Ceratonia siliqua) and the mastic (Pistacia lentiscus). Occasionally this type of flora is found on the sandy limestone hills near Caesarea and on the sands near Netanya. All these types of flora are accompanied by many types of bushes, perennial and annual. Another type of flora is that of the so-called garigue, scrubland with bushes not above the height of a man. Here the Calycotome thorn bush and various species of rockroses (Cistus) and salvia predominate.

On the unforested Mediterranean shore is found a distinctive group of low plants, wooded or grassy. Very prevalent is the Poterium thorn bush (Poterium spinosum), which is important in the prevention of soil erosion on the slopes of the hills. In the places where this flora has been destroyed, the land has been swept away by the winds and the rain.

Along the Mediterranean shore are sandy soil, mixtures of sandy clay and sandy chalk. Such soils are not favorable to plant development because of their poor organic composition and meager ability to hold rain water. Here grow deep-rooted plants, those of the steppe and the desert that can thrive on a small amount of water, as well as annuals that have a short period of growth. These plants are in constant danger of being covered by shifting dunes or undercut by winds. But there are species here that have developed means of defense against the force of the wind, particularly the Retama broom plant (Retama roetam) and the Gallic tamarisk (Tamarix gallica). Here grow species that are not sensitive to the salty spray of the sea or to the saline sand. There are also tropical trees such as the sycamore fig (Ficus sycomorus) and the wild jujube (Zizyphus spina-Christi).

Irano-Turanic Vegetation. This is centered in the northern Negeb, the Judean Desert, and the highlands of Transjordan. The climate is dry and the amount of rainfall 200 to 300 millimeters (8–12 inches), within the limits for stable growth. In this area there are almost no natural woodlands. Its soils are semiarid or loess. One finds sparse groups of trees or bushes; the common type is wormwood (Artemisia herba-alba).

Saharo-Sindic Vegetation. This type covers the largest territory, but it is poorest in species. It includes the southern Negeb, the Araba, and the desert regions of Edom and Moab. The amount of rainfall is less than 200 millimeters (eight inches) and is usually far below this level. The rains are concentrated in a very short winter. The soil is not fertile. It is comprised mainly of gravel and rocks; trees are found only in the bottom of the wadies, and the plant cover is very sparse, the typical type being the Zygophyllum dumosum bush. In the sandy regions plants are more plentiful, with species of Haloxylon and Retama predominating. In this area there are large salt deposits, especially in the lower Jordan Valley and in the Araba. There are dense growths of saline flora, including species of Atriplex and Salicornia. Near freshwater springs are oases where a tropical flora thrives, of which acacia and wild jujube are typical.

Hydrophilic Vegetation. Throughout the country plants are found that grow alongside bodies of water, swamps, river banks, and springs. Among the trees in this category are the poplar (Populus euphratica), tamarisk (Tamarix jordanis), Oriental plane (Platanus orientalis), and willow. At the side of every body of water are reeds and cattails, and in the Huleh swamps (which have now been drained) the papyrus was formerly common.

Cultivated Plants and Associated Species. In modern times essentially the same crops are being raised as in the ancient era; but in fruits the emphasis has moved away from the sweet fruits that are rich in calories, such as figs and dates, which were highly valued in ancient times, to the juicy fruits, especially the fruit trees of the Rosaceae family, such as the apple, pear, plum, and peach. Hundreds of new species, such as the orange, have been brought in; many of them originated in the New World. Especially numerous are the kinds of ornamental flora that have been brought to the land from countries all over the world.

Hundreds of species of weeds are associated with the cultivated plants. These are more closely connected with the plants that they accompany than to any specific locale. Among them are species established in the country from antiquity, whose seeds are found in archeological excavations along with the seeds of cultivated plants, and others that have been introduced in recent times along with the new plants.

FAUNA

After a brief description of the Palestinian fauna in the prehistoric period, lists of the biblical fauna are given; the changes in the Holy Land from biblical to modern times are then discussed, with an account of the zoogeography of modern Palestine, and finally a few words are said on the domestic animals of ancient Israel.

Palestinian Fauna in the Prehistoric Period. The natural history of Israel reaches far back in time. The most important and dynamic period was the Pleistocene era, when changes appeared in the fauna of the area, especially as a result of invasions from other areas. This fauna was similar to that which is now found on the savannas of East Africa. Bones of the wart hog, hippopotamus, rhinoceros, striped hyena, and many different species of gazelles other than those currently found in Palestine have been discovered. Bones also of elephants and mastodons have been found in the Lower Pleistocene. Later there occurred a migration of animals from India and Central Asia, among which were wild cattle, wild horses, wild asses, gazelles, wolves, and badgers. There was only limited migration of northern animals following the Ice Age in Europe. During the Upper Pleistocene a tropical climate prevailed in Palestine. After this there occurred a period of drought, which brought about the disappearance of the tropical fauna. By the end of the Stone Age, the Holy Land was already the habitat of the fauna that is described in the Bible and has persisted to recent times. This is supporting evidence for the theory that since the Stone Age there have not been radical climatic changes in the country.

Biblical Fauna. About 120 animal names appear in the Bible (not including synonyms). They may be grouped systematically as follows. Mammals (39 names) may be subdivided according to cloven-hoofed and ruminating (13), cloven-hoofed nonruminating (3), single-hoofed (4), carnivora (8), rodents (4), and other orders (7). Birds (38 names) may be divided according to ritually clean fowl (9), birds of prey (diurnal) (5), vulturine birds (4), birds of prey (nocturnal) (11), and birds of other orders (9). Other fauna includes reptiles and similar creatures (13) and insects and other small creatures (20).

From this list it can be seen that mammals, birds, and reptiles are the most adequately represented in the Bible. Of the 75 species of mammals in modern Palestine (including domestic cattle), about half are mentioned. Of the 350 species of birds, 38 are mentioned, and of the 80 species of reptiles, 12 are mentioned in the Bible. It must be stressed that the references to these animals (as also to the flora) are incidental, and they are cited to illustrate laws of ritual cleanliness or are used symbolically or allegorically. The occurrence of so many names demonstrates the highly developed perception of the scriptural writers in their understanding of the phenomena of nature. It is thought possible to identify in a majority of cases the names of the biblical fauna with established species.

Changes in Fauna from Biblical to Modern Times. Although no great changes have transpired in the fauna of the Holy Land since biblical times, the last few generations have witnessed the disappearance from the country and the surrounding regions of some of the animals that are mentioned in the Bible. The depredations have been especially severe in the case of the ruminants and cloven-hoofed, for of the ten mentioned in the Bible, only the gazelle and the Nubian ibex are left today. The wild ox (Bos primigenius) had already disappeared from the region at a rather early period. The others continued to inhabit the country or region up to the beginning of the 20th century. As previously noted, this does not imply a change in climate or plant cover. The main reason for the disappearance of these animals, whose flesh is eaten, is the improvement of hunting weapons. To the gun must be ascribed, as well, the destruction of the large predators, such as the lion, the bear, the leopard, and the cheetah in the confines of the country. Some think that the existence of these predatory animals in the Holy Land in the time of the Bible is proof that the land was sparsely settled at that time. But these animals inhabited the country in the Roman and Byzantine periods, when the land was, undoubtedly, densely populated. We may infer from the Scriptures that even in biblical times these beasts of prey did not inhabit the cis-Jordanian area; their habitat was the thickets of the Jordan (Jer 49.19), the forests of Bashan (Dt 33.22), and the mountains of Lebanon and Hermon (Sg 4.5). From these places they invaded settled areas, and in times of destruction and famine they would remain there for awhile.

The lion was still found in the Negeb during the Crusades. The Syrian bear ranged down to the northern borders of Palestine until the beginning of the 20th century, and scattered traces of it have recently come to light in the mountains of Lebanon. The leopard still reaches Upper Galilee from Lebanon occasionally. Until only a few decades ago the cheetah (Acinonyx jubata) still survived in the Negeb, and some of its traces have recently been found at Yotvata in the Araba. Of the big animals that are now completely extinct in the country, the hippopotamus (hippopotamus amphibius)—the behemoth of Jb 40.15–24—may be mentioned. The crocodile—called the tannîn [the “dragon” of Ps 90(91).13; Is 27.1; etc.] and the Leviathan (Jb 40.25–41.26)—inhabited the western streams of Palestine until the end of the 19th century. The ostrich (Struthio camelus)—mentioned in Lam 4.3; Jb 39.13—disappeared from the area in the 19th century, although some effort has been made in recent years to bring it back. At the end of the 19th century the last survivors of the Syrian wild ass (Equus hemionus hemihippus) and the Arabian wild ass (Equus hemionus onager) were exterminated in the Syrian desert.

The expansion of Jewish settlement in the country, especially modern agricultural settlement, has altered the populations of various animals. There has been an increase in those species that have been able to adapt themselves to the new conditions. The increased number of fishponds has brought an increase in waterfowl. Also the swamp cat (Catolynx chaus chrysomelo notis) is spreading. All the means employed against the jackals have not deterred them from multiplying. The poisonous bait laid out to exterminate the jackals and rodents have caused the destruction of the vulturine birds that have eaten the poisoned carrion. Thus, for example, of the griffon vulture (Gyps fulvus), which ranged over the country until the early 20th century and is often mentioned in the Bible as the nešer (commonly mistranslated as “eagle”), only a few pairs still survive. Laws for the protection of wildlife that were enacted in the state of Israel have prevented the annihilation of certain creatures that had been in danger of complete extinction. The gazelle has noticeably increased throughout the country, and the Nubian ibex, too, has spread into the hills of Ein Gedi and Eilat.

The Zoogeography of Modern Palestine. The animal ranges coincide with the vegetation zones in Palestine (see above). To the Mediterranean group belong the hare, the chuckar partridge, the swallow, the agama, and others. To the Saharo-Sindic group belong various species of desert mice, the desert lark, the sandgrouse, the gecko, the cobra, and many other species. To the Irano-Turanic group belong the creatures that inhabit the northern Negeb and the desert of Judah, for instance, the tiger weasel (Vormela), the bustard, the isolepis agama, and others. To the Sudano-Decanic group belong the creatures that inhabit the lower Jordan Valley, especially the oasis areas of the desert and the vicinity of the Dead Sea. To the tropical groups belong the cheetah, the honey badger, the tropical cuckoo, the carpet viper, and others. To the holarctic group belong the northern creatures, for instance, the shrew, and the meadow pipit.

Palestine, at the juncture of three continents, is a meeting place of creatures of many different regions, and it has a rich variety of species. Currently known are 68 species of mammals, about 350 species of birds, about 80 species of reptiles, about 40 species of fresh-water fishes, and 8 species of amphibia. According to F. S. Bodenheimer, the number of recognized insect species is about 8,000 and, in his opinion the total reaches about 22,000. According to this scholar, the Arthropoda number about 900 known species and possibly total about 2,000. As for the invertebrates, there are about 300 recognized species, with the possible total of about 2,750.

Domestic Animals. Domestication of animals began at a very early period in Palestine. On the rocks of Kilwa in Transjordan prehistoric carvings of camels and cattle have been found. Jericho has yielded clay statues of a herd of goats, lambs, and pigs from c. 5000 B.C. Inside an Egyptian temple at Beth-shan figurines of cats have been found. (Cats are not mentioned in the Bible.) There have been found in the Holy Land paintings of dogs of at least four different breeds. The cattle are of uncertain breed. In paintings of the Roman and Byzantine period, hunchback cattle, such as the zebu, are depicted. The black, long-eared goat was a very early inhabitant, and it is pictured as early as 1500 B.C. This is also the case in regard to the broad-tailed sheep. The horse was not an important domestic animal; more important were the ass and the mule. In addition to the dove, chickens were raised as early as the period of the Israelite monarchy; a cock is depicted on a seal found at Tell en-Nasbeh, probable site of ancient Mizpeh. To the royal courts were brought decorative tropical birds, such as the peacock; and the courts received monkeys also (1 Kgs 10.22).

Bibliography: Flora. H. BALFOUR, The Plants of the Bible (new ed. London 1885). O. CELSIUS, Hierobotanicon, 2 v. (Amsterdam 1748). P. CULTRERA, Flora Biblica (Palermo 1861). G. H. DALMAN, Arbeit und Sitte in Palästina, 7 v. in 8 (Gütersloh 1928–42). I. LÖW, Die Flora der Juden, 4 v. in 5 (Vienna-Leipzig 1924–34). H. N. and A. L. MOLDENKE, Plants of the Bible (Waltham, Mass. 1952). In Hebrew. B. CHIZIK, Otsar ha-Tsemahim (Herzlia 1952). M. ZOHARY, Olam ha-Tsemahim (Tel Aviv 1954); Geobotanikah (Merhavya 1955). J. FELIKS, Olam ha-Tsomeah ha-Mikrai (Tel Aviv 1957); Ha-Haklout be-Eretz Yisrael bi-tekufat ha-Mishnah veha-Talmud (Jerusalem 1963). Fauna. F. HASSELQUIST, Iter palaestinum, ed. C. VON LINNÉ (Stockholm 1757). H. B. TRISTAM, The Fauna and Flora of Palestine (London 1884); Natural History of the Bible (10th ed. New York 1911). L. LEWYSOHN, Die Zoologie des Talmuds (Frankfurt 1858). F. S. BODENHEIMER, Tierwelt Palästinas, 2 v. (Leipzig 1920); Prodromus faunae palaestinae (Cairo 1937); Animal and Man in Bible Lands (Leiden 1960). J. FELIKS, The Animal World of the Bible, tr. P. IRSAL (Tel Aviv 1962). In Hebrew. I. AHARONI, Torat ha-Hai, 3 v. (Tel Aviv 1927–49); Zikhronot Zoolog Ivri (Tel Aviv 1942–43). Y. MARGOLIN, Zoologia (Tel Aviv 1959). F. S. BODENHEIMER, Ha-Hai be-Artsot ha-Mikra, 2 v. (Jerusalem 1949–56); Ha-Hai be-Eretz Yisrael (Tel Aviv 1953). J. FELIKS, Ha-Hai shel ha-Tanakh (Tel Aviv 1954).

[J. FELIKS]

5. Archeology

Palestine, as used here, embraces the lands not only to the west but also to the east of the River Jordan. After World War I both territories were under British mandate. Under the mandatory power a Department of Antiquities was organized to protect and promote the study of the antiquities of the country. According to the norms of this department an antiquity is “an object which has been constructed, shaped, inscribed, erected, excavated or otherwise produced or modified by human agency earlier than the year 1700 A.D.” To preserve the movable antiquities, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., provided funds for the construction of an appropriate museum in Jerusalem; it was opened to the public in 1938. The Department of Antiquities established its headquarters here also. At that time the files of the department contained records of about 4,000 archeological sites [see R. W. Hamilton, “Schedule of Historical Monuments and Sites,” Palestine Gazette Extraordinary 1375, suppl. 2 (Nov. 24, 1944)] and about 40,000 objects, all of which were made accessible to scholars. Typical objects of all periods have been arranged in chronological order in the visitors’ galleries. The Palestine Archaeological Museum Gallery Book (hereafter PAMGB) aids the visitor in studying those objects and gives him a good survey of all the periods. The Department published its own periodical Quarterly of the Department of Antiquities in Palestine (hereafter QDAP) and a number of books and pamphlets on special places and themes. Since the termination of the mandate in 1948 the museum has been administered by an international board of trustees, under whose direction it has become the center for the study of the so-called Dead Sea Scrolls. The museum continues to be a valuable aid for study, although now both Jordan and Israel have their own Departments of Antiquities with their own museums and publications.

Both before and after 1948 the departments of antiquities have been assisted in their work by numerous foreign individuals, schools, and organizations. Thus, for example, N. Glueck alone, in his surface surveys, has added more than 1,400 names of archeological sites to the registers, and numerous excavations by others have greatly augmented the number of objects in the museums.

Summaries of the results achieved have been published by such scholars as C. Watzinger, W. F. Albright, K. Kenyon, and G. E. Wright. These have followed an ascending chronological order which will be followed also in the present article.

The earliest periods are named for the most effective materials available for tools: thus Stone, Bronze, and Iron Ages. Later periods are named for the political rulers of the area—the Persians, Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Crusaders, and Turks. Each such period is subdivided by archeologists using chronological (early, middle, late) or stratigraphical terms (lower, middle, upper); these are then often reduced to numbers or subdivided (e.g., Late Bronze III). Great strides have been made in refining the methods used, but much still remains vague and uncertain.

STONE AGE

Palestine is remarkable for the profusion of informative evidences that it has provided bearing on human existence in all phases of this long, essentially prehistoric period from c. 500,000 to c. 3100 B.C. After a long Early Stone Age (Paleolithic) period, rapid development in the Mesolithic and following (Neolithic, Chalcolithic, Proto-Urban) periods leads up to the historical times.

Paleolithic or Early Stone Age. This period extends from c. 500,000 B.C. to c. 10,000 B.C. The names of its subdivisions have been derived from similar cultures discovered in European countries: Chellean, Tayacian, Acheulean, Levallois-Mousterian, and Aurignacian. Animal remains suggest that the people of this entire period were primarily hunters and fishers. Such remains have turned up both in open-air sites and in caves.

Open-air Sites. The principal stations of this sort known until now are in the neighborhood of Jerusalem and near the lakes in the north. The oldest of these sites is near the southern end of the Sea of Tiberias at a place called Afiqim. It was discovered in 1960. Regarding it, M. Stekelis [Israel Exploration Journal (hereafter IEJ) 10 (1960) 118] reports: “The finds prove that the site was inhabited by men in the Lower Pleistocene Age, half a million years ago. These finds include few human remains: two fragments of a human skull, four times as thick as that of modern man, and one incisor tooth, the most ancient human remains ever discovered in the Near East. . . . Fossil bones of some forty different species of animals, most of them now extinct, were found. . . . Other finds consisted of flint tools and chopping instruments belonging to what is known as the ‘pebble culture.’” The relation of this find to other Lower Paleolithic levels in Galilee and Lebanon is discussed by E. de Vau-mas [“Chronologie des dépôts paléolithiques stratifiés,” IEJ 13 (1963) 195–207, with bibliography].

Caves. Near the northwestern shore of the Sea of Tiberias, near Nazareth, south of Mount Carmel, and in the Judean Desert, caves containing Early Stone Age deposits were excavated by F. Turville-Petre, R. Neuville, M. Stekelis, D. A. E. Garrod, and others. As a result of the work carried out in these caves, D. A. E. Garrod writes: “In the caves of Wady el-Mughara, for the first time, the Stone Age industries hitherto known only from isolated deposits, or as part of a very incomplete series, were found in place in a long and apparently continuous sequence extending from the Tayacian to the end of the Mesolithic” [D. A. E. Garrod and D. M. A. Bate, The Stone Age of Mount Carmel: Excavations at the Wady el-Mughara (hereafter SAMC) v.1 (Oxford 1937) 114]. The oldest industry found in the caves, the Tayacian, is characterized by small irregular flakes (see SAMC 114). The Acheulean level comes next; its flint industry is highly developed and consists chiefly of flakes. In this period human beings seem first to have been buried in or near caves. The minimum date suggested for such burials is about 50,000 years ago. The Galilee Skull, the first of these human remains in caves to be found, was excavated in 1925 by F. Turville-Petre in Mugharet ez-Zuttiyeh, northwest of the Sea of Galilee [see F. Turville-Petre et al., Researches in Prehistoric Galilee 1925–1926 (London 1927) 15–106]. It is now on exhibit in the Palestine Archeological Museum. According to PAMGB No. 33, “the skull belongs to a type of man closely related to the Neanderthal race,” which is “distinguished by strongly protruding eye-brow ridges, and by a low, receding forehead which indicates incomplete development of the brain” [see also The Biblical Archaeologist 26 (1963) 73–91].

The Lower Aurignacian industry marks an advanced flint culture; the hand axes disappear completely. It is followed by the Middle Aurignacian, the Athlitian and the Kebaran, the latest Palaeolithic industry. This industry belongs to a society of food-gatherers, leaving no buildings [see SAMC 116–117; IEJ 10 (1960) 259].

Mesolithic Period. During this time people lived in caves, near caves, or in structures out in the open. The first cave in which this culture was found was the Shukba cave in Wadi Natūf, northwest of Jerusalem. The excavations were made in 1928 by Garrod, who named the industry Natufian (see SAMC 114). Later, in her work in the Wadi el-Mughara, she found two layers of this industry in the Mugharet el-Wad: the lower (B 2) she called Lower Natufian; the upper (B 1) Upper Natufian. The former was also found by F. Turville-Petre in layer B of el-Kebara; it was particularly rich in worked and carved bone (SAMC 113, 117). R. Neuville found the same culture in various caves of the Judean Desert [R. Neuville et al., Le Paléolithique et le Mésolithique du Désert de Judée (hereafter PMDJ) (Paris 1951)]. The upper Natufian was found at Khiam on a terrace out in the open [see SAMC 113; PMDJ 135, 155; Revue biblique 70 (1963) 106–110].

Typical of the Mesolithic Period are blades and tools of minute size, called pygmy flints or microliths. Harpoons and fishhooks suggest that the people were fishers; sickles may indicate the beginning of agriculture; heads of animals carved on bone handles mark the beginnings of art; a carving of a human head is the oldest representation of a human being hitherto discovered in Palestine; and figures of deer or gazelles carved on or out of stone or bone illustrate high artistic skill. Pendants worn as charms or amulets suggest religious views [see PAMGB No. 150–249; Eretz Israel 6 (1956) 21–24, 27]. The shrine found beneath the tell near the spring of Jericho also suggests that the people were religious [see K. Kenyon, Archaeology of the Holy Land (hereafter AHL) 41–42]. This shrine preserved wood that made a carbon-14 test possible, and for the first time yielded an absolute date near the 9th millennium B.C. for this period. Other objects associated with this shrine made it possible to link it with the Lower Natufian of Mugharet el-Wad and thus fix the absolute chronology of that well-stratified site.

Mesolithic remains outside of caves have been found both at Eynan and Oren. They consist at present of stone foundations of both dwellings and tombs, close together. The dwellings are supposed to represent the first colony living outside of caves known in Palestine. The burial of the dead near their habitations continues an older custom [see IEJ 10 (1960) 14–22; Antiquity and Survival 2:2–3, 91–110; IEJ 7 (1957) 125, 8 (1958) 131, 10 (1960) 118–119; The Biblical Archaeologist 26 (1963) 76–77; PAMGB No. 249].

Neolithic Period. Between the Mesolithic and the Neolithic periods at JERICHO there were transitional settlements, which K. Kenyon called Proto-Neolithic; they produced 13 vertical feet of deposit without any substantial structure. The deposit was made up of innumerable floors bounded by slight humps, which were all that remained of slight hutlike structures. The same flint and bone industry, allied to the Lower Natufian of Mount Carmel, extended through the transitional Proto-Neolithic state to the large-scale settlement that followed. Jericho has, therefore, provided evidence of the transition from man as a hunter to man as a member of a settled community (see AHL 42–43).

Prepottery-Neolithic Period. This period is represented in the next two stages in the development of Jericho. In the earlier of these stages (Prepottery Neolithic A) Jericho had a solid, free-standing, stone town wall. A great stone tower was built against the inside of the western sector of the wall. Against the wall and its tower, curvilinear houses were built. The third series, successively constructed, of these houses produced charcoal timbers that gave a carbon-14 dating of 6850 B.C. plus or minus 210. The walls and tower were older (see AHL 43–47). According to D. Kirkbride [Palestine Exploration Quarterly (1960) 117–119] the flint instruments of this period resembled the Natufian flints of the two preceding periods.

The Prepottery-Neolithic B stage at Jericho had a flint industry that is called Tahunian and is considered the classic Neolithic industry of Palestine. It is not certain whether it developed from the Natufian or was superimposed on it; the latter seems to have been the case at Jericho, where there are new city walls and rectangular buildings, several of which were places of worship. The floors were covered with plaster, beneath which were found human burials. The heads were separated from the bodies and covered with plaster; the lifesize clay figures found by J. Garstang and later by K. Kenyon most probably came from this stage. Carbon-14 tests gave the following dates: 6250 B.C. plus or minus 200; 5850 B.C. plus or minus 160 (see AHL 47–57).

Evidence of this same period was discovered by Kirkbride in excavations carried out by her in 1956, 1958, 1959, and 1961 at Seyl Aqlat, in Beida, north of ancient Petra. Carbon-14 tests yielded dates in the 7th millennium B.C. [see Palestine Exploration Quarterly (1960) 136–145].

Pottery-Neolithic A and B Periods. These two periods are distinguished from all the preceding periods by the presence of fired-clay vessels. In the A stage some of the ware is coarse, other ware is fine and decorated. The chief difference is the finish. The finer ware has a comparatively smooth surface and is covered as a rule by a cream-colored slip. This slip in turn is partially covered by a red slip, so that the reserve portions of the cream slip form a pattern, usually in some combinations of chevrons or triangles. To heighten the contrast, the red slip is finely burnished with a beautifully lustrous finish. Altogether, it is a most attractive ware and contrasts strongly with the coarse pottery (see AHL 61, 62, and Fig. 4 in that source).

The Pottery-Neolithic-A material was discovered by Garstang in a level at Jericho that is known as Jericho IX and by Kenyon in numerous pits that served as habitations all over the site; in the next level there is a slight improvement in the habitations, as in the objects used in them.

In the B stage many of the vessels are covered with a deep-red slip, sometimes burnished, sometimes matte. The most characteristic decoration, found on both jars and bowls, is bands of herringbone incisions. The bands are usually delineated by grooves, and very often they are covered by a band of cream slip, with the rest of the vessel covered by a red slip (see AHL 65).

J. Kaplan [“The Neolithic Pottery of Palestine,” Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 156 (December 1959) 15–22] asserts that Miss Kenyon’s B stage is mixed, consisting of both Neolithic and Chalcolithic wares; the former he calls Yarmukian, the latter Jericho VIII or Ghassulian. In both phases the herringbone bands occur, but they differ from one another: “in the Yarmukian phase the pattern is part of the filling between the lines which create the zigzag band, whereas at Jericho VIII or Ghassul it is independent ornamentation surrounding the vessel in a band or bands and not in a zigzag pattern.” Kaplan’s conclusions are that only two main Neolithic phases have become known in the pottery of Palestine up to now: the “Yarmukian” and the older Jericho IX; the latter can be subdivided into two secondary phases based on a related site, Batashi IVa (upper) and Batashi IVb (lower). He asserts that Jericho VIII should not be combined with the Yarmukian Neolithic, nor is the Wadi Rabah material to be so combined, as seems to have occurred at Byblos in Lebanon (Byblos A). “Jericho VIII” and “Wadi Rabah” constitute distinct Chalcolithic phases.

Jericho was the first site in which the earliest pottery of Palestine was found in a stratified context. In 1959 Kaplan knew of seven such sites: besides Jericho, also Abu Usba’, Sha’ar ha-Golan, Tell-Aviv, Teluliyot Batashi in the Vale of Sorek, Khirbet Sheikh ‘Ali in the Jordan Valley south of Tiberias, and Kfar Gil’adi in the extreme north of Palestine. More recent explorations are rapidly increasing the number of sites in which this period is represented. The Pottery Neolithic Periods fall in the 5th millennium B.C.

Chalcolithic Period. In Palestine, this period, roughly the 4th millennium B.C., is characterized by the manufacture and use of copper objects, while stone implements continued to be used. It first became known through the work that the Pontifical Biblical Institute carried out from 1929 to 1938 at Tulaylat el-Ghassul, a site east of the Jordan and a little north of the Dead Sea. Since that time this culture has been noted in many other places throughout Palestine. Details are given by R. North in Ghassul 1960, Excavation Report [Analecta biblica 14 (1961)]. As a result of his own work at Ghassul (1959–60), North confirmed the existence of four levels or strata there, but he was not able to detect any change in culture in those strata. The same is said regarding the Chalcolithic sites explored in the neighborhood of Beer-sheba (see S. Yeivin, 13–19). The houses at Ghassul were rectangular and their interiors were often painted; in the Beer-sheba region the inhabitants lived partly underground, partly in pits sunk beneath the surface, and partly in rectangular buildings above ground. Ossuaries in the form of buildings, animals, or jars, found especially at Hedera, Azor, and Bne Beraq in the plain adjacent to the Mediterranean, suggest the form of the houses in that region.

At Ein Gedi, near the Dead Sea, a sacred enclosure of this period was found high up a mountain above the spring there. It consists of a wide open court, with a high place and three houses in the center; one, of the “broad house” type, was certainly used for ritual purposes; it is very well preserved, with a fireplace and benches inside [see Christian News from Israel (hereafter CNI) 14 (1963) 2:16; Revue biblique 70 (1963) 575–576, Pl. 23a]. In a cave in the Judean Desert a hoard of bronze and ivory cult objects of this period was discovered [see IEJ 11 (1961) 78–79, 12 (1962) 156].

According to J. A. Callaway [The Biblical Archaeologist 26 (1963) 78–82], the first intimations of SHEOL (the abode of the dead) go back to this period, when the dead began to be buried away from the habitations of the living. The chronological relations of the different phases of this culture are not yet clear. This holds true especially with reference to the gray burnished ware first found in Esdraelon sites. Carbon-14 tests yield dates toward the end of the 4th millennium for this culture (see AHL 82).

Proto-Urban Period. This is a new term invented by K. Kenyon (explained in AHL 84–100). It deals with three groups of pottery in use at about the same time and interlocking. These point to three different groups of people who are known principally from their tombs, not from their towns; they do not seem to have had any fortified towns, but seem to have been mere villagers living in poor dwellings. Some of the sites on which they lived were subsequently abandoned and remained so for a long time; such are Tell en-Nasbeh, a little north of Jerusalem, and Samaria; others were later to develop into towns, such as MEGIDDO, Jericho, Beth-shan, and Tell Far’ah (northeast of Nablus). The tombs are peculiar; they are the earliest to be cut into rock and to contain multiple burials. Their date has been fixed in the latter part of the 4th millennium. A central point has been fixed by a carbon-14 test made on material from Jericho; it is around 3200 B.C. and is confirmed by sealings on jars. Originally, some of these finds were assigned to the latter part of the Chalcolithic Period (the gray burnished ware, generally known as Esdraelon ware) and others (red painted ware) to the Early Bronze Age.

BRONZE AGE

In Palestine, as in other areas of ancient occupation, the term Bronze Age was intended originally as a designation of the period between the earliest use of nonprecious metals and the spread of iron tools. Today, the name is largely conventional, and includes three well-known periods (Early, Middle, and Late Bronze) extending from c. 3100 to c. 1200 B.C.

Early Bronze Age. This age (EB) is characterized by the development of villages into towns or cities that were protected by walls, of which good examples have been found at various places. At Jericho the walls were built of unbaked bricks made in molds. On the western side of the city 17 phases of building and rebuilding of the walls were traced. The walls were protected by round and rectangular towers and by an external ditch. The defenses of Tell el-Far'ah (northeast of Nablus) date from the fourth phase of its existence at the beginning of EB II; at the north they are of stone protected by a glacis of beaten earth; on the west they are of brick; this brick section collapsed at the end of the fifth period of occupation, before the beginning of EB III. The massive wall found at Megiddo was considered a city wall by the excavators, but Kenyon considers it a terrace wall because of the houses built against its exterior. The fortifications of Khirbet Kerak were built of brick either in EB I or in EB II. Those of Ai were constructed of stone, and consist of either three or two lines at various points; their date, however, remains uncertain. The so-called citadel was still in use in EB III. The town wall of Ras el-'Ain may go back to EB I.

Buildings inside the fortifications show a marked change in the course of this period. The earliest houses are the best; some have rounded ends; others are completely round. Timber was common. Associated with the houses are brick-built silos. From Tell el-Far'ah there is evidence that a new type of pottery kiln was introduced during the period; it continued in use down to the Roman Period. A conical stone altar with steps originated in EB III at Megiddo. V. M. Seton-Williams [Iraq 11 (1949) 79–83] distinguishes two types of temples in the EB Age, each with its distinctive ground plan. One is a single-chambered type, as at Jericho VII; the other is a more complex structure that contains at least three rooms, as at Hai. The sanctuary at Tell el-Far'ah has two rooms [see Revue biblique 68 (1961) Pl. 33, No. 671]. A remarkable building at Khirbet Kerak may have been either a shrine or a granary. The tombs were large rock-cut chambers with multiple burials. The pottery is characterized by a burnished slip, usually red, but occasionally black; it forms the basis for distinguishing three phases known as EB I, II, and III, beginning c. 3100 and ending c. 2300 B.C. The period is conventionally known as the EB Age, but in fact there is no certain evidence that bronze was used, and even copper was not very common (see AHL 101–134).

The Middle Bronze Age. This period (MB) begins with a subperiod characterized as intermediate (EB/MB) by K. Kenyon [AHL 135–161; K. Kenyon, Excavation at Jericho I: The Tombs Excavated in 1952–54 (Jerusalem 1960) 180–262, hereafter EJ I]. Others insist on calling it MB I, which term is retained in this article.

Middle Bronze Age I. In this period (2250–1850/1800 B.C.) the inhabited places were without walls and the houses were few in number. The three temples of stratum 15 at Megiddo probably belong to it. Tombs are numerous and characterized by individual burials. Much of the pottery is peculiar; R. Amiran endeavored to arrange it in three groups which she called A, B, and C [see IEJ 10 (1960) 204–225]. Albright, however, prefers a different sequence; he thinks that Amiran's A should come after C [Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 168 (1962) 36–42]. Both Albright and Glueck think that this is the period during which Abraham came to Palestine [see Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 163 (1961) 38–40; Glueck, Rivers in the Desert, 60–105].

Middle Bronze Age II. In this period (c. 1850/1800–1550/1500 B.C.) the cities were defended by walls. All those that have been excavated reveal a number of phases and can be illustrated by the walls of Jericho. In the earlier stages the single-wall type was used; this was replaced in the later phases by massive ramparts that consisted of three or four sections: an enormous fill, revetted below by a stone wall and crowned on top by the actual defensive wall. It is doubtful whether there was a ditch. All or some of these elements (the ditch, the revetment, the bank, and the wall) have been found at Tell ed-Duweir (Lachish), Tell Jeriseh, Tell el-'Ajjūl, Tell Far'ah (Beth-pelet), Tell Beit Mirsim, Megiddo, Hazor, and SHECHEM. At several places the gateways also were preserved; they consisted of a passage with three pairs of buttresses between which the actual gates were probably placed; this was the case at Megiddo X, Shechem, Tell Beit Mirsim, and Tell Far'ah (in the south).

The eastern side of the mound of Jericho reveals several streets and the houses flanking them. On the lower floor there were shops and storage places; on the upper floor habitations. In one group of chambers J. Garstang [The Story of Jericho (London 1940) 97–98] found vases of such fine quality that they seemed to represent temple offerings and furniture. One vase was decorated with a molded snake, "a terrestrial emblem of the Mother-goddess, symbolizing Life within the earth." Modeled serpents on cult objects of this period are very numerous (see PAMGB No. 773 and passim). Temples and cult objects of this period are known from Nahariya [see QDAP 14 (1950) 1–41; IEJ 6 (1956) 14–25]; from Shechem [see Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 169 (Feb. 1963) 5–32; The Biblical Archaeologist 16 (1963) 129–130], both a temenos (1800–1650) and a fortress-temple (1650–1550); probably from Megiddo VIII; and from Tell el-Far‘ah in the north [see Revue biblique 64 (1957) 559–567].

The tombs of Jericho in this period are noteworthy because they preserved till modern excavation not only the usual objects of clay and metal, but also objects of wood. The clay vessels found at Jericho provided Kenyon with a basis for distinguishing five phases of MB II. Regarding the MB II Period, see AHL 170–194; EJ I 263–518.

Late Bronze Age. Archeology reveals that in the Late Bronze (LB) period (16th–13th centuries B.C.) numerous cities were destroyed; good examples are Jericho, which fell twice, and Tell Beit Mirsim, both of which were restored only after long intervals. From those that survived or were rebuilt there is evidence that the art of fortification changed but little; both vertical and battered city walls remained in use. The city gates at Megiddo and Beth-shemesh were a continuation or a development of the type in use in the MB Period. The better houses consisted of rooms built around a courtyard. The palace near the gate at Mageddo contained a large number of ivories; an inscription dated one ivory object to the time of Ramses III (1175–1144 B.C.).

The discoveries of temples and objects used in them have been reported from Megiddo, Shechem, Tell Abu Hawam near Haifa, Beth-shan, Hazor, and Tell ed-Duweir. A stele of the god Mekal was found in the 14th-century temple at Beth-shan; it contained also a panel representing a struggle between a lion and a dog. In one of several temples at Hazor was found a stele with two hands raised in prayer, along with many other stelae without representations. For the burial of prominent persons shaft tombs continued to be used. For the first time in history plastered cisterns began to be used; this made it possible to build homes and towns at places where there was no natural water supply.

Written sources from Palestine are now quite numerous. From Beth-shan come royal and private stelae dating from the 14th and 13th centuries; their inscriptions are in Egyptian hieroglyphs and reveal something about the political and religious conditions in Palestine at that time. A fragment of another stele of Thutmose III or Amenophis II was discovered at Tell el-‘Oreimeh near the northwestern part of the Sea of Tiberias. Inscribed statues of Ramses III (1175–1144 B.C.) were found at Beth-shan and Megiddo. At Tell el-Amarna in Egypt were found more than 350 cuneiform tablets, mostly official letters sent from Palestine between 1364 and 1347 B.C. Other cuneiform tablets turned up in Palestine itself at Taanach (12 tablets), Tell el-Hesi, Shechem, Lachish, and Beth-shemesh. The art of the period is illustrated by stelae, statues, figurines, ivories, etc. Peculiar to this period are bichrome ware, base ring ware, and stirrup vessels. The first group is characteristic of the beginning of the period, the second of the whole period, and the third of the end of the period. The first is a local product; the other two come from Cyprus and Mycenae, respectively. They indicate the country's extensive trade contacts with the Mediterranean. See AHL 195–220; Albright, Archaeology of Palestine (hereafter AP) 96–109.

BIBLICAL PERIOD AND LATER

The Israelite settlement in Palestine coincides roughly with the beginning of the Iron Age (c. 1200 B.C.); later periods are identified by archeologists with the name of the occupying power of the moment, beginning with the Persians.

Iron Age. Towns and fortresses of the Iron Age (12th to 6th centuries B.C.) were protected by casemate walls, though solid walls with projections and recesses also are found, for example, at Megiddo. Their gates continued older traditions with slight modifications. The use of Proto-Aeolic capitals is now known from Jerusalem, Ramet Rachel, Samaria, Megiddo, and Hazor. Tunnels supplied water to Jerusalem, Gibeon, Megiddo, and Saidiyeh. Temples are reported from Beth-shan, Megiddo, Hazor, Arad, Ashdod, etc. Palaces, storerooms, and vast stables are reported from Megiddo and elsewhere. For the burial of the dead divan-shaped tombs were used; coffins made of clay have been recovered at Tell el-Far‘ah in the Negeb, at Beth-shan, and at Sahab; they have anthropoidal lids (see Galling BR 448–449). At Tell el-Kheleifeh, ancient Eziongeber, a copper refinery has been excavated (see N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan, 89–113).

Inscriptions are numerous. D. Diringer in Le iscrizioni antico-ebraiche palestinesi (Florence 1934) and S. Moscati in L'epigraphia ebraica antica (Rome 1951) have collected most of the Hebrew inscriptions known up to 1951. To these we may now add a Canaanite tablet of the 12th century B.C. from Taanach [The Biblical Archaeologist 26 (1963) 125]; new material from the 7th century B.C. [Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 165 (February 1962) 34–46]; numerous inscriptions from Arad since 1961; stamped jar handles from Jib; the LACHIS (LACHISH) Letters, etc. Ivories, especially from Samaria [see J. W. and G. M. Crowfoot, Samaria-Sebaste, II: Early Ivories from Samaria (London 1938)] illustrate the art of the period. Religious practices are illustrated by numerous Astarte figurines and stands for burning incense or making offerings; they are often decorated with human figures or with animals such as doves and snakes (see AHL 221–297; AP 112–142).

Persian Period. In this period (6th to 4th centuries B.C.) administrative buildings existed principally at Lachish, Tell Jemmeh, and Ramet Rachel. Tombs of the shaft type are reported from Tell el-Far‘ah in the Negeb, from Gezer, and from ‘Athlit. Coins put in their appearance for the first time in the Persian period. Astarte figurines, numerous in earlier periods, still continued to be in use, though their style was already influenced by Greek art (see PAMGB No. 710). From Lachish alone over 150 crude incense altars are reported [see O. Tufnell et al., Lachish III: The Iron Age (London, New York, and Toronto 1953) 226; PAMGB, No. 720, 721]. Glass began to be used for seals (see PAMGB No. 766). Amulets had representations of Egyptian gods. Inscriptions occur on many small objects. Most interesting, however, are the papyri found in 1962 and 1963; they come from Samaria, and deal with legal and administrative matters; they are written in Aramaic and date from the time between Artaxerxes III (358–338) and 335 B.C. [see The Biblical Archaeologist 26 (1963) 110–121; Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 171 (1963) 2].

Greek Period. This period (4th to 1st centuries B.C.) is also commonly referred to as the Hellenistic period. Greek culture had been introduced into Palestine long before Alexander the Great had conquered it (332 B.C.) and subjected it to his rule and that of his successors, the Ptolemies of Egypt (down to 198 B.C.) and the Seleucids of Syria. For a description of the round towers and the fort of the Greek period at Samaria, see J. W. Crowfoot et al., Samaria-Sebaste, I: The Buildings of Samaria (London 1942) 24–31 (hereafter SS I); the fortifications and buildings of Tell Sandahannah are treated by F. J. Bliss and R. A. S. Macalister, Excavations in Palestine 1898–1900 (London 1902) 52–57. In Tell Sandahannah are the earliest tombs of the kôkîm (oven-shaped) type found in Palestine; the walls are painted and have numerous inscriptions [see J. P. Peters and H. Thiersch, Painted Tombs in the Necropolis of Marissa (London 1905)]. Rhodian jar handles with stamped inscriptions characterize this period. Moreover, coins are now a very important means for dating the monuments. The discovery of the Samaria papyri has convinced F. M. Cross that his dates of “the old Exodus manuscript from Cave 4, Qumran (c. 250 B.C.) and the archaic Samuel manuscript (c. 225 B.C.) now appear to be minimal, and it is clear in turn that the so-called Hasmonean hands of Qumran cannot be reduced in date” [The Biblical Archaeologist 26 (1963) 120]. New light has been shed on this period by work at ‘Araq el-Emir [see Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 171 (October 1963) 8–55; see also C. Watzinger, Denkmäler Palästina II (hereafter DP II) 10–30; AP 146–154].

Roman Period. Jerash in Transjordan and Samaria west of the Jordan (see SS I, 31–37) were typical Roman cities of this period (1st century B.C. to 4th Christian century). Walls, gates, columned streets, forums, stadia, theaters, nymphaea, baths, and temples were some of their chief features; the palaces were noteworthy for their architecture, paintings, mosaics, and baths. As places of worship the pagans had their temples, dedicated to many deities, and also Semitic-style high places; the Jews had not only their famous temple in Jerusalem but also numerous synagogues, especially in Galilee. For burial purposes there were mausoleums built of stone containing sarcophagi; rock-cut chambers with graves in the form of kôkîm or arcosolia also contained sarcophagi or ossuaries, often with decorations and inscriptions carved on them; in a few cases the chambers were painted [see Annual of the Department of Antiquities of Jordan (hereafter ADAJ) 4–5 (1960) 116]. Most of the Qumran manuscripts and those which have been and are being found more to the south belong to this period (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). For more details regarding this period one can consult AP 154–176; DP II 31–116. The excavations at Herodium, Liber Annuus Studii Biblici Franciscani (hereafter LA) 13 (1963) 219–277; Masada, IEJ 7 (1957) 1–65; Caesarea, CNI 14:3–4 (1963) 20–24; Jerash, ADAJ 4–5 (1960) 123–127; Petra, ADAJ 5–6 (1960) 119–122; 6–7 (1962) 13–54, and other sites, are constantly shedding new light on this period.

Byzantine Period. This period (4th to 7th century A.D.) was characterized by the public use of the cross on churches, monasteries, private homes, and burial places. All these monuments were generally quite plain on their exteriors, but inside they were beautified by the extensive use of marble, mosaics, and paintings. The decorative elements now took on a Christian character; their inspiration was generally derived from the Scriptures and the liturgy. The same holds true regarding the numerous inscriptions, which, however, contain much historical information as well. The dead continued to be buried in rock-cut tombs like those of earlier periods, especially the arcosolia type; a new practice was that of interment in shaft tombs inside churches and monasteries or in nearby cemeteries [see DP II, 117–164; B. Bagatti, L’Archeologia Cristiana in Palestina (Florence 1962)]. SYNAGOGUES of this period closely resembled churches in their form and decorations, though their distinctive character was generally indicated by candelabra and inscriptions. See LA 4 (1954) 219–246.

First Arab Period. At the beginning of this period (7th–11th centuries), i.e., up to about the middle of the 8th century, synagogues, churches and mosques, as well as new palaces, flourished; after that almost all began to be neglected and to fall into ruins. The palaces at Khirbat el-Minyeh, at the northwestern part of the Sea of Tiberias (see IEJ 10 (1960) 226–243), and at Khirbat al Mafjar, north of Jericho [see QDAP 5–14; D. C. Baramki, Guide to the Umayyad Palace at Khirbat Mafjar (Jerusalem 1947); R. W. Hamilton and O. Grabar, Khirbat al Mafjar: An Arabian Mansion in the Jordan Valley (Oxford 1959)] have been excavated. The latter consisted not only of a royal palace, but also of baths, mosques, colonnaded courtyards, pools, gardens, groves, etc. For some of the floors, beautiful mosaics were used; for the walls and ceilings, geometrical motifs, human beings, and animals were executed in stucco.

Period of the Crusades and After. Palestine is still dotted with the castles, churches, and monasteries built by the Crusaders (11th and 12th centuries); some are well preserved. The location of these monuments is indicated on a map published by the Palestine Government in 1937 (Palestine of the Crusaders: A Map of the Country); an accompanying text was prepared by C. N. Johns, who himself carried on work at the castle at 'Athlit (see QDAP 1–4). On pages 20–21 of the brochure he indicates other sources dealing with these monuments. In the period after the Crusades (late 12th to 16th centuries) Saladin and his successors generally adapted older buildings to their purposes and repaired them. See R. W. Hamilton, The Structural History of the Aqsa Mosque (Jerusalem 1949); H. Luke and E. Keith-Roach, The Handbook of Palestine and Transjordan (London 1934) 85–89.

Bibliography: W. F. ALBRIGHT, The Archaeology of Palestine (Baltimore 1960). K. M. KENYON, Archaeology in the Holy Land (New York 1960). G. E. WRIGHT, Biblical Archaeology (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1963). S. YEIVIN, A Decade of Archaeology in Israel 1948–1958 (Istanbul 1960). C. WATZINGER, Denkmäler Palästinas, 2 v. (Leipzig 1933–35). H. C. J. LUKE and E. KEITH-ROACH, eds., The Handbook of Palestine and Transjordan (3rd ed. London 1934). N. GLUECK, Rivers in the Desert (New York 1959); The River Jordan (Philadelphia 1946); The Other Side of the Jordan (New Haven 1940). The Holy Land: New Light on the Prehistory and Early History of Israel (Antiquity and Survival 2.2–3; The Hague 1957).

[S. J. SALLER]

6. Pre-Israelite Ethnology

References to the pre-Israelite population of Palestine are far from lacking in the Bible. They are to be found in the lists of peoples dispossessed by the invading tribes of Israel and in incidental statements about the earlier inhabitants of the land or of particular localities. About some of these people very little is known. They have left little more than their names on the pages of the Bible. Such, for example, are the so-called giants of the land: the Emim who are said to have dwelt in Moab (Dt 2.10–11); the Anakim, found in the vicinity of Hebron (Nm 13.22, 32–33; Dt 2.10,21); and the Rephaim, inhabitants of Bashan and the environs of Jerusalem (Gn 14.5; Dt 3.13; 2 Sm 21.16, 18). Other enigmatic names are those of the Avvim who lived in villages near Gaza (Dt 2.22); the Zuzim (Gn 14.5) in Gilead; and the Zamzumim, found in Ammon (Dt 2.20). Gergashites are named without any locality (Gn 10.16; 15.21; Dt 7.1). The Amalekites were a primitive people of the Negeb (Ex 17.8–16; Nm 13.29).

Other groups, however, have left their mark on the pages of history. They are known not only from biblical references, but can be found in extra-biblical literature as well—in such texts as those coming from Mari, Amarna, etc. First and foremost are the two Semitic groups, the Canaanites and the Amorrites. In addition, the non-Semitic elements are represented by the Hurrians, Hittites, Hivites, Jebusites, and Perizzites.

Canaanites and Amorrites. Canaanites (Channanites) occupied the whole area west of the Jordan (see CANAAN AND CANAANITES). The land of Canaan, later known in part as Phoenicia (see PHOENICIANS), is the oldest designation for the land of Palestine. Historically the Canaanites were apparently in Palestine as early as the 4th millennium B.C. Biblically this term has both a geographical and an ethnic meaning. Geographically it can refer to any and all the inhabitants of the territory west of the Jordan, whatever their ethnic origin may be. More precisely, however, it is used to refer to that ethnic group of peoples who were dispossessed by the Israelites (Ex 3.8, 17; 13.5; 33.2) and who are said to have inhabited the coastal regions and the plains (Nm 13.29).

AMORRITES appear in northern Syria, the land of Amurru, toward the beginning of the 2nd millennium B.C. Thence they spread out through the fertile crescent, founding such dynasties as those of Mari and Babylon. Biblically they are found on both sides of the Jordan and are said to have preferred the mountainous regions (Nm 13.29). They dwelt particularly in Judah (Jos 10.5) and in the areas of Bashan (Nm 21.33–34) and Heshbon (Nm 21.26). As a geographic term Amorrite is used to refer to the pre-Israelite population of Palestine in general, regardless of ethnic affiliation (Am 2.9–10).

Hurrians and Hittites. Of the non-Semitic population, Hurrians, Hittites, and Hevites deserve special considerations. The Hurrians were a non-Indo-European Armenoid people who settled especially in northern Mesopotamia, particularly in the land subsequently known as Mitanni, and in eastern Mesopotamia, e.g., at Nuzi. They were among the Hyksos who invaded Egypt. According to the Bible, where they are called Horites, the Hurrians were among the ancient inhabitants of central Palestine [Gn 34.2 (Septuagint)] and Seir (Edom: Gn 14.6; Dt 2.12, 22). Ethnically, it would seem that the Jebusites, the early inhabitants of Jerusalem, belonged to Hurrian stock (Ez 16.45). Despite the prominence of Hurrians in extra-biblical literature they receive only scant attention in the Bible.

On the other hand Hivites are found at Shechem (Gn 34.2), Gibeon (Jos 9.7), Mt. Lebanon (Jgs 3.3), Mt. Hermon (Jos 11.3), and in the vicinity of Sidon (2 Sm 24.7), but they receive no mention whatever in any of the extra-biblical literature. It has been suggested that Hivite is a local name for Hurrian. Another attractive theory is that the Hurrians of Seir (Edom) were really Hivites and that the Hivites mentioned in the biblical narratives were in fact Hurrians.

More enigmatic still are the references to the Hittites of the Bible, where they are called Hethites. Historically, three groups called HITTITES are known: the Proto-Hittites or Hattians, the Hittites of the 2nd millennium B.C. or Nesians who used mostly cuneiform for their writings, and the Hittites of the 1st millennium B.C. whose inscriptions are in hieroglyphics. Who the Hittites of Palestine might have been remains a historical problem. They are said to have dwelt in the vicinity of Hebron (Gn 23.2–4; 25.10) and Beer-sheba and in the hill country of southern Palestine (Gn 26.34). It is possible, though not probable, that Hurrian should be substituted for Hittite in the biblical narratives. All three of these terms—Hurrian, Hivite, Hittite—differ only in the middle letter in the Hebrew consonantal text: hry, hwy, and hty. Confusion, therefore, could easily have resulted in the transmission of the text.

Receiving frequent mention, usually in conjunction with other dispossessed peoples, are the Perizzites. They are found at Bethel, at Shechem, and in the hill country of Judah (Gn 15.20; Ex 3.8, 17; Dt 7.1; Jos 17.15; etc.). However, not much can be said about them. Judging from the above name alone, the Perizzites could have been of Hurrian origin. Names ending in “-izzi” are known from extra-biblical Hurrian references. Whatever the case may be, they were a distinct ethnic group in the pre-Israelite population of Palestine.

Bibliography: J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959) 106–107. J. C. L. GIBSON, “Observations on Some Important Ethnic Terms in the Pentateuch,” Journal of Near Eastern Studies 20 (1961) 217–238.

[F. SEPER]

7. Holy Places

For Christians the term “holy places of Palestine” designates the sites in the Holy Land that have been made sacred by the presence of Jesus or His blessed Mother or the Apostles. From the viewpoint of relative importance, the holy places are either primary or secondary. In the former class are the cave where Jesus was born, the tomb in which He was buried, etc.; in the latter class are the Pool of Shiloh, the place where St. Stephen was stoned, etc. The holy places may be connected either with private houses, as the home of Mary at Nazareth, the Cenacle, etc., or with sites in the open, such as the Mount of the Beatitudes, the place at the Jordan where Jesus was baptized, the Garden of Gethsemani, etc. On the basis of scholarly certitude the holy places may be regarded either as authentic or as based on pious legend. To the former class belong the site of the Annunciation, the cave of Christ’s Nativity, the tomb of Lazarus at Bethany, etc.; to the latter belong the STATIONS OF THE CROSS, the site where Mary and Joseph found Jesus in the temple, etc.

Nature. Shrines or sanctuaries were erected at the holy places at different times. The reasons for building them were various: to honor the place as a king is honored by giving him a crown, to preserve them from profanation, and especially to have a proper edifice for the celebration of the sacred liturgy. Bad weather or, in certain periods of history, the interference of unbelievers would have prevented Christians from celebrating the Eucharist there in peace, and since the Eucharist was considered the best means of being united with Christ at these venerated sites, sacred edifices were erected there.

In regard to the architectural form, at the holy places the churches are or have been of five naves (the basilica at Bethlehem and the former basilica at Calvary), of three naves (at Gethsemani, Tabor, Bethany, etc.), and of one nave (the ancient chapel of the Multiplication of the Loaves and of the BEATITUDES at et-Tabga), or churches with the ground plan of a Greek cross (formerly at Jacob’s Well), or of a circle (the rotunda of the Ascension), or octagonal (over the house of Peter at Capernaum). The present owners are either Muslims (the church of the Ascension), or Israeli (the Cenacle), or Latin-rite Catholics (Tabor, Nazareth, Capernaum, Ain Karem, etc.), or Greek Orthodox (Jacob’s Well, Jebel Quarantāl, i.e., the site of our Lord’s 40-day fast), or the three communities jointly of Latin Catholics, Greek Orthodox, and Armenians (the Holy Sepulcher and the Basilica of Bethlehem, in both places the status quo going back to 1852, when a Turkish decree ordained that these three Christian communities should henceforth retain what rights they had there as of that year).

History. The sanctuaries at the holy places date almost exclusively from the 4th century, when Christians of Gentile origin first came in numbers to the Holy Land. At first the Judeo-Christians of Palestine regarded the holy places as memorials, and they left most of them in their pristine state. Such were the tombs of Jesus, of the Blessed Virgin, of St. Joseph, and of LAZARUS. But a few of the holy places they adapted, in simple fashion, for Christian worship, such as the house of the Holy Family at Nazareth and the upper room on "Christian Zion." The first important period for the building of Christian sanctuaries at the holy places in Palestine was that of the 4th and 5th centuries, when construction proceeded chiefly under the patronage of the Byzantine emperors. The second such period was in the 12th century, when the crusaders had control of the Holy Land, and the third was from the middle of the 19th century to the present. Between these periods of construction there were periods of destruction: in 614, when Palestine was devastated by the Persians; from 638 to 1099, during which time the Muslims on several occasions destroyed certain Christian sanctuaries, and from 1187 to the present, when the Muslims, though not actively destructive, have often interfered with Christian worship at the holy places.

Authenticity. To evaluate the authenticity of any of the holy places of Palestine, two main conditions must be fulfilled if the site is to be considered authentic: its localization must not contradict the data of the Bible, and the tradition connected with it must go back to Apostolic times. If either of these requirements is missing, the place must be regarded as having merely devotional value. Thus, the localization of Emmaus at modern Amwas has, in its favor, a tradition going back at least to Byzantine times; but the site does not seem to agree with the Gospel data, since its distance from Jerusalem is much greater than the 60 stadia given in the best manuscripts of Lk 24.13. The location of Emmaus at modern el-Qubeibeh agrees with the Gospel data of 60 stadia, but the tradition connected with this site does not seem to be older than crusader times.

Since almost all the sanctuaries in the Holy Land date from the 4th and later centuries, and consequently the earliest descriptions left by pilgrims date from these centuries, one may wonder how it is possible to show that there is any tradition in regard to them going back to the time of the Apostles. However, for a certain group of the holy places it is possible to suppose that throughout the early centuries of Christianity there were Judeo-Christians in these places who would have been as interested in these sacred sites as modern Christians are. Until not long ago such continuous presence of Judeo-Christians in the Holy Land was not suspected. But recent discoveries at NAZARETH and at Dominus Fleuit, as well as a more careful study of the Talmudic sources, of certain statements of the Fathers, and of the sparse data collected by Eusebius, have shown that during the first few Christian centuries a certain number of Judeo-Christians continued to live in Palestine, especially in its mountain regions.

Judeo-Christian Traditions. To mention a few cases in particular, it is known, for instance, that "the brethren [relatives] of the Lord" lived at Nazareth at least until 250 as leaders of the local Christian community, and precisely at the present traditional site of the Annunciation, archeological excavations have brought to light a religious edifice resembling a synagogue that was built not later than the 3rd century, together with certain caves that were venerated at even an earlier date. Many graffiti here with the words "holy place" or with such an invocation as X[AIP]E MAPIA ("Hail, Mary!") show, not only the continuous veneration of the place, but also the Judeo-Christian character of its possessors and visitors, which had already been surmised from the literary sources.

The presence of Mînîm (Judeo-Christians) at Capernaum during the early Christian centuries is well known from the Talmud. The tradition locating the CENACLE on Christian Zion is witnessed to by a retrospective passage in Epiphanius and especially by the so-called "Tomb of David" there, which is to be related with the Christian synagogues at Nazareth. The tomb of the blessed Virgin at JERUSALEM, which is mentioned in Judeo-Christian sources, was held to be connected with "very ancient" tradition when the sanctuary there was erected by Gentile Christians. At the cave of Gethsemani there was preserved, even after the Constantinian peace, the remembrance of a sacred supper that had been held there formerly by the Judeo-Christians. The cave of the Eleona (ἐλαιών, olive grove) on the MOUNT OF OLIVES, regarded as the site where Jesus taught His disciples the LORD'S PRAYER, is mentioned in the apocryphal sources and is spoken of as a venerated site by Eusebius five years before Constantine began his program of building sanctuaries in the Holy Land. The same is true of the tomb of Lazarus and the cave of the Nativity at BETHLEHEM. The latter site was known also to Origen and even St. Justin. When the site of the Holy SEPULCHER was recovered in 326, the Gentile Christians took pains to verify its authenticity by establishing its agreement with the Gospel data, such as the earthquake fissure in the rock of CALVARY and the single burial niche in the tomb chamber there, so that the tradition that had been maintained by the Judeo-Christians for this site was relegated to a subordinate position.

The Evangelists did not think it opportune to refer to everything that concerned the holy places. But other points of information were transmitted by the apocryphal Gospels; thus, the Gospel of the Hebrews places the fasting of Jesus on Mount Tabor, and the Proto-Evangelium of James has the beginning of the Annunciation take place at the fountain in Nazareth. This does not mean that such extra-evangelical traditions are always historical. Rather, they give evidence of a difference, going back to a very early period, between Galilean traditions and Judean ones, e.g., regarding the place of the 40-day fast of Jesus after His Baptism (see TEMPTATIONS OF JESUS).

Despite the many vicissitudes that Palestine has suffered in the course of its long history, most of the place names throughout the country have been preserved from remote antiquity to the present with remarkable fidelity. Therefore, there is no reason to doubt the local traditions that preserved the biblical names, not only of such villages as Nazareth and Nain, but also also of such localities as Gethsemani and Shiloh.

From the examples just cited, as well as from others that could be given, it can be seen that, in order to establish the authenticity of the holy places, it is necessary to study each case by itself against its historical background. To reject all of them as spurious or to accept all of them as authentic without further ado is an easy way out, but it does not lead to the truth.

Exegetical Value. The scientific study of the holy places can contribute much to general biblical studies, whether this confirms the authenticity of the places or whether it establishes their value more precisely. Thus, for instance, the excavation and study of the Pool of BETHESDA both confirm and explain the statement in Jn 5.2 that this pool had "five porticoes"; the location of the Garden of Gethsemani shows how far from Jerusalem Jesus was when arrested (Mt 26.36, 47); Jacob's Well at Shechem shows what the Samaritan woman meant when she told Jesus that "the well is deep" (Jn 4.6.11); the sanctuary of the Nativity at Bethlehem shows that the manger in which the infant Jesus was bedded was in a cave that was used for a stable, as many caves still are so used in Palestine (Lk 2.7); the rustic character of Nazareth at the time of Christ, as shown by the archeological excavations there, throws light on Nathanael's question, "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1.46).

Bibliography: C. KOPP, The Holy Places of the Gospels, tr. R. WALLS (New York 1963). E. HOADE, Guide to the Holy Land (Jerusalem 1942 and later eds.); Marian Shrines in Mary's Land (Ottawa 1958). B. BAGATTI, L'archeologia cristiana in Palestina (Florence 1962). D. BALDI, Enchiridion locorum sanctorum (2nd ed. Jerusalem 1955). G. PERELLA, I Luoghi Santi (Piacenza 1936). A. OLIVAN, Maria nella sua terra (Milan 1958). Authenticity of the Holy Places. B. BAGATTI, "Sguardo storico (ai giudeo-cristiani)," Il simbolismo dei giudeo-cristiani, ed. E. TESTA (Jerusalem 1962) 19–33; "Sainte Sion," Saint Jacques le Mineur (Jerusalem 1962) 13–22; "Le origini della 'tomba della Vergine' in Getsemani," Revista Biblica Italiana 11 (1963) 38–52; "Autenticità del S. Sepolcro," La Terra Santa 38 (1962) 299–302; "Origine dei Luoghi santi di Palestina," Liber Annuus 14 (1963–64) 32–64. E. TESTA, "Le Grotte dei misteri giudeo-cristiane," ibid. 65–144. B. BAGATTI, L'Église de la circoncision (Jerusalem 1965) 93–113.

[B. BAGATTI]

PALESTINE, EARLY CHURCH IN

Since the time of Diocletian, it was customary to distinguish (1) Palestina prima, or the middle section of West Jordania, with Caesarea as capital; (2) Palestina secunda, or Galilee and Peraea, with its capital at Scythopolis; (3) Palestina tertia, or salutaris, the southern part of Judaea and Peraea, with capital at Petra.

Early Palestinian Christianity. With the Palestinian revolt against Rome in 66, the Christian community left Jerusalem for Pella in Transjordan. Their bishop was Simeon, relative of Jesus and successor of James. By this gesture the Jewish Christians separated themselves from the Temple, which was destroyed in 70 by Titus. Some Christians returned from Pella, and Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 4.5) states that 15 bishops succeeded one another at Jerusalem up to the revolt under Hadrian, all of Hebrew descent. This large number probably includes the presbyteroi, one of whom was chosen as bishop. The Christians of Jerusalem adhered to Jewish practices, and the Epistle of Jude and the Apocryphal Gospel of James seem to come from this group. They were not favored by the Jews, and BAR KOKHBA persecuted them during his revolt of 132 to 135. Suppressed by Hadrian, Jerusalem was rebuilt as Aelia Capitolina, and only a few Christians returned. Others migrated to Kokaba in Transjordania, to Nazareth, and to Aleppo. In Jerusalem itself, pagan statues were erected on the site of the Temple, and on Golgotha, the mount of the Crucifixion, a temple was erected to the Capitoline Triad.

Palestinian Bishops. Christian missionaries were sent from Palestine to the churches of Egypt, Osrhoene, and Adiabene. Though it was the land where Christianity originated, Palestine was not the scene of its most rapid diffusion and remained considerably behind the Greek-speaking cities of Syria. Palestinian towns with bishops before 325 were, besides Jerusalem and Caesarea (which had a bishop c. 190), Maximianopolis; Scythopolis; Sebaste; Flavia Neapolis; Ascalon; Diospolis, or Lydda; Nicopolis; Gadara; Azotus; Ascalon; Eleutheropolis; Jericho; Capitolias; Aila; and Gaza. Jaffa became an episcopal see after the time of Constantine. Pella seems to have become a permanent episcopal see only in the 5th century.

As early as the reign of Domitian, Gnostic tendencies appeared among the Palestinian Christians. As Ves-pasian before him, Domitian sought out relatives of Jesus, fearing a renewed Messianism. When Christians were martyred under Trajan, Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem and son of Cleophas, was among them. Lucian's satire in his Life of Peregrinus gives a garbled picture of a Palestinian community of the 2d century. When synods were held under Pope Victor concerning the date of Easter, the assembled bishops of Palestine (c. 190) wrote a letter acknowledging agreement with the Western usage. Two Palestinian bishops are known to have attended this synod: Theophilus of Caesarea and Narcissus of Jerusalem. Bishops of Syria also were present, a fact that indicates that they did not belong to distinct ecclesiastical provinces at this time. Under Marcus Aurelius, Jerusalem had bishops of gentile descent, e.g., Narcissus and Alexander. Little by little, this community adapted itself to the universal Church, while a minority tended to sectarianism. Virginity was highly honored, and there are indications of a renewed Christian messianism, contemporary with a similar Jewish movement that inspired Septimius Severus, during a journey through Palestine in 202, to forbid further proselytism.

Origen at Caesarea. In 231, Theoctistus, bishop of Caesarea, ordained ORIGEN a priest, and made him head of the school which achieved considerable renown. Origen was active as lecturer and preacher, so that the city became an intellectual center for the Christians. The persecution of Valerian produced martyrs in Palestine in 257 to 258, but in spite of the emperor's hostility the majority of the region had been Christianized by the end of the 3d century.

As early as 260, Theotecnus, a student of Origen, was bishop of Caesarea, and under his successor the school was directed by PAMPHILUS who continued the tradition established by Origen and developed the famous library, which contained many Christian texts, including the Hexapla. Its intellectual direction reflected Alexandrian rather than Antiochene thought. When Arius was condemned, however, he took refuge with EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA and was declared innocent by a local council in Palestine, even though the bishop of Jerusalem, Macarius, opposed him. A certain number of Palestinian bishops, including Maximus and Saint CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, agreed with the condemnation of Arius at Nicaea, but Eusebius of Caesarea led the attack against the Nicæan bishops that culminated in the council of Tyre-Jerusalem of 335. This assembly deposed Athanasius and repudiated the term HOMOUSIOS. The successor of Eusebius, Acacius of Caesarea, became the head of the homoean faction and with imperial help in 360 reversed ecclesiastical power in the East. But even the support of the Emperor Valens (364–78) could not prevent the victory of orthodoxy. In 379, 153 Eastern bishops expressed their agreement with Rome.

Palestinian Monasticism. Monasticism began in Palestine during the first years of the 4th century with Hilarion of Gaza, who settled near Maiuma and whose fame attracted disciples. The Laura of Pharan on the Dead Sea was founded by Saint Chariton of Iconium about 320, and the coenobitic form of monastic life flourished. Other foundations were those of Saint EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA (c. 335) at Besanduk near Eleutheropolis; of Saints EUTHYMIUS and Theoctistus near Jericho; of Saint GERASIMUS on the Jordan; and of Saint THEODOSIUS near Bethlehem. Particularly important and lasting to our own times is the Great Laura founded near Jerusalem by Saint Sabas (d. 532). Latin monks were located at Bethlehem under Saint JEROME (386), while nuns dwelt nearby under Paula. MELANIA THE ELDER and RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA founded a double monastery on Mount Olivet in Jerusalem (c. 376). MELANIA THE YOUNGER took up her abode there early in the 5th century and erected two monasteries, as she had previously done at Tagaste in Africa.

In the 4th century Jerusalem entered into dispute with Caesarea over possession of the metropolitan see. The Council of Nicaea (c. 7) admitted a special position of honor for Jerusalem. But its bishops, particularly John (386–417) desired metropolitan status, and in 451 the Council of CHALCEDON declared Juvenal (421–458) patriarch and head of the three provinces of Palestine at the expense of Antioch.

Jerusalem further owed its growing importance to pilgrimages, which became progressively popular in the 4th century. CONSTANTINE I and HELENA erected several magnificent buildings in Jerusalem and Bethlehem. The liturgy of Jerusalem, described by Aetheria, exercised a great influence in the whole church, by reason of the pilgrims who witnessed it (see ITINERARIA).

Monophysitism and Origenism. Palestine had a strong anti-Chalcedonian party, though weaker than in Syria and Egypt. Juvenal, the patriarch, was ejected and replaced by an opponent of the council of Chalcedon and was not restored until the Byzantine army had defeated hordes of fanatical monks in 453. Though the monks generally favored orthodoxy, especially under Euthymius and Sabas, the Monophysite leaders, and particularly the intruder Theodosius, installed anti-Chalcedonians in many sees, and the opposition was kept alive especially from the monastery of Maiuma. In 513 the monk Severus succeeded in having Elias, the patriarch of Jerusalem, exiled, even though he was defended by the great abbots, Theodosius and Sabas. The Patriarch John (d. 524) was hostile to the Monophysites, so that Jerusalem was the only patriarchate not in the hands of the Monophysites when Justin became emperor in 519. Since Jerusalem relied upon the powerful patriarchate of Constantinople for protection against its rivals, Antioch and Alexandria, it was involved on the side of this see in the ACACIAN SCHISM. In the 6th century, it was considered to hold fourth place among the patriarchates of the East, after Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch.

PELAGIANISM was dealt with by a provincial council at Diospolis (or Lydda) in 415, which was misinformed by Pelagius and declared him innocent. A dispute over Origenism led to a heated controversy at the end of the 4th century between Bishop John of Jerusalem and Rufinus on the one side, and Saints Jerome and Epiphanius on the other. The problem became acute in the 6th century when the monks of the New Laura of Thecuc defended Origen's orthodoxy, whereas the outstanding monk of Palestine, Saint Sabas, head of the old or Great Laura, led his opponents. When two Origenist monks, Domitian and THEODORE ASCIDAS, were named bishops by Justinian and enlisted the support of THEODORA in their cause, a strong anti-Origenist movement was begun by the Patriarch Peter of Jerusalem. This led to a Synod at Gaza (539) and an edict of Justinian in 542, condemning nine propositions of Origen. Several Palestinian monks, headed by Theodore Ascidas, in the desire to avenge themselves and to avoid further persecution, persuaded Justinian to devote himself to another problem, that of the THREE CHAPTERS.

In addition to the earliest Judeo-Christian writers of Palestine, several early apologists and propagandists are considered Palestinian by birth or activity: Ariston of Pella, JUSTIN MARTYR, JULIUS AFRICANUS, Pamphilus and Eusebius of Caesarea, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius of Constantia, and CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS. The end of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th centuries constituted a period of prosperity, but the Persian invasion of 614 proved catastrophic: thousands of Christians were slaughtered, many churches and monasteries were destroyed or damaged, and the patriarch Zacharias was exiled. At this time the true cross was captured. Even though the victory of the Emperor HERACLIUS forced the Persians to restore the cross, the dispute over MONOTHELITISM brought new troubles, and the Patriarch Saint SOPHRONIUS (634–38) sharply attacked this heresy. But he was forced to arrange the surrender of Jerusalem to the Arabs under the Caliph Omar in 637; and although Christianity survived under Muslim rule, the distrust of the Arabs for the orthodox patriarchs made it impossible to give him a successor for 68 years.

Bibliography: M. LE QUIEN, Oriens Christianus, 3 v. (Paris 1740; rpre. Graz 1958). F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine, 2 v. (Paris 1952). A. VON HARNACK, The Mission and Expansion of

Giovanni Pierluigi Da Palestrina. (Bettmann/CORBIS)

Christianity in the First Three Centuries, tr. and ed. J. MOFFATT, 2 v. (2d ed. New York 1908). H. JEDIN, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, 6 v. (Freiburg 1962–): v. 1., K. BAUS, ed., Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Grosskirche, with “Einleitung zur Kirchengeschichte” by H. JEDIN. J. DANÉLOU and H. I. MARROU, The First Six Hundred Years, tr. V. CRONIN, v. 1 of The Christian Centuries (New York 1964–). J. A. FITZMEYER, “The Bar Cochba Period,” in The Bible in Current Catholic Thought, ed. J. L. MCKENZIE (New York 1962) 133–68. F. VAN DER MEER and C. MOHRMANN, Atlas of the Early Christian World, ed. and tr. M. F. HEDLUND and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1958). L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1925). A. FLICHEM and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v. 1–4. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) v. 1–2.

[J. J. GAVIGAN]

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA

Foremost composer of Renaissance vocal polyphony of the Roman school; b. Palestrina, Italy (whence the name by which he has been known ever since), probably at the end of 1525; d. Rome, Feb. 2, 1594. He may have been a chorister of the Palestrina cathedral, for after its bishop, Cardinal della Valle, had been made archpriest of the basilica of St. Mary Major, Rome (1534), the young boy was transferred to that choir and was singing as a full member in 1537. He returned home when his voice changed in 1539 but began his higher musical education in Rome in 1540. At that time the new St. Peter's was being built, and the city was full of great Renaissance artists, architects, and sculptors—a stimulating environment for the rising musician. In 1544, his training finished, he was appointed organista e maestro di canto of the cathedral of Palestrina, a post that lasted seven years, during which time he married a fairly wealthy girl. When the reigning bishop of Palestrina, Cardinal del Monte, became Pope Julius III (1551), the young composer returned to Rome, this time as master of the Julian choir.

The Early Phase of His Work. His first volume of Masses, dedicated to Julius and containing the famous engraving of the Pope receiving the music from Palestrina's hands, was published in 1554. Four of these Masses are earlier compositions, but the fifth Ecce Sacerdos Magnus, was a new work in the Pope's honor. Julius' ill-advised reward was to appoint him to the pontifical choir, an exclusive and proud body of singers, who were not pleased to have the newcomer forced upon them. This appointment, moreover, meant that Palestrina had to give up his Julian choirmastership. Even more unluckily, Julius III died within three months, and his successor, Marcellus, within 23 days of election. The next pope, Paul IV, a reformer, soon found two reasons to dismiss Palestrina from his new position: he was married, and he had recently published a book of madrigals—both were against the rules for Church musicians. The young man, however, had the perspicacity to obtain a papal pension that was to last for the rest of his life, even though he had been a member of the choir for only a few months.

The music at the Lateran Basilica had deteriorated since the departure of LASSO for Antwerp in 1555, and in October of the same year Palestrina easily obtained this post (his impressive Lamentations setting was composed there; see TENEBRAE). Although the pay was small, he had his pension and also a wine-selling business. Indeed, so sure was he of his financial position that he could afford to leave the Lateran over a monetary squabble concerning his eldest son; he did not accept another position until March 1561, when he became choirmaster at St. Mary Major, the basilica of his childhood. A few years later, restlessness overtook him, and an opportunity to direct music in the fabulous Villa d'Este during the summer of 1564 turned his thoughts to court employment. Also, the new Roman seminary had offered him the directorship of music with free living, education for his family, and leisure to pursue his courtly career; not surprisingly, that he relinquished the position at St. Mary Major. These years, however, remained indecisive, and after an offer from Emperor Maximilian of Vienna had been lost through Palestrina's own cupidity, he turned his attention to ecclesiastical work. His one friend during all these courtly contacts was the Duke of Mantua, to whom he sent many compositions during 20 years. In 1571 he again accepted the mastership of the Julian choir, and from this time on he was exclusively a church musician. His good fortune, however, was darkened by a series of personal sorrows. The ever-present Roman plagues and pestilences killed his son Rodolfo in 1572, his brother Silla a year later, his second son Angelo in 1575, and finally his wife, whom he had deeply loved, in 1580.

During this long, checkered period, Palestrina published several collections: the first book of motets in 1563, the second book of Masses (which included the Missa di Papa Marcello), in 1567, and more motets in 1569.

The Later Phase. His style changed notably at this time: the number of vocal parts began to increase. In 1572 he increased the number of vocal parts in the motets from the usual four and five to between five and seven parts. In 1575 he increased the number again to eight vocal parts. The style of composition, too, rapidly matured. The early canonic writing which featured Netherlandish technique gave way to a more serene style where contrapuntal and homophonic writing were integrated into a unique fluency, and the madrigalism of the earlier works almost disappeared. His sorrows had enabled him to produce some of his more poignant works, such as the Impropria and some of the Lamentations as well as many of the larger motets. From 1577 he was engaged partly in an abortive effort to revise the Gradual, whose plainsong had become so full of errors that it was impossible to construct a unified liturgy. This herculean task was abandoned after a few years, and nothing more was done about it for another four decades. The Medicean edition, as it was called when finally published, had little or no connection with Palestrina's work (see CHANT BOOKS, PRINTED EDITIONS OF).

Depressed by his losses of both family and fortune, Palestrina turned to religion and offered himself for the priesthood. He received the tonsure and even a benefice, but within a few months he was quietly married to a rich widow who brought with her a prosperous furrier's business. Palestrina, ever a resourceful businessman, switched comfortably from the wine trade to furs, and life began afresh. Whereas publication of his works had been sporadic between 1563 and 1575, three volumes were produced in the year 1581 and another in 1582. Indeed, these last 13 years saw the publication of 16 different collections, comprising more than 400 compositions. After his death, his son Iginio published many volumes of Masses and motets, but some of the finest works, because of changing musical fashion, remained in manuscript. Glorious Masses like Assumpta Est Maria and Ecce Ego Joannes, and motets, such as Salve Regina and O Sacrum Convivium, had to wait for three centuries before gaining wide currency.

Evaluation. Palestrina's position at the end of his century was rather like that of Bach after his death. Both composers used a conservative technique, a style virtually reflecting a past age, although in a strikingly individual and compelling manner. But the new music was already emerging, and it is small wonder that their music was abandoned as being old-fashioned. There is no doubt that Palestrina deliberately adopted a restrained manner of composing in order to produce a more remote and less modern style than that of his contemporaries. Even the madrigals, both secular and spiritual, are restrained to a point where they may be compared unfavorably with those of lesser contemporaries, although they contain much good music. Some of the early church music is a little unsure and derivative, but the works of his middle period, and certainly his later compositions are ideal for liturgical use. They possess those qualities of serenity and impersonality that are essential for divine worship.

Palestrina's coffin bore the title Princeps Musicae. It could be argued that composers such as MORALES, Lasso, and VICTORIA were perhaps more adventurous, and that Lasso and many others were more effective in the secular field. No one, however, would seriously deny Palestrina the title Princeps Musicae Sacrae.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. F. X. HABERL, 33 v. (Leipzig 1862–1903), see pref. by Haberl; Le Opere complete, ed. R. CASIMIRI et al. (Rome 1939–), there are innumerable performing editions of his most popular items. Biography. G. BAINI, Memorie Storico-critiche della vita e delle opere. . . , 2 v. (Rome 1828), a curiosity. M. BOBILLIER, Palestrina, 2 v. in 1 (Paris 1906). F. RAUGEL, Palestrina (Paris 1930). H. COATES, Palestrina (New York 1938; repr. 1949), best biog. Technical. A. CAMETTI, "Le case di G. P. da Palestrina in Roma," Rivista musicale italiana 28 (1921) 419–432; "Rubino Mallapert, maestro di G. P. da Palestrina," ibid. 29 (1922) 335–347; "G. P. da Palestrina e le sue alleanze matrimoniali," ibid. 30 (1923) 489–510. R. CASIMIRI, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina Nuovi documenti biografici, 2 pts. (Rome 1918–22), pamphlet; Il codice 59 dell'archivio musicale lateranense, autografo di inedite e dieci tavole fototipiche (Rome 1919), pamphlet. H. K. ANDREWS, An Introduction to the Technique of Palestine (London 1958), the only complete study of Palestrina's technique of composition. K. G. FELLNER, Palestrina (Regensburg 1930). K. JEPPESEN, The Style of Palestrina and the Dissonance, tr. M. W. HAMERIK (New York 1927). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). L. BIANCHI and G. ROSTIROLLA, Iconografia palestriniana (Lucca 1994). B. BUJIC, "Palestrina, Willaert, Arcadelt, and the Art of Imitation," Recercare 10 (1998) 105–131. J. ROCHE, "The Praise of it Endureth For Ever: The Posthumous Publication of Palestrina's Music," Early Music 22 (1994)

631–639. N. O'REGAN, "The Performance of Palestrina: Some Further Observations," Early Music 24 (1996) 144–154.

[P. E. PEACOCK]

PALEY, WILLIAM

English divine and philosopher; b. Peterborough, July 1743; d. Lincoln, May 25, 1805. Educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, he served there as a successful lecturer and tutor until 1776, when he became rector of Musgrave in Westmorland. In 1782 he was made archdeacon of Carlisle. The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (London 1785), based on his lectures at Cambridge, went through 15 editions in his lifetime and was used at Cambridge as a standard textbook. His most original work, Horae Paulinae, or the Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul Evinced by a Comparison of the Epistles Which Bear His Name and the Acts of the Apostles and with One Another, appeared in 1790. The most famous of his books are A View of the Evidences of Christianity (2 v. London 1794), and Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity collected from the Appearances of Nature (London 1802), in which he set forth his fully developed argument from design for the existence of God. He changed the ground of the argument from astronomy to anatomy in order to argue to God from the evidences of design in animal and human organisms. One of the most successful apologists of his time, Paley was a guiding light of the "evidential school" of rationalist theologians who were very influential in the Church of England, especially at Oxford, during the early 19th century, and against whose ideas the leaders of the OXFORD MOVEMENT reacted.

Bibliography: Works, ed. E. PALEY, 7 v. (London 1825). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster MD 1946–63) 5:195–199. L. STEPHEN, History of English Thought in the 18th Century, 2 v. (London 1927).

[E. SILLEM]

PALI CANON

The main body of the Buddhist canonical texts developed in the period between Buddha's death (483 B.C.) and Asoka's reign (273–231 B.C.), though its oral tradition was committed to writing in the Pāli language only in the reign of Vattāgamani Abhaya (29–17 B.C.), in Ceylon. The Tipiṭaka (Skt. Tripitaka), The Three Baskets of Theravāda tradition, consists of three main divisions.

The first is the Vinaya Piṭaka, The Basket of Rules for the orders of monks, nuns, and lay people, subdivided into three collections: (1) Suttavibha-aga, under 15 headings grouping the rules for individual discipline and the disciplinary action required in case of infringement; (2) Khandhaka, in 22 chapters outlining the norms for the organization of the orders; (3) Parivāra, containing 19 supplementary sections on the foundation of the order of nuns and the sacred councils, which were convoked at Rājagrha and Vaiśālī.

The second is the Sutta Piṭaka, The Basket of Discourses, attributed to Buddha, divided into five sections (nikāya): (1) Dīgha Nikāya, a series of 34 long lectures on points of doctrine (reward of asceticism, attitude to caste, points of contact and contrast with Brahmanism), including the Mahāparinibbānasuttanta (The Great Chapter of Complete Nirvāna), an account of the last days of Buddha; (2) Majjhima Nikāya, a series of 152 medium-length sermons and dialogues on points of Buddhist religion; (3) Samyutta Nikāya, a series of more than 2,700 short statements on related topics, including the Dhammacakkapavattanavagga, the so-called Sermon of Benares on setting in motion the wheel of the law; (4) A-guttara Nikāya, a progressive series of 11 sections arranged according to the number of topics expounded in each; (5) Khuddaka Nikāya, “minor series” of 15 works including the exquisite and ancient stanzas of the Dhammapada (Way of the Law), the Theragāthā, and Therīgāthā, psalms for choir recitation, and the Jātaka containing 547 stories of former lives of Buddha, along with the Nidānakathā, the oldest connected biography of Buddha in three parts.

The third is the Abhidhamma Piṭaka, The Basket of Supplementary Doctrines, treating in systematic fashion doctrinal questions evidently raised at a later epoch in debates among rival schools and comprising seven works: Puggalapaññatti; Dhātukathāpakarana; Dhammasaṅgani; Vibhaṅga; Paṭṭhānapakaraṇa; Yamaka; and Kathāvatthu.

See Also: BUDDHISM.

Bibliography: B. C. LAW, A History of Pāli Literature, 2 v. (London 1933). M. WINTERNITZ, A History of Indian Literature, tr. S. KATKAR (London 1927–34) v. 2. G. BORSANI, Prospetti e Indice del Tipiṭaka (Milan 1942). A. S. ROSSO, “Buddhism in India, Ceylon and Burma,” Worldmission 3 (1952) 62–82. A. BAREAU, Les Premiers conciles bouddhiques (Paris 1956). W. RAHULA, The History of Buddhism in Ceylon: The Anuradhapura Period, 3d Century, B.C.–10th Century A.D. (Colombo, Ceylon 1956). W. T. DE BARY et al., comps., Sources of Indian Tradition (Records of Civilization 56); New York 1958). G. F. ALLEN, ed. and tr., The Buddha’s Philosophy: Selections from the Pāli Canon and an Introductory Essay (New York 1959). A. B. GOVINDA, The Psychological Attitude of Early Buddhist Philosophy and Its Systematic Representation according to Abhidhamma Tradition (London 1961). C. H. PHILIPS, ed., Historians of India, Pakistan and Ceylon (New York 1961).

[A. S. ROSSO]

PALIMPSEST

A technical term of paleography, used to designate a MS of leather or parchment that was used more than once. Since such materials were scarce and expensive, the writing was often erased from an old codex by washing and/or scraping, so that the surface could be used again. The term refers only to leather or parchment MSS, since papyrus and paper would not permit such rough treatment. If the MS was erased twice, it was called a double palimpsest. The original writing was seldom completely destroyed and can frequently be read, at least in part. As a result, some palimpsests have great value for the scholar. Chemical agents such as ammonium hydro-sulfide once proved useful in making the text readable, but today ultraviolet lamps and especially infrared photography aid in deciphering a text. The most famous palimpsests of the Bible are the Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (C), Codex Nitriensis (R), and Codex Syrus-Sinaiticus.

[T. H. WEBER]

PALLADINO, LAWRENCE BENEDICT

Missionary; b. Tiglieto, Italy, Aug. 15, 1837; d. Missoula, Montana, Aug. 19, 1927. Lawrence was the youngest boy of Giulio and Maddalena (Rizzi) Palladino’s seven children. After attending Genoa’s minor seminary, he became a Jesuit novice at Querciuoli in the Duchy of Modena, Italy, Nov. 18, 1855. The anti-clericalism of Italian nationalists explains his training in Austria and France before he was ordained on May 30, 1863, at Nice, France. Early in 1864 he went to California, where he studied and taught at St. Ignatius College, San Francisco, until 1867. He then began missionary service in the Pacific Northwest. During the next 60 years he worked among settlers and Indians in Washington, Idaho, and Montana. He is usually associated with Montana where he spent 44 years (at St. Ignatius Mission, at Helena, and at Missoula). He purchased property in Helena that was later transferred to John B. Brondel, first Bishop of Helena, when the see was established in 1884. Palladino served at different times as the new bishop’s secretary, counselor, director of education, and vicar-general. He spent many years, also, as pastor of St. Francis Xavier’s Church, Missoula. His civic activities during Montana’s formative years and his role as regional historian gave his works lasting value. Because of the disappearance of many of the materials he used, his Indian and White in the Northwest: A History of Catholicity in Montana (1894) became a primary source for Montana history.

Bibliography: W. N. BISCHOFF, The Jesuits in Old Oregon (Caldwell, Idaho 1945). W. P. SCHOENBERG, Jesuits in Montana, 1840–1960 (Portland, Ore. 1960).

[W. N. BISCHOFF]

PALLADIUS, ST.

Bishop of Ireland; d. probably in Brittany, after 432. According to the Chronicon of PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, Pope CELESTINE I sent Palladius, a Roman deacon “ad Scottos in Christum credentes” to the Christians of Ireland, where he labored to combat PELAGIANISM and reorganize the Church. His history is complicated by the legends that accompany the diverse lives of St. PATRICK. Palladius seems to have settled near a Christian center (the port of Inber De, south of Dublin?) and he had to battle against Pelagianism. The details concerning his departure from Ireland in 432 and the possible lack of success that caused it, as well as his death in Britain, are not certain. Upon learning of the death of Palladius, Patrick, then in Gaul, is supposed to have received permission from Germain of Auxerre to continue the work of Palladius in Ireland. The Chronicon of Prosper of Aquitaine alleges that Palladius was still in Ireland in 433 and 434, but this interpretation is not widely held.

Feast: July 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 2:286–290. L. GOUGAUD, Christianity in Celtic Lands, tr. M. JOYNT (London 1932). J. L. G. MEISSNER, Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy 40 (1931–32) 371. P. GROSJEAN, Analecta Bollandiana 63 (1945) 73–86, 112–119. J. CARNEY, The Problem of St. Patrick (Dublin 1961).

[P. ROCHE]

PALLADIUS OF HELENOPOLIS

Fourth-century monk, bishop, and writer; b. Galatia, 363 or 364; d. probably Aspuna, before 431. At 23, a pupil of EVAGRIUS PONTICUS, he embraced the monastic life on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem. Later he became acquainted with the Egyptian ascetics, spent some time in Alexandria, and retired to the Nitrian Desert about 390. He remained there for nine years, became ill, and at the advice of an Alexandrian physician returned to Palestine (399). The next year he journeyed to Bithynia and was consecrated bishop of Helenopolis by (St.) JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

When sent to Ephesus to investigate charges brought against Bp. Antoninus by Eusebius of Valentinopolis, Palladius appeared with John Chrysostom at the Synod of the OAK near Chalcedon in 403. The Synod banished John, and Palladius went to Rome to lay the case before Pope INNOCENT I (405). The Western Emperor HONORIUS sent him to Constantinople with a decision in favor of John, but the Eastern Emperor Arcadius exiled him to Egypt, where, at Syene (406–408), he wrote his Dialogus de vita Sancti Joannis Chrysostomi, a principal source for the life of John Chrysostom.

Palimpsest folio from “Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (Cod. Gr. 9, fol. 60v).

Palladius spent four years in the Thebaid of Egypt at Antinoë and returned to his diocese only after opposition to John Chrysostom ceased in 412. In Galatia he lived with a priest named Philoramus, and in 417 he was transferred to the Diocese of Aspuna, where he wrote the Lausiaca History (419–420). The Epistola de Indicis gentibus et de Bragmannibus attributed to Palladius suggests a trip to India; but is actually a report he seems to have received from a Theban advocate. The Palladian authorship is suggested by similarities in style and diction with his other works.

The writings of Palladius have a moral purpose. His Dialogus seeks to edify by the example of a saintly bishop and shows how John Chrysostom’s enemies fell victims to greed and pride in planning his downfall. In the Historia Lausiaca he portrays the life of good monks but does not develop a theory of ascetical theology. He used the example of those who had fallen from grace to show how temptations to pride and vainglory must be expelled. The Epistola describes the gymnosophists of India as dedicated to an ascetical ideal. This work was read and copied frequently during the Middle Ages.

The Palladian authorship of these works has been contested. In antiquity, however, there was no doubt that the interlocutors in the Dialogus are Palladius and Bishop John. The exordium is strongly reminiscent of the opening passage in Plato's Republic.

The Lausiaca History of Palladius is a work of the highest importance for the history of early monasticism. In the 19th century his veracity was questioned; but today the work is accepted as reliable in the sections where Palladius had spoken to the people involved or had seen the events he describes. His account falters when he depends upon hearsay.

The Epistola de Indicis was known in Europe during the Middle Ages in a garbled Latin translation as the Commonitorium Palladii supposedly translated by St. Ambrose. Actually, only the first part of the work belongs to Palladius; and thus far no satisfactory proof has been offered against his authorship.

Bibliography: PALLADIUS OF HELENOPOLIS, Dialogus de vita S. Joannis Chrysostomi, ed. P. R. COLEMAN-NORTON (Cambridge, Eng. 1928), Eng. tr. H. MOORE (London 1921); The Lausiaca History, ed. C. BUTLER, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1898–1904); ed. and tr. R. T. MEYER (Ancient Christian Writers; 1965). H. RAHNER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:6. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:912–930. A. KURFESS, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893)18.3 (1949) 203–207. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster MD 1950) 3:176–180. J. D. M. DERRETT, "The History of Palladius on the Races of India and the Brahmans," Classica et Mediaevalia 21 (1960) 64–99. E. SCHWARTZ, "Palladiana," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 36 (1937) 161–204. F. X. MURPHY, Rufinus of Aquileia (Washington 1945) 175–179. R. DRAQUET, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 41 (1946) 321–364; 42 (1947) 5–49.

[R. T. MEYER]

PALLAVICINO, PIETRO SFORZA

Cardinal, historian, and theologian; b. Rome, Nov. 28, 1607; d. Rome, June 5, 1667. Although he was a descendant of the Parma line of the noble Pallavicini family, he renounced his rights as first-born to become a cleric. He studied letters, philosophy, and theology at the Roman College, and law at the Sapienza. He became a doctor of theology (1628), and on June 21, 1637, he entered the Society of Jesus, becoming a professor of philosophy and then of theology at the Roman College. In the spring of 1652 he took up his greatest work, the history of the Council of Trent. His friend Alexander VII proclaimed him a cardinal on Nov. 10, 1659. In his earlier years he was strongly inclined toward purely literary pursuits, publishing works on literary style and a tragedy, Ermenegildo martire. In his later theological writings, Del bene (4 v. Rome 1644), Assertiones theologicae (Rome 1649–52), and Disputationes in primam secundae D.

Thomas (Rome 1653), he was a faithful disciple of Cardinal Juan de Lugo and not an original thinker. Pallavicino proved his loyalty to his order by his Vindicationes Societatis Jesus (Rome 1649) and his last published work Arte della perfezione cristiana (Rome 1665). His greatest fame rests on his historical works. His Vita di Alessandro VII, which remained in manuscript till 1839, is a careful work of high value. Since the appearance of the antipapal Historia del Concilio Tridentino by Paolo SARPI in 1619 there had been need for a refutation based on a thorough study of available documents. Terenzio Alciati, SJ, who had been gathering materials for such a work for 25 years, died in 1651. Pallavicino was given the task and the work appeared during 1656 and 1657 and in further improved editions. For centuries it was a reliable source, though heavy with polemical tone.

Bibliography: I. AFFÒ, Memorie della vita e degli studi del Cardinale Sforza Pallavicino (Faenza 1792). Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 6: 120–143. J. DUHR, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.2:1831–34. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon 1362–63. H. JEDIN, Der Quellenapparat der Konzilsgeschichte Pallavicinos (Rome 1940). H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF, v. 1–2 (St. Louis 1957–60). I. MACCHIA, Relazioni fra il padre gesuita Sforza Pallavicino e Fabio Chigi (Turin 1907).

[A. C. WAND]

PALLEN, CONDÉ BENOIST

Editor; b. St. Louis, Mo., Dec. 5, 1858; d. New York City, May 26, 1929. His parents were Montrose A., a physician and teacher of medicine, and Anne (Benoist) Pallen, daughter of a St. Louis banker and a descendant of the Chevalier Benoist who served with Montcalm in the French and Indian War. After graduating from Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., Pallen received a doctorate (1885) from St. Louis University and taught there briefly before continuing his studies in Rome. After his return to St. Louis he was editor of Church Progress (1887–97) and served as Catholic revisory editor for two general encyclopedias. He joined a small group of scholars to project the first comprehensive Catholic encyclopedia in the English language, serving as an organizer of the board of editors (1904–05) and as managing editor (1905–13); The Catholic Encyclopedia (16 v., 1907–14; supplement, 1922) became the authoritative international work of reference on the constitution, discipline, and history of the Catholic Church. As president of Encyclopedia Press, Inc. (1913–20), he was later associated with other publishing ventures, including the New Catholic Dictionary (1929).

Pallen was an advocate of conservative economic and social views and served as chairman of the department of subversive movements of the National Civic

Pope John Paul II being vested with Pallium. (Bettmann/CORBIS)

Federation. Leo XIII honored him with the medal pro ecclesia et pontifice and Pius XI named him a Knight of St. Gregory. His published works include numerous articles and The Philosophy of Literature (1897), New Rubaiyat (1898), Epochs of Literature (1898), The Feast of Thalar-chus (1901), Death of Sir Launcelot and Other Poems (1902), The Meaning of the Idylls of the King (1904), Collected Poems (1915), Education of Boys (1916), The Story of Literature (1917), Crucible Island (1919), As Man to Man: The Adventures of a Commuter (1927), Ghost House (1928), and The King's Coil (1928).

[F. X. GERRITY]

PALLIUM

The pallium is a circular band about two inches wide, made of white wool, and worn over the chasuble about the neck, breast, and shoulders. It has two pendants, one hanging down in front, the other in back. It is set with six black crosses of silk, one each on the breast and back, one on each shoulder, and one on each of the pendants.

In the Eastern Churches the pallium is a longer and wider cloth, marked by four red crosses and given by the Oriental patriarchs to their metropolitans and other distinguished bishops.

The pallium is made (at least partially) from the wool of two lambs that are blessed each year at the Basilica of St. John Lateran on Jan. 21, the feast of St. Agnes. The new pallia are blessed by the pope in the crypt of St. Peter at vespers on June 28, the vigil of the feast of SS. Peter and Paul. The blessed pallia are kept overnight at the crypt and conferred on the newly appointed metropolitans on the feast.

Origin and Symbolism. The pallium began to be worn in the 4th century by bishops of the Eastern Churches and by the Bishop of Rome to emphasize the episcopal dignity and pastoral office. One cannot say definitely whence it derived. In the 6th century, the pallium was conferred by the pope on bishops of the Latin Church, especially metropolitans, until it gradually became the symbol of the metropolitan office. In the 9th century, John VIII commanded all metropolitans to petition the pope for the pallium within three months of their appointment or confirmation. Since then the pallium has been the symbol of the jurisdiction conferred upon metropolitans by the Roman pontiff and it signifies a certain participation in the pope's supreme pastoral office. It also represents their close union with the See of Rome. When worn by the pope, the pallium signifies the fullness of pontifical power.

Petition and Use in the Latin Church. In the Latin Church, a metropolitan is obliged, either in person or by proxy, to ask the Roman pontiff (instanter, instantius, instantissime) for the pallium within three months of his consecration or, if already consecrated, of his canonical promotion in the consistory [Codex iuris canonici c.437, §1]. By a decree dated May 11, 1978, Pope Paul VI ordered that the pallium was to be conferred only on metropolitans and on the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem (see AAS 70 [1978] 442).

The pope may use the pallium at any time. A metropolitan in the Latin Church may use the pallium in every church of his province according to the norm of liturgical laws, but not outside his province even with the consent of the local ordinary [Codex iuris canonici c.437, §2]. The reason for this restriction arises from the fact that since the pallium is a symbol of metropolitan authority, it does not make sense for a metropolitan to wear the pallium in places where he is unable to exercise that authority. There are two exceptions to this general rule: the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem and the Patriarch of Lisbon are endowed with the privilege of wearing their pallia even outside their provinces (see Communicationes 14 [1982] 190). If a metropolitan is transferred to another metropolitan see, he must obtain another pallium [Codex iuris canonici c.437, §3].

Bibliography: L. TROMBETTA, De pallio archiepiscopali: Elucubratio canonico-liturgico-historica (Sorrento 1923). R. LE-SAGE, Vestments and Church Furniture, tr. F. MURPHY (New York 1960) 139–142. F. J. WEBER, “The Sacred Pallium and Its History,” Liturgical Arts 30 (1962) 91, 106. J. C. NOONAN, JR., The Church Visible: The Ceremonial Life and Protocol of the Roman Catholic Church (New York 1996) 359–363.

[J. A. ABBO/EDS.]

PALLOTA, MARIA ASSUNTA, BL.

Missionary; b. Force, in the Marches of Ancona, Italy, Aug. 20, 1878; d. Tong-Eul-Koo, China, April 7, 1905. From her early years Pallota worked to help support her poor family. She acquired only enough formal schooling to read and write. In 1898 in Rome, she joined the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary (see FRANCISCAN SISTERS). During the next few years she dwelt in the congregation’s convents in Rome, Grottaferrata, and Florence, working about the house and in the garden and infirmary, and teaching catechism. She sailed for China (1904), and there in the orphanage at Tong-Eul-Koo, she continued her humble tasks. While caring for the plague-stricken during a typhus epidemic she fell victim to the disease. Humility, kindness; obedience, and prayerfulness distinguished her life. Her remains, which were incorrupt when exhumed in 1913, are in China. She was beatified Nov. 7, 1954.

Feast: April 7.

Bibliography: E. FEDERICI, Bienheureuse Maria Assunta (Rome 1954). Acta Sanctae Sedis 47 (1955) 28–33. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes, ed. THE BENEDICTINES OF PARIS (Paris 1935–56) 13:205–208.

[M. F. S. CONDON]

PALLOTTI, VINCENT, ST.

Religious founder; b. Rome, April 21, 1795; d. there, Jan. 22, 1850. He was the son of a prosperous grocer. From his early years he developed a special devotion to the Blessed Virgin and an intense compassion for the poor. After studying in Rome at the Roman College and at the Sapienza, he was ordained (1818). He taught theology at the Sapienza for ten years before he devoted himself completely to spiritual guidance and preaching. In 1827 he became spiritual director at the Roman College and often acted as confessor at various national colleges for future priests. He was intimately acquainted with St. Gaspare del BUFALO and Nicholas WISEMAN. As rector of the church of Santo Spirito dei Neapolitani, he suffered for more than a decade from slanders by the other priests there, who were jealous of his promotion and resentful of his zeal. Vincent interested himself also in projects to revive artisan guilds and to establish schools for young workers and farm boys. During the cholera epidemic of 1837 he organized relief for the plague-stricken. His spiritual and charitable ministrations so impressed the Romans that they referred to him as a second St. Philip NERI. In 1835 he founded the PALLOTTINES, and later, the Sisters of the Catholic Apostolate, from whom developed the PALLOTTINE MISSIONARY SISTERS. Vincent shared Rome’s hopes for the conversion of England arising out of the OXFORD Movement and sent priests to assist Frederick William FABER. His inspiration was instrumental in the founding of the MILL HILL MISSIONARIES and of several mission colleges. His fame for sanctity was increased by his reputation as a thaumaturge and prophet. Pius XI called him a forerunner of CATHOLIC ACTION. His body lies incorrupt in the church of San Salvatore in Onda, Rome. Vincent Pallotti was beatified on Jan. 22, 1950, by Pope Pius XII, and he was canonized on Jan. 20, 1963, by Pope John XXIII.

Feast: Jan. 22

Bibliography: E. WEBER, Vincent Pallotti: Apostle and Mystic, tr. from the Ger. (New York 1964). J. FRANK, Vincenz Pallotti,

2 v. (Friedberg 1952–63). F. BONIFAZI, Soul of a Saint (Staten Island NY 1963); Yearning of a Soul (Boston 1979).

[H. E. SCHAACK]

PALLOTTINE MISSIONARY SISTERS

(SAC, Official Catholic Directory# 3150); a congregation founded in Rome, Italy, in 1843, by St. Vincent PALLOTTI, to care for children, especially orphans. When, in 1890, the Pallottine Fathers began a mission in the German colony in the Cameroons, Africa, the help of sisters also was required. Since the Italian sisters were not interested in mission work, it was decided to invite candidates from Germany to enter the novitiate in Rome. Those who answered this call were trained there and sent to Africa. When it became evident that the Pallottine Missionary Sisters should have their own motherhouse in Germany, a plan that was realized in 1895, a new branch of the Pallottine family came into existence. From Limburg, Germany, these sisters spread to England, Switzerland, Central America, Poland, South Africa, and in 1912 to the U.S. In the U.S., the sisters engage in education, catechetics, healthcare, daycare, retreats, counseling, parish ministries, pastoral and social outreach. When papal approval was granted to the congregation in 1964, its official title was established as Missionary Sisters of the Catholic Apostolate. The generalate is in Rome. The U.S. provincialate is in Florissant, Mo.

[M. B. KURTH/EDS.]

PALLOTTINE SISTERS OF THE CATHOLIC APOSTOLATE

(CSAC, Official Catholic Directory # 3140); a pontifical institute founded in 1843 by St. Vincent PALLOTTI in Rome, Italy, to care for children orphaned by the cholera plague. Benedetta Gabrielli was the first sister to receive the habit at the Pia Casa di Carità, Rome. The first general chapter, held in 1886, elected Mother Raphael Castellani as superior general. Mother Raphael sent five sisters to the U.S. in 1889 to work among the Italian immigrants. In 1911 the congregation was approved by the Holy See, and in 1933 missions were begun in South America, in Brazil and Argentina. The charism of the order prompts them to engage in any work that corresponds to the needs of the places where they serve; the sisters are engaged in teaching, healthcare, pastoral ministries and social outreach. The generalate is in Rome. The U.S. provincialate is in Harriman, N.Y.

[M. E. ZIEGLER/EDS.]

PALLOTTINES

The Society of the Catholic Apostolate (SAC, Official Catholic Directory #0990), popularly known as Pallottine Fathers, was founded by St. Vincent PALLOTTI in 1835 at Rome, Italy. Under his direction, a group of clerics and lay people formed the Pious Union of the Catholic Apostolate, which received formal approbation in 1835. Its objective was to revive faith and charity in all Catholics and to diffuse these virtues throughout the entire world by prayers, labors, or other contributions.

As the membership increased and activities expanded, Pallotti saw the need for a group of priests who would devote their energies entirely to the work. Those who with him assumed this task, soon evolved into a society entitled Congregation of the Catholic Apostolate; it was to function as a connecting bond between the secular and religious priests, both of whom Pallotti desired to see labor side by side in all apostolic activities. Thus the society assumed a secular and a religious character: the secular was expressed by the absence of vows; the religious, by the observance of common life and promises. At first Pallotti did not favor constitutions or rules other than the Gospels, but he was constrained by experience to introduce them.

Despite papal approval, Pallotti's work was seriously threatened. The Lyons Society for the Propagation of the Faith claimed that Pallotti's work was merely duplicating its own program on behalf of foreign missions and had his society suppressed in 1838. When Pallotti clarified the situation for Gregory XVI, the decree of suppression was revoked. The words Catholic Apostolate raised objection from some who believed that the apostolate was reserved to the hierarchy. Four years after Pallotti's death the controversy was settled by a decree (1854) that changed the name to Pious Society of Missions. The original title was restored in 1947, when the concept of the universal apostolate was better understood.

Because of the Roman Revolution, Pallotti's death in 1850, and the change in title that obscured its nature, the society's development was slow until 1880. However, by the turn of the century there were 30 houses in eight countries. In 1890 the Pallottines accepted a request to evangelize the African Cameroons, where by 1914 they had baptized 25,000 converts and were instructing 40,000 catechumens. By 1909 the society had over 500 members and was divided into four provinces. After World War I, it continued to flourish, and created in Germany the Schoenstatt movement, a Marian apostolic movement that implements Pallotti's program.

The first Pallottines arrived in the U.S. to minister to New York's Italians; this was the beginning of the Immaculate Conception Province of the eastern states. The foundations for a midwestern province, the Mother of God Province, were laid when, in 1921, a house was established in Milwaukee, Wis. Two other provinces, the Irish and the Italian, have established their foundations in the U.S. In the U.S., the Pallottines are engaged in parish administration, chaplaincies, retreats, missions, hospitals, immigrant care, schools, and social outreach. The generalate is in Rome.

Bibliography: J. GAYNOR, Life of St. Vincent Pallotti (Rome 1963). E. WEBER, Vincent Pallotti: Apostle and Mystic (New York 1964).

[H. E. SCHAAK/EDS.]

PALLU, FRANÇOIS

Vicar apostolic in southwest China and a founder of the Paris Foreign Mission Society; b. Tours, France, Aug. 30, 1626; d. Moyang, China, Oct. 29, 1684. His father was a lawyer and mayor. During his youth, Pallu was made a canon of St. Martin's. In Paris, he met Father De Rhodes, SJ, who was coming from Tongking to obtain from Rome the appointment of native bishops in the Far East. Pallu and his friends agreed to support De Rhodes and went to Rome, aided by the Assembly of the Clergy and the Company of the Blessed Sacrament. In 1658 Pallu was appointed titular bishop of Heliopolis, and vicar apostolic of Tongking, Laos, and southwest China. He wanted helpers and money, and this led him to start a society of priests without vows who would go to the missions. With the help of Pierre LAMBERT DE LA MOTTE, his first fellow-worker, he wrote instructions for the benefit of missionaries. Throughout his life he traveled from the East to Rome to further mission work and to obtain the approval and help of the Holy See. He had to struggle against the governments of Spain and Portugal, and a number of religious who were opposed to the setting up of native churches. He is recognized as the main founder of the PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY. Pallu was a man of great gifts, kindly, and with sound judgment and strong willpower. He gave himself zealously to spread the Church in the Far East.

Bibliography: F. PALLU, Lettres, ed. A. LAUNAY, 2 v. (Angoulême 1905). A. LAUNAY, Histoire générale de la Société des Missions Étrangères, 3 v. (Paris 1894). L. BAUDIMENT, François Pallu (Paris 1934). J. GUENNOU, Les Missions Étrangères (Paris 1963). J. GLAZIK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 8:11.

[H. PROUVOST]

PALM SUNDAY

The solemnity of "Palm Sunday" marks the beginning of Holy Week in the Roman liturgical calendar. The feast appears as early as the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries. The procession of the Palms gives this Sunday its distinctive character.

The annual procession of the palms originated in Jerusalem as a commemoration of the entry of Christ into the Holy City to consummate the great work of the Redemption. According to Egeria's 4th century account of the Holy Week celebrations in Jerusalem, the people of Jerusalem were led to reenact this event at the spot where it had actually happened. The faithful of Jerusalem gathered around their bishop on the Mount of Olives. There they sang hymns and listened to readings from the Old Testament and to the Gospel account of our Savior's entry. Then at five o'clock they set out carrying olive or palm branches in their hands, accompanying the bishop, who was seated on a mule, to the Church of the Resurrection. During this procession they sang psalms and hymns with the constant refrain: "Blessed is He who comes in the Name of the Lord." Upon arriving at the church they sang Vespers.

From Jerusalem this custom made its way to the churches of the Gallican rite in the West. In turn, the entire rite came to Rome from the Gallican lands through the Romano-Germanic Pontifical of the 10th century.

By the Middle Ages the rite of the palms had acquired a distinctly dramatic form. The procession would go from one church to another, usually one outside the city walls. The presence of Christ was symbolized in various ways: in some parts of France by the gospel book, in northern Italy by a large cross decorated with green foliage, in Germany by an image of Christ borne on the back of a wooden donkey, in England and Normandy by the Blessed Sacrament itself. Upon returning to the gate of the city or to the door of the principal church, the faithful would cast their garments and their palm or olive branches before the symbol of Christ and repeat the same acclamations the Jews had used to greet the coming of the Messiah King. There too the hymn Gloria Laus, et honor (All glory, laud and honor) was sung, a choir within the gates alternating with those outside. Then one of the clerics knocked at the door and all entered singing the antiphon Ingrediente Domino in Sanctam Civitatem.

In the beginning there was no blessing provided for the palms. The earliest blessing is found in the Liber Ordinum of the Mozarabic Rite (6th century). By the end of the Middle Ages this had become a very elaborate ceremonial. Such emphasis was laid upon the blessing and upon the palm itself as a sacramental that the real purpose of the whole ceremony was obscured. In time the procession became secondary, and often was not observed at all. That is why Pius XII's Holy Week Ordinal (promulgated in 1955) simplified the blessing and restored the procession of the palms. Thus the triumphal procession in honor of Christ the King once more occupies the central place that belongs to it. Like all the Holy Week rites, it is not a mere commemoration, but a mysterium in which not only the historical event is recalled to mind but Christ's own victory is reenacted in the Church. We celebrate this event only by living it. Hence all are invited to take part in it by carrying palms and singing the acclamations to the King. Because of the festive nature of the procession the priest and the sacred ministers wear red—the royal color, the color of victory—instead of the penitential purple; and the cross, the standard of victory, is carried unveiled.

Palm Sunday Procession. (©Jeremy Horner/CORBIS)

Bibliography: W. J. O'SHEA, The Meaning of Holy Week (Collegeville, Minn. 1958). T. J. TALLEY, Origins of the Liturgical Year, 2nd emended edition (Collegeville 1991). T. J. TALLEY, "The Entry into Jerusalem in Liturgical Tradition," in With Ever Joyful Hearts: Essays on Liturgy and Music: Honoring Marion J. Hatchett, ed. J. N. ALEXANDER (New York 1999) 211–226. J. M. PIERCE, "Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages," in Passover and Easter: Or- igin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFFMAN (Notre Dame, Ind 1999) 161–185.

[W. J. O'SHEA/EDS.]

PALMENTIERI, LUDOVICO DA CASORIA, BL.

Baptized Arcángelo; Franciscan priest; founder of the Brothers of Charity (Grey Franciscan Friars of Charity or Frati Bigi) and Sisters of St. Elizabeth (Suore Bigie); b. Mar. 11, 1814, Casoria (near Naples), Campania, Italy; d. Mar. 30, 1885, Pausilippo near Naples, Italy.

Arcángelo was a cabinetmaker in his youth. Attracted by the Franciscans at the nearby friary in Naples, Arcángelo entered the order at Avellino (June 17, 1832) and took the name Ludovico (Louis). Shortly after the completion of the year's novitiate, he was appointed to study and teach philosophy, chemistry, and mathematics in San Pietro Convent, Naples. His affinity for science led him later to found a meteorological observatory, an academy of religion and science, and five magazines. Other literary accomplishments included an Italian translation of the works of Saint BONAVENTURE and a pocket edition of the Bible.

Following the advice of his superiors, he instituted a branch of the Third Order at San Pietro from which he formed (1859) a religious institute, commonly known as the Frati Bigi because of their grayish-colored habits. In 1862, Ludovico instituted a congregation of religious women, known as the Suore Bigie, whom he placed under the protection of Saint ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. These congregations made his many charitable works possible.

Ludovico was ordained to the priesthood on June 4, 1837. In 1847, during a mystical experience in prayer, he discerned a vocation to serve the poor actively. He opened a pharmacy in the friary and, later, infirmaries for the elderly and sick friars of the province. Additionally, he founded care centers for children; institutes for the blind, and deaf and dumb; hospices for travelers; agricultural colonies; and savings and loan societies for the poor. About 1852, he opened the first of two schools for the children of emancipated African slaves with the intention that they would return home to evangelize Africa. He later entrusted the continuance of this work to Anna Maria Fiorelli Lapini and her Stigmatine Sisters.

Ten years before his death, he was attacked with a serious and painful illness, from which he never completely recovered. He died in the Marine Hospital he had established for elderly sailors. The numerous charitable institutions in Naples, Rome, Assisi, and Florence that owe their origin to Ludovico of Casoria, as well as his fame for sanctity even during his lifetime, account for the veneration in which he was held by all classes. His mortal remains were entrusted to his spiritual daughters, the Suore Bigie, in 1887. The cause for Ludovico's beatification was introduced in Rome in 1907. He was declared venerable on Feb. 13, 1964, and beatified by John Paul II on April 18, 1993.

Feast: March 30.

Bibliography: Epistolario, ed. G. D'ANDREA (Naples 1989). A. CAPECELATRO, La vita del p. Lodovico da Casoria (Naples 1887).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PALMER, WILLIAM

Theologian and archaeologist; b. Mixbury, Oxfordshire, England, 1811; d. Rome, 1879. Palmer was educated at Rugby School and Oxford University, and was ordained deacon in the Church of England in 1832. From 1834 to 1843 he was tutor at Durham University and then classical examiner and tutor at Oxford, where he had been elected a fellow of his college, Magdalen. He was a high churchman, and in 1840 and again in 1842 went to Russia to learn about the Orthodox Church there and investigate the possibility of intercommunion between it and the Anglicans. This led to his best-known written work, Notes on a Visit to the Russian Church, edited by Cardinal Newman and published in 1882. Palmer was disturbed by certain aspects of the Church of England and for a time seriously considered joining the Orthodox, but in 1855 he was received into the Catholic Church and spent the rest of his life in Rome studying archaeology. Among his other published writings on ecclesiastical and archaeological topics were a Harmony of Anglican Doctrine with the Doctrine of the Eastern Church (1846) and an Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism (1859). In his later years he wrote, in Latin, a commentary on the book of Daniel (1874) and translated from the Russian The Patriarch Nikon and the Tsar, 6 v. (1871–76). His learning was highly respected by Newman, Perrone, and Dölinger.

He must be distinguished from his contemporary, another William Palmer (1803–85), an Anglican theologian of repute who in 1846 published a reply to Newman's Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine.

[D. ATTWATER]

PALMIERI, AURELIO

Italian Orientalist; b. Savona, May 4, 1870; d. Rome, Oct. 18, 1926. After joining the AUGUSTINIANS (1885) he transferred to the ASSUMPTIONISTS (1890) and then returned to the Augustinians (1902). He resided at the Italian Augustinian Holy Rosary parish in Lawrence, Massachusetts, from 1913 to 1916. During the First World War his knowledge of European languages led to work supported by the American government. Because of his private conduct and erroneous ideas, he fell into difficulties with ecclesiastical authorities and was laicized. During 20 years devoted to Oriental, especially Byzantine, studies, he published 15 scholarly books, notably Die Polemik des Islam (Salzburg 1902), La Chiesa Russa (Florence 1908), Dositeo patriarcha greco di Gerusalemme, 1647–1707 (Florence 1909), and Theologia dogmatica orthodoxa (2 v. Florence 1911–13). Besides editing Bessarione, the Italian journal devoted to Byzantine studies, he wrote 130 articles for it between 1896 and 1923. Between 1917 and 1923 he also wrote six articles on the relationship between Italian immigrants and religion in the United States. In some of these articles he elaborated on the question of the "Italian problem" in the Catholic Church in America. Together with his writings for other Italian and foreign periodicals and for the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, the total of his articles exceeded 300. During his last years he headed the Institute for Eastern Europe.

Bibliography: Studi Bizantini 1 (1925): 261–269, lists all Palmieri's writings. E. LO GATTO, "Bibliografia essenziale degli scritti di A. P.," L'Europe orientale 6 (1926): 519–532. D. A. PERINI, Bibliographia Augustiniana, v. 3 (Florence 1935) 45–48. E. C. STABILI, "Palmeiro, Aurelio (1870 1925)," in The Italian American Experience: An Encyclopedia, ed. S. J. LA GUMINA, et al. (New York 2000).

[G. A. MALONEY]

PALMIERI, DOMENICO

Jesuit philosopher, theologian; b. Piacenza, Italy, July 4, 1829; d. Rome, May 29, 1909. He was ordained and entered the Society of Jesus in 1852. After teaching philosophy, theology, and Scripture at the seminary of Fermo and the college at Spoleto, he became professor of philosophy (1861–67) and of dogma (1867–78) at the Gregorian University. He espoused a kind of dynamism, claiming that HYLIFORMISM was incompatible with the findings of natural science. His position in Rome became precarious during the Thomistic revival under Leo XIII. After transfer to Maastricht in Holland in 1878, he taught exegesis there until 1894. In that year he returned to Rome as theologian to the Sacred Penitentiary and consultant to the Holy Office and was later on the Commission for the Code of Canon Law. He was among the first to attack the Modernist error of LOISY. The publication of his works extends from 1874 to 1910. Noteworthy are his Institutiones Philosophiae, his reedition of Gury's and Ballerini's moral works, and his commentary on Dante's Divina Comedia.

[J. FLYNN]

PALMS, LITURGICAL USE OF

A liturgical palm is a branch of the palm tree, in Greek φοίνιξ, in Latin, dactylifera, or date-bearing palm. The palm tree was considered in Biblical times as a princely tree and was used as a symbol of victory and well-being and also as temple decoration. Because of the tree's height and graceful trunk, with its crown of serrated branches and shade-providing leaves, it served as a shelter and provided food in desert borderlands and was highly prized among Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, and Jews. The palm tree was considered holy in Babylon and later was sacred to the Greek god Apollo at Delos. Several cities were referred to specifically as the Palm City: Tamar (Ez 47.19), Jericho (Dt 34.3), and En-Gedi (Pliny, Hist. nat. 5.17). The palm tree supplied figures and similes for poets (Ps 92.13) and was used as a name for girls (Gn 38.6; 2 Sm 13.1). It provided decor for the ornamentation of temples among the Phoenicians, Assyrians, and Egyptians (1 Kgs 6.29; Ez 40.16, 22).

Among both the Romans and the Jews it was carried in joyful or triumphant processions. In 293 B.C. victorious Roman soldiers bore palm branches when parading in Rome; and the palm was given as a victory emblem at public games. Of earlier date was its usage among the Israelites; people carried palm branches during the Feast of Tabernacles (Lv 23.40; Neh 8.15); and it was part of the bouquet, or lulab, offered on festive occasions as a sign of homage or to celebrate a victory (1 Mc 13.37; Jn 12.13).

Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, when the people strew palm branches in his path and greeted him with Hosannas (Jn 12.12–13), became a liturgical function on PALM SUNDAY in the 4th century. But already in the New Testament the palm was connected with martyrdom (Rv 7.9) and was used to decorate grave markers and tombs in the catacombs as a sign of the triumphal death of the martyr (Paul of Nola, Epist., 32.10). On mosaics and on sarcophagi it usually stands for paradise, and Christ is frequently portrayed amid palms in heaven. So also in ancient church decorations the Lamb of God and the Apostles are depicted amid palms. In the Middle Ages palms served as a symbol of Sunday; and in the Renaissance, under humanist influence, they came to stand for virtues or an augury for a good marriage and length of years.

The palm blessed at Mass on Palm Sunday is carried home by the faithful as a sacramental and symbol of Christ's presence among them. It is usually placed over the bed, entwined on a crucifix, or displayed near some holy picture or statue. Often it is decorated with ribbons or worked into an artistic pattern, such as a cross. In Western countries this has been the custom since at least the 11th century, and both palm and olive tree branches are so employed. Before Ash Wednesday the blessed palm is burned, and its residue is used in the distribution of ashes as a symbol of penance during Lent.

Bibliography: H. I. MARROU, Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire, 58 (1941–46) 109–113. J. E. HARRISON, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion (3d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 78–82.

[F. X. MURPHY/EDS.]

PALMYRA

Ancient and modern caravan center of the Syrian Desert between Damascus (150 miles SW) or Homs (100 miles W) and Deir ez-Zor (130 miles E). "Palmyra" is apparently (Greek via Latin) from the Semitic "date palm" (Hebrew tāmār; Aramaic tamrā'; Arabic tamrun); the modern name Tadmor may be a variant (or another Semitic root with common prefix t-); but it is scarcely SOLOMON's Tadmor that is mentioned in 2 Chr 8.4, where the reading should be Tamar (Thamar), a town in southern Juda (Ez 47.9; 48.28), as in 1 Kgs 9.18 [see J. Starcky, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. Pirot, 5:1068]. The only mention of a pre-Hellenistic Tadmor may be in Mari documents (c.1750 B.C.) or in inscriptions of Tiglath-Pileser I (1116–1078 B.C.); see P. Dhorme, Revue biblique 53 (1924) 106.

The far-flung surviving ruins, cleared by T. Wiegand's German expedition, come from a period beginning c. 200 B.C.. In 44 a.d. the settlement was already "monumental" as known from the visit of Tiberius' nephew Germanicus and from a Bel temple inscription of 32 (Stoneman, p. 52), but still with a mostly unstable nomadic population (Browning, p. 28). But colonnaded Palmyra's magnificence is chiefly due to Hadrian's visit (A.D. 129)—especially the major temple of Bel (BAAL), distinct from a smaller temple of Belšamin (Baal-šamayim); see A. Collart, Annales archéologiques de Syrie 7 (1957) 67–94. Several hundred of the original 750 sandstone columns are still erect, stretching 1,240 yards from a monumental gateway (now partly reconstructed) past a theater (built c. A.D. 140) in the heart of the city—unlike most Roman-Syrian parallels; see E. Frezouls, Syria 36 (1959) 202.

Palmyra's most characteristic contribution to world culture is its funerary sculpture, showing the whole family of the deceased reunited around a festive banquet table, framed by rows of busts of near relatives that seal their respective burials [see Parlasca; E. Ruprechtsberger, Ausstellung Linz 1987; H. Ingholt, Studier (Copenhagen 1928)]. These sculptured burials were arranged either in several stories of a tower, of which a good number survive, notably those of Elahbel (A.D. 103) and Jamblichus (A.D. 80)—see E. Will, Syria 26 (1949) 87–116, 258–312; cf. 34 (1957) 262–277—or in underground chambers, most of which have been transferred to museums, especially Yarhai's (A.D. 108), reconstructed in Damascus [see R. Amy and H. Seyrig, Syria 17 (1936) 229; Annales archéologiques de Syrie 1 (1951) 32–40]. Some of the tombs contain inscriptions in the Palmyrene language (see bibliography), closely related to Nabataean and the Aramaic of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, 1).

Rome built up Palmyra's strength to a maximum under the local ruler Odeinat; but after his death (A.D. 268) his widow Zenobia declared her independence and successfully resisted sporadic attacks by the Roman legions until a strong army was sent against her. She was captured and made to grace Aurelian's triumph in Rome (thus earning him the bad name of "general who conquered a woman"), then comfortably ended her days in a villa at Tivoli.

The desert ruins of Palmyra are now dominated by a castle named for Ibn Ma'an but really built by Fakhr-al-Dīn II al-Ma'nī (c. A.D. 1600).

See Also: ARABIA, 3

Bibliography: R. STONEMAN, Palmyra and Its Empire: Zenobia's Revolt against Rome (Ann Arbor 1992). I. BROWNING, Palmyra (1979). M. GAWLIKOWSKI, "Palmyra," Anchor Bible Dictionary 5 (1992) 136–137. P. PARLASCA, "Die palmyrenische Grabkunst," Mitteilungen der archäologischen Gesellschaft Steyermark 94 (1989–90) 112–136. M. COLLEDGE, The Art of Palmyra (1976). H. J. W. DRIJVERS and M. VERSTEEGH, "Palmyra," Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römische Welt 2.8 (1977) 837–863; H. DRIJVERS, The Religion of Palmyra (Leiden 1976). J. TEIXIDOR, The Pantheon of Palmyra (Leiden 1974). W. MACDONALD, Architecture of the Roman Empire (New Haven 1965). E. WILL, Les Palmyreniens (Paris 1992). J. STARCKY, Palmyre (Paris 1952); Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:1066–1103. H. LECLEERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 13 (1957) 962. T. WIEGAND, ed., Palmyra: Ergebnisse der Expedition von 1902–1917, 2 v. (Berlin 1932). M. I. ROSTOVTSSEV, Caravan Cities, tr. D. and T. TALBOT RICE (Oxford 1932) 91–152. Palmyrene language. D. HILLERS, Zeitschrift für Althebraistik 8 (1995) 55–62. J. CANTINEAU, Grammaire du palmyrénien épigraphique (Cairo 1935). F. ROSENTHAL, Die Sprache der palmyrenischen Inschriften . . . (Leipzig 1936).

[R. NORTH]

PALOMAR, JOHN OF

Spanish theologian; fl. 1431–43. Although he was one of the leading figures at the Council of BASEL, very little is known of his early life. He served successively as archdeacon of Barcelona, chaplain to Pope EUGENE IV, and auditor of the Sacred Palace. With John of RAGUSA he presided briefly over the Council of Basel from July 1431 until the return of Cardinal CESARINI from Bohemia. After 1433 Palomar was engaged in debate with the Hussites at the council over the Church's right to possess goods and temporal jurisdiction. He was also one of a small group led by Cesarini who defended the principle of papal supremacy against the proponents of CONCILIARISM, defending the basic dictum that the See of Peter may be judged by no one. His Scriptum contra Basileense concilium (MS Paris, B.N. lat. 1442) was a bitter rejection of the council's decrees and claims to superiority.

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Graz 1960) 29:1105–68. J. J. I. VON DÖLLINGER, Beiträge zur Politischen, Kirchlichen, und Kulturgeschichte . . . , 3 v. (Regensburg 1862–82) 2:414–441. N. VALOIS, Le pape et le concile, 1418–50, 2 v. (Paris 1909) 1:116–129; 2:53–56. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:796–797. Enciclopedia de la religión Católica, ed. R. D. FERRERES et al. (Barcelona 1950–56) 4:895.

[D. S. BUCZEK]

PALÓU, FRANCISCO

Missionary; b. Palma, Majorca, Jan. 22, 1723; d. Querétaro, Mexico, April 6, 1789. He entered the Franciscan Order in 1739 and studied under Junípero SERRA. Palóu was ordained in 1747, and two years later went to Mexico as a missionary. He and Serra were assigned to the missionary Apostolic College of San Fernando, Mexico City. From 1750 to 1760 he served in the Indian missions of the Sierra Gorda, north of Querétaro. In 1767 he went to Lower California to work in the missions left vacant by the expulsion of the Jesuits, and he eventually became missionary president of that area. Palóu remained in charge of the missions of the Lower California Peninsula until the region was transferred to the Dominicans in 1773. In that year he went to the newly opened mission field of Upper California, where he became temporary superior because of Serra's absence in Mexico. During this period he began his Noticias de la Nueva California (1874), a history of the first years of California's colonization. He also accompanied two expeditions to the San Francisco Bay area, acting as diarist. In 1776 Palóu founded Mission San Francisco, where he served during most of his years in California. He assisted the dying Serra at the latter's Mission San Carlos in 1784. Upon the president's death, Palóu again assumed temporary charge of the upper California area and began his classic biography of Serra, the Relación histórica de la vida y apostólicas tareas del Venerable Padre Fray Junípero Serra (1787). Recalled to San Fernando College in 1785, he was elected superior in 1786 and held office until he died.

Bibliography: F. PALÓU, Life of Fray Junípero Serra, tr. and annot. M. J. GEIGER (Washington 1955). H. E. BOLTON, Palóu and His Writings (Berkeley 1926).

[E. D. BURNETT]

PAMMACHIUS, ST.

Roman senator; b. c. 340 of the Furian family; d. Rome, 409–10. He was a friend and fellow student of St. JEROME in their youth, and Jerome's extant correspondence of later years includes a number of letters addressed to Pammachius, who was intensely interested in theological controversy, as well as one (Ep. 83) addressed to Jerome from Pammachius and Oceanus. Pammachius was married to Paulina, the second daughter of St. PAULA of Rome. After Paulina's death, near the end of the fourth century, Pammachius turned to the religious life and used his wealth for the care of the poor. In conjunction with St. FABIOLA he founded a hospice at Ostia, and he may have been a founder of the church of SS. John and Paul on the Caelius in Rome. He was termed ecclesiae munerarius by St. PAULINUS OF NOLA (Ep. 13). St. AUGUSTINE's Ep. 58 is addressed to Pammachius.

Feast: Aug. 30.

Bibliography: Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi epistulae, ed. I. HILBERG, 3 v. (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 54–56; 1910–18) 48, 49, 57, 66, 83, 84, 97. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:555–563. F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1, 2; 1922).

[T. C. LAWLER]

PAMPHILUS, ST.

Martyr; b. Berytus, Phoenicia (modern Beirut, Lebanon); d. Caesarea, Palestine, February 16, 310. The two early biographies, one written by his master Pierius, according to Philip of Side, and the other by his disciple EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, have been lost. Eusebius took his name (Eusebius Pamphili) to display the spiritual filiation between them and speaks of him with admiration in his Ecclesiastical History and in his On the Martyrs of Palestine, where he gives a résumé of his career, imprisonment, and martyrdom (ch. 11.1).

Pamphilus, of a noble family of Berytus, received a careful education and exercised public office there, then became, at the Didaskaleion of Alexandria (Photius, Bibliotheca 118–119), a student of Pierius, head of the school under Bishop Theonas after 281 (Jerome, De vir. ill. 76). Pierius was called Origen the Younger because of his talents and the admiration he had for that great theologian; he communicated this conviction to Pamphilus, who later reopened the School of CAESAREA founded by ORIGEN. Ordained by Bishop Agapius (c. 290), Pamphilus was renowned for his asceticism and charity as well as for his knowledge.

Speaking of his disciples, the brothers Apphianus and Aedesius, Eusebius described the spiritual and scriptural orientation of the teaching of Pamphilus (De mart. Palest. 4.6; 5.2). He reorganized the Christian library attached to the school at Caesarea and employed a band of copyists. Arrested in 307, he was held in prison for two years and then decapitated during the persecution of Maximinus Daia.

The only known writing of Pamphilus is his Apology for Origen, composed while in prison with the assistance of Eusebius of Caesarea, who was the author of the work's sixth book (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.33, 36; Photius, Bibl. 118). JEROME testifies to Pamphilus's authorship (De vir. ill. 75). But after Jerome became an anti-Origenist, he attributed the Apology to Eusebius, whom he described as a semi-Arian to discredit the work. Only book 1 in the translation of RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA exists. It begins with a letter to the Palestinian confessors condemned to the mines and indicates the proper manner of judging the difficulties in Origen's thought: the hypothetical and doubtful character of his speculations, which are not dogmatic affirmations and frequently are self-contradictory. Pamphilus bears witness to Origen's fidelity to orthodoxy. By numerous citations of Origen's works, some of which are otherwise unknown, he refutes the accusations made against Origen's doctrine on the Trinity, the Incarnation, the historicity of the Scriptures, the Resurrection, the soul, metempsychosis, and eternal damnation.

Feast: June 1.

Bibliography: Patrologica Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66). 17:541–616. E. VENABLES, in A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, 4 v. (London 1877–87) 4:178–179. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–). 11.2:1839–41. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–60) 2:144–146. F. X. MURPHY, Rufinus of Aquileia (Washington 1945).

[H. CROUZEL]

PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.

Martyrs; Religious of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (PIARISTS); d. June–December 1936; beatified Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II.

Dionisio Pamplona, born Oct. 11, 1868 in Calamocha, Teruel, Spain; d. July 25. Pamplona made his solemn profession in 1889 and was ordained a priest in 1893. He taught in several Piarist schools in Spain and then Argentina. In 1934 he was appointed rector of the novitiate house in Peralta, Huesca, Spain, where he also served as pastor of the local church. He was devoted to the Piarist rule and allowed the love of God to animate all he did. The religious persecution marking the Spanish Civil War intensified in 1936. On July 23, 1936 the Revolutionary Committee placed the Piarist community under house arrest in a secluded home away from the church and school. The next day at dawn, Pamplona left the house unnoticed by the guards and returned to the church to celebrate Mass. As he was locking the church to leave, armed men seized him and later took him to the prison in Monzón. On June 25 around eleven o'clock in the evening, the soldiers removed Pamplona with several other prisoners, led them to the main square, and lined them up for execution. Pamplona was singled out and shot to death.

Other members of the Piarist community martyred during the Civil War were beatified with Pamplona. Each is listed below by the date of his death in 1936. Further details may be found in the individual entries.

July 28: Manuel SEGURA LÓPEZ, priest (age 55) and David Carlos MARAÑÓN, lay brother (age 28).

August 9: Faustino OTEIZA SEGURA, priest (age 46) and Florentín Felipe NAYA, lay brother (age 79).

August 14: Juan AGRAMUNT RIERA, priest (age 29).

August 17–18 (night of): Enrique CANADELL QUINTANA (age 46).

August 20: Matias CARDONA MESEGUER, priest (age 33).

September 16: Ignacio CASANOVAS PERRAMÓN, priest (age 43).

September 22: Carlo NAVARRO MIGUEL, priest (age 25).

October 2: Francisco CARCELLER GALINDO, priest (age 35).

December 9: José FERRER ESTEVE, priest (age 32).

December 27: Alfredo PARTE SAIZ, priest (age 37).

At their beatification Pope John Paul II observed, "They are not heroes of an inhuman war but teachers of youth who, as both religious and teachers, faced up to their tragic fate by authentic witness to the faith, giving by their martyrdom, the ultimate lesson of their life."

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: "Decreto Super Martyrio," Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995) 651–656. La Documentation Catholique 2125 (Nov. 5, 1995) 924.

[L. GENDERNALIK/EDS.]

PAMPLONA, FRANCIS OF

Capuchin lay brother and missionary; b. Pamplona, Spain, Aug. 11, 1597; d. La Guaira, Venezuela, Aug. 31, 1651. He was born Tiburcio de Redin, of a noble family, and first followed a career in the military, holding high offices and distinguishing himself for his skill and courage. In 1637, however, he was converted to a life of penance as a Capuchin and dedicated his efforts to the foreign missions. He joined Bonaventure of Allesano in founding a Capuchin mission in the Congo in 1645. Returning to Europe, he solicited support for the missions in London, Rome, and Madrid. After 1647 he went to the missions in Spanish America, where he spent his remaining years laboring in Panama and Venezuela.

Bibliography: C. DA TERZORIO, Le missioni dei Minori Cappuccini, v. 10 (Rome 1938) 370–398. Documentos históricos: Fray Francisco de Pamplona, v.3 (1948) 67–73.

[J. C. WILLKE]

PAMPURI, RICCARDO, ST.

Baptized Erminio Filippo (Herman Philip), physician, lay brother of the Hospitallers of St. John of God; b. Aug. 2, 1897, Trivolizi (near Pavia), Lombardy, Italy; d. May 1, 1930, Milan. The second youngest of the eleven children of wine merchants Innocente Pampuri and Angela Campari, who died of tuberculosis when Erminio was three, Erminio was raised by his uncle Carlo Campari in Turin following his father's death (1907). There, Erminio became involved in CATHOLIC ACTION. He studied medicine at the University of Pavia (1915–21) with an interruption for military service in the Italian Army Medical Corps (1917–18). In 1921, he joined his uncle Carlo's practice in Morimondo (Milan) as a general physician. He became an active member of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, joined the Third Order of Franciscans (1922), fostered the growth of a parish Catholic Action youth group, and organized spiritual exercises in preparation for the 1925 Jubilee. Under the spiritual direction of Fr. Riccardo Beretta, he entered the HOSPITALLEERS OF ST. JOHN OF GOD (June 22, 1927). After receiving the habit and name Brother Riccardo (Richard; Oct. 21, 1927), he completed his novitiate and began his work as director of the dental clinic at St. Ursula's Hospital in Brescia (Oct. 24, 1928). Following his death at age 33 from bronchial pneumonia, his remains have been venerated in a chapel dedicated to him in Trivolzio. Pampuri's beatification process was opened in 1949. Pope John Paul II both beatified (Oct. 4, 1981) and canonized (Nov. 1, 1989) him in Rome.

Feast: May 1.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 74 (1982): 376–379. L'Osservatore Romano, English Edition, no. 41: 1, 12. Comune di Trivolzio, Trivolzio: il paese di San Riccardo Pampuri nel centenario della sua nascita (Pavia 1997). L. CIONI, Il santo semplice: vita di san Riccardo Pampuri (Genoa 1996). N. MUTSCHLECHNER, Ein Arzt wählt Gott—Der Heilige Frater Richard Pampuri aus dem Orden der Barmherzigen Brüder (Munich 1991).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PANAMA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Panama is, geographically, the narrowest part of Central America and unites North and South America. It is situated between the Republics of Colombia on the east and Costa Rica on the west. On the north is the Atlantic Ocean and on the south the Pacific Ocean. Rugged mountains run the length of the interior, falling to plains and rolling hills near the coast. The climate is hot and humid, marked by a rainy season from

Capital: Panama City.
Size: 28,576 sq. miles.
Population: 2,808,270 in 2000.
Languages: Spanish, English.
Religions: 2,302,780 Catholics (82%), 140,500 Muslims (5%), 196,590 Protestants (7%), 168,400 without religious affiliation.
Archdiocese: Panama City, with suffragans Chitré, Colón-Kuna Yala, David, Penonomé, and Santiago de Veraguas. A prelatore is located at Bocas del Toro, and an apostolic vicariate is located in Darién.

May to January. Natural resources include copper, mahogany timber and shrimp; agricultural products consist of bananas, rice, corn, coffee and sugarcane.

Panama is an isthmus with the 47 mile-long interoceanic Panama Canal located at its narrowest point. Begun by the French in 1882, the canal was completed by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers between 1904 and 1914. The canal was placed at the service of worldwide maritime trade and governed by the United States under the authorization of the Republic of Panama until 1999, when the entire canal zone (553 sq. miles) was turned over to the republic.

A Spanish colony until 1821, Panama broke its ties to Gran Columbia and became independent as a U.S. protectorate in 1903. The region, controlled by a succession of volatile administrations, required repeated intervention by the U.S. in order to preserve its interest in the canal zone. From 1988 to 1989 General Manuel Noriega seized control; he was deposed, with U.S. backing in favor of a civilian regime, and was convicted of drug trafficking in 1992. Most Panamanians are ethnic mestizo, with Amerindian, European (Spanish) and West Indian minorities. Indigenous people live in the mountainous regions, while others reside in the country's more populous areas. During the 1980s and 1990s the region's rainforests were severely diminished through deforestation.

The Early Church. Both Spanish explorer Rodrigo de Bastidas in 1501 and Christopher Columbus, on his fourth voyage to the New World in 1502, traveled portions of Panama, although neither perceived it was an isthmus. This was left to Vasco Núñez de Balboa, who crossed from one ocean to the other in 1513. The Holy See, by petition of the catholic King Ferdinand of Spain, created the bishopric of Darién, the oldest on the American continent and the fourth in the New World. In 1514 Franciscans led by Bishop Juan de QUEVEDO, and six years later Dominicans led by Bishop Vicente Peraza, entered the region to convert the indigenous tribes of Darién. With the support of the Spanish crown, these first missionaries staked out settlements in the mountains, valleys and plains, many of which grew into major cities in the centuries that followed.

Jesuits began their residence in the isthmus in the middle of the 16th century, and, in addition to missionary work, devoted their efforts to education. Some of their native students were inspired to enter the Society of Jesus, among them theologian Pedro Ignacio de Cáceres, educator Juan Antonio Giraldo and Agustín Hurtado, a zealous missionary, who in 1677 was martyred by natives to whom he was preaching the gospel. Dominican General Adriano Ufelde de Santo Tomás was among the most noted evangelist of the colonial period, and his written works provided historians with a valuable source of historical information.

The Panamanian curia was suffragan of the archdiocese of Seville till 1546, of Lima until 1836, of Bogotá till 1901 and finally of Cartagena de Indias till 1925, at which time, by disposition of Pius XI, the Republic of Panama became an archdiocese. In 1749 the University of St. Xavier was founded by the native priest Francisco Javier de Luna Victoria. Many native Panamanians also reached the high honor of the episcopate, among them Francisco Javier de Luna, bishop of Chuquisaca, Bolivia

(d. c. 1778) and Manuel Joaquín González de Acuña y Sanz Merino, bishop of Panama (1797–1813).

An Independent Panama. Led by Bishop José Higinio Durán, the Church took a leadership role in the independence movement, and in 1821 Panama gained independence from Spain. Under the new government, the Church enjoyed independence from civil government while maintaining cordial relations. Freedom of religion was granted to all faiths by the new constitution, and this attracted a number of evangelical Protestant groups. The constitution, promulgated following independence from Columbia on Nov. 3, 1903, recognizing that the Catholic faith predominated, extended it special protection, financing its missions and granting subsidies for the construction of churches and the development of charitable foundations, especially in the field of education and scholarships for parochial schools. The Church had no other properties or income apart from donations. Under a new constitution dated Oct. 11, 1972, freedom of religion was continued. In addition, Catholicism continued to be taught in state-run schools, although parents could exempt their children from this curriculum. Clerics were prohibited from holding public office.

Iglesia del Carmen (Church of Carmen), Panama City. (©Danny Lehman/CORBIS)

In the middle of the 20th century a shortage of priests required that men's vocations be supplemented by Spanish clergy; vocations continued to be adequate among women. Religious communities active in the region included Jesuits, Augustinians, Paulists, Franciscans, Salesians, Christian Brothers, Benedictines, Sisters of Charity, Maryknoll, Discalced Carmelites, Franciscans, Dominicans, Mercedarians and Servants of Mary. Despite the inroads made by foreign evangelical Protestant groups during the second half of the century, the Church participated enthusiastically in ecumenical conferences, through which it effected positive social change in Panama.

Through the leadership of General Omar Torrijos from 1968 to 1981, Panama gained economic autonomy, and in 1977 a treaty was signed under which the canal would revert to Panama by the end of the century. Torrijos was killed in 1981. Seven years later General Manuel Noriega took control. Following elections in May of 1989 during which president-elect Guillermo Endara was forced into hiding and charges of corruption abounded, Church leaders accused Noriega of fraudulent election practices. Over 20,000 U.S. troops descended on the Panamanian capital to depose Noriega, who was suspected of drug trafficking on a large scale. Ten days later Noriega surrendered Panama's high office, his relinquishment of power aided by Church mediation. In 1990 Endara abolished the country's standing military. During the 1990s the government of Ernesto Balladares encouraged a strong economy based on banking, international trade and tourism. Government corruption, perhaps caused by Panama's position as a distribution point for illegal drugs, however continued to be a problem. Remarking on Panama's acquisition of all rights to the Panama Canal on Dec. 31, 1999, Pope John Paul II called it a "magnificent opportunity" for the government to improve the quality of life for all Panamanians.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 161 parishes tended by 166 diocesan and 230 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 55 brothers and 560 sisters, many of whom aided the Panamanian people through their work in the nation's 41 primary and 39 secondary Catholic schools. In 1999 Church leaders participated in a peace initiative near the Colombian-Panama border in an effort to end confrontations between Marxist and other guerilla groups, engaged in fighting, that endangered and impoverished local populations.

Bibliography: E. J. CASTILLERO REYES, Historia de Panamá (6th ed. Panama 1959). G. RUDOLF, Panama's Poor: Victims,

Agents, and Historymakers (Miami 1999). Annuario Pontificio has information on all diocese.

[E. J. CASTILLERO/EDS.]

PANBABYLONISM

A theory of interpretation of history advanced in Germany at the beginning of the 20th century that claimed to find traces of an essential Babylonian influence in all the cultures and religions of the world. The theory was proposed in several forms, the most notable being those of Hugo Winckler, Himmels- und Weltenbild der Babylonier als Grundlage der Weltanschauung und Mythologie aller Völker (1903), and Alfred Jeremias, Die Panbabylonisten (1907). These men observed that the cosmogonies of the various nations were permeated with astral motifs and concluded that this worldwide similarity in mythological types argued for a common cultural heritage that had its roots in Babylonia, the birthplace of both astronomy and astrological religion. Some of the ramifications of their theory were to picture Israelite history and tradition as a shadowy borrowing from Mesopotamia and to portray Christ as a fictional reincarnation of the Babylonian god, Bel-Marduk. Another variety of Panbabylonism was exemplified in P. Jensen's Das Gilgamesch-Epos in der Welt-literatur (1906), which found that Babylonian hero under different guises in the literature of almost all nations and viewed Christ as a solar-myth figure modeled on Gilgamesh. The extravagant claims of the school were effectively dismissed from serious consideration after the scientific investigations of the astronomer-Assyriologist F. X. Kugler in his Auf den Trümmern des Panbabylonismus (1909) and Im Bannkreis Babels (1910).

Bibliography: A. DEIMEL, Pantheon Babylonicum (Rome 1914) 35–39. C. M. EDSMAN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:35–36. P. SCHEBASTA, Christus und die Religionen der Erde (Vienna 1961) 1:548–550. F. M. TH. DE LIA-GRE BÖHL, Christus und die Religionen der Erde 2:447–448. F. KÖNIG, Christus und die Religionen der Erde 3:745–746.

[J. A. BRINKMAN]

PANENTHEISM

Panentheism, (Gr.  $\pi\alpha\nu$ , all;  $\epsilon\nu$ , in;  $\theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ , God) in its simplest form, is the view that the world is in God, but God is not the world. In metaphysics, it utilizes a real distinction between the essence of God and God's existence, or considers God as having accidents really distinct from God's nature. Panentheism stands as a kind of surrealism holding for a mutuality in relationship between God and the world not only is the world dependent upon God, but God also is to some extent dependent upon the world. It regards the world as an actual fulfillment of God's creative possibility.

The term panentheism seems to have been introduced by Karl C. F. Krause (1781–1832) to distinguish his doctrine from contemporary forms of PANTHEISM and EMANATIONISM. The term was used also by Friedrich Jacobi and by a few members of the theological faculty at Tübingen, though not so pointedly. Today it describes the views of those who introduce a polarity in the notion of God as both eternal and temporal, and as including yet transcending the world.

Panentheism is rooted in a conviction that the world as possible in the mind of God becomes actualized and thereby adds to God's actuality. It opposes the Thomistic view of God as PURE ACT. Panentheists give special importance to what they call a logic of polarity, which has a close affinity to Hegelian dialectics, as the only means of escaping ultimate dilemmas arising from the use of categories.

Historical Survey. In one sense, the present forms of panentheism can be traced to PLATO, who discussed both being and becoming in a manner that could imply a dipolar view of ultimate reality. His "One" seems to have contained individual beings even as it remained indivisible.

Medieval Thought. JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA viewed creation as the production of Ideas in the World, and designated a stage of completion for such productivity in quite the same manner as do present-day panentheists. Moreover, his distinction of God as Creator and God as the End of all things implies fulfillment, and reads much like Whitehead's primordial and consequent natures of God.

Ramanuja (1017–1137) tempered the impersonal Hindu panentheism of his day with a personalistic notion of BRAHMAN as cause of all things, but he also maintained that all the things of this world formed the body of Brahma. His doctrine of nonduality with differences (vish-istadvaita) seems more in line with modern polaristic views than with either panentheistic MONISM or theistic DUALISM.

Although John DUNS SCOTUS insisted on freedom in the act of creation, traces of panentheism may be seen in his view of God as being necessitated to will the ideas of things, and in his doctrine of the univocity of being. Further, his ideas of infinity and his insistence upon the limitations of metaphysics imply a polarity.

Meister ECKHART emphasized the transcendence of God and maintained that one could not affirm anything of God in such a way as to rule out its opposite—an idea similar to the later notion of polarity.

Renaissance and Modern Thinkers. NICHOLAS OF CUSA leaned even further towards panentheism. He held that the world is explication of what is implication in God and conceived of the infinite as including and reconciling all opposites. Such ideas not only established ground for the doctrine of dipolarity, but also emphasized the theme of fulfillment that was presented by later panentheists.

Friedrich SCHELLING described the ABSOLUTE as the identity of all differences. For Schelling, God will “be” only when the Absolute has fully revealed itself. His God is in process in somewhat the same manner as Whitehead’s consequent God.

Accepting the complexity of the concept of God, Gustav Fechner (1801–87) proposed the view of an inclusive eternal-temporal deity. He maintained that such opposing descriptions are partial truths that can be reconciled through proper re-interpretation or completion, thus harmonizing them with the more general conception of God.

The triadic doctrine of the Absolute Spirit proposed by Hegel considers nature as an externalization of the Absolute, and portrays the Absolute itself as a never-ending process that implies eternity and temporality.

Two Russian thinkers, Vladimir SOLOV’EV and Nikolai BERYAIEV, emphasized the incarnational aspect of panentheism. Solov’ev presented God as polarized and developed this view through the notions of man-Godhood and God-manhood. Berdyaev looked to a transfigured world as the ultimate expression of God and wrote, in a rather mystical fashion, of a divine history, a divine becoming, a divine need, and above all, a divine suffering. For Berdyaev we are creatively responsive to God, and we enrich God’s life.

Contemporary Directions. Alfred N. WHITEHEAD offered a dipolar God by distinguishing between the so-called primordial and consequent aspects of the divine nature: the primordial aspect is God considered as the first cause of all things; the consequent aspect is God as the end of all things. Arguing from the relativity of all things, he held for a reaction of the world upon God to the extent that the whole of the created order stands as a fulfillment of God’s concrete actuality, though not of God’s abstract nature.

Muhammad Iqbal (1875–1938) described God’s creative life as an organic whole existing as an open possibility, so that God is ever being completed by the world without changing God’s essential nature.

The interpretation of participated being given by Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN seems to have concluded with the placement of all things in God by what he calls a unitive transformation. While insisting that this infusion of the one and the many does not add anything essential to God, he implied that it does add something accidental to the divine being.

Paul TILLICH’s approach to ultimate reality through symbolization used the notion of polarity to overcome the tendency to impose limitations upon God. It fit in well with the basic approach of panentheism.

Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan (1888–1975) made a distinction between divine being and divine action, rejecting the idea of confining the illimitable to a single form or perfection. He held that abstract possibility and concrete realization are both contained in the one reality, which he identified as the Absolute-God. Although he said that this distinction is only logical, he seemed to use it as a real distinction; thus it gave his thought a panentheistic polarity.

Charles HARTSHORNE did the most to give panentheism formal expression as a view of God. He developed a dipolar concept of God, resting on a fundamental distinction between his concrete actuality and his abstract existence. He attributed the traditional categories of absoluteness, infinity, immutability, and so on to God’s abstractness while maintaining that his concreteness makes God truly related, finite, mutable, and so on, just like any other actuality. Hartshorne explained what it means to say that God is truly in the world and yet is not identical with it. He developed more fully than the other panentheists the logic of panentheism, arguing that the predication of contrary predicates of God makes better philosophical and religious sense than classical theism.

Critical Evaluation. Critics of panentheism have charged that it involves erroneous understandings of logic, CAUSALITY, and ANALOGY. The focal point of criticism has been the logic of dipolarity, on which panentheism rests. Hartshorne consistently argued that, despite attributing contrary predicates of God (e.g., transcendent-immanent, absolute-relative, infinite-finite), panentheism does not violate the principle of non-contradiction since these are predicated of God under different aspects. Furthermore the relationship between the pairs of contraries is asymmetrical: one set includes the other but not the other way around. Contrary to traditional philosophies of being, Hartshorne maintained that God’s absoluteness is explainable as contained in God’s relativity rather than vice versa.

Critics have also questioned whether the distinction between God and the world is really sufficiently delineated since panentheists deny the doctrine of creatio ex nihilo. In panentheism, God’s being Supreme Cause does not require that he have the kind of independence of the world reflected in the traditional doctrine of creation.

For Christian theists panentheism needs to be developed further if it is to be reconcilable with the doctrine of the Trinity. While dipolarity can be useful in explaining how God can be transcendent and immanent in the world or in shaping a new kind of Christology, it still remains unclear as to how it can support the doctrine of a triune God.

Bibliography: C. HARTSHORNE and W. L. REESE, eds. Philosophers Speak of God (Chicago 1953). C. HARTSHORNE, Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism (Chicago 1941).

[E. R. NAUGHTON/S. SIA]

PANGE LINGUA GLORIOSI

The opening words of two liturgical hymns. (1) Pange lingua gloriosi lauream certaminis, a hymn of the holy cross by Venantius FORTUNATUS, written c. 569 for the reception of a relic of the cross, sent by Emperor JUSTIN II to Queen RADEGUNDA, in Poitiers. One of the most famous Passiontide hymns of all times, it was traditionally used in the GOOD FRIDAY ceremony of the veneration of the cross since the ninth century. At one time, it was also sung at MATINS and LAUDS of Passiontide, as well as for the Feast of the Triumph of the Cross. The original text consists of ten stanzas, each having three lines in trochaic tetrameter, a form once used in marching songs of the Roman soldiers. The hymn briefly recounts Christ's earthly life, embedded in the history of the Redemption, beginning with humanity's fall, and makes passing allusions to the instruments of the Passion. Christ's cross appears as the tree of life, especially selected for the glorious task of bearing Christ. This holy cross hymn later became the model for many compositions, among them the not less famous Eucharistic hymn, (2) Pange lingua gloriosi corporis mysterium, which was traditionally sung at Vespers and during procession on Corpus Christi and HOLY THURSDAY. It has five three-line stanzas and a doxology, in catalectic and accentual trochaic tetrameter. This masterpiece of medieval poetry was written probably by St. THOMAS AQUINAS (or by someone in his entourage) c. 1264. Written to a preexisting melody (that of the holy cross sequence Laudes crucis attollamus), by the Goliardic poet Hugh Primas of Orléans, it contains many echoes and reminiscences from earlier hymns; still it is an original piece of work, with highly poetic inspiration and doctrinal exactitude. Its fifth stanza, Tantum ergo, is sung (to various melodies) at the BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.

Bibliography: J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 118–120, the Eucharistic Sequence, 82–84, the holy cross, etc., hymn. Analecta hymnica 50:71, 585–586. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hym- nendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:129–135; 2:251–252. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 90, Venantius Fortunatus; 408, Thomas Aquinas. B. FISCHER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:21, cf. H. VANDERHOVEN, Paroisse et Liturgie 33 (1951) 168–173.

[J. SZÖVÉRFY]

PANIGAROLA, FRANCESCO

Franciscan Observant preacher and theologian; b. Milan, June 6, 1548; d. Asti, May 31, 1594. He was born of the noble Panigarola family and baptized Jerome. He began his studies at Pavia in 1561 and continued them later at Bologna. He led a very dissipated life, but was suddenly converted and entered the Friars Minor Observant in Florence on May 15, 1567. There he took the name Francesco to distinguish himself from an uncle Jerome, a member of the same province. He made his regular ecclesiastical studies at Padua and Pisa. It was said of him that he became as devout in religion as he had been dissipated in the world.

After his ordination, he began to preach in the large cities of Italy and gained great renown. St. Pius V was so impressed by his eloquence that he sent him to Paris for two years to study the Fathers.

In 1579 Panigarola refused the generalate of his order, but was elected a general definitor and was appointed visitor for all the Italian provinces. In 1583 he was commissioned by St. Charles Borromeo to preach against Lutheranism and Calvinism, which were gaining a foothold in the Tyrol. He became celebrated as a controversialist and is credited with saving the Rhaetian provinces from the Reformation. His sermons on Calvinism, Lettoni sopra dogmi dette calviniche (Milan 1582), were translated into several languages and were many times reprinted.

In 1586 Sixtus V named him bishop of Grisopolis and the next year transferred him to Asti, where Calvinism was active. In 1587 he was sent by Sixtus V as part of a diplomatic mission to Paris; he did not return to his diocese until 1590. In Asti he spent his few remaining years in energetic action, especially preaching and combatting the doctrines of the Reformation.

Panigarola's published works number 33, and there are at least as many in manuscript form. Most of his writings are in the field of sacred eloquence, and include especially his philosophical and theological polemics against the teachings of Luther and Calvin. Notable among his printed works are Rhetorica ecclesiastica (Cologne 1605) and Conciones 100 supra Christi passionem coram D. Carlo Borromeo recitatae (Venice 1585).

Bibliography: A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1850–53. O. BONMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:22. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:249.

[P. F. MULHERN]

PANNONHALMA, ABBEY OF

Archabbey and center of the Hungarian BENEDICTINES (Mártonhegy, Martinsberg, Mons sacer Pannoniae). The foundation, near Győr (Raab), was initiated by Duke Géza in 996 and completed in 1101 under King St. STEPHEN by monks from Brevnov in Bohemia. An abbey nullius with all the privileges of MONTE CASSINO, it was the chief agent of Hungary's conversion to Christianity and throughout the Middle Ages was a center of learning and culture, as well as the scene of political events. After organizing the Hungarian Benedictine Congregation in 1512 and becoming an archabbey in 1514, it was for a century a bastion that resisted the Turkish invasion. JOSEPH II secularized it (1786) but Francis I restored it (1802). From then until World War II it was engaged in secondary education and headed the congregation, which, incorporating the abbeys of Bakonybél, Tihany, Dömölk, and Zalavár and administering 25 parishes and 8 gymnasia, had about 300 priest monks. In 1948 the Communist government secularized the possessions of the congregation. The monastery has a valuable library and is rich in cultural monuments. Hungarian Benedictines have settled in Brazil and California.

Bibliography: L. ERDÉLYI, A Pannonhalmi Szent-Benedek-rend története, 14 v. (Budapest 1902–16). T. VON BOGYAY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:125.

[L. J. LEKAI]

PANPSYCHISM

From the Greek πάν meaning all, and ψυχή meaning soul, a philosophical theory that all reality, including inorganic matter, is animated and possesses a psychic nature similar to that of the human soul. It is to be distinguished from HYLOZOISM, the doctrine that all matter is endowed with life but possesses no psychic element.

Old Forms. Panpsychism can be traced back to early Greek philosophers, such as HERACLITUS and EMPEDOCLES, but it is only in the Renaissance that it assumed a concrete and systematic form. Thus in his Nova de universes philosophia (Venice 1593), Francesco Patrizi

Pannonhalma Benedictine Monastery. (©Carmen Redondo/CORBIS)

(1529–97) developed the Neoplatonic theme of an eternal divine light pervading the whole universe, and described knowledge in terms that indicated a similarity of nature between knower and object known. Likewise, Geronimo Cardano (1501–76) defended the doctrine of a WORLD SOUL informing the universe as a psychic principle and Giordano BRUNO (1548–1600) stated even more clearly that the world soul is “the formal constitutive principle of the universe and all that is contained in it” [De la causa, principio et uno, Venice (London): 1584]. The doctrine of a world soul was defended also by Tommaso CAMPANELLA (1568–1639), who accepted the theory of universal sensation propounded by Bernardino TELESIO and developed it into a metaphysical theory that being is essentially composed of power, knowledge and love.

Modern Forms. In modern times panpsychism has found supporters among philosophers of different trends of thought, principally in Germany, but also in England, the United States, Italy and France.

Germany. The theory of G. W. LEIBNIZ that all reality is made up of monads considered as conscious units reflecting the entire universe is clearly of a panpsychic nature. More recently G. T. FECHNER (1801–87) revived the Renaissance theme of an animated universe, which he held to be a unitary system penetrated by the spirit of God and including all other minor “systems” as sentient subjects. Among such systems he classed not only animals, but plants, the earth and the heavenly bodies. Rudolph LOTZE (1817–81) restated Leibniz’s theory of unextended and conscious monads, and Friedrich Paulsen (1846–1908) presented physical reality as a manifestation of a supreme psychic unit, God, conceived essentially as Will, a doctrine that has many elements in common with the systems of A. SCHOPENHAUER and W. WUNDT. This monistic conception of reality was shared also by Ernst Haeckel (1834–1919), for whom God was the sum total of the infinite psychic realities that compose the universe.

England and the United States. Like Haeckel in Germany, William K. Clifford (1845–79) in England arrived at panpsychism from his theory of evolution. If man evolves from inorganic matter, matter must contain the elements of consciousness as this is known to exist in man. Hence the entire universe consists of “mind stuff.” Another British philosopher whose conception of reality was impregnated with panpsychic motives was Alfred N. WHITEHEAD (1861–1947), who, with Leibniz, is believed to be “one of two great artificers of the panpsychic philosophy in its present form” (A History of Philosophical Systems, 450). He pictured the world as a process of events rather than of things. Each event contains within itself its own past, anticipates its future and represents all other events by their effects on it. Thus an event is the synthetic unity of the universe comprehended as oneness, as well as the mirror of the entire universe. It is also an organism in which each part affects the whole and, in turn, is determined by the whole as to its role within it.

In the United States also panpsychism had a few followers. Charles S. PEIRCE (1839–1914) maintained that mind and matter are but different aspects of a single feeling process. When something is considered in its relations and reactions, it is regarded as matter; when understood as feeling, it appears as consciousness. Josiah ROYCE (1855–1916) shared Fechner’s basic view of the psychic aspect of all beings. However he defended the peculiar theory that in addition to individual animals, each species of animal as a whole is a single conscious unit. A more recent American exponent of the panpsychic doctrine was Charles A. Strong (1862–1940), whose attempt to solve the problem of interaction between body and mind led him to the denial of their essential difference and to the conception of matter as a psychic reality.

Italy and France. In Italy and France panpsychism was found chiefly among philosophers of spiritualistic tendencies. Thus, in Italy, Vincenzo GIOBERTI (1801–52) not only held the doctrine of an animated universe but also claimed that the principle of animation is of an intellectual nature. In France the spiritualistic movement started by MAINE DE BIRAN and developed by J. G. F. RAVAISSON (1813–1900) reached its climax in the theory of vital impulse (élan vital) as the immanent principle directive of all organic evolution, a doctrine proposed by H. BERGSON. By P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN (1881–1955) the process of integral evolution was conceived to extend from elemental matter to reflex consciousness and to attain to its final stage in the “Omega Point.”

Evaluation. Panpsychism is untenable both as a scientific theory and as a philosophical doctrine. Living beings differ from inanimate matter because of their structural organization and their activities. They are composed of cells or combination of cells forming organs and they are characterized by metabolism, growth, reproduction and internal power of adaptation to environment. This distinction becomes even more evident in animals, which, in addition to vegetative powers, have the capacity for sensation, and in man, who alone among all corporeal creatures is endowed with the power of reasoning. By attributing to matter vital and psychic forces that are proper to plants and animals respectively, panpsychists fail to take into account the essential distinction that separates one order of being from another.

See Also: SOUL; SOUL, HUMAN; SPIRIT.

Bibliography: C. HARTSHORNE, “Panpsychism,” A History of Philosophical Systems, ed. V. T. A. FERM (New York 1950). G. MARTANO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1127–29. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 2:372–374. P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Phenomenon of Man, tr. B. WALL (New York 1959). C. A. STRONG, Essays on the Natural Origin of the Mind (London 1930).

[B. M. BONANSEA]

PANTAENUS, ST.

Second-century Christian author. The scanty knowledge about Pantaenus comes primarily from EUSEBIUS, who stated (Hist. Eccl. 5.10) that he had been trained in the Stoic philosophy and was head of a private school of philosophy at Alexandria about 180. Previously, although Eusebius reported this only as tradition, he had been a zealous missionary and had reached India (i.e., probably South Arabia), where he had found Christians who knew the Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew (Aramaic) which they had received from St. BARTHOLOMEW. He was still alive in 194 (Eusebius, Chron. 2210) and died probably in that decade, being succeeded by CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

In the Hypotyposes, Clement mentioned Pantaenus as his teacher and quoted “his opinions and traditions” (Hist. Eccl. 6.13). Eusebius thought that he also alluded to him in the Stromateis (1.11.2; particularly quoted Hist. Eccl. 5.11); where after mentioning certain unnamed teachers Clement concluded: “I found rest when I came upon the last (he was the first in power), after tracking him to where he was in Egypt. He the true Sicilian bee, gathering the flowers of the prophetic and apostolic meadow, engendered in the soul of his hearers an un fading element of knowledge.”

Possibly Pantaenus came originally from Sicily. He seems to have promoted liberal studies, for ORIGEN (Hist. Eccl. 6.14) defended his own study of philosophy by reference to his example. He also wrote scriptural commentaries that were extant in JEROME’s time (De vir. ill. 36), but nothing has survived. His importance lies in his contribution to the scholarly tradition of Alexandrian Christianity.

Feast: July 7 (Roman MARTYROLOGY), June 22 (Coptic Church).

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology 2:4–5. J. MUNCK, Untersuchungen über Klemens von Alexandria (Stuttgart 1933) 151–204. G. BARDY, Recherches de science religieuse 27 (1937) 65–90, school. M. HORNSCHUH, Zeitschrift Kirchengeschichte 71 (1960) 1–5, 19–25. H. I. MARROU, ed. and tr., À Diognète (Sources Chrétiennes 33; 1951) 266–268.

[M. WHITTAKER]

PANTHEISM

Pantheism, from παν, all, and θεός, god, is a view of reality that tends to identify the world with God or God with the world. Pantheism is not so much a doctrine as it is the implication of views expressed in terms of the world, GOD, the ABSOLUTE, or infinity. It generally emphasizes the IMMANENCE of God in the world and deemphasizes, or ignores, His TRANSCENDENCE over the world. Since no one has as yet failed to make some distinction between transcendent and immanent aspects of infinite being, there never has been a complete and utter pantheism.

Scholastics tend to reduce pantheism to a form of ATHEISM on the ground that identification of God with the world implies the denial of Him as transcendent and really distinct from the world—a view fundamental to all forms of THEISM. However, the majority of those who are labeled pantheists manifest a strong religious commitment to God in one way or another; in fact, many of them are properly classified as religious thinkers. Again, views of reality termed pantheistic usually embody some limitation that effectively negates complete identification between God and the world. One such limitation now identifies itself as PANENTHEISM and claims many earlier thinkers as proponents. Beyond this, a more general element of restriction is found in MONISM, which distinguishes between absolute and FINITE BEING, but reduces one to an illusion or appearance of the other. Interpretations of such reductions, of course, differ widely.

Origins in the East. Throughout ancient Indian philosophy, with its direction toward self, themes occur that are clearly pantheistic. The general current of Vedic literature conveys the notion of a purely immanent deity (Purusa), frequently described as the whole of reality (see VEDAS). In the UPANISHADS, the notions of Brahman and Ātman are proposed as manifestations of the Absolute, Brahma being the objective evolutionary manifestation and Ātman the conscious or subjective manifestation. In idealistic interpretations of Upanishadic literature, the world is appearance or illusion (see MAYA RELIGION). In materialistic interpretations, the world is the reality; deity is impersonal, mythical, a manifestation of the world. Even the lofty Bhagavadgītā presents the Absolute as equally present in all things. Since JAINISM and BUDDHISM fully identify the Absolute with the world, their pantheism is at root atheistic.

In ancient Chinese thought, TAOISM, especially in doctrines of LAO-TZŪ, reflects a certain pantheism in that the Tao is said to have produced all things out of itself.

Greek and Roman Thought. Among the ancient Greeks, Xenophanes denounced the polytheism of his day but made God the totality of being. PARMENIDES extended this pantheism to an extreme monism expressed in terms of being and paralleling some of the ancient Hindu notions of the Absolute. This doctrine of Parmenides was developed by Melissus to include the notion of infinity. For these monists, changing reality was an illusion, much as it was for the idealistic interpreters of the Upanishads. On the other hand, HERACLITUS offered a monism in which permanence was the illusion and change the only reality. He called his primal fire Zeus, Logos, or Deity, and developed a doctrine similar to the almost contemporary Buddhist theory of “momentariness” (Kṣaṇabhangavāda). [See GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS).] Both Platonism and NEOPLATONISM evidence tendencies toward pantheism that derive from foundations in Plato’s thought. The relation between the doctrine of the One and that of Ideas suggests a similarity to the Hindu doctrine of Maya, where the only reality is God and everything else is merely an appearance. Centuries later, PLOTINUS reinforced this Platonic implication of pantheism with his own doctrine of EMANATIONISM, which gave inspiration to many later pantheists.

The STOICISM of Greece and Rome tried to overcome polytheism but seems have fallen short of theism and to have settled for pantheism. The Stoics maintained that the material alone was real, yet they looked upon God as the author of the world. For most of them God was the WORLD soul, and they described Him as fire, ether, air, mind, or combinations of these; in this sense the Stoic God was part of this world.

Non-Christian Medievals. Among the Hindus of the Middle Ages, Shaṅkara (788–820) tried to maintain the transcendence as well as the immanence of God, but his doctrines imply a limited variety of pantheism (panentheism) that accepts the Upanishadic notion of God as the lower Brahma (Īshvara) and immanent in the world. In the 12th century, Ramanuja also perceived the inadequacy of pure pantheism, identified Brahma as God and individual, but then regarded God as qualified by matter with souls constituting His body. A limiting factor in Ramanuja's thought is his notion that identity includes difference and unity includes diversity, much as this was later proposed by Hegel.

The Islamic philosopher ALFARABI, under the influence of the Neoplatonic Theologia Aristotelis and LIBER DE CAUSIS, combined the Aristotelian spheres with emanationism to maintain the existence of a supreme agent intellect from which all substantial forms were derived. No Arabian philosopher went further than Alfarabi, and most of them, including AVICENNA and AVERROËS, were saved from the pantheistic implications of their views by their concern for religious truth and the transcendence of God. (See ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY.)

While relatively little pantheism is found in Jewish thinkers of the time, one man stands out for his leanings in this direction, viz, AVICEBRON (ibn-Gabirol). He seems to have identified the matter of this world with God and to have reduced the doctrine of CREATION to a theory of emanation. Yet his attempt to unite the world and God in terms of Divine Wisdom or the Divine Word led many European scholars to regard him as a Christian. Avicbron exerted a strong influence also on the cabalists, a 13th-century group of mystics (see CABALA).

Christian Thinkers. Four distinct tendencies are apparent among the Christians of the Middle Ages. First there is that of the controversial JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA, the 9th-century Neoplatonist. In his Division of Nature, he made what seems to be a real distinction between God as the Creator and God as the end of all things—a distinction similar to Whitehead's antecedent and consequent God. For Eriugena, creation was a "theophany," a manifestation of God. Although this strongly resembles the Hindu doctrine of Maya, Eriugena clearly accepted the reality of both God and the world, and his pantheism (a matter of prolonged controversy) may be more a consequence of inadequate language than an attempt to identify the world with God.

Then, at the beginning of the 13th century, AMALRIC OF BÈNE made God the formal principle in all things by his notion that the Holy Spirit was the soul of the world, while DAVID OF DINANT presented a monistic and materialistic view of the world by identifying primary matter, mind, and God in the ancient Hindu tradition.

Thirdly, the thought of Meister ECKHART shows the influence of Neoplatonism on the highest levels of religious thought. For Eckhart, God transcends all concepts, even that of being, so that strictly He cannot be called a being. Yet Eckhart held that being flows eternally from God, and this led him to identify being with the Holy Spirit. Thus he tended to confuse ideas in the mind of God with the world itself, much as did Erigena.

Finally NICHOLAS OF CUSA, the leading Platonist of his day and a staunch believer in the orthodoxy of both Erigena and Eckhart, held that the world is explication of what is implication in God; God is infinitely one so that, in Him, all opposites are reconciled or overcome. Although Nicholas does mark God off from the world, his expressions have implications similar to the views of the ancient Hindus on the Absolute and of Plotinus on the One.

Renaissance and Reformation. Giordano BRUNO anticipated Spinoza in his monistic concept of substance: God is substantial nature. For him, God (natura naturans) is transcendent and beyond our knowledge; yet the world (natura naturata) is that into which the Infinite divides itself and is likewise infinite. Consequently there is a recurrent identification of God, as Nature, with the world, with God being the immanent principle as well as external cause of the universe.

In the 17th century, the Protestant mystic Jakob BÖHME exerted wide influence, especially on later German and Russian MYSTICISM. While his doctrine of external dualism suggests panentheism more than pure pantheism, Böhme viewed God as an evolutionary figure, sometimes nothing more than a divinity in man or his spiritual force.

Later in the same century, SPINOZA formulated his pantheism. His monistic approach to the notion of substance made the world attributes or modes of God. While he did use the term "creation," he also spoke of natura naturans and natura naturata in the same way as Bruno, with the same suggestion of emanationism. Thus, while Spinoza looked upon God as the cause of the world, immanent cause and nature are for him one in essence and identical with God.

It was during the 18th-century debate over religion that Toland actually introduced the terms “pantheism” and “pantheist”. Toland’s final view seems to have reduced God to the material universe and to have made Him little more than a mechanistic law of nature.

Transcendentalism and Idealism. Although KANT was not a pantheist, his idealistic IMMANENTISM did occasion in many of his followers a tendency toward pantheism. An interesting aspect of this development of transcendental IDEALISM was the great outpouring of ideas about God in the end of the 18th and beginning of the 19th centuries (see KANTIANISM; NEO-KANTIANISM).

Within the 19th century, SCHOPENHAUER distinctively and consciously took direction from Indian thinkers, principally from Buddhism. Although his philosophy tends toward atheistic Buddhism, Schopenhauer makes the world and man momentary reflections of a transcendent Will. His views of this absolute Will imply something more personal than mere force, even though he considered his pantheism as an atheism. Later FECHNER held that God is the totality of things as the infinite consciousness of the universe and a kind of world soul.

The transcendental EGOISM of FICHTE reduced God to moral order and an expression of the self. SCHELLING developed a bipolar approach like that used later by Whitehead and identified both the real and the ideal in the Absolute in a manner reflecting Böhme’s influence and the Upanishadic approach. While Hegelian monism—qualified by dialectical logic—seems more pantheistic than pantheistic, HEGEL regarded the Absolute as totally immanent to, and constantly developing in, human consciousness. Later FEUERBACH reduced the Absolute to a mere abstraction in his atheistic philosophy. The Russian mystic SOLOV’EV reflected the influence of Spinoza, Schopenhauer, and Buddhism; he proposed a spiritualistic personalism that drifted toward pantheism through its emphasis on the unity of all beings with the Divinity and its relatively uncritical notion of Godmanhood.

Recent Directions. Among significant contemporary thinkers, Spencer viewed God as some kind of physical force and the ground of evolution. Haeckel, while attempting to find some middle position between making God either extrinsic or intrinsic to the world, identified God with nature. For E. von HARTMANN, the Absolute was the Unconscious but also the principle of vitality in all things. H. Höffding offered a critical monism in which reality was one; yet for him the One is immanent in the many, although it transcends the many. Although PEIRCE admits a doctrine of creation, he seems to have looked upon God as a primordial element of the universe, an evolutionary principle within the world. William JAMES described his position as a kind of pantheism, not absolute and monistic, but rather a “finite pluralism” that provided for God’s being in the world but not as the only existing substance. For F. H. BRADLEY, the Absolute was the reality of things in their psychical existence. Josiah ROYCE considered God the absolute experience of which our minds were fragments; this absolute was infinite and all comprehensive.

Although BERGSON denied any suggestions of pantheism in his ideas, his doctrine of creative evolution is open to such implications. Samuel ALEXANDER identifies Deity as a quality of the world and goes on to consider the world as God’s body and Deity as God’s mind in much the same way as Upanishadic Hinduism. Because WHITEHEAD deliberately limited his pantheism through the instrumentality of Hegelian dialectics, he is more properly classified as a pantheist. BRIGHTMAN tried to limit his own tendency toward pantheism by negating absolute unity in God and by having God achieve his goals gradually. Weiss presents God as one of his modes of being; yet, in offering four coordinate and irreducible modes of being, he insists that each mode enters as part of the others.

Catholic Doctrine. Catholic teaching has always opposed the basic notions of pantheism. A personalistic religion, Catholicism upholds metaphysical reality of the individual, the spirituality but finitude of the human SOUL, and personal fulfillment through immortal union with God as an infinite and distinct personal being. All such ideas are suppressed or negated by pantheism.

From the Middle Ages to the present, the Church has concerned itself with pantheistic implications in the writings of individual thinkers such as Erigena, Eckhart, and Bruno. Yet a formal condemnation of pantheism as such was not made until Pius IX condemned pantheism by a decree of the Holy Office (1861), in his allocation Maxima quidem (1862), and in his “Syllabus of Errors” (1864) [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 2843, 2845, 2846, 2901]. Vatican Council I condemned it formally also (ibid. 3023–25). Under LEO XIII, the Holy Office again condemned such ideas as those implied in the works of ROSMINI-SERBATI (ibid. 3206, 3209, 3212–15). PIUS X, in his encyclical Pascendi, further warned against the implications of pantheism (ibid. 3477, 3486).

The fact that pantheistic leanings are found primarily among Catholic thinkers who are more mystical than doctrinal, and whose religious sincerity can hardly be questioned, may serve to explain why other views with pantheistic overtones have never been formally condemned.

Critical Evaluation. In criticizing pantheism, one should first acknowledge the religious fervor manifested in the works of most pantheists, their dislike of distinctions and abstract analysis, and a basic difficulty in their subject matter, viz, that it is impossible for finite minds to comprehend the infinity of God.

As a general criticism, pantheism negates or limits the excellence of God to the point where He does not seem to be a special and distinct being. The confusing element is that all pantheists use special terms, usually capitalized, such as God, the Absolute, the One, or the Infinite, and seemingly intend to denote a special being or, at least, a special mode of being that transcends other beings. Nevertheless, atheistic implications are almost always present, if only because the thinkers involved, in their religious enthusiasm, do not concern themselves with the theoretical implications of their statements.

Pantheists further fail to distinguish between cause and effect. They often speak of God as the cause of the world, but not as the efficient, extrinsic cause; rather they tend to reduce God to some kind of a material source of the universe. Such thinkers frequently substitute a doctrine of emanationism for creation, ignoring the notion of EFFICIENT causality—itsself basic to our understanding of the world.

Ignoring fundamental metaphysical distinctions, pantheists approach or discuss reality in a univocal, rather than an analogical, manner that does not take into account difference as well as sameness (see ANALOGY). In this respect, pantheism is too limited in its treatment of ultimate values. This limitation of viewpoint is reflected in the monism that is either explicit or implicit in pantheism. Where DUALISM seems to be accepted, one aspect is actually reduced to the other, considered as a mere manifestation of the other, or treated as an illusion.

Another confusion arises from the notion of transcendence, reduced by some pantheists to the potentiality of the world or of man. This view seems to contradict itself by establishing transcendence, which stands for perfection, as a mere extension of this world or finite beings in this world: both notions involve imperfection. Other pantheists look upon transcendence as the negation of all finite being to the degree that all perfections of finite being, such as PERSONALITY, immortality, and FREEDOM, become ultimately meaningless. Such reductions of transcendence to either superimmanence or negation cannot be accepted as reasonable.

Lastly, pantheism does not seem to grant the infinite positive value except as a mere quantitative inclusion of all things. It makes no distinction between actual infinity, which must be looked upon as pure perfection, and potential infinity, which involves incompleteness or imperfection. Reason demands that a superlative being—and the Infinite is presented by pantheists as superlative—be judged as actually and absolutely infinite.

Bibliography: C. N. BITTLE, God and His Creatures (Milwaukee 1953). F. J. THONNARD, A Short History of Philosophy, tr. E. A. MAZIARZ (rev. and correc. New York 1955). J. F. ANDERSON, The Bond of Being (St. Louis 1949). J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959). C. SHARMA, A Critical Survey of Indian Philosophy (London 1960). E. H. GILSON, Being and Some Philosophers (Toronto 1949). N. A. BERDIÁEV, The Russian Idea; tr. R. M. FRENCH (New York 1948; repr. pa. Boston 1962). C. HARTSHORNE and W. L. REESE, eds. Philosophers Speak of God (Chicago 1953). F. CLARK, "Pantheism and Analogy," The Irish Theological Quarterly 20 (1953) 24–38. J. BAYART, "Hindu Pantheism," Clergy Monthly Supplement 3 (1956) 102–108. E. A. PACE, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN, 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 11:447–450. F. A. SCHALCK, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1855–74.

[E. R. NAUGHTON]

PANVINIO, ONOFRIO

Antiquarian and historian; b. Verona, February 24, 1530; d. Palermo, April 7, 1568. Pavinio entered the Augustinian Order in his native city in 1541. In 1547 he was sent to Naples for studies, and in 1549, to Rome. While his first research was concerned with Roman antiquity, he also began to study church history. At the request of the Augustinian prior general, SERIPANDO, he compiled a chronicle of the order's history, published anonymously with the Augustinian Constitutions (Rome 1551). From 1554 until his death he was employed in the service of Cardinal Alessandro Farnese.

His Romani Pontifices et Cardinales (Venice 1557) aligned the sequence of the popes and cardinals. Among his works on Roman themes, the Fastorum Libri V (Venice 1558), which set in order the Roman consuls and emperors, was the most significant. He revised and updated Platina's Lives of the Popes (Venice and Cologne 1562; and Venice 1568). This work, accompanied by his ecclesiastical chronicle, was reissued in the original Latin and in translation up to the 18th century. A book of portraits of 27 popes from Urban VI to Pius V (Rome 1568) set the pattern for similar works. Major works, found only in manuscript, include a history of papal elections in ten volumes and the lives of the popes and cardinals, richly illustrated with portraits, coats-of-arms, and seals. At his premature death he left many incomplete works, including a history of the Church, intended to refute the CEN-TURIATORS OF MAGDEBURG, and a projected work on Roman antiquities in 100 volumes. His defense of the primacy of the papacy (Verona 1589) and other works have been edited posthumously up to recent times.

With the authorization of Pius IV, Panvinio visited sites throughout Italy to collect documents, inscriptions, and illustrations. Among his correspondents he counted leading scholars of the day: Antonio Agustín, Carlo Sigonio, Ottavio Pantagatho, Piero Vettori, and Vincenzo Borghini. Angelo Massarelli, secretary of the Council of Trent, supplied him with material derived from the papal archives. Although some writings betray hasty composition and lack of mature judgment, they preserve important sources. His descriptions of Roman churches remain valuable for art historians. His indefatigable labors in unearthing and organizing vast amounts of historical material have merited the admiration of later scholars, and Paul Fridolin Kehr notes that the history of papal diplomacy begins with Panvinio and Massarelli.

Bibliography: Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon, 7: 1486–1489. K. A. GERSBACH, “Onofrio Panvinio’s De comitiis imperatoris and Its Successive Revisions: Biographical Background and Manuscripts,” Analecta Augustiniana 53 (1990): 410–452; “Onofrio Panvinio and Cybo Family Pride in His Treatment of Innocent VIII and in the XXVII Pontificum Maximorum Elogia et Imagines,” Analecta Augustiniana 54 (1991): 117–141; “Onofrio Panvinio, OSA, and His Florentine Correspondents Vincenzo Borghini, OSB, Pietro Vettori, Francesco de’ Medici,” Analecta Augustiniana 60 (1997): 207–280. J.-L. FERRARY, Onofrio Panvinio et les Antiquités Romaines (Rome 1996). D. A. PERINI, Onofrio Panvinio e le sue opere (Rome, 1899); Bibliographia Augustiniana, 4 vols. (Florence 1929–1938) 3:53–65.

[K. A. GERSBACH]

PANZANI, GREGORIO

Secret papal agent in England (1634–36), Bishop of Mileto; b. date unknown; d. Mileto, Italy, 1662. When Henrietta Maria married Charles I in 1625, her godfather, previously nuncio in Paris, had become Pope Urban VIII. Urban sent a personal emissary to Henrietta, primarily to assess the papist situation in England. For this delicate mission, the pope’s nephew and secretary of state Francesco Barberini, who was also Cardinal Protector of England, chose Panzani, a former Oratorian. Panzani’s instructions were to try to settle sharp differences among the English Catholics, particularly between the secular and regular clergy (most of all, the Jesuits) on the need or expediency of having a bishop and on the lawfulness of taking the oath of allegiance to the king. Panzani was to look for signs, at court and among the Anglican clergy, of good will towards Rome. With this in mind he formed a close friendship with Sir Francis Windebank, secretary of state and a Crypto-Catholic enthusiastic for reunion. Both worked to establish an official exchange of agents between pope and queen. The latter’s first two candidates, Sir Robert Douglas and Sir Arthur Brett, both Catholics and approved by King Charles, died before taking up their appointments. Eventually, Sir William Hamilton, a distant relative of the king, was sent to Rome (June 1636). A month later George Con, a Scot long resident in Rome, arrived in London as Pope Urban’s agent to the queen. He was well received by Charles I and at once became popular in court and clerical circles. Panzani, who remained with him for six months, had meanwhile been sending fortnightly dispatches to Cardinal Barberini, reporting every sign of friendliness: the general esteem in which Pope Urban was held, particularly by the king; sermons preached by Anglican clergy attacking the Puritans or deploring the break with the Holy See; reunion talks with the Bishop of Chichester, who expressed his readiness to acknowledge the pope as Vicar of Christ; and suggestions for discussions in France between “moderate” Catholics and Anglicans. Panzani also sent Barberini a dossier on the two archbishops and 25 bishops of the Church of England, classifying the theological and personal attitude of each. Con’s dispatches after Panzani’s departure show that the Church of England would never reunite with the Holy See except on a basis of parity of rights, which Con at once made clear could never be. On his return to Rome, early in 1637, Panzani was made a canon of San Lorenzo in Damaso and a court judge. In August 1640, he became bishop of Mileto, where he remained until his death in 1662.

Bibliography: G. PANZANI, Memoirs, tr. J. BERINGTON (Birmingham, Eng. 1793). G. ALBION, Charles I and the Court of Rome (London 1935).

[G. ALBION]

PAPACY

This article treats of the development of the papacy (papatus) and the office of pope in five historical divisions: (1) the early period, to 590, (2) the medieval period, (3) the Renaissance and early modern period, (4) the modern period (1789–1958), and (5) the contemporary period (1958–2001).

1. Early Period.

At the earliest stage of the papacy’s development, two elements will be discussed: its Biblical foundations and its juristic complexion.

Biblical Foundations. The title deed of the papacy as an institution in its claim to universality in the spiritual sphere of government is found in two crucial passages of the New Testament. The one is the text of St. Matthew

Courtyard within the Pope's Palace (Palais des Papes), which was used by French popes during the Great Schism, Avignon, France.
(©Angelo Hornak/CORBIS)

(Mt 16.18–19), which traditional exegesis understands to have been a promise made by Christ to St. Peter; the other is the fulfillment of the promise contained in Christ's words to Peter: "Feed my sheep" (Jn 21.17). Both passages gave rise to the claim of two kinds of primacy (primatus) in the Roman Church: a magisterial and a jurisdictional primacy; the former is concerned with the final definition of doctrine and teaching; the latter, with government in the sense of a final decision. This article deals mainly with the jurisdictional aspect of the Roman Church, for it is in this function that the popes themselves saw the true nature and character of the papacy, and from the outset they considered that it was part of their duty to direct the path of organized Christianity. The essential point, which was invariably stressed by the papacy, was that in the Biblical passages, notably in the Matthean verses, Christ founded a new society, namely, the Church, and provided a government for the Church by conferring on Peter a fullness of power. It was a unique, creative act of Christ Himself. Further, since the Church was never, from the papal point of view, a merely spiritual or sacramental body, but an organized, visible, juristic, and corporate society that needed constant guidance for the realization of its aims, the conferment of governmental powers on Peter implicitly and necessarily contained the provision for a succession into these powers, specifically bestowed as they were on the Prince of the Apostles. In the consideration, therefore, of the governmental work of the papacy, the character of the body over which government was to be exercised and the divine establishment of that government must always be given due attention.

Juristic Complexion. That in the primitive Christian period the Roman Church was credited with an authority superior to that of any other patriarchal see, can be gathered from the letter written by Pope CLEMENT I (c. 92) to the Corinthians in which he made important statements concerning the nature of the Church and laid down principles that in embryonic form contained maxims of government. That in view of its location, the Roman Church was in actual fact credited with preeminence over other sees is a matter of history. Perhaps the most telling witness to this preeminence is Irenaeus (c. 180), who clearly stated that the Roman Church possessed potentior principalitas and that special importance attaches to the apostolicity of that Church. Numerous testimonies could be cited to prove the factual preeminence of the Roman Church. It is similarly a matter of history that in the early centuries of the Christian era there was no doctrinal elaboration of the jurisdictional position of the Roman Church. Its function as the supreme jurisdictional authority, though operative, did not become the subject of reflective thought before the end of the 4th century; at least there is no evidence to suggest the contrary. Actual proof of the function of the Roman Church as the institution charged with making Christian doctrine part of the social fabric is contained in the first extant decretal letter of a pope—that of Siricius, dispatched in 385 to Spain—which is an important legal document. It may be said that the period between Siricius and LEO I (440–461) was the period of gestation in the conceptual development of the Roman primacy. The juristic complexion of the papacy as an institution of government similarly finds a ready explanation in the location of the Roman Church. The form in which government was exercised was Roman, i.e., the Roman law and constitution served as models on which to formulate governmental principles and to transact governmental affairs. The matter was Biblical, i.e., the substance of the papal government principles and measures was derived from the Bible. It is therefore noteworthy that at exactly the time when Jerome took on the enormous task of rendering the Hebrew text of the Bible into Latin, the Roman Church had begun the process of entering fully into the life of contemporary society. Moreover, it was the legislation of THEODOSIUS the Great that made Christianity the official religion of the Roman Empire. There was a steady accumulation of papal decrees in the early fifth century; there was also a rapid development of concept and actions that, under Leo I, gave shape to a system culminating in the properly juristic function of the pope as successor of Peter. Nor should one underestimate in this historical process the factual, primatial position of the Roman Church, endorsed by the Roman synod of 380, which clearly stated the “double apostolicity” of this Church, i.e., the one Church that had been founded by the two Apostles, Peter and Paul. The Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon confirmed this development. Leo I’s supreme mastery of Roman law enabled him to construct the thesis of Peter’s function, and therefore that of the pope, in so satisfactory a way that it stood the test of time. The Roman Church had by right the primacy (principatus) because, according to Leo, the head of this Church was, though personally unworthy, the heir of St. Peter (indignus haeres beati Petri). In these two terms, coined by Leo, the whole papal program is epitomized. It was the merit of Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, to have recognized Christ at Caesarea Philippi, and because of this recognition Christ had distinguished him by conferring plenary powers on him. This was a special merit that belonged to Peter, personally, which meant that it could not be transmitted or conveyed to anyone else. But the functions, i.e., the powers given by Christ, were purely objective, and could be transmitted.

The large statue of St. Peter above a crowd of 350,000 people who came to receive the papal benediction of Easter Sunday. Photo by Massimo Ascani. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Illuminated manuscript from an Italian church depicting a papal scene. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

To explain this theme Leo utilized the Roman law of inheritance according to which the heir inherits all the deceased person’s assets and liabilities, though not his personal qualifications, distinctions, and merits. The powers given by Christ to Peter constituted an office that was indeed capable of being inherited. Hence, although the pope was heir to the full Petrine powers—the office of Peter as builder of the Church—he was unworthy as a person to wield the powers contained in that office. Leo’s doctrine therefore clearly distinguished between the person of the pope and the office itself—a distinction with far-reaching consequences. What mattered for purposes of government was the office, and not the personal character of the individual pope. He may personally have been a saint, a mediocrity, or even a scoundrel; all this was of no interest, as many popes pointed out. The essential point was that the pope succeeded into the powers of Peter, and the totality of powers constituted, according to Leo, a fullness of power—plenitudo potestatis. Consequently, there was, as far as the scope and extent of powers went, identity between Peter and the pope. This identity placed a great burden of responsibility upon the pope, because his verdicts, judgments, and pronouncements took effect in this world as well as in the next; hence the frequently stated gravissimum pondus of responsibility upon papal shoulders. The so-called automatism of papal plenitude of power, as conceived by Leo, was to be a hallmark of papal thought throughout the Middle Ages. There was no tribunal and no higher court that could subject papal rulings to a revision; nor did an appeal lie from a papal decision to any other authority or court. This explains the later emergence of the view that the decrees of general COUNCILS acquire their validity through papal sanction, either in the convocation of the council or in posterior approval. It explains also why in the Middle Ages an appeal from the papacy's judgment to a general council was branded as a sign of heresy. In short, the pope was the point of intersection between heaven and earth. There is no intermediary between pope and Peter: no pope qua pope succeeds his predecessor, but succeeds Peter directly, again a principle of the papacy that has stood the test of time.

The Leonine thesis brings into clear relief the properly conceived monarchic institution of the papacy according to which the sum total of powers is in the hands of the pope. Therefore, one can speak of a vertical or descending concept of government, because whatever power is found in the Church, in the congregation of the faithful, is conceptually derived from the pope: hence the early pictorial representation of the Roman Church as the source of a river. This theme has particular relevance for episcopal power, which only later was formally held to have been dependent on the pope for its exercise of jurisdiction. In other words, the bishop was called upon to participate in the papal solicitude for all Christians, but not in the papal plenitude of power. The principatus Romanae ecclesiae was the usual designation for this monarchic conception. The exercise of this papal principatus had, however, exclusive reference to government, i.e., to jurisdiction, the final verdict arrived at by the law and exhibiting effects solely by means of the law. Correctly understood, the pope as monarchic governor (gubernator), and in his function as pope, stands outside and above the Church that was entrusted to him, and this idea was expressed by the maxim papa a nemine iudicatur. Although this statement was made at the beginning of the sixth century in a spurious document, the idea itself was considerably older, as is proved by a similar statement of Pope ZOSIMUS. In modern terminology this concept is called absolute sovereignty (superioritas), a notion that can likewise be found in the medieval concept of kingship. Further, because the pope in his official capacity is identical with Peter, the principle of the infallibility of certain papal pronouncements finds its ready explanation. As heir to Petrine powers, a pope cannot pronounce erroneously in matters of faith and morals. Therefore, no pope could or did say that any of his predecessors had erred in doctrine, because the consequence would have been that Peter himself had been the victim of error. A further consequence of the fundamental Leonine position was that the pope claimed, by virtue of his function, to be endowed with an auctoritas sacrata, i.e., a supreme and final authority, in which concept a number of charismatic qualities are discernible. The secular power, on the other hand, possessed a regal power (potestas regalis). As a result of the spread of Christianity amongst the barbarian nations, the papacy thus became the primary instrument in propagating the idea that civilized government could be conducted solely by means of law. In other words, the papacy, itself the heir of the ancient Roman principle of the superiority of law, utilized this idea in the interests of the whole Christian community while pursuing its evangelical mission. In this lies one of the great historic achievements of the papacy.

A portion of "The Line of Popes," a series of woodcut figures by Anton Koberger, appearing on the borders of the pages of "World Chronicle" by Hartmann Schedel, 1493, printed in Nuremberg, Germany.

In order to understand the full import of the terms auctoritas and potestas, adapted to ecclesiastical usage by Leo I, then by GELASIUS I, one should realize that the second half of the fifth century witnessed an acceleration of the monarchic program by the imperial government at CONSTANTINOPLE. At the same time the papacy, as a result of Leo's clear exposition of the Petrine function of the pope, acquired the means, i.e., the legal principles with which to combat the ever-increasing claims of the imperial government. The papacy was now faced with the necessity of challenging the validity and legality of imperial measures that, in its opinion, fell outside the scope of imperial functions. In so doing, the papacy was forced to declare itself on certain vital governmental points; and throughout its long and checkered history in the Middle Ages it never deviated from them. The imperial government had gone so far as to decree the faith and doctrine of Christians and to intervene drastically in the ecclesiastical organism by appointing and dismissing prelates. Armed with the primatial doctrine of Leo, the papacy issued its serious challenge to the imperial government and raised the question whether the emperor was suitably qualified to direct the body under his control in the manner in which he did, and by what authority he did so. Although the emperors acted in the belief that it was their duty as divinely appointed rulers to direct the Empire in all its vital aspects, the papacy maintained that the direction of the body of Christians, i.e., the Church, must be in the hands of those who were specially qualified to carry out this function. The definition of dogma, fixing the purpose and aim of Christian life, and the organization of the Church were the right and duty of the papacy, and not of the imperial government. The papal position, arrived at in the late fifth century and adhered to throughout subsequent centuries, was that the overall direction, the final authority in matters that affected the vital interests and the structural fabric of the Church—in short the auctoritas sacrata—belonged by virtue of his function solely to the pope. He was instituted as the “builder of the Church” and had to lead the faithful to their end, and the means to this was the law. The emperor, though clearly also instituted by God, had different functions in Christian society, and as a Christian actually belonged to the body entrusted by Christ to Peter's successor. He had a potestas regalis, i.e., power to act within the framework of his divine trust, or as Gelasius I said, the emperor's duty was to learn (discere), not to teach (docere), in the religious sphere. What the papacy here laid down was nothing less than the principle of division of labor and of respective spheres of power. This Leonine-Gelasian program received precision in the subsequent development, notably through ISIDORE OF SEVILLE and above all through GREGORY VII, according to whom the potestas regalis existed to supplement the word of the sacerdotium by regal power so as to eradicate evil. But since evil (sin) was prompted by the devil, God Himself had instituted secular government for the purpose of exterminating evil. It is thus clear that from the fifth century onward the papacy adhered to a teleologically conceived system of government.

The firm stand taken by FELIX III and Gelasius I in the matter of the imperially imposed HENOTICON, dealing with a doctrinal matter, led to the first serious schism between East and West (see ACACIAN SCHISM), lasting some 30 years. A settlement was reached between the Emperor JUSTIN I and Pope HORMISDAS in 519.

Subsequent development was to show that the theory of government in Constantinople culminated in the concept of the emperor as priest and king, the former admittedly only in an external sense, yet in a manner that seriously infringed the exercise of papal primatial rights. This was especially true during the reign of JUSTINIAN I, which brought so-called CAESAROPAPISM to its apogee. The position of the papacy was difficult: the city of Rome and the whole of Italy were parts of the Empire and the popes themselves civil subjects of the emperor. Though fundamentally Constantinople recognized the primacy of the pope, the imperial government left no doubt about the final direction of the Christian body politic. The dilemma was most serious: if the popes remonstrated against the regal-sacerdotal decrees of the imperial government and insisted upon the exercise of Roman primacy, they ran the risk of committing the crimen laesae majestatis against the emperor. If they acquiesced, they became unfaithful to their own vocation and duty. (In this connection see VIGILIUS, POPE.) It is at this juncture in the late sixth century that the truly historic significance of GREGORY I emerges.

2. Medieval Period

The medieval papacy logically built on the premises inherited from its immediate past.

Gregory I to Gregory VII. Gregory I had been papal representative (apocrisarius) to the imperial court for a number of years before his election to the papacy. While at Constantinople he reached the conclusion that the regal-sacerdotal idea of government was so firmly entrenched there that, however regrettable this state of affairs, it would be futile and dangerous to press the Roman primatial claim against the East. As long as the popes were subjects of the Empire, they were exposed to serious charges if they insisted upon the exercise of their primatial rights because in their civil capacity they were under the emperor. But if they were to act as popes in regions where the imperial writ did not run, they could press the primatial claim to its fullest extent. In this realization lies Gregory I's historic importance: he never acquiesced in or approved of the imperial theory, but accepted reality and, with the history of the sixth century before his eyes, logically concluded that the future held no promise for the papacy in the East. Gregory I opened up the West to the papacy by his missions to Gaul and England. In these areas, from the outset, papal jurisdiction was exercised without reference to Constantinople. It was, in actual fact, from the farthest corner of medieval Europe, the British Isles, that the historic conversion of the Germans took place. Anglo-Saxon missionaries not only established close relations between England and the papacy, but they also were instrumental in forging the strong links between the FRANKS and the papacy, links that were to give medieval Europe its specific character. It cannot be said that the papacy in the seventh century inherited Gregory's vision and appreciation of the historical situation, since it was difficult for the popes in this century to break with established traditions. Of these none was stronger than the ubiquity of Romanitas: Rome was Roman, the papacy was Roman, and the Empire was Roman. And yet the imperial government advanced more and more on the road that had so alarmed the papacy. The period was indeed a heroic age of the papacy, which suffered for its principles in the face of imperial encroachment upon religious and ecclesiastical policy. When after the turn of the century the imperial government promoted ICONOCLASM by legislation, GREGORY II openly challenged Constantinople. Indeed, if the papacy wished to live up to its vocation, two alternatives were open. The pope would have to remove himself physically from Rome and reside among "the barbarians," or the city of Rome with its surrounding districts would have to be withdrawn from imperial control. The first alternative was certainly in the mind of Gregory II when he issued in 729 his challenge to the Emperor LEO III. But it was abandoned for excellent reasons. As later events were to show, the papacy, deprived of its historic and natural surroundings, would become the pawn of contending territorial factions. There remained the other alternative that was adopted by STEPHEN II (III). When Rome was threatened by the Lombards, he appealed to PEPIN, King of the Franks. The background of this crucial step was the sanction given by Pope ZACHARY to the deposition of the last Merovingian king, Childeric III. The papal sanction was based on the principle that only he should be effective king who was useful—and about the uselessness of Childeric there was no doubt. Later GREGORY VII was to utilize this principle fully. Stephen's appeal culminated in his journey to Ponthion in Gaul (Epiphany 754) where he made clear to Pepin that the Lombards had conquered and stolen territory that by right belonged to St. Peter and hence to the pope. The document that was to support this papal claim of ownership was the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE. Although the ostensible reason for this appeal was the restitution of stolen property, a real motive was the establishment of a territorial entity in central Italy, independent of Constantinople. In two campaigns (754 and 756) Pepin drove the LOMBARDS out and made over the territories to the pope. The document was deposited at the Confession of St. Peter and established the STATES OF THE CHURCH (Patrimonium beati Petri), which were to last until 1870. A most powerful link was forged between the new and virile Frankish dynasty and the papacy, a link that was to endure through the Middle Ages and beyond. The emergence of the papacy as an independent entity gave rise to a number of institutional changes: the regulation of papal elections (769), confining this function to the Roman clergy; notice of the elections was no longer to be sent to Constantinople, but to the Frankish court; papal coins were now struck; and the popes abandoned the dating of their documents according to imperial years.

The papacy had won freedom of action and was, so to speak, master in its house. The last chapter in the direct relations between Constantinople and the papacy in the eighth century was the coronation of Pepin's son, CHARLEMAGNE, upon whom Pope LEO III conferred the imperial crown, making him thereby emperor of the Romans.

This coronation had far-reaching results. It set a precedent for the papacy insofar as no pope had ever crowned an emperor in Rome; the title deed for the pope's action was at least implied in the Donation of Constantine. And as there could not be two emperors of the Romans, the Eastern emperor was degraded to a mere "king of the Greeks" whose orthodoxy was in any case rather suspect; the Roman imperial crown was where the pope wished it to be. Although Charlemagne himself had reservations regarding this papal notion, it subsequently came to be accepted in the West, though never in the East. What is remarkable and what explains the eventual victory of the papacy is the dynamic initiative that the papacy in the earlier Middle Ages had firmly kept in its hands. Throughout the ninth century small but significant elements were added, e.g., the combination of coronation and anointing in one ceremony when STEPHEN IV crowned Louis I emperor of the Romans at Reims in 816; and the subsequent coronation in 823, which was performed in St. Peter's basilica, henceforth the rightful place for imperial coronations, and at which for the first time a sword was conferred on the emperor as part of the coronation ceremonial. It was in the ninth century that the pope appeared as the constituent organ of Roman emperors, a function that enormously added to the prestige of the papacy. Other factors not of its own making, but nevertheless potently assisting the papacy in its growth, were the troubles of succession during Louis I's reign, the FALSE DECREALS, the brisk conciliar activity in the Frankish domains, and the general unrest in the Frankish empire—all of which likewise served to make the papacy the rallying point of Christian civilization in the ninth century. The papacy was in a position to state or to restate and define its fundamental principles in numerous letters and decrees, notably those of NICHOLAS I and JOHN VIII. The papacy's relations with the East, especially as a result of PHOTIUS' attitude, worsened considerably when Nicholas I had opportunity to elaborate the primatial function of the papacy vis-à-vis the recalcitrant Eastern patriarch. But precisely because the papacy had established closest links with the Frankish dynasty, the collapse of that power had repercussions on the papal institution itself. The history of the papacy in the tenth century proves that it was still partly in the hands of the Roman nobility and partly in the hands of the newly risen Saxon dynasty in Germany. OTTO I, though humbly supplicating for the imperial crown, treated the Roman Church as if it were a German PROPRIETARY CHURCH. The essence of this system was lay patronage exercised to a degree that violated basic principles of Church government, above all, those relating to the conferment of the ecclesiastical office itself. Otto I applied this even to the papacy itself in his so-called Ottomanum (963) and imposed severe restrictions on the freedom of the papal electors, with equal severity circumscribing the governmental activity of the papacy. At the same time, however, the personalities and lives of the popes in the tenth century inspired little reverence and still less respect for the successors of Peter. Nevertheless, the papacy, despite the low moral standard of individual popes, kept the program alive. In this period the coronation rites were greatly improved and embodied the traditional papal theme of the emperor as the organ of government specifically created on a universal scale and charged with specific tasks mentioned in the ceremony. However low the virtues of the popes, the papacy as an institution was none the worse for it; it continued to develop internally and to promote its principles, at least programmatically. Perhaps at no other time in its long history has the papacy so much profited from the Leonine distinction between person and office.

Hildebrandine Era. The overbearing power of the Saxon and early Salian emperors had prevented the papacy from translating its principles into reality. During this period popes were made and unmade by the emperors, who, inspired as they were by the CLUNIAN REFORM, certainly were convinced that they acted in the interests of Christendom and of the papacy. The premature death of HENRY III (1056) and the minority of his son, HENRY IV, provided the papacy with the long-sought opportunity for implementing basic principles of government. The Papal CURIA was assisted in this process by the influx of a number of outstanding men from beyond the Alps, who were mainly responsible for the cosmopolitan outlook characteristic of the papacy in the eleventh century. Perhaps nothing reflects better the new attitude of the papacy than the numerous institutional measures initiated, developed, or modified in the second half of the eleventh century. One of the first measures was the passing of the PAPAL ELECTION DECREE in April 1059. The significance of this decree lies partly in its adoption and refinement of the procedure envisaged in 769 and partly in the abolition of the obnoxious Ottomanum. With this decree the college of CARDINALS came into being as the advisory body of the pope. The same year witnessed the first coronation of the pope (NICHOLAS II), which, though not an essential element in his assumption of power, was nevertheless a symbolic means of presenting the pope in his monarchic status, and was readily understood by contemporaries. The wide-flung policy of the pre-Gregorian papacy necessitated the institution of the legatine system, since the legates functioned as the prolonged arms of the pope and could be in constant touch with faraway bishops, princes, and governments. The legates were also a guarantee that papal instructions were carried out. Because of the papacy's wide European connections a number of new departments came into being, and old ones were adapted to the exigencies of the time. Of these departments, none was more important than the chancery, which became the very nerve center of the Christian body politic. The residence of the pope, the Lateran, was reconstituted and here a number of new departments came to be greatly developed, especially the financial and judicial. From this time onward the papacy also began to harness FEUDALISM to its governmental scheme. The enfeoffment of the Normans in 1059 started the long line of papal feudal contracts, so that by the end of the following century the Papal Curia had more feudal vassals than any other European court. In strictest theory the feudal lord was not the pope, but St. Peter himself, on whose behalf the pope acted. Some of the feudal services could be rendered by money payment (feodum censuale) in the place of the usual military service. The governmental scheme of the papacy was above all in need of a law. Hitherto there was no single law of the Church, and it was the acute realization of Gregory VII, when he was still Archdeacon Hildebrand, that the Roman Church as a governmental institution needed a legal code that was specifically related to the papacy. His impetuous demand to some of his colleagues in the Curia resulted in a spate of canonical collections of which the common feature was the emphasis on the primatial position of the Roman Church. This was the beginning of the legal development that culminated in the Decretum of Gratian in the twelfth century. It should be pointed out, however, that all these collections of Canon Law were private efforts and did not receive official papal sanction.

The pontificate of Gregory VII demonstrated for the first time the practical application of papal principles of government: the papacy had now entered upon the path of effective rulership by means of the law. Although there was at first not much tangible success for the papacy, a number of important principles were clearly reformulated and restated and came to be subsequently the pillars of the papal government: the exaction of the episcopal oath of obedience, the enforcement of episcopal visits to Rome (visitatio liminum apostolorum), stern prohibition of SIMONY and lay INVESTITURE, the enforcement of celibacy, and appeals to the Roman Curia. In the exercise of its governmental functions the papacy made known and acted upon the principle that the life of a Christian on earth determined his life in the other world, i.e., obedience to papal law was an indispensable condition for salvation, and that the material things of this world had merely auxiliary value insofar as they assisted the realization of the Christian's true aim—salvation. Resting upon this basic principle, amply supported as it was by the Bible, patristic lore, and earlier papal doctrine, the papacy could not and did not attribute inherent value to matter (the temporal) as such, but merely recognized its function as a means to an end. From this arose the claim, again pursued and acted upon by the papacy, that the end determined the use of material things—from the Christian teleological standpoint a perfectly understandable thesis. Precisely because the papacy was the divinely instituted government of the Christian world, its opponents, especially kings and emperors, could make little headway against it; they had little with which to answer the papal arguments of governing a Christian world. For the papal principles of government were basically rooted in the concept of the Church as the congregation of the faithful, entrusted by Christ to the pope through St. Peter and ruled by Peter's successor. Its end was otherworldly, and none other than the holder of the keys of the kingdom of heaven knew by virtue of his special qualification how to achieve this end. Kings and emperors were indubitably members of the Church and as such were subject to papal jurisdiction. They had, moreover, as their title "king by the grace of God" made clear, received their kingdom as a trust from God for the sake of actualizing Christian principles. Who else but the pope was the proper organ to watch over the discharge of this trust? From the medieval-historical point of view these papal principles of government exhibited extraordinary consistency and logical coherence. Nonetheless, censorious criticism has often been directed against both the principles themselves and their application by contemporaries as well as by modern critics. Their observations culminate in the assertion that the papacy, by dealing with temporal matters, became oblivious of its primary function as a spiritual organ. The point, however, to which insufficient attention and importance is attached by the critics of the papal government at work, is that the Church was an earthly society held together by faith in Christ as well as a society that by virtue of the same faith pursued otherworldly aims. This dual nature of the Church—an organic, visible, and juristic body, as well as a sacramental society—makes understandable the exercise of governing powers by the papacy. But there is no statement or action by any medieval pope that justified papal jurisdiction solely on grounds that were or could be considered purely temporal. What the medieval papacy at all times insisted upon was the application of the teleological principle. No criterion has ever been formulated according to which the spiritual could be separated from the temporal. Indeed, in a Christocentric society this separation could not conceptually come about: the categorization of human activities into religious, moral, or political is of post-medieval origin, while in the Middle Ages the Christian was viewed from no other standpoint than that of Christianity.

The schism between East and West (see EASTERN SCHISM) had already moved Gregory VII to issue an appeal for a crusade. URBAN II succeeded in bringing about the CRUSADE, in itself a major undertaking, which released the first large-scale mass movement in the Middle Ages. The resistance to Islam and the liberation of the holy places from Seljuk oppressions were most pressing and urgent motives. Meanwhile the problem of lay investiture by king or emperor was settled on a somewhat pragmatic basis, first in France, shortly followed by the compromise reached with England, and lastly with the German Emperor in the Concordat of WORMS (1122). The principles for which Gregory VII had fought gradually received recognition: the subsequent period saw the highest ascendancy of the medieval papacy. The so-called First LATERAN COUNCIL of 1123 is counted as the first general council of the Middle Ages, soon to be followed by the second in 1139 and the third in 1179. Each was held under the presidency of the pope and issued numerous and fundamental decrees regulating virtually all aspects of public and social life. Now that canonistic scholarship also had come into being at the University of BOLOGNA, the papacy was in a position to call upon well-trained jurists for all its essential departments, and with ALEXANDER III the long and distinguished line of jurist-popes began. The outstanding features of the twelfth-century papacy were its considerable legal output in decretals and its successful fight against the new and overbearing Staufen dynasty in Germany as well as against other kings, notably HENRY II of England, who resisted the full implementation of papal principles of government. Another feature of the twelfth century was the stand taken against emerging heresies, notably those of the Waldenses and the Cathari, who showed a keen spirit of resistance to papal law and order. These successes of the papacy are all the more remarkable as a considerable period of Alexander III's pontificate was marred by a pernicious schism, engineered and sustained by the Staufen Frederick I. The work of the papacy in the twelfth century also entailed institutional changes: the systematization of the legatine machinery, the chancery, and appellate jurisdiction; the emergence of new papal documents to cope with the increased output; the regulation of the papal election procedure and the introduction of the two-thirds majority for a valid election; the introduction of regular meetings of pope and cardinals (the consistory) in which fundamental questions were discussed and decided; the reorganization of the financial departments of the Curia by outstanding chamberlains.

Zenith of the Medieval Papacy. With the accession of INNOCENT III in 1198, the papacy entered upon its most splendid period. A man of great learning and vision, a first-class jurist with an enormous working capacity, he reconstituted the papal state and clarified the vital relations between the papacy and Sicily. His dealings with the disputed succession in Germany are a model of astute diplomacy; he made kingdoms (such as Bulgaria, England, and Portugal) fiefs of the papacy; he was highly successful in bringing back to the fold a number of heretical sects; he witnessed the fall of Constantinople in 1204 and became instrumental in establishing a Latin ecclesiastical organization in the Near East; in the regular consistory meetings his legal acumen shone forth; he prevented tension between the episcopacy and the papacy from deteriorating into rebellion. Almost all the PAPAL REGISTERS of his pontificate have been preserved. The Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 under his presidency marked the zenith of papal power in the Middle Ages. More than 1,200 participants attended this assembly, and its legislation was to exercise an influence beyond the medieval period. During this pontificate, the first official collection of CANON LAW was published by Innocent himself (1209). In short, the papacy had reached the status of a universal power, not only in name but also in fact, taking an active part in every department of public life.

In many respects the history of the papacy in the thirteenth century is an appendix to the Innocentian pontificate. Under HONORIUS III the new MENDICANT ORDERS were established and emerged as great civilizing and pastoral agencies in medieval Europe and beyond. In this pontificate the Staufen king, FREDERICK II, was crowned emperor (November 1220), and on this occasion Frederick issued a number of laws dealing with the menace of heresy. Throughout the thirteenth century the papacy refined and expanded its principles and institutions. New institutions developed in this period had a significant bearing upon the making of modern international law, e.g., the protection of legates and their safe conduct; the sanctity of treaties; proper treatment of hostages, prisoners, and exiles. As a universal power the papacy was in a position to command kings and other secular princes to take steps against heretics, to allot territory to a victorious belligerent party, to depose rulers and establish others in their place, and to take (especially in Eastern Europe) effective steps in organizing diocesan structures. The papacy, now ruled by some of its ablest lawyer-popes, such as INNOCENT IV, had to face the full rigor of the conflict with Frederick II. In the First Council of LYONS (1245) Innocent excommunicated and deposed the emperor; this step resulted in an anarchic interregnum in Germany, lasting some 30 years. The same Council also promulgated disciplinary decrees that remained in force until 1918. The Second Council of Lyons (1274) under GREGORY X witnessed the temporary union between the Eastern and the Latin Churches (see ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT), and among other decrees issued an important one on papal elections: the practice hitherto observed in holding elections in CONCLAVE was turned into law. Among the institutional measures developed in the 13th century were those concerned with papal PROVISIONS, reservations, expectancies, collations, and the regularization of papal taxation. In its attempt to combat HERESY, the papacy under GREGORY IX instituted the INQUISITION, a special tribunal directly subordinated to the pope. There are many explanations for the increase of heresy throughout Europe, but as far as the papacy itself was concerned, one measure that seems to have engendered most opposition was the ready exercise of papal plenitude of power through ecclesiastical censures, which, though not misused nor abused, was certainly over used and thus became blunted. The theme of papal plenitude of power was not a problem of theology or law, but one concerned with handling power wisely and prudently.

The papacy was at all times, if not the begetter, at any rate a strong supporter of the universities. Toulouse and Rome saw the establishment of seats of learning by the papacy, which had always entertained amicable relations with the older universities, such as Bologna and Paris, and with the more recent foundations as well. Nevertheless, the spirit of inquiry promoted in the universities released forces that in their full maturity contributed to the diminution of papal authority in the following decades. Above all, the rediscovery of ARISTOTLE and of his corpus of thought and the awakening of a national spirit in the individual kingdoms, notably in France, brought about a considerable estrangement between the papacy and the faithful in general. By virtue of its commanding governing position in Europe, the papacy had perforce to deal with a number of issues that were not always properly explained nor adequately understood by the faithful. Unwittingly thereby the papacy aroused antagonism and resistance in quarters that were basically by no means antipapal. Moreover, in the conflict between the papacy under BONIFACE VIII and the French king, Philip IV, the former had failed to realize the strength and influence of the new forces. Instead, he relied for his arguments almost exclusively on traditional (Roman) doctrine which was largely conceived within the framework of the imperial government, but which made little impression on national kingdoms, such as France. That the papacy suffered defeat in this conflict was not the fault of Boniface VIII (who brought forth no argument that had not been advanced before), but arose partly from the loss of dynamic initiative by the papacy throughout the second half of the thirteenth century and partly from its underestimating the power and strength of "mere" kings. Precisely because the papacy concentrated so much on the Empire, European kings had been able to strengthen their position, virtually unimpeded by the papacy. It would be erroneous, nevertheless, to say that the papacy after Boniface became virtually a French satellite because it took up residence at Avignon for the following 70 years (see AVIGNON PAPACY). That the papacy under CLEMENT V assisted in the suppression of the TEMPLARS in France was due to papal timidity and to a number of circumstances over which the papacy had no control.

Decline of Papal Authority. It is worth pointing out that by the middle of the thirteenth century the papacy had reached its apogee of authority, influence, and prestige in Europe. There can be no doubt that the secret of its success had been an unyielding adherence to its program and the pursuit of dynamic and constructive policies that contributed to the welding of Europe into one more or less coherent whole. Apart from the factors already mentioned as contributing to the papacy's decline, there were others, such as opportunism; the ad hoc adjustment of some vital principles to emerging situations; the frequently questionable conferment of benefices by way of reservation, collation, and postulation; the incidence of very high taxation; the underestimation of new forces; and the blunting of papal censures through overuse. More and more Europe disintegrated into its national component parts, and the role of the papacy as a supraregal governmental organ was considerably modified: what came to count more and more was the law of the national kingdoms and less and less the law of the papacy. The development of political thought proper—one of the by-products of the renewed study of Aristotle and of the revival of Roman law—also must be reckoned as a contributory factor in the decline of papal authority. For this development led to the conceptual elaboration of a dualism of public bodies, i.e., the State as a product of nature and the Church as a supranatural product. This dualism found its reflection in the view—advocated particularly by MARSILIUS OF PADUA—that only the laws of the State were true, enforceable laws, while the laws of the Church were not, strictly speaking, laws, but statements to which a merely persuasive force could be attributed. Law was, according to this thesis, the expression of the will of the people, and because the pope was said to be the head of a divinely instituted society, his decrees could assume the character of law only if the people (or the State) so willed it. The Avignon papacy was very much overshadowed by these and similar doctrines, which to some extent influenced even the Curia itself; the monarchical function of the pope came to be questioned, with the consequence that the college of cardinals assumed greater powers. Electoral CAPITULATIONS were a clear symptom of the tension between pope and cardinals. Similarly, the WESTERN SCHISM was a symptom of unresolved constitutional conflicts resulting in the emergence of conciliarism, which saw its victory in the Council of Constance.

Eve of the Reformation. The election of MARTIN V meant not only the end of the schism, but also the beginning of an era in which the papacy was to recoup a good deal of its lost prestige. The reestablishment of the papal state, which had sunk into anarchy, was taken in hand, and so was the fight against the HUSSITES. As all traces of conciliarism had not been wiped out, Martin, in implementing the decrees of Constance, convoked a new synod at Pavia for April 1423, but shortly afterward transferred it to Siena. This council produced none of the necessary reform decrees, and a new council was summoned to BASEL in 1431. Meanwhile the new pope, EUGENE IV, showed little taste for bowing to conciliarism. The much desired reformatio in capite as well as the reforms of the clergy, of papal taxation, elections, reservations, etc., brought about such serious tension that an open breach resulted. One part of the council was transferred to Ferrara in 1437, while the other remained at Basel. The Council of Ferrara was recognized as the legitimate continuation of the original Council of Basel and counts as the seventeenth general council of the Church. Its great success, however temporary, was the union between the Latin and Greek Churches, eventually achieved at FLORENCE in 1439. The papacy also provided a great stimulus to the revival of Greek studies and thus in a way assisted in the birth of the RENAISSANCE. A great preoccupation of the fifteenth-century papacy was the threat to the West by the advance of the Turks, who, since the fall of Constantinople in 1453, were justifiably considered a menace to Christianity. In the second half of the century, the papacy became very active in the promotion of a crusade against Islam, though circumstances were no longer propitious for its execution. A further notable achievement was the arrangement of concordats with secular governments; in fact, since the fifteenth century, this form of treaty came to be the modus by which the relations between the papacy and states were regulated on an international scale. A good part of the city of Rome was rebuilt during this century under the aegis of the papacy, and above all, plans of rebuilding St. Peter's, the papal library, and the Vatican were actively taken in hand, though the moving spirit behind these plans, NICHOLAS V, did not live to see the fruit of his planning. The vision of the papacy had nevertheless become restricted: it was Rome and to a certain extent Italy that almost exclusively preoccupied papal interest, and far less the universal tasks in which the papacy traditionally saw its foremost mission. Moreover, the personal character of some of these popes was far from approaching the customary bearing of St. Peter's successors, and it is understandable that the institution of the papacy should have suffered from them, although the cataclysm into which Europe was thrown after the turn of the century was due only to a very small degree, if at all, to the personal bearing of these popes. What they made abundantly clear on an objective level was that the office of the supreme pontiff must be separated from his personality, as indeed Leo I had proclaimed exactly a millennium earlier. It was on this distinction between office and person that the papacy had actively entered the historic scene in that age, and it was on that distinction that the papacy as an institution successfully recovered from the depth into which it had been plunged by the popes of the late fifteenth century.

Bibliography: H. VON SCHUBERT, Geschichte der christlichen Kirche im Frühmittelalter (Tübingen 1921). L. NINA, Le finanze pontificie nel medioevo, 3 v. (Milan 1929–32). H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 102–32). E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den anfangen bis zur höhe der Weltherrschaft, 2 v. (Tübingen 1930–33). W. E. LUNT, ed. and tr., Papal Revenues in the Middle Ages, 2 v. (New York 1934). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABOL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1111–1345. V. MARTIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1877–1944. G. GLEZ, ibid. 13.1:247–344. F. COPPA, ed. Encyclopedia of the Vatican and Papacy (London 1999). E. EICHMANN, Die Kaiserkrönung im Abendland, 2 v. (Würzburg 1942); Weihe und Krönung des Papstes im Mittelalter (Munich 1951). R. ENO, The Rise of the Papacy (Wilmington, Delaware 1990). A. FORTESCUE, The Early Papacy: To the Synod of Chalcedon in 451, 3rd ed. by S. REID (Southampton 1997). J. GAUDEMET, La Formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'église aux IV<sup>e</sup> et V<sup>e</sup> siècles (Paris 1957). P. GRELOT, "Pierre et Paul, fondateurs de la 'primaute' romaine," Istina 27 (1982) 228–68. L. HERTLING, Communio: Church and Papacy in Early Christianity (Chicago 1972). P. JOHNSON, The Papacy (New York 1997). W. LADUE, The Chair of St. Peter: A History of the Papacy (New York 1999). J. LORTZ, Geschichte der Kirche in ideengeschichtlicher Betrachtung (21st ed. Münster 1962– ) v.1. H. RAHNER, Kirche und Staat im frühen Christentum: Dokumente aus acht Jahrhunderten und ihre Deutung (Munich 1961). B. SCHIMMELPFENNIG, The Papacy (New York 1992). W. ULLMANN, Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages (New York 1961); The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1962); Gelasius I: (492–496). Das Papsttum an der Wende der Spätantike zum Mittelalter (Stuttgart 1981). H. BARION, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:44–47. K. ALAND et al., ibid. 5:51–71. G. SCHWAIGER and K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:36–48. H. E. A. FEINE, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte (4th ed. Cologne 1964– ). J. CANNING, A History of Medieval Political Thought 300–1450 (London-New York 1996). C. MORRIS, The Papal Monarchy: The Western Church from 1050 to 1250: Oxford History of the Christian Church (Oxford Press 1989). A. PARAVICINI-BAGLIANI, The Pope's Body, tr. D. S. PETERSON (Chicago and London 2000). K. PENNINGTON, Pope and Bishops: The Papal Monarchy in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries (Philadelphia 1984). B. TIERNEY, Origins of Papal Infallibility 1150–1350: A Study on the Concepts of Infallibility, Sovereignty and Tradition in the Middle Ages (Studies in the History of Christian Thought 6; Leiden 1972).

[W. ULLMANN]

3. Renaissance and Early Modern Period

This section of the history of the papacy extends from the period of cultural transition known as the RENAISSANCE (c. 1450) to the great political, social, and religious upheaval of the FRENCH REVOLUTION (1789).

The Renaissance Papacy. The bitter conciliar quarrels of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries had shown that the most dangerous crisis of the Church of the late Middle Ages was a constitutional one: its background was the impassioned demand for a reform “in capite et membris.” Attempts for a stronger democratization of the Church had failed with the fateful ending of the Council of Basel, although the conciliar ideas reaffirmed there remained powerful for centuries. After the experience of Constance and Basel, the strengthened papacy resisted the summoning of a general council, thereby abandoning its most powerful court for proposing reform measures. As the needed self-reform did not come about, the multi-colored “autumn of the Middle Ages” was the forerunner of a religious revolution in the Church. With the highly cultured Nicholas V (1447–55), under whom the last antipope, FELIX V, resigned there began that close connection between the papacy, humanism, and the Renaissance which would endure well into the sixteenth century. After the evident decline of the political power of the Holy See, Nicholas and many of his successors aimed at regaining esteem for the papacy and Church by making them the leading centers of culture. Renaissance Rome became a focal point of arts and sciences, while at the same time the religious character of the papacy declined. With a few exceptions, the Renaissance popes became embroiled in secular affairs, wars, money-making, nepotism, and sensual passion. Nicholas V, the first and most high-minded pope of this epoch, concluded with the German King Frederick III, as ruler of the realm, the Vienna Concordat, which remained in force till the end of the Holy Roman Empire in 1803. But since the “gravamina of the German nation” was not heeded, the anticurial opposition in the Empire grew. In 1452 Frederick III was crowned emperor in St. Peter’s; it represented the last imperial coronation ceremony in Rome. In 1453 Constantinople fell to the Turks—not without the fault of the popes and of the Occident, neither of whom had given efficient aid.

The pontificates of the Spaniard CALLISTUS III (1455–58) and of the cultured humanist Enea Silvio Piccolomini, PIUS II (1458–64), were dominated by the thought of a crusade against the Turks. But everywhere in Europe national interest prevailed, so that notwithstanding all papal efforts, a common undertaking did not come about. The sense of spiritual responsibility increasingly receded during the pontificate of Sixtus IV (1471–84), under whom the Spanish Inquisition was expanded; INNOCENT VIII (1484–92), who issued the fateful “Witches Bull” (Summis desiderantes, Dec. 5, 1484), was gravely compromised by his role as guardian of the Turkish Prince Dschem; finally, under the impetuous Borgia (Borja), ALEXANDER VI (1492–1503), the papacy further declined. Unrestricted nepotism and unscrupulous money-making involved the popes more and more in unseemly political quarrels. While Alexander VI showed political foresight in drawing a demarcation line between the Spanish and Portuguese empires of the New World, his anti-French policy in Italy and his plans for making the papal state a permanent fief of the Borgias came to naught. His successor was the high-minded PIUS III (1503), whose reign lasted less than a month. The bitter foe of the Borgias, JULIUS II (1503–13), physically and intellectually a powerful character (“il terribile”), was one of the most capable popes, though far more an Italian Renaissance prince and general than a priest. Using diplomatic and military means he sought to establish a strong, independent papacy in an Italy free from foreign domination; the League of Cambrai (1509) and the Holy League (1511) were formed to serve this purpose. A schism in France was prevented only with difficulty when King Louis XII reinforced the PRAGMATIC SANCTION and, with the aid of several cardinals, caused a general Church council to convene at Pisa in 1511. Julius II countered the move by calling together the Fifth Lateran Council (1512–17). Under his princely protection, Rome became the center of the Italian High Renaissance, where Bramante, Micheangelo, and Rafael created masterpieces to the glorification of Church and papacy. His successor of the house of Medici, LEO X (1513–21), greatly disappointed the expectations of reformists. His secular, extravagant mode of life, as well as his whole manner of Church government, indicated a lack of spiritual responsibility.

With the inglorious end of the Fifth Lateran Council vanished the last possibility of an internal reform (see LATERAN COUNCILS). Thus, when, in 1517, Martin LUTHER launched his open challenge, a catastrophe for papacy and Church was at hand. The occasion was given by the promulgation of an indulgence stipulating a money offering in connection with the building of the new basilica of St. Peter. Neither Pope nor Curia was aware of the religious motives of Luther, nor did they foresee the weighty consequences of his action. They also underestimated the anti-Roman state of mind of much of Europe. Thus, in a short time large sections of central and eastern Europe, as well as the whole Germanic North (England, Scotland, Scandinavia), went over to PROTESTANTISM. After 1520, Luther looked upon the pope as an Antichrist. John CALVIN opened up an even deeper chasm with the papacy. Although the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century represented an attempt to restore the purity of an original Christianity, the resultant split in Christendom became the greatest misfortune in Church history.

In 1516 Leo X and Francis I of France signed a concordat in which, in exchange for the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction, the Pope had to recognize a nearly complete supremacy of State over Church. The pious and moral Netherlander ADRIAN VI (1522–23), the last German and last non-Italian pope prior to John Paul II initiated the reform of the Church in capite. At the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg (1522) he had the legate Francesco Chiergati pronounce the papal acknowledgment of guilt and assert the Pope's firm intention to achieve Church reform. The Pope's early death ended these hopes. The Medici pope CLEMENT VII (1522–34) followed the old ways. Besides, he allowed himself to come into fateful opposition to Emperor Charles V (1519–56), whose lifelong efforts to restore the unity of faith were rather hindered than supported by papal policy. Under Clement VII the great defection from papacy and Church advanced rapidly, especially in Germany and in the Nordic kingdoms. England separated from the papacy following the marriage scandals of King HENRY VIII. And from the 1530s on, a militant CALVINISM spread from Geneva to France, the Netherlands, Scotland, Hungary, and Poland, and became with LUTHERANISM and ANGLICANISM the third main branch of a reformed Christendom (see REFORMED CHURCHES).

Catholic Reform and Counter Reformation. The Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century curbed the power of the papacy. Yet, the immense shock at last caused the Curia to join the movement of reform that had been growing for decades in Spain and in small circles of Italy. After the early failure of Adrian VI, the pontificate of PAUL III (1534–49) signified a turn of events. Though his way of life still followed wholly the traditions of the Renaissance popes, his wide education and political sense convinced him that the real strength of papal policy lay in following spiritual and ecclesiastical principles. But he seems to have had no clear ideas about the extent of necessary measures, and since he shrank from radical steps, his pontificate is characterized by hesitation. Of great importance for the Catholic reform was the thorough renewal of the college of cardinals, the appointment of the commission for Church reform in 1536 (Consilium de emendanda ecclesia), the promotion of new orders (THEATRINES, BARNABITES, SOMASCHI), especially the approval of the Society of Jesus in 1540, the renewal of the Roman Inquisition (Sanctum Officium, 1542), and most of all the Council of TRENT in session with interruptions from 1545 to 1563. The council could not restore the lost unity of faith, but it laid the broad basis for a thorough internal renewal by determining the most important articles of faith and by issuing sweeping decrees of reform. Notwithstanding the episcopalian tendencies, especially from the Spaniards and French, the popes remained masters of the council. Although showing serious weaknesses, JULIUS III (1550–55) had a pronounced sense of his spiritual office. PAUL IV (1555–59) tried with passionate energy to hurry the reform without the council, thereby involving himself in a series of catastrophes through political ineptitude and uncompromising severity. Under PIUS IV (1559–65) the Council of Trent completed its labors, having successfully overcome several threatening crises. A whole series of unfinished topics (the Roman Catechism, Missal, and Breviary, the edition of the Vulgate) were expressly entrusted to the Pope. The new edition of liturgical books, appearing for the most part under PIUS V (1566–72), resulted in the acceptance of the Roman rite by nearly the whole Church. The Council of Trent and active new religious orders, such as the JESUITS, were among the most important factors in strengthening the Church.

Since the defection of nearly all the Germanic nations, post-Tridentine Catholicism has been characterized by a preponderance of Romanic nations. The radical attacks on the papacy by Protestant reformers made the Catholic reaction stress the importance of the priestly office in the Church, especially in the office of the pope. Their pitiless judgements, however, also made even well meaning and necessary criticism in the Church difficult. All attempts at reunion with Protestants, the aim of some of the most generous minds on both sides, proved unsuccessful. The most difficult problem, then as now, proved to be the position of the pope in the Church. Although the mentality and character of some post-Tridentine popes showed serious defects, there can be no further question of "unworthy" popes. The great popes Pius V, GREGORY XIII (1572–85), and SIXTUS V (1585–90) energetically and successfully assumed leadership of Catholic reform. In 1570 Pius V declared ELIZABETH I of England excommunicated and deposed—the last and unsuccessful papal deposition of an important ruler. The naval victory at LEPANTO over the Turks (1571) also was caused by his efforts. Gregory XIII supported Counter-Reformation forces, especially in Germany, France, England, Poland, and Sweden, although these were sometimes ill advised. Existing diplomatic representatives of the Holy See at Vienna, Paris, Madrid, and Lisbon were expanded by permanent nunciatures at Lucerne in Switzerland, at Graz in Inner Austria, at Cologne for Lower Germany, and at Brussels. These nunciatures assumed an important ecclesiastical and political role in preventing innovations, giving effect to the Tridentine reform, supervising bishops and the Church organization, and promoting Counter-Reformation forces.

Conflicts with state power and with the individual metropolitans and bishops developed, especially in the eighteenth century. The Jesuits, besides gaining leadership in a rapidly developing new educational system, became the most important helpers of a strengthened papacy. Sixtus V, combining a tremendous capacity for work with political wisdom, continued the reconstruction of the Church. His reorganization of the Curia and of the general government of the Church by setting up 15 Cardinal Congregations in 1588 and limiting the number of cardinals to 70, a number that remained unchanged until the twentieth century. He made Rome a baroque city and—less felicitously—ordered a new edition of the Vulgate. This period clearly demonstrated the trend toward greater centralization in Church government around papacy and Curia. It also reveals that the restrengthened papacy's most significant Protestant adversary was well-organized Calvinism, while Lutheranism and Anglicanism had noticeably declined as foes, the former by splitting up into numerous national churches, the latter through its isolation.

Catholic reform and the reconquest of lost territory, once started, were continued by CLEMENT VIII (1592–1605), PAUL V (1605–21), GREGORY XV (1621–23), and, to a lesser degree, URBAN VIII (1623–44). They found the strongest political backing for their plans from the Spanish and Austrian Hapsburgs and the Bavarian Wittelsbachs. France at last found peace when, after the end of the destructive wars with HUGUENOTS, the Bourbon King HENRY IV turned Roman Catholic in 1593. In the seventeenth century France rapidly advanced to the position of a great European power, thanks to the statesmanship of RICHELIEU. Paul V attempted to revive medieval claims of a supremacy of the Church in political matters, although everywhere, even in the Catholic national states, a tendency toward national churches was acquiring new strength, especially in the GALLICANISM expressed by Edmond RICHER. His policy led to serious political conflicts and failures in particular with the republic of Venice (1605–07, excommunication of the Senate, interdict over the Republic) and with England (prohibition of the loyalty oath of Catholics to the king after the Gunpowder Plot of 1605). In the Thirty Years' War Paul V and Gregory XV supported Emperor Ferdinand II and the Catholic League under Maximilian I of Bavaria. The reintroduction of Catholicism into Bohemia after the victory of 1620 and in the Upper Palatinate was greeted in Rome with joy. The transfer of the electoral office to Maximilian of Bavaria was vigorously supported by the papal diplomacy in order to safeguard the election of a Catholic emperor.

The establishment of the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith in 1622 indicated that the papacy intended to take over the leadership of the expanding world missionary movement. Under the Barberini Pope Urban VIII, a patron of arts, stately baroque buildings were erected in Rome. As in the Renaissance period, this building was accompanied by the destruction of many monuments of antiquity and the Middle Ages. Nepotism, never quite extinct, flared up again in Urban's pontificate. The Pope, deceived by Richelieu, leaned, toward the French's side during the Thirty Years' War, thereby harming indirectly the Catholic party in Germany, although he strove sincerely for peace. The Peace of WESTPHALIA, which caused great damage to the Catholic Church, was concluded in 1648 under INNOCENT X (1644–55) after long negotiations. During the war and at the time of the peace the political weakness of the papacy had become painfully apparent. It was noted that often political thought and action were determined by simple reasons of state rather than by religious and ethical principles.

From the Peace of Westphalia to the French Revolution. In this period princely absolutism became firmly established in nearly all European states. The progressive secularization of the West forced the papacy, now internally strengthened and of high moral caliber, to accept not only the increasing loss of political influence but even the control of its internal affairs. It had to fight absolutism, an Enlightenment that too often was anti-papal and anti-ecclesiastical, JANSENISM, Gallicanism in France, Episcopalianism (FEBRONIANISM) in Germany, and JOSEPHINISM in the Hapsburg lands. All these phenomena were evident to a greater or lesser degree in all Catholic countries. Probably wishing to avoid political conflicts, the cardinals in this period elected honest but undistinguished popes; none were strong personalities, with the exception of Innocent XI and BENEDICT XIV.

The greatest political difficulties for the Holy See arose from France. Through the labors of Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin and during the long reign of Louis XIV (1643–1715) that country had its "great century" when it stood at the top of its political power and spread its cultural influence over the whole Europeanized world. After a painful confrontation during the pontificate of the peaceable and restrained ALEXANDER VII (1655–67), the incorruptible and deeply religious INNOCENT XI (1676–89) lived to see bitter quarrels with the unscrupulous absolutism of Louis XIV regarding the régale, rights of diplomatic immunity of the French ambassador in Rome, and papal condemnation of the four Gallican articles of 1682 (see REGALIA; ASSEMBLIES OF FRENCH CLERGY). An open schism was prevented probably only by the intervention of François FÉNELON and the change of government in England brought on by the Glorious REVOLUTION OF 1688.

In international politics, also, Innocent XI found the King of France his greatest opponent, a fact especially fateful in view of the mortal Turkish danger. Considerable aid from the Pope made possible the decisive victory at Vienna in 1683 that relieved Europe from Turkish pressure on its eastern boundaries. Purity of aims and means gained Innocent XI high repute even with non-Catholics. Under Innocent XII (1691–1700) the quarrel with France could finally be settled in view of the imminent extinction of the Spanish Hapsburgs because of the death on Nov. 1, 1700, of Charles II, King of Spain, without a son. A long war for the rich Spanish inheritance was not settled until the Treaty of Utrecht (1713) recognized Phillip of Anjou as Phillip V of Spain. Fearing a Hapsburg hegemony, CLEMENT XI (1700–21) took the side of the French Bourbons, which led to a short war with Emperor Joseph I in 1708.

The teachings of Luther, Calvin, and their followers on grace and justification led Catholic theologians to focus on the doctrine of the original state of man in paradise, to the Fall, and to the relation of divine grace and man's freedom. The Council of Trent had left the central problem of cooperation grace and free will undecided. As in late antiquity, this gave rise to long and violent debates, in which the papacy repeatedly intervened. The old distinction between the theological schools of Thomists and Scotists emerged vividly in a modern form. In 1567 Pius V rejected 79 theses of Michel de Bay, professor at Louvain, and his adherents (see BAIUS AND BAIANISM). The aftermath of this quarrel was seen in the discussion about the doctrine of grace of the Jesuit Leonard LESSIUS. Sixtus V forbade both parties to censure each other. At the end of the sixteenth century another severe conflict broke out between Dominicans and Jesuits (Domingo BÁÑEZ, OP; Luis de MOLINA, SJ). After long deliberations of the papal commission of inquiry (see CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIS), neither Clement VIII nor Paul V gave a decision. A similar situation existed in the 200-year dispute over systems of moral theology. Both extremes were condemned: LAXISM by ALEXANDER VII (1665–66) and Innocent XI (1679), RIGORISM by ALEXANDER VIII (1690). Theological contention came to a pitch in the century-long quarrel over the interpretation of the AUGUSTINUS, written by bishop Cornelius JANSEN and printed posthumously (1640). Jansenism, which started in Louvain, soon took hold of France and influenced the Catholic lands of Europe. Jansenistic doctrines were first condemned by Urban VIII (1642), later by Innocent X (1653); after the inheritance of Alexander VII (1644), the charitable CLEMENT IX brought about a temporary truce in 1669 (Clementine peace). The hostile activity of Louis XIV made the quarrel in France flare up again c. 1700 and occasioned Clement XI's two great bulls of condemnation, Vineam Domini (1705) and UNIGENITUS (1715). In the end the bishops of France submitted, but not so in the Netherlands, where Utrecht became the seat of the schism (1723). The papal condemnation of Jansenism made the latter movement often an ally of the opponents of Roman centralization, as in the Gallican and Josephinist movements and the Synod of PISTOIA (1786). Quietism also received papal condemnation, first by Innocent XI, who after long hesitation proscribed propositions found in the Guía espiritual of Miguel de MOLINOS (1687), then by Innocent XII, who was pressured by the French crown to censure the Explication des Maximes des Saints of Fénelon (1699).

The ENLIGHTENMENT period brought a great turning away from the acknowledgement of Christianity as revealed religion. The Catholic Church and the papacy especially were mercilessly attacked by many enlightened philosophers in France, Portugal, Spain, and Naples-Sicily. Increasing difficulties were overcome for the time being by the capable and learned Benedict XIV (1740–58), whose measures for internal reform of the Church and whose wise and timely policy of compromise in external affairs testify to his deliberate moderation, prudent compliance, and sincere love of peace, without surrender of essential rights of the Church. The pontificates of CLEMENT XIII (1758–69) and CLEMENT XIV (1769–74) were completely overshadowed by discussion about the dissolution of the Society of Jesus. Long demanded by the Bourbon states, which unilaterally had already effected it in their respective dominions, the suppression of the order was decreed in 1773 by Clement XIV, after deep reflection. The long antecedents of this affair, the brutal states, and also the unsuccessful petitionary journey of PIUS VI (1775–99) to Emperor Joseph II in Vienna (1782), revealed the political impotence of the papacy in the period of Enlightenment. The end of the eighteenth century witnessed the deepest humiliation of the modern papacy in the wake of the FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Bibliography: For extensive sources and literature see: L. PASTOR, The History of Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London 1938–61). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh., v.4–5 (Leipzig 1931–41). K. BIHLMAYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (17th ed. Paderborn 1962). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935– ). P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, eds., I papi nella storia, 2 v. (Rome 1961). J. W. O'MALLEY, ed. Catholicism in Early Modern History (St. Louis, Missouri 1988). A. D. WRIGHT, The Early Modern Papacy: >From the Council of Trent to the French Revolution 1564–1789 (London 2000). J. A. F. THOMSON, Popes and Princes, 1417–1517 (London 1980). H. M. VAUGHN, The Medici Popes (Port Washington, New York 1971). P. PARTNER, Renaissance Rome, 1500–1559 (Berkeley 1976). R. BIRELEY, The Refashioning of Catholicism: A Reassessment of the Counter-Reformation (Washington, D.C. 1999). M. R. O'CONNELL, The Counter-Reformation, 1559–1610 (New York 1974). R. PO-CHIA HSIA, The World of Catholic Renewal, 1540–1700 (New York 1996). J. DULUMEAU, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire (London 1977). W. J. CALLAHAN and D. HIGGS, eds., Church and State in Catholic Europe of the Eighteenth Century (Cambridge 1979). H. DANIEL-ROPS, The Church in the Eighteenth Century (Garden City, New York 1966).

H. GROSS, Rome in the Age of Enlightenment (Cambridge 1990).

[G. SCHWAIGER]

4. The Modern Period (1789–1958)

The history of the papacy in this period extends from the tumultuous impact of the French Revolution of 1789 upon the Church and its leadership through the papacy's involvement in the early Cold War.

The main lines of historical development in the institution of the papacy during the period 1789 to 1958 are clear-cut. The quarter century between the outbreak of the French Revolution and Napoleon's downfall witnessed determined and violent assaults against the papal spiritual and temporal power that seriously menaced the very existence of the office; yet it also registered gains of long-term significance. Then followed a reversal of fortune almost unparalleled in suddenness and importance. Since 1815 the prestige and effective spiritual powers of succeeding popes have continued to mount, even after 1870. More than ever Rome became the vital center of the Church throughout the world. Particularly since mid-nineteenth century, ecclesiastical administration has been centralized in the Eternal City to an unprecedented degree. Clergy and laity have become accustomed to turn to the popes for doctrinal and pastoral guidance regularly, not merely in periods of crisis; and they have entertained for recent pontiffs a personal reverence that earlier centuries rarely knew. Papal temporal power nevertheless suffered mounting difficulties from its restoration in 1815 to its disappearance in 1870; its revival in 1929 was on a very limited scale.

From 1789 to 1815. Events in France gave direction to the history of the Church and of the papacy during these years.

Losses. From the beginning of his pontificate, Pius VI, like his predecessors, had to contend with Catholic governments imbued with the tenets of monarchical absolutism and regalism that viewed with suspicion or hostility any exercise of papal authority within their borders and defied or disregarded Rome save when it suited their interests to do otherwise. These states utilized the exequatur and placet, the appeal as from an abuse, and the menace of schism as standard devices to maintain as much national spiritual autonomy as possible within a universal Church. Gallicanism, allied with Jansenism, continued to oppose the full hierarchical supremacy of the papacy. In Germanic lands Febronianism and Josephinism, with similar aims, reached their peak during this pontificate. All four of these antipapal tendencies converged close to Rome at the synod of Pistoia (1784), convoked by Bishop Scipione de' RICCI, whose decrees merited the solemn papal condemnation, Auctorem fidei (1794). Protestant rulers preserved their antipapal traditions and displayed more intolerance toward Rome than toward their Catholic subjects. After engineering the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773, the more radical champions of the Enlightenment envisioned the abolition of the papal office.

As the French Revolution (1789–99) progressed, leaders intent on de-Christianizing France gained control. Their antipapal predispositions were intensified by Pius VI's opposition to the principles of 1789, and still more by his condemnation of the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY and the oaths of civil disobedience demanded of the clergy, and by his aversion to the whole body of ecclesiastical legislation of the French Assembly. When the Pope supported the first coalition of European powers arrayed against France, the revolutionaries retaliated by annexing papal territories in southern France, invading Italy, seizing the States of the Church, and establishing a republic in Rome. After stripping Pius VI of his temporal power, the French deprived him of his liberty. His death while a prisoner marked a low point in the papacy's fortune and gave rise to a prophecy that the apostolic succession had come to a close with the demise of "Pius the Last."

The next pope's humiliation surpassed those of his predecessor. After election at a conclave which convened in Venice, PIUS VII (1800–23) quickly revealed his independence by spurning Austrian enticements to reside in Vienna and by returning to his own capital. The first part of his pontificate was linked with the career of Napoleon I. As Bonaparte's military prowess extended his political sway and religious system over most of western Europe, including Italy, danger mounted that the Holy See would become a French vassal, the Pope an imperial chaplain, and Paris the center of the Church. Pius VII could not decline an invitation to attend the coronation in Paris, where he sat among the onlookers as Napoleon crowned himself emperor (1804). When the Pope refused to ally with France in the Continental Blockade, Napoleon seized Rome, deprived Pius VII of his temporal power, and held him prisoner in Savonna and Fontainebleau (1809–14). So close was the Pope's confinement that he could scarcely function even in his spiritual capacity.

Gains. An audit confined to adversities would be incomplete and misleading. The revolutionary era brought gains for the papacy that at least balanced the losses and prepared the way unwittingly for still greater advances. Badly as the two popes fared, their traditional foes fared worse. In the collapse of the monarchy and ancien régime, Gallicanism, particularly Political Gallicanism, received a serious wound from which it never fully recovered. Parlement, long a stronghold of Gallicanism, did not survive the Revolution. Although the Civil Constitution of Clergy started a schism in France, it caused also a noticeable rift in the façade of ecclesiastical Gallicanism. After the Constituent Assembly, without consulting the Church, passed (July 12, 1790) and promulgated this law (August 24), it prevented the French hierarchy from meeting in a national synod to chart a course through the crisis. Thereupon 30 of the 32 bishops among the Assembly's delegates drew up an Exposition des principes sur la Constitution civile (October 30) and with the almost unanimous approval of their fellow bishops submitted it to Pius VI seeking his guidance in applying the Civil Constitution. In the Exposition the Gallican bishops referred to the "successor of St. Peter, placed in the center of Catholic unity, who must be the interpreter and organ of the will of the universal Church." Pius VI delayed his formal condemnation of the law until the following March.

The CONCORDAT OF 1801, arranged between Napoleon and Pius VII without the concurrence of the French hierarchy, dealt a blow to the ecclesiastical Gallicanism. It was a recognition by the First Consul that the Pope held the key to restoring religious peace to France. In redrawing the ecclesiastical map of France and reducing the number of dioceses from 85 to 60, the Concordat permitted an unprecedented exercise of papal power requiring that the entire French hierarchy, whether Constitutional prelates or ordinaries in office previous to 1789, resign their sees. The 45 bishops who refused to resign were summarily removed from office. Twelve Constitutional bishops were named to the new sees, but they had to sign a submission to papal decisions concerning French religious affairs. Thereby they implicitly retracted their adherence to the Civil Constitution.

Napoleon's secularization of ecclesiastical principalities in Germany served to impoverish a group of wealthy, powerful, traditionally anti-Roman Rhenish bishops, weakened their Febronianism, and forced them and German Catholics in general to look to Rome for support.

From 1815 to 1878. Waterloo proved helpful for the noncombatant papacy. After Napoleon's downfall it became a principle beneficiary of the widespread disillusionment with the bloodshed and political and social upheaval in France, where democracy had quickly given way to military dictatorship. The statesmen who assembled at the Congress of Vienna (1814-15) sought a restoration of the ancien régime as far as possible. In their plans to stabilize a conservative, monarchical, legitimist system of law and order throughout Europe, they recognized the altar as the sturdiest support of thrones. The allied powers that had displayed slight concern for the Pope's welfare when he was despoiled of his territories and his liberty, returned to him the States of the Church, save for the land in France. For the future of the papacy it was significant that no other ecclesiastic regained his confiscated principality. Governments that had expelled the Jesuits in the third quarter of the previous century and browbeaten the popes until the order was completely suppressed did not object when in 1814 Pius VII restored the Society of Jesus worldwide, proving strong support for the papacy as it had previous to 1773.

Reorganization of the Church. The second part of Pius VII's pontificate stands in marked contrast to the first. Events since 1789 had disorganized religious as well as secular society throughout Europe. Pius VII utilized his newly won influence and assumed leadership in rebuilding the Church. States that in the previous century had insisted on controlling internal religious affairs were eager to cooperate in arranging with Rome concordats or less formal agreements. The Holy See's policy in Germany took advantage of the fact that this region emerged from the Congress of Vienna as a loose confederation of political units. Dalberg, Wessenberg, and others favored a single German concordat in the hope of unifying the Church there with minimal dependence on Rome. Pius VII forestalled them by making separate arrangements with individual rulers, notably the Protestant King of Prussia, who found this an advantageous way of keeping formerly independent prelates civilly obedient. Succeeding decades witnessed the Cologne mixed marriage dispute and other Church-State disagreements that caused extended vacancies in several German sees, placed Catholics on the defensive, and nurtured the growth of ULTRAMONTANISM.

New Political Developments. Following the French Revolution there emerged a trend toward constitutional governments, secular in aim, officially indifferent or hostile toward religion, unwilling to favor one creed over another or to help any creed. Many states have followed the United States in separating Church and State. The material support, privileges, social and political status that the clergy enjoyed under the ancien régime greatly diminished or disappeared. The ties that once bound the clergy to so closely to the civil power and kept alive Gallicanism and other forms of ecclesiastical particularism no longer held. Political factors were very important in diverting the clergy en masse toward Rome as the one source willing and able to help them. The best example is France, particularly after 1830. What had long been the main center of Catholic opposition to the papacy assumed the lead in ultramontanism. Secular nationalism swelled to excessive proportions throughout the world during the nineteenth century, but ecclesiastical nationalism greatly declined.

The increasing menace of secularism, laicism, anti-clericalism, materialism, and communism on an international scale also impelled Catholics to solidify their own ranks under the common leadership that Rome alone could provide.

Ultramontanism. Doctrinal and, even more, practical considerations promoted a remarkable growth of ultramontanism, which began early in the nineteenth century and developed into a well-organized, aggressive, and irresistible movement by mid-century. Ultramontanism was a complex movement, but in general it favored an authoritarian, highly centralized ecclesiastical government with the pope exerting his primacy of jurisdiction in all domains of the entire Church. This, the ultramontanes were convinced, was essential for the effectiveness of the Church and even for the salvation of society. Ultramontanism advocated also freeing the Church from all State tutelage and unifying liturgy, discipline, devotion, and customs according to the Roman model. Like most important movements in the life of the Church, this one grew from humble origins and won wide popular support among the lower clergy and laity. Until mid-century the popes remained somewhat aloof from it, partly because of its connection with Hugues Félicité de Lamennais and partly from a papal fear of alienating the French government. However, Pius IX favored it and placed himself at its head. The three most prominent literary champions of ultramontanism were not theologians but publicists and apologists: Joseph de MAISTRE, LAMENNAIS, and Louis VEUILLLOT. Ultramontanism won followers in many countries, but chiefly in France, Germany, and Belgium. It proved a major force in preparing the way for the solemn definition of papal prerogatives in 1870 and in undermining the vestiges of Gallicanism, Febronianism, and Josephinism. Some ultramontanes allowed their enthusiastic adulation for the papacy to carry them to theologically unsound extremes, but this was not characteristic of the movement as a whole.

Action of the Popes (1823–46). LEO XII (1823–29) and PIUS VIII (1829–30) continued the centralizing tendencies of Pius VII. Most important in this regard was GREGORY XVI (1831–46). As pope he retained his keen interest in theology and in the missions. His principle theological work, Il trionfo della Santa Sede e della Chiesa (1799), strongly upheld the Church's independence of the civil power and papal primacy and infallibility, and it foretold the ultimate triumph of the Holy See and the Church. Gregory XVI put his teachings into effect by withstanding the secularizing aims of several governments and their encroachments on the spiritual power in Prussia and elsewhere. He was insistent on Rome's right to name bishops, particularly in Latin America, where he came into conflict with some of the newly independent republics. Despite growing unrest in the States of the Church, he determined to retain his temporal power. As a teacher he took the lead in condemning the doctrines of Lamennais and HERMES.

The papal control of Catholic missions throughout the world dates from this pontificate. Civil rulers, with little counsel from Rome, had often been responsible for spreading Christianity during the Middle Ages. The great missionary expansion of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries after the era of geographical discoveries was accomplished largely by the Spanish and Portuguese governments, which interpreted the PATRONATO REAL and padroado in such a way as to monopolize control of the missions in their far-flung colonies. A combination of factors made the eighteenth century one of such precipitous decline that scarcely 300 missionaries were active by 1800. Penury of personnel and other reasons did not allow this situation to improve much during the following three decades. Circumstances became more favorable under the Gregory XVI, whose preoccupation with evangelization won him a reputation as the mission pope of his century. Since Spain and Portugal had by then ceased to be major powers and were unable to supply their former material support, they could not effectively resume their old patronato and padroado pretensions. Gradually Rome gained exclusive control. The Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (Propaganda), which Napoleon I had abolished in 1808, was reorganized in 1817. Barolomeo Capellari acted as its prefect from 1826 until his election as Pope Gregory XVI in 1831. The Propaganda soon played the important role designed for it at its foundation in 1622. Its jurisdiction included Asia, Africa, Oceania, Australia, and the entire Western Hemisphere, as well as Prussia, Scandinavia, the Netherlands, and the British Isles. Acting through the Congregation, Gregory XVI assigned mission territories to religious institutes, decided the status of all missions, and appointed, promoted, and transferred the vicars and prefects who headed them. The Pope worked out the guiding principles and methods for the missionaries. Gregory XVI and his successors took the lead in trying to eliminate colonialism and nationalism, particularly European nationalism, from the missions and in developing native clergies. Gone were the interminable negotiations among the Propaganda, the patronato powers, and religious orders with a quasi-monopoly in certain areas. Save for very limited territories remaining under the patronato real and padroado, all missions depended directly on the Propaganda, except for those under the Congregation for the Oriental Church since 1917 and the few subjected to the Consistorial Congregation.

The extraordinary mission development after 1831 received slight financial support from governments. Gregory XVI and later popes have promoted the organizations to raise by private charity the huge sums needed; they have exhorted the faithful to contribute and in the twentieth century brought the headquarters of many of these societies to Rome. demonstrate its intent to keep them under its personal direction and to obtain firsthand information about them.

Pius IX (1846–78). In the development of the papacy one of the most important pontificates in modern times is that of PIUS IX. He was the first pope to assume active leadership of ultramontaniam, which he helped build almost into a “party.” To undermine Gallicanism still further, the Pope placed several well-known works on the Index. Some of them had been textbooks in French seminaries, and one by them, by Louis Bailly, had been taught at Maynooth. Pius IX also promoted liturgical unification by substituting Roman practices for a variety of local liturgies, particularly French ones. A concentrated effort was made to standardize ecclesiastical usages according to norms established in Rome. Even before 1870, centralization of authority and administration made such strides that it stands out as one of the most notable features of this pontificate. The Roman Curia emerged as the Church’s administrative nerve center. Its functionaries served the Pope in ever more effective exercise of his jurisdictional primacy throughout the world. Accompanying this growth in the Roman Congregations was a marked improvement in the spiritual earnestness, intellectual caliber, professional competence, and industry of their staffs. But they did not always have a thorough grasp of contemporary needs and trends. Although the Curial cardinals were of high quality, Pius IX reduced their spiritual and temporal influence and consulted them rarely on broader issues, save for ANTONELLI and a few others.

Individual bishops came into more direct contact with papal authority. More so than his predecessors, Pius IX named bishops himself, regardless of local preferences, and in doing so revealed his inclination for ultramontanes. (By 1869 only 81 bishops chosen by Gregory XVI remained in a total of 739). Papal initiative was responsible for an increasing number of national seminaries in Rome, where promising future priests and bishops received ultramontane training and a preference for Roman usages. AD LIMINA VISITS became more frequent. Refractory bishops were beckoned to Rome. Appeals to the Curia from diocesan decisions, even in minor matters, were countenanced. The Holy See frowned on national synods but approved provincial councils. The large number of these provincial gatherings between 1846 and 1869 demonstrated the progress of ultramontaniam among the bishops. The same trend was evident in the large episcopal assemblages in Rome in 1854, 1862, and 1867. Papal nuncios were more active than before in the internal affairs of local churches; they intervened regularly between Rome and bishops and between bishops and local clergy. The work of Fornari in Paris provides the most memorable example of a nuncio utilizing every circumstance to promote ultramontaniam.

As a teacher for the entire Church Pius IX was more active than his predecessor. It is especially noteworthy in the present context that the solemn definition of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, pronounced by Pius IX (Dec. 8, 1854) in the presence of a great international gathering of his bishops, made no mention of episcopal approbation, although this had been sought and received. The manner of defining this doctrine was intended as a practical demonstration of papal infallibility. The bishops attended the ceremony as spectators. It was during this pontificate above all that the Catholic world developed a strong personal devotion to each incumbent in the chair of St. Peter. Pius IX’s winning personality and his conduct during very troubled years won him immense popularity.

VATICAN COUNCIL I marked the climax of this pontificate with a solemn definition of papal INFALLIBILITY and PRIMACY of jurisdiction. It brought to completion centuries of doctrinal development and removed permanently from serious consideration conciliarist or episcopalist arguments about the pope’s position in the Church. When the final decision came, there was no energetic opposition from governments. Within the Council the minority based its case mainly on the inopportune of defining these matters at this time. Most of the Catholic world rejoiced in the definitions. Those irreconcilables who started the schism of the OLD CATHOLICS represented the insignificant minority.

Temporal Power. If alterations in society benefited the papal spiritual position, they weakened and finally destroyed the temporal power. Economic backwardness made the States of the Church a financial burden instead of a source of income for the Holy See. As the forces unleashed by the French Revolution permeated Italy, the Papal States ceased to provide independence for the popes, who were compelled to rely on military aid from France and Austria to restrain domestic unrest that was fomented by the drive to unify the Italian peninsula politically. Almost simultaneously in 1870 Vatican Council I established the pope permanently at the pinnacle of spiritual power, and an invading Italian army ended the papal temporal power. Rome feared that the loss of the States of the Church would eventually entail the sacrifice of papal spiritual independence; but matters turned out otherwise. Pius IX and his successors until Pius XI retired behind the walls of the Vatican as voluntary prisoners protesting against the seizure of their state and against the Law of GUARANTEES and awaited the solution of the ROMAN QUESTION. Meanwhile the papacy's international diplomatic standing remained intact and its spiritual power continued to increase.

1878 to 1958. LEO XIII (1878–1903), PIUS X (1903–14), BENEDICT XV (1914–22), PIUS XI (1922–39), and PIUS XII (1939–58) were all zealous men of high spiritual and intellectual caliber and both esteemed and influential. In 1917 the promulgation by Benedict XV of the Code of CANON LAW terminated a long process of growth in ecclesiastical law and exalted the position of the papacy in the Church's legal structure, just as Vatican Council I did in a doctrinal way. To Heiler the Code marked "the victory of papalism, the completion of centralization, the conclusion of centuries of development of the primacy of jurisdiction." Never was the papal magisterial power more in evidence than after 1878. As teachers in matters of faith and morals these five popes were prodigiously active. Heterodox doctrines were rare in Catholic ranks; but when they appeared, they served to reveal the enormous influence of the papal magisterium. Thus MODERNISM subsided quickly after Pius X's condemnation. Pius XII's HUMANI GENERIS nipped in the bud several novel doctrines. The contrast is striking between the effectiveness of those pronouncements and those issued by seventeenth- and eighteenth-century popes during the Jansenist disputes. For topical variety and volume of teachings, the writings, allocutions, and broadcasts of Pius XII surpassed anything in papal history. This extremely conscientious and industrious supreme pontiff kept in the closest possible touch with all sections of the Church, familiarized himself with current problems, and considered it his duty to provide solutions for all of them. It is doubtful that any pope made more extensive use of his position as spiritual monarch. After Cardinal Maglione's death in 1944, for example, Pius XII dispensed with even a secretary of state.

Administrative centralization in Rome continued to increase, although this is not a necessary corollary of the definitions in 1870. Primacy of jurisdiction does not require limitless centralization of administration any more than it compels the absorption of all episcopal jurisdiction. Burgeoning bureaucracy and its effects roused criticisms in the ranks of the hierarchy and elsewhere. Doctrinally the popes remained within their rights. In the practical order each pope must endeavor to conciliate his powers and obligations with those of the bishops, according to changing circumstances. The tendency toward centralization and uniformity was not the same everywhere. Thus the Eastern Churches in union with Rome long enjoyed autonomy in their liturgy, law, and discipline. After Pius IX, this autonomy was considerably reduced, notably in disciplinary matters, but not to the same extent as in the West.

Papal relations with bishops were harmonious and close. Detailed quinquennial reports, which had to be sent to Rome from all dioceses, enabled twentieth-century popes to maintain over all episcopal administrations careful surveillance and methodical control. Vatican Council I did not pronounce on the relationship between the pope and the bishops, but this was addressed during the course of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

Bibliography: H. MARC-BONNET, La Papauté contemporaine, 1878–1945 (Paris 1946). P. BREZZI, The Papacy: Its Origins and Historical Evolution, tr. H. J. YANNONE (Westminster, Maryland 1958). W. BERTRAMS, The Papacy, the Episcopacy, and Collegiality tr. P. T. BRANNAN (Westminster, Maryland 1964). H. C. KOENIG, ed., Principles for Peace: Selections from Papal Documents from Leo XIII to Pius XII (Washington, D.C. 1943). R. AUBERT, The Church in a Secularized Society (New York 1978). F. J. COPPA, The Modern Papacy Since 1789 (London 1998). E. E. Y. HALES, The Catholic Church in the Modern World (Garden City, New York 1958). M. GIACOMO, La Chiesa nell' eta del liberalismo (Brescia 1978). Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thoughts and Movements, 1789–1950, ed. J. N. MOODY et. al. 21–92. (New York 1953). O. CHADWICK, A History of the Popes, 1830–1914 (Oxford 1998). E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1816 (Notre Dame, Indiana 1966). J. MCMANNERS, The French Revolution and the Church (New York 1970). M. M. O'DWYER, The Papacy in the Age of Napoleon and the Restoration, Pius VII, 1800–1823 (New York 1985). N. BLAKISTON, ed. Extracts from the Dispatches of Odo Russel from Rome 1858–1870 (London 1962). C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council: The Story Told From Inside in Bishop Ullathorne's Letters (New York 1930). F. J. COPPA, Pope Pius IX: Crusader in Secular Age (Boston 1979). M. GIACOMO, Pio IX (1846–1850) (Rome 1974). F. J. COPPA, Pio IX (1851–1866) (Rome 1986). F. J. COPPA, Pio IX (1867–1878) (Rome 1990). I. GIORDANI, Pius X: A Country Priest tr. T. J. TOBIN (Milwaukee 1954). G. P. FOGARTY, The Vatican and the Americanist Crisis: Denis J. O'Connell, American Agent in Rome, 1885–1903 (Rome 1974). P. GRANFIELD, The Papacy in Transition (New York 1980). J.F. POLLARD, The Unknown Pope: Benedict XV (1914–1922) and the Pursuit of Peace (London and New York 1999). R. ANDERSON, Between Two Wars: The Story of Pope Pius XI (Achille Ratti) 1922–1939 (Chicago 1977). G. PASSELECQ, and B. SUCHECKY, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI (New York 1998). P. BLET, Pius XII and the Second World War According to the Archives of Vatican (New York 1999). F. J. COPPA, ed., Controversial Concordats: The Vatican's Relations with Napoleon, Mussolini and Hitler (Washington, D.C. 1999). A. RHODES, The Vatican in the Age of Dictators, 1922–1945 (New York 1973). R. RYCHLAK, Hitler, the War, and the Pope (Huntington, Indiana 2000).

[J. F. BRODERICK/EDS.]

5. The Contemporary Papacy (1958–2001)

This section of the history of the papacy extends from the election of JOHN XXIII (1958) to the opening of the third millennium.

Following the death of Pius XII, 51 Cardinals entered the conclave on Oct 25, 1958, to select a successor. Some considered the age of the 77-year-old Angelo Roncalli an advantage, convinced that the Church needed a transitional pope who would not have time to introduce innovations. He was elected on October 28. Immediately, John XXIII recognized the need for some updating or aggiornamento of the Church as well as an aperturismo or opening up of the institution as he sought an accommodation with the contemporary world.

John referred to aggiornamento in November 1957, and it was to become his trademark. Early on, he conceived of calling a Council, the twenty-first of the Church, announcing his intention in January 1959. He perceived it as the Church's response to modernity. On Oct. 11, 1962, the Council officially opened.

Among the themes of his pontificate was a concern for the persecuted Church where pastors could not perform their duties in freedom, encouraging the so-called Ostpolitik or opening to the eastern bloc and particularly Moscow.

Rather than continuing Pius XII's anticommunist crusade, John was prepared to adopt a pragmatic approach to the communist regimes, letting Moscow know that the Vatican sought improved relations. He utilized Agostino CASAROLI, his new secretary of state, to reach accommodation with a series of communist governments, securing the liberation of a number of ecclesiastics from eastern Europe and enabling him to fill vacant bishoprics there. Assured the Council would not condemn communism, Khrushchev gave permission for Russian Orthodox observers to attend and allowed some 90 bishops from the communist countries of Eastern Europe to participate.

John did not neglect the social question. On May 15, 1961, he issued MATER ET MAGISTRA, on the Church as mother and teacher of all nations, stressing the role of Christianity and social progress. John claimed that Leo's RERUM NOVARUM initiated a process by which the Church made itself the champion of the rights of the working class. John concurred with Leo that private property was a right that entailed social obligations, adding that the state could not remain aloof from economic matters. He decried the sums squandered on ill-conceived national prestige and armaments to the detriment of workers.

Like Pius XI, who issued QUADRAGESIMO ANNO, John believed that the relationship between wages and profits must take into consideration the common good. John, too, was not prepared to accept communism or socialism, whose objectives did not transcend material-well being. However, he argued that that COMMON GOOD required that the public authority broaden its scope, keeping in mind that the world's goods were intended for the support of the entire human race. John's Mater et magistra accepted the welfare state as an expression of the common good. His call for social and international peace was repeated in his last encyclical PACEM IN TERRIS (On Universal Peace) of April 11, 1963. In it, the papacy came to terms with individual rights introduced by the revolutionary movement, but within a Christian context.

In November 1959, Pope John issued Princeps pastorum on the missions and the native clergy. The pope warned that the missionary contribution must be carefully attuned to local needs, expressing the hope that the local clergy would be able to select from among its ranks those capable of governing, forming, and educating their own seminarians.

When John closed the first session of the Council on Dec. 8, 1962, the expectations aroused had not been fulfilled. During its two crowded months no decrees had been approved. John, who had cancer, would not be able to see the Council to its conclusion. John's popularity stemmed from his personal warmth and his willingness to take risks.

The conclave of June 19, 1963, elected as pope the 65-year-old Giovanni Battista Montini, the Cardinal Archbishop of Milan, who was considered John's choice. He assumed the name PAUL VI. Following his election to the papacy, Paul announced that the Council would reopen on Sept. 29, 1963. Aggiornamento remained one of his goals, as well as the need to revise the canon law and reform the curia, while he continued the commitment to social justice enunciated in his predecessor's encyclicals. Paul outlined new directives for the Council, including the admission of lay Catholics, the extension of invitations to non-Catholic observers, and the appointment cardinal moderators. At the opening of this second session he called for renewal, Christian unity, and dialogue with the contemporary world. Paul wanted to the bishops to exercise their rights to govern the Church with him, while seeking conditions for ecumenical encounters with non-Catholics.

In December 1963, Paul announced his pilgrimage to the Holy Land the next year. The first pope to fly in an airplane, and first to visit the Holy Land, Paul met the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople there, as well as the Armenian Patriarch and the Anglican Archbishop of Jerusalem. As Paul prepared for the third session of the Council scheduled to convene in mid-September 1964, he stressed the need for unity, which had moved him to visit the Holy Land. In August he issued the first encyclical letter ECCLESIAM SUAM which continued the dialogue within the Church, with non-Catholic Christians, with non-Christians, and even non-believers. Indeed, it called for a dialogue with the entire, contemporary world. In September 1964, Paul prepared for the opening of the third session of the Council, making provisions to have some women attend as auditors without the right to speak or vote during the debates.

At year's end, Pope Paul ventured to Bombay, India, where he expressed his desire to narrow the gap between the world's Christians and non-Christians. Returning to Rome, Paul planned for the fourth and final session of the Council. In January 1965, he revealed his decision to name 27 new cardinals, stressing the need to make the college more universal and appointing the four major Eastern patriarchs to it. In June 1965, when Paul addressed the College of Cardinals, he surveyed the problems confronting the Church, including collegiality, the reform of canon law, mixed marriages, birth control, world peace, and the Council. Pope Paul also addressed the problems confronting the global community. He supported the United Nations quest for disarmament and fight against hunger, addressing it on the twentieth anniversary of its organization. His message was "no more war, war never again." The pope's plan had four major elements. First, relations between states should be governed by reason, justice, law and negotiation rather than by fear, violence, deceit or war. This, in turn, required disarmament. The money saved from the stockpiling of weapons should be utilized to assist the developing nations and solving the problems of hunger and poverty. Finally, the Pope saw the need to protect fundamental human rights, and above all, religious liberty.

As the council came to a close on December 7, a joint declaration by Paul VI and Patriarch ATHENOGORAS I, read at Rome and Istanbul simultaneously, nullified the Catholic-Orthodox exchange of excommunications issued in 1054. On Dec. 8, 1965, Pope Paul declared the Council closed.

The decade following the Council was dominated by a continuing discussion of the need to implement its decisions. Paul established commissions to continue its work, as well as yearly meetings in Rome to further the dialogue. His social encyclical on the development of peoples, POPULORUM PROGRESSIO, was issued on March 26, 1967. Deemed by some the magna carta for justice and peace, Paul showed his concern for those attempting to escape the ravages of hunger, poverty, endemic disease, and ignorance as he made a plea for social justice and fundamental improvement for the impoverished masses of the third world. Citing Leo's Rerum novarum, Pius XI's Quadragesimo anno, John XXIII's Mater et magistra and Pacem in terris, as well as his own trips to Latin America (1960) and Africa (1962), he addressed the perplexing problems of these continents. In August 1968,

Pope Paul flew to Bogota and Medellín, Columbia, the first visit of a pope to Latin America. Here Populorum progressio was appreciated for its support of the third world, as was the condemnation of the unequal distribution of the world's goods cataloged in Humanae vitae.

Paul pursued a via media, encouraging the Extraordinary Synod at the end of 1969 to explore the relationship between papal primacy and episcopal collegiality. In 1970, he ruled that bishops should submit their resignation when they reached 75, and that cardinals after their eightieth year could no longer participate in a conclave. Some suggested that the Pope himself should retire, but Paul continued to preside over the Church and travel on behalf of peace and social justice. In 1969, he visited Africa, again the first Pope to do so, while in 1970 he visited the Philippines where the Bolivian painter Benjamin Mendoza made an attempt against his life in Manila. Undaunted, the Pope continued his Ostpolitik by seeking a reconciliation with the communist regimes of Eastern Europe, establishing diplomatic relations with Yugoslavia in 1971 and improving relations with Hungary.

Paul continued to inject the Vatican in international affairs, supporting peace in Vietnam, and upholding the cause of the United Nations. In July 1972, the Holy See participated in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe at Helsinki as a participant and not simply as an observer, marking the first full participation in an international conference since the Congress of Vienna of 1815. Casaroli, who was at Helsinki, followed this by a visit to Moscow in 1972, the first Vatican official to travel there in an official capacity. Subsequently, he traveled to Castro's Cuba. In 1973 Paul established a "Study Commission on the Role of Women in Church and Society." On Aug. 6, 1978, Paul died at Castel Gandolfo, following a heart attack.

Among his achievements, he brought John's Council to a successful conclusion and continued his work of aggiornamento and reconciliation with the contemporary world. He dismantled the papal court and reformed the Roman curia without alienating either, and introduced collegiality in the Church without undermining papal primacy. He internationalized the Vatican and visited the Holy Land, India, Turkey, the United Nations in New York, Latin America, the Philippines, Australia and Portugal among other places. He helped to make the Church in Africa an African Church, and implemented the use of modern languages in the liturgy. For conservatives he had gone too far, for liberals his reformism remained incomplete.

Cardinal Albino Luciani, the Patriarch of Venice, was elected pope at the end of August 1978 under the name JOHN PAUL. Determined to continue the work of his two predecessors, he did not have time to do so, dying some 33 days following his election—one of the shortest pontificates in modern times.

On October 16, 1978, during the second conclave of that year, Cardinal Karol Wojtyła, archbishop of Kraków, was elected and took the name JOHN PAUL II. He was the first Slav pope and the first non-Italian since Hadrian VI of Utrecht in 1522. Only 58, Wojtyła, the 264th pope, was the youngest since Pius IX in 1846. The new pope quickly embarked on a series of travels that covered more territory than those of all of his predecessors combined. The most significant of the early travels was to Poland (June 2-10, 1979), the first of three visits there before the opening of Eastern Europe. The triumphant papal tour altered the mentality of fear that prevailed in Poland and much of the Eastern bloc. On display even at this early stage were two factors that marked John Paul II's pontificate: his personal popularity, which heightened public perception of the pope as the voice of the Church; and a new engagement of the Church in the world.

The themes for John Paul II's pontificate were set forth in his first encyclical, REDEMPTOR HOMINIS (1979): Christian unity, the preparation for the Great Jubilee of the Year 2000, the implementation of the Second Vatican Council, evangelization and mission. Most notable was the pope's emphasis on the Church's message to the world, based on Gaudium et spes 22, "The truth is that only in the mystery of the Incarnate Word does the mystery of man take on light" (cited in RH 8). Christian personalism, seeing the human person in the light of revelation, emerged as the basis for much of John Paul II's teaching. The engagement with the world proposed here had been prepared by the fate of the papacy since the loss of the States of the Church. As noted in the previous section of this article, the teaching authority of the papacy grew immensely concurrently with the papacy's loss of temporal power. Nor was this teaching confined to inner-Church matters, as can be seen, for example, in the rise of papal social teaching. Yet the Church's proclamations on matters of concern to all men were often based in a conception of the social order (society being under the direction of a legislator/governor obedient to the natural law) that was not shared by those countries whose constitutions emerged from the age of revolution. Vatican II had attempted to speak the truth of Christ to the world in a language that it could understand; John Paul II's personalism developed this further. The dignity of the person—the calling of each person to eternal union with God in Christ, and what is necessary to foster that vocation—became the basis for papal teaching on the evils of socialism's subordination of the person to the State (LABOREM EXERCENS), of consumerism (CENTESIMUS ANNUS), of the denigration of women (Mulieris digni- tatem), and of all assaults on human life (EVANGELIUM VITAE). It also grounded the pope's teaching that moral theology ought to be concerned primarily with the call of every person to beatitude (VERITATIS SPLENDOR); that human reason, rightly understood, is an indispensable part of the Christian life (FIDES ET RATIO); and that Christians are called to manifest to the world the transformative power of suffering in love (Salvifici doloris; DIVES IN MISERICORDIA).

In 1983, in an address to the Latin American bishops assembled in Haiti, the pope called for a new evangelization, "new in its ardor, its methods, and its expression," in keeping with a recognition of the dignity and ultimate destiny of the human person. Thus, for example, this evangelization emphasizes dialogue and respect for existing cultures, at the same time as it calls for a transformation of all cultures. The missionary work of the Church at the end of the twentieth century, hampered in part by declining numbers in missionary religious orders, received a great boost from the pope himself. In his travels, from Poland to the Philippines, from Nicaragua to the United States, he routinely drew huge, enthusiastic crowds, receptive to his personal, pastoral presence. Especially noteworthy in this regard were the WORLD YOUTH DAYS, celebrated every other year, beginning in 1987.

The implementation of Vatican II required not only the renewal of the Church's mission to the world, but also the practical implementation of the council's vision of the Church as COMMUNIO. The relationship of the bishops to the pope and the role of the Roman Curia in the governance of the Church were two decisive issues. The SYNOD OF BISHOPS, established by Paul VI in 1965, had met approximately every three years in general assemblies. They continued to do so under John Paul II, treating themes of the Christian family (1980), reconciliation and penance (1983), laity (1987), priests (1990), consecrated life (1994), and the role of the bishop (2001). An extraordinary assembly was called in 1985 to reflect on the Second Vatican Council, twenty years later. In 1991 the pope began calling special assemblies of the synod, gathering bishops of distinct areas of the world (Europe, Asia, the Americas, Oceania, Africa, Lebanon). A consistent theme of these assemblies was evangelization.

Despite the prominence given to the bishops through the assemblies of the Synod and the development of national episcopal conferences, the Roman Curia remained the administrative nerve center of the Church. This was evident in the question of the authority of episcopal conferences, a matter of some dispute following the council. The apostolic letter Apostolos suos, issued motu proprio by John Paul II in 1998, clarified that a doctrinal declaration of a conference is binding only if the members approve it unanimously or it receives a recognitio from the Apostolic See after receiving the approval of at least two-thirds of the conference. The authority of Rome was emphasized also by the promulgation of several key documents for the universal Church: e.g., a revised Code of Canon Law; the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches; the Catechism of the Catholic Church; the General Directory for Catechesis; and the Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism. The Curia took a proactive role in teaching and governing the universal Church. Preeminent in this respect was the CONGREGATION FOR THE DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH, under the direction of Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger. Disciplinary action was taken against several theologians and prelates. Most significant of these was Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE, who had denounced the changes in the Church arising from Vatican II. Lefebvre was excommunicated in 1988 after he ordained four bishops without papal permission. A papal commission, Ecclesia Dei, was established to facilitate the reconciliation of the members of Lefebvre's movement with the Church.

Though the administration of the Church continued to be centralized, the composition of that administration was changing substantially. In 1988 the pope reorganized the Curia via the apostolic letter Pastor bonus. More importantly, the internationalization of the college of cardinals (and indirectly of the Curia) begun by Paul VI was expanded greatly by John Paul II. In 2001, only one of the nine curial congregations and one of the eleven pontifical councils was headed by an Italian; most were headed by non-European cardinals.

One congregation whose importance increased greatly during this time was the Congregation for the Causes of Saints. By the year 2000, John Paul II had celebrated over 300 canonizations and almost 1000 beatifications. His twentieth-century predecessors had, all together, celebrated 98 and 79, respectively. The theme of the "universal call to holiness" of the Second Vatican Council thus received extraordinary emphasis. Previously, local impetus toward canonization had been met by a cautious attitude from Rome; now, it was evident that Rome encouraged local churches to recognize models of holiness in their midst.

The role of the papacy on the world political stage was most obvious in Eastern Europe and the fall of communism. It was also evident in various interventions with the United Nations (Cairo Conference on Population [1994]; Beijing Conference on the Status of Women [1995]) in support of the Christian understanding of human rights and especially the good of the family. The Vatican criticized the "contraceptive imperialism" of the modernized world vis-a-vis the third world. Vatican diplomacy played a key role in shifting the focus of the Cairo conference from controlling population through birth control to an emphasis on increased education, job opportunities, and full civil rights for women. Another striking development was the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Vatican and the State of Israel in 1993. Pope John Paul was a credible spokesman against anti-Semitism, having suffered under Nazi occupation in his youth in Poland and having been active in protecting Jews at that time. He repeatedly denounced the outbursts of anti-Semitism in Europe. In 1998 a Vatican document entitled "We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah" recognized that anti-Judaism among Christians facilitated the genocidal anti-Semitism of the Nazis. Regret for anti-Judaism was repeated by the pope during his March 2000 visit to the Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem.

The ecumenical efforts begun by a variety of movements in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries were taken up by the council and grew throughout the late twentieth century. John Paul II issued an encyclical on the subject (UT UNUM SINT) and promoted extensive ecumenical discussions with Protestant and Anglican communions as well as numerous Orthodox Churches. No visible union arose from these efforts, but the principle of ecumenical dialogue as a normative part of the Church's mission was enshrined. Particularly difficult for the papacy was the approach to take to the Orthodox Churches. After the fall of communism and the restoration of much religious liberty in Eastern Europe, old feuds between Orthodox Churches and Eastern Churches in union with Rome flared up again, the former refusing to recognize the latter, the latter appealing to Rome to support their rights. The pope's wish to make a fraternal visit to the patriarch of Moscow was frustrated time and again. Interreligious dialogue achieved greater success. In Redemptor hominis, the pope laid down the principle that the Church must be attentive to the work of the Spirit in followers of non-Christian religions (RH 6). Dialogue with the great cultures and religions of the world thus became a part of papal ministry to a degree that it never had been before. The pope himself met with a variety of religious leaders, most famously the Dalai Lama, and personally overrode some objections from the Curia in order to call for a World Day of Prayer for Peace in Assisi in 1986. More than sixty religious leaders, most of them non-Christian, joined the pope in Assisi to pray in the presence of one another.

A century and more of popes of exemplary character, fine intelligence, and, frequently, enormous popular appeal had raised the prestige of the papacy to an exalted height. Entering the third millennium, the pope had become the world's most significant, internationally recognized moral authority.

Bibliography: L. ACCATOLI, Man of the Millennium: John Paul II (Boston 2000). A. ALEXIEV, "The Kremlin and the Vatican" Orbis (Fall 1983) 554–65. R. AUBERT, The Church in a Secularized Society (New York 1978). F. J. COPPA, The Modern Papacy 1789, The Longman History of the Papacy (London 1988). A. FLANNERY, ed., Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents (Grand Rapids, Michigan 1992). M. E. DE FRANCISCUS, Italy and the Vatican: The 1984 Concordat Between Church and State, Studies in Modern European History, ed. F. J. COPPA (New York 1989). A. FROSSARD, Be Not Afraid: Pope John Paul Speaks Out on his Life, his Beliefs, and his Inspiring Vision for Humanity, tr. J. R. FOSTER (New York 1984). V. GORRESIO, The New Mission of Pope John XXIII, tr. C. L. MARKMANN (New York 1969). M. HABIGER, Papal Teaching on Private Property, 1891–1981 (Lanham, Maryland 1990). P. HEBBLETHWAITE, Pope John XXIII: Shepherd of the Modern World (Garden City, New York 1985). P. HEBBLETHWAITE, Paul VI: The First Modern Pope (New York 1993). D. J. HOLMES, The Papacy in the Modern World, 1914–1978 (New York 1981). M. MALINSKI, Pope John Paul II: The Life of Karol Wojtyła, tr. P. S. FALL (New York 1979). M. MALACHI, The Keys of this Blood: The Struggle for World Dominion Between Pope John Paul II, Mikail Gorbachev, and the Capitalist West (New York 1990). M. B. MELADY, The Rhetoric of Pope John Paul II (Westport, Connecticut 1999). M. MILLER, ed., The Encyclicals of John Paul II (Huntington, Indiana 1999). J. E. SMITH, Humanae Vitae, A Generation Later (Washington D.C. 1991). H. STEHLE, Eastern Politics of the Vatican, tr. S. SMITH (Athens, Ohio 1981). T. SZULC, John Paul II: The Biography (New York 1995). G. WEIGEL, ed., A New Wordly Order: John Paul II and Human Freedom (Lanham, Maryland 1992).

[F. J. COPPA/EDS.]

PAPADOPOULOS, CHRYSOSTOMOS

Orthodox archbishop, ecclesiastical historian; b. Madytos, eastern Thrace, July 1, 1868; d. Athens, Oct. 28, 1938. After earlier training at Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Smyrna he studied theology at the University of Athens (1889–91) and at the ecclesiastical academies of Kiev (1891–93) and St. Petersburg (1893–95). From 1895 until 1909 he taught at the theological School of the Cross in Jerusalem, where he was ordained and was made an archimandrite (1900). After two years spent in parish work in Alexandria (1909–11), he acted as director of the Rizzion Seminary in Athens (1911–23) and also as professor of ecclesiastical history at the University (1914–23). The Holy Synod elected him archbishop of Athens and of all Greece (1923). Papadopoulos published numerous articles on ecclesiastical history, his principal scholarly interest, and also many on ethics. He wrote also a history of the Oriental patriarchates and a history of the Greek and Slavic Orthodox Churches. He influenced deeply the cultural and political life of Greece between World Wars I and II. He favored the ecumenical movement, but showed slight sympathy for Catholics of the Greek rite.

Bibliography: Biography and complete list of his works in Enaisima (miscellanea in his honor), ed. G. PAPAMICHAIL (Athens 1931); and in Theologia 16 (1938) 369–408; 17 (1939) 257–272. H. PIERRE, "L'union de l'Orient avec Rome," Orientalia Christiana 18.1 (1930) 5–165, correspondence between P. Ch. and the Catholic exarch of Greece, George Calavassy. J. SALAVILLE, Catholicisme 2:1116–17.

[J. KRAJCAR]

PAPAL ARBITRATION

International arbitration, of which papal arbitration is an aspect, evoked a vast literature between 1870 and 1920. These writings mirrored quite perfectly the assumption of civilized society that rational juridical forms might be substituted for irrational military methods to resolve conflicting claims of sovereign states. Since 1929 and the abandonment of the assumption that ratio can control vis, arbitration as a juridical form has its greatest utility in cases of private law and labor negotiations and is scarcely noticed in international legal literature save in its historical aspects. Arbitration, a method of adjudication developed in classical Greece and refined by Roman usage and jurisprudence, depends on several assumptions common to the contenders and the arbitrator. Some of these assumptions are good faith, equality, and a belief in some kind of punitive sanction. The contenders assume, first, that the losses incurred in arbitration are substantially less than would occur were they to resort to a trial of strength and, second, that the arbitrator is as much concerned with equity, as they understand the term, as are they themselves.

Medieval Development. Papal arbitration was one aspect of that subtle process by which the Roman Catholic Church in the West became in the Middle Ages the veritable heir of the Roman Empire. The process had already begun in the NT period, when Church members were exhorted to settle their differences without recourse to pagan courts (1 Cor 6.1–9). Among the privileges extended to bishops by the Constantinian peace was imperial recognition (Codex Theodosianus, ed. T. Mommsen and P. Meyer, 2 v. in 3 [Berlin 1905] 1:27.1) of the validity of decisions rendered by the bishop in his capacity either of iudex (judge) or arbiter (arbitrator), and the obligation of the state to enforce the decisions rendered by an ecclesiastical person. As the internal cohesion of the Empire dissolved especially in the 5th and 6th centuries, not only did all bishops assume greater administrative and judicial responsibility, but the bishops of the patriarchal sees, except Constantinople, became shadowy proconsuls.

From the time of the Lombard invasions into Italy, the bishops of Rome became steadily the sole Roman, political, and judicial power of the West. After freeing itself first from Byzantine and, later, Carolingian domination, the papacy of the 11th century rose to a position of leadership based solidly on written law in contrast with Germanic contention for headship based on custom of relatively brief duration. The great popes of the 12th and 13th centuries, many of them former professors of law—both Canon and Roman—appointed Roman law forms of arbitration for many classes of difficulties arising between two juridical persons. “It is in the collection of GREGORY IX (1234) that one must seek out the Canon Law doctrine on arbitration and its codification. This doctrine is taken from Roman law, which it reproduced almost completely and without change, except in those areas peculiarly inspired by Christian ideas or which the dictates of practice necessitated. The doctrine remained without notable change up to the Code of Canon Law of 1917” (Amanieu).

However, as the feudal monarchs of the 13th century developed greater awareness of their own juridical personalities (Rex est imperator in regno suo), the popes, who became more deeply involved in European power politics and were recognized for this reason to be of the same power stature as the secular monarchs, were more and more often called upon to act as arbitrators. BONIFACE VIII arbitrating the dispute between King PHILIP IV the Fair and EDWARD I of England (1297); ALEXANDER VI, between Portugal and Spain (1493); and GREGORY XIII, between Poland and Russia (1572–83), exemplified successful papal adjudication of international disputes. Whereas textbooks often refer to popes as arbitrators, they seldom note that the Holy See itself not infrequently employed the method of arbitration to resolve its own political differences with Italian states and combinations of states, a fact that underscores the grave responsibilities which devolved on the pope as a territorial sovereign.

Modern Era. The religious and political upheavals of the 16th and 17th centuries diminished the possibility of arbitration but by no means ended the need for it. With J. BODIN’s definition of sovereignty and the growth of the modern state with its large and absolute authority, the peacelovers of the civilized nations began to seek juridical mechanisms for the promotion of peace; and in the early writers, such as Hugo GROTIUS, one finds recourse to the Roman law doctrine of arbitration. The congress system of making and maintaining peace, begun in the 18th century and developed in the years that followed, recognized arbitration and finally set up at The Hague a panel of jurists to be employed for arbitration of disputed claims. But only rarely did secular rulers employ the good offices of the Holy See in arbitration. In 1885 Pope LEO XIII was selected to arbitrate the claims of the German Empire and Spain in the Caroline Islands. The overtures of BENEDICT XV (July 28, 1915, and especially Aug.

1, 1917) to serve as mediator between the belligerents in World War I met with no success. More cautiously, PIUS XII fashioned his public reactions during World War II to the prospective role of peacemaker—to which, however, he was not invited. In his first encyclical, ECCLESIAM SUAM, PAUL VI, by offering his services in the cause of peace, maintained the traditional attitude of the papacy toward international arbitration.

It may be concluded that the prevailing ethical standard of European society has been gauged by its view of papal arbitration. The Church preserved the Roman law of arbitration and the great legist popes of the Middle Ages disseminated that equitable form. Since secular governments began to replace Romano-canonical methods, they have sought, particularly from the 17th century, to devise universally acceptable systems of arbitration. But lacking a common ethic and a common religious orientation, modern nations can act in concert only ad hoc and on the basis of the balance of power, best described by St. Augustine as a latrocinium, or robbers’ treaty.

Bibliography: J. H. RALSTON, International Arbitration from Athens to Locarno (Palo Alto 1929). J. EPPSTEIN, The Catholic Tradition of the Law of Nations (London 1935). A. AMANIEU, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 1:862–895. G. BALLADORE PALLIERI and G. VISMARA, Acta pontificia juris gentium (Milan 1946). C. PHARR et al., eds. and trs., The Theodosian Code and Novels (Princeton 1952). A. BERGER, Encyclopedic Dictionary of Roman Law (Transactions of the American Philosophical Society NS 43.2; Philadelphia 1953).

[S. WILLIAMS]

PAPAL CEREMONY AND VESTURE

As supreme head of the universal Church, the pope can officiate in any existing liturgical rite, Eastern or Western. However, as bishop of Rome, he regularly celebrates according to the Roman Rite.

Ceremonial. While the ritual he observes is that followed by all archbishops, there are nonetheless many ceremonies special to the pope.

The Papal Pontifical Mass. In a pontifical mass, the pope wears several vestments, as explained below; the college of cardinals and bishops or abbots attending Mass are vested in cope or chasuble (the cardinal deacons in dalmatics), and all wear the white miter. Historically, the first part of the papal mass was the solemn entry of the pope, carried on the sedes gestatoria and wearing his great mantle and the TIARA, both of which have fallen into disuse. The Liturgy of the Word of the papal mass closely follows the rite of a bishop’s pontifical Mass in his own cathedral. The special rite in this part of the Mass is the chanting of the Gospel in Latin and Greek.

The coronation ceremony of Pope Paul VI outside St Peter's in July 1963. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

During the papal mass, there is one very particular rite, which has never been allowed in any other diocese or rite, that is, the pope's Communion at his throne.

Canonization. Until the time of Pius XII the ceremony was quite long. The Ave Maris Stella was sung during the procession into St. Peter's Basilica behind the banner of the servant of God. Upon arrival before the papal throne, the postulator of the cause knelt before the pontiff and asked instante (urgently) the canonization; the Litany of the Saints followed. Again the postulator approached the throne and requested instantius (more urgently) for the glorification of the servant of God; the Veni Creator was then sung. For a third time the postulator went to the pope and begged instantissime (most urgently). At this the pontiff read the declaration of canonization. The Te Deum concluded this part of the rite.

However, in order to abbreviate the ceremony Pius XII had the Litany of the Saints chanted during the procession into the basilica; the three petitions were joined into one followed by the Veni Creator and the declaration. In the Mass that follows there is a solemn procession with offerings of candles, wine, bread, and doves. The first report of such an offertory procession comes from the canonization of St. Bridget of Sweden, which took place in 1391.

Other Rites. The pope also reserves to himself the opening and closing of ecumenical councils, the opening of the Holy Doors in JUBILEE YEARS, the blessing of the archbishop's PALLIUM, the blessing of the GOLDEN ROSE that he offers from time to time as a gift to some personality or sanctuary.

Vesture. The pope has two kinds of vesture: the prelatial, or nonliturgical, and liturgical.

Prelatial Dress. This is very simple. In his daily life he wears a white cassock or simar, with the small humeral cape and oversleeves that go with it; a white silk sash; and a zucchetto to match. In cold weather the pope wears a long cloak of red wool, called a mantello, and a red hat with gold trimmings. For receptions the pope wears a long linen rochet, usually ornamented with lace, and over it the mozzetta or humeral cape, which, in summer is of red satin, and in winter of red velvet, with ermine trimmings. During Eastertide the mozzetta and shoes are of white satin. With the red velvet mozzetta the pope wears, instead of the white skull cap, a papal biretta, called camauero, made to match the mozzetta. According to the best traditions, when wearing the mozzetta, the pope wears the pectoral cross under it and over the rochet. Although the use of a white cassock goes back many centuries, the papal color is red and that is the reason mozzetta, camauero, shoes, mantello, and hat are always red, except during Eastertide.

Liturgical Vestments. Besides the pontifical vestments worn by all archbishops, historically the pope has two vestments that are proper, or reserved, to him, viz, the FANON and the subcinctorium (below the girdle).

The subcinctorium took the form of a maniple of the same width from top to bottom and is ornamented with an Agnus Dei at the lower end. It is attached to a special girdle and hangs on the pope's right side. The subcinctorium has now no practical meaning. Up to the 13th century it was commonly worn by all bishops, and St. Charles Borromeo tried to reintroduce its use in the AMBROSIAN RITE as a pontifical vestment. The subcinctorium is closely related also to the Greek epigonation: a lozenge-shaped piece of stiff, embroidered material attached to the girdle and worn as part of pontifical dress. Both the vestments were originally related to the MANIPULE, which was a towel or handkerchief, usually attached to the waist of the garment, and for hygienic use.

The falda, worn by some popes and fallen into disuse, is not strictly a vestment, but a white flowing robe with a train that falls around the feet. When used, it is placed over the rochet. Since the falda is so long, it must be lifted by assistants whenever the pope walks during ceremonies. The diaries of Alexander VI (d. 1503) speak of it as a papal ornament, but there is no agreement regarding its origin or significance.

The pope's cope or great mantle is like any other cope, except that it is either white or red. He wears the cope at solemn entries, before he vests for Mass, and when he is present, vested, at his throne.

Bibliography: P. SALMON, Étude sur les insignes du pontife dans le rit romain (Rome 1955). R. LESAGE, Vestments and Church Furniture, tr. F. MURPHY (New York 1960). T. KLAUSER, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Insignien und Ehrenrechte (2d ed. Krefeld 1953). M. DYKMANS, Le cérémonial papal de la fin du Moyen Age à la Renaissance (Brussels, 1977). J.-C. NOONAN, The Church Visible: The Ceremonial Life and Protocol of the Roman Catholic Church (New York 1996). S. TWYMAN, Papal Ceremonial at Rome in the Twelfth Century (London 2002).

[J. NABUCO/EDS.]

PAPAL ELECTION DECREE (1059)

A judgment issued by the Roman Synod in April 1059, under the presidency of Pope NICHOLAS II, to regularize the procedure of papal elections.

Background. Earlier attempts had been made to avert uncanonical accession and the civil disorders that normally attended elections: the synodal decree of 816, the oath that Louis the Pious and LOTHAIR I required of the Romans (824), and the cession of Pope LEO VIII to OTTO I (963). All had tried to ensure orderly and canonical accessions by guaranteeing the emperor's role as arbiter in the elections. The decree of 1059, however, was the first effort to establish administrative machinery within the Church for that purpose. Prepared for by the development of the college of cardinals under the reformed papacy, the burden of the decree was anticipated early in 1059 when Nicholas II became the liege lord of Robert Guiscard, Duke of Apulia and Calabria, receiving Robert's promise in future to assist the "better" cardinals, the clergy, and the laity of Rome in electing and consecrating suitable men as popes.

Content. The framers of the decree began by recalling that the Roman Church had been endangered by SIMONY after the death of STEPHEN IX and stating their hope that the subsequent provisions would provide against the recurrence of such peril. They specified that on the death of a bishop of Rome the cardinal bishops should consider the succession among themselves, then admit the cardinal priests to their deliberations, and finally take counsel with the rest of the Roman clergy and with the Roman laity. Scholars interpret these rules to mean that the cardinal bishops were to nominate a candidate, that the lesser cardinal clergy were to approve him, and that the other clergy and the people were formally to accept him. The decree then quotes a passage from the letter of Pope LEO I to Rusticus saying that no one could be truly a bishop unless he were elected by the clergy of his church, accepted by his people, and consecrated by the bishops of his province on the approval of their metropolitan. It adds that, since the Roman Church had no metropolitan superior, the cardinal bishops discharged the office of the metropolitan in the case of papal elections.

In accord with a decree of STEPHEN III, the 1059 decree required that the pope be elected from the Roman Church itself, and that to HENRY IV of Germany and his successors must be reserved the "honor" (i.e., the formal privileges) that Rome had already granted Henry in accepting him as emperor-designate, which his successors must personally request of the apostolic see. This provision is commonly understood to refer to the right of approval that Byzantine emperors from JUSTINIAN I onward had demanded in papal elections and that the earlier regulations about accessions to the Roman See had guaranteed. The decree added that if civil conditions in Rome were too disturbed to allow the immediate enthronement of the bishop-elect, he might exercise the full authority of the papacy even before his formal installation, and it concluded by cursing those who would work to subvert its provisions and blessing those who observed them. The subscriptions of witnesses, led by the signature of Nicholas II, ended the text.

Significance. The appraisal of the decree's intent and importance is one of the most vexed problems of medieval history, and it has been complicated by the presence of a deliberately corrupted version of the decree written within 40 years after the issuance of the original. The earliest students of the problem distinguished the original as the "papal" version and the corrupted reading as the "imperial" and tended to judge the two documents outside their historical context. Scholars at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century generally accepted the distinction of "papal" and "imperial"; but they argued that the original decree was the first major effort of the GREGORIAN REFORM to free papal elections from lay influence, especially from imperial intervention, and that, to achieve their goal, its authors ascribed the effectual act of election to the cardinals, leaving only ceremonial rights to the German king.

The decree was, scholars judged, the true cause of the repudiation of Nicholas II by German bishops in 1061 and of the schism that followed. In 1936 A. Michel brought this interpretation into doubt, setting the decree into the ecclesiological context of the Gregorian reform rather than into the conventional setting of the struggle between the Church and the temporal power; and H. G. Krause has recently developed and convincingly modified Michel's thought. Michel argued on textual grounds, and Krause has since confirmed, that the distinctions of "papal" and "imperial" were erroneous, and that the corrupt reading came not from the imperial chancery but from among the schismatic cardinals who abandoned GREGORY VII in 1084. Michel dated the false version for 1084, but Krause assigned it generally to the period 1085–1100. They both pointed out that the later version is much the same as the original and that such changes as it contains enhance, on balance, the powers of the lesser cardinal clergy, rather than those of the German king. This version, however, had only slight effect. Krause particularly contested the view that the original decree was designed to free papal elections from imperial control. He suggested rather that the authors of the decree intended to free the papacy from the schism and local conflict that attended Nicholas's accession in 1058 by confirming precisely those powers of arbitration that the earlier enactments on papal elections had described and that HENRY III had vigorously exercised. In this way they hoped to subject local interests to the superior juridical competence of the Empire and to give the earlier process canonical force through synodal approval. Krause further maintained that the repudiation of Nicholas II by the German bishops and the schism of 1061 resulted, not from displeasure at the curtailment of imperial prerogatives by the decree, but from the quite unrelated animosity of Abp. ANNO OF COLOGNE toward Nicholas. In addition to its critical importance in polemical works of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, the decree has significance as the basis of modern procedure in papal elections.

Bibliography: Editions. Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–): Constitutiones 1:537–551. H. G. KRAUSE, Das Papstwahldekret von 1059 und seine Rolle im Investiturstreit (Studi gregoriani 7; 1960). Literature. A. MICHEL, Papstwahl und Königsrecht oder das Papstwahl-Konkordat von 1059 (Munich 1936); "Das Papstwahlpaktum von 1059," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 59 (1939) 291–351. R. HOLTZMANN, "Zum Papstwahldekret von 1059," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Romanistische Abteilung 27 (1938) 135–153. B. SCHMEIDLER, "Zum Wahldekret Papst Nikolaus II. vom Jahre 1059," Historische Vierteljahrschrift 31 (1937–39) 554–560.

[K. F. MORRISON]

PAPAL ELECTIONS, VETO POWER IN

The jus exclusivae, or secular veto, in papal elections was a device used by the Catholic powers of Spain, Austria, and France to prevent the election of a candidate thought unfriendly to their interests. Although secular rulers tried to influence papal elections earlier, the Emperor Charles V is the first known to have drawn up lists of acceptable and nonacceptable candidates, which he gave to cardinals friendly to Spain. Philip II allowed such names to be made public. These procedures developed slowly into the "immemorial right" of exclusion (also known as the veto, or Ausschliessungsrecht). Only in the late 17th and, more clearly, in the 18th century was a formal claim made by France, Austria, and Spain to exclude one candidate each during a CONCLAVE.

The wishes of the ruler were made known to a cardinal chosen for the purpose. The cardinal had to exercise his judgment as to the necessity of making the exclusion known in a formal session of the conclave, or of attaining the desired end by hints or warnings in private conversation. Timing was a critical concern because the exclusion should be pronounced only when a cardinal was near attaining the two-thirds vote necessary to elect a pope. Because several candidates might be undesirable in the sovereign's view, the cardinal would wish to hold back the use of his single veto as long as possible. On the other hand, after the election itself the veto would be meaningless. Sometimes the opportunity was lost: an unforeseen shift in the vote would result in election; in 1846 the cardinal bearing the Austrian veto arrived after the election.

St. Pius X in Commissum nobis (Jan. 20, 1904) abolished the veto absolutely.

See Also: POPES, ELECTION OF.

Bibliography: T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 3.1:720–727. A. MOLIEN, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 3:1319–42. J. B. SÄGMÜLLER, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al. (New York 1904–14; suppl. 1922) 5:677–678. L. LECTOR, Le Conclave (Paris 1894). H. THURSTON, "State Interference in Papal Elections," Month 102 (1903) 337–348.

[M. O'CALLAGHAN]

PAPAL REGISTERS

Papal registers (regesta, regestra, registra) are bound volumes containing copies of official papal letters and documents, today preserved in the VATICAN ARCHIVES (with a few exceptions). They represent a fairly continuous series from INNOCENT III (1198–1216) onward, but there is evidence that registers were kept as early as the 4th century, and probably earlier. They followed the Roman imperial model of the commentarii, and were the work of the papal notaries, whose office eventually became the chancery by the 11th century. Such records were essential, for the Roman pontiff ruled largely by promulgation and written acts and decrees. However, apart from the reconstructed register of GREGORY I (590–604), based on 9th-century and later materials, a late excerpt of JOHN VIII (872–882), the first contemporary register of GREGORY VII (1073–85), and some partial transcripts of the 12th century, e.g., of the antipope ANACLETUS II (1030–38; see PIERLEONI), none of the early registers have survived. We deduce their existence from various CANONICAL COLLECTIONS, e.g., the DIONYSIANA, QUESNELLIANA, and Britannica, and the testimony of such canonists as Deusdedit (see DEUSDEDIT, COLLECTION OF) and ANSELM OF LUCCA. The order of registration was generally chronological (by indictions, and from Gregory VII onward by pontifical years). No attempt was made to classify matter until the 13th century, when, e.g., Innocent III ordered a Regestum super negotio Romani imperii. With the growth of papal administration and the problems created by the AVIGNON PAPACY and the WESTERN SCHISM came an increasingly complicated system of registers.

There are several series of papal registers. (1) Vatican Registers are the oldest and the most important. There are 2,042 items, mostly on parchment, opening properly with Innocent III (Reg. Vat. 4) in 1198 and extending to CLEMENT VIII (1592–1605). (2) Avignonesse Registers were compiled at Avignon between 1316 and 1415, and remained there until the 18th century. There are 349 volumes on paper. The majority were transcribed into the Vatican Registers. They contain Litterae communes and Litterae secretae. (3) Lateran Registers constitute 2,467 volumes, kept in the lateran palace until 1892. They cover the period between 1389 and 1897, but their contents concern only ecclesiastical and administrative matters, i.e., copies of Litterae communes (favor and justice). Many volumes are missing, especially as a result of the Napoleonic Wars.

The opening of the Vatican Archives to the scholarly world in 1881 fulfilled a long-felt need. The archives constitute a major source for European history, especially that of the Middle Ages. Many of the documents are of outstanding importance. Thus Gregory VII Reg. 2.55a is the famous DICTATUS PAPAE and 3.10a is the deposition of the Emperor HENRY IV. Finally, there is a continuing discussion among historians as to the method and form of compiling the registers, e.g., whether the corrected draft or the finished letter was the model, and also how far the registers are themselves original or merely transcripts of the original Chancery Registers. The likely solution is that no single system prevailed throughout.

(4) The papal Penitentiary, the central office for dispensations, absolutions, and licences, kept registers of its own. These registers, which were begun in the early 15th and continued until well into the 19th century, are now deposited in the Vatican Archives and have been accessible to scholars since 1983 upon special permission. (5) From 1334 all incoming petitions to the pope were registered in the Registra supplicationum (see Boyle and Diener). (6) From ca. 1470 a new abbreviated form of papal letter came into use, the littera brevis (i.e. shorter letters), which were registered as Brevia (see Gualdo). (7) The Papal Chamber kept several registers concerning the financial affairs of the Holy See, such as the Introitus et Exitus registers or the Annate registers (see Diener and Boyle).

Bibliography: Sources: Registra Vaticana 1–136. Iohannes VIII-Benedictus XII (876–1342), 136 CD-ROMs (Archivio Segreto Vaticano, Vatican City) [photographic reproduction of the Vatican Registers]. Die Register Innozenz' III., ed. by O. HAGENEDER, A. HADACHER et al. for the Österreichisches Kulturinstitut in Rom, 7 v. to date (Graz-Cologne-Vienna 1964ff). Registres et lettres des Papes du XIII<sup>e</sup> et du XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle, ed. École française de Rome, 80 v. (Rome 1883ff); also published on 3 CD-ROMs (Turnhout, Belgium). Calendar of Entries in the Papal Registers relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 18 v. to date (London 1893ff). Repertorium Germanicum, ed. German Historical Institute in Rome, 9 v. to date (Berlin and Tübingen 1916ff). Repertorium Poenitentiarie Germanicum, ed. L. SCHMUGGE et al. for the German Historical Institute in Rome, 4 v. to date (Tübingen 1996ff). Studies: L. BOYLE, A Survey of the Vatican Archives and of Its Medieval Holdings (Subsidia mediaevalia 1); Toronto 1972). H. DIENER, Die grossen Registererien im Vatikanischen Archiv (1378–1523) (Tübingen 1972). T. FRENZ, Die Kanzlei der Päpste der Hochrenaissance (1471–1527) (Bibliothek des Deutschen Historischen Instituts in Rom 63; Tübingen 1986). G. GUALDO, Sussidi per la consultazione dell' Archivio Vaticano (Collectanea Archivi Vaticani 17; Vatican City 1989).

[J. GILCHRIST/L. SCHMUGGE]

PAPAL VOLUNTEERS FOR LATIN AMERICA

The Papal Volunteers for Latin America (PAVLA) were volunteer Catholic lay missionaries committed to pastoral and social work in Latin America for short-term service, usually three years. Consistent with the stress on Catholic Action found in papal encyclicals (e.g., Pius XI's Non Abbiamo Bisogno in 1931, and Pius XII's Mystici Corporis in 1943) and with the orientation of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), the Pontifical Commission for Latin America (CAL) approved PAVLA on April 20, 1960. Monsignor Paul Tanner, General Secretary of the NCWC wrote to the U.S. bishops, asking them to establish the program in their dioceses. Michael Lies, a diocesan priest of Wichita, Kansas, was named the first national director in 1961, and served one year in that capacity. The national office, established in Chicago, was placed under the Bishop's Committee for Latin America, and administered by the NCWC's Latin America Bureau, whose director from 1959 to 1968 was John J. Considine, M.M., a Maryknoll priest. The office was meant to function as an umbrella agency, coordinating the requests of Latin American bishops for assistance within their dioceses and other ecclesiastical jurisdictions, and the diocesan directors, religious communities, lay mission societies, and even individual volunteers that wanted to participate.

Independent language schools in Cuernavaca, Mexico; Petropolis, Brazil; and Ponce, Puerto Rico, as well as a few domestic Catholic colleges and universities provided varying degrees of language, theological, pastoral, and cultural formation for candidates. In the first year, 112 volunteers were sent to Latin America. They and subsequent lay missionaries were primarily engaged in various forms of teaching, medicine, social work, community development, and the creation of credit unions.

A series of problems plagued the program from its inception, including an initial lack of financial support, tension between many diocesan directors and the national office over questions of coordination and control, and deep disagreements among various parties over the screening, formation, and assignment of candidates. Many volunteers, once in Latin America, experienced little local support for their apostolates. By 1967, the number of active PAVLA volunteers began to decline. When Louis Michael Colonnese, a priest of Davenport, Iowa, became director of the Latin America Bureau in 1968, he initiated the process that resulted in the closing of the national office in 1971.

Bibliography: A. DRIES, The Missionary Movement in American Catholic History (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1998). G. M. COSTELLO, Mission to Latin America: The Successes and Failures of a Twentieth-Century Crusade (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1979).

[J. F. GARNEAU]

PAPCZYŃSKI, STANISLAUS

Founder of the MARIAN FATHERS; b. Podegrodzie, near Sary Sacz, Poland, May 18, 1631; d. Góra Kalwaria, Sept. 17, 1701. His baptismal name was John Baptist. He studied in the Piarist college in Podoliniec (Spicz) and in Jesuit colleges in Lvov and in Rawa Mazowiecka. In 1654 he entered the Piarist novitiate in Podoliniec, receiving the religious name Stanislaus of Jesus-Mary. In 1656, in Warsaw, at the close of his second novitiate combined with a theology course, he took his simple vows and became a subdeacon. In 1661 he was ordained at the Piarist college of Rzeszów. Transferred to Warsaw in 1663, he became renowned as a teacher of eloquence, a preacher, and confessor. In 1669 he was secularized, but in the act of his release from vows and the oath of perseverance in the Piarist Institute on Dec. 2, 1670, he solemnly promised God to continue in the religious life through the "Society of the Marian Clerics of the Immaculate Conception," which he planned to found. This new Marian Congregation received its first ecclesiastical approval in 1673, and he was appointed superior of a small hermitage at Korabiew (Puszcza Mariańska), near Zyradów. In 1677 he fixed his residence in Nowa Jerozolima (Góra Kalwaria) near Warsaw and devoted the rest of his life to the government and canonical establishment of the Marians in the strict observance of the Norma Vitae, the constitutions he had written for them. Upon the approval of the Marians by the Holy See in 1701, Papczyński made his solemn profession, and he died a few months later. His body rests in the "Cenacle" Chapel of Góra Kalwaria. His beatification process, begun in 1769, was interrupted in 1775 and resumed in 1953. His principal writings are Prodromus Reginae Artium (Cracow 1669), Templum Dei Mysticum (Cracow 1675), and Norma Vitae (Warsaw 1687).

Bibliography: G. A. NAVIKEVIČIUS, Stanisław di Gesù Maria Papczyński 1631–1701 (Doctoral diss. Gregorian U. Rome 1960). C. KRZYŻANOWSKI, Stanislaus a Jesu Maria Papczyński, . . . Magister studii perfectionis (Rome 1963).

[M. RZESZUTEK]

PAPHNUTIUS

The name of many monks in the Egyptian desert, among whom the more important were:

Paphnutius the Bishop, St., a bishop of the Upper THEBAID; d. c. 356. He attended the Council of NICAIA, 325, and the Synod of Tyre, 335. His left knee had been mutilated and his right eye torn out in the persecution of Maximinus. He was esteemed by CONSTANTINE I and by the prelates at Nicaea. It was perhaps due to his influence that the council left the question of continence to the discretion of those clergy who had been married before ordination. If this Paphnutius is the "confessor and monk" to whom a miracle is attributed in the Vita Antonii (58; see R. MEYER, tr., Ancient Christian Writers 10:69, 122, n. 198), he may also be the "anchorite . . . of the desert about Heracleos . . . in the Thebaid" mentioned in the Historia Monachorum (16).

Feast: Sept. 11 (Roman MARTYROLOGY).

Paphnutius the Buffalo, anchorite and priest of the desert of Scete. He was 90 years old when visited by John CASSIAN in 395, and was the only monastic leader in Scete to hold a public reading of the letter of the Patriarch THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA condemning anthropomorphism (397).

Paphnutius the Anchorite, St., martyr; d. c. 303; who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian, according to the Roman Martyrology.

Feast: Sept. 24.

Paphnutius the Abbot, St.; d. c. 480; the reputed father of St. Euphrosyne. He is highly venerated in the East.

Feast: Sept. 25.

Bibliography: H. DELEHAYE, ed., "Passio," Analecta Bollandiana 40 (1922) 328–343, Gr. Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:681–688, Lat. SOCRATES, Ecclesiastical History 1:11 in Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 67:102–106. SOZOMEN, Ecclesiastical History 1:23 ibid. 67:925–926. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) v. 1.1. J. CASSIAN, Conlationes, ed. M. PETSCHENIG (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 13; 1886) 3:4.1, 10.2–3. "Paphnutius the Buffalo," H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1358–61.

[M. C. MCCARTHY]

PAPIAS OF HIERAPOLIS

Bishop and chronicler of primitive Christianity; b. c. A.D. 60 or 70; d. c. 125. Information on Papias is supplied by EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (Hist. Eccl. 2.15.2, 3.39.13) and IRENAEUS OF LYONS (Adv. haer. 5.33.4). Irenaeus testifies that Papias heard the Apostle John preach and was acquainted with Polycarp; Eusebius makes mention of his Explanation of the Sayings of the Lord (in 5 bks.). In the preface to this work, Papias asserts that his main endeavor is to record the truth, and that he had made a collection of the logia (sayings that included both words and deeds) of the Apostles that were reported to him by a presbyter. Irenaeus took this to mean that Papias was quoting the Evangelist John, whereas Eusebius maintains that Papias spoke of two Johns, indicating the Evangelist as one, and the other as the companion of Aristion, one of the presbyters, or elders, of the primitive Church (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.7). Eusebius further believed that the second John was the author of the Apocalypse and accused Papias of transmitting the heretical doctrine of CHILIASM to Irenaeus and other early churchmen (ibid. 3.39.12–13).

Papias stated that Mark the Evangelist was the interpreter of Peter, that Mark had never heard Christ, but that he had carefully recorded everything he remembered from Peter's preaching (ibid. 3.39.15). Of Matthew, Papias maintained that he "wrote down the logia of the Savior in the Hebrew dialektikos [language or dialect], and each one interpreted them as best he could" (3.39.16). Irenaeus took this to refer to the Hebraisms that appear frequently in Matthew's Gospel. Origen, however, thought it meant that Matthew had originally written his Gospel in Hebrew. Papias also witnessed to the existence of the apocryphal Gospel according to the Hebrews, out of which he reported a story of the woman taken in adultery that differs from the disputed pericope in John's Gospel (7.53–8.11). Papias refers to the daughters of the Apostle Philip, who told him of a miracle concerning a certain Justus Barsabbas, as well as, in Eusebius's judgment, several bizarre parables attributed to the Savior (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.9–13).

Papias's exegesis was used not merely by Irenaeus, but by Origen and Western theologians down to VICTORINUS OF PETTAU. His testimony, however, has raised many problems in regard to the formation of the Gospel texts, an Aramaic version of Matthew, the identity of the two Johns, and other questions about the history of the primitive Church. According to a late legend he died a martyr.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Maryland 1950–) 1:82–85. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:1944–47. M. JOURJON, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:1104–1109. J. KÜRZINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:34–36. E. PREUSCHEN, ed. and tr., Antilegomena (2d ed. Giessen 1905) 91–99, 195–202. K. BIHLMAYER, ed., Die Apostolischen Väter (2d ed. Tübingen 1956–) 133–140. F. WOTKE, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 18.2 (1949) 966–976. J. F. BLIGH, Theological Studies 13 (1952) 234–240. J. MUNCK, Harvard Theological Review 52 (1959) 223–243; Neotestamentica et Patristica (Leiden 1962) 249–260. K. BEYSCHLAG, Studia patristica, v.4 (TU 79; 1961) 268–280.

[F. X. MURPHY]

PAPINI TARTAGNI, NICCOLÒ

Historian, b. San Giovanni Valdarno, Italy, 1751; d. Terni, Dec. 16, 1834. He served as minister general of the Franciscan Conventuals (1803–09). He was a contemporary and successor of Giovanni Giacinto SBARAGLIA in the historical research on the FRANCISCANS, and his published works are all in the area of Franciscan history. These include Etruria francescana (part 1a, Siena 1787; part 2a, unpublished), Notizie sicure della morte, sepoltura, canonizzazione e traslazione di s. Francesco e del ritrovamento del di lui corpo (Florence 1822; Foligno 1824), Storia del Perdono di Assisi (Florence 1824), Storia di S. Francesco d' Assisi (2 v. Foligno 1825–27, 3d unedited) and "Index Fratrum Minorum Conventualium qui scientias et artes, conducti, publice tradiderunt," Miscellanea Francescana 31 (1931); 32 (1932). His unpublished bibliographical works can be found in the archives of the general curia of the Franciscan Conventuals in Rome. They are in a folio volume, Cod.c. 128, Appen- dix ad supplementum scriptorum Franciscanorum P. M. Hyacinthi Sbaraglia; scriptores ordinis minorum conventualium ab anno 1650 ad annum 1820, which also includes a supplementary appendix and a second essay continuing the list to the year 1830. A manuscript, I et II Index onomasticus scriptorum universae Franciscanae familiae seu trium ordinum S. Francisci ab origine usque ad annum MCDL, dated 1828, is in the collections of the National Library of Florence, No. II ii, 181.

Papyrus fragment, text of Book of Hebrews 12.1–11, 4th Century.

Bibliography: D. SPARACIO, “Gli studi di storia e i minori conventuali,” Miscellanea Franciscana 20 (1919) 56–64.

[J. J. SMITH]

PAPYROLOGY

The study of ancient documents written on papyrus (plural of papyrus). Papyrus (Greek ὄ or ἡ πάπυρος, ἡ βίβλος; Latin papyrus; as writing material also Greek ὄ χάρτης, Latin charta) was the name given to a certain plant (Cyperus papyrus, Latin) and to a writing material made from it in antiquity. The papyrus plant, which was cultivated especially in the delta of the Nile, was put to various practical uses, e.g., for the making of rafts and boats in Egypt.

Writing Material. The most important use of papyrus, however, was in the manufacture of a writing material that was employed by the Egyptians from the 3d millennium B.C., by the Greeks from the 6th century B.C., and by the Romans from the 3d century B.C. until well into the Middle Ages, when it was supplanted by paper. (Although the word “paper” is derived from the word “papyrus”, paper is made by an entirely different process.) On the ancient use of papyrus, see Herodotus, Hist. 2.92; Theophrastes, Hist. plant. 4.8, 3; Pliny, Hist. nat. 13.11 (68)–12(83); S. N. Lewis, L’Industrie du papyrus dans l’Égypte Greco-Romaine (Paris 1934). According to Pliny (ibid. 13.12[74]), for the making of the writing material the pith of papyrus stalks was sliced into thin strips (called σχίζα in Greek and scissurae or philyrae in Latin), a number of the strips were laid vertically side by side, over these a number of strips were laid horizontally side by side, and the two layers were pressed together, dried out, and rubbed smooth, to form oblong leaves. The finished leaves were called σελίδες in Greek and plagulae in Latin. Several such leaves (20 of them according to Pliny, ibid.) were then pasted side by side (hence the word κόλλημα, literally “a glueing,” came to mean page or column) in such a way that the sides of the leaves with the horizontal fibers were all kept on the same (upper or recto) side of the long sheet. Sheets were made in different lengths and heights. A finished sheet was rolled around a narrow cylinder (scapus) with the recto on the inside, and so it was offered for sale. The sheet itself was often called a scapus (“roll” of papyrus). The long sheet either served as a SCROLL (volumen) on which lengthy documents, especially literary works, were written, or the individual pages were cut from it for the writing of short documents, letters, etc. Writing was put ordinarily only on the recto with its horizontal fibers, seldom on the back or verso with its vertical fibers. A papyrus written on the verso was called an ὀπισθόγραφον.

The earliest instrument used for writing on papyrus was a sedge stalk cut off at an angle at one end or frayed at the end into a sort of small brush. After the 3d century B.C. a thin reed (κάλαμος, calamus) sharpened to a point and split at one end was used as a pen. The ordinary ink used for writing was black (μέλαν, atramentum), made from soot; but other colors, such as brown (sepia) and crimson (ἔγκαστον, encaustum) were employed. Pictorial additions were in cinnabar (vermillion) or other colors.

In pharaonic times the Egyptian manufacture of papyrus was a monopoly of the individual temples and their priests; in Ptolemaic times it was a state monopoly. In the Byzantine and Arabic periods the first leaf (πρωτόκολλον, whence the word “protocol”) of a papyrus roll was impressed with a government stamp stating where and when the roll was made. According to its quality there were various kinds of papyrus, from the fine charta hieratica or regia (Augusta, Livia) down to ordinary wrapping material (charta emporetica); see Pliny, Hist. nat. 13.74–79; Isidorus, Orig. 6.9. Writing was done on other material also, such as potsherds (see OSTRACON), wax tablets, and parchment. In the early imperial period literary texts began, apparently in Christian circles, to be written on separate leaves that were bound in a codex (modern book form). Parchment was more suitable for this purpose and soon was the only material used for codices. Smaller documents, however, continued to be written on papyrus for many centuries, e.g., in the papal chancery until the 11th century.

Papyrus Manuscripts, Papyri. Outside of Egypt, where the climate was kind to them, ancient and medieval papyrus MSS have almost entirely fallen victims to the destructive forces of time. Only by accident have a few Latin papyrus codices or fragments of them and some papyrus documents been preserved in European libraries and archives. Thus in papyrus there are a codex of Josephus’s Jewish Antiquities in Milan; a codex of some of St. Hilary’s works in Vienna; individual leaves of a codex containing some sermons and letters of St. Augustine in Paris, Geneva, and Leningrad; a codex containing extracts from St. Isidore’s Synonyma and a homily of St. Eucherius in St. Gall, Switzerland; and a codex containing some of the writings of St. Avitus of Vienne in Paris. Some of the other preserved papyrus documents are a few dozen papal bulls in French, Italian, German, and Spanish archives, in addition to some 800 mostly Greek scrolls containing philosophical works recovered in 1572 from the ruins of the city of Herculaneum that was covered with lava from Mt. Vesuvius in A.D. 79. A few papyrus documents have been found also at DURA-EUROPOS on the Euphrates, at Nessana in the Negeb of Palestine, and at some other places (see Preisendanz, Papyrusfunde 18–66; Handbuch 166–170).

Papyri from Egypt. Large masses of papyrus MSS written in ancient Egyptian, Coptic, Arabic, Persian, Aramaic, Hebrew, Latin, and especially Greek have been found only in the sand-covered graves, ruins, and rubbish piles of the ancient settlements of the native land of the papyrus plant, rain-poor Egypt. As early as the end of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th the learned world became aware of Egyptian papyri through accidental finds. But it was only in 1877 that the interests of scholars was fully aroused by the discovery of an immense amount of papyrus MSS at El Faiyûm (site of the ancient city of Arsinoë), and impetus was thereby given to organized excavations by European and American scholars, especially in the ruins of the Faiyûm regions (at Arsinoë, Soknopaiu Nēsos, Theadelphia, Tebtynis, and Philadelphia) and in Heracleopolis Magna, Oxyrhynchus, Hermopolis Magna, El Iba, Thebes (NO-AMON), Panopolis, Syene, Elephantine, and other places. (For the location of these places on a map, see EGYPT.)

Some of the papyri that were discovered in these excavations have been kept in Egyptian museums (in Alexandria and Cairo). But most of the papyri entered public or private collections in Europe or America, especially in England (London, Oxford, and Manchester), Ireland (Dublin), France (Paris, Lille, and Strasbourg), Italy (Milan, Turin, Florence, and Naples), Germany (Berlin, Munich, Heidelberg, Giessen, Marburg, Jena, and Würzburg), Holland (Leiden), Norway, Denmark, Russia (Tiflis), Switzerland (Basel, Geneva, and Zurich), and the United States (Ann Arbor, Chicago, Princeton, New York, Berkeley, and other cities). In these collections the papyri, which were usually found in a damaged and soiled condition, have been restored, preserved, and scientifically studied by specialists in papyrology, a discipline that has been developed for this purpose. By the 1960s about 7,000 papyri had been published, and the number of those still unedited in the collections and still hidden in the sands of Egypt is no doubt several times that amount.

Contents. The papyri have thrown lasting light on all branches of the study of antiquity: not only Egyptology and Arabic studies, but especially classic philology and the history of Greek and Roman law, economics, sociology, and religion. Classical philology has been enriched by the discovery of many literary papyri, mostly from the 1st to the 3d century, containing fragmentary or even complete classical works that previously had either been preserved in much more recent parchment MSS or been considered entirely lost, e.g., Aristotle's Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία (Constitution of Athens), Sophocles's Ἰχνηυτοί (The Investigators), Herondas's Mimes, Bacchylides's Choral Odes, and Menander's Δύσκολος (The Discontented Man), and other comedies. Not only classical studies, however, but other disciplines also have been greatly benefited by the many thousands of papyrus MSS that have been discovered, such as official edicts and decrees, business documents, financial accounts, invoices, receipts, last wills, contracts (for sales, rents, loans, hiring, teaching, and marriage), and letters. Such papyri give a faithful and impressive picture of all public and private life in Egypt until the Arabic period.

The study of the script and language of these records has made it possible to obtain for the first time an accurate knowledge of the development both of Greek handwriting from the 4th century B.C. to the 10th Christian century and of the colloquial Greek language (Κοινή) throughout the same period, so that the biblical GREEK LANGUAGE, which previously had been a rather isolated phenomenon, can now be assigned its rightful place in this development.

Biblical and Christian Papyri. The papyri are of immense importance for all branches of theological studies, but especially for biblical studies, since many of the papyri contain fragments of OT and NT books (such as some in the Chester Beatty Papyri, the Freer Collection, the Bodmer Collection, and others) that go back, at least in part (e.g., P<sup>52</sup> of the Fourth Gospel from A.D. 125), to the 2d century. They are therefore much older than the oldest parchment MSS and consequently of inestimable value for biblical textual criticism. At least fragments of every book of the NT except 1 and 2 Timothy and 2 and 3 John are preserved in the papyri.

Of scarcely less value are the Greek and Coptic papyri that contain liturgical or patristic texts, e.g., those of the 1941 find at Tura of writings of Origen and Didymus, the menologies (liturgical calendars), the libelli (documents certifying that the persons named in them have offered sacrifice to the gods) from the Decian persecution (middle of the 3d century), certain Gnostic apocrypha (as the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of Truth found at Nag' Hammâdi) and other heretical writings, and last but not least, numerous incantation and other magical texts. All these religious texts, together with the secular documents, bring to life for modern man the world in which the gospel was first preached and offer him a vivid picture of Egypt's early Christian life, of its flourishing monasticism, of the turbulence of its religious quarrels and schisms, and even of the continuance, in the Christian era, of its ancient pagan superstitions, concepts, and customs.

Bibliography: Manuals and introductions. L. MITTEIS and U. WILCKEN, Grundzüge und Chrestomathie der Papyrskunde, 4 v. (Leipzig-Berlin 1912). W. SCHUBART, Einführung in die Papyrskunde (Berlin 1918). A. CALDERINI, Papyri: Guida allo studio della papirologia antica Greca e Romana (Milan 1944). W. PEREMANS and V. VERGOTE, Papyrologisch Handboek (Louvain 1942). F. G. KENYON, Books and Readers in Ancient Greece and Rome (2d ed. Oxford 1951). K. PREISENDANZ, Papyrusfunde und Papyrusforschung (Leipzig 1933); "Papyrskunde," Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, ed. G. LEYH, v. 1 (2d ed. Wiesbaden 1952) 163–248, extensive history of the discoveries and collections, with bibliog. of the whole pertinent literature. A. BATAILLE, Les Papyrus (Paris 1955), with extensive bibliog. also for the language and script and a list of the religionsgeschichtlich papyrus literature, 58–66. H. HUNGER et al., eds., Geschichte der Textüberlieferung der antiken und mittelalterlichen Literatur, v. 1 (Zurich 1961) 29–50, 72–113, 168–170. H. METZGER, Wege und Probleme der Papyrusforschung, v. 2 Die frühchristliche Welt im Lichte der Papyri (Schweizer Beiträge zur Allgemeinen Geschichte 10; 1952) 199–208. C. H. ROBERTS, Greek Literary Hands, 350 B.C.–A.D. 400 (Oxford 1956). Encyclopedia articles. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL; H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1370–1520, with extensive bibliog. and many illustrations. E. LEVESQUE and F. PRAT, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 4:2079–94. B. BOTTE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928– ) 6:1109–20. Encyclopaedia biblica, ed. T. K. CHEYNE and J. S. BLACK, 4 v. (London 1899–1903) 5:3556–63. H. GERSTINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:63–65. A. DEISSMANN, Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie, ed. J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, 24 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1896–1913) 14:667–675. K. TREU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:91–93. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1704–13. Publications of papyri. These are listed in most of the works mentioned above under Manuals and introductions, esp. those of Preisendanz and Bataille; current pubs. are given in the periodicals mentioned below under Periodicals, with current reports and bibliogs.; among the more recent pubs. are the following: J. O. TJAEDER, Die nichtliterarischen lateinischen Papyri Italiens aus der Zeit (Lund 1955) 445–700. R. CAVENAILE, ed., Corpus papyrorum latinorum (Vienna 1956–). V. A. TCHERIKOVER et al., eds., Corpus papyrorum Judaicarum, 3 v. (Cambridge, Mass. 1957–64). Selections and special eds. E. J. GOODSPEED and E. C. COLWELL, A Greek Papyrus Reader (Chicago 1935). A. S. HUNT et al., Select Papyri, 3 v. (New York 1932–50). W. SCHUBART, Ein Jahrtausend am Nil: Briefe aus dem Altertum verdeutsch und erklärt (2d ed. Berlin 1923). J. G. WINTER, Life and Letters in the Papyri (Ann Arbor 1933). H. THIERFELDER, Unbekannte antike Welt: Eine Darstellung nach Papyrusurkunden (Gütersloh 1963). A. DEISSMANN, Light from the Ancient East, tr. L. R. M. STRACHAN (rev. ed. New York 1927). G. GHEDINI, Lettere cristiane dai papiri greci del III e IV secolo (Milan 1923). C. DEL GRANDE, ed., Liturgiae, preces, hymni christianorum e papyris collecti (Naples 1938). R. KNIPFING, “The Libelli of the Decian Persecution,” Harvard Theological Review 16 (1923) 345–390. A. BLUDAU, “Die ägyptischen Libelli und die Christenverfolgungen des Kaiser Decius,” Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte (Freiburg 1887–) 27 (1913), suppl. K. PREISENDANZ, et al., eds., Papyri graecae magicae, 2 v. (Leipzig 1928–31). Periodicals, with current reports and bibliog. Aegyptus: Revista italiana di egittologia e papirologia (Milan 1920–). Archiv für Papyrusforschung und verwandte Gebiete (Leipzig 1900–). Chronique d'Égypte (Brussels 1925–). Études de papirologie (Cairo 1932–). Journal of Egyptian Archaeology (London 1914–). Journal of Juristic Papyrology (New York 1946–). Mizraim: Journal of Papyrology (Philadelphia 1933–). Revue des études grecques (Paris 1888–). Recherches de papirologie: Travaux de l'Institut de papirologie de Paris (Paris 1961–). Studia papyrologica: Revista española de papirologia (Barcelona 1962–). Lists of published papyri. R. A. PACK, The Greek and Latin Literary Texts from Greco-Roman Egypt (2d ed. Ann Arbor 1965). Biblical papyri. A. RAHLFS, Verzeichnis der griechischen Handschriften des AT (Berlin 1914). M. M. PARVIS and A. P. WIKGREN, eds., NT Manuscript Studies (Chicago 1950). G. MALDFELD and B. M. METZGER, “Detailed List of the Greek Papyri of the NT,” Journal of Biblical Literature 68 (1949) 359–370. G. MALDFELD, “Die griechischen Handschriften des NT auf Papyrus,” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 42 (1949) 228–253; 43 (1950–51) 260–261. F. G. KENYON, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 5th ed. rev. A. W. ADAMS (New York 1958) 113–119, 185–190. W. C. VAN UNNIK, Evangelien aus dem Nilsand (Frankfurt 1960). O. PARET, Die Bibel: Ihre Überlieferung in Druck und Schrift (Stuttgart 1949) 50–52.

[H. GERSTINGER]

PARABLES OF JESUS

The English word parable is from the Greek παραβολή, whose root connotation involves the placing of things side by side for the sake of comparison; it was a technical term for a figure of speech in ancient oratory. Before undertaking to describe the characteristics of Jesus' parables and their place in the Gospel context, this article, by way of background, outlines some relevant points about figures of speech as they pertain to parables and reviews the history of parable exegesis. At the end, as kind of postscript, it discusses the relation of the parables reported in the canonical Gospels to those found in the Gospel of Thomas.

Simile, Metaphor and Allegory. The most basic forms of illustration are the simile and the metaphor. In a simile one thing is likened or compared to another thing of a different kind for illustrative purposes (often with the words “like” or “as”); for example, “Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because you are like whitewashed tombs” (Mt 23.27). This colorful method of description is common in ordinary speech. A metaphor is a compressed simile in which one thing is identified or equated with another, or the qualities of one thing are directly ascribed to another; for example, “You are the salt of the earth” (Mt 5.13); “Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees” (Mk 8.15). This figure is more literary than the simile and is frequent in poetry.

The more elaborate forms of illustration, the parable and the allegory, are really expansions of the basic figures. A parable is a developed simile in which the story, while fictitious, is true to life. The latter feature differentiates a parable from a fable. Parables are frequently used today in speeches and sermons in which the speaker tells a story whose moral or punch line illustrates his topic. An ALLEGORY is a developed metaphor prolonged into continuous narrative. Ideally, in the technical and classical usage, the parable is distinct from allegory. In the parable the details and characters have no hidden meaning; the important thing is the lesson of the story. Details serve only to bring out the principal point. Another mark of differentiation is that the parable, like the simile, is a popular and less literary figure of speech. But in practice the traits of allegory are often present in a parable. The story may have one principal point (parable), but some of the characters may have a significance of their own. Already Quintilian, the 1st-century Latin authority on oratory, recognized such intermingling.

History of Parable Exegesis. In the exegesis of the Church Fathers the parables of Jesus were treated as allegories, and the Fathers were greatly concerned with the significance of all the details of the parables. They indulged in an exegesis that at times seems rather fanciful, although beneath their allegorizing the Fathers often came to a valid basic interpretation of the parable involved.

In modern times there was a violent reaction to the long centuries of allegorizing the parables initiated by the German Protestant scholar A. Jülicher. In his work Die Gleichnisreden Jesu (2 v. Freiburg 1888–89) he rejected 18 centuries of allegorizing and insisted that the parables of Jesus were simple, moralizing stories. The parables Illumination from "Codex Aureus," depicting parable of Laborers in Vineyard, from Eternach, written at Trier ca. 983–993, preserved in Stiftung für Kunst und Wissenschaft, Coburg, Germany.

Former Abbey Church of Saint-Pierre in Moissac; bas-relief depicting the parable of Dives and Lazarus in the South Porch, France. (©Ruggero Vanni/CORBIS) had one point, and no one should seek hidden meaning in the details or characters of the parables; allegory is a literary figure, and Jesus was a simple preacher.

The wide implications of this popular position were very serious. As they are reported in the Gospels, some of the parables of Jesus have obvious allegorical characteristics, e.g., the parable of the Tenants in the Vineyard (Mk 12.1–11), where the characters are identifiable. If one were to follow Jülicher's principle strictly, the allegorical features would indicate that the parable could not be attributed to Jesus but would have to be regarded as a literary creation of the early Church. Again, three other parables receive an explanation in the Gospels: the Sower (Mk 4.13–20), the Weeds (Mt 13.36–43), and the Fish Net (Mt 13.49–50). These explanations are somewhat allegorical, for they interpret the individual details and characters. Here too, according to Jülicher's principle, the explanation of these parables could not be attributed to Jesus.

In time scholars challenged Jülicher's principle as being too doctrinaire. It is clear that, while the parables have one principal point, many of them are not free from allegorical features. This is evident if one approaches the parables of Jesus from a Semitic viewpoint rather than from the technical distinctions of classical oratory. Hebrew has one word for these figures of speech, māšāl, which covers all the Greek divisions and more. Under māšāl are grouped, in the Old Testament and the rabbinical writings, proverbs, maxims, symbols, riddles, parables, allegories, and fables. The παράβολή of the Greek New Testament is the equivalent of māšāl. Subsumed under it are proverbs (Lk 4.23), maxims (Lk 14.7–11), riddles (Mk 7.15–17), examples (Lk 12.15–21), figurative speech (Mk 4.33), similes (Mt 13.33), metaphors (Mt 5.14), and, finally, parables, and parables with simple allegorical characteristics. Thus, “parable” can cover a range from a single-line metaphor or simile to a long narrative. The distinctions that underlie Jülicher’s theory would have been strange to Jesus and cannot be used mechanically to interpret His parables. Finally, it should be noted that the word παραβολή does not occur in the Fourth Gospel; there, as a synonym, another Greek word, παραομιλία, is used, which also covers a range of figurative speech (16.25).

“Christ Explaining a Parable to the Disciples,” manuscript illumination by Cristoforo de Predis from the “Predis Codex.”
 (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Literary Dimension. Subsequent to the seminal work of Joachim Jeremias, who traced the development of the parables from their earliest stages to their final redaction in the Gospels, and who reconstructed the main aspects of the teaching of Jesus from the parables, a major shift in parable study occurred in the mid-1960s. Amos Wilder and Robert Funk, in proposing that parables be treated as poetic language, broke with the tradition which had been predominant since Jülicher of viewing the parables primarily as rhetorical forms with a single meaning or focus. At the heart of both poetry and parable, they argued, is a metaphor which, by the surprising equation of dissimilar elements (e.g., “The eye is the lamp of the body,” Mt 6.22), produces an impact on the imagination that cannot be conveyed by discursive speech. Metaphor leads beyond the expressive power of language so that logically, “interpretation of parables should take place in parables” (Funk, Language, p. 196).

The parables tell us in image and symbol what God and God’s reign is “like,” but their open-ended and often enigmatic quality prevent us from finding one-to-one correspondences between the nature or action of God and the situation in the parables. As metaphors, the parables use concrete and familiar images which touch people in their everyday lives, but which point to a reality which transcends definition or literal description. Metaphor has thus moved from the status of a literary trope or figure of speech to a theological and hermeneutical category which characterizes all religious speech. The parables of Jesus become themselves paradigms for language about God.

Paul RICOEUR stressed that the parables of Jesus are more properly “metaphoric” than metaphors since they comprise extended narratives which combine the narrative form and metaphorical process (“Biblical Hermeneutics,” p. 33). As narratives they continue the narrative legacy of the Biblical tradition, and those who read the stories told by Jesus realize that life itself is “a pilgrimage, a race, in short, a history” (Wilder, Rhetoric, 65). The narrative potential of the parables was pursued by Dan Otto Via who offered a “dramatic” reading of the longer parables. From study of their plot and interaction of characters Via divided the parables into “tragic” and “comic” parables, understood in the classic sense as a sudden reversal of fortune from good to evil or the reverse. He argued that the parables confront their readers with the same tragic or salvific possibilities as those confronted by their characters. Readers can, like the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18.23–35), remain untouched by unmerited forgiveness and continue to live in a world of strict justice which ultimately destroys them. They can look at the “salvation” of a picaresque or roguish Unjust Steward (Lk 16.1–8) and realize that God summons us to live by our wits when faced with a crisis.

Parables are not only metaphoric, they contain novel twists or paradoxes (i.e., apparent incongruities which convey a deeper truth). Generous vineyard owners about to give equal pay for unequal work generally do not make those who worked all day stand around while they first pay those hired at the seventh hour (Mt 20.8). Fathers in a first-century Near Eastern culture generally do not “run” (Lk 15.20). A major key to the “meaning” of a given parable is where the realism begins to break down.

Ricoeur and later J. Dominic Crossan stress the paradoxical quality of parables. Their fundamental message is that things are not as they seem; you must have your tidy image of reality shattered. The Good Samaritan (Lk 10.29–37) is not primarily an illustration of compassion toward those suffering, but a challenge to see the enemy (i.e., the Samaritan) as “good.” The paradox of the parables corresponds to the paradox of Jesus’ action in associating with tax collectors and sinners. The parables operate, according to Ricoeur, by a pattern of orientation, disorientation, and reorientation. Their hyperbolic and paradoxical language embodies an extravagance which shocks our normal perceptions, so that we are drawn to the extraordinary within the ordinary. The parables dislocate our project of trying to fit our lives into a tight pattern, which Ricoeur feels is equivalent to Paul’s criticism of “justification by works.” The parables offer a poetics of faith by summoning us to openness and trust in the face of the unexpected (“Biblical Hermeneutics,” p. 122–128).

Characteristics of Jesus’ Parables. Jesus took illustrations from daily life that attracted the hearers’ attention by vividness and narrative color. While these illustrations enabled the hearers to understand His message better, they often had a strange or novel twist that left enough doubt to challenge the hearers into active thought and inquiry. These characteristics are worthy of detailed study.

Illustrations from Daily Life. Jesus was familiar with a rural Galilean milieu: outdoor scenes of farming and shepherding, and domestic scenes in a simple one-room house (Lk 11.5–8). The homes of the rich were seen only through the kitchen door—the view of servants and slaves. The farming was hill-country farming, done in small patches with stone fences and briars (Mk 4.5–7), not in the broad lowland plains. There were donkeys, sheep, wolves, and birds; seeds, wheat, and harvest; lilies of the field and fruit trees; patches and wineskins and lamps; children in the market place, laborers and merchants. Now, even for those readers who know something of rural life the ancient techniques described in the Gospels are somewhat puzzling, and special knowledge is required. For instance, the careless broadcasting of seed in the parable of the Sower is explained by the fact that in Palestinian farming sowing sometimes took place before plowing.

Storytelling Techniques. Among the Gospel parables are found vivid narratives employing all the techniques of storytelling. One of these would be the rule of three, namely, that in popular stories it is customary to have three characters with the point of illustration lying in the third. Thus, in the parables, three servants are entrusted with the talents, and three men pass the man who fell among robbers. Another technique of storytelling is direct discourse: rarely is it told in the third person what a character is thinking. Rather, the characters talk aloud to themselves so that the hearer may find out what is in their minds, e.g., in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18.9–14) and in that of the Rich Fool (Lk 12.16–21). Only one conversation can hold the stage at a time; and consequently, when three characters are involved, as in the Talents, the direct confrontation is repeated three times (Mt 25.14–28). Thinking of the parables as stories will also help to make understandable the peculiarities and inconsistencies that appear in them. “That is for the sake of the story” is the answer to many a difficulty that arises if one is too logical, e.g., why a dishonest steward should be allowed to make an inventory (Lk 16.1), or why workers should be paid in inverse order (Mt 20).

Novel Twists and Challenging Points. In the stories told by Jesus there is often a novel twist that must have made his hearers take notice. Who would have expected the scapegrace prodigal son to emerge as a more sympathetic character than the elder son who stayed at home? At times, as one may suspect from the similarity of Jesus' parables to those of the rabbis, Jesus may have used well-known stories or characters and have supplied new endings. The priest, the Levite, and the layman may have been stock characters in religious tales; but in Jesus' story, the third character was a hated Samaritan, and it was he who was the most sympathetic of the three.

Frequently there was a challenge in the parables of Jesus, the challenge of the kingdom of God. In evaluating the parables as moral lessons Jülicher made the mistake, so common in the liberal theology of the late 19th century, of reducing Jesus to a preacher of good morals. Some of the parables, such as that of the Good Samaritan, were a blistering attack on the established religious policy of the time. Others, such as the parable of the Tenants in the Vineyard and that of the Talents, were threats of imminent judgment on the leaders of Judaism. Still others, such as the Sower and the Mustard Seed, were an apologia for the slowness and insignificance of the results of His own ministry in Galilee. Jesus sought constantly to involve His hearers personally in the challenge of the parables. Many times He asked them, "What do you think?" (see Mt 21.31; Lk 7.42) and made them pass judgment on the outcome of the parabolic story. The Matthean version of the parable of the Tenants in the Vineyard has the audience itself pass judgment on the Jewish leaders who rejected Jesus (Mt 21.41; but cf. Mk 12.9). Throughout the Gospel is heard the personal appeal of Jesus: "He who has ears to hear, let him hear."

Purpose of the Parables. The fact that some of the parables had to be explained by Jesus to the disciples who had not understood them (Mk 4.10, 34; Mt 13.36; Jn 16.29) raises the question of the purpose of the parables. The overwhelming evidence of the Gospels is that the parables made Jesus' message intelligible. Yet in a passage that separates the parable of the Sower from its explanation (Mk 4.11–12) the disciples are told: ". . . to those outside, all things are treated in parables, that 'Seeing they may see but not perceive; and hearing they may hear but not understand.'" Was the purpose of the parables, then, to confuse and obfuscate?

Today many authors recognize that this passage is really a summation, not of the purpose, but of the result of preaching the kingdom of God in parables. The challenge of the parables was rejected by the majority of hearers who saw and heard but refused to perceive and understand. The parables were a sword of judgment. The passage cited above as part of Mk 4 is an adaptation of Is 6.10, which is quoted several times in the New Testament and became the standard Christian explanation of why Jesus' ministry had not been received by Israel (Jn 12.7–41; Acts 28.26–27).

Therefore, if the parables blinded men's minds and hearts, it was more because men refused their piercing challenge than because men could not intellectually understand them. This does not mean that the parables were always clear to all. Jesus' picture of the kingdom of God was quite different from that of the political kingdom of David that was popularly expected, and so his parabolic exposition of the kingdom often had to be explained. Also, Jesus was chary of detailed descriptions of the future action of God in definitively establishing the kingdom (Mt 24.36; Acts 1.6–7). The parables could unfold the true nature and destiny of the kingdom without arousing vain speculation about the future. Thus, the vagueness, which is of the nature of symbolic language, served Jesus' purpose. Well does Mark say of the parable: "And in many such parables he spoke the word to them according as they were able to understand it" (Mk 4.33).

Parables in the Gospel Context. The evangelists not only transmit the parables, but each stamps them with his own theological perspective through editorial changes, by locating them in a definite context (e.g., the three parables of Lk 15; the eschatological parables of Mt 24 and 25), and by addition of material from their own sources. The parables simultaneously influence and reflect the different theologies of the Synoptic Gospels.

The world of Mark's parables is that of the village, farming, and the processes of nature, and he has only one long dramatic parable (Mk 12.1–11). His parables lead the readers into the mystery of the KINGDOM (Mk 4.11), and serve the two major motifs of his theology, christology and discipleship. In contrast to Mark, Matthew has a great number. He takes over all of Mark's except for the Seed Growing Secretly (Mk 4.26–29), and incorporates extensive parabolic sayings and longer parables from Q, e.g., the Lost Sheep (18.12–14), the Marriage Feast (22.1–14), the Wise and Faithful Servants (24.45–51), and the Talents (25.14–30). Matthew's theology assumes its distinctive shape from parables found only in his Gospel, such as the Wheat and the Tares (13.24–30), the Unmerciful Servant (18.23–35), the Laborers in the Vineyard (20.1–16), the Ten Bridesmaids (25.1–13), and the Sheep and the Goats (25.31–46).

Matthew's parables manifest common literary and theological traits. Matthew loves extravagance. Mark's shrub (4.32) becomes a tree (Mt 13.32) and the debt of the servant (Mt 18.24) exceeds the taxes of Syria, Phoenicia, Judaea, and Samaria. His parables contain many allegorical features and he is fond of APOCALYPTIC imagery to underscore the crisis occasioned by the teaching of Jesus (eternal fire; outer darkness; weeping and gnashing of teeth; see 13.42, 50; 22.13; 24.51; 25.30). Matthew changes the parable of the Lost Sheep (18.12–14) from a defense of Jesus' fellowship with tax collectors (cf. Lk 15.1–7), to concern for the "little ones" in the community—a major theme of chapter 18. In editing parables received from Mark and parables only in his Gospel, Matthew also reflects the conflict with the Judaism of his time (see 21.28–43; 22.1–14). The parables which conclude the eschatological discourse (24.45–25.31) all deal with responsible ethical action in the face of coming judgment, a theme which reverberates throughout the discourse and the Gospel.

The Gospel of Luke contains the most extensive collection of parables in the New Testament, including those which are seen as classic statements of the teaching of Jesus, such as the Good Samaritan (10.29–37) and the Prodigal Son (15.11–32). Luke's parables eschew allegory; they offer stories which are true to life and by the frequent use of soliloquy (12.17; 15.17–19; 16.3–4) they invite us into the world of the characters. They occur for the most part in the "travel narrative" (Lk 9.51–19.27) and reflect distinct Lukan themes such as the importance of compassion and mercy (1.78; 7.13; 10.33; 15.20), the dangers of wealth (12.13–21; 16.19–31) and the importance of prayer (11.5–10; 18.1–14). More than any evangelist Luke presents the demands of daily Christian life, so that the parables become paradigms of Christian existence.

Parables in the Fourth Gospel. John differs markedly from the Synoptics in the use of figurative language. However, if one recalls the scope of the term māšāl and that in the Biblical mentality there is no emphatic distinction between the various types of figurative language, then what is found in John can certainly come under the designation παράβολή (as the equivalent of māšāl), even though John does not use that word.

Jesus is found citing proverbs in John 4.35, 37. More often Johannine figurative language is applied to Jesus Himself, e.g., metaphors wherein Jesus is the bread of life (6.35), the source of living water (7.38), the light of the world (8.12). In the Synoptics, figurative language is frequently used for the kingdom of God, a term which does not loom large in Johannine thought. Actually, the emphasis that the Synoptics put on the coming and acceptance of the KINGDOM OF GOD, John puts on the sending of Jesus by the Father. The challenge to men presented in the Synoptic tradition by the kingdom of God is presented in John (e.g., 3.16–21) by the person of Jesus. The uses of figurative language in the two traditions are quite analogous, then, to their theological emphases. (See JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.)

There are more elaborate instances of figurative language in John that border on allegory. On the basis of Jülicher's theory, some use Johannine allegory as an indication of the lateness of the Gospel and its lack of authentic tradition. Jesus, however, was just as capable of speaking in simple allegories as were the rabbis of his time. Moreover, the proposed Johannine allegories must be analyzed. Taking the figure of the shepherd and the sheep in John 10.1–13 as an example, one may suggest that in 10.1–3a and 3b–5 there really are two short parables. Then, in 10.6 there is a failure to understand the parables, just as there is in Mark 4.10; and in 10.7–13 there is a somewhat allegorical explanation of the parables, just as in Mark 4.13–20. Again, an analysis of the simple allegory of the vine and branches in John 15.1–8 would show Old Testament and Synoptic parallels. Thus, the Johannine tradition in relation to parables is not as startlingly different as it might seem at first sight.

Gospel of Thomas and Synoptic Parables. The discovery in 1945 of the Coptic Gospel of Thomas (not to be confused with the apocryphal Infancy Gospel of Thomas) among the 13 Coptic manuscripts at Nag Hammadi and its subsequent publication, as well as the realization that the texts found in the late 19th century at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt were also from the Gospel of Thomas, precipitated a lively discussion on the relation of its 114 sayings to similar sayings in the Synoptic Gospels. Roughly 25 percent are virtually identical with parallel sayings in the Synoptic Gospels. The others represent variants of Synoptic sayings, sayings of Jesus known from the Church Fathers and Apocryphal Gospels, as well as sayings found only in the Gospel of Thomas.

Especially important are those parables and parabolic sayings which are parallel to similar sayings in the Synoptic Gospels (principally, Gos. Thom. #8=Mt 13.47–50; #9=Mk 4.2–9, et par.; #20=Mk 30–32, et par.; #21=Mk 3.27; 4.26–29; #35=Mk 3.23–27, et par.; #57=Mt 13.24–30; #63=Lk 12.13–21; #64=Mt 22.1–14; Lk 14.15–24; #65=Mk 12.1–12, et par.; #76=Mt 13.45–46; #96=Mt 13.33, Lk 13.20–21; #107=Mt 18.12–14; Lk 15.3–7; #109=Mt 13.44). Two parables (#97–98) have no parallels in the Synoptics. The parables of the Gospel of Thomas show a strong affinity with those in Q and lack those which are often seen as distinctive of the teaching of Jesus, e.g., the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18.23–35), the Sheep and the Goats (Mt 25.31–46), the Good Samaritan (Lk 10.29–37), and the Prodigal Son (Lk 15.11–32).

As in the Synoptic parables the introductory formula is "like"; unlike them the formula is often "The Kingdom of the Father is like.” While the Synoptic parables are addressed often to the crowds or to Jesus’ disciples, the parables of the Gospel of Thomas are directed exclusively to the disciples. The parables of the Gospel of Thomas lack references to the Old Testament found in the Synoptic parables and the work is negative toward the Old Testament (see #52).

Three principal theories have emerged on the relationship of the Gospel of Thomas to the Synoptics: dependence on the Synoptic Gospels; essential independence of the Synoptics; and partial dependence and partial independence. Since the parables of the Gospel of Thomas appear in a different order than in the Synoptics and in a simpler form (i.e., without allegorical additions), and since they do not reflect the distinctive theology of the Gospels, the majority opinion rejects direct literary dependence on the Synoptics, and favors use of a common or similar primitive tradition. In specific cases the parables of the Gospel of Thomas may be closer than the Synoptics to the original words of Jesus.

Earlier commentators on the Gospel of Thomas often described it as “Gnostic,” but recent studies question this by arguing that, while stressing asceticism and wisdom, it is on the borderline between Gnosticism and orthodoxy (Crossan, Davies, and Quispel). While much remains unsettled about the Gospel of Thomas, such as its original language, its provenance and date (speculations range from mid-first century A.D. until late second), its literary structure, and the relation of tradition and redaction within the text, it remains an important resource for the study of the history and development of the sayings of the Gospels (especially the parables), as well as for the religious history of early Christianity.

Bibliography: General and Literary Dimension of Parables. R. E. BROWN, “Parable and Allegory Reconsidered,” Novum Testamentum 5 (1962) 36–45. J. JEREMIAS, The Parables of Jesus (rev. ed. New York 1963). M. BOUCHER, The Parables (Wilmington, Delaware 1981). J. E. BREECH, The Silence of Jesus (Philadelphia 1983). J. D. CROSSAN, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York 1973). J. DRURY, The Parables in the Gospels (New York 1985). R. FUNK, Language, Hermeneutic and the Word of God (New York 1966). W. S. KISSINGER, The Parables of Jesus: A History of Interpretation and Bibliography (Metuchen, New Jersey 1979). H.-J. KLAUCK, Allegorie und Allegorese in synoptischen Gleichnistexten (Münster 1978). J. LAMBRECHT, Once More Astonished: The Parables of Jesus (New York 1981). S. MCFAGUE, Metaphorical Theology (Philadelphia 1982). P. PERKINS, Hearing the Parables of Jesus (New York 1981). N. PERRIN, Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom (Philadelphia 1976). P. RICOEUR, “Biblical Hermeneutics,” Semeia 4 (1975) 27–148. M. A. TOLBERT, Perspectives on the Parables: An Approach to Multiple Interpretations (Philadelphia 1979). D. O. VIA, The Parables: Their Literary and Existential Dimension (Philadelphia 1967). H. WEDER, Die Gleichnisse Jesu als Metaphern (Göttingen 1978). A. WILDER, Early Christian Rhetoric: The Language of the Gospel, (2d ed. New York 1971). Parables in Context of Gospels. K. E. BAILEY, Poet and Peas- ant and Through Peasant Eyes, 2 v. in 1 (Grand Rapids 1984) [on Luke]. M. BOUCHER, The Mysterious Parable (Washington 1977) [on Mark]. C. E. CARLSTON, The Parables of the Triple Tradition (Philadelphia 1975). J. R. DONAHUE, The Gospel in Parable (Philadelphia 1988). M. GOULDER, “Characteristics of the Parables in the Several Gospels,” Journal of Theological Studies 19 (1968) 51–69. J. KINGSBURY, The Parables of Jesus in Matthew 13 (London and St. Louis 1977). Parables and the Gospel of Thomas. Text. The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices, 12 v. (Leiden 1972–), v. 3 (=Codex II) contains The Gospel of Thomas. A. GUILLAUMONT, et al., The Gospel According to Thomas, Coptic text and Eng. tr. (New York 1959). Translations, J. ROBINSON, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library in English (San Francisco 1977) 117–130; also in R. FUNK, ed., New Gospel Parallels, v. 2 (Philadelphia 1985) 93–187. Studies. S. DAVIES, The Gospel of Thomas and Christian Wisdom (New York 1983). J. D. CROSSAN, Four Other Gospels (Minneapolis 1985). H. MONTEFIORE, “A Comparison of the Parables of the Gospel according to Thomas and of the Synoptic Gospels,” H. MONTEFIORE and H. E. W. TURNER, eds., Thomas and the Evangelists (Naperville 1962) 40–78. G. QUISPSEL, “The Gospel of Thomas Revisited,” B. BARC, ed., Colloque International sur Les Textes de Nag Hammadi (Québec; Louvain 1981) 218–266.

[R. E. BROWN / J. R. DONAHUE/EDS.]

PARACLETE

The word Paraclete, peculiar in the Bible to the Gospel of St. John, directly denotes the role of the Holy Spirit as intercessor, consoler, teacher, and defender of Christ’s disciples; yet implicit in the fourth Gospel (Jn 14.26) is the fundamental thought that Jesus Himself is the primary Paraclete, a thought that John clearly enunciates elsewhere (1 Jn 1.2).

Extra-Biblical Use of the Term. The English word Paraclete comes, through the Latin Paracletus, from the Greek Παράκλητος. The verb παρακαλεῖν means “to call to one’s side”; hence it has various derived meanings depending on the function for which one is called, such as to defend, to intercede, to console. Morphologically, as a verbal adjective ending in τος, the word Παράκλητος would normally have a passive meaning, “one called to another”; yet in usage, the meaning derives primarily from the function of the one called, so that the few examples of this word in extra-Biblical Greek show rather the active meaning, “helper, defender, mediator, consoler.” In Jb 16.2 the Hebrew active (hiph’îl) participle menahāmîm, “comforters,” was translated as παράκλητοι by Aquila and Theodotion. The term appears also in Philo in an active sense, “helper” or “mediator” (De Specialibus Legibus 1.237; De Opificio Mundi 23). In rabbinical Judaism this Greek term was taken over into Mishnaic Hebrew as a transliterated loanword, peraqlît. As such, it was used for both human and angelic mediators or intercessors, and especially for the “advocate” (the one called) who pleads the cause of another in a judicial process.

Johannine Usage. The word Paraclete occurs only five times in the Bible, and all five occurrences are in the writings of St. John: 1 Jn 2.1; Jn 14.16, 26; 15.26; 16.7.

Christ, the Paraclete. In 1 Jn 2.1 it is Jesus Christ who is termed the paraclete. The active sense of the word is clear in this case; Jesus is our defender, our intercessor before the Father. If Christians commit sin, they should not despair; they have Christ, who is Himself “just” (i.e., innocent), as their advocate to plead their case before God’s supreme tribunal. This concept of Jesus Christ as the heavenly Paraclete, or Advocate, leads naturally to the use of the term in the farewell discourse of Jesus at the LAST SUPPER (Jn 14–16).

The Holy Spirit, the Paraclete-Advocate. In His discourse at the Last Supper Jesus announces His imminent departure from this earth (Jn 13.33; 14.2; 16.5), but He also tells His disciples of a return that is to follow very shortly after this absence (14.18, 28). This return is then explained in terms of the abiding presence of the Spirit of the glorified Lord who will be sent from the Father and the Son after the Son’s glorification (16.7–11; see also 7.39). When the HOLY SPIRIT is first mentioned in this context, He is described as “another Paraclete” (14.16). Jesus is the primary and, in a certain sense, even the unique Paraclete; the Holy Spirit is “another” only in the sense that through Him Jesus will remain forever present with the Apostles and with all who through them come to believe in Him. They and their spiritual descendants in the Church will not be left like defenseless orphans to become the prey of an evil world; they will have a permanent advocate to plead their cause before the just tribunal of God against all the evil tribunals of this world (14.16–18). The usage of the term here is similar to, but broader than, that in 1 Jn 2.1. The Paraclete who is the Spirit of the glorified Christ, in defending the Church, must condemn the world that has wrongfully accused it. Here the defender is also a prosecutor. This activity of the Spirit-Paraclete can be perceived only by faith; even though this divine Advocate is the very “Spirit of truth” (14.16; 15.26; 16.13), the world will not listen to Him (14.17).

The Holy Spirit, the Paraclete-Defender. The next passage where the Spirit-Paraclete appears is Jn 14.26. This time only one aspect of His dual role as defender-prosecutor is stressed. He must keep the Apostles ever mindful of all that Jesus has taught them and make plain to them what they have not yet fully understood (see also 16.12–15), for only insofar as they remain faithful to His teaching can their divine Advocate prove them blameless before the judgment seat of God against all the accusations of this world (16.1–4). In these two Paraclete passages in John ch. 14, the Spirit appears primarily as the Advocate defending the Apostles and the Church.

The Spirit-Paraclete, Witness of the Truth. In Jn 15.1–8 the absolute need of the Apostles to remain united with Jesus is described under the symbolism of the vine. Then in 15.18–25 the Apostles are warned that they, in their union with Christ, will share in the world’s hatred and persecution of Him. Therefore, the Spirit-Paraclete will also have to come to the defense of Christ; He will bear witness to the truth of what Jesus did and said and was (15.26). It is in the Spirit’s defense of the mission of Jesus that the truth of the Apostles’ mission is guaranteed (15.27; see also Mk 13.11; Mt 10.20; Lk 12.12).

Judicial Role of the Spirit-Paraclete. The exact meaning of Jn 15.26 is made clearer in the final and climatic use of the term Paraclete in Jn 16.7. Once again Jesus reiterates that His departure is but the condition and prelude to His return in the Spirit (16.5–6). Moreover, when the Spirit-Paraclete of Jesus comes, He will do three things: first, He will prove that the world is guilty of sin because it acted unjustly in refusing to believe in Jesus, as well as in condemning Him “without cause” (15.25) to death before its human tribunal; secondly, He will prove that Jesus was “just,” i.e., innocent, by bearing witness to the fact that His death was not a defeat but a glorious return to the Father; thirdly, having established both the guilt of the world and the innocence of Jesus, He will pass sentence of condemnation on “the prince of this world,” i.e., Satan. Human tribunals may condemn Jesus and His followers (15.18–25; 16.1–4; 17.16), but before the solemn tribunal of God, the Paraclete overturns and reverses these judgments—on Jesus (15.26; 16.7) and on those who are faithful to Him (14.16, 26).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1717–20. J. BEHM, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 5:798–812. X. LÉON-DUFOUR, ed., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962). L. J. LUTKEMEYER, “The Role of the Paraclete (Jn. 16:7–15),” The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 8 (1946) 220–229. O. BETZ, Der Paraklet: Fürsprecher im häretischen Spätjudentum, im Johannes-Evangelium und in neu gefundenen gnostischen Schriften (Leiden 1963). R. E. BROWN, The Gospel According to John (Anchor Bible 29 and 29A; Garden City 1966). passim.

[D. M. CROSSAN]

PARACLETE, SERVANTS OF THE

(SP, Official Catholic Directory, #1230); a clerical congregation, was founded by Gerald M. C. Fitzgerald at Jemez Springs, New Mexico, in January 1947. Father Fitzgerald considered Cardinal Francis Spellman, of New York; Abp. Edwin V. Byrne, of Santa Fe; and Abp. William D. O’Brien, of the Extension Society, as cofounders because of their vital interest and support. The specific purpose of the congregation is the care of priests, especially those on temporary retirement from active duty. At Jemez Springs, where the first monastery, Via Coeli, was opened in what had formerly been a mountain inn, priests quickly gave support to the work in a spirit epitomized by the motto of the congregation: "For Christ in His priests." The constitutions were approved in May of 1952, and the congregation was formally erected by Archbishop Byrne on June 1, 1952. The generalate is Jemez Springs, N.M.

[G. FITZGERALD/EDS.]

PARADIS, MARIE-LÉONIE, BL.

Baptized Alodie Virginie, foundress of the Little Sisters of the Holy Family; b. May 12, 1840, at L'Acadie (Sainte Marguerite de Blairfindie, a suburb of Montréal), Québec, Canada; d. May 3, 1912, at Sherbrooke, Québec.

She was the daughter of a miller, who sent her to a boarding school run by the Sisters of Notre Dame at Saint-Laurent. Paradis entered the religious life at age thirteen, taking vows in 1857 as a Holy Cross sister. She was sent to St. Vincent's Orphanage in New York City. For sometime she taught in various schools. In 1864, she was given charge of the domestic work in an Indiana household. Later she had the same responsibilities at St. Joseph's College, Memramcook, New Brunswick.

Finding many young women eager to join her in this vocation, she formed a new community, Little Sisters of the Holy Family (1880), which received canonical approval in 1896 and papal approbation in 1905. The sisters work in the kitchens, laundries, and sacristies of colleges, seminaries, episcopal residences, and retirement homes for priests. They began with the household management of the apostolic delegations in Canada and Washington, DC. In 1885, the novitiate was transferred to Sherbrooke, Québec, where the motherhouse was later established. Although Mother Marie-Léonie was frail and often ill, she continued her service until a few hours before her peaceful death.

At her beatification in Montréal, Sept. 11, 1984, John Paul II declared that Marie-Léonie "never shied away from the various forms of manual labor which is the lot of so many people today and which held a special place in the Holy Family and in the life of Jesus of Nazareth himself."

Feast: May 4 (Canada).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 78 (1986): 13–15. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 39 (1984): 9.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PARADISE

Paradise is a place or state of bliss and immortality. This concept has its roots in the description and conditions of the Garden of Eden in Genesis, but appears in other places in the Old Testament and the New Testament and in extra-Biblical writings, in all of which it has undergone considerable development. This article will discuss first the terminology and then the concept of paradise as related to the primeval age, the eschatological age, and the present age.

Terminology. The word paradise comes to us through the Greek παράδεισος, which in turn derives from the ancient Persian pairi-daēza, meaning an enclosure wall, the space enclosed, and finally a park. This Persian term was taken over by late Hebrew in the form of pardēs and is found in Neh 2.8; Eccl 2.5; and Sg 4.12. The Septuagint uses παράδεισος to translate both pardēs and the more classical Hebrew word for garden, gan, whether there be reference to a garden in the ordinary sense (e.g., Nm 24.6; Is 1.30; Jer 29.5) or to the Garden of EDEN (Gn 2.8–3.24 passim; Jl 2.3), which is elsewhere called the Garden of God (e.g., Gn 13.10; Is 51.3; Ez 28.13; 31.8–9) or simply Eden (e.g., Ez 31.9, 16, 18; Sir 40.27). In later Jewish writings and in the New Testament, Paradise takes on a special and at times intricate religious significance.

Paradise of Primeval Age. The Yahwist narrative of Gn 2.4b–3.24 states that after creation man was placed in a garden (gan) where trees of all kinds grew (including the TREE OF LIFE and the TREE OF KNOWLEDGE), where there was copious water and a wide assortment of natural life. References to the Garden of Eden or the Garden of God are found in Gn 13.10; Is 51.3; Ez 31.8–9; 36.35; Jl 2.3; and Sir 40.27, with slightly varying terminology being used. The enigmatic Ez 28.13–19 not only speaks of Eden, the Garden of God, but also gives a kind of parallel and variant tradition of the Fall; in this text there is reference to a richly clad royal figure, a mountain, a cherub, and a fall from pristine innocence through trafficking and haughtiness (to mention some obvious features that differentiate it from the Genesis account).

In Genesis one may note several discordant features within the account, e.g., the probable reference to a kind of artesian well in 2.6 stands in contrast with the river system in 2.10–14, from both of which the ground or earth (Heb. 'ādāmā) is watered (the 'ādāmā being understood for the moment as outside the Garden). In 2.9 the reference to the Tree of Knowledge seems to be added to the verse, and 3.3 bears out the suggestion. In 3.22–23 only the man is spoken of as being driven out of the Garden, although the narrative has involved the woman very intimately. These examples point to various elements having been brought together from different sources with clever, but not perfect, literary skill.

From these and other disharmonies, it appears that there are various teachings in this account. One teaching is sin's influence on the earth's poverty (3.17–19), although one is free to suggest that the real cause is man's lack of industry and resourcefulness in his fallen condition. The Garden, too, is depicted as a place of blessedness and of closeness to God. One may note here, as in the case of Utnapishtim's dwelling in the GILGAMESH epic, the idea of remoteness: "far away at the mouth of the rivers" [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament<sup>2</sup> (2d, rev. ed. Princeton 1955) 95b]. Thus Gn 2.8 speaks of the Garden "out in the steppe" ("Eden" presupposing the Sumerian e d i n, via the Akkadian edinu, which means steppe), "off towards the East"—the terms that are both vague and somewhat mysterious. The Hebrew 'ēden (delight) is a clever and significant wordplay. The parallel use of terms in Is 51.3 brings out the same idea.

The possible location of Paradise has long intrigued men, especially those of fundamentalist outlook who have little knowledge of and concern for literary forms. Since two of the four rivers in 2.10–14 can be identified, the perāt and the hiddeqel being the Euphrates and the Tigris respectively, while the other two remain difficult to identify, many have thought of some location near the headwaters of the above named rivers. It is, however, extremely doubtful that the Yahwist had scientific geography in mind. He more likely borrowed famous names out of the past, thus adding to the luster of the Garden—which was not the site where earliest man actually lived. The emphasis is on man's primitive state and his lost opportunity for immortality. The number four elicits a note of universality (cf. "four corners of the earth" in Is 11.12 and the "four winds" in Mt 24.31).

Paradise in the Eschatological Age. In the writings of the Old Testament Prophets man's future happiness—vaguely situated in the "latter times"—is often depicted in terms reminiscent of Paradise. The peace and ideal justice to be procured by the messianic king will be like those of Paradise in Is 11.6–11. The same image is found in Hos 2.20, where peace in the animal kingdom and cessation of war are depicted. References to Eden are found in descriptions of the Promised Land in Is 51.3 and Ez 36.35, while the promise of longevity reminiscent of the immortality proffered to man in Eden is found in Is 65.17–25.

According to the Apocrypha and some rabbinical writings, Paradise will be the place of reward and bliss following upon judgment (e.g., Enoch 61.1–13; Testament of Levi 18.10–14; Apocalypse of Baruch 4). In these descriptions one finds the most varied ideas, e.g., Paradise is to be established in Jerusalem; the Tree of Life will flourish once more. The eschatological Paradise is often identified with the primeval Paradise. The Testament of Levi 18.10 tells how the high priest of the messianic age will open the gates of Paradise and remove the flaming sword mentioned in Gn 3.24. On the other hand, Paradise was described by some rabbis as close to GEHENNA or as associated with SHEOL, the latter term now being taken as one form of reference to future bliss [for many references, see R. H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (Oxford 1913) 1:861 s.v. "Paradise"].

Adam and Eve Expelled From Paradise and the Birth of Death, from Saint Augustine's "City of God," 1486–1587. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

In the New Testament Paradise is described with more restraint, and only three times by name. Of these references only Rv 2.7 is of interest. In this text the conquerors are promised the fruit of the Tree of Life that is in the Paradise of God. This fruit, symbolizing a very real spiritual value, is already available. Such a notion is common to New Testament thought, where union with Christ anticipates eschatological benefits. Revelation ch. 22 is filled with imagery drawn from Genesis ch. 2 and 3, although Paradise is not specifically named.

Paradise in the Present Age. If one makes the identification of the primeval Paradise with that to come, one might presuppose that Paradise has never ceased to exist. Such a notion could be derived from Gn 3.23–24, understood in a crassly literal sense. On the other hand, as the doctrine on RETRIBUTION after death developed, and a separate lot for the good and the wicked was postulated, speculation regarding entrance into Paradise quite normally increased. Some of the apocryphal writings state that after death and prior to resurrection the elect (and especially the Patriarchs) will be placed in Paradise (see Jubilees 4.23). The location of Paradise was likewise discussed. Some situated it, with Gn 2.8, in the East (e.g., Jubilees 8.16); others placed it in the North (Enoch 61.1–4; cf. 77.3; IS 14.13); and still others placed it in the West (reported by Josephus as Essene doctrine in Bell. Jud. 2.155–158; 4 Esdras 14.9). Still others assumed, seemingly, that after the Fall of Man, Paradise was removed from the earth and taken up to heaven with God (Life of Adam and Eve 25.3; Apocalypse of Baruch 4.6; 4 Esdras 4.7–8) and is, more precisely, in the “third heaven” (Apocalypse of Moses 37.5; Slavonic Enoch 8.1).

In the New Testament in Lk 23.43 Our Lord refers to the then already existing temporary abode of the just after their death. The notion is linked to that of ABRAHAM'S BOSOM, mentioned in Lk 16.23. In 2 Cor 12.2–4 Paradise is situated in the “third heaven” (an identification found in Slavonic Enoch 8.1), God's abode being the “seventh heaven.” Underlying the “great chasm” of Lk 16.26 is the same notion of temporary beatitude, opposed in this instance to HADES. With our present knowledge of the universe it is impossible to point toward Paradise, i.e., heaven, as a distinctive place, though it would seem preferable to conceive of it as a place distinct from the earth.

See Also: AFTERLIFE, 2.

Bibliography: C. COTHENET, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:1177–1220. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1720–25. P. HOFFMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:69–72. A. JEPSEN and F. HESSE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (ed. ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 5:96–100. J. JEREMIAS, G. KITTEL Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 5:763–771. J. L. MCKENZIE, “The Literary Characteristics of Gn 2–3,” Theological Studies 15 (1954) 541–572. H. RENCKENS, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. NAPIER (New York 1964) 204–213. J. DANIELOU, From Shadows to Reality, tr. W. HIBBERD (Westminster, Md. 1960) 11–65. J. WEISENGOFF, “Paradise and St. Luke 23:43,” American Ecclesiastical Review 103 (1940) 163–167.

[I. HUNT]

PARADOX

A statement that seems at first to defy ordinary understanding, even to the point of self-contradiction, but that may, on closer examination, prove to be well founded. The term has been applied to certain religious teachings, e.g., God at one time took on the identity of a particular man, and to antithetical sayings found in Scripture, such as St. Paul's description of the ministers of God, “As sorrowful yet always rejoicing; as poor yet enriching many; as having nothing yet possessing all things” (2 Cor 6.10). For paradoxical constructions arising in sciences such as metaphysics, logic, and mathematics, see ANTINOMY.

[H. A. NIELSEN]

PARAGUAY, JESUIT MARTYRS OF, SS.

Jesuit missionaries and martyrs; d. Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, Nov. 15 and 17, 1628; canonized at Asunción, Paraguay, by John Paul II, May 16, 1988.

Roch González de Santa Cruz, b. Asunción, Paraguay, 1576; d. Caaró, November 17; he dedicated his life to the evangelization of the native peoples. He was appointed priest of the cathedral and, in 1609, vicar-general of the diocese. On May 9, 1609, he entered the Society of Jesus. In 1615 he began his missionary work by founding the Reducción of Itapúa and in subsequent years other such settlements. In 1620 he was appointed by his superiors to give religious instruction to the inhabitants of the area that is now the Brazilian state of Rio Grande do Sul. There he was martyred at the Reducción of Todos los Santos, the last one he founded. He had two companions in his martyrdom.

Alonso Rodríguez, b. Zamora, Spain, March 10, 1598; d. Caaró, November 15. He entered the Society of Jesus on March 25, 1614, and arrived in Buenos Aires on Feb. 15, 1617. After completing his studies, he gave religious instruction to the native peoples for four years.

Juan del Castillo, b. Belmonte, Spain, Sept. 14, 1596; d. Iyúí in the Reducción of La Asunción, two days later (November 17). He entered the Society of Jesus on March 22, 1614. Assigned to Paraguay, he arrived in Buenos Aires with Rodríguez and worked among the native peoples there for three years.

Their bodies were taken first to the Reducción of Candelaria and later transferred to that of the Immaculate Conception. These Jesuits became the first American martyrs to be beatified (Jan. 28, 1934, by Pius XI).

Pope John Paul II praised the Paraguayan martyrs because “neither the obstacles of the wilderness, the misunderstanding of people, nor the attacks of those who saw their evangelizing activity as a threat to personal interests could intimidate these champions of the faith'' (canonization homily). They are patrons of native traditions.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: L. G. JAEGER, Os-bem aventurados Roque González, Alfonso Rodríguez e João del Castillo: Mártires do Caaró e Pirapó, 2d ed. (Pôrto Alegre 1951). L. KOHLER, Los tres héroes de Caaró y Pirapó (Posadas, Argentina 1978). G. MÁRKUS, The Radical Tradition: Revolutionary Saints in the Battle for Justice and Human Rights (New York 1993) 143–50. C. J. MCNASPY, Conquistador without Sword: The Life of Roque González (Chicago 1984), tr. of Roque González de Santacruz, un conquistador sin espada (Asunción, Paraguay 1983). H. THURSTON, "The First Beatified Martyr of Spanish America," Catholic Historical Review 20 (1934–35): 371–83. J. N. TYLENDÁ, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 387–92. R. E. VELÁZQUEZ, Roque González de Santa Cruz, colonia y reducciones en el Paraguay de 1600 (Asunción, Paraguay 1975).

[H. STORNI]

PARAGUAY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A landlocked country in the heart of South America, joined to the sea by the great Paraguay and Paraná rivers, the Republic of Paraguay is bordered on the north and northwest by Bolivia, on the northeast, east and southeast by Brazil, and on the southwest and west by Argentina. A predominately agricultural nation, Paraguay benefits from the Gran Chaco, an area of black, fertile pastureland and forest in its west; the eastern landscape rises to grass-covered plains and rolling hills, with marshes and shallow lakes to the south. The Paraguay River runs south through the center of the country on its way to the Atlantic Ocean. Natural resources include hydropower, timber, iron ore and manganese; agricultural products consist of cotton, sugarcane, soybeans, corn, wheat, tobacco, tapioca and fruits and vegetables.

Since becoming an independent republic in 1811, Paraguay has been involved in two international wars: that of the Triple Alliance against Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay (1865–70), during which most of its adult male population was killed, and the Chaco War against Bolivia (1932–35), during which it gained territorially. A military dictatorship was overthrown in 1989, ushering in a series of freely elected, democratic governments. The population of Paraguay was overwhelmingly mestizo by 2000. Deforestation—the result of employing slash and burn methods to render farmland—resulted in a loss of five million acres of rain forest by 2000.

The Early Church. The area was originally inhabited by the Cario people and was discovered by Alejo Gar-

Capital: Asunción.

Size: 157,000 sq. miles.

Population: 5,585,830 in 2000.

Languages: Spanish; Guaraní is spoken in rural areas.

Religions: 5,470,200 Catholics (90%), 276,330 Protestants (5%), 3,500 Jews (.06%), 2,000 Muslims (.03%), 256,800 without religious affiliation.

Archdiocese: Asunción, with suffragans Alto Paraná, Benjamin Aceval, Caacupé, Carapeguá, Concepción, Coronel Oviedo, Encarnación, San Juan Bautista de Las Misiones, San Lorenzo, San Pedro, and Villarrica del Espíritu Santo. Apostolic vicariates are located in Chaco Paraguayo and Pilcomaya, and a military ordinariate is also located in the country.

ría in 1524, after which colonization was begun. During the colonial period Spain provided an ample number of priests for the area and protected the religious orders in order to evangelize the Cario and multiply the subjects of the Crown. The Franciscans arrived in 1537, and from Asunción carried on missions in interior regions. Among the early missionaries were Alonso Lebrón, Alonso de San Buenaventura, Luis de BOLAÑOS, Bernardo de Armenta and the natives Gabriel de la Anunciación and Francisco de Guzmán. The first bishop to arrive was Pedro Fernández de la Torre. Mercedarians, Hieronymites and Dominicans preceded the Jesuits, each orders with schools and convents. The most famous Jesuits in colonial Paraguay were Manuel de Lorenzana, Antonio RUÍZ DE MONTOYA, Nicolás del TECHO, Pedro LOZANO, Francisco Xavier de Charlevoix, Nicolás Yapuguai, José Guevara, Simón Bandini, José CARDIEL, José Insaurralde, Diego de Boroa, Manuel Paramás, Nicolás Mastrilli, Alonso Barzana, Martín DOBRIZHOFFER, Pablo Restivo, José Sánchez Labrador, Pedro Montenegro, Roque González de Santa Cruz, Domingo Muriel and José Quiroga. The principal obstacles for the propagation of the faith were learning of languages, the nomadic character of the native Cario, the ravages of the Portuguese bandeirantes, and the conflicts between political and religious authorities. The first missionaries used music and gifts to attract the Cario, and after learning their language they used songs and prayers to gain participants in their doctrinas and oratories, the foundations of the REDUCTIONS that were large communal centers of learning and enterprise. The success of the reductions became of concern to the government, which successfully dismantled them in 1768 by removing the Jesuits from Paraguay.

As the Catholic population grew, so did the need for a hierarchy. The Church of Asunción was erected in 1547, and the canonical founder of the see of Paraguay was the Spaniard Juan de Barrios, although he never reached his bishopric but was succeeded by Pedro Fernández de la Torre (1556–72). During the first four centuries of its existence, the see was governed for only 200 years and was otherwise vacant or abandoned. Of the first 40 bishops, only 20 came to Paraguay. In 1929 the ecclesiastical Province of Paraguay was erected.

The Church and an Independent State. The most important institute founded in Asunción during the colonial period was the Colegio Seminario Conciliar de San Carlos, which was inaugurated on April 12, 1783 and educated almost all the leaders of the independence movement. During the colonial period the Church was very rich, and held ranches on government lands. During the independence period the Church was sympathetic toward the revolution and some priests worked for its success. No major reform touched the Church as a result of independence, which was gained on May 14, 1811, although relations between Church and State became relatively tense because of the right of patronage that the new state assumed and that influenced the election of bishops. In 1822 the dictator José Gaspar de Francia confiscated all Church properties and transformed its convents into barracks. During the War of the Triple Alliance the most serious crisis occurred between Church and State as a result of the execution of Bishop Manuel Antonio PALACIOS in 1868.

There was no lack of priests until the War of the Triple Alliance. At that point, Isidro Gavilán reorganized the Church due to a lack of clergy, and the Church was leaderless for 11 years. The first postwar priests were ordained in 1886 by Bishop Pedro Juan Aponte. They included Juan Sinfioriano BOGARÍN, who later became the first archbishop of Asunción. Their funds came from the foreign mission bureaus of each order and the contributions of the faithful, and their work supplemented the social work of the state.

The Modern Church. Following the War of the Triple Alliance, Paraguay went into an economic decline, due predominately to the lack of its adult male workforce, most of whom had been killed or maimed during the war. In 1932 the country found itself at war again, this time with Bolivia, from which it won several large areas of land in the Chaco by 1935. This fertile region, believed to contain oil reserves, sparked an improvement in Paraguay's economic outlook. In 1954 Gen. Alfredo Stroessner took power in a coup backed by the U. S. government. While some efforts were made to aid landless peasants, the declining economy forced the government to become increasingly repressive.

During the mid-20th century, the Church was still under the protection of the state and was supported by the contributions of the faithful. Absolute divorce was not recognized; only physical and financial separation was legal under Paraguayan law. The Universidad Católica Nuestra Señora de la Asunción, founded in 1960, was the first private university officially recognized by the Paraguayan government. In addition there were primary and secondary schools conducted by religious throughout the republic. In spite of these schools, the influence of Catholic teaching in the country was not high, and this trend continued into the next few decades as the forces of liberalism and anticlericalism collided with the region's increasing economic decline and the resultant poverty and unemployment. The dictatorship of President Alfredo Stroessner, which had by now lost U.S. backing, drew increasing ire from Church leaders, who blamed his mismanagement for the nation's economy. Due to the increase in evangelical missionaries, Protestant activity grew in the region, its influence spreading through the rural areas in particular.

In 1989 a military coup led by General Andrés Rodríguez deposed Stroessner, in part in defense of the Church. Under the civilian presidency of Juan Carlos Wasmosy, who gained power in democratic elections in 1993, the economic crisis continued, forcing the unemployed into protest marches by mid-decade. An election later in the decade was followed by upheaval as President Raul Cubas was implicated in the March of 1999 murder of vice president Luis María Argana and forced to resign. While attempting to prevent the collapse of democracy against such upheaval, Church leaders remained outspoken in the political arena, particularly in regard to issues of social welfare, and denounced the corruption that had pervaded both society and government. In 1997 the government initiated a training program, to be run by the Catholic Church, to train the nation's military in "the respect of human dignity and in a culture of social peace and reconciliation."

Photograph of a Paraguayan at the Roman Catholic mission of Santa Teresa, in the Chaco. (©Richard Bailey/CORBIS)

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 323 parishes tended by 250 diocesan and 441 religious priests. Other religious, which included approximately 180 brothers and 1,300 sisters, dedicated themselves to the propagation of the faith, teaching at the 160 primary and 131 secondary schools and assisting in hospitals, at missions established in the interior of the country, homeless shelters and other centers of social assistance. In 1998 the apostolic nunciature opened a hospital for HIV-positive children to be administered by the Vincentian Sisters, at Tablada Nueva, in honor of the 20th anniversary of Pope John Paul II's pontificate. Despite the fact that the government had no state religion, the Church often performed Mass at state functions. Paraguay's traditional pilgrimage was to the Sanctuary of the Virgin of the Miracles in Caacupé, near Asunción, which had a legendary origin.

Bibliography: A. N. ACHÁ DUARTE, Anuario eclesiástico del Paraguay (Asunción 1963). Registro oficial de la República del Paraguay (1869). H. FERREIRA GUBETICH, Geografía del Paraguay (4th ed. Asunción 1960). G. FURLONG CÁRDIFF, Misiones y sus pueblos guaraníes (Buenos Aires 1956). C. R. CENTURIÓN, Historia de las letras paraguayas, 3 v. (Buenos Aires 1947–51); Historia de la cultura paraguaya, 2 v. (2d ed. Buenos Aires 1961).

[C. R. CENTURIÓN/EDS.]

PARALIPOMENON (CHRONICLES), BOOKS OF

Paralipomenon, or, first and second Chronicles, are the names given to the two books, originally one, that recount the history of the chosen people from a postexilic viewpoint, tracing it from Adam to the Edict of Cyrus in 538 B.C., but concentrating mostly on the history of the Judean monarchy. Palestinian Jews (and Hebrew printed Bibles) called these books (sēper) dibrê hayyāmîm, a title idiomatically equivalent to “annals” or “happenings of the times.” Greek-speaking Jews in their Septuagint (followed by the Vulgate and some modern editions) referred to these books by the name παραλειπόμενα, which the Fathers of the Church understood as designating the books' content, “things omitted” (from previous Biblical histories). Some scholars, however, prefer to translate παραλειπόμενα as “things transmitted.” St. Jerome, in his Prologus galeatus, says that these books are a “chronicle of the whole of divine history,” with which phrase the modern appellation of these books, Chronicles, agrees. For these books themselves, see CHRONICLER, BIBLICAL.

[N. J. MCELENEY]

PARAY-LE-MONIAL

City in Saône-et-Loire department, Diocese of AUTUN, Burgundy, east central France. Next to LOURDES, it is the most popular pilgrimage center in France (since 1865). The rural parish Paray became le-Monial when CLUNIAC monks were sent there by St. MAJOLUS at the request of Count Lambert of Chalon (973), who endowed the foundation and gave a charter to the people. As the population increased, the monastery became a priory under Cluny and continued so, the prior being lord of the town, until 1789. The monastery church, dedicated to Our Lady in 977 and consecrated in 1004 by Bp. Hugh of AUXERRE, Lambert's son, was replaced c. 1100 by the present model of Burgundian Romanesque (with a semi-circular choir beneath an octagonal tower 184 feet high and a 14th-century fresco of Christ Pantocrator, discovered in 1935). In 1794 the city purchased the church, which revolutionaries were about to destroy. Following the revelations of the Sacred Heart to St. Margaret Mary ALACOQUE (1673–75), the church became the Basilica of the Sacred Heart (1875). The shrine of the revelations and the saint's relics are in the Visitation monastery founded through the efforts of Jesuits (1626), who had established a mission in Paray to combat Calvinism (1619). The relics of Bl. Claude de LA COLOMBIÈRE were translated from the monastery to the Jesuit chapel (1930). The hospital of Paray, originally under Benedictines, is now staffed by Sisters of St. Marthe. Other monuments in Paray include the Chapel of Notre Dame de Romay, the tower of St. Nicholas, the hôtel de ville, and Hiéron (a Eucharistic museum founded in 1893).

Bibliography: É. LECANUET, L'Église de France sous la Troisième République, 4 v. (Paris 1930–31) v.1. A. GAUDILLIÈRE, Lumières de Paray (St. Léger-Vauban 1955). J. VIREY, Paray-le-Monial et les églises du Brionnais (new ed. Paris 1962).

[M. L. LYNN]

PAREDES Y FLORES, MARIANA DE JESÚS, ST.

Also known as Mariana of Quito, the “Lily of Ecuador”; b. Quito, Ecuador, Oct. 31, 1618; d. there, May 26, 1645. The eighth child of Jerónimo Zenel Paredes y Flores and Mariana Jaramillo de Granobles, Mariana upon her parents' death was left to the care of her sister, Jerónima, and brother-in-law, Cosme de Caso. Since the child had already begun her life of prayer, fasting, and penance, her guardians found a religious adviser for her in the Jesuit priest, Juan Camacho. She had a series of Jesuit confessors, but her most influential spiritual adviser was the Jesuit lay brother, Hernando de la Cruz. As models for her spiritual life she chose St. CATHERINE OF SIENA, St. ROSE OF LIMA, and St. TERESA OF ÁVILA. Mariana did not enter a convent, but spent most of her time in an austere furnished upper room in her sister's house. She wore a black garment modeled on the Jesuit cassock. Tradition holds that she joined the Third Order of St. Francis at age 21 and wore its cord; though she never wore the habit while she was alive, she was buried with it over her black “Jesuit dress.” While continuing her life of personal mortification, she encouraged the poor, hungry, and ill to come to her for help. In her sister's house she developed a kind of free clinic and a school room in which she taught native children. A number of times she predicted that the house would eventually become a Carmelite convent. In 1645, when Lima was visited with a number of calamities—earthquakes, epidemics, volcanic eruptions—Mariana publicly offered her life for the benefit of the city. Within the generation after her death the process for beatification was begun, but it was beset with mishaps to the documents and the sponsors. She was finally canonized by PIUS XII on July 9, 1950.

Sacre-Coeur Basilica in Paray-le-Monial. (©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

Feast: May 26.

Bibliography: C. M. LARREA, Las biografías de Santa Mariana de Jesús (Quito 1970). F. P. KEYES, The Rose and the Lily (New York 1961). A. ESPINOSA PÓLIT, Santa Mariana de Jesús hija de la Compañía de Jesús (Quito 1957).

[J. M. VARGAS]

PAREJA, FRANCISCO

Mercedarian chronicler; place and date of birth unknown; d. Sept. 9, 1688. Nothing is known of his early years, not even his parents' names. He probably studied at the Mercedarian convent in Mexico City. In 1652 he was in Spain. He was the first rector of the San Ramón

Nonato College in Mexico City (1654); professor of theology at the University of Mexico (1656); provincial twice (1655 and 1668); and provincial chronicler (1671). His main literary work was Crónica de la provincia de la Visitación de Ntra. Sra. de la Merced redención de cautivos, de Nueva España, which was completed Nov. 4, 1687. It remained unedited for two centuries. Cristobal de Aldana published a compendium of it about 1770; this edition was poorly printed and lacked a press signature. Juan Rodríguez Puebla (1798–1848), Mexican educator, made a manuscript copy of Pareja's Crónica. This copy was taken to Europe in 1869 and sold to a London bookseller, but was not published. The original manuscript, signed by Pareja, was discovered in Mexico and then published in two volumes in 1882–83. The unsigned preface contains historical information on Pareja and the vicissitudes the manuscript had gone through. The Crónica has three distinct parts: the first is an account of the Mercedarian pioneers in Mexico; the second is concerned with the Mercedarians who came to Mexico in 1576 to found a permanent community and carries the history to 1687; the third part is a collection of documents, added by editors, bringing the history of the order up to 1844. Pareja's purpose was to support his claim that the Mercedarians came to Mexico before the Franciscans, Dominicans, or Augustinians. The Crónica is very useful for the history of the Mercedarian Order. Two copies are extant: one in the library of the Museo de Antropología e Historia in Mexico City; the other in the Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.

[E. GÓMEZ TAGLE]

PAREJA, FRANCISCO DE

Franciscan missionary in Florida; dates of birth and death unknown. He was a native of Auñón, Spain, and joined the Franciscan Order in the Province of Castile. Pareja went to Florida as an Indian missionary in 1595 and served at San Juan del Puerto (in the area of modern Jacksonville) until 1616. He was then elected provincial of the Province of Santa Elena, which comprised Cuba, Florida, and Georgia. According to Fray Luis Gerónimo de Oré, visitor general to Florida in 1616, Pareja was a missionary of great sanctity and incredible zeal; he had expert knowledge of the Timucuan language. He wrote valuable mission reports and made frequent trips into the interior. Pareja composed the following works, all of which were printed in Mexico: Cathecismo en lengua castellana y timuquana (1612), Cathecismo y breve exposición de la doctrina Christiana (1612), Confessionario en lengua castellana y timuquana (1613), Arte y pronunciación en lengua timuquana y castellana (1614), and Cathecismo y examen para los que comulgan en lengua castellana y timuquana (1627).

Bibliography: L. J. DE ORÉ, Relación histórica de la Florida, escrita en el siglo XVII, ed. A. LÓPEZ, 2 v. (Madrid 1931–33); The Martyrs of Florida (1513–1616), tr. M. J. GEIGER (Franc Studies 18; New York 1936). M. J. GEIGER, The Franciscan Conquest of Florida (1573–1618) (Washington 1937).

[M. GEIGER]

PARENESIS

Parenesis (also spelled paraenesis) is derived from the Greek parainesis, advice, or paraineō, advise, recommend, urge, exhort. The word has been taken over from Greek rhetorical vocabulary by Biblical scholars as a technical description for passages with an exhortatory content concerned with proper moral or religious living. In the NT the term is found twice, both times in verbal form (Acts 27.9, 22). Passages judged to be parenetic often contain the similarly used parakaleō, exhort (e.g., Rom 12.1; 1 Thes 4.1; 1 Pt 2.11; 5.1).

Parenesis tends to be expressed briefly by using a succession of imperative statements. It gives personal counsel on moral and spiritual matters, practical advice for the listener or reader. A dominant feature of such exhortation is the use of traditional materials, especially popular maxims of wisdom passed on from generation to generation. Parenetic writing is characterized by the author's selection of a topos, i.e., focus upon a particular topic of moral concern. The development of the topos often uses such figures as similes, metaphors, parables, allegories, fables, and myths. The parenetic teaching may also be set forth in antitheses, i.e., expressed in the distinctive dualistic motif of the "two ways." Finally, parenesis is inclined to use catalogues of virtues and vices, groups of sayings, and, in some instances, Haustafeln, tables of household duties.

Biblical Instances. While parenesis is easily recognizable in the OT (e.g., in the wisdom literature in Prv 10.1–22.16, the "Proverbs of Solomon," and throughout Sir), most attention has been directed to its presence in the NT. Major sections of Paul's writings are considered to be parenetic (1 Thes 4–5; Gal 5–6; 1 Cor 6–7; Rom 6, 12–15). Various other epistles have parenetic sections throughout (Heb, 1 Pt) or are entirely so (Jas).

Twentieth-century assessments by A. Malherbe and S. Stowers warn, however, that parenesis has been generally understood too narrowly in New Testament studies as the stringing together of traditional precepts and exhortations usually placed before the conclusion of a letter. In their judgment parenesis includes not only precepts but also such things as advice, supporting argumentation, various modes of encouragement and dissuasion, the use of examples, models of conduct, etc. Thus, it is argued, for example that 1 Thessalonians as a whole is a parenetic letter using such rhetoric. In this approach the pastoral epistles would also be termed parenetic insofar as they compare well with fictitious letters of exhortation written in the names of various philosophers. Romans is the letter of Paul that comes closest to having a discrete parenetic section (chs. 12–15), but this is deemed misleading because the earlier part of the letter also has exhortatory materials (ch. 6).

Patristic Literature and Moral Theology. Parenesis is also frequently found in patristic writings (see e.g., Didache; Epistle of Barnabas; 1 Clement; Polycarp, Philippians; Basil, Letter 2; Augustine, Letters 19, 112, 210). The most outstanding example of the "two ways" motif in all of early Christian exhortation is that found in the beginning of the Didache: "There are two ways: a way of life and a way of death; and the difference between these two ways is great."

The early Christian proclamation of Christ, the kyrgma, is related by many to parenesis analogously as gift and task, indicative and imperative, and from the perspective of theological reflection as dogmatics and ethics.

Thus the good news of the gospel is seen as the basis for the claims of parenesis. At the same time, it has been observed that parenesis draws attention to an essential element in the preaching of God's word: "It does not merely instruct, but paves the way for and reveals the blessed reality that is preached, liberating, consoling, fortifying its hearers and enabling them to accept it: a law which gives to them the power they need to fulfill it" (Rahner-Vorgrimler, p. 336).

Parenesis has moved also into the vocabulary of some moral theologians (e.g., B. Schüller and R. McCormick) as a term designating a supposedly distinct type of moral discourse. These moralists stress a difference between, and the perils of confusing, normative ethics with exhortatory moralizing, i.e., parenesis. Parenesis is understood to be a kind of verbal or exemplary persuasion to behave in a way that is already conceded to be the right way of behaving; the parenetic discourse is basically motivational, while the normative ethical formulation is mainly declarative. It has been argued in response (e.g., by J. Gaffney), however, that such a distinction is too sharply drawn and that the exhortation these theologians call parenesis is in fact integrally part and parcel of the moral norms to which it refers.

Bibliography: J. GAFFNEY, "On Parenesis and Fundamental Moral Theology," Journal of Religious Ethics 11 (1983) 23–34. A. J. MALHERBE, "Exhortation in First Thessalonians," Novum Testamentum 25 (1983) 238–256. J. I. H. MCDONALD, Kerygma and Didache. The Articulation and Structure of the Earliest Christian Message, Society for New Testament Studies, Monograph 37 (Cambridge 1980). K. RAHNER and H. VORGRIMLER, "Parenesis," Theological Dictionary (Freiburg 1965) 335–336. D. SCHROEDER, "Parenesis," The Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible supplement, ed. K. CRIM et al. (Nashville 1976) 643. S. K. STOWERS, Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity, Library of Early Christianity 5 (Philadelphia 1986).

[F. M. GILLMAN]

PARIS, INSTITUT CATHOLIQUE DE

An institution of higher learning, the Catholic university of Paris.

History. In 1845 Denis Auguste Affre, Archbishop of Paris, opened an ecclesiastical school of higher learning in a former Carmelite convent. It was an old building situated in a large park where, in the 17th century, the Carmelites, desirous of introducing St. Teresa's reform into France, had established residence. It was in this house and park that in September 1792 the priests and bishops (240 in number) imprisoned in the convent were massacred. Their remains were buried in the crypt of the church. J. B. LACORDAIRE, OP, lived in the same house for several years and F. Ozanam is interred there (1853).

In 1875 the French parliament passed a law granting freedom to higher education and permitting the establishment of private universities. That same year 22 bishops meeting in Paris decided to found a Catholic university in the capital. The three Faculties of Law, Letters, and Science were thereupon established and the Catholic University of Paris inaugurated July 16, 1876. It lacked only a Faculty of Theology, which was difficult to found since there already existed a state Faculty of Theology at the Sorbonne. This, however, was suppressed in 1886 and another one established at the Catholic University in 1889.

In the meantime, the law of 1880 curtailed freedom of higher education by denying private institutions the power to grant degrees and the right to use the title university. Thenceforth the Catholic University of Paris had to be satisfied with the title Catholic Institute of Paris, which it still bears.

The years 1893 to 1910 were very trying ones for the Catholic Institute, which had to cope with serious financial difficulties (1893–95) and problems arising from what was later known as Modernism, a movement precipitated by theories on the inspiration of Sacred Scripture and its historical value proposed by Alfred LOISY, whom Maurice d' Hulst, the rector, and Louis DUCHESNE had appointed to the Catholic Institute in 1893. Following the Modernist crisis, the Faculty of Theology was reorganized and the major chairs of dogma, apologetics, and moral philosophy were entrusted to the Society of Jesus. In 1906, acting on the law of separation, the state confiscated the property and buildings of the Catholic Institute. They were not bought back until 1923. The importance of the canonical Faculties (Theology, Philosophy, and Canon Law) was established in 1935 when the Catholic Institute, having adopted the constitution Deus scientiarum Dominus, was named a pontifical university.

Development. The Catholic Institute witnessed much growth after World War I. It has witnessed the multiplication of affiliated institutes and schools which, because of their specialization, have succeeded in eliminating the rigid programs imposed in the Faculties and in opening up its instruction to newly emerging disciplines. The Institute is composed of three Faculties of Religious Sciences (Theology, Canon Law, and Philosophy) and three of Humanities (Law, Literature and Natural Sciences). There are schools of liturgy, Oriental languages, social sciences, Christian Greek and Latin, French language and culture, and numerous affiliated research centers and institutes. Each Faculty, Institute, or School has its own program, examinations, and diplomas, the most common of which are the licentiate and the doctorate. Each has its own dean (Faculties), director, or president (Schools and Institutes), assisted by a council that determines internal affairs and elects the professors. The decisions of these councils are approved by the rectoral council.

Faculties, Schools, and Institutes all enjoy administrative, but not financial, autonomy; the recruitment and titles of professors vary according to each Faculty, School, or Institute. Chaplains are responsible for the students' religious instruction and formation. Representatives chosen by the students assure rapport between teachers and pupils. The latter have their own autonomous organizations.

Bibliography: Annuaire de l'Institut catholique de Paris. Nouvelles de l'Institut catholique, periodical. A. BAUDRILLART, Vie de Monseigneur d'Hulst, v. (Paris 1912–14); L'Institut catholique (Paris 1930); Vingt-cinq ans de rectorat: L'Institut catholique de Paris (1907–1932) (Paris 1932). J. BRUGERETTE, Le Prêtre français et la société contemporaine, 3 v. (Paris 1933–38) v.2 Vers la séparation J. CALVET, "L'Institut catholique de Paris" in L. HALPHEN et al., Aspects de l'Université de Paris (Paris 1949) 251–266.

[E. JARRY/EDS.]

PARIS, MARTYRS OF

This term refers to a group of 191 men who were beatified after being put to death in various Parisian prisons during the FRENCH REVOLUTION. They are sometimes called the September Martyrs because their execution occurred on Sept. 2 or 3, 1792, as part of the September massacres during the first Reign of Terror. The catalogue of beatified martyrs includes 2 archbishops, 1 bishop, 176 priests, 1 lay brother, 5 deacons, 1 tonsured cleric, and 5 laymen. The martyrdoms occurred in 4 places: 95 executed in the Carmelite convent, 72 in the Vincentian seminary of St. Firmin, 21 in the Abbey of SAINT-GERMAIN-DES-PRÉS, and 3 in the prison of La Force.

The Circumstances. Two sets of circumstances led up to the massacres. The first was the strong opposition of a large part of the French clergy to the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, resulting in their refusal to take the required oath to support it. The second was the critical situation that developed from the military reverses of the revolutionary armies and that permitted bitterly antireligious groups to operate freely. Following the manifesto (July 11, 1792) of the Duke of Brunswick, leader of the Prussian forces, threatening vengeance on the French for mistreating their rulers, the Parisian mob stormed the Tuileries (August 10), massacred the Swiss guards, and imprisoned King Louis XVI and the Queen in the Temple. Effective power in the capital passed from the Legislative Assembly to the Commune and the Jacobin clubs. Municipalities received authorization (August 11) to arrest suspects, including nonjuring priests. Most priests in the provinces went into exile following the decree of August 11 that banished them. In Paris ecclesiastics and other suspects were herded into Bicêtre, Châtelet, the Conciergerie, La Force, and other prisons, or into the jails improvised in the Carmelite convent, St. Firmin, and Saint-Germain-des-Prés. Panic spread as fears of invasion grew. When false rumors circulated (September 2) that Verdun had surrendered and that the prisoners were preparing an uprising, mobs invaded the prisons and executed hundreds after summary trials. About three-fourths of the victims, totaling between 1,100 and 1,400, were criminals. Some were political prisoners, but the clerics had been incarcerated for religious reasons. Beatification occurred only in cases where it was proved that death was inflicted for reasons of faith. Almost all the beatified martyrs were massacred for their refusal to support by oath the Civil Constitution. In 1926 the Congregation of Rites deferred action on 22 other persons who were put to death in the last three of the above-named prisons. None of those who were put to death in other prisons during the September massacres have been beatified.

The Martyrs. The list of beatified martyrs follows (with year of birth noted when known).

At the Carmelite convent perished Jean Marie du Lau d'Alleman (b. 1738), Archbishop of Arles; François Joseph de LA ROCHEFOUCAULD MAUMONT (1736), Bishop of Beauvais; and his brother Pierre Louis de la Rouchefoucauld Bayers (1744), Bishop of Saintes.

Most of the martyred priests belonged to the Archdiocese of PARIS. Several of them, who came from other French dioceses, were residing in the capital. About one-third of the secular priests had been stationed in one or another of 26 dioceses throughout the country. Their occupations were diversified. The majority were engaged in pastoral work as pastors, curates, or chaplains; several served in seminaries as superiors, professors, or librarians; and some were vicars general of dioceses or held other equally important administrative posts.

The following were secular priests: Vincent Abraham (1740), André Alricy (1712), Daniel André Des Pommerayes (1756), André Angar, Jean Aubert, Pierre Balzac (1750), Jean Bangué (1744), Louis Barret (1753), Joseph Bécavin (1767), Louis Remi Benoist (1740), his brother Louis Remi Nicolas Benoist (1755), Michel Binard (1742), Robert le Bis (1719), Nicolas Bize (1737), Pierre Bonsé (1719), Jean Bottex (1749), Jean Bousquet (1751), Antoine du Bouzet (1739), Pierre Briquet, Pierre Brisse (1733), Jean Capeau, Charles Carnus (1749), Jean Caron (1730), Bertrand de Caupenne (1753), Armand Chapt de Rastignac (1727), Claude Chaudet, Antoine Boucharenc de Chaumeils (1738), Nicolas Claret

(1726), Claude Colin (1728), Nicolas Colin (1750), Louis le Danois (1741), François Dardan (1733), Mathurin Deruelle, Gabriel Desprez de Roche (1751, vicar general of the Archdiocese of Paris), Thomas Dubuisson (1737), Jacques Dufour, François Dumasrambaud de Calandelle (1754), Denis Duval (1740), Henri Ermès, Joseph Falcoz (1726), Gilbert Fautrel (1730), Claude Fontaine (1749), Armand de Foucauld de Pontbriand (1751), Philibert Fougères (1742), Michel de la Gardette (1744), Pierre Garrigues (1725), Nicolas Gaudreau (1744), Louis Gaultier (1717), Pierre Gervais (1753), Étienne Gillet (1758), Georges Girous (1765), Jean Goizet (1742), André Grasset de Saint-Sauveur (born in Canada 1758), Joseph Gros (1742), Jean Guilleminet (1738), Yves Guillon de Keranrum (1748, vice chancellor of the University of Paris), Julien Hédouin (1760), Pierre Hénocq (1749), Saintin Huré (1765), Jean Jannin (1754), Pierre Joret (1761), Jean Le Laisant (1753) and his brother Julien (1761), Gilbert Lanchon (1754), Jacques de la Lande (1735), Pierre Landry (1762), Jean Lanier (1753), Laurent, Jean de Lavèze Belay (1742), Michel Leber (1731), Jean Lecan, Pierre Leclercq (or Clerq, 1744), Olivier Lefebvre (1728), Jean Legrand (1745), Jacques Lejardinier des Landes (1750), Jean Lemaitre (1767), Jean Leroy (1738), François Londiveau (1764), Louis Longuet (1757), Martin Loublrier (1733), Jacques de Lubersac (1729), Louis Mauduit (1763), Gaspard Maignien (1752), Jean Marchand (1765), Claude Marmotant (1748), Claude Mayneaud de Bisefranc (1750), François Méallet de Fargues (1764), Jacques Menuret (1734), Jacques Le Meunier (1747), Henri Millet (1760), François Monnier (1763), Thomas Monsaint (1725), Marie François Mouffle (1754), Jean Baptiste Nativelle (1743) and his brother René (1751), Mathias Nogier (1764), Joseph Oviefve (1748), Joseph Pazery de Thorame (1751), his brother Jules (1763) and uncle Pierre (1735), François Pey (1759), Jean Philippot (1743), Pierre Ploquin (1762), René Poret (1732), Julien Poulain de Launay (1744), Jean Quéneau (1758), Jacques Rabé (1750), Jean Rateau (1758), Pierre Régnet (1755), Yves Rey de Kervisic (1761), Nicholas Roussel (1730), Marc Royer (1720), Jean de Saint Clair (1734), Pierre Saint James (1742), Urbain Salin de Niart (1760), Henri Samson (1754), Jacques Schmid (1752), Jean Séguin (1754), Jean Simon, Pierre de Turmenyes (1744), René Urvoy (1766), Pierre Verrier (1722), and Pierre Vitalis (1759).

Priests belonging to the regular clergy included three Maurists: Louis Barreau de La Touche (1758), René Massey (1732), and Ambroise Chevreux (1728), the superior general. Jean Bonnel de Pradal (1738) and Claude Ponse (1729) belonged to the Canons Regular of St. Genevieve; Jean Bernard (1759), to the Canons Regular of St. Victor. Jean Burté (1740) was a Conventual Franciscan;

Jean Morel (Père Apollinaire, 1739), a Capuchin; and Georges Girault (Père Severin, 1728), a Third Order Franciscan. Charles Hurtrel (1760) was a Minim. Claude Bochot (1720) and Eustache Félix (1735) were Doctrinarians. François Hébert (1735), Pierre Pottier (1743), and François Lefranc (1739), assistant to the superior general, were Eudists. Urbain Lefebvre (1725) was a member of the Paris Foreign Mission Society. The Vincentians numbered Jean Gruyer (1734) and Louis François (1751), head of the Parisian seminary of St. Firmin.

The Sulpicians supplied 12 martyred priests: Bernard Cucsac (1728), Thomas Dubray, Jacques Galais (1754), Pierre Gaugain (1725), Pierre Guérin (1759), Jacques Hourrier (1751), Henri Luzeau de la Mulonnière (1762), Jean Pontus, Pierre Psalmon (1749), Claude Rousseau (1751), Jean Savine (1760), and Jean Tessier. Six of them had been in charge of seminaries.

Twenty-three priests had been JESUITS until the suppression of the order. They were: René Andrieux (1742), François Balmain (1733), Jean Benoît (1731), Charles Béraud du Pérou (1737), Jacques Bonnaud (1740), Claude Cayx-Dumas (1724), Jean Charton de Millou (1736), Guillaume Delfaut (1733), Jacques Friteyre-Durvé (1725), Claude Cagnières des Granges (1722), Charles Le Gué (1724), Pierre Guérin du Rocher (1759) and his brother Robert (1736), Éloy Herque du Roule (1741), Anne Alexandre Lanfant (1726), Claude Laporte (1734), François Le Livec de Tresurin (1726), Thomas Loup (called Bonnotte, 1719), Vincent le Rousseau (1726), Jean Seconds (1734), François Vareille-Duteil (1734), Nicolas Verron (1740), and Mathurin de la Villecrohain le Bous de Villeneuve (1731).

Louis Boubert (1766), Louis Hurtrel (brother of Bl. Charles Hurtrel, the Minim), Jacques Robert de Lezardièrre (1768), Étienne de Ravinel (1769), and Charles Veret (1763) were seminarians who had received the diaconate. Nezel, a tonsured cleric, was a professor at the Sulpician seminary in Issy, near Paris. Guillaume Nicolas Leclercq (Brother Solomon, 1745) was general secretary of the Christian Brothers.

Five laymen complete the catalogue. Sebastien Desbrielles (1739) and Jean Duval had been teachers, and Louis Rigot (1751), a sacristan. Jean de Villette (1731) and Charles Régis de la Calmette, Count of Valfons, were former army officers.

The entire group was beatified Oct. 17, 1926.

Feast: Sept. 2 or 4.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 18 (Rome 1926) 415–425, 439–447. G. LENÔTRE, Les Massacres de Septembre (Paris 1907); La Maison des Carmes (Paris 1933). H. WELSCHINGER, Les Martyrs de Septembre (Paris 1927). P. CARON, Les Mas- sacres de Septembre (Paris 1935). J. HÉRISSAY, Les Journées de Septembre (Paris 1946). H. FOUQUERAY, Un Groupe des Martyrs de Septembre 1792: Vingt-trois anciens Jésuites (Paris 1926). W. J. BATTERSBY, Brother Solomon, Martyr of the French Revolution (New York 1960). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 9:53–71, good bibliog.

[W. J. BATTERSBY]

PARIS, UNIVERSITY OF

One of the oldest and most influential universities of Europe, founded as a voluntary association of teaching masters in the 13th century.

Origin and Early Development Before 1500

At the turn of the 12th century, such masters as Anselm of Laon, William of Champeaux, Peter Abelard, William of Conches, Adam du Petit Pont, Gilbert de la Porrée, Alan of Lille, and Richard and Hugh of Saint-Victor had attracted to Paris large numbers of masters and students from all parts of Europe. As a result of the influx, many of the teaching masters, especially those attached to the School of Notre Dame Cathedral, found it necessary to teach outside the cathedral cloister. They lectured in the open streets, particularly in the Rue du Fouarre, in the schools of the Abbey of Mont Ste. Geneviève; on the Petit Pont, and, in the vicinity of Saint Germain-des-Prés, on the left bank of the Seine, henceforth known as the Latin quarter. The masters thus removed from the immediate control of the cathedral organized themselves, in accord with the contemporary guild movement, into a corporate association bound together by oath.

The masters' association was formally approved in 1200 when King Philip Augustus accorded the masters the charter of privileges that guaranteed them exemptions and immunity from the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the local provost and his magistrates, and recognized that as clerics they were subject to their own elected officials and to the bishop of Paris. Between 1208 and 1215 the university obtained papal sanction as a corporate association with the right to representation at the papal court, to have a seal of its own, and to regulate the dress, method of teaching, and the funerals of its deceased masters. It also affirmed the university's independence from the jurisdiction and control of the cathedral chancellor. Although the chancellor retained the power to confer the license to teach (licentia docendi), he could not withhold it from anyone judged competent or qualified by a majority of the teaching masters. As a result of another revolt against local authorities, Gregory IX reinforced the university's autonomous rights in the bull Parens scientiarum (April 13, 1231), often referred to as the Magna Carta of the university. The provisions of this bull reaffirmed the university's right to make its own rules and regulations regarding the curriculum, the individual members of the association, and the rents of hospices, and to call a cessation of lectures whenever any of these rights were violated or abrogated.

Organization. By the early 13th century the teaching masters were differentiated into four Faculties: Arts, Medicine, Canon Law, and Theology.

Nations. The Faculty of Arts, the most numerous of the Faculties and the stepping stone to the others, was at an early period divided into four nations: French, Picard, Norman, and English (English-German). These nations, representing primarily geographical regions rather than states or localities, were probably based on an earlier voluntary grouping of the masters and students according to the land from which they had come or in which they were born. Masters in the French nation came not only from France but also from southern and eastern Europe and from Asia Minor; in the Picard, from Flanders and the Walloon country; in the Norman, from Normandy and Brittany; and in the English (English-German), from the British Isles, Holland, the Germanies, and Scandinavia, as well as from Hungary and the Slavic lands. Each nation had its own elected officers: a proctor who headed the nation, a treasurer or receptor, and its own bedels and messengers to serve the nation and its members; its own chapel, patron saint and feast days, places of assembly, and revenues. Moreover, each nation drew up its own rules and regulations in the assemblies called by the proctors. The four nations, through their proctors and other officers, also maintained matriculation rolls, looked after the schools in which masters of the nations taught, and took care of members who fell ill or died. The proctors or other delegates of the nations elected the rector, who served as head of the Faculty of Arts and eventually as head of the university association as a whole.

Each of the four Faculties had its own similar officers, statutes, and schools: in the Faculty of Arts the executive officer was the rector; in the three Faculties of Medicine, Canon Law, and Theology, a dean was chosen by the members of his Faculty. The deans, like the rector, presided over the Faculty congregations that discussed and drew up measures relating to the Faculty as a whole: curriculum, qualifications for matriculation and for obtaining the baccalaureate or other degrees, and the rules governing the determination or defense of the thesis by candidates for the degree or license to teach.

University Council. The other administrative agencies of the university were the council and the general university congregation. The council, which met at stated intervals and was made up of the rector, the three deans, and the four proctors of the nations, examined and acted upon matters relating to the university association and its members. It was at the university congregation, however, to which were summoned all the teaching masters, that measures affecting the teaching, the relations of the university to the outer world, and other matters, were drawn up, debated, and voted upon. At these congregations, and in accordance with specified rules, other officers elected to assist the rector in carrying out university measures were the bedels, treasurer, messengers, peciarii (supervisors of texts), parchment dealers, booksellers, and copyists or scribes.

Colleges. Since the University of Paris was a masters' association, the students were attached to it only through the masters and therefore at first lacked discipline and supervision outside the schools. To fill this need, as well as to provide for the basic necessities of food, lodging, and a small stipend for poor scholars, from an early date philanthropists and other benefactors endowed hostels or colleges. Provision was thus made for poor scholars and for those coming from specified localities. Examples of the former are the College of Eighteen (Collège des dix-huits); the College of the Good Children of St. Honoré, founded by Étienne Belot and his wife; and Ave Maria College. Illustrative of the latter are the Colleges of Bayeux and Narbonne, France, and of Linkoping and Skara, Sweden. The Collège de Sorbonne was founded by Robert de SORBON to accommodate poor scholars who were already masters of arts but who were studying in the Faculty of Theology. In time several colleges became places of instruction as well as of lodging.

Curriculum. The curriculum of the university was administered under the four Faculties. In the Faculty of Arts, instruction was based on the LIBERAL ARTS, the mastery of which was to serve as the foundation and stepping stone for higher Faculties. The course of study in medicine comprised lectures on the Latin translations of the works of the Greek physicians Hippocrates and Galen, of the Arabic physicians Rasis and Avicenna, and of some Latin authors, with practical experience under the direction of a doctor of medicine for six months in Paris and for one year outside the city. In Canon Law the principal texts studied were the Decretum of Gratian, together with several additions, namely, the Decretals of Gregory IX, the Liber Sextus of Boniface VIII, the Constitutions of Clement V, and the Extravagantes or collection of papal laws. In theology instruction was centered upon the Bible, the works of the Church Fathers, Peter Lombard's Sentences, and compilations of Thomas Aquinas's Questiones and Summae, as well as upon some works of other medieval authors.

Method of Instruction. In general use was the lecture or commentary and gloss on a specific text, followed by the repetition or review and the collatio or discussion and conference. The lectures were usually divided into the ordinary, those given in the morning by the members of the Faculty, and the extraordinary or cursory, usually given in the late-afternoons or on feast days by guest lecturers or bachelors in the Faculty. In addition, there were disputations that applied the rational method of inquiry in the presentation, explanation, and proving of a specific proposition and the answering of objections raised against it. Frequent references were made to the Bible, the Fathers, Aristotle, and other standard authors. There were also the Quodlibeta disputations and the disputed questions. In the former, at a public session, the professor in charge was asked questions at random from the leading topics of the day. A bachelor closely associated with the professor then gave tentative replies; at a later session the professor made a formal reply in the form of a disputation. In the disputed questions, the professor set his own question and then proceeded in the form of the disputation.

Examinations: Determination and Inception. At Paris, after following a prescribed course of studies, the candidate for a degree or license to teach underwent a series of examinations: (1) a private interrogation or responsion conducted by his own professor to ascertain whether he was ready for the examination for the determination; (2) after a careful scrutiny of the candidate's qualifications and fitness, the examination for determination, conducted by a committee of professors chosen for the purpose; (3) the determination, consisting of a series of disputations carried on for several weeks by the candidate himself. If judged successful, he was accorded the license to teach anywhere (Licentia ubique docendi). The final step was the initiation or inception (inceptio) into the Faculty.

Rights, Privileges, Immunities. The University of Paris and its members, through the grants and support of the French monarchs and the papacy, held a highly privileged position. It enjoyed, among other exemptions, immunity from the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the local magistrates, from the disciplinary ban of excommunication by the local bishop, from all tolls and taxes as well as from military and other levies except under very unusual circumstances, and freedom from the obligation to respond to summons to civil or ecclesiastical courts outside the city of Paris except under the direct will of the pope. The university had the right to make and enforce rules and regulations for its own members; to set up courses and examinations; to regulate the time, content, and method of teaching; and to determine the rent of houses occupied by its members. University members also enjoyed the right to be named to vacant benefices, to be preferred to all others for appointment whenever such vacancies occurred, and to enjoy the returns of their benefices while they were studying at Paris for a period of from five to seven years. In the 13th century, moreover, they could call a cessation of lectures whenever their rights were violated. The provost of Paris served as the conservator of royal privileges; one of the bishops outside Paris, but in its vicinity, acted as the conservator of apostolic privileges.

Influence. The fame and importance of the University of Paris between the 13th and 15th centuries attracted many famous European scholars and theologians: ROGER BACON, ALEXANDER OF HALES, ALBERT THE GREAT, THOMAS AQUINAS, BONAVENTURE, DUNS SCOTUS, Jean Buridan, WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, Nicole Oresme, Jean GERSON, PETER OF AILLY, and others. The university's influence was far-reaching. Not only did it provide a model for the universities of northern Europe founded before 1500, but through its professors and graduates, bound to it in perpetuity by an oath, it made a strong impression upon contemporary thought and action. Many of its graduates were leaders in affairs of church and state: Innocent III, Gregory IX, Urban IV, and other popes as well as bishops, archbishops, and others who served as royal and ecclesiastical judges, counselors, and administrators. Doctors on the Medical Faculty, moreover, served as royal and papal physicians; other members of the university gave aid and counsel to the French monarchs, participated in the theological and doctrinal discussions of the time, served in the peace commissions during the Hundred Years' War, and played an important role in the Council of CONSTANCE, which healed the papal schism.

Bibliography: H. RASHDALL, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, ed. F. M. POWICKE and A. B. EMDEN, 3 v. (new ed. Oxford 1936). L. J. DALY, The Medieval University, 1200–1400 (New York 1961). P. KIBRE, The Nations in the Mediaeval Universities (Cambridge, Mass. 1948); Scholarly Privileges in the Middle Ages (Cambridge, Mass. 1962). L. HALPHEN et al., Aspects de l'Université de Paris (Paris 1949). J. BONNEROT, L'Université de Paris du moyen âge à nos jours (Paris 1933). A. L. GABRIEL, Student Life in Ave Maria College, Mediaeval Paris (Notre Dame, Ind. 1955); Skara House at the Mediaeval University of Paris (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960); "The College System in the Fourteenth Century Universities," The Forward Movement of the Fourteenth Century, ed. F. L. UTLEY (Columbus, Ohio 1961). P. GLORIEUX, Les Origines du Collège de Sorbonne (Notre Dame, Ind. 1959).

[P. KIBRE]

Later History

Although the university's prestige was not enhanced throughout the 14th century, its numbers increased regularly (almost 800 master regents in the Faculty of Arts alone in 1408). It was "Milady the University, daughter of the king of France," and its members were conscious of its importance. The intellectual vigor of the 13th century, however, was lacking during the 14th and 15th centuries when minds went astray in subtle and often futile discussions. In 1400 Gerson said of his colleagues: "The theologians are the laughing stock of the other Faculties."

The WESTERN SCHISM, in which the university took sides, dealt it a heavy blow. It not only turned certain students away, but what was still more serious, it provoked the departure of certain masters for Prague, Vienna, Cologne, or Heidelberg. Finally, the English conquest and occupation of Paris, to which the university rallied, and the establishment in the 15th century of several universities in France (Caen, Poitiers, Bordeaux) dimmed its radiance. Its renown was sustained, nevertheless, by such masters as Pierre d'Ailly (1350–1420) and Gerson (1363–1420).

The university, moreover, greatly impaired its intellectual prestige by allowing itself to become deeply involved in the Western Schism. After having rallied under pressure from Charles V of France to the French antipope, Clement VII (Robert of Geneva), the university decided in an assembly of the four Faculties to submit the matter of allegiance to the council (1381), thus following the teaching of its two illustrious masters, Conrad of Gelnhausen and Henry of Langenstein. It henceforth adhered to the resolution of the council, from which it did not swerve except when obliged by force to propose the abdication of the rival popes (1394) or the withdrawal of obedience (1398 and 1406–08). At the Council of Constance (1415–18), it was the Parisian masters Pierre d'Ailly, Guillaume Fillastre, and Gerson who were the leading spokesmen.

The university was no less engaged in political controversy than in religious disputes. In 1413 it condemned the theories justifying tyrannicide; but in 1418 the duke of Burgundy forced it to reverse its decision. Likewise, in February of 1413, the university joined the people of Paris in asking the king for reforms; in May it took part in the preparation of the ordonnances cabochiennes that prescribed the reforms.

Soon overcome by popular violence (of which Gerson was personally a victim), the university broke with the Cabochians and by its presence approved the session of the Parlement in which the king dissolved the ordonnances cabochiennes (September of 1413).

These political entanglements and the reversal of loyalty that often accompanied them could not enhance the authority of the university. The deterioration of scholastic methods also dimmed its scientific brilliance. Faced with growing humanism, the University of Paris could not recover its pristine vigor. When it became evident that a new body of teaching was necessary, the crown created it outside the aged body of the university, which had fought against registration of the concordat of 1516 in the name of Gallican liberty and thereby opposed both pope and king. In 1530 Francis I established royal lectors to answer the intellectual needs of the new age; the lectors later separated from the university to become the COLLÈGE DE FRANCE (built in 1610 on its present site). During the religious crises of the 16th century, the Faculty of Theology aligned itself against the reformers, while the university as a whole opposed the admission of Jesuits into France.

In 1598 Henry IV (whom the university had recognized the day following his entry into Paris) reformed the university, determining the discipline, the living arrangements of the students, and the curriculum. For the first time, university regulations were established without the intervention of ecclesiastical authority.

Development in the 17th and 18th Centuries. The university continued its educational function of training lawyers, physicians, and jurists. Just as it had been untouched by the spirit of the Renaissance, it remained insensitive to the great philosophical currents and the first signs of a modern scientific spirit.

At the beginning of the 17th century the Sorbonne became the center of the Faculty of Theology not only because of the quality of its teachers but also because of the number of its students. Cardinal Armand Jean du Plessis Richelieu, elected headmaster of the Sorbonne in 1622, restored and enlarged its buildings. Since then the Sorbonne has been the center of theological activity and of Parisian university life. By its approval or disapproval, it exercises a kind of spiritual magistracy that reaches beyond the limits of the Ile-de-France.

The Edict of April 1679 reformed all French universities into four Faculties: Theology, Décret (which in 1679, with the reintroduction of Roman law in Paris, became the Faculty of Law), Medicine, and Arts (which gave access to the other three). The rector, elected by the proctors of the four nations of the Faculty of Arts, administered the entire corporate body. He was admitted to the Parlement of Paris and to the king's council whenever the interests of the university were in question. Each Faculty was headed by a dean, elected by the regent doctors. The master and student personnel was increased by the addition of registrars, collectors, lawyers, and attorneys who defended the university's interests in Parlement and at the Chatelet (law court) of Paris; and by bedels, booksellers, illustrators, and writers. Mendicant monks (Franciscans, Carmelites, Augustinians), as well as Dominicans, regular canons of St. Victor, Trinitarians, and monks of Cluny and of Saint Germain-des-Prés were also affiliated with the university. All enjoyed important privileges (tax exemption, jurisdictional privileges, etc.).

As in the preceding period, the concerns of the university extended beyond the strict framework of teaching. Several times the Sorbonne interfered in political debates under pretext of juridical or theological questions (e.g., condemnation in 1616 of the theses of the Jesuit Anton Santarelli, who taught that the pope could remove incompetent princes; the attack on ecclesiastical competence in the matter of marriage apropos the annulment of Gaston of Orléan's marriage in 1634).

These political involvements were proof of the university's prestige without, however, increasing its influence. Concerned mainly with professional preparation, the university left new research to the academies. In the period following the expulsion of the Jesuits (1762) and the closing of their colleges, diverse projects were published on national education (La Chalotais in 1763, and also others in Parlement) that contained requests for the introduction of subjects ignored by the university: modern languages, modern history, geography, physics, etc. Renewing the heritage of the dissolved Jesuit colleges, the university changed the Collège Louis le Grand into a training school for teachers. The enterprise, however, was not successful. On the eve of the Revolution, the Faculty of Theology had ten professors; Law had seven in addition to 12 doctors; Medicine had 152 doctors, of whom seven were teachers; Arts combined the principals and regents of the colleges; there were 5,000 students. A doctoral examination for recruiting teachers for the Faculty of Arts was inaugurated in 1766.

From 1789 to 1896. The University of Paris disappeared together with the other universities during the revolutionary years, without being formally dissolved. The law of the three Brumaire year IV instituting central schools reestablished an outline for higher education. Medical schools were founded in the year XI (1804). The term university reappeared with the law of May 10, 1806, establishing a national university for the whole empire. In fact, an Imperial University was organized by the decree of March 17, 1808. Within this university, and according to territorial distribution, were Faculties of Catholic Theology, Law, Medicine, Sciences, and Literature. The entire organization was subject to strict control by the emperor. Isolated one from the other, these Faculties were not federated into universities. It was not until the laws of April 28, 1893 (art. 71) and July 10, 1896 (art. 1) that Faculties were regrouped into universities. Juridically the University of Paris was reborn (the system of French universities is actually ruled by the decree of July 31, 1920).

In fact, the Faculties of Paris had resumed work as early as 1808. In 1821 Theology, Sciences, and Literature had set themselves up in the "old house of the Sorbonne." The Faculty of Law remained in the buildings that were planned by J. Soufflot and constructed for it between 1764 and 1772. After the suppression of Theology in March of 1885, the university became fully secular in orientation.

20th Century Developments. The beginning of the 20th century witnessed a renaissance of the University of Paris as a center for education and research comprising the five Faculties—Law and Economics, Medicine, Sciences, Literature and Human Sciences, and Pharmacy. After World War II, the University of Paris continued the expansion begun at the turn of the century. This increase in enrollment had been accompanied by the multiplication of new educational subjects and the ever-broadening horizons in exact and human sciences, in all of which the university has shown great interest. The influx of students and educational developments necessitated additional space for new laboratories, amphitheatres, libraries, and study halls. In a saturated city where one university alone must meet the needs of eight million inhabitants, it was necessary to consider a dispersion of educational and research centers toward the suburbs. By the 1960s the Faculty of Sciences had already acquired a very important center at Orsay, followed by further expansion to the west and north of Paris. Student protests and riots led to the national crisis of May of 1968 and the resulting restructuring of the university into decentralized schools.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, "La Faculté de théologie de Paris et ses principaux docteurs au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle," Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France 32 (1946) 241–264. L. HALPHEN and P. GLORIEUX, L'Université de Paris au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1949). A. LUCHAIRE, L'Université de Paris sous Philippe-Auguste (Paris 1899). P. MICHAUDQUANTIN, "Le Droit universitaire dans le conflit parisien de 1252–1257," Studia Gratiana 8 (1962) 579–599. G. POST, "Parisian Masters as a Corporation, 1200–1246," Speculum 9 (1934) 421–445. M. TOULOUSE, La Nation anglaise-allemande de l'Université de Paris, des origines à la fin du XV<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1939). A. DOUARCHE, L'Université de Paris et les Jésuites (XVI<sup>e</sup> et XVII<sup>e</sup> siècles) (Paris 1888). C. M. JOURDAIN, Histoire de l'Université de Paris aux XVII<sup>e</sup> et XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècles, 2 v. (Paris 1888). A. J. M. LEFRANCE, Histoire du Collège de France, depuis ses origines jusqu'à la fin du premier Empire (Paris 1893).

[J. GAUDEMET/EDS.]

PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY

A religious institute of secular priests, the first one devoted exclusively to foreign missions (Société des Missions Étrangères de Paris, Societas Parisiensis Missionum ad exterarum gentes, MEP).

It began c. 1660 as a result of the following conjunction of circumstances: (1) the French clergy and laity, especially the members of a pious apostolic association called the COMPAGNIE DU SAINT-SACREMENT, were eager to participate in missions hitherto reserved to religious; (2) some missionaries, notably Alexandre de RHODES, SJ, wished to form a native clergy in the Far East; (3) the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (Propaganda), founded in 1622, wanted to gain effective control of missions up to then dominated by the Spanish and Portuguese governments with their claims of PATRONATO REAL and padroado. The efforts of the Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement, begun in 1646, led to the naming in various missions of a VICAR APOSTOLIC dependent on Propaganda and charged with the formation of a native clergy in Tonkin, Cochinchina, and China. Before departing for the East, Bps. François PALLU, Pierre LAMBERT DE LA MOTTE, and Ignace Cotelendi ordered their procurators to establish a seminary. King Louis XIV and the local ordinary approved the Paris Mission Seminary in 1663; the Holy See approved it in 1664.

One hundred missionaries, including many laymen, embarked for Asia between 1660 and 1700; but only 62 went between 1700 and 1822, for the 18th century lacked fervor, and the seminary, closed by the French Revolution in 1792, was unable to open until the fall of Napoleon I (1815). Between 1822 and 1963 there were 3,816 departures for the missions. Bishop François Laval confided to the MEP his seminary in Quebec and the missions dependent on him, in Acadia, Ill., and elsewhere. This situation lasted from 1665 to the Treaty of Paris (1763). From its start the society centered its activities in the Far East, and labored in Tonkin, Cochinchina, Siam, and western China. In 1776 it assumed responsibility for evangelizing southern India, until the Jesuits took over part of this region (1836). As MEP missionaries became more numerous, Propaganda assigned them new territories: Japan and Korea (1831); Manchuria (1838); Tibet (1846); the Chinese provinces of Guangdong, Guangxi and Hainan (1848); Burma (1855); and Malaysia, detached from the mission of Siam (1899). By 1920 the society had relinquished three of these fields, but its 1,139 members, aided by 1,109 native priests, were still entrusted with regions populated by 250 millions. Since 1920 the society has ceded 30 mission fields to various religious congregations, and 41 to native clergies formed by it. After the closing of China to missionaries, the MEP was assigned Hwalien in Taiwan (1952); Madagascar, for work among the Chinese (1953); and the mission of Mananjary (1961).

To develop a native clergy the society founded a general seminary in Siam (1665), which has since been transferred to Penang, Malaysia. Other seminaries were opened in Cochinchina (1665), Tonkin (1666), and China (1703). The original Chinese one lasted only a short time, but reopened in Jiuquan (1777). In 1909 membership reached its highest total, with 38 bishops, 1,377 priests, and six lay auxiliaries or brothers. Since its inception, about 200 of its members have sacrificed their lives for the faith. Among the 23 martyrs that have been beatified, 20 were canonized by Pope John Paul II.

In its government the MEP followed a collegiate form until 1921. Since then it has had a superior general, who since 1950 has been elected by a general assembly, along with his assistants. Members do not take religious vows, but promise to serve for life in the missions while receiving temporal support from the MEP.

Bibliography: J. GUENNOU, Les Missions étrangères (Paris 1963). G. GOYAU, Les Prêtres des Missions Étrangères (Paris 1932). A. LAUNAY, La Société des missions étrangères, 1658–1913, 2 v. (Paris 1912–16); Histoire générale de la Société des Missions Étrangères, 3 v. (Paris 1894). H. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregation der katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1932–34) 2:600–606. J. GUENNOU, “La fondation de la Société des Missions Étrangères de Paris,” Sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide, 1/1: memoria rerum 1622–1700 (Freiburg 1971) 523–537. J. P. WIEST, “Catholic Mission Theory and Practice: Lessons of the Paris Foreign Mission Society and Maryknoll,” Missiology 10 (1982) 171–184. G. M. OURY, Mgr François Pallu, ou les missions étrangères en Asie au 17ue siècle (Paris 1985).

[J. GUENNOU]

PARISH VISITORS OF MARY IMMACULATE

(PVMI; Official Catholic Directory #3160); a contemplative missionary congregation of women, founded, 1920, in New York City by Mother Mary Teresa Tallon with the approval of Archbishop (later Cardinal) Patrick Hayes. The congregation was canonically erected on April 25, 1927. At a time when Christian family life was rapidly declining, the foundress conceived the idea of sisters engaging in family visitation to restore the spirit of the Holy Family to the home. The sisters engage in family visitations, counseling, missionary outreach and religious education, focusing on person-to-person evangelization. The motherhouse is at Monroe, N.Y.

[M. L. COONEY]

PARK (LE PARC), MONASTERY OF

Premonstratensian abbey at Heverlee, Louvain, Belgium, Diocese of Mechelen, circary (province) of Brabant. It was founded as a double monastery c. 1128 by Duke Godfrey I of Lorraine, and itself founded in 1137 the Abbey of Ninove on the Dendre (suppressed in 1796). The nuns of Park soon transferred, probably to the Au-gustinian Parc-les-Dames (Cistercian 1215–1796). The nuns of Gempe and 19 churches were under the rule of the abbot of Park, which became a flourishing monastery. The Annales Parchenses (1148–1458) were compiled in the abbey. Abbot T. van Tuldell, mitred in 1462, resisted the commendatory system energetically. In the 17th century Park was a center of Tridentine reform in the order. Abbots J. Druys and J. Maes in 1630 drew up new statutes and the ordinarius of the order. Suppressed in 1789–90 by JOSEPH II and in 1797 by the French, Park was restored in 1836 and became an abbey again in 1872. In 1896 it undertook a mission in Montes Claros, Brazil. Until 1914 it published the scientific periodical Analectes de l'ordre de Prémontré. The abbey is one of the most charming in Belgium. The Romanesque church was extensively remodeled in the 17th and 18th centuries; the style of the monastery is Renaissance and baroque. Park has always been a center of learning; its monks included the historian R. van Wafelghem and the Vatican expert in Coptic sciences F. A. van Lantschoot. Its archives are extensive and valuable.

Bibliography: C. L. HUGO, S. Ordinis Praemonstratensis annales, 2 v. (Nancy 1734–36) v. 2. J. E. JANSEN, L'Abbaye norbertine de Parc-le Duc (Malines 1929). N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 v. (Straubing 1949–56) 2:317–322.

[N. BACKMUND]

PARKER, MATTHEW

Scholar and archbishop of Canterbury who helped shape the Elizabethan religious settlement; b. Norwich, Aug. 6, 1504; d. London, May 17, 1575. Parker entered Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1522 and took his B.A. degree in 1525. In 1527 he was ordained, and in 1528 he became associated with the Cambridge Reformers, a student group with Lutheran sympathies. When Anne Boleyn became queen, Parker was made her chaplain, and in 1537 he became chaplain to Henry VIII. In 1544, on the king's recommendation, he became master of his old college and in 1545, vice chancellor of Cambridge. At the accession of Edward VI in 1547 Parker married Margaret Harlestone of Norfolk. Parker's Protestant sympathies were avowed with increasing openness as the successive regencies of Somerset and Northumberland drew England steadily in a Protestant direction. Upon Edward's death in 1553 Parker espoused the cause of Northumberland's unfortunate pawn, Lady Jane Grey. For this and for his marriage he was deprived of his offices by Catholic Queen Mary. Having no taste for martyrdom, he spent the five years of her reign in hiding, devoting his time to translating the Psalms and writing in defense of the marriage of priests.

Following the accession of Elizabeth I, Parker was elected Archbishop of Canterbury in 1559 and was consecrated by four Henrician and Edwardian bishops. Since the Ordinal employed had been repealed in the reign of Mary, the consecration was valid only if royal supremacy was also accepted. Parker's consecration thus became a key problem in the later controversy over Anglican Orders. The most important among Archbishop Parker's hundreds of appointments were to ten sees that Mary and Cardinal Pole had left vacant. He furthered the English Reformation by filling them with Protestants.

Parker, a modest, pious, reserved man, was always a moderate. In 1545 he saved Cambridge's colleges from dissolution during the Henrician confiscations. Years later, he strove to limit further spoliation of the church by Elizabethan courtiers. Always interested in scholarship and antiquities, Parker tried to revive the Saxon language, founded the Society of Antiquaries, and collected ancient manuscripts at a time when learning was being plundered. His magnificent manuscript collection was the most important of many gifts he bequeathed to Cambridge. As archbishop, Parker sought a middle way between Catholics and Puritans. Significantly, the worst Elizabethan persecution of Catholics commenced only after his death. With the Puritans, Parker ordered an end to "prophesyings" and enforced a compromise between the queen's desire for elaborate vestments and the Puritans' insistence upon none at all, depriving those Puritans who refused to comply.

Bibliography: J. STRYPE, The Life and Acts of Matthew Parker, 3 v. (Oxford 1821). H. GEE, The Elizabethan Clergy and the Settlement of Religion, 1558–1564 (Oxford 1898). H. N. BIRT, The Elizabethan Religious Settlement (London 1907). B. M. H. THOMPSON, The Consecration of Archbishop Parker (London 1934). J. B. MULLINGER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 15:254–264. V. J. K. BROOK, A Life of Archbishop Parker (Oxford 1962). E. W. PERRY, Under Four Tudors (London 1940). P. HUGHES, The Reformation of England (New York 1963).

[B. NORLING]

PARKER, THEODORE

Unitarian minister; b. Lexington, Mass., Aug. 24, 1810; d. Florence, Italy, May 10, 1860. Parker was a child prodigy, but poverty prevented his receiving any formal education. He taught school for some years to finance his studies at Harvard Divinity School; he was ordained in 1837 as pastor at West Roxbury, Mass. He stressed the immanence of God in nature and the human mind, and rejected many traditional Christian teachings. Parker became the center of controversy with the publication of The Transient and Permanent in Christianity

(1841) and Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion (1842). After resigning his pastorate, he organized his own Boston, Mass., congregation in 1845. Parker was active in reform movements, particularly the antislavery cause. He wrote abolitionist tracts and participated in the rescue of fugitive slaves.

Bibliography: Collected Works, ed. F. P. COBBE, 14 v. (London 1863–71). H. S. COMMAGER, Theodore Parker (Boston 1936). J. E. DIRKS, Critical Theology of Theodore Parker (New York 1948).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

PARKINSON, ANTHONY

English Franciscan historian; b. Cuthbert, Lancashire, England, 1667; d. East Hendred, Berkshire, Jan. 30, 1728. Professed as a Franciscan at Douai, he was appointed philosophy professor at the Franciscan college there in 1692. After being assigned to the English mission two years later, he served as superior of the Franciscans at Warwick (1698–1701) and at Birmingham (1701–10), as guardian at Oxford (1710–13), and as provincial (1713–16, 1722–25). In this last post, he participated in the Franciscan general chapter at Rome in 1723. His principal work is the Collectanea Anglo-Minoritica, or a Collection of the Antiquities of the English Franciscans or Friars Minors Commonly Called Gray Friars (London 1726). He spent his remaining years as guardian of Coventry and as chaplain to the Eyston family of Berkshire.

Bibliography: FATHER THADDEUS, The Franciscans in England 1600–1850 (London 1898).

[P. S. MC GARRY]

PARKMINSTER (CHARTERHOUSE)

St. Hugh's Charterhouse, Partridge Green, Horsham, Sussex, England; Southwark diocese. This CARTHUSIAN MONASTERY was founded in 1873 from La Grande Chartreuse as a refuge in anticipation of the possible expulsion of religious orders from France. This need coincided with the desire of the English Catholic hierarchy to restore the Carthusians to England, and a property in Sussex called Parknowle (changed to Parkminster) was chosen. Building commenced in 1876, using local and Bath stone and paving stones from Belgium for the cloisters. More than 600 workmen of different nationalities were employed, and the foundation stone was laid in October of 1877. In 1883, the first prior was appointed, the novitiate opened, and the church consecrated. The spire has become a well-known landmark. There are 4,000 feet of cloisters, the main garth being one of the largest of its kind in the world. A fine library houses 30,000 volumes, including valuable MSS dating from the earliest days of the order. Parkminster is the only charterhouse in England today and continues the tradition of the nine English charterhouses (from WITHAM to SHEEN) prior to the Reformation.

Bibliography: A MONK OF PARKMINSTER, "The Return of the Carthusians to England," The Southwark Record (Sept.–Oct. 1939). St. Hugh's Charterhouse (Marseille 1963), guidebook.

[A. GRAY]

PARMENIDES

Parmenides of Elea inaugurated Western metaphysical thinking; b. probably in the middle of the latter half of the sixth century B.C. He is reported to have been introduced to philosophy by a Pythagorean named Ameinias, and his cultural background at Elea, a Phocaeen colony on the west coast of Italy, was Ionian. His philosophy was expressed in a poem of which considerable fragments, as quoted by ancient writers, survive.

Content of the Poem. Although this was composed as a literary unit, it is divided by commentators into three parts: a proem or apocalyptic introduction, a section on truth, and a section on opinion (δόξα) or things as they appear. Textual difficulties and ambiguities in key passages, as well as the poetic form, often leave the meaning highly controversial.

Introduction. In the proem, in imagery found to a large extent in Hesiod (Theog. 744–761), Parmenides is borne from the dwellings of night aloft toward light on a chariot guided by sun maidens. Beyond the portals of the ways of night and day he is ushered into the presence of an unnamed goddess, there to be instructed in the knowledge of all things, first of the convincing truth, then of the unreliable "opinions of mortals," in the sense of being shown how things had to appear as they do (H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch 3 v. [10th ed. Berlin 1960–61] 28B 1).

Truth. The way of inquiry following upon truth asserts that there is being—for there not to be is not possible. The directly opposite way, namely, that there is no being and cannot be any, cannot even be entered by human thought (Frg. 2). But Parmenides is also barred by the goddess from another way, the way actually traveled by mortals. This is two-headed, reverberating, perplexed, unseeing, undiscerning; for it gives nonbeing the same status as being and yet distinguishes them, setting up for everything a way that goes simultaneously in opposite directions. It is the way of sense perception and hearsay, and has to be superseded by difficult reasoning.

The signposts identifying the legitimate way are as follows: being cannot become or perish, it is a whole, without motion or change, without end, without past or future, all together, indivisible, continuous, finite, lacking nothing, perfectly self-identical, entirely homogeneous, and unique—for, since there is no nonbeing, there is nothing that could in any way come to be or cease to be, or divide or multiply being, or cause defect or difference in it. All apparent changes in the cosmos, and distinctions between being and nonbeing, are but conventional names for the one all-embracing reality.

Opinion. From the goddess, Parmenides then learns why things appear to mortals differently from the way they are. By custom, mortals set up two basic and opposite forms, light and night, one of which it is not legitimate to posit. Each is entirely self-identical and in no way the same as the other. Given equal status by human cognition, they fill everything and differentiate things from one another according to their relative predominance in each thing (Frgs. 6–9). Even individual cognition, with all conscious identity in a man, is but an ever-varying combination of the two basic forms, light and darkness (Frg. 16). In this framework cosmogony is taught Parmenides by the goddess (Frgs. 10–15; 17–19). Complete predominance of darkness in an individual's constitution is death (Frg. A 46), while full predominance of light, as the proem makes clear, allowed Parmenides during special inspiration to see things solely under the aspect of being.

Influence and Interpretation. Parmenides's teaching had wide influence in GREEK PHILOSOPHY. His formal (in contrast to existential) notion of being, passed on through Aristotle and Neoplatonism, deeply impregnated scholastic, classical, and neoscholastic metaphysics, with the notable exception of that of St. Thomas Aquinas.

Interpreters differ widely over Parmenides. His doctrine of being, isolated from its poetic setting, is variously regarded as an abstract dialectic, a mystical experience, a philosophical monotone, or a sediment from preceding philosophies. His way of seeming, likewise isolated, has been viewed as a report of teachings rejected by him, or as tenets impossible to reconcile with his doctrine of being. Yet the contrast between light and night in the proem seems explained in terms of being and then carried through to the concluding section. No rational link between the sections is possible. In this cast the whole poem gives a consistent and penetrating account of both the way things are and the way they appear. Aristotle (Meta. 986b 31–33; 1010a 2–3) is almost certainly right in reporting that for Parmenides beings meant sensible things only, and that the same reality known as one by reason appears multiple through sensation.

Bibliography: K. REINHARDT, Parmenides und die Geschichte der griechischen Philosophie (2d ed. Frankfurt am Main 1959). W. J. VERDENIUS, Parmenides: Some Comments on His Poem (Groningen 1942). G. VLASTOS, "Parmenides' Theory of Knowledge," American Philological Association, Transactions and Proceedings 77 (1946): 66–77. J. H. M. LOENEN, Parmenides, Melissus, Gorgias (Assen 1959).

[J. OWENS]

PAROUSIA

The coming of the glorified Christ as the climax of SALVATION HISTORY. This article treats first the biblical data on the Parousia and then the Parousia from a theological viewpoint.

In the Bible

For a better understanding of the scriptural data on the Parousia, it is well to begin by considering the general questions of the terminology, the meaning of the doctrine, and the time of the Parousia, particularly as presented in the writings of St. Paul. The doctrine as contained in the individual books of the NT is then examined, and the solution of the problem of the delay of the Parousia is briefly considered.

Terminology. The term "Parousia" is a transliteration of the Greek word παρουσία. In classical Greek the word had the meaning of "presence" or "arrival." St. Paul used the word to speak of his own presence among the Corinthians (2 Cor 10.10) and the Philippians (Phil 2.12), of the presence of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus among the Corinthians (1 Cor 16.17), of his future arrival at Philippi (Phil 1.26), and of the arrival of Titus at Corinth (2 Cor 7.6–7). In Hellenistic Greek παρουσία had acquired two technical meanings: (1) the public arrival of officials, which was accompanied by appropriate ceremony; and (2) the presence of the gods, manifested in acts of power, or assumed to be an invisible reality in the cult. Before A.D. 51, the approximate date of 1 Thesalonians, the Church borrowed this technical usage to express its doctrine of the presence of the risen Christ to conclude salvation history. After the biblical period, the doctrine came to be known as the Coming (adventus) or the Second Coming of Christ. The word παρουσία in the sense of the presence of the risen Christ at the conclusion of history is found in 1 Thes 2.19; 3.13; 4.15; 5.23; 2 Thes 2.1, 8; Jas 5.7–8; 2 Pt 1.16; 3.4, 12; 1 Jn 2.28. An exceptional usage occurs in 2 Thes 2.9, where παρουσία refers to the presence of "the lawless one," the Pauline opponent of Christ at the end of history.

The primitive Church understood the Parousia event as the time of God's final judgment upon all people (1 Thes 1.10). For this reason scriptural authors made use of the term "the day of the Lord" in reference to the Parousia. In the Hebrew Scriptures the DAY OF THE LORD (Yahweh) is a technical term for God's saving acts in history. Before the time of Amos, the day of Yahweh was understood as a time of blessings and happiness; but Amos taught that the day of Yahweh was also a time of punishment. The term and its meaning were borrowed by Christian writers, who substituted Christ's title LORD for the name YAHWEH. Clear examples of the usage of "the day" or "the day of the Lord" to designate the Parousia as the time of the final judgment to be rendered by Christ on humankind are in Rom 2.16; 13.12; 1 Cor 1.8; 3.13; 5.5; Eph 4.30; Phil 1.6; 1 Thes 5.2, 4; 2 Thes 1.10; 2.2; 2 Tm 1.12; 4.8; 2 Pt 3.10; Acts 17.31 [see JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE)].

In the Pastoral Epistles ἐπιφάνεια (EPIPHANY, manifestation) is the term used for the Parousia (1 Tm 6.14; 2 Tm 4.1, 8; Ti 2.13). Some authors consider ἐπιφάνεια to be synonymous with παρουσία, but this opinion may be questioned. It is certainly not true for 2 Tm 1.10, where ἐπιφάνεια is used of the Incarnation. In 2 Thes 2.8 Paul combines the two terms: "by the manifestation [ἐπιφάνεια] of his coming [παρουσία]." While some scholars consider this phrase to be a pleonasm, i.e., the repetition of the same idea in different terms, it is probable that Paul intends a particular nuance of meaning here (indicated below). Although the word ἐπιφάνεια is employed in classical Greek in the meaning of outward appearance, only in later Greek is it used to mean the visible (not necessarily corporeal) manifestation of a hidden divinity. Finally, the NT designates the παρουσία with the word ἀποκάλυψις (1 Cor 1.7; 2 Thes 1.7; 1 Pt 1.7, 13; 4.13). In ordinary Greek ἀποκάλυψις meant the uncovering of something hidden. In the Greek of late Judaism and the Jewish apocalyptic literature, the word meant the revelation of divine secrets.

Meaning of the doctrine. In the NT, Parousia is an eschatological concept, i.e., it expresses faith in a final act of God that is to occur when human history has reached its divinely determined goal. This act of God will usher in a life in which all humanity is completely under the rule of God. The doctrine presupposes the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD (1 Thes 4.16), whose eternal condition and new existence (1 Cor 15.51) are under the direction and dominion of the risen Christ, mysteriously present to effect and to govern the lot of humanity (in His παρουσία). The initial effect of the presence of the risen Christ, with which all humanity will be confronted, is the final judgment rendered by Christ (the day of the Lord). The just are to be "with the Lord" (1 Thes 4.17), while the unjust are to be banished from Him (2 Thes 1.9). Thus the Parousia will make known the significance of Christ for all humanity (ἐπιφάνεια), and at the same time it will disclose God's design for the eternal destiny of humankind (ἀποκάλυψις). The language in which Paul describes the Parousia event in 1 Thes 4.16–17 and 2 Thes 2.3–10 is taken mainly from Jewish APOCALYPTIC. It is not to be understood as a literal historical description. The NT does not indicate how the presence of the risen Christ is to occur at the end of history or how this presence will be recognized by humankind.

Time of the Parousia. Once the doctrine of the Parousia is presented to faith, the question naturally arises regarding the time when the event is to occur. The teaching of Christ and of St. Paul on the time of the Parousia is one of the most celebrated questions in the field of biblical scholarship. Many scholars have argued that in the teaching of Jesus the Parousia is certainly proximate, i.e., it is to occur within the lifetime of the Twelve or within a single generation. Other scholars have attributed a similar teaching to St. Paul. Some Catholic scholars have believed that Paul was personally convinced of a proximate Parousia, which he himself would live to witness, though he did not actually teach this personal opinion as a certitude of faith. At an opposite extreme are the opinions of those scholars who attempt to prove that there was no thought at all of a proximate Parousia in the Church of early period, and a fortiori in the teaching of Jesus. The early Church anticipated the imminent destruction of the Temple, prophesied by Jesus, and a union with Him through personal death. The Parousia was expected only in the remote future.

In 1 and 2 Thessalonians. The study of early Christian thought on the time of the Parousia has its natural point of departure in the Epistles to the THESSALONIANS, which are certainly among the earliest and probably the earliest of the Pauline Epistles (written c. A.D. 51). These Epistles and 2 Pt 3.3–14 are the only documents in the NT to speak expressly (and not simply by allusion) of the doctrine of the Parousia. In 1 Thes 4.12–18, Paul addresses himself to the question of mourning for the Christian dead in Thessalonica. He considers that some among the Thessalonians are guilty of an undesirable manifestation of grief over their dead (v. 13). His response is to stress (1) the certainty from faith of the resurrection of these dead (v. 14), and (2) the time of their resurrection as an occurrence before the Parousia (v. 16), so that (3) death itself will not place these believers in Christ at a disadvantage when the Parousia occurs (v. 15). Paul's main doctrinal objective in this passage is quite clear. He wishes to state the chronological relationship between the Parousia and the resurrection of the dead: first the resurrection, then the Parousia. The Thessalonians, therefore, are not justified in understanding the doctrine of the Parousia to imply that death deprives the Christian of the joys to be anticipated from the event itself. Paul concludes his remarks with the observation that the Thessalonians should "comfort one another with these words" (v. 18), i.e., with the doctrine he has presented to them: resurrection first, then the Parousia. Here he envisions the possibility of further deaths among these Christians. On these occasions, the living should remind the bereaved of the doctrine he has here taught.

This concluding advice of Paul was of practical relevance only on the supposition that the Thessalonian Christians made a direct connection between their faith in Christ as Savior and the Parousia of Christ; they considered it undesirable that death should intervene between the time of their conversion to Christ and the Parousia of Christ. This sentiment indicates that they were in anticipation of a proximate Parousia, i.e., the presence of Christ as the concluding event of salvation history within their own lifetimes. In framing his doctrine so as to point up the chronology—resurrection first, then the Parousia—Paul wrote to them exactly in terms of this proximate expectancy: "we who live, who survive until the coming of the Lord" (v. 15). Thereby he included himself in their hope of escaping death because of an early occurrence of the Parousia. Analysis of 1 Thes 4.12–18 makes it impossible to avoid the conclusion that both Paul and the Thessalonians had in view a proximate Parousia. The Paul felt bound to write as if the Parousia-event were, at the least, a real possibility within the lifetime of the Thessalonians and himself. Further, he ascribed his teaching that the resurrection precedes the Parousia to the "word of the Lord," i.e., the teaching of Jesus. Mindful as he was of the "word of the Lord," he did not appeal to it to disabuse the Thessalonians of their expectancy of a proximate Parousia. Instead, he wrote from this very standpoint. This fact suggests that Paul knew of nothing in the teaching of Jesus that required him to fix the Parousia in the distant future.

In 2 Thes 2.1–12 (2 Thessalonians was written about six months after 1 Thessalonians) Paul again concerned himself with the Thessalonians' expectancy of the Parousia. On this occasion, however, he rejected an idea being spread among them: that the "day of the Lord is already here" (v. 2), i.e., that the time of the final judgment by Christ has actually arrived. Paul flatly denied that such is the case, characterizing this opinion as a deception (v. 3). He reminded them of his previous teaching concerning the occurrence of a religious apostasy and the appearance of a "man of lawlessness" before the Parousia (v. 3–5). Since in his judgment there was no evidence that these events were occurring, he declared that the day of the Lord was not a process that had begun. In effect, he denied that the Parousia was imminent, i.e., an event to be anticipated from day to day; but he said nothing in this passage in 2 Thessalonians to modify the position on the proximity of the Parousia that he had taken in 1 Thessalonians. In 2 Thessalonians he stated categorically that the Parousia was not about to occur; but in neither epistle did he state categorically that the Parousia would not occur within the lifetime of some of the Thessalonian Christians.

In Other Epistles. There is no evidence in the NT that other Christian communities underwent similar crises of faith over the doctrine of the Parousia as occurred in Thessalonica. There is abundant testimony, however, that Christian communities in general entertained the same proximate expectancy as the Thessalonians. In Jas 5.7–8 (the Epistle of St. JAMES may have been written as early as the mid-40s or as late as 90–100) the hope of the Parousia is held out as a motive for patience in trials. In 1 Jn 2.28 (probably to be dated before 98) the possibility of the occurrence of the Parousia in the near future is still left open (see also 1 Jn 2.18). In 1 Pt 1.7, 13 (probably in the early 60s, but possibly 90–95), as in James, the thought of the Parousia is presented as a consolation in the midst of persecutions. The passage in Jude 14–24 (datable from the early 60s to 100) also seems to have been composed in a thought context of the proximate Parousia. In 1 Cor 1.7–8 Paul can appeal to the Corinthians' expectancy of the revelation (ἀποκάλυψις) of Christ for which the gifts of Christ have prepared them. In 1 Cor 4.5 he warns them against rendering condemnatory judgments "until the Lord comes," when judgment will be rendered by Christ. In 1 Cor 6.1–7, he criticizes them for appealing against one another to pagan lawcourts, and he asks why they are not willing to accept injustice. The latter question appears a plausible one only in view of the proximate Parousia, a possibility that, in the view of Paul, depresses the importance of the things of this world.

Paul's observations on marriage in 1 Cor 7.28–31 are couched in the framework of the proximate Parousia, to which he expressly alludes in the phrase "the time is short" (v. 29). He reminds the Corinthian Christians, lately converted from paganism, that preparation for the final judgment is the main factor that should influence their decision on marriage. He recommends virginity as a more desirable state than marriage, provided this choice is motivated by the desire to prepare for the judgment of Christ at the Parousia (1 Cor 7.32–35) and provided it is freely made by those Christians who see in virginity the opportunity for a fuller dedication to the Christian life (1 Cor 7.36–38) (see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE).

Parousia in the books of the New Testament. The teaching of St. Paul on the Parousia has been considered above. Other NT literature is here discussed on the basis of the commonly accepted chronology, Mark (A.D.

65–70), Luke (c. 75), Matthew (75–85), 2 Peter (probably 80–100). The Johannine writings and Revelation are discussed separately.

In Mark. Although actual data on the Parousia is slight in Mark's Gospel, the conception is undeniably present (Mk 8.38; 13.26; 14.62). Its setting in the discourse on the destruction of the Temple (Mk 13.26) has provoked extensive discussion among scholars on the origin of the discourse as a whole and in particular on the authenticity of Mk 13.24–27, a series of verses apocalyptic in style. It is generally agreed that Mark ch. 13 is a composition that incorporates words spoken by Jesus on different occasions into a unit centering on the theme of the destruction of the Temple. All that is said in the discourse on this point is stated to be proximate in time (13.28–31), i.e., it is to occur within the period of the first Christian generation. It is this clear assertion that has produced the question concerning the authenticity of Mk 13.24–27, since these verses can be understood to forecast the occurrence of the Parousia immediately upon the destruction of the Temple.

Beginning with the work of Timothée Colani (1824–88), Jésus Christ et les croyances messianiques de son temps (1864), many scholars (including the Catholic M. J. Lagrange) have sided with Colani in judging Mk 13.24–27 to be of Judaeo-Christian origin rather than a record of the teaching of Jesus. Two arguments are advanced for this opinion, namely, that Jesus was not guilty of error and that He never spoke in apocalyptic language. Recent scholars, however, have recognized the arbitrary character of the opinion that Jesus never employed apocalyptic language. There is in fact nothing in Mk 13.24–27 that could not have been uttered by Jesus Himself. Apart from the problem of attributing error to Him when Mk 13.24–27 is understood in the sense of chronological time, it is necessary to question the assumption that the passage is concerned solely with chronological time. Like all biblical writers, Mark proposes salvation history, i.e., the salvific acts of God within history. When Mk 13.24–27 is interpreted from this standpoint, the evangelist must be understood to say that after the fulfillment of Jesus' prophecy on the destruction of the Temple, Christians are not to anticipate another messianic intervention into history until the Parousia. Mark's passage, to be sure, does not exclude the possibility of the Parousia in the chronological sense as an immediate occurrence after the destruction; the evangelist leaves this possibility distinctly open. But his position on the proximity of the Parousia is no stronger than that of St. Paul in 1 Thes 4.12–18. The evidence of the Pauline epistles, outlined above, shows clearly enough that the early Church commonly entertained the possibility of a proximate Parousia. The Gospel of Mark remains within this tradition. Whereas St.

Paul had occasion to inculcate the time sequence—resurrection first and then the Parousia—Mark advances the sequence—the destruction first, and then, as the next messianic intervention of God, the (possibly proximate) Parousia. (For further consideration of the position of Mark, see below on the teaching of Jesus and the Parousia.)

In Luke. Luke's eschatological discourse (Luke ch. 21) closely parallels Mark ch. 13 both in material content and in sequence of thought. Nonetheless, it contains certain ideas that show that Luke was in a position to offer some degree of clarification to the Church of his time on the relationship between the destruction of the Temple and the Parousia. As in Mark, the Lucan discourse answers two questions raised by the prophecy of Christ concerning the destruction of the Temple: the first question inquires when the destruction is to occur; and the second requests the sign by which the imminence of the event will be recognizable (cf. Lk 21.5–7 with Mk 13.1–4). The Lucan answer to the question on the sign (Lk 21.20–24) differs from Mark's (Mk 13.14–20) in four significant respects: (1) the sign itself, a siege by armies, is on the historical level in contrast to the indeterminate biblical phrase of Mark-Matthew, "the ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION" (Dn 9.27); (2) the destruction of Jerusalem, not simply that of the Temple, is the point at issue; (3) the destruction is presented as a divine judgment against the Holy City, a conception that follows the Jewish understanding of Israel's catastrophes (2 Kgs 9.6–9; Hos 9.7; Jer 5.29); (4) a period of time is envisioned after the destruction, described by Luke as "the times of the nations," during which the teachings of Christ are to be offered to the Gentiles.

Luke's counterpart (Lk 21.25–28) to the apocalyptic passage in Mk 13.24–27, expanding upon the Parousia, is set in the context of "the times of the nations" instead of the context of the destruction, as in Mark. Amid distress and fear upon the earth, the Parousia of the Son of Man occurs. During this period, the Christian is not to be disturbed; rather, he is to reflect that the fullness of the Redemption to come with the Parousia. Luke thus removes the possible relationship in time between the destruction and the Parousia that is so conspicuous in Mark. Although it is perhaps too much to say with some modern scholars that Luke eliminates the proximity of the Parousia altogether, he does disassociate it in time from the destruction of Jerusalem.

In accordance with his chronological disassociation of the destruction and the Parousia, Luke, by comparison to Mark, modifies the response of Jesus to the question on the time of the destruction (cf. Lk 21.29–33 with Mk 13.28–31). Although "all things" prophesied by Jesus are to occur before His generation has passed away (Lk 21.32), the fulfillment of the prophecies in Luke consists in the knowledge that the reign of God is near (Lk 21.31). Thus, in Luke the destruction of Jerusalem is understood as a sign of the Parousia of Christ: the fulfillment of His prophecy on the doom of Jerusalem indicates the fulfillment of His prophecy on the Parousia. Those who witness the fulfillment of the first prophecy should look to the fulfillment of the second (Lk 21.32–36). In this sense of the gradual revelation in history of God's salvific plan, Jesus' words are fulfilled within a single generation.

In Matthew. Matthew's is the only one of the four Gospels to use the term παρουσία (Mt 24.3, 27, 37, 39). His use of it gives his discourse on the destruction of the Temple (Matthew ch. 24) a different orientation of thought from its parallels in Mark ch. 13 and Luke ch. 21. In Mark and Luke, Jesus is asked concerning the time of the destruction and for a sign by which the imminence of the event will be recognizable. In Matthew the question on the time of the destruction remains. However, the request of the disciples for a sign pertains, not to the destruction, but to "your Parousia and the end of the age [τοῦ αἰῶνος, AEON]" (Mt 24.3b). Unlike the discourse in Mark ch. 13 and Luke ch. 21, Matthew ch. 24 treats explicitly a question that is only implicit in Mark and Luke: whether or not the proximity of the Parousia, and therefore of the end of natural human history, is to be recognized by a sign.

Although the question of the time of the end is the main one for Matthew ch. 24, the evangelist has retained the traditional question on the time of the destruction of the Temple (Mt 24.3a) as well as the traditional material that responds to it (Mt 24.4–26). This material has substantially the same meaning as in Mk 13.5–23: it pertains to the destruction of the Temple, warning against false messiahs and false signs, forecasting persecution, demanding perseverance, and advising flight upon the appearance of the "abomination of desolation." However, to the Marcan warnings against false messiahs and false prophets (cf. Mk 13.21–23 with Mt 24.23–26), Matthew adds two sayings of Jesus (Mt 24.27–28) to the effect that the Parousia will be unannounced (v. 27) and will be inevitably recognized by all people (v. 28). He thereby strengthens the teaching of Mk 13.21–23 that after the destruction, no messianic intervention other than the Parousia is to be expected.

Matthew's apocalyptic passage (Mt 24.29–31) parallel to Mk 13.24–27, elaborating upon the Parousia, is introduced by the word εὐθέως (immediately). As in Mark, the evangelist's thought is best comprehended in terms of salvation history: in the divine, salvific plan the Parousia is the only messianic intervention to be anticipated as following upon the destruction. The entire human race is to recognize the presence of the Son of Man, and the last judgment is to occur.

Up to this point in the discourse (Mt 24.4–31), Matthew, as Mark, asserts the destruction of the Temple and the Parousia, but does not address himself to the questions concerning the time of the destruction and the sign of the Parousia. He now does so (Mt 24.32–36), utilizing, however, traditional material, found also in Mk 13.28–32: as the fig tree in bloom indicates the nearness of summer, so the fulfillment in history of the prophecies of Jesus (Mt 24.33) is “the sign of [His] parousia and of the end of the age” (Mt 24.3b). The fulfillment in history can only refer to the destruction of the Temple, since the day and the hour of the Parousia itself is a secret held by the Father alone (Mt 24.36). For Matthew the destruction of the Temple is the theological sign of the Parousia, but not its chronological sign. The time of the Parousia is a divine secret that the Father did not reveal even to the Son. Whereas in Mark the Parousia is left in possible chronological proximity to the destruction of the Temple, and whereas in Luke it is chronologically separated from the destruction of Jerusalem, in Matthew the stress is on the mystery enshrouding the time of the event.

Historical Teaching of Jesus. Scholars of the Gospels are not in agreement that Jesus actually taught the Parousia during His lifetime. Numerous passages in the Gospels attribute sayings to Him concerning “the coming [ἐρχομαι]” of the Son of Man (Mk 8.38; 13.26; 14.26; Lk 9.26; 12.40; 18.8; 21.27; Mt 10.23; 16.27; 24.30, 44; 25.31; 26.64). The interpretation of these sayings is rendered difficult by the fact that the Gospel tradition has not always conserved their original historical context. Either the evangelists or the tradition before them have, to a degree, reinterpreted some of these sayings in the light of the early Church’s fuller understanding of Jesus’ mission. From the critical standpoint, two sound points of departure for the interpretation of these sayings can be indicated: (1) in 1 Thes 4.15 St. Paul asserts that he bases his statements about the Parousia on “the word of the Lord,” i.e., on the historical teaching of Jesus; (2) the passages indicated in the parenthesis above have in common the doctrine of the “coming [ἐρχομαι]” of the Son of Man. These facts reveal that there is no ground to deny a priori that the Parousia originated in the historical teaching of Jesus. On the other hand, one must ascertain carefully whether Jesus taught this doctrine explicitly or merely contented Himself with providing a foundation for the Church’s later comprehension of it.

The most significant passage for the understanding of Jesus’ historical teaching on the Parousia is the statement He made at His trial before the Sanhedrin as quoted in Mk 14.62 (see also Mt 26.64): “You will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of the Power and coming with the clouds of heaven.” Although scholars of the Gospels concede that the saying is substantially historical, they are not in accord on the meaning Jesus intended to convey. For some scholars Jesus here declared not only His Resurrection, but also His Parousia. For others He simply affirmed that He would be vindicated by being brought to God upon His execution. Interpretation of the saying must take into consideration its prophetic character. Prophecy is frequently obscure in its content at the time it is uttered. Only through the development of events and the evaluation of the prophecy in the light of other religious doctrines is its true significance comprehended. Thus the RESURRECTION and ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST (cf. the exaltation of Jesus in Phil 2.9), as well as His headship of the new messianic community (cf. Acts 2.36), provide a fuller comprehension of His saying in Mk 14.62 than was possible when He made the statement historically. St. Paul’s allusion in 1 Thes 4.15 to the historical teaching of Jesus on the Parousia finds its minimal justification in the fact that Jesus spoke of the “coming” of the Son of Man that would have future and final relevance, not only to His own disciples, but also to the entire world. The recollection of such sayings is embodied in Mk 8.38 and Mt 25.31–32.

Jesus’ historical teaching insisted upon vigilance in preparation for “that day” (Mk 13.33–37; Mt 24.42–51; Lk 21.34–36), i.e., the time of final judgment, and He declared His own ignorance of the time of the event (cf. Mk 13.32 with Mt 24.36). St. Paul sets forth the same doctrine (1 Thes 5.1–2) as well known to the Thessalonians. It would seem, then, that the historical teaching of Jesus Himself compelled the early Church to entertain the possibility of an imminent Parousia, since nothing in the Lord’s teaching excluded this possibility. Such an orientation of thought in the primitive Church forced it to focus its attention on the person of Jesus and His teaching, and to a considerable degree it was responsible for the development of the material on Jesus and His teaching that made possible the composition of the four Gospels.

In the Johannine Literature and Revelation. The only explicit reference to the Parousia in the Johannine literature (1, 2, 3 John and John) lies in 1 Jn 2.28, which expresses a Christian hope concerning the presence of Christ as judge not unsimilar to 1 Thes 2.10. Elsewhere in 1 John the doctrine of the Parousia seems clearly to be assumed (1 Jn 3.2) or can be inferred from statements about the ANTICHRIST (2.18; 4.3). No mention is made of the doctrine in 2 and 3 John, but 2 John does speak of the Antichrist (2 Jn 7).

The Fourth Gospel does not employ the term παρουσία. Neither does it utilize the figure of the Son of Man to depict a presence of the risen Christ in history that will terminate the course of human events. The Gospel begins and ends by placing its central figure, “the Anointed One, the Son of God” (Jn 20.31), within the Godhead. The prologue (1.1–18) names Him the LOGOS, eternally preexistent, who entered the world by becoming Incarnate (1.14). The remainder of the Gospel conceives His life as a passage through suffering, death, and Resurrection to the realm of the Father (12.32; 20.17). The significance of the divine origin, earthly career, and final glorification of Jesus for Christians is not spelled out in the Fourth Gospel in terms of the Parousia, but rather in terms of a union with Christ that has its beginning in the Christian’s earthly existence (3.3; 4.10; 6.53; 15.1) and its terminus in a life that will transcend the bonds of human mortality (3.15; 4.14; 6.54; 14.2). This presentation of Christian faith as a supernatural union with Christ, the Son of God, that begins in mortal human existence and ends in a superterrestrial sharing in the divine life draws out the ultimate significance of the doctrine of the Parousia. The Parousia is the logical presupposition of such Johannine statements as the following: “The Father loves the Son and has handed all things over to him. Whoever believes in the Son has life eternal. Whoever disobeys the Son will not see life, but must endure God’s wrath” (3.35–36); “I solemnly assure you, an hour is coming and is now here when the dead shall hear the voice of God’s Son, and those who have listened shall live” (Jn 5.25); “And when I do go and prepare a place for you, I am coming back to take you along with me so that where I am, you may also be” (Jn 14.3). In these passages, the Christian life is conceived as an anticipation of the Parousia.

Revelation, like the Fourth Gospel, rather presupposes the doctrine of the Parousia than inculcates it. At the outset of the work, the risen and ascended Jesus is described symbolically as existing within the Godhead (Rv 1.13–16). From this position, He addresses messages to the seven churches (2.1–3.22), in the course of which perseverance in the Christian faith is urged until His coming (2.25). The coming is directed especially against persecutors of Christians (6.10) and is described in 6.15–17 in terms reminiscent of Lk 23.30. The coming on behalf of the just is taken up from Rv 19.11 to the conclusion of the work. Here the Parousia is explicitly announced as part of the divine irrevocable plan: “And behold, I am coming quickly” (22.7). This assertion is repeated at the end of the book, together with the author’s prayer affirming his firm conviction of the coming and requesting that it take place in accordance with God’s design: “Amen. Come, Lord Jesus” (22.20). Revelation is clearly the product of the persecutions experienced by the early Church, especially under Nero (A.D. 54–68) and Domitian (A.D. 81–96). Its author, writing probably during the reign of Domitian, utilized the Church’s doctrine of the Parousia to encourage the faith of Christians in these dire circumstances.

Delay of the Parousia. Criticism of the Christian doctrine of the Parousia is reflected in 2 Pt 3.3–10, a late epistle dating probably after A.D. 80. The criticism consists in ridicule of the doctrine on the ground that the Parousia has not materialized (3.4). The objection presupposes a Christian expectancy of an early Parousia. However, neither the source of the criticism nor the concrete circumstances of it is ascertainable. The author of the Epistle responds by invoking the creative power of the word of God (3.5), the punitive power of His word (3.6), and the difference between the human conception of time and the working out of God’s design in history (3.7–8). He reassures his Christian readers that the non-occurrence of the Parousia is not evidence against the truth of the doctrine but rather an indication of the divine mercy still bent on the repentance of humankind (3.9). Finally, he reasserts the doctrine, stressing that the occurrence of the Parousia will be unanticipated because of its suddenness and that this event will terminate human history as humans have known it (3.10).

Some scholars have urged that the Gospel of Luke is preoccupied with the question of the so-called delay of the Parousia. They appeal to such passages as Lk 12.45, which speaks of a delay in the return of a householder, and 19.12, which describes a man embarking upon a long journey (see also 20.9). It remains possible that the Gospel of Luke anticipated a problem that arose among some early Christians when the Parousia failed to materialize; but these passages can be understood also as parabolic detail that has no intentional reference to the Christian expectancy of a proximate Parousia.

See Also: ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: A. FEUILLET, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed., ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928— ) 6:1331–1419. H. CONZELMANN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 5:130–132. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1728–39. G. R. BEASLEY-MURRAY, Jesus and the Future (New York 1954), with extensive bibliog.; A Commentary on Mark Thirteen (London 1957). H. CONZELMANN, Theology of St. Luke, tr. G. BUSWELL (New York 1960). A. CORELL, Consummatum est: Eschatology and Church in the Gospel of St. John (New York 1958). T. F. GLASSON, The Second Advent (3d ed. London 1963). W. G. KÜMMEL, Promise and Fulfillment, tr. D. M. BARTON (Naperville, Ill. 1957). B. RIGAU, Saint Paul: Les Épîtres aux Thessaloniens Études bibliques (1956). J. A. T. ROBINSON, Jesus and His Coming (Nashville, Tenn. 1958). J. P. MEIER A Marginal Jew (New York, 1991, 1994).

[C. P. CERROKE/EDS.]

In Theology

Early symbols professing the great Christian mysteries place the Second Coming (always an essential truth of faith) side by side with the Incarnation, death and Resurrection of Christ [see the apostolic, Athanasian, Nicene, and Nicene-Constantinopolitan creedal formulations (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 11, 30, 41, 76, 125–126, 150)]. The patristic tradition witnessing to the importance of the Parousia in the Christian mind is clear and constant. The writings of the Apostolic Fathers, reflecting a lingering Jewish apocalyptic spirit, as well as the teaching of Christ on the seeming imminence of His eschatological predictions, are strongly eschatological. Clement of Rome, in his letter to the Corinthians (96–97), affirms the proximity of the Parousia and reproves the skeptical (23.3–5). The Didache concludes facing the Parousia and the duties of Christians arising from its approach (16.1). Widespread yearning for the return of Christ in glory attests to an intense parousial faith in the early Church. Any misunderstanding of the proximity of the Second Coming was born of obscurity inherent in the prophetic-apocalyptic message of Christ and Paul.

Millenarianism. Many in the first two centuries interpreted 2 Pt 3.8–9 and Rv 20.4–5 literally and looked to a future messianic kingdom prior to the Parousia. Thus MILLENARIANISM was born. A residue of Jewish speculation on the duration of the intermediary messianic reign was probably at work here [cf. J. Bonsirven, Le Judaïsme palestinien au temps de Jésus-Christ, sa théologie (Paris 1934–35) 427]. Papias of Hierapolis in the 2d century paints a vivid picture of the millennial era (Patrologia Graeca 7:1213–15). Among its early adherents Millenarianism numbered Pseudo-Barnabas, Irenaeus, Justin, Tertullian, Lactantius, and Hippolytus. Never universally held as part of apostolic tradition, chiliasm did tend to replace in the 2d century what previously had been the expectation of an imminent Parousia. Such excess indicates the force of eschatological hope in the early Church. An unfortunately inept way of affirming that history is the expectation of Christ, chiliastic dreams revive from time to time [cf. decree of Holy Office, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 36 (1944) 212 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3839)].

Kingdom and empire. As the Church expanded through the Roman world in the 3d and 4th centuries and won state recognition, Millenarianism waned. Persecution lessened; the present time seemed less provisory; the Parousia less imminent. Wed to Rome, many considered the messianic kingdom as realized in the spread of the empire (see, e.g., Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 10.4). Others, by solitude and virginity, renounced identification of the eschatological kingdom with the world and saw the establishment of the true kingdom in the Parousia (see, e.g., tracts on virginity by Methodius, Ambrose, Basil of An-cyra, Gregory of Nyssa). It was Augustine who dealt the death blow to both the chiliasts and those identifying Christ's reign with temporal society (Civ. 20.6–13). The fall of Rome in 410 further stifled such deviations. Like people in every other age, faced with the fragility and radical impermanence of the world's institutions, many saw the empire's demise as presaging the end.

Particular judgment, purgatory, beatific vision.

The vivacity of early belief in the Parousia left its stamp on patristic theologizing about the particular judgment, purgatory, and the beatific vision. At the outset, it was thought that departed souls lived in a state of parousial expectancy. The evident delay of the Second Coming gradually gave rise to closer study of the lot of the soul after death, and a marked doctrinal development took place. It was only in the 4th century that particular judgment was generally received into the mainstream of patristic thought, without, however, usurping the primacy of the parousial judgment. Similarly, since retribution immediately after death hinges upon particular judgment, patristic teaching on purgatory developed slowly and was first conceived in function of the Parousia. For Origen and others, purification of the just commences with the Parousia (see A. Michel, "Purgatoire," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.1:1193–96). The Greek Fathers of the 4th century fell heir to Origen's thought and with but rare exception viewed the dead as awaiting definitive parousial judgment and purgation in the final conflagration. In the 9th century, this parousial orientation per-dured in Photius (Ad Amphil 6.15) and survived to the beginning of the 15th century and the Council of Florence. In the West it was Augustine especially who insisted on purification immediately after death (Civ. 21.46). In the ante-Nicene period, beatitude was likewise so closely bound up with the return of Christ that it was generally considered delayed until the parousial resurrection. From the 4th to the 9th century, the lot of the elect was gradually though not wholly separated from the Parousia. Following the 9th-century cleavage between East and West, enjoyment of the beatific vision by the elect immediately after death was common doctrine in the West, whose tradition culminated in 1336 with the constitution BENEDICTUS DEUS of Benedict XII (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1000–02). Though the doctrine was not yet in possession in the East, it had numerous and weighty partisans there.

Perspective. Doctrinal development concerning retribution was slow and faltering precisely because patristic theologians, like the New Testament itself, focused primarily on the perfection of creation, history and humanity redeemed in Christ and glorified with Him at the term of this earthly economy, and only secondarily on the fate of the individual. Recall the New Testament images of the meal, the wedding, the holy city. In this perspective all converges upon the Parousia: judgment, retribution, consummation of life inaugurated by Christ's Resurrection, definitive constitution of His kingdom. Though time corroded the urgency of parousial hope, the Parousia always remained a key mystery [see the conciliar teaching of Lateran IV, 1215 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 801), Lyons II, 1274 (ibid. 852), Florence, 1442 (ibid. 1338), the Tridentine profession of faith, 1564 (ibid. 1862)]. The impact of the doctrine in the medieval period, an age not of printed word but of artistic image, is felt in the painting and sculpture of the era, as well as in the popular preaching. With time, joyous hope for the return of Christ was colored with pessimistic desire for the last day, when Christ's justice would pronounce vengeful judgment on this world's injustice. With the rise of rationalistic theology and the decline of historical sensitivity, the Parousia lost much of its larger significance and became little more than doomsday.

In the rediscovery of eschatology by contemporary theology, the Parousia is restored to its rightful place as final event of salvation history. The glorious return of Christ and the ensemble of eschatological events He will then effect mark the consummation of God's redemptive plan. As such the Parousia is certain and promised, yet a reality already at the heart of the present world. Salvation is now present, though not yet unveiled in full cosmic dimension (Rom 8.17–23). While the kingdom of God is essentially a kingdom to come, it is presently realized in those who share by grace in the redemptive work of Christ (Jn 12.31; 2 Cor 5.17; 6.2; Col 1.22; 1 Jn 1.7). The present is the future anticipated. For in this realized Redemption are sewn new promises. The Parousia will harvest in final, perfect form what already is (1 Jn 3.2). Dead with Christ by Baptism and already risen to a new life (Rom 6.1–11), through adhesion to Christ Christians anticipate final judgment (Jn 3.17; 5.24). This in no way implies that the Parousia brings with it nothing new. Christ's emergence from His secret presence in His Church, His resurrection of the dead, His definitive judgment and situation of each person within the divine plan, His transfiguration of non-rational creation, His enthronement as center of creation, all are new events giving the personal eschata, death and particular judgment, their full significance. Yet these final events now exist hiddenly in Christ's KINGDOM, as Christ Himself lives hiddenly in glory to be manifested only at His return (Col 3.1–4). Hence the Parousia is not simply another item in an array of last things. As God's final loving intervention, it is the plenitude of Redemption, the crowning triumph of Christ as SAVIOR.

The central, decisive event of history is neither at the beginning nor at the end; it is the Resurrection of Christ. What preceded was preparation; what follows is the "end time" (cf. 1 Cor 10.11), the time of the Church in and through which Christ incorporates into Himself all comprised in His eternal decree, communicates to them divine life, and reveals His power to bring to its ultimate state the kingdom predestined. The appearance of Christ at the end of ages will close this period of growth. Then He will present to the Father His kingdom finally established as the perfect, unending realization of divine wisdom, power, and love (1 Cor 15.20–28). The glory of Christ will be extended by Him to the members of His kingdom who by faith and baptismal REBIRTH are associated to His paschal mystery (1 Thes 4.14–18; 2 Thes 1.10; Phil 3.20–21). The root of the parousial mystery is men's solidarity with Christ (1 Jn 2.28). Thus Redemption is actualized in history now hastening to fulfillment in the parousial theophany, wherein the ultimate defeat of Satan will be realized in the completion of the Trinity's saving work.

Sacraments. It is not difficult to see why the early Church did not fear the end of time but yearned for it, as Tertullian says, as the farmer for the harvest, the soldier for the definitive end of struggle (De orat. 5). The Christian is turned to the future with tranquil assurance that the Parousia will perfect and manifest what has already been wrought in him inchoatively and is possessed in pledge (2 Cor 1.22; 5.5). In the present stage of the redemptive process, intermediary between the two comings of Christ, creation possesses in the obscurity of faith the glory now perfectly possessed by the "Firstborn" (Col 1.15) and awaits the definitive reality in the final stage ushered in by the Parousia. Meanwhile, it is especially in its Sacraments that the Church meets in veiled contact the Christ to come. Each Sacrament mysteriously renders accessible the mystery of Christ and associates the Christian to Him. Commemorating the past, introducing the Christian presently to an ultratemporal and ultraterrestrial life, the Sacraments are pregnant with future reality and announce the return of Christ to reveal and crown His victory now hidden in Himself and those united to Him. Parousial dimension is found above all in the Eucharist, the food of immortality (Jn 6.54), which heralds the death of Christ "until He come" (1 Cor 11.26) and is a foretaste of the heavenly banquet (Mt 8.11). By sacramental insertion into the mystery of Christ, the Christian knows a double-track existence: he lives now in the era of the Parousia, yet remains in the era of history.

For schools of Protestant theology holding a "consequent" and wholly supratemporal eschatology, no eschatological transformation has penetrated history. Hiddenly accomplished only in Christ, it is extrinsically appropriated to the Christian by faith. The kingdom is present only insofar as Christ, who brings it, is present. Wholly future, the kingdom has not begun its realization in us. The Parousia, far from being the maturation and culmination that Catholic theology views it to be, will be a commencement.

Expectation of Parousia. If anything is clearly affirmed by Christ, it is that we remain ignorant to the end concerning the day of the Parousia (cf., e.g., Mt 24.36; Lk 12.40). Theologians follow the healthy skepticism of Aquinas (Summa theologiae 3a, suppl., 73) relative to any literal interpretation of scriptural signs. Perturbations in nature and society are foretold not to date the Parousia but to kindle and orientate human hopes. The definitive theophany cannot be determined by any cosmic catastrophe or by human PROGRESS. What is relevant for Christians, living now in the paratemporal, is the theological, rather than the chronological, imminence of Christ's return. This parousial hope gives meaning and consistency to history and manifests God's immanence to its linear development. If Redemption works in and through historical evolution, only when the redemptive decree of God has run its divinely plotted course will Christ come forth from His abiding presence in His Church. The expectancy of the Church, however, is not directed merely to history's term, but to encounter with the Bridegroom, who will show time to have been a history of salvation, and subject all things to Himself. Through the Word all things were made at the beginning (Col 1.16); through the Word Incarnate all things will be remade at the end. The seed of glory in man will be brought to fruition; the universe, far from being annihilated, will be gloriously transfigured into a suitable habitat for glorified humanity and a luminous reflection of Christ's glory (Rom 8.19–23; 2 Pt 3.7–13). Aside from the fact of transformation, Scripture and patristic tradition provide little detail on the extent and mode of this re-creation. Linked with humanity in sin, the cosmos will be linked to the human race in Redemption (C. gent. 4.97; Comp. theol. 169–171). The new Adam will create a new Eden, where the cosmic integrity destroyed by sin will be restored and God will be "all in all" (1 Cor 15.28).

See Also: DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); END OF THE WORLD; ESCHATOLOGISM; ESCHATOLOGY (IN THEOLOGY); ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; FIRE OF JUDGMENT; INCORPORATION IN CHRIST; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); MYSTERY THEOLOGY; PURGATORY; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 2; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, 2.

Bibliography: E. PAX and K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:120–124. A. WINKLHOFER, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegrif- fe, ed. H. FRIES (Munich 1962–63) 1:327–336; The Coming of His Kingdom, tr. A. V. LITTLEDALE (New York 1963). J. GALOT, "Eschatologie," Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 4:1020–59. A. FEUILLET, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl., ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928—) 6:1331–1419. L. BILLOT, La Parousie (Paris 1920). O. CULLMANN, Le Retour du Christ (Neuchâtel 1943); Christ and Time, tr. F. V. FILSON (rev. ed. Philadelphia, Pa. 1964). R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1963). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, "Eschatology," in Theology Today: Renewal in Dogma, v. 1, ed. J. FEINER et al., tr. P. WHITE and R. H. KELLY (Milwaukee, Wis. 1965) 222–244. L. BEAUDUIN, "Ciel et résurrection," in H. M. FÉRET, ed., Le Mystère de la mort et sa célébration (Lex orandi 12); Paris 1956). A. M. HENRY, ed., "The Return of Christ," The Historical and Mystical Christ, tr. A. BOUCHARD (Theology Library 5; Chicago 1958). P. HUMBERT et al., "La Fin du monde," Lumière et vie 11 (Sept. 1953), whole issue. A. JANSSENS, "La Signification sotériologique de la parousie," Divus Thomas 36 (1933) 25–38. A. MICHEL, "La Doctrine de la parousie et son incidence dans le dogme et la théologie," Divinitas 3 (1959) 397–437. M. SCHMAUS, "Das Eschatologische im Christentum," in Aus der Theologie der Zeit, ed. G. SÖHNGEN (Regensburg 1948). J. WRIGHT, "The Consummation of the Universe in Christ," Gregorianum 39 (1958) 285–294. J. A. T. ROBINSON, Jesus and His Coming (Nashville, Tenn. 1958). O. CULLMANN, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (New York 1958). J. P. MARTIN, Last Judgment in Protestant Theology from Orthodoxy to Ritschl (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1963). J. DANÉLOU, "Christologie et Eschatologie," Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT (Würzburg 1951–54) 3:269–286.

[S. J. DUFFY/EDS.]

PARRAS, PEDRO JOSÉ

Franciscan missionary and writer; b. Pancrudo, near Teruel, Spain, c. 1710; d. Córdoba, Argentina, Sept. 7, 1784. Parras joined the Franciscan Order in Aragon and was being trained to teach when he volunteered for the missions of Río de la Plata. In 1748 his expedition was in Cádiz at the same time as that of Junípero SERRA. After arriving in Buenos Aires, Parras traveled to Paraguay as visitor of the Franciscan province. His learning and moderate tendencies were valued by Manuel Antonio de la Torre, bishop of Paraguay, who chose him as his adviser on his official visit to the Jesuit Reductions in 1759, and also by Pedro de Cevallos, the governor of Paraguay. Parras was not a member of the anti-Jesuit group, and his attitude was reflected in the objective position of Cevallos. Both Cevallos and Parras returned to Spain in 1766, where Parras attended the General Chapter of the Order (Valencia 1768) as delegate of the Argentine Province and remained to become guardian of the Franciscan house in Zaragoza. When the Portuguese threat again increased in La Plata, Cevallos was sent back, and he requested Parras to accompany him. Grateful for his services, Cevallos frequently recommended him for a bishopric, but this was opposed by the Commissary General of the Indies, Manuel de Vega. Parras was named rector of the University of Córdoba, Argentina, in 1778, a post he filled with great success and tact until his death. He published two works of permanent merit: Diario y derrotero de sus viajes (1749–52), a delightful travel account of his trip from Valencia to Paraguay, together with an appendix of his report on the Jesuit Reductions in 1759; and Gobierno de los regulares de la América (2 v. Madrid 1783), a masterful account of the legal position of religious in Spanish America at that time; it is clear, reasonable, and often marked by a touch of humor.

Bibliography: P. J. PARRAS, Fray Pedro José de Parras: Diario y derrotero de sus viajes, 1749–1753 (Buenos Aires 1943). P. PASTELLS, ed., Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la provincia del Paraguay, 8 v. in 9 (Madrid 1912–49).

[L. G. CANEDO]

PARRENIN, DOMINIQUE

Missionary and sinologist; b. Russey, near Besançon, France, Sept. 1, 1665; d. Peking, Sept. 29, 1741. He was admitted into the Society of Jesus on Sept. 1, 1685, and left for the China mission in 1697. At the court of Peking he pleased Emperor K'ang-hi with his extensive knowledge and his familiarity with the Chinese and Tatar-Manchu languages. With this advantage he discussed physics, history, and the place of Christianity in producing the culture of the West. His great service to China was in making maps, especially the great map of China. His popularity at court was greatly responsible for preventing the total destruction of the Christian mission during the hostile reign of Yong-tsching (1723–35), son of K'ang-hi. Many of his letters were published by J. B. du Halde in Lettres édifiantes et curieuses (Paris 1711) and Description de la Chine et de la Tartarie Chinoise (Paris 1735, Eng. tr. E. Cave, 2 v. London 1738–41). Others are found in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:284–290. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexicon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Louvain-Heverlee 1962) 1383–84. S. DELACROIX, ed. Histoire universelle des missions catholiques (Paris 1956–59) 2:177, 360. B. H. WILLEKE, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:110.

[J. S. SCHWARZ]

PARSCH, PIUS

Leading Austrian liturgist and biblicist; b. Olmütz, Moravia, May 18, 1884; d. Klosterneuburg, Austria, March 11, 1954. Parsch became a Canon of St. Augustine at Klosterneuburg in 1904 and studied there until his ordination in 1909. He taught pastoral theology for a while, then served as a military chaplain during World War I.

Upon entering the order, he took the name Pius in honor of Pius X with whom he shared a love of Holy Scripture. Parsch not only taught Scripture, he also devoted his writings to it, including his doctoral dissertation and his best efforts after World War II, especially in the periodical he founded, Bibel und Liturgie. He shared Pius X's concern for bringing the liturgy to the people and making it understood by them. To this purpose, he devoted himself to the many editions of liturgical texts and numerous published explanations of the liturgy that made his monastery a liturgical center of Austria, and indeed of all the German-speaking countries.

The name he gave his work, "Popular Liturgical Apostolate," is noteworthy. It pinpointed his main concern; it was not for research, nor for monastic or academic liturgical forms, much less for liturgical reform. His energy was spent in an apostolate for the Christian people, to bring them to both interior and exterior participation in the liturgy. He aimed at vanquishing liberalism in Austria by unfolding the mysteries of faith and grace. He sought these goals by means of an ideal form of worship celebrated daily in the little Church of St. Gertrude in Klosterneuburg. Because he concentrated on the popular aspects of the liturgical revival, he occasionally risked superficiality in his explanations, which in part have been brought up to date by later research. Parsch was a pioneer in his insistence on an intimate connection between liturgy and Scripture. He came upon this not only through his own scriptural training and teaching, but also through his realization that the people can be brought to an understanding of the liturgy only by a knowledge of Scripture.

His spirit and work have been a major influence on popular liturgical movement throughout the world. Chief among his works are The Church's Year of Grace (Collegeville, Minn. 1953–58; first in German in 1929); The Liturgy of the Mass (St. Louis 1936; rev. ed. 1957); The Breviary Explained (St. Louis 1952; first in German in 1940); Seasons of Grace (New York 1963); and Volksliturgie (Klosterneuburg 1940).

Bibliography: Ephemerides liturgicae 68 (1954) 256–257. T. WARNUNG and T. SCHNITZLER, "In memoriam Pii Parsch," Liturgisches Jahrbuch 4 (1954) 230–236. G. ZUNINI, "Apostolato liturgico in azione; le conquiste del P. Parsch," Ambrosius 5 (1929) 26–32.

[T. SCHNITZLER]

PARSEES

As their name indicates, are descendants of Persian immigrants who settled in Bombay and its vicinity and who brought their Iranian religion with them. To the 130,000 who now live in India should be added about 20,000 ‘‘cousins’’ who remain in Iran, in the regions of Kerman and Yazd. The Parsees of India have adopted the Gujarati language of the Bombay area. All claim allegiance to the god Mazda or Ormazd and to his prophet Zardusht or Zoroaster. However, under the influence of Hinduism, Islam, and Christianity, their religion has lost much of its original dualism. Ahriman has for the most part been reduced to a symbol of man’s evil tendencies.

The most striking features of the Parsees’ religion are fire worship and the exposure of corpses in ‘‘Towers of Silence.’’ During their fire worship, which is carried out in fire temples, the priest, holding a ritual staff, covers his mouth with a veil which is intended to protect the fire from any possible impurity. The ceremony is completed by a continuous reading of a large portion of the Avesta. The Parsees are not a caste, but they remain a closed community. They never marry outside their group and they make no attempt to convert non-Parsees to their religion. They are antiascetic and have little interest in astrology and mysticism. They are conspicuous for their generosity and interest in education as well as for their wealth, their desire to alleviate misery without distinction of race or religion, and their founding of hospitals, orphanages, and schools. Under Western influence they have changed their dress and abolished infant marriage.

Bibliography: D. MENANT, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 9:640–650. J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN, La Religion de l’Iran ancien (Paris 1962).

[J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN]

PARSONS, WILFRID

Editor, author, educator; b. Philadelphia, Penn., March 17, 1887; d. Washington, DC, Oct. 28, 1958. He was the son of Paul Julian and Alice (Avery) Parsons. After attending high school in New York, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1903. He studied at the Jesuit seminary in Louvain, Belgium (1907–09), and at Woodstock, Maryland, where he obtained his Ph.D. (1910) and was ordained (1918). He went to Rome, received a doctorate in theology from the Gregorian University (1921), and then returned to Woodstock as professor of theology (1922–24). From 1925 to 1936 he served as editor of the Jesuit weekly, America, tending to support New Deal reforms and to oppose Republican economic policies; he was also a sharp critic of Rev. Charles E. COUGHLIN, a bitter opponent of F. D. Roosevelt’s administration. After 1936 Parsons was engaged in teaching political science at Georgetown University (1936–37, 1948–50, 1954–58) and the Catholic University of America (1938–47), both in Washington, D.C. He contributed articles to several Catholic journals, including Thought, which he founded in 1926. His books include The Pope and Italy (1929), Mexican Martyrdom (1936), Early Catholic Americana (1939), Which Way Democracy? (1939), and The First Freedom (1948).

[J. L. MORRISON]

PART

A part is related to a WHOLE as something into which a whole is divisible and of which it is constituted. Thus a whole is prior to its parts in the order of being and of understanding, but in the order of becoming the parts are prior to the whole that is made from them by process of change.

Quantitative and Integral Parts. In the clearest case, a part is something into which a QUANTITY is divisible. A quantitative part is smaller in comparison with the larger whole of which it is a part when both whole and part are finite and actual. A part that can measure the whole without remainder is called an aliquot part, as two is of four or three of nine. A continuous quantity is always divisible into parts that in turn are also divisible, not indivisible. A quantitative point can be the beginning or end of a line or of a segment of a line, but it is indivisible and so is not a part of a line. A whole or cardinal number is a discrete quantity composed of units. The unit is both part and measure of numbers, but in the order of discrete quantity it is without parts and is indivisible. The parts of which a quantity is composed or integrated and into which it is divisible are called integral parts. A natural body has integral parts that exhibit qualitative differences and are called heterogeneous parts, as the various organs of plant or animal and the parts of molecules or atoms. Integral parts that are required for the whole to be, without which it cannot be, or that are regularly present in the whole, are called proper parts, as the head or hand in man.

Physical, Entitative, and Virtual Parts. In a sensible thing composed of matter and form, both the matter and the form are called physical parts. The wood of which a chair is made is part of the chair, namely, the MATTER, and the figure of a statue is part of the statue, namely, the FORM. When both matter and form are extended or quantified, they are likewise divisible into parts, as this or that part of the wood or part of the figure. The primary principles, or natures, of which natural bodies are made and composed are also called physical parts, as the material nature, or proper matter, of a chemical compound or of an organism and its formal nature, or specifying form. The parts of which any created being, as such, is composed are called entitative parts, namely essence and existence.

Parts that do not include the full perfection of the whole, as the vegetative and sensitive parts of the animal, are said to be virtual, or potential. Such parts are distinguishable by human reason even though they are not distinct in the whole, which is one and undivided in itself, and when made distinct by mental precisizing they include the whole but not wholly. Thus the animal is an organism; moreover, it is a sensitive organism.

Logical Parts. The parts signified by terms expressed in a definition are called logical parts, because they express man's understanding of an essence, or essential nature. In a DEFINITION composed of terms that signify the GENUS and the specific difference, the genus is part of the SPECIES because the species expresses the whole essence, whereas the genus expresses the virtual part that is determinable by the difference. Thus if man is defined as a tool-making animal, the term "animal" signifies the determinable part of the essence, or essential nature, of man, and the term "tool-making", understood radically, signifies the determining part, or specific difference in man. However, the species that are included in a genus are parts of the genus, called subjective parts, because the genus is the whole that includes the species, whether these are actual or merely in potency.

See Also: DISTINCTION, KINDS OF; DIVISION (LOGIC); ELEMENT; ATOMISM.

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, Metaphysics 1023b 12–25. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa contra Gentiles 2.72. V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:1171–72.

[W. H. KANE]

PARTE SAIZ, ALFREDO, BL.

Martyr, priest of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. June 1, 1899 in Cilleruelo de Bricia, Burgos, Spain; d. Dec. 27, 1936. Alfredo Parte was a priest from the Colegio Villacarriedo. In mid-August 1936, he fled to his uncle's home in Santander. On November 15 he was seized. He consoled his fellow prisoners and endured his suffering with patience until he was executed by gunfire. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: "Decreto Super Martyrio," Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 651–656. La Documentation Catholique 2125 (5 November 1995): 924.

[L. GENDERNALIK/EDS.]

PARTICIPATION

In the Platonic tradition, where the notion was first systematically developed, participation (μέθεξις) signifies the derivation of temporal diversity from eternal unity, and the structural dependence of the many on the One. In Christian thought it means the complete dependence of creatures on the Creator in the order of efficient, exemplary, and final causality. Not only was the word commonly used by the Fathers and schoolmen, but the notion is fundamental to their entire thought.

Various Usages. In ordinary usage the word signifies a sharing or taking part in a common effort, glory, nature, or movement; thus in every order of causality one may "share" or "take part" in some whole (pars, part; and capere, take). As a transitive verb, it signifies the act of giving or communicating something to others, as when we say that God shares or participates His life, goodness, and truth with creatures. Ordinarily it is used in the intransitive sense of a subject "having a part" or "taking part" in some reality (physical, moral, or spiritual), as though a whole were somehow divided among many. In this sense it is said that Christ "deigned to become partaker of our humanity" (Sacram. Leon., 159). The post-classical abstract noun designates the active and passive reality of sharing or communicating. In grammar the adjectival form of a verb called a participle similarly signifies a subject sharing some quality or situation (cf. Isidore, Etymol. 1.21.11; Patrologia Latina [Paris 1878–90] 82:88).

In philosophical usage the word is analogical, always involving a reference of many to one or one to many. "To participate is to take a quasi part; thus when something receives a part of what belongs to another fully, it is said 'to share' it, just as man is said to share animality because he does not have the whole of animality exclusively; for the same reason Socrates shares humanity; similarly even a subject shares accidents, and matter shares form, because substantial or accidental form, which of its very nature is common, is limited to this or that subject; likewise an effect is said to participate in its cause, particularly when it does not equal the cause, as when we say that the air shares the light of the sun, because it does not receive light with the same brilliance that exists in the sun" (St. Thomas, In Boeth. de hebdom. 2.24).

Origins with the Greeks. The philosophical notion of participation was used by PLATO to explain the relation between the contingent, individual forms and the eternal, unchangeable Ideas. ARISTOTLE attributes the origin of this doctrine to the Pythagoreans, who taught that all things exist by imitation (μίμησις) of numbers; for him, Plato simply introduced the new term participation (μέθεξις) and said that all things exist by participation, changing only the name. According to Aristotle, both the Pythagoreans and Plato left undecided what this participation or imitation of Forms could be (Meta. 987b 10–14). It is true that the doctrine of participation in the writings of Plato is undeveloped and includes all types of being involving any kind of dependence, likeness, co-existence, and the like.

History of the Concept

Already in the Phaedo things are said “to participate” (μετάσχεσις; 100C, 101C), “to receive” (μετάληψις; 102B), to be what they are by a “presence or communion” (παρουσία, κοινωνία; 100D; also Rep. 437E; Soph. 247A, 248C, E) or even by an “appertaining” (ἐπέιναι, παραγιγνεσθαι; 103D, 105C; cf. Symp. 211B) of the “model” in which many participate (Phaedo 78D; cf. Rep. 476A, D; 496A; 507B). In this doctrine Plato saw the answer to Zeno’s problem: if many things exist, they must simultaneously be similar and dissimilar, one and many, in motion and in rest (Parm. 127E); Plato’s answer is that the “Ideas” do not combine with sensible things but exist per se “apart” (καθ’αυτά; Phaedo 129D–130A).

Plato and Aristotle. According to Aristotle, who apparently is reporting the oral teaching of the master, between sensible things and separated Forms Plato placed mathematical beings, “which occupy an intermediate position, differing from sensible things in being eternal and unchangeable, from Forms in that there are many alike, while the Form itself is in each case unique” (Meta. 987b 15–18). For Plato the object of wisdom is the Idea as Exemplar (παράδειγμα), the Idea as “that which completely is” (το παντελῶς ὄν) and therefore “perfectly knowable” (το παντελῶς γνωστόν) as “the One among many” (τὸ ἓν ἐπὶ τῶν πολλῶν), thus permitting knowledge transcending the perception of transitory and corruptible things (τὸ νοεῖν τι φθαρίντος; Soph. 248E). In the Dialogues of his maturity Plato presents two orders of participation: that of sensible objects in ideal Forms, and that of Forms among themselves. This extension of the notion of participation to the ideal Forms themselves was important for the later development of philosophy, for it allows for various kinds of participation [μετέχειν δὲ πολλῶν οὐδὲν κωλύει; Parm. 161A; cf. P. Natorp, Platos Ideenlehre (2d ed., Leipzig 1921) 231, 469–470].

One of the major difficulties inherent in the Platonic notion of participation, based as it is on the logico-mathematical relation of the universal to the particular, is the famous problem of the “third man” (τρίτος ἄνθρωπος) discussed by Plato (Parm. 132A, B) and urged by Aristotle (Meta. 990b 17 and 1059b 8): If similarity among many individuals presupposed a “form in itself,” then the similarity of the many to the one presupposes another form, and so on (see the detailed argument in Alexander of Aphrodisia, In meta. 990a 15, ed. Hayduck, 83–85). For this and other reasons, Aristotle firmly and contemptuously rejected Platonic participation: “To say that they are patterns and that other things share them is to use empty words (κενολογεῖν) and poetical metaphors” (μεταφορᾶς λέγειν ποιητικός; Meta. 991a 20; cf. 1079a 4–13, 1079b 24–26).

In opposition to the Platonic imitation of a transcendent ideal, Aristotle insisted on the IMMANENCE of concrete forms and on the true CAUSALITY of particular causes on particular effects. Aristotle did not deny the existence of spiritual substances, intelligences, or souls in celestial bodies (Cael. 285a 29–30), but his insistence on physical causality distinguished his doctrine from Platonic participation. The apparent impasse was solved in two ways. Pure Aristotelians such as Alexander of Aphrodisias explained participation by means of causality, while Neoplatonists admitted the necessity of causality within the framework of participation. This latter approach was more influential in Christian thought.

Neoplatonic Teaching. The distinctive aim of NEO-PLATONISM was to show the basic harmony between Plato and Aristotle, blaming Aristotle’s critique on Plato’s faulty expression through “poetic metaphors,” “myths,” etc. For pagan Neoplatonists it was important to demonstrate the overall harmony between the two outstanding Greek philosophers in order to defend the Greek ideal of wisdom against what they regarded as a barbaric religion founded on expiation for sin by the Crucifixion of Christ.

While faithful to the basic principle of Platonic participation, Neoplatonism transformed it in such a way as to make Aristotle’s critique and principles its own. This harmony between Plato and Aristotle was already proclaimed by Ammonius, the teacher of Plotinus, who transcended apparent differences by his “intensive method” (Photius, Bibl. cod. 214; PG 103: 701A–708B). For the Latin West BOETHIUS proclaimed this same harmony (In Arist. de interp. 2, prol.; Patrologia Latina 64:433). In Arabic Neoplatonism the theme of agreement pervaded the whole of philosophy; for ALFARABI the difference between the two philosophers was simply one of method—Plato chose analysis, Aristotle synthesis—and Aristotle was seen as “the follower and perfecter, the help and consultor of Plato” [F. Dieterici, Alfarabis philosophische Abhandlungen (Leiden 1892) 3, 17–21].

Plotinus. PLOTINUS, the most eminent representative of Neoplatonism, clearly absorbs Aristotelian notions in his Platonic synthesis. In his celebrated doctrine of the three Hypostases (Mind, Soul, Life), Plotinus tried desperately to reduce the distance between transcendence and immanence. For him the νοῦς of Aristotle coincided with the ὄντως ὄν of Plato since the Mind, the supreme principle of the world, cogitates a multiplicity of Ideas, which are the eternal exemplars of all reality and true knowledge. This multiplicity of Ideas cannot be derived from the sensible world, but from Mind itself. Thus Plato's world of Ideas is localized by Plotinus in the νοῦς of Aristotle. The crucial problem of causality is solved by the doctrine of emanation (πρόοδος) by means of the WORLD soul, which fashions the world and everything in it according to the separated Ideas in Mind. Since for Plotinus the separated Ideas are endowed with specific quantities, qualities, movements, and rest, all sensible realities depend on the Ideas and derive from them their individual movements and appropriate changes of quantity and quality [cf. A. Covotti, Da Aristotele ai Bizantini (Naples 1935) 226–228]. See EMANATIONISM.

Proclus. More profoundly, the syncretist, Neoplatonic notion of participation revived the pre-Socratic notion of “dialectical method,” which reached its widest application in PROCLUS. The novelty of this dialectic, explicitly introduced into the doctrine of participation, is the importance given to negation as the momentum of change, and consequently as the foundation of dialectics itself [cf. G. W. F. Hegel, Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. Michelet (Berlin 1833) 2.66]. These negations (ἀποφάσεις) were not considered privations of being, but productions of opposite determinations, as sketched in Plato's Parmenides. Proclus maintained that “the method of negations (τρέπος τῶν ἀποφάσεων) has an unusual character; it conforms to the dignity of the One; its function is primary; it far transcends all things in the unknowable and ineffable excellence of simplicity” (Theologia Platonis, 2.10). The work of Proclus marks the high point in the speculative synthesis of Plato and Aristotle, replacing the negative attitude of Alexander (see the explicit statement of Simplicius, In 3 de caelo, 7.306a 1).

In general it can be said that Arabic Neoplatonism and AUGUSTINIANISM developed the common, intuitive notion of participation ascending toward the One; it stemmed from the traditions of Plotinus and Porphyry. The Thomistic notion of participation, on the other hand, is directly inspired by the more rigorous dialectical method, which stemmed from IAMBlichus and Proclus through PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS and the small Arabic work entitled LIBER DE CAUSIS.

Thomistic Notion

From the beginning St. THOMAS AQUINAS appreciated the radical difference between Platonic and Aristotelian principles. Rejecting the Neoplatonic concordism prevalent in medieval Augustinianism and Arabic writers, he developed a precise notion of participation based upon a new concept of esse as the actus essendi, not to be confused with the existentia of Augustinianism and RATIONALISM. It is from the concept of esse as the ultimate act that St. Thomas developed his notion of participation and his entire metaphysics (see EXISTENCE).

Basic Elements. The most important elements in the Thomistic notion of participation include the concepts of act, of the unicity of the substantial form, of the personal individuality of the human soul, and of the real distinction between essence and esse, or act of being, in creatures.

Concept of Act. Aquinas's starting point is the Aristotelian concept of ACT as perfection in se and per se. Thus by its very nature act is prior to POTENCY, whether it is understood as activity or as FORM. St. Thomas accepted this “primacy of act” without reservation, and rejected the attempt of AVICEBRON to reduce everything to potency instead of to act. Because of this new concept of act as perfection, the affirmation of BEING, there arose a new and wider concept of potency as capacity to receive perfection, i.e., negation as PRIVATION. Two important consequences follow from this for St. Thomas: (1) Potency is not a univocal concept signifying prime matter alone, but an analogical concept embracing all the ways a thing can be a subject of act: “Being a subject is not peculiar to the matter that is part of substance, but is a universal property of all potentiality” (De subs. sep. 8). (2) Prime matter, being exclusively a “subject,” can have no act whatever of its own; all its actuality stems from form so that not even God can make matter exist without form (Quodl. 3.1.1). (See MATTER AND FORM).

Unicity of Substantial Form. The second element in the Thomistic metaphysics of participation follows from this new concept of act and potency: the unicity of substantial form in all bodies, living and nonliving. In man this unique substantial form is his intellectual soul. For St. Thomas a “plurality of forms,” even hierarchically ordered from lowest (forma corporeitatis) to the highest (forma intellectiva), would destroy the essential unity of act in man; all acts after the first could be nothing but accidental forms. This view was fiercely contested during St. Thomas's lifetime, because it seemed to deny that Christ's dead body continued to be divine when separated from a permanent form; but for St. Thomas divinity and identity were due not to form, but to the Person of the Word who continued to be united hypostatically to both body and soul (Quodl. 2.2.1 and ad 1). In St. Thomas's view, the single form in man is responsible not only for the spiritual functions of thinking and willing, but also for the lower functions of sensation, nutrition, and natural motions (Summa Theologiae 1a, 76.3–5). Thus the higher form is said to contain the lower forms virtually. (See FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF.)

Individuality of the Soul. The third element in the Thomistic metaphysics of participation is the personal individuality of the human SOUL and its functions. This rejection of the principal Averroist tenet is developed under two aspects: (1) Phenomenologically, one's consciousness, thoughts, aspirations, desires, and loves are seen to be personal functions, belonging to a concrete, individual person. (2) Metaphysically, the ground of this phenomenon is seen to be none other than the personal intellectual soul (first act), which is the root of human activity (second act). The immateriality of certain personal functions, such as thinking and aspiring, indicates that the personal soul has an immaterial esse proper to it and inseparable from it: "Esse properly belongs to the form, which is act . . . . But it is impossible that a form be separated from itself; therefore it is impossible that a subsistent form should cease to be" (Summa Theologiae 1a, 75.6; 50.5).

Essence and Esse. The fourth element in the Thomistic metaphysics of participation is the real distinction in all created things between essence and the act of being (esse). This fundamental Thomistic insight, originally derived from Boethius and AVICENNA, was eventually seen as a consequence of the primacy of act in participation. This is seen in two stages: (1) Being (esse) is the first perfection and the act of all acts (ibid. 1a, 4.1 ad 3, 2); pure perfection (perfectio separata) cannot be anything but unique; subsisting being must be one, namely God, whose essence is to be. (2) All creatures, whose essence is not to be, must participate or share existence as a gift; thus all creatures are beings (entia) by participation. In this view essence is a subject, a potentiality for esse, which is the sublime reality shared by many as a gift from God. With this view of participation, St. Thomas could reject Augustinianism, which made matter essential for creatures, and Averroism, which made immaterial substances (intelligences) independent of God's creative and sustaining act. Finally, this participation is the basis for the Thomistic doctrine of ANALOGY between God and creatures, for just as God is being by essence (per essentiam), so creatures are being by participation (per participationem: see Summa Theologiae 1a, 4.3 ad 3). In St. Thomas's conception, esse is no longer an accident, as Avicenna thought, but the immanent act of substance, and the proper effect of God alone (Quodl. 12.5.1).

Kinds of Participation. Some Thomists (e.g., L. B. Geiger) believe that St. Thomas developed two notions of participation, each distinct: (1) Participation by similitude (secundum similitudinem), in which participated beings diversely reflect, mirror, or symbolize the reality participated. (2) Participation by composition (secundum compositionem), in which a subject shares, or has, the participated characteristic, e.g., esse. In this view creatures not only participate in esse by composition, but the very composite is a "similitude" reflecting God.

Static Structure of Being. Other Thomists, rejecting this interpretation of the Thomistic synthesis, prefer to see in St. Thomas's doctrine of participation a complete dissolution (the Hegelian Aufhebung) of the Platonic-Aristotelian tension. For these, esse as the act of all acts must be distinguished not only from essence, but also from existence in the Kantian sense. In order to preserve the theory of actus essendi, they prefer to divide participation initially into transcendental and predicamental: the first type concerns esse and its transcendental attributes; the second concerns univocal formalities of GENUS with respect to SPECIES, and species with respect to individuals. Transcendental participation of esse has already been mentioned; it is the second that needs special consideration because of its Aristotelian roots. It is true, as Aristotle says, that genera and species are predicated of subjects essentially (per essentiam) and not by participation (per participationem). However, a genus is differently realized and actualized in the various species according to different degrees of participated perfection (cf. Fabro, La nozione metafisica di partecipazione, 161). Thus while genera and species may be logically predicated as univocal and essential attributes, in the physical order they must be considered as potestative wholes, capable of being shared unequally according to different degrees of perfection. Predicamentally even individual men participate in human nature (see text of In Boeth. de hebdom. 2.24, quoted above). St. Thomas speaks about predicamental participation when he says, "Just as this individual man participates in human nature, so every created being participates, if I may say so, in the nature of being (naturam essendi), since only God is His esse." (Summa Theologiae 1a, 45.5 ad 1; cf. C. gent. 1.32; Quodl. 2.2.1). Thus in a static or structural consideration of beings, transcendental participation is the real composition of subject and esse, while predicamental participation is the real composition of matter and form in essence, and substance and accident in general.

Causal Participation. Parallel to this static consideration of being, one must consider the dynamic or causal order. Causal participation is likewise twofold: transcendental and predicamental. Causal transcendental participation is the production of the common esse of all creatures by creation (De pot. 3.5 ad 1–2; De ver. 21.5 ad 5–6). Esse is the proper effect of divine causality (CREATION and divine CONSERVATION), and it is in virtue of this direct production of esse that God works immediately on every created cause. Causality as predicamental participation, on the other hand, is concerned with fieri or BECOMING in the order of genera and species. Here the pertinent principle is “form gives esse” (forma dat esse), which seems to invert the causal relationship discovered in the transcendental order. However, the principle has two meanings: (1) substantial form bestows formal and constitutive esse, inasmuch as it confers a specific kind of being; (2) substantial form as formal act of the essence is the true subject of the actus essendi (C. gent. 2.54). Thus form is the predicamental mediator between God and the existing finite being (cf. Fabro, Participation et causalité, 344–362). From this it follows that in all the actions of creatures, even the free actions of men, God intimately operates in all things as the universal First Cause of all being and all activity. Creatures, however, participate in this causality only on condition that they likewise remain true and responsible causes of action.

Extension of Participation. To the extent that participation allows one to conceive the universe as a reflection of divine ideas or exemplars, one may speak of participation by similitude. The EXEMPLARY causality of immaterial forms on material forms is expressed by Boethius (De trin. 2), while Pseudo-Dionysius refers to the exemplars of all existing things as preexisting in the mind of God (De div. nom. 5.8; Patrologia Graeca 3:824). But here again participation by similitude must be considered in both the transcendental and the predicamental orders. Transcendentally this similitude exists in the relation of dependence of FINITE being on the Infinite (see INFINITY). In the predicamental order this similitude can be seen in the universal affinity all beings have for each other. Thus lower beings tend to approach the more perfect as though they participated in their perfections. This ontological affinity, which orders the entire cosmos, can be expressed as the principle of the metaphysical continuity of beings, which St. Thomas borrows directly from Pseudo-Dionysius: “Divine wisdom joins the highest of the lower to the lowest of the higher” (De div. nom. 7.3; Patrologia Graeca 3:872; cf. Proclus, Elem. theol., prop. 147, ed. Dodds, 128).

In view of this principle, all created knowledge can be seen in terms of participation. Thus angelic intuitive knowledge of itself resembles (by participation) divine intuition, while through infused species it participates in all other things (Summa Theologiae 1a, 56.2; De subs. sep. 13). Similarly, human intuitive knowledge of FIRST PRINCIPLES resembles angelic “intellection,” while man’s more characteristic knowledge is REASONING, whereby he reaches out to all other reality. Even the highest of the sense faculties, the COGITATIVE POWER, participates in rationality and in a certain freedom (ibid. 1a, 78.4 ad 5; In 3 anim. 13.397). Likewise, sense appetites participate in rationality and freedom when they obey the order of right reason (In 3 sent. 35.1.1.4; Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 47.5 ad 1); this participation is realized through moral VIRTUE.

From this principle of the metaphysical continuity of all being also emerges a conception of the world as an orderly solidarity of all things (De ver. 16.1). This continuity, imperfectly realized in the static structure of being, reaches its fullness when beings reach their ultimate goals through activity. For man this ultimate goal is the dynamic, supernatural union with God that is possible only through GRACE, which is a participation in the life and powers of God as He is in Himself. “Only a rational creature is capable of God (capax Dei) in this way, because he alone can know and love God explicitly” (De ver. 22.2 ad 5); for this reason “only rational creatures have an immediate directedness to God” (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 2.3). Consequently, because man’s spirit is infinitely receptive, he cannot find complete happiness in anything that is good only by participation, but can find it only in Him who is goodness per essentiam (ibid. 1a2ae, 3.7). This is eternal beatitude. The highest and most sublime participation ever willed by God is the personal union of the Word with human nature in Christ. As “a partaker of our human nature” God not only renewed the whole human race (ἀνακεφαλαιώσας), but He also gave men the power to become partakers of divinity through the grace of Christ.

Participation and Analogy. The Platonic theory of vertical imitation and the Aristotelian theory of horizontal causality of universals on particulars tend to emphasize formal univocity, while the true language of participation is necessarily that of analogy. The Thomistic notion of participation, founded in esse as supreme intensive act, makes it possible to pass from finite to Infinite Being through analogical discourse. Since the foundation of all analogical language is participation, the three basic types of analogy are discussed here in terms of participation.

Analogy of Proportionality. Basically this analogy, whether proper or metaphorical, is a proportion of two or more proportions, for example, accidents are to their being proportionately what substance is to its being. Despite the radical difference between SUBSTANCE and ACCIDENT, there is a certain proportional similarity that allows us to use one predicate of both analogically. The basis of this proportional similarity is the fact that all accidents participate in the being (esse) of substance. Thus while the formal, logical structure of this kind of analogy is simply relations of SIMILARITY, its root is actual dependence and participation. In the wider, transcendental order, all creatures have their esse by participation from God, Ipsium Esse Subsistens. Consequently the analogical proportionality between the goodness of God and the goodness of creatures, the wisdom of God and the wisdom of creatures, and the like, is based on the fact of transcendental participation, which is the basis also for predicamental participation (composition of substance and accidents, matter and form). It is this static analogy of proportionality that is expressed in the tension of similarity-dissimilarity according to the Platonic view of the vertical “fall” of beings. Moreover, it is precisely through this static analogy of proportionality that beings obtain the proper consistency of esse, each in its own way, since each being is actuated by the proper act of participated esse. For St. Thomas—in keeping with the demands of Heidegger—the difference between to be and to exist is founded on being, as intensive emergent act, that is diversely shared by each being.

Analogy of Attribution. In contrast to static analogy of proportions, analogy of intrinsic attribution is dynamic in that it is based on causality and dependency. In analogy of attribution, a term that properly belongs to one subject, for example, healthy in body, is attributed to other subjects because of some causal dependence, for example, healthy apples, healthy medicine, and so on. In the analogy of being, esse properly belongs to God alone, but it is predicated of creatures because God creates and conserves the esse of each creature. This analogy is called intrinsic attribution because each creature really does have being intrinsically, even though it is from another. Analogy of attribution emphasizes the “otherness” of the characteristic participated. Thus creatures are being only by participation (ens per participationem), and accidents are being only by participation. In this way analogy of proportionality presupposes analogy of attribution in the existential order. For this reason analogy of attribution culminates metaphysical investigation in resolving the many to the One, the diverse to the All. While PAN-THEISM denies the TRANSCENDENCE of God, either by reducing God to creatures or by identifying creatures with God, the metaphysics of St. Thomas maintains the transcendence of God above all creatures and at the same time recognizes His IMMANENCE in participated being. In fact, only a doctrine of participation can maintain both His transcendence and His immanence.

Analogy of Inequality. The analogy of inequality within genera and species, as has been explained, is founded on predicamental participation. While the logician considers genera and species to be univocal abstractions, the realist sees that a genus is differently realized in the various species; that is, the perfection of the genus is unequally shared by the various species within a given genus. This inequality of participation is the indispensable condition for multiplicity of species, just as the indispensable condition for multiplicity of individuals is the divisibility of matter. Thus from the formal point of view, a generic definition is univocally predicated of various subjects, but from the existential point of view, these subjects participate unequally in the full perfection (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 88.1 ad 1; C. gent. 1.32).

See Also: BEING; EXISTENCE; EMANATIONISM; IMMANENCE; TRANSCENDENCE; ACT; CAUSALITY; ANALOGY.

Bibliography: C. FABRO, La nozione metafisica di partecipazione secondo S. Tomaso d'Aquino (3d ed. rev. and enl. Turin 1964); Participation et causalité selon S. Thomas d'Aquin (Louvain 1961). L. B. GEIGER, La Participation dans la philosophie de S. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1942). R. J. HENLE, Saint Thomas and Platonism (The Hague 1956). De Thomistische Participatieleeren (Nijmegen 1944). J. DE FINANCE, Être et agir dans la philosophie de saint Thomas (Paris 1945). P. KLUBERTANZ, St. Thomas Aquinas on Analogy (Chicago, Ill. 1960). J. MUNDHENK, Die Begriffe der "Teil-habe" und des "Lichts" in der Psychologie und Erkenntnislehre des Thomas von Aquin (Würzburg 1935). G. SÖHNGEN, "Thomas von Aquin über Teilhabe durch Berührung," Die Einheit in der Theologie (Munich 1952). K. KRENN, Vermittlung und Differenz? (Rome 1962). F. ULRICH, Homo Abyssus (Einsiedeln 1961). L. OEING-HANHOFF, Ens et unum convertuntur (Münster 1953). A. HAYEN, L'Intentionnel dans la philosophie de saint Thomas (Brussels 1942). G. SIEWERTH, Der Thomismus als Identitätssystem (2d ed. Frankfurt 1961). E. J. SCHELLER, Das Priestertum Christi im Anschluss an den hl. Thomas von Aquin (Paderborn 1934).

[C. FABRO]

PASCAL, BLAISE

Mathematician, Christian apologist; b. Clermont-en-Auvergne, June 19, 1623; d. Paris, Aug. 19, 1662. Despite his brief life and incomplete work, Pascal was one of the most universal geniuses of modern France and a singularly novel and profound interpreter of the Christian conscience. In his life and thought were intimately commingled: the witness of the man is no less significant than the message of his work.

Pascal's life can be thought of as a drama in which three principles confront each other: science, the world, and God. His genius first became apparent through science. Deprived of maternal care at the age of three, he was brought up with admirable devotion and competence by his father, Etienne, a mathematician of genuine ability, who, in order to devote himself more fully to the education of this son and two daughters, Gilberte and Jacqueline, gave up his post as magistrate of Clermont-Ferrand to move to Paris in 1631. In the capital, Blaise, whose mathematical genius manifested itself at an early age, was soon able to take part in the discussions of those savants who gathered around Father Mersenne. In 1639 Pascal wrote his Essai pour les coniques, a widely acclaimed treatise in which he demonstrated a remarkable new property of conic sections.

From 1640 to 1647 Pascal lived at Rouen, where Richelieu had appointed his father administrator. Here Pascal invented his famous arithmetical machine, the first known mechanical calculator, an achievement by which he showed himself as competent in technical matters as he was in pure science. His machine enjoyed considerable success, not only among the savants, but with the general public as well, and made him famous.

First Conversion. From his father Blaise had received a thorough, though not very fervent, religious education. In 1646 the young man was exposed to the revelation of a much more demanding Christianity. Several disciples of Jean du Vergier, Abbé of Saint Cyran (d. 1643), lived in the vicinity of Rouen, and Pascal became acquainted with their austere doctrine which advocated, primarily, the necessity of “conversion”—an abandonment of the world and submission to God. He accepted this demand enthusiastically, became a convert himself, and won his family over to his point of view. He woke to the fact that he genuinely relished one of the most dangerous of worldly enticements, fame, and resolved forthwith to abandon the sciences, the means by which he had won renown.

This resolution, however, was not immediately reduced to practice. Pascal continued his research and plunged into physics in an effort to interpret the famous experiment of Torricelli. Through some original, most ingenious experiments, he demonstrated the existence of the vacuum and the weight of air. At the same time he advanced the principles of a truly modern scientific philosophy based on primary reliance on the experiment; through him came the final break between true science and metaphysics.

Meanwhile, stricken by a serious illness, the young savant returned to Paris in 1647. His doctors had recommended diversions—advice which was, indirectly, the cause of some relaxation of his religious discipline. Worldliness again gained ground in his mind, and he began again to frequent the “world.” He attached himself principally to a nobleman, the Duc de Roannez, through whom he made the acquaintance of two very charming men, the Chevalier de Méré and Mitton. They became the models for his “emancipated free-thinker” of the Pensées, and though he turned away from them, they had taught him much—they made him taste of MONTAIGNE, and they convinced him that the science of man was of far greater importance than the science of things.

During this time Pascal continued his scientific labors and established the foundations of the calculus of probabilities. But neither science nor the world could satisfy this soul so enamored of the absolute. In 1654 his sister Jacqueline, who had become a religious in the Blaise Pascal.

Convent at PORT-ROYAL, privately heard him confess his confusion and understood immediately that, for the second time, he had become a convert. The famous and brilliantly written Mémorial recalls the intense religious experience that resulted, during the night of November 23, 1654, in the revelation of the living God.

Second Conversion and Port-Royal. Through this second conversion Pascal found himself intimately linked with the theologians and recluses of Port-Royal. He traveled there repeatedly for retreats, and the one of January 1655 gave rise to the Entretien avec M. de Sacy sur Epictète et Montaigne. A similar period of prayer the following year made him decide to embark on Les Provinciales (Lettres écrites par Louis de Montalte à un provincial), the masterpiece of the great mass of pamphlet literature brought out by the Jansenist controversies. (See JANSENISM.) At the same time Pascal remained in touch with his fashionable friends, trying to win them over to his views. He succeeded in the case of the Duc de Roannez, and addressed some remarkable letters to the duke's sister, Mlle. de Roannez (1656). It was in thinking about Méré and Mitton that Pascal conceived his project of an apologetic for the Christian religion, to be directed toward the unbelievers, for which the Pensées form the rough draft.

Although he had given up the sciences on his conversion in 1654, Pascal returned to them in 1658 at the urgent request of friends who persuaded him that publication of a worthwhile discovery would add weight to the arguments of his apologetic. Thus it was that he published (1658) some investigations on the curve called roulette, or cycloid, that provided the foundations for differential and integral calculus. But this episode was unique; following it Pascal withdrew from all lay activity. His illness, which returned in 1659 and from which he would never again be free, prohibited from that moment on any mental effort. His only writing of this period, a "Prayer asking God to make good use of his illness," expresses an ardent desire for a conversion still more perfect. In his last years Pascal accomplished one final spiritual ascension, which, reaching its culmination during the course of a terrible agony, brought him to a sort of sainthood.

Significance of his Work. He left a diversified life's work touching on the sciences, philosophy, theology, and spirituality, but at the same time extending beyond them because it was the work of neither a savant nor a specialist, but of a man gifted with a winning personality and a mind of profound insight. He owed to science his rigorous regard for truth, based on geometric reasoning or the experimental method, but he had come quickly to the conclusion that science was powerless to discern the condition of humanity, to fix the objectives of human life—in a word, powerless to attain those truths essential to man. One may properly say that the two fundamental traits of Pascal's mind were the strict demands of the absolute and the need of a living truth.

It is not surprising that he fervently embraced the Christian message, especially in the form in which it was made known to him. A devout Catholic, Pascal at the same time adhered to the thought of Port-Royal, that one need not be too rigid in the formulation of theological propositions, and as a fervent Augustinian, he believed that in the domain of religion knowledge is inseparable from love. The certainties of faith are not grasped through reason, but through the heart, the mainspring of love, which submits to revealed truth and fosters its manifestation. ( See AUGUSTINIANISM.)

From this conviction springs the deep feeling of the Provinciales. If Pascal grappled with the "casuistry" of the Jesuits, it was not because he was ignorant of certain difficulties and the necessity of resolving them, but because he wished to use only the light of revelation and not that of a reason corrupted by the Fall, which tends, understandably, to define duty as a function of self-interest. He was hostile to any compromise between humanism and Christianity, and refused to place any faith in a human nature sustained only by its own strength.

The impotence of man's reason is no less clearly set forth in the Pensées. Granted that impotence, how can the verities of Christianity be demonstrated? As a matter of fact, Pascal does not propose a rational demonstration. If the reason is too weak to achieve the absolute, it is at least strong enough to prove "that there are an infinite number of things which surpass it." It can realize the contradiction of man—his weakness and his nobility—but it cannot explain them; only revelation can resolve the problems imposed by the reason. In addition, reason can grasp revelation as a historical fact surrounded by certain wonderful events that guarantee its supernatural character. The method of the physician, who from some facts arrives at an explanatory hypothesis, is equally applicable to apologetics.

Through his sensitivity to the human drama, and the exalted ideal he propounded of a religion that rejects any compromise with worldly standards of value, Pascal impregnated his work with a ferment whose power is far from being exhausted.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, ed. L. BRUNSCHVICG and P. L. BOUTROUX, 14 v. (Paris 1904–14); Pensées, ed. L. LAFUMA, 3 v. (Paris 1951). J. MESNARD, Pascal: His Life and Works, tr. G. S. FRASER (London 1952). M. L. HUBERT, Pascal's Unfinished Apology: A Study of His Plan (New Haven 1952). A. MAIRE, Bibliographie générale des oeuvres de Blaise Pascal, 5 v. (Paris 1925–27).

[J. MESNARD]

PASCENDI

Encyclical letter of PIUS X (Sept. 8, 1907), which, along with the Holy Office's decree LAMENTABILI and the Oath against MODERNISM, forms the basis of the Church's condemnation of Modernism. Presenting a logical synthesis, not found wholly in any one Modernist's work, Pascendi emphasized root tendencies and principles. Successively it considered various roles of the Modernist.

As philosopher the Modernist proposed an agnosticism that limited all knowledge to phenomena and a vital immanence that made religion, revelation, and faith simply a sense springing from the collective subconscious and the Church its product apart from historical events. As believer he resorted to an intuition of the heart to find the divine reality. DOGMA he considered a series of secondary symbolic formulas that must be continually adjusted to the religious sense. As theologian he postulated an immanence that often savored of pantheism. As historical critic he based his work on a concealed philosophy of vital immanence. Pascendi termed Modernism "the synthesis of all heresies." The encyclical concluded with a list of disciplinary measures to be taken in the training of priests and in the censoring of written works.

The various statements of the encyclical should be interpreted in the context of its major preoccupation, which is to condemn (1) agnosticism, both in natural theology and in the symbolic, nonobjective approach to dogmatic content; (2) vital immanence, an exclusive immanence of the divine and a consequent natural, vital evolution of revelation; (3) total emancipation of exegesis from dogma and of political-religious movements from ecclesiastical authority.

Bibliography: PIUS X, "Pascendi dominici gregis" (encyclical, Sept. 8, 1907) Acta Sanctorum Sedis 40 (1907) 593–650, Eng. All Things in Christ, ed. V. A. YZERMANS (Westminster, Md. 1954). J. RIVIÈRE, Le Modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929). A. FARGES and J. LEBRETON, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. P. ALÈS (Paris 1911–22) 3:637–695. H. STIRNIMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:126–127.

[J. J. HEANEY]

PASCHAL, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: 687. Nothing is known of archdeacon Paschal until he attempts to bribe the imperial exarch at Ravenna into confirming his election as successor to Pope Conon (686–7). At this time, since the Roman church was still part of the empire, it was customary for papal elections to be ratified by the emperor's administrator in Ravenna. This exarch, John Platyn, agreed to support Paschal, but the election was contested by the military aristocracy, which put forward the archpriest Theodore (Antipope, 687) as its candidate. Both rivals occupied the Lateran palace between October and December 687. The stalemate was ended after a meeting of city officials, clergy, and leaders of the militia. They elected Sergius I (687–701) as a compromise candidate, and he was forcibly installed in the Lateran. Theodore recognized the new pope (who would eventually be named a saint), but Paschal remained obstinate and complained to the exarch. John Platyn soon appeared in Rome, but seeing the broad support for Sergius, he ratified his election. For his part, Paschal continued to oppose Sergius, attempting to replace him. Soon Paschal was tried and imprisoned in a monastery, where he died in 692.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 1.369–72, 377; 3.343. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.243. J. RICHARDS, The Popes and the Papacy in the Early Middle Ages, 476–752 (London 1979) 206–8, 266, 274. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 82. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1993) 6.1753.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

PASCHAL I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Jan. 24, 817 to Feb. 11, 824. Little is known of Paschal's life before he became Pope, except that he was of Roman origin, was educated at the papal curia, was ordained to the priesthood, and was appointed abbot of the monastery of St. Stephen Major. Perhaps during part of his early career he played a role in papal administration. The surviving evidence suggests that his election to the papal office had general support in Rome.

At the time of Paschal I's election there remained a variety of unanswered questions about the relationship between the Pope and the Papal States and the recently created western Roman emperor and his empire. During the last years of his reign CHARLEMAGNE (768–814) had done little to clarify that issue; neither had the tumultuous pontificate of Pope LEO III (795–816) contributed to a solution. Apparently concerned about his relationship with the Franks, one of Paschal's first actions as Pope was to establish communications with Emperor LOUIS I THE PIOUS (814–840), who had assumed the imperial office less than three years earlier and had already shown signs of moving in new directions in his political and religious policy. Paschal dispatched two letters to Louis. The first sought to explain the circumstances surrounding his election and consecration, which had occurred without the involvement of the emperor. This enigmatic letter seems to reflect uncertainty about the role of the western emperor in papal elections and a strong desire on the part of Paschal to avoid any sign of impropriety with respect to the emperor. The second requested that Louis renew the friendship pact that had existed between the papacy and the Carolingian rulers since the time of King PEPIN III (751–768) and reconfirm the territorial concessions granted to the papacy by Pepin III and Charlemagne. Again the pope seemed anxious to define the boundaries of the Papal States and to clarify its role in the Carolingian empire. Louis responded promptly by issuing in 817 a document called the Pactum Ludovicianum which set forth in writing the terms that Louis and Pope STEPHEN IV (V) (816–817), Paschal's immediate predecessor, had agreed upon during their meeting in 816. Although the authenticity of this important document has been challenged many times by modern historians, it is now generally accepted as authentic in its main provisions. The Pactum renewed the friendship pact between the papacy and the Franks and confirmed the exact territories and patrimonies that pertained to the papacy in a way that sanctioned papal claims to a large part of Italy. Louis recognized papal sovereignty in administrative and judicial functions in the Papal States, except in cases where the Pope asked for imperial assistance or where inhabitants of the Papal States who claimed to be oppressed sought justice from the emperor. The emperor pledged to protect the Papal State and to allow complete freedom of papal elections. The generous terms of the Pactum Ludovicianum have sometimes been interpreted as an instance where Louis' misdirected piety led to undue concessions to the Church at the expense of the secular authority. In reality, the Pactum represented an important step in formally integrating the Papal States into the structure of the Carolingian Empire in a manner that gave to that entity and its ruler, the Pope, a privileged place, immune for the most part from outside interference.

Christ with Saints by the Jordan River, Church of St. Prassede, Rome. Pope Paschal I, the donor of the mosaic and restorer of the 5th century church is at left holding model of the church.

During most of Paschal I's pontificate the Pactum Ludovicianum served as a workable arrangement governing papal-Frankish relationships. When Louis the Pious enacted his famous Ordinatio imperii of 817, which arranged for his succession in terms aimed at preserving the unity of the Carolingian empire rather than observing the Frankish tradition of dividing the realm among all male heirs, Paschal I gave his approval. Paschal I responded to Louis I's request that he lend papal support to the missionary effort of EBBO, archbishop of Reims, in Denmark by providing Ebbo with a letter that designated him papal legate to the mission field in the North. In 821 Paschal sent legates bearing gifts to celebrate the marriage of LO-THAIR I, heir to the imperial title. In 823 the Pope welcomed Lothair I to Rome and bestowed on him the crown of the kingdom of Italy and the title emperor; although Louis I had already designated Lothair I as co-emperor in 817, Paschal's act reinforced the idea that papal participation was necessary to legitimate assumption of the imperial crown.

During most of his pontificate Paschal was in full control of affairs in the Papal States with little interference from either Emperor Louis I or his surrogate in Italy, Lothair I. Little is known about papal activity during these years. Paschal I gave some attention to the renewal of ICONOCLASM by the eastern emperor, LEO V (813–820), a matter drawn to his attention chiefly by the appeals of THEODORE THE STUDITE, the leader of the considerable anti-iconoclastic forces opposing Emperor Leo V in the East. Theodore's appeals were couched in terms that recognized the Pope as the ultimate source of orthodox doctrine. Aside from welcoming victims of persecution in the eastern empire, Paschal wrote letters denouncing the iconoclasm of Leo V and his successor, Michael II (820–829). Papal condemnation was a factor in sustaining the opposition within the Eastern empire. Paschal also gave considerable attention to rebuilding and redecorating churches in Rome, continuing the policy of transforming the physical appearance of the city begun by his predecessors during the eighth century.

Despite the appearance of calm surrounding affairs during most of Paschal I's pontificate, all was not well. Bits of information scattered through the record suggest a rising tide of opposition to his administration of the Papal States. The opposition came chiefly from the Roman secular nobility, who were increasingly unhappy with the clerical control of the Papal States. In 822 the appearance of co-emperor Lothair I in Italy triggered a crisis, which came to a head in 823 when two high officials in the papal administration were put to death, apparently because they headed a faction in Rome favorable to Lothair I. Their pro-Frankish position raised doubts about their loyalty to Paschal I. Although Paschal sent a letter to Louis claiming his innocence, supporters of the victims brought him a version of events in Rome that implicated Paschal I in the murders. The emperor decided to send envoys to investigate, but before the imperial inquest could be completed the Pope appeared before the imperial envoys and many bishops and swore an oath of purgation vowing he was innocent of any wrongdoing. He was following the example set by Pope Leo III in 800 in a similar situation. Louis was momentarily satisfied with Paschal I's denial of culpability; the Pope's death soon after ended further inquiry into his conduct. But apparently Louis I soon became convinced that the situation in Rome required a closer examination of the relationship between Pope and emperor. It was redefined during the pontificate of Paul I's successor, Pope Eugenius II (824–827), in the Constitutio Romana of 824, which provided for more imperial control over papal administration and papal elections than had prevailed before. In a sense, the end result of Paschal I's pontificate was tighter integration of the Papal States into the Carolingian empire through the imposition of severe limitations on the independence of the Pope as ruler of the Papal States. This consequence probably should not be construed as an anti-papal action on the part of Louis the Pious. Rather, it was another facet of the emperor's effort to unify the Christian community into a single imperium Christianum in which spiritual and secular leaders could act in accord to realize God's will.

Feast: May 14.

See Also: CAROLINGIAN DYNASTY; CAROLINGIAN REFORM; STATES OF THE CHURCH.

Bibliography: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957) 2:52–68, English translation as The Lives of the Ninth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of Ten Popes from A.D. 817–891, trans. with intro. and notes by R. DAVIS, Translated Texts for Historians 20 (Liverpool 1995) 1–30. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2nd ed. (Leipzig 1885–1888) 1:318–320. Annales regni Francorum, a. 817–824, ed. F. KURZE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum (Hannover 1895; reprinted, 1989) 145–164, English translation in Carolingian Chronicles: Royal Frankish Annals and Nithard's Histories, trans. B. W. SCHOLZ (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1970) 101–115. Theganus, Gesta Hludowici Imperatoris, chs. 18 and 30, and Astronomus, Vita Hludowici Imperatoris, chs. 27, 34, 36, and 37, both in Thegan, Die Taten Kaiser Ludwigs; Astronomus, Das Leben Kaiser Ludwigs, ed. and trans. E. TREMP, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum 64 (Hannover 1995) 200, 218, 372, 402, 414, 418–420, an English translation of the passage from the Astronomer in Son of Charlemagne. A Contemporary Life of Louis the Pious, chs. 27, 34, 36, 37, trans. with intro. and notes A. CABANISS (Syracuse, N.Y. 1964) 62, 71, 75, 76–77. Capitularia regum Francorum, ed. A. BORETIUS and V. KRAUSE, 2 v., Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Leges, Sectio II (Hannover 1893–1897; reprinted, 1980–1984) 1:352–355 (text of the Pactum Ludowicianum). Epistolae selectae pontificum Romanorum Carlo Magno et Ludowico Pio regnantibus scriptae, ed. K. HAMPE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, vol. 5: Epistolae Karolini Aevi, vol. 3 (Berlin 1899; reprinted, 1995). 68–71.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

PASCHAL II, POPE

Pontificate: Aug. 13, 1099, to Jan. 21, 1118; Benedictine; b. Rainerius, at Bieda, in central Italy. He entered a monastery as a boy (not Cluny as commonly supposed, but probably a dependent house of Vallombrosa), became cardinal priest of San Clemente under GREGORY VII, served as legate in Spain under URBAN II, and was subsequently abbot of ST. PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE-WALLS. His personal sanctity helped determine his election to succeed Urban II. His pontificate did not prove an easy one. The main problems he faced were (1) the existence of anti-popes; (2) the conflict with the secular powers, especially in Germany, France, and England; (3) the need to further the reform of the Church. Underlying them all was one theme—the struggle for control of episcopal elections.

His reign opened well. Emperor HENRY IV, after the death of Guibert of Ravenna (CLEMENT III, ANTIPOPE) in 1100, withdrew support from subsequent antipopes, Th-eoderic (1100–02), Albert (1102), and Sylvester IV (1105–11); these no longer proved a serious threat to Paschal. Both Henry and the pope hoped to settle their differences, but neither of them would give way on the investiture issue. Paschal renewed the ban against Henry and prohibited lay investiture at the Roman synod in 1102. Subsequently he favored the revolt of Henry's son (1105). The son made a large number of promises, but as HENRY V he proved just as determined to retain control over investiture.

Pope Paschal II inviting the monk John to continue the "Chronicon Vulturense."

Despite meetings with the royal legates in 1106, 1107, and 1110, Paschal was disillusioned, and he condemned Henry V at the Synods of Guastalla (1106), Troyes (1107), Benevento (1108), and the Lateran (1110). Polemic literature on both sides aggravated the dispute. Henry finally marched on Rome, for he was determined to obtain imperial coronation and the right of investiture. The outcome was the fiercely debated concordat at Sutri (Feb. 9, 1111), by which, in return for free elections, Paschal granted church property in the Empire to Henry and agreed to crown him as emperor.

Both papal and imperial supporters condemned the agreement. Henry then took Paschal prisoner and forced him to recognize lay investiture (Privilege of Ponte Mammolo, Apr. 12, 1111). These actions seriously damaged the unity of the papal party. Ultimately Paschal repudiated the privilege (1112) and explicitly condemned lay investiture in 1116. He finally left Rome and returned only on Jan. 14, 1118, to die there a few days later. During this long struggle with Henry V, Paschal had also intervened to settle the dispute of ANSELM, Archbishop of Canterbury, with HENRY I OF ENGLAND (1107). The interest of that settlement lies in its departure from the strict principles of the GREGORIAN REFORM, thus providing a basis for subsequent settlements with France (also in 1107) and with Henry V (Concordat of WORMS, 1122).

Paschal has generally been criticized for his failure, and little has been said of his work for the Church in other regions, e.g., in the Latin Kingdom of JERUSALEM. Even his contemporaries—enemies and friends alike—condemned his actions (see the Liber de honore ecclesiae of Placidus of Nonantula, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite 2:568). He did not solve the conflict with the Empire; but if success be the guiding principle, it may be asked how much he differed from the example of his more able predecessors. His attitude toward temporal possessions was ideally the right one. He certainly contributed toward depriving the REGALIA of their sacramental character, making the concordat of 1122 possible. His pontificate was one more step in the direction of sharply distinguishing lay and clerical powers and offices.

See Also: INVESTITURE STRUGGLE.

Bibliography: F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. 3:134–151. C. MARCORA, Storia dei papi (Milan 1961) 2:346–358. A. STACPOOLE, "Hildebrand, Cluny and the Papacy," Downside Review 81 (1963) 142–164, 254–272. J. G. ROWE, "Paschal II and the Relation Between the Spiritual and Temporal Powers in the Kingdom of Jerusalem," Speculum 32 (1957) 470–501. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD 1:702–772. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Constitutiones 1:134–152, 564–574. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 8:338–375. H. SEIBERT, "Paschalis II," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg, Basel, Rome, Vienna 1993) 7:1409–1410. G.M. CANTARELLA, Pasquale II e il suo tempo (Naples 1997). I. M. RESNICK, "Odo of Cambrai and the Investiture Crisis of the Early Twelfth Century," Viator 28 (1997) 83–98. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 160.

[J. GILCHRIST]

PASCHAL III, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: April 22, 1164 to Sept. 20, 1168. Born into a noble family, Guido of Crema was a prominent member of the papal curia as cardinal priest of St. Callisto, and was arguably the strongest supporter of antipope Victor IV (1159–64) among the curia. Guido was elected successor to Victor after the latter died suddenly at Lucca. His election (April 22, 1164) was highly irregular because only two schismatic cardinals, two bishops, and the prefect of Rome participated. Nonetheless, Paschal was consecrated at Lucca by the bishop of Liège on April 26, 1164. His election and consecration were instigated by one of Frederick I Barbarossa's (1152–90) most trusted advisors: Rainald of Dassel, the emperor's chancellor for Italy and the archbishop of Cologne (1159–67). For this reason Frederick soon ratified Paschal's election, even though it was done without his advice.

At this time Frederick was losing support among the German clergy. Archbishop Eberhard of Salzburg had long opposed imperial policy toward the papacy, but upon the death of Victor IV the archbishops of Mainz, Trèves, and Magdeburg also came out against Frederick. These were influential prelates who believed that an important opportunity to end the schism had been quashed by the emperor's support of Paschal. Yet the emperor managed to turn this opposition to his advantage. He took an oath at the diet of Würzburg (May 22, 1165) never to recognize Alexander III (1159–81) and then demanded that all German clergy do the same. Those clergy who were present followed Frederick in his oath; other clergy who continued to recognize Alexander had their lands confiscated by the emperor and given to laymen. Thus by the end of 1167, Frederick had replaced in his territories (i.e., most of Germany, northern Italy, and Burgundy) virtually every churchman who had sided with Alexander with supporters of Paschal.

For his part, Paschal was forced to reside in Viterbo, since he could not remain in Rome because of local pressure from the communes and others who opposed imperial control of the papacy. He appears to have approved Frederick's request for the canonization of Charlemagne, who was elevated to sainthood by Rainald of Dassel on Jan. 8, 1166. In July 1167, after a difficult campaign through Lombardy, Frederick entered Rome and marched on St. Peter's with Paschal at his side. Pope Alexander was forced to flee for another part of Rome, and eventually to Benevento. On July 22 Paschal was formally enthroned in St. Peter's and actively assumed his role as pope. On July 30 he consecrated over a dozen bishops and patriarchs, and on August 1 solemnly crowned Frederick and Beatrice as emperor and empress. Yet, Paschal's usefulness to the emperor had passed and Frederick was already discussing the possibility of both pope and antipope stepping aside in favor of a new election.

But a few weeks later when an outbreak of malaria in Rome decimated Frederick's army, he was forced to break camp and march north to the German frontier. Rainald of Dassel, Frederick's trusted advisor and Paschal's great supporter, was among the two thousand who perished. Paschal was forced to go north with Frederick and did not return to Italy until early 1168. At that time the Romans only accepted him grudgingly, probably because the city was negotiating for the release of many citizens held captive by the emperor. Furthermore, the Lombards were challenging the imperial presence more effectively than ever before. He died on Sept. 20, 1168, a few weeks after retiring to a secure part of the city because of fear of a future Roman senate election that might favor Pope Alexander. Although the force of the schism had largely been spent, Frederick still found an imperial antipope useful in dealing with Alexander and so allowed Callistus III (1168–78) to be named Paschal's successor.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.410–20. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 2.426–29. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Munich 1954–59) 248–58, 273–78, 608ff. M. BALDWIN, Alexander III and the Twelfth Century (Glen Rock, NJ 1968). W. ULLMANN, A Short History of the Papacy in the Middle Ages (London 1972). T. REUTER, The Papal Schism, the Empire and the West, 1159–69 (Diss. Exeter 1975). J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 178–79. C. MORRIS, The Papal Monarchy: The Western Church from 1050–1250 (Oxford 1989). I. S. ROBINSON, The Papacy 1073–1198: Continuity and Innovation (Cambridge 1990). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1993) 6.1753–4.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

PASCHAL BAYLON, ST.

Franciscan monk; b. Torre-Hermosa, Aragon, Spain, May 24, 1540; d. Villareal in Castellon, Spain, May 15, 1592. He was a shepherd, the son of Martin Baylon and Elizabeth Jubeira, peasants of lowly origins, and he taught himself to read and write. In 1564 he was received into the Alcantarine Franciscans at Monteforte. His superiors urged him to study for the priesthood, but he chose to become a lay brother. During most of his religious life he served as porter. In this office he showed remarkable kindness to the poor who came to the friary door. His personal austerities surpassed the severe demands of the Alcantarine constitutions. He was granted marvelous insights into the mysteries of religion, and his counsel was sought by learned and saintly persons. But it was his devotion to the Eucharist that emerged as the dominant theme of his life. In this connection numerous miracles are reported by his early biographers, but it is not always easy to distinguish fact from legend.

His writings consist of two books of prayers and reflections that he jotted down on scraps of paper. One of these volumes was edited by Jaime Sala and published at Toledo in 1911 under the title Opúsculos de San Pascual Bailón. Because of the number of cures worked through his intercession, PAUL V beatified Paschal in 1618, 26 years after the saint's death. He was canonized by ALEXANDER VIII in 1690, and, in 1897 LEO XIII designated him patron of all Eucharistic congresses and societies.

Feast: May 17.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum May 4:48–131. O. ENGLEBERT, Saint Pascal Baylon (Paris 1942). V. FACCHINETTI, Pasquale Baylon, frate minore: Il santo dell'Eucaristia (Milan 1922). A. GROETEKEN, Paschalis Baylon: Ein Heiligenbild aus Spaniens Goldenem Jahrhundert (Cincinnati 1912). L. GUIM CASTRO, San Pascual Bailón: Celestial patrono de los Congresos Eucarísticos (Vich, Spain 1953). C. NAVARRETE, San Pascualito Rey y el culto a la muerte en Chiapas (Mexico City 1982). L. A. PORRENTROY, The Saint of the Eucharist, tr. O. STANIFORTH (San Francisco 1905). L. PRINCIPE, Pasquale Baylón, santo, ieri e oggi (Naples 1973). I. A. RUSSO, San Pasquale Baylon (3d ed. Naples 1968). J. XIMENEZ, Crónica del beato Fr. Pascual Bailón (Valencia 1601).

[C. J. LYNCH]

PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, ST.

Abbot, theologian of the Eucharist; b. Soissons, c. 785; d. c. 860. He entered the Benedictine abbey of CORBIE under Abbot ADALARD the Elder (814–821) whose life he was to write (Patrologia Latina, 120:1507–56). Though only a deacon, he was elected abbot of Corbie c. 843 but later resigned (before 853) because of opposition to his plans for reform. In 831 Paschasius wrote his treatise Concerning the Lord's Body and Blood (Patrologia Latina, 120:1267–1351), the first monograph ever written on the Eucharist. Revised by Paschasius in 844, it was severely criticized by RATRAMNUS and RABANUS MAURUS. Toward the end of his life Paschasius answered his critics in his famous letter to Frudegard (Patrologia Latina, 120:1351–66). In addition to commentaries on Psalms 44, Jeremiah, and Matthew (Patrologia Latina, 120:31–1256), he wrote works dealing with the three theological virtues (Patrologia Latina, 120:1387–90), the Virginal Birth (Patrologia Latina, 120:1367–86), the martyrdom of Rufinus and Valerius (Patrologia Latina, 120:1489–1508), the life of Abbot WALA (Patrologia Latina, 120:1559–1650), and a number of poems and letters. His letter on the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, formerly attributed to St. Jerome (Patrologia Latina, 30:122–142), was often cited in Christological treatises of the Middle Ages. Paschasius is known to have attended the synods of Paris (847) and Quierzy (849), but the date of his death is uncertain.

Concerning the Eucharist, Paschasius taught that “the substance of bread and wine is changed into Christ's Body and Blood” (De Corp., 8.2). In dealing with the Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist he described it as the very flesh of Mary, which had suffered on the Cross, was buried, and rose again (De Corp., 4.3 and 7.2). He held that by the omnipotence of God it is miraculously created or multiplied daily at each Consecration (De Corp., 4.1 and 12.1). His opponents rejected this doctrinal presentation as too crude and materialistic. In his letter to Frudegard, Paschasius reaffirmed his view and tried to show that it was in complete accord with the teaching of the Fathers. Modern historians of theology agree that Paschasius overstressed the identity of the historical and the Eucharistic body and that the manner in which he had recourse to legends was not commendable. Paschasius's great influence was partly due to the fact that at the end of the 11th century a number of passages copied from his work began to be circulated under the name of St. Augustine.

Feast: April 26.

Bibliography: Works. Collection of his works, ed. J. SIRMOND (Paris 1618), MABILLON (Paris 1677), and MARTÈNE (Paris 1733), reprinted in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 120; Poems, ed. L. TRAUBE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1826– ) 3.1:38–53; Letters, ed. E. DUEMMLER, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae (Berlin 1826– ) 6.1:133–149, critical eds. A. RIPBERGER, Der Pseudo-Hieronymus-Brief IX “Cogitis me” (Spicilegium Friburgense 9: Fribourg 1962), with bibliog. Literature. E. CHOISY, Paschase Radbert (Geneva 1888). D. STONE, A History of the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist, 2 v. (New York 1909) 1:216–220. J. GEISELMANN, Die Eucharistielehre der Vorscholastik (Paderborn 1926). H. PELTIER, Paschase Radbert (Amiens 1938). K. VIELHABER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:130–131. C. CHAZELLE, “Figure, Character, and the Glorified Body in the Carolingian Eucharistic Controversy,” Traditio, 47 (1992) 1–36. W. COLE, “Theology in Paschasius Radbertus' Liturgy-Oriented Marian Works,” in De Cultu Mariano Saeculis VI–XI, v. 3 (Rome 1972) 395–431.

[N. M. HARING]

PASSAGLIA, CARLO

Theologian; b. Pieve S. Carlo, Lucca, Italy, May 2, 1812; d. Turin, March 12, 1887. In 1827 he became a Jesuit. From 1840 to 1844 he was prefect of studies at the Germanicum in Rome, and in 1844 professor of dogma at the Roman College. He became professor at the papal Sapienza University in Rome in 1858, left the Jesuits in 1859, and in 1860 was named a member of the papal commission for the theological investigation of the Causa italica. In 1860 he wrote Il pontifice ed il principe. He was Cavour's mediator, and in 1861 he published, anonymously, Pro causa italica ad episcopos catholicos, which was placed on the Index. He fled Rome in October of the same year and accepted a professorship in moral philosophy at the state university of Turin. In 1862 he directed to Pius IX a petition on behalf of about 9,000 Italian priests and was suspended. He was the editor of the weekly Il mediatore (1862–66), the daily La pace (1863–64), and Il gerdil (1864). In 1863 and 1864 he was a member of Parliament. He had been seeking reconciliation with the Church since 1868, and on March 8, 1887, a few days before his death, he obtained it.

Passaglia was a patristically oriented theologian with strong leanings toward Petavius and Thomassin. He published the first book of Petavius's Dogmatics in 1857. He showed a mastery of theology, and together with G. PERRONE and his two disciples, K. SCHRADER and J. B. FRANZELIN, he renewed the study of it at the Roman College. There he was the teacher of renowned German theologians, including H. J. DENZINGER, F. HETTINGER, B. JUNGSMANN, H. von HURTER, and M. SCHEEBEN. Passaglia took part in the preparatory work that led to the definition of the Immaculate Conception of Mary, and to the wording of the bull Ineffabilis Deus. Yet at Vatican I, Passaglia's view of the mediate papal power of jurisdiction was rejected. His theological works are of lasting value, for example: Commentarium theologicorum, 3 v. (Rome 1850–51), De ecclesia Christi, 2 v. (Regensburg 1853–56), and De immaculata deiparae semper virginis conceptu, 3 v. (Rome 1854, Naples 1855). From his unpublished material H. Schauf edited De conciliis oecumenicis, theses (Rome 1961).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 6:332–336. C. BOYER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:2207–10. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.2:1499–1500. L. BIGI-NELLI, Biografia del Sac. Prof. Carlo Passaglia con documenti (Turin 1887). P. D'ERCOLE, Carlo Passaglia: cenno biobibliografico e ricordo (Turin 1888). C. G. AREVALO, Some Aspects of the Theology of the Mystical Body of Christ in the Ecclesiology of G. Perrone, C. Passaglia, and Cl. Schrader (Rome 1959). W. KASPER, Die Lehre von der Tradition in der römischen Schule (Freiburg 1962).

[H. SCHAUF]

PASSERINI, PIETRO MARIA

b. Cremona, 1597; d. Rome, 1677. Passerini, a canonist, became procurator general of the Dominican Order. For 20 years he was a professor at the Sapienza in Rome and was renowned for his work on the Roman Curia. His principal writings are the De electione canonica tractatus (Rome 1661), De hominum statibus et officiis (1665), and the Regulare Tribunale (1677).

Bibliography: M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:2210–11. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:253–254.

[L. R. KOZLOWSKI]

PASSIO

Passio was originally the account of suffering of a martyr written by Christians and based on the testimony of eyewitnesses. In the earliest type of passio, the miraculous element plays a restricted part, as in the accounts of the martyrdoms of St. POLYCARP and SS. PERPETUA and Felicity, or in the passio of the Scillitan Martyrs (c. 180). Later authors embellished this type of narrative with fanciful and miraculous happenings to edify, or to satisfy, popular tastes. This was done in the case of the passiones of SS. HIPPOLYTUS, SEBASTIAN, CECILIA, AGNES, and the FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS, making the task of discovering the authentic ones difficult for modern hagiographers. Another type of passio that became popular from the 5th century onward was a completely legendary account of a martyr's or saint's life and death, which usually had nothing more than a name and possibly a location as foundation. The passio of St. CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA and that of St. GEORGE are without historical foundation. The passio even in its most authentic form is to be distinguished from an authentic Act of the martyrdom, which is the official shorthand report of the trial and death of a martyr. Only a few of these have survived. (See ACTS OF THE MARTYRS.)

The passio was used by the APOLOGISTS as a subsidiary proof of the divine origin of the Christian religion; but its specific purpose was to encourage Christians to honor and imitate the martyrs. In theology the passio as an account of the sufferings of a martyr points to the relevance of the faith as an absolute factor in the life of the early Church. The martyr was challenged to forswear his faith or die for it. Likewise, the confessions of faith frequently put into the mouth of the martyr, whether authentic or not, witness to belief in a living, triune God, the Resurrection of Christ, and Christian belief in final glory.

Bibliography: A. HAMMAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–67) 7:133–134; Theologie und Glaube 45 (1955) 35–43. G. LAZZATI, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei primi quattro secoli (Turin 1956). Acta Sanctorum, (Paris 1863– ). Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882– ). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels, 1898–1901; suppl. 1911). Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957). R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953). H. DELEHAYE, Les Passions des martyrs et les genres littéraires (Brussels 1921).

[F. X. MURPHY]

PASSION

From the Latin passio (Gr. πάθος), meaning something suffered or undergone, has a variety of significations. In its etymological sense it refers to physical suffering, particularly that associated with the martyrdom of early Christians (see PASSIO). In a broader philosophical meaning, as opposed to action it signifies the reception of the activity of some extrinsic agent or mover, and as such is enumerated among the CATEGORIES of being (see ACTION AND PASSION). It is used also to designate the species of QUALITY according to which there can be alteration (see MOTION), and, by extension, to signify any attribute, affection, or PROPERTY of a subject. In psychology, Cartesian usage identifies passions with states of the soul resulting from the action of “animal spirits”; Aristotelian and scholastic usage, on the other hand, refers to all types of emotional activity as passions (see EMOTION). More commonly accepted usages refer to any violent or intense emotion, particularly an ardent affection for one of the opposite sex, as passion (see LOVE; SEX). Among Christians, the word is frequently used to indicate the sufferings of Christ.

[W. A. WALLACE]

PASSION OF CHRIST, I (IN THE BIBLE)

This article, concerned primarily with the story of Christ's Passion and death as told in the four Gospels, is composed of four main sections: the ancient, common basis of a Passion narrative prior to the four written Gospels; the development of the Gospel tradition about the Passion; characteristics of the four canonical Passion narratives; the use of the OT in the Passion accounts. A specific treatment of the Resurrection is not included in this article, although the realization of the unity of the one redemptive mystery, Passion-death-Exaltation, is basic to the discussion (see RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 1). For the theological significance of Christ's Passion, see EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE); REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE); SALVATION.

Pre-Gospel Passion Narrative. The Passion narratives in the present Gospels (Mark ch. 14–15; Matthew ch. 26–27; Luke ch. 22–23; John ch. 18–19) differ from the rest of the Gospel material in that they seem not to have been compiled from individual, self-contained units or stories, but present a unified, sequential account of the final events in Jesus' life and ministry. Recognizing the very different character of these stories as continuous narratives, the adherents of the form-critical school have acknowledged the very ancient tradition upon which they are based. Modern Biblical scholarship agrees that there was a primitive narrative; but there are divergent opinions on the genre, content, and milieu of the formation of that narrative. Only as a whole could the story answer the question, “How could Jesus have been brought to the cross by the people who were blessed by His signs and wonders?” To counter this scandal of the cross, individual incidents from the Passion would not do; the entire purposeful narrative, giving exact geographical and temporal data, was seen to be necessary. (See FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL.)

Several arguments from literary criticism support the hypothesis of such a primitive narrative. More than any other part of the Gospels, this section has the nature of a connected historical account. Although the first ten chapters of Mark, for example, comprise separate blocks of material loosely connected and without continuous chronological or topographical coherence, with the beginning of the Passion story, we find a definitely sequential account. Among all four Gospels there is substantial agreement regarding the course of events of the Passion. Although chronological arrangements in earlier parts of the Gospels reflect more freely the particular interests of the writers, the events of Holy Week seem to have been so fixed in the tradition and so respected as the record of the climax of Jesus' life that the order could not be freely changed; it might be abridged, expanded, or supplemented, but its general order was retained. J. Jeremias observes that John's Gospel rarely shows parallels to Mark's account in the description of Jesus' ministry, but beginning with the entrance into Jerusalem, the Johannine narrative agrees with the Marcan rather broadly until the arrest, and then quite strictly after that. These parallels are striking, for the substance of the narrative is the same, even though details and wording may differ and even though religious and doctrinal interests are more obviously present in John than in Mark. This similarity of structure in the Passion accounts of all four Gospels has a natural explanation if there was such a basic narrative, traditional before the written Gospels.

At present critics do not express complete agreement about what the pre-Gospel narrative comprised, but most include the following incidents, which can be distinguished more easily in Mark: the plot of the priests (Mk 14.1–2); JUDAS' treason (14.10–11); the LAST SUPPER (14.17–25); the arrest of Jesus (14.43–52); the trial before the CHIEF PRIESTS (14.53–72—not admitted by all as part of the primitive narrative) and before PILATE (15.1–15); the CRUCIFIXION with some of its concomitant events (15.21–41); and the burial (15.42–47). These episodes are the ones referred to in Christ's own prophecies of the Passion (Mk 8.31; 9.29–30; 10.33) and in the earliest apostolic preaching (e.g., Acts 3.13–16; 13.27–31). From an analysis of Semitic expressions in Mark, V. Taylor proposes that Mark utilized the Greek Passion narrative current in Rome and that he expanded this with certain personal reminiscences of Peter. X. Léon-Dufour, however, maintains that an examination of Semitisms in Matthew indicates that the first Gospel also witnesses to an older, more primitive narrative, of which Matthew and Mark would represent two recensions, the one Semitic (Matthew), the other Roman (Mark).

Scenes of the Last Supper and of Jesus Christ washing the feet of a disciple are depicted in a stained glass window of the Chartres Cathedral, France. (©Adam Woolfitt/CORBIS)

Development of the Gospel Tradition. While there is essential agreement among the four Gospels on the important events of the Passion, each of the accounts is a unique composition with its own literary characteristics and theological viewpoint. Even Mark's presentation, though barely more than an outline, has singular features and theological interests. Present-day understanding of the NT emphasizes the benefits to be gained by appreciating the differences for what they are: signs of the individual view of the Evangelist, the needs of the particular audience addressed, and the literary style of the author. The passion narratives can best be understood as SALVATION HISTORY (Heilsgeschichte), i.e., history with a theological intent. In order to appreciate the narratives fully, one must be alert to the theological, missionary, and liturgical factors that influenced their formation.

In Acts and in the Pauline Epistles evidence is found of the focus on Jesus' death and Resurrection in the early preaching and doctrinal development. Christ's death on the cross determined the conception not only of messianic salvation, but also of God's entire revelation through the OT. In Paul's early Epistles it can be seen how the first missionaries overcame the tremendous stumbling block of the cross by their Christological interpretation of the OT. The apologetic necessity of answering objections to a crucified Messiah led them to seek and achieve profound religious and theological insights into the meaning of the event. From saying that Jesus was Messiah despite the Crucifixion (Acts 2.23,36; 3.13–15, 17–18; etc.), they came to say that He was Messiah in virtue of the Crucifixion because this was the fulfillment of the will of God (Gal 3.10–13; 6.14; Rom 4.25). Liturgical influences on the Passion narratives include the celebration of the Eucharist, the administration of the Sacraments, and what may be called the “liturgy of the word.”

While the kerygma (preaching) is the core of the apostolic preaching, the Passion narrative based on it is chiefly didache (instruction); that is, it is an illustration and an elucidation of the basic proclamation of salvation (see KERYGMA). To retain all the many deeds and sayings of Jesus was not possible (Jn 21.25); so the primitive community and the Evangelists preserved certain ones by a selective operation. Evidence of this is seen in the preservation of incidents from the Passion that prove that Jesus, Messiah and God’s Son, foreknew His Passion and freely chose to suffer for our Redemption. The three Synoptic writers stress Christ’s prophecies of the Passion, and John underlines the same truth in the parable of the Good Shepherd (Jn 10.11–18). To stress the innocence of Jesus, the tradition emphasizes the guilt of the Jews, while in comparison it seems to mitigate the responsibility of Pilate. The Evangelists achieve this emphasis, however, only by leaving out some things that would tend to exonerate the Jews and not by inventing anti-Jewish stories; at the same time, they present the Passion as the fulfillment of God’s will, so that both the Jews and Pilate are but instruments in God’s redemptive design (Lk 24.45–47).

Particular Characteristics of the Gospel Narratives. A study of similarities and differences among the four Gospel Passion narratives deepens appreciation of their significance and also reveals much about the way in which the early Christian community and the Evangelists understood them. Mark may be taken as the basis for comparison because it is simplest and earliest. Mark presents a historical view of Jesus’ ministry and emphasizes the themes of hiddenness, secrecy, and lack of understanding about Jesus and His mission. The narrative of the Passion itself makes up a substantial part, approximately one-fifth, of the entire Gospel. For this reason, some critics have described Mark’s Gospel as simply a Passion narrative with an introduction. Its purpose is more comprehensive than this, however; it seeks to elucidate the doctrine of Jesus Christ as Redeemer and Son of God. This basic theme is highlighted in three key places: in the opening statement (1.1); at Caesarea Philippi, the turning point of the Gospel (8.29); and at Jesus’ death (15.39). The Passion narrative is an integral part of this total plan; as Peter’s confession prepares the way for the narrative of the Passion, so the words of the pagan centurion (15.39) provide the final comment on it. Immediately after Peter’s confession (8.29), Jesus’ new teaching on the necessity of suffering is introduced.

In their account of the trial of Jesus, the Synoptic writers imply what John states explicitly: that the issue for which Jesus is condemned by the Sanhedrin is His teaching of His divinity (Mk 14.61–62; Mt 26.63–64; Lk 22.66–71; Jn 18.19–21). Before Pilate, however, the Sanhedrin attempts to indict Jesus on political charges, knowing well that blasphemy is not a charge that will win a death sentence from the Roman governor. The religious issue central to the trial is evident when the Jews insist: “We have a Law, and according to that Law he must die, because he has made himself Son of God” (Jn 19.7). Under pressure from the chief priests and the mob, Pilate fears an insurrection, so he delivers Jesus to be crucified (Mk 15.15). The connotation of παράδιδόναι (to deliver, to hand over), so frequently used in the accounts, is that ultimately it is God’s will that is being fulfilled, the human agents being but instruments (cf. Rom 8.32; Acts 2.23; Is 53.4). Significant of the restraint of the Gospel accounts is the fact that the cruel torture of the scourging is described with a single Greek word (Mk 15.15).

Like John, both Mark and Matthew associate a mocking and spitting scene with that of the scourging (Mk 15.15–19; Mt 27.26–30); and like the fourth Evangelist, also, they emphasize the royal caricature of the “King of the Jews.” Luke, on the other hand, in a scene proper to his Gospel, separates the mocking and scourging; he attributes the mocking to the court of HEROD ANTIPAS, where Jesus is treated with contempt because of His claim to royalty (Lk 23.11). In the third Gospel the scourging alternative proposed by Pilate follows closely upon this scene at Herod’s court. Luke’s special source has apparently given him information about the dealings between Herod and Pilate, for the other Evangelists do not seem to know of Jesus’ appearance before the Tetrarch of Galilee (see also Acts 4.24–30). As the mercenaries of Pilate took their cue from the official accusations at the trial and mocked Jesus as a political pretender, so also earlier, the attendants at the court of the Sanhedrin had taken their cue from the charges of that court, ridiculing and maltreating Jesus as a religious pretender, taunting Him to exercise now His powers of prophecy (Mk 14.65). John associates maltreatment of Jesus with the questioning before Caiphas (Jn 18.22–23); indeed, this unofficial hearing is more likely than the official meeting of the Sanhedrin.

Mark, followed by Matthew and Luke, tells of Simon of Cyrene’s part in carrying the cross. For John’s theological purpose, the incident of Simon’s help seems unimportant, and he chooses instead to emphasize that Jesus goes freely to His death carrying the cross Himself and fully in charge of His destiny (Jn 19.17). In keeping with the Roman custom, the plaque announcing the deed for which He was being executed was posted on the cross above Jesus’ head. All four accounts report this, but in four slightly different wordings, an interesting example of the way in which the primitive tradition preserved the substance, but not necessarily the exact details, of the events.

Old Testament in Passion Narratives. In Jesus' own teaching regarding His Passion, one of the most striking elements is His use of OT allusions and His interpretation of the Scriptures in function of His own person and mission: in God's salvific plan, He is the climax toward which all of Israel's history has been moving. His doctrine is so firmly rooted in scriptural thought that one can have little understanding of it unless one knows the significance of the OT references made. Especially in the Servant of the Lord oracles in Deutero-Isaiah and in Psalms 21(22) and 68(69), the early Church and the Evangelists saw delineated clearly the prefiguring of the Just One who suffered vicariously for His people (Mk 15.23, 34, 36; Mt 27.42–43; Lk 23.34, 35–37; Jn 19.24, 28, 29). Jesus Himself had consistently taught that He was the fulfillment of the Scriptures and had identified Himself with the Isaiah Servant. The Apostles and first Christians, meditating upon these passages, were impressed with the great similarities between the sufferings of the Isaiah Servant and of Christ. Their desire to stress prophetic fulfillment was an important influence upon the formation, selection of events, and manner of narration of the Passion story. In the tradition we find preserved especially those things that show the fulfillment of prophecy, while more profane information may be omitted. Not merely the Passion as a whole, but also many individual happenings are seen as the fulfillment of Scripture and God's foreordained will, e.g., the betrayal by Judas, the arrest of Jesus, the flight of His disciples, His being raised up on the wood of the cross, and His shameful death as a criminal. The use of the OT by each of the Evangelists provides some unique insights into the meaning of the Passion.

Mark. The chief OT theme developed by Mark is that of Christ as Suffering Servant (cf. Is 52.13–53.12). In Mk 14.21 the Gospel points out that Jesus, the Son of Man, "goes his way" to death "as it is written." Mark seems to allude to Is 53.7 in his description of Jesus' silence before the high priest and before Pilate (Mk 14.61; 15.5). The description of the mistreatment of Jesus before the Sanhedrin (Mk 14.65) recalls the language of Is 50.6. On Calvary, Jesus' Crucifixion between the two thieves (Mk 15.27) recalls a passage from Isaia (53.12).

Matthew. The account in Matthew likewise emphasizes Jesus' role as Servant of Yahweh, but it reveals a particular interest in showing a literal accomplishment of prophecy. The language of Matthew is noticeably Biblical, e.g., in 26.3–5, 14–16, describing the plot of the Jewish council against Jesus and perhaps recalling Ps

30(31).14 and Ps 2.1–2. His account of Judas' betrayal of Jesus for 30 pieces of silver recalls Zec 11.12–13, which he later cites explicitly in telling of Judas' fate (Mt 27.9–10). The derision by those standing about the cross recalls the words of Ps 21(22).9, and their resemblance to the words of Wis 2.12–20 is even more striking.

Luke. For his Passion narrative, Luke uses not only the Mark-Matthew tradition, but other sources as well. He includes incidents and OT allusions that contribute to the themes of his Gospel, including Jesus as the Chosen One of God, the Messiah (Lk 23.35). Luke's stress upon Jesus' fulfillment of the Servant prophecy is apparent, for he includes the allusions of the other Synoptics; and he makes a special point of emphasizing the realization of Is 53.12, "And he was counted among the wicked," by alluding to it in three different verses (Lk 22.37; 23.32–33). On Calvary Jesus' last words as recorded in Luke express the filial obedience of the Redeemer, the Chosen One, as He cries in the words of Ps 30(31).6, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Lk 23.46).

John. In his use of OT allusions, the fourth Evangelist presents a developed, refined theology of Jesus' redemptive death. John omits many of the Synoptic details (e.g., Simon of Cyrene, the weeping women, the jeering of the onlookers, the darkness, the tearing of the Temple veil) and selects other incidents in which he sees special significance. Deep reflection on the meaning of Jesus' life and mission enabled John to see profound and sometimes subtle symbolism in the circumstances of the Passion. He conceives of Jesus' Passion as the beginning of His Exaltation, the supreme revelation to the world of His universal kingship and His divinity. John alone mentions the seamless tunic; his intention here may be to stress that Jesus dies as high priest of the New Covenant; for according to the Jewish historian Josephus, the robe of the Jewish high priest was a seamless one, described by Ben Sirach as a "glorious robe" (Sir 50.11). John concludes the description with another citation of Psalm 21(22); here is an interesting example of the personal way in which John employs data from the apostolic tradition. Matthew and Mark cite the opening words of this Psalm in their description of the Crucifixion; John, however, sees Jesus' Passion primarily as the beginning of His glory, so he omits this seeming cry of desperation and prefers to point out (Jn 19.24) the fulfillment of those other words in the same Psalm: "They divided up my garments among them, and for my vesture they cast lots" [Ps 21(22).19].

The typology of the Paschal Lamb is paramount in John's account. John stresses that Jesus' sacrifice takes place at the same time as that of the paschal lambs in the Temple (Jn 13.1; 18.28; 19.14, 31). When the sacrifice has been accomplished, and the Divine Lamb hangs dead upon the cross, John points out the significance of the piercing of His side (19.34–37). The meaning of this event is explained by two texts of Scripture: the blood attests to the reality of the sacrifice, and the water, symbol of the Spirit (Jn 7.39), its spiritual fecundity. Many Fathers of the Church, with accurate insight into John's teaching, have seen in the water the symbol of Baptism, in the blood that of the Eucharist, and thus in the two Sacraments, the sign of the Church, the New Eve being born from the side of the New Adam. John's citation (19.36), "Not a bone of him shall you break," presents a composite picture of the Savior as Servant of Yahweh and Paschal Lamb [cf. Ex 12.46; Ps 33(34).21]. Thus John sees the consummation of Jesus' Exaltation realized even at His death. He applies the citation of Zec 12.10, "They shall look on him whom they have pierced," not only to the piercing there on Calvary but also to the compelling, attracting power of the crucified, exalted Jesus (Jn 19.37; see also 3.14; 8.28; 12.32). His sacrifice accomplished, Jesus, the Paschal Lamb whose sacrifice wins universal redemption, draws all men to Himself so that with Him and through Him, all return to the Father.

See Also: TRIAL OF JESUS.

Bibliography: X. LÉON-DUFOUR, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:1419–92, with detailed bibliog.; "Mt et Mc dans le récit de la Passion," Biblica 40 (1959) 684–696; "Autour des récits de la Passion," Recherches de science religieuse 48 (1960) 489–507. K. H. SCHELKLE, Die Passion Jesu in der Verkündigung des N.T.: Ein Beitrag zur Formgeschichte und zur Theologie des N.T. (Heidelberg 1949). A. M. RAMSEY, The Narratives of the Passion (Contemporary Studies in Theology 1; London 1962). V. TAYLOR, "The Narrative of the Crucifixion," New Testament Studies 8 (1961–62) 333–334. M. JUDGE, The Passion Narratives in the College Sacred Doctrine Courses (Doctoral diss. microfilm; CUA 1963), bibliog. 267–280.

[M. JUDGE]

PASSION OF CHRIST, II (DEVOTION TO)

In the strict sense DEVOTION is an act of the will giving oneself with fervor to the service of God or divine cult. The Passion is the suffering both interior and exterior endured by Jesus Christ from the Last Supper until His death on the cross. Further, the earliest Latin use of the term passio refers to the entirety of the paschal mystery, and this includes the Resurrection and the Ascension, as well as the sufferings of Good Friday.

From apostolic times these events have been looked on as an integrated action on the part of the Savior of mankind and, aside from the actual NT Passion narratives, are generally mentioned as a whole in the writings of the early Church. Thus are they referred to in the Acts of the Apostles (1.3), where St. Luke wrote of Christ alive "after His Passion." St. Paul, using the same unification, preferred the personification in "Christ Crucified" (1 Cor 1.23) or the instrumentality in "the Cross" (Gal 6.14). St. Peter referred to the totality of His "sufferings" (1 Pt 2.21, 23) and exhorted his hearers to follow in Christ's steps. In the carrying out of this exhortation the lives and the martyrdom of the Apostles show the intensity of their devotion to the service of God and His Son. But from the early Church, in a period close to the Passion, when the Second Coming was thought of as imminent, there is little literature specifically concerned with devotion to Christ's Passion, but rather a group of human, individual, joyous passions patterned on Christ's action and reported sometimes by the sufferers, sometimes by their pagan onlookers.

Moreover, there is also the hypothesis that the emphasis on the Resurrection rather than the suffering came about through the desire on the part of the Church to combat misunderstandings of the two natures of Christ that overemphasized His humanity. Special attention to the Passion sufferings may have been deliberately avoided in order to prevent adding to the imbalance.

From the East there came, on the one hand, most of the early heresies concerning Christ's nature, and on the other hand, outstanding devotion to Christ's Passion.

The Syrian Church, although lacking Rome's influence, had a certain aura because it was centered in the Holy Land and possessed the relics of the Passion, which it concealed and revealed in turn. The personalized and intense devotion to Christ's Passion that the Syrian Church nurtured was typified by St. Ignatius of Antioch, who, on his way to Rome to his own martyrdom, wrote in glowing terms of the triumph of Christ's Passion and Resurrection, "Him I seek who died on our behalf; Him I desire who rose again for our sake . . . Permit me to be an imitator of the Passion of my God" (Epist. ad Rom. 4, 9).

St. Melito of Sardis (2d century), in a homily on the Passion, referred to the "Passover" and Christ in His mission to the world and His Resurrection, ending: "Listen while you tremble! He that suspended the earth was hanged up; He that fixed the heavens was fixed with nails; He that supported the earth was supported upon a tree; the Lord was exposed to ignominy with a naked body; God put to death!" [W. Cureton, Spicilegium Syriacum (London 1861) 55]. St. Ephraem—who used to interrupt his own sermons from time to time to exclaim, "Glory be to Him, how much He suffered!"—gives this vignette:

“Let the heavens and earth stand awestruck to behold Him who swayeth the rod of fire, Himself smitten with scourges, to behold Him who spread over the earth the veil of the skies and who set fast the foundations of the mountains, who poised the earth over the waters and sent down the blazing lightning-flash, now beaten by wretches over a stone pillar that His own word had created” [T. J. Lamy, S. Ephraemi Syri Hymni et Sermones (4 v. Louvain 1882–1902) 1.511].

It was in Jerusalem, part of the Syrian Church, that the relics of the Passion were rediscovered; and in the 4th century the pilgrim Aetheria reported the veneration of the true cross on Good Friday and the reading of the Gospel of the Agony in Gethsemane during Holy Week. The veneration of the true cross was the precursor of adoration of the wood in the Good Friday liturgy.

Development in the West. In the period of the expansion of the Church from the 5th century, there are the teachings of the Fathers regarding the Passion. St. Augustine, bearing in mind Christ’s tremendous sacrifice and the men for whom He died, prayed, “Look, O loving Father, on thy most loving Son suffering so many outrages for me: See, most loving Ruler, who it is that suffers and remember to be kind to him for whom He suffered . . . . Note His innocent hands dripping with holy blood and being placated forgive the sins which my hands have done” [Meditationes S. Augustini (pseudo.) ch. 6]. St. Anselm wrote: “I, myself am the wound of your sorrow, I am to blame for your murder. I have merited that you should die, I am the scourge of vengeance upon you. I am the real malice in your Passion, the real suffering in your Crucifixion” (Meditations 7). St. Bernard advised: “As much as we can, let us love our wounded Lord, let us give love for love, and embrace Him whose hands and feet and side wicked ploughmen have furrowed” (Omnia Opera S. Bern. 3:3). These three quotations span five centuries. The Church passed from an age of persecution into one of missionary zeal and from a time of adult Baptism into one when infant Baptism was general. The necessity of replacing the catechesis of those who learned, accepted, and were baptized with one for those who were baptized and then learned and had to be led to acceptance produced a new emphasis on compassion, the actual feeling with the suffering of Christ. The development of a concept of sin as something that man must put off anew every day after baptism also contributed to the idea of a personal wounding of Christ by each man’s sin.

St. Francis of Assisi introduced a new element into devotion to the Passion. Through the use of crib scenes and crucifixes, he began to bring to the people a human Christ with whom to suffer. Francis bore the signs of his own devotion to the Passion in the stigmata, the wounds of Christ in man’s flesh, of which Francis is the first known example. From Francis we have the invocation “We adore The, O Christ, and we bless The, because by Thy Holy Cross Thou hast redeemed the world.” St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Bonaventure excelled in their teachings concerning the dignity and effects of devotion to the Passion. All of this devotion was strengthened among the laity by the practices the Crusaders brought back from the Holy Land and by the instructive devices that mendicant preachers had developed, such as the STATIONS OF THE CROSS, miracle plays, Passion tropes, hymns, prayers, and Books of Hours, replete with Passion references.

The Passion of Christ, devotional image. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

The Devotio Moderna, which is crystallized in the Imitation of Christ, and in a similar way the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola, stressed the Passion as a means of daily perfection, the support of every virtue, and the means to endure every affliction.

Among the outstanding missionary preachers who moved the masses by their emphasis on the Passion of Our Lord were SS. Vincent de Paul, John Eudes, Alphonsus Liguori, Paul of the Cross (who founded the Passionists), and Leonard of Port Maurice (who preached the Way of the Cross). The love of the crucified Christ was promoted by such pulpit orators of the 18th and 19th centuries as Bossuet, Bourdaloue, Fénelon, and Lacordaire. Through these periods there was a steady increase in the number and type of devotion accorded not only the Passion itself but also the individual phases and even the instruments of Christ’s suffering. Among these subsidiary devotions are numbered the cult of Holy Relics, reaffirmed by Vatican Council II, devotion to the Holy Infancy, the Holy Face, the Precious Blood, and the instruments of the Passion, as well as to the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary and the Sorrows of Mary. Passion feasts and Offices also developed, and the practices of the Holy Hour, the Three Hours Agony, and the Forty Hours devotion became common.

The Mass and the Sacraments. St. Francis of Assisi was followed in the stigmata by many mystics of the Passion, and every age has produced new writers to develop the theme of Christ's Passion in ways pertinent to that age. In every age, however, it is the Mass that is the major source and the prime mover of devotion to the Passion. The Mass, as the perfect reenactment of all the events of Christ's Passion, His suffering, death, and Resurrection, forever present to man, is also the perfect act of devotion to those events for man. All the Sacraments commemorate the Passion, most especially, of course, the Holy Eucharist, but in Baptism man is called upon to be baptized "into Christ Jesus . . . into His death. For we were buried with Him by means of Baptism into death, in order that, just as Christ has risen from the dead. . . so we also may walk in newness of life" (Rom 6.3–5). In Confirmation we have become "the temple of the Holy Spirit . . . for you have been bought at a great price. Glorify God and bear Him in your body" (1 Cor 6.19–20). And in the other four Sacraments there are equal reminders that it is in Christ and His Church through the Passion in all its fullness that we receive the abundance of God's life. In a like manner the sacramentals of the Church, and in a special way the Sign of the Cross, draw efficacy from Christ's Passion. But it is the restored rites of Holy Week that have brought the Passion into prominence so that Christians may appreciate the words of Pope St. Leo I: "Our Lord's Passion is being continually reenacted until the end of the world; for just as, in the person of His saints, it is Christ Himself who is honored, it is Christ Himself who is loved; just as in the person of His poor, it is Christ Himself who is fed and clothed, so, in the person of all who suffer wrongs for justice' sake, it is Christ Himself who suffers" (Sermo 7.5).

Bibliography: P. POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. W. H. MITCHELL et al., 4 v. (New York 1922–27; Westminster, Md. 1953–55). M. J. OLLIVIER, The Passion, tr. E. LEAHY (Boston 1901). R. PLUS, Folly of the Cross (New York 1927). J. MEAD, Hours of the Passion (Milwaukee 1956). C. MARMION, Christ in His Mysteries (St. Louis 1926). J. DANIELOU, The Bible and the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1956). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960). W. F. HOGAN, Christ's Redemptive Sacrifice (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). J. A. JUNGSMANN, Pastoral Liturgy (New York 1962).

[J. MEAD]

PASSION PLAYS

The Passion play was a genre of medieval religious drama, of relatively late and slow development, which concentrated on the suffering, death, and Resurrection of Christ, and was thus distinguished from the Corpus Christi cycles narrating the entire Biblical story from Creation to Judgment (see DRAMA, MEDIEVAL).

Origins. A survey of the origins and primitive forms of Passion drama reveals the liturgical background and lyrical character of these cautious and tentative experiments and will disclose the pattern of the more elaborate plays staged in Germany and France during the late Middle Ages. The absence of any dramatic representation of Christ's death until the early 13th century, when all other types of liturgical play had long been performed, may very well mean a reluctance to imitate in a fictive manner the awesome mystery of Christ's sacrifice, especially since the Mass as the central act of the liturgy was itself the actual continuation of that sacrifice.

During the 12th century, however, the custom of chanting a long, lyrical planctus, or lament, of the Blessed Virgin became attached to the Good Friday veneration of the cross. The latter ceremony already included the choral singing of the Savior's reproaches (the IMPROPERIA) and the uncovering of a veiled crucifix with the words "Ecce lignum crucis." A cleric would then stand before this cross and sing the lament of the Sorrowful Mother in stanzas of Latin verse marked by the literary and musical artistry characteristic of the great Sequences and hymns (see SEQUENCE). Some texts contained lines of reply in the voice of Christ or of St. John, and, as impersonation of these voices probably accompanied the chanting, real drama was present. Rubrics calling for solemn, stylized gestures eventually appeared (e.g., in the text from Cividale, Italy). Karl Young regarded such activity as genuine Passion drama. When incidents from Christ's trial, journey to Calvary, and Crucifixion were included in the plays of the 13th century, the planctus of Mary was structured into the complex design, the texts often using the two best known of the earlier lyrical compositions, the "Planctus ante nescia" and the "Flete, fideles animae."

Further Influences. Other formative influences on these plays have been suggested. One was the dramatic homily on the Passion, in which the preacher often came close to impersonation of characters through quoted speech and imitated gesture. Important, too, was the long narrative poem on the death of Christ, the most important being the so-called Passion des jongleurs, written c. 1200, which is said to underlie a whole group of Burgundian dramas of about a century later. The only extant texts of Passion plays in Latin, however, are the two in the Benediktbeuern MS from the 13th century, and their form suggests a development rather by elaboration of already existing liturgical plays than by accretion to dramatic lyric, sermon, or narrative poem.

The first of these Benediktbeuern plays, the Ludus breviter de Passione, was meant to be followed by a Resurrection scene, as the rubric directs, and therefore can be regarded as a prologue to the Easter play. It covers the events from the Last Supper to the burial of Christ, but much of its action was left to be performed in pantomime, e.g., the nailing to the cross. Hardin Craig, who regards this short text as an expansion backward of an Easter play, believes also that the longer Passion dramatization in the same MS was built around an already existing and highly embellished play of Mary Magdalene and her brother Lazarus. Such a hypothesis about the origin of the Passion play in earlier liturgical drama, rather than in any extrinsic source, is supported by the difference in literary maturity between the prose of the Passion incidents (which often reads like mere stage direction) and the mature poetry of the Magdalene performance, some of it in Latin and some in German. Both of these Benediktbeuern plays reveal lyrical associations, however, for they contain the planctus Mariae, the shorter text using the “Planctus ante nescia” and the longer one the “Flete, fideles animae.” Although these texts from Germany are the only surviving ones, records of nonextant plays of the same nature are to be found in Siena, Padua, and Sulmona in Italy.

Vernacular Plays. The early vernacular Passion plays belong to the turn of the 14th century in both Germany and France. It is clear that this stage of development for the dramas on the death of Christ was reached more slowly than the parallel elaboration of the Christmas plays, which had probably achieved cyclic proportions in the 13th century. In any case, it is important to regard the Passion play as an integral unit separate from the Christmas plays and also from the Corpus Christi plays. The typical plan of the vernacular Passion drama is a threefold design: the Fall (of the angels and of man), the suffering of Christ, and finally the Resurrection. This plan omits virtually all of the Old Testament history except the original sin of Adam and Eve and ordinarily does not include the Nativity of the Savior. The life of Christ may be taken up at the beginning of His public ministry or at His triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

German Plays. The oldest surviving German Passion play is found in a St. Gall MS, undated but probably of the early 14th century. Its span of sacred history extends from the marriage feast of Cana to the Resurrection. Of comparable date is the Vienna play, which adds to the St. Gall pattern the narrative of Adam’s Fall, thus presenting for the first time the triptych effect of the usual Passion play. Perhaps the most notable feature of the St. Gall text is the presence of a prologue in the voice of St. Augustine, a trace thus appearing of the famous Prophet plays, in which the Church Father summoned a procession of witnesses to the Messiah. This prophetic prologue was a common feature of the Christmas plays, but Creizenach regards the abridged form of it in the St. Gall text as an indication that it fulfilled the same function for the Passion plays. Augustine serves also as a commentator here, at times interrupting to give a brief outline of coming action and at other times to give a little homily based on a scene just concluded. After Christ washes the feet of the Disciples, for example, Augustine gives an exhortation to humility, and after the Crucifixion he offers a meditation on the sorrows of Mary.

Manuscript page from oldest surviving German Passion Play (St. Gallen Codex 919, fol. 205v), describing Jesus washing the Apostles feet.

The flowering of German Passion plays occurred in the 15th and 16th centuries, which witnessed the expansion of the texts to many thousands of lines and thus to an action requiring three days for performance. Among those surviving, two groups of plays call for special mention, the Frankfurt and the Tyrol texts.

The nucleus of the first group of plays is the Frankfurt Dirigierrolle, that is, an outline or register of the characters, incidents, and cues for a Passion play. It reveals in skeletal form a very extensive undertaking, from a Prophet play to an Ascension scene, with an epilogue debate between the allegorical figures Ecclesia and Synagoga. This is a director's manual, but it is rich enough in detail to reveal indebtedness to a long narrative poem on the Redemption entitled Die Erlösung and to simpler plays of the St. Gall type. In its turn it has served as a point of departure for other Passion plays performed in the same general area, of which the best known are the Alsfeld and the Heidelberg texts. These come to us in MSS written shortly after 1500, and the latter in its present form is really a library version rather than an actors' copy. The great length of the scenes is due to the loquacity of the characters, immeasurably changed and grown from the cryptic speeches in the early plays, and to the lavish use of comic motifs.

The presence of buffoonery is quite marked in these southwestern German plays, notably in the scenes of merry devils, of Mary Magdalene's worldly life, and even of the counting out and quarreling over Judas's 30 silver coins. Allegory is used sparingly, but effectively, e.g., in the Heidelberg personification of Death as summoner of Lazarus; Death boasts ironically of his unlimited power and then suffers humiliation in his defeat by Christ's miracle at Lazarus's tomb (Jn 11.1–46). Also noteworthy in this text is the juxtaposition of prefigurative scenes from the Old Testament immediately before the corresponding events of the New Testament related typologically to them. Thus, the acquittal of Susanna by Daniel (Daniel ch. 13) is staged as a prelude to Christ's encounter with the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8.1–11). This method of structuring type and antitype in sacred history is not widespread in drama. The much later Oberammergau play has something akin to this arrangement in a series of tableaux vivants from prefigurative Old Testament events preceding each New Testament scene.

The Tyrol Passion plays from the eastern Alpine region are, like the Frankfurt group, related one to another and are presumed to have a common origin. They are distinguished from other German specimens by a greater selectivity of incident and by a uniformly elevated tone. Omitting Old Testament material, they begin late in the life of the Redeemer, with the council of the Jews plotting His death. They cover a three-day division of performance: the arrest and trials of Christ, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection. On the first two days, comic intrusion into the solemn scenes is virtually absent, but on the third day there is a notable amount of it. It is highly probable that the first and second divisions were actually performed on Holy Thursday and Good Friday, when the buffoonery would have been regarded as unacceptable; the third day's action, given on Easter or shortly afterward, would have a context of returning joy capable of supporting the comic dimension.

French Plays. French Passion plays reveal much the same history as do those in Germany. The early vernacular texts are of Burgundian provenance and are all related ultimately to the nondramatic narrative poem Passion des jongleurs, mentioned above. The oldest play in this group is called La Passion du Palatinus. Although it has many dramatic and interesting touches—such as the forging of the nails for the Crucifixion by the wife of the blacksmith, who himself refuses the odious task—this play is still clumsy and awkward in many ways. G. Cohen has even expressed doubt that it was actually performed, since it lacks rubrics that can be regarded as stage directions. There is a closely related Passion d'Autun, existing in two versions; and a much later and more elaborate Passion de Semur associated with the Burgundian area.

The really great French Passion plays are those of Eustache Mercadé and Arnoul Greban, both 15th-century dramatists whose gigantic plays were subjected to revision and adaptation by later writers, most skilfully by Jean Michel. These French mystères show divergence from the standard German design; although they omit most of the Old Testament narrative, they do include the Nativity and early life of Christ. Moreover, they envelope the titanic serial narrative in a unifying framework known as the Procès de Paradis, quite different from the German forms of prophetic prologue and Augustinian commentary. The Procès is a dramatization of the debate among Righteousness, Mercy, Truth, and Peace at the throne of God, allegorizing the conflict between His justice and His mercy. The allegorized virtues, known in homiletic literature as the Four Daughters of God, are reconciled only when the Second Person of the Trinity undertakes to expiate man's sin; they reappear at intervals in the long cycle, most notably at the return of Christ to heaven when Justice (Righteousness) at first sulks in a corner, but then, in a dramatic and thrilling capitulation, accepts the satisfaction made by the Redeemer.

Mercadé's Passion d'Arras, as it is called, surpasses Greban's in the theological profundity of its material, but is in turn excelled by the latter's skill in poetry and music. The position held by Greban as organist and choirmaster at Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris developed in him the technical mastery that he displayed in versification, dialogue, lyric forms, and musical pieces. His Passion has been well termed a melodrama, not in the modern sense, but in the original concept of a play rich in musical melody. Closely associated with this technical achievement and inseparable from it is Greban's mastery of emotional language, especially that of tenderness and pity. He could thus express in moving fashion the anguish of Christ in the Garden and His plea to the Father; above all he could imaginatively represent the role of the Sorrowful Mother pleading with her Son to evade the Passion and cross, then lamenting in her traditional planctus Mariae the actualization of her worst fears for His welfare.

Modern Survival. Performances of Passion plays continued long into modern times. One of the German dramas is still flourishing in a regular presentation at Oberammergau every tenth year. The origin of this custom is a well-known series of events related to the Thirty Years' War of the early 17th century. During the devastation of the Bavarian countryside by Swedish troops in 1632, a severe outbreak of the plague occurred, first in the lowlands, spreading gradually to the upland villages, including Oberammergau. After months of such disaster, the town council of this devout Catholic village decided upon a vow: they would sacrifice a year in every decade to the presentation of a Passion play. This promise was made by all the villagers for themselves and their descendants as an act of penance and petition for deliverance; it is the Oberammergau tradition that no one died of the plague after this solemn religious act. The most famous actors to play the role of the "Christus" in the 20th century have been members of the Lang family, Anton and a distant relative, Alois.

From the 12th-century planctus Mariae and the simple Latin plays of the Benediktbeuern MS to the gigantic spectacles of the German and French cycles, the Passion play has been a paraliturgical expression of popular devotion to the suffering of the Redeemer and has engaged the talents of innumerable craftsmen, poets, musicians, and actors, who have coveted an opportunity to take part in it by designing its scenes, singing in its chorus, or being chosen to act in the great role of the "Christus."

Bibliography: G. COHEN, Le Théâtre en France au moyen âge (rev. ed. Paris 1948). H. CRAIG, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1955). W. M. A. CREIZENACH, Geschichte des neueren Dramas, 5 v. (Halle 1893–1916; v. 2, rev. ed. 1918). G. FRANK, The Medieval French Drama (Oxford 1954). C. J. STRATMAN, Bibliography of the Medieval Drama (Berkeley 1954). K. YOUNG, The Drama of the Medieval Church, 2 v. (Oxford 1933). E. H. CORATHIEL, Oberammergau and Its Passion Play (Westminster, Md. 1960). R. FRONING, ed., Das Drama des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Stuttgart 1891–92). F. MONE, ed., Schauspiele des Mittelalters (Karlsruhe 1846). Le Mystère de la Passion d'Arnoul Greban, ed. G. PARIS and G. RAYNAUD (Paris 1878). E. ROY, Le Mystère de la Passion en France du XIV<sup>e</sup> au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, 2 v. (Dijon 1903–04), still a classic, but corrected by later studies. J. E. WACKERNELL, Alt-deutsche Passionsspiele aus Tirol (Graz 1897).

[E. C. DUNN]

PASSIONEI, DOMENICO

Cardinal, statesman, and man of letters; b. Fossombrone, Italy, Dec. 4, 1682; d. Camaldoli di Frascati, Italy,

July 5, 1761. When 13 years old he attended the Clementine College at Rome, conducted by the SOMASCAN FATHERS. Under the guidance of his uncle Msgr. Guido Passionei he completed his studies with distinction and won the friendship of the scholars Antonio Magliabechi and Giusto Fontanini and the Cardinals Henry NORIS and Tommaso Ferrari. Through them he was introduced to the MAURISTS and the highest cultural circles. Family tradition more than vocation (so he writes in a letter to Cardinal Neri Corsini) initiated him into an ecclesiastical career, and he studied dogmatic theology and Church history under the direction of Giuseppe TOMAS. Clement XI commissioned him to take the cardinal's hat to Ludovico Gualtieri, nuncio to France; Passionei remained in France from 1706 to 1708.

From his friends Jean MABILLON, Bernard de MONTFAUCON, Eusèbe Renaudot, and Cardinals Cesar d'Estrées and Louis Antoine de NOAILLES, he learned a great love of books and with them he frequented the Abbey of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, which had become the meeting place of French intellectuals. His initiative and desire to excel annoyed Msgr. Agostino Cusani, the new nuncio to France. He was ordered to leave, and with resentment went first to Brussels, then to Holland, where he remained from 1708 to 1713. As the representative of Clement XI, he showed diplomatic skill at the Treaty of Utrecht (1713–14) and the Congress of Baden (1714), which ended the conflict between France and Spain over the Spanish succession. At Solette he presided at the renewal of the alliance between France and the Catholic Swiss cantons, and in 1715 he returned to Fossombrone.

Passionei became secretary of the Propagation of the Faith in 1720 and played a notable role in the conversion to Catholicism of the Protestant historian Johann Georg von Eckart. He was made bishop of Ephesus in partibus by Innocent XIII (1721) and sent to Switzerland as nuncio. Transferred to the nunciature of Vienna (1730), he became the friend of Eugene of Savoy; Prince Ludwig von Würtemberg, whom he converted to Catholicism; and the Venetian ambassador, Marco Foscarini. Later, in Rome, Foscarini stole from him the MSS Arcana Papatus of Paolo Sarpi and a dossier of Sarpi's letters. At Vienna Passionei tutored the daughters of Charles VI; he also blessed the marriage of Francis of Lorraine with Archduchess Maria Theresa of Austria. In 1738 he was appointed to the secretariate of briefs by Clement XII and created cardinal, first of S. Bernardo alle Terme and later of S. Lorenzo in Lucina. In 1755 Benedict XIV named him prefect of the Vatican Library. In the palace of the Consulta on the Quirinal Passionei amassed a rich private library of 40,000 volumes. After his death this library was bought by the Augustinians, and later added to the Angelica Library in Rome, except for about 6,000 volumes that made up the first nucleus of the Civic Library of Fossombrone (April 19, 1784). Among his writings are Univer-sae philosophiae studia (Rome 1701) and Acta legationis helveticae ab anno 1723 ad annum 1729 (Zug 1729; 2d ed. Rome 1738).

Passionei remains a figure of controversy. He has been considered an enemy of the Jesuits because he rejected Molinism and probabilism; and because he opposed the beatification of Robert Bellarmine, but voted for that of Juan de Palafox. This antipathy is alleged as the chief cause of his failure to win the papal election in the conclave of 1758. He is also censured as a Roman Jansenist because of his association with scholars, themselves suspected of Jansenistic sympathies, who gathered at the "Hermitage" at Camaldoli da Frascati. Here he presided, seated beneath a portrait of Antoine Arnauld and holding the Lettres provinciales of Blaise Pascal. G. V. Vella calls him a bibliophile with "library kleptomania," who used his position as papal nuncio to visit monasteries with the intent of finding and receiving as gifts precious MSS and rare books. His critics seem in agreement, however, on his skills in his various diplomatic posts. Regarding his alleged Jansenistic sympathies, it can be said that Passionei shared the anti-Jesuitism of the transalpine Jansenists, but remained substantially orthodox in his theology and loyalty to Rome.

Bibliography: M. RIOLLET, Correspondance, 1724–1727 de Valbonnais avec Mgr. Passionei (Grenoble 1933). P. L. GALLETI, Memorie per servir alla storia della vita del Card. Domenico Passionei (Rome 1762). F. M. TORRICELLI, comp., Antologia, 4 v. (Fossombrone, Italy 1842–46). A. VERNARECCI, Fossombrone dai tempi antichissimi ai nostri, 2 v. (Fossombrone 1907–14). E. ROSA, "La causa del ven. card. Bellarmino e l'opposizione del card. Passionei," La civiltà cattolica 69, (1918) 2:336–346; "Carteggio inedito del card. de Tencin a Benedetto XIV intorno al ven. card. Bellarmino" ibid. 4:48–55; "Le Memorie della città di Fossombrone e il card. Domenico Passionei," ibid. 2: 254–261. M. COSTELBARCO-ALBANI, Della Somaglia, un grande bibliofilo del secolo XVIII (Florence 1937). E. DAMMIG, Il movimento giansenista a Roma nella seconda metà del secolo XVIII (Vatican City 1945). A. MERCATI, Note per la storia di alcune biblioteche romane nei secoli XVI–XIX (Vatican City 1952). G. V. VELLA, "L'abate Domenico Passionei e le sue missioni diplomatiche dal 1708–1716," Nuova Rivista Storica 33, 302–341; 34 (1950) 197–234; Il Passionei e la politica di Clemente XI, 1708–1716 (Biblioteca della Nuova Rivista Storica 19). E. SGRECCIA, Il fondo card. Passionei della Biblioteca civica di Fossombrone (Fano, Italy 1963), extract from Studia Picena, v. 31.

[R. BELVEDERI]

PASSIONIST NUNS

Also known as Religious of the Passion of Jesus Christ (CP, Official Catholic Directory, #3170). A cloistered contemplative community of women founded by Saint PAUL OF THE CROSS. On May 3, 1771, the first superior, Mother Mary Crucified, born Faustina Constantini (1713–1787) and nine other women donned the Passionist habit, took the customary vows of poverty, chastity, obedience and enclosure as well as a fourth vow, also taken by their Passionist brothers, to promote devotion to the Passion of Christ. The nuns fulfill this unique vow through their lives of prayer and penance, as stipulated in the Rule written by Paul of the Cross in 1769 and approved by the Holy See on Sept. 30, 1770.

Mother Mary Crucified first met Paul of the Cross in 1738, when he preached a retreat for her cloistered Benedictine community. She remained in regular contact with him through the intervening years, while he worked to bring to fruition his dream of the Passionist Congregation for men and the cloistered community for women.

For over 100 years the nuns' only monastery was the original foundation in Corneto, Italy, but in 1872 a second foundation was established in Mamers, France. In 1910 the first monastery was established in the United States. Today, the Passionist nuns are present throughout the world.

Each monastery is autonomous and develops, within the contemplative lifestyle, its own means of financial support. All monasteries continue a close spiritual affiliation with the larger Congregation of the Passion.

Bibliography: P. F. SPENCER, CP, As a Seal Upon Your Heart: The Life of St. Paul of the Cross, Founder of the Passionists (Middlegreen, England 1994). R. MECURIO, CP, The Passionists (Collegeville 1992). J. MEAD, St. Paul of the Cross (New Rochelle, NY 1983).

[E. RINERE]

PASSIONIST SISTERS

Also known as Sisters of the Cross and Passion (CP, Official Catholic Directory, #3180). Founded in Manchester, England, March 25, 1851 by Elizabeth Prout (1820–1864) with guidance from Passionist priests Gaudentius Rossi and Ignatius Spencer (1799–1864), from whom the first sisters received their spiritual heritage. The institute, originally known as the "Catholic Sisters of the Holy Family," formally affiliated with the Congregation of the Passion in 1874, and adopted the title "Sisters of the Cross and Passion" (CP). Initial approbation of the rule was received from the Holy See in 1863.

Nineteenth-century Manchester was in the process of developing into one of England's first industrial centers and was also the subject of a Catholic revival, or "second spring." Under this dual influence, the new institute brought Passionist spirituality as well as education and basic social services to those disenfranchised by the industrialization process. Unique for its time, the institute was itself open to the poor since it did not require dowries from women who sought membership. By the beginning of the 20th century, it was one of the largest apostolic communities in England and exerted great influence in the development of national educational plans.

From these roots, the congregation expanded to Ireland, Scotland and Wales, as well as to South America (Chile, Peru, Argentina), the United States, Africa (Botswana), the West Indies (Jamaica), and Eastern Europe. Its focus remains response to the needs of the poor through education or other social outreach.

Bibliography: A. M. REYNOLDS, CP, Heralds of Hope: The Sisters of the Cross and Passion (Strasbourg 1988). E. HAMER, Elizabeth Prout, 1820–1864: A Religious Life for Industrial England (Bath 1994).

[E. RINERE]

PASSIONISTS

(Official Catholic Directory, #1000). A religious institute professing simple perpetual vows and officially entitled the Congregation of the Passion of Jesus Christ, for which the initials are “C. P.” The habit is a black tunic with a leather belt. The heart-shaped emblem with a cross mounted on the heart with the inscription Jesu XPI Passio “The Passion of Jesus Christ” in Greek, Hebrew, and Latin is the official seal of the Passionists and is worn on the tunic.

Origin. The Passionists were founded in Italy in 1720 by Paul Francis Danei (now St. PAUL OF THE CROSS), who, at the age of 26, after a retreat of 40 days, wrote the Rule and Constitutions for his Passionist Community. The following year he took a vow to promote the memory of the Passion; this particular vow accounts for the Congregation’s distinctive spirituality and its specific apostolate. In 1725 Benedict XIII permitted Paul to recruit members, but it was not until 1737 that the first foundation was completed on Monte Argentario near Orbetello.

Papal approval was granted for the Rule in 1741 and again in 1769, following two revisions. The reasons for the delay in approval were: (1) the severity of the original Rule, which had to be tempered so as to make it livable; (2) Paul had extensive correspondence with the Holy See to convince them the purpose of the Community was to keep alive the “memory of the Passion” rather than simply to promote “devotion to the Passion.” After the Rule was approved for the first time, Paul sought to obtain permission for solemn vows for his brethren. The reason for this is that it would allow him more authority in presenting candidates for ordination, rather than making him dependent on the local bishop for such permissions. It would also allow him to establish a Community of PASSIONIST NUNS. On November 16, 1769, Clement XIV’s bull Supremi Apostolatus praised and approved the Passionist Congregation. Soon after, the pope entrusted to the Passionists the perpetual custody of the ancient Basilica of SS. John and Paul on the Coelian Hill in Rome that became the General Headquarters of the Congregation. By the time of his death, October 18, 1775, Paul had established 12 houses, two provinces, and in Rome, one hospice; he presided over six General Chapters; his members numbered 114 priests and 62 brothers. He also founded a second community, the cloistered Passionists Nuns.

John Dominic Tarlattini, first provincial and associate founder of the Passionists in the United States.

Spirituality. The spirituality of the Passionists is identical with that of its founder. The cross dominated Paul’s life. He desired to participate as intimately and absolutely as possible in the sufferings and death of the Redeemer to effect the complete transformation of his soul in God. The establishment of an Institute whose members would perpetually carry out this ideal and bring its fruits to countless souls was the single object of all his labors. The Rule and the way of life he bequeathed his followers aimed at removing every obstacle to participation in Christ's Passion and at providing every means to render it efficacious. Hence, the spirit of the Congregation, emphasized in its official documents, is one of prayer, penance, and solitude.

Bernard Mary Silvestrelli.

Rule. St. Paul of the Cross' Rule for the Passionists has had only three revisions in over 200 years. In 1917 a minor revision was occasioned by the new Code of Canon Law. The second was completed in 1958 after a study was carried out according to the desires and norms of the Holy See. The Rule and Constitutions were again given papal approval by John XXIII in the brief *Salutiferos Cruciatu*s. The Rule and Constitutions were revised again in 1984 after the Second Vatican Council, which exhorted religious communities to rediscover their founders and charism. The Passionist Rule states that the specific purpose of the Congregation is "to recall and promote the memory of the Passion of Christ by its way of life and its apostolate, especially its ministry of preaching."

Passionists take the traditional vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, as well as a special vow to keep alive in the hearts of the people of God the memory of the sufferings and passion of Christ. The members of this Congregation are called to a contemplative-apostolic spirituality. This is attained through a serious commitment to prayer, community living, and a vigorous apostolic ministry. This latter is especially attained through the preaching of the word of God, in retreats and parochial missions, and by teaching people to pray.

Apostolate. The Second Vatican Council had a profound influence on the life and ministry of the Congregation. The decrees of the 42nd (1988), 43rd (1994), and 44th (2000) General Chapters of the Congregation have researched the founder and the charism of the Community. As a result, the Community has developed a rich understanding of the "memory of the Passion," which in turn has driven the members to identify with and embrace the "crucified of the world" today. These Chapters have motivated its members to have "a passion for life, and a life for the Passion" in contemporary society.

History. For the first 35 years after the death of its founder, the Congregation progressed slowly but steadily, with emphasis on the contemplative and penitential aspects of the life. The first crisis occurred in 1810, when religious communities in Italy were forced to disperse by the Napoleonic suppression of religious communities. Reestablished by Pius VII in 1814, the Passionists were among the first communities reconstituted in Rome. It would take several years for the Community to regain its original vitality before considering any further growth. Before 1840, the Congregation limited itself to Italy, where it had two provinces. The 60 following years, however, were years of increase and expansion during which houses were founded in 13 countries in Europe and America; ten new provinces were formed; a mission in Bulgaria was increased; and a mission to the Australian aborigines was undertaken. The membership rose from 371 in 1840 to 1,475 in 1905.

The man credited for this new growth, Anthony Testa, was well prepared to direct the progress of the Community. After 12 years as provincial of a northern Italian province, he was chosen to be the Superior General of the Congregation. As Superior General he governed for 23 years (1830–62) and is regarded as the second founder. Bernard Silvestrelli guided the Institute from 1875 until his death in 1911. His reputation for holiness and the favors obtained through his intercession led to the introduction of his cause before the Holy See.

In 2001, the total membership of the Passionists was 2,326 religious: 13 bishops, 1,779 priests, 274 brothers, five permanent deacons, and 255 students. There were approximately 400 communities of Passionists throughout the world, spread over 55 countries on the five continents, organized into 23 provinces, four Vice Provinces, and one General Vicariate, with various Provincial Vicariates in mission areas.

Outstanding Members. Besides St. Paul of the Cross, other members of the Congregation have been canonized: St. Eugene BOSSILKOV (1900–1952), St. Innocent Canoura Arnau (1887–1934), St. Gabriel POSSENTI (1838–1862), and St. Vincent STRAMBI (1745–1824). St. Gemma GALGANI (1878–1903) and St. Maria GORETTI (1890–1902) were also sponsored by the Passionists. Fourteen other causes are in various degrees of advancement before the Holy See. Most notable among these causes are: Blessed Dominic BARBERI (1792–1849), who received John Henry NEWMAN into the Church; Blessed Pius CAMPIDELLI (1868–1889), Blessed Isidore De Loor (1881–1916) from Belgium, Blessed Nicephorous Diez-Tejerina (1893–1936) and 27 martyred Passionists (priests, brothers, and students) in the Spanish Civil War, Blessed Charles HOUBEN (1821–1893), a Hollander in Dublin, Ireland, Blessed Grimaldo SANTAMARIA (1883–1902), Blessed Bernard Mary SILVESTRELLI (1840–1921), and Blessed Lawrence SALVI (1782–1856). About 50 other Passionist religious are listed in postulation archives.

Work in the United States. The Passionists established the first house of their Congregation in the U. S. at Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1852 at the invitation of Bishop Michael O'Connor. In 2001 they had 35 communities in the U. S., one in Canada, and two in Jamaica, West Indies. There are 366 religious in two provinces: the eastern with the headquarters at South River, New Jersey, and the western with headquarters in Chicago, Illinois. Foremost among the preaching communities, Passionists pioneered in the retreat movement; they conducted retreats for the laity, priests, and religious, and preached parish missions and renewal programs throughout the United States and Canada. The Passionists in the United States established independent vicariates and are still staffing missions in China, Haiti, Honduras, India, Jamaica, West Indies, Japan, Korea, and the Philippines, as well as, parishes in African-American communities in Alabama, Georgia, and North Carolina. In the past, they published The Sign, a monthly magazine of national interest, and are highly involved in television ministries.

Bibliography: C. YUHAUS, Compelled to Speak: the Passionists in America, Origin and Apostolate (Westminster, MD 1967). R. MERCURIO, C. P., The Passionists (Collegeville, MN 1991). F. WARD, The Passionists: Sketches Historical and Personal (New York 1923). F. GIORGINI, History of the Passionists (Rome 1987–1988).

[K. O'MALLEY/C. J. YUHAUS]

PASSOVER, FEAST OF

From later Biblical times the Passover, formerly sometimes called the Pasch (Heb. happesah, Gr. τὸ πάσχα), celebrated on the night of the 14th to the 15th of Nisan (March or April), has been the principal feast of the Jewish calendar. In the Bible it is combined with the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which is kept from the 15th to the 21st of Nisan. Passover commemorates the Israelites' exodus from Egypt and is observed with great solemnity as well as rejoicing. From the many Biblical references to it, both legislative and historical, no completely clear picture of its origin and evolution is apparent, but there is a widespread consensus of scholarly opinion.

The Sources. The Old Testament texts that contain laws for the observance of the Passover are the passages in the ancient festival calendars of Ex 23.15; 34.18 (see also 34.25); Dt 16.1–8; Lv 23.5–8; Nm 28.16–25 (see also 9.9–14), besides Ex ch. 12, which gives the feast a historical setting. Celebrations of the Passover are described or referred to in Nm 9.1–14; Jos 5.10–12; 4 Kgs 23.21–23 (see also 2 Chr 35.1–19); 2 Chr 30.127; Ezr 6.19–22. In addition to the principal Old Testament texts, important witnesses to the antiquity of the feast are found in a papyrus and two ostraca of the 5th century B.C. from the Jewish settlement at Elephantine in Egypt. In the New Testament, the Passion narratives of all four Gospels mention details of the Passover. Moreover, the intertestamental Book of Jubilees, the writings of Philo Judaeus and Flavius Josephus, and other ancient works describe the feast. The Mishnah tractate Pesahim contains details of the later mode of observance.

Name. The Old Testament derives the name pesah from a Hebrew verb meaning to limp or to jump and hence to jump over or to pass over (e.g., Ex 12.27), referring to Yahweh's "passing over" the houses of the Israelites during the 10th PLAGUE OF EGYPT. But this historical explanation is secondary, and it is not clear that the etymology in it is the original one. Attempts to derive the word from Akkadian or Egyptian roots have not won general acceptance.

In this article the name Passover will be understood to refer to the combined Feast of Passover and Unleavened Bread except where otherwise indicated.

Origin. The oldest Biblical allusions to the festival (Ex 23.15; 34.18) do not mention the name Passover but enjoin the keeping of the Feast of Unleavened Bread for seven days in the spring month of Abib (the old name for Nisan). Since in the later texts this observance forms part of the Passover festival, it is generally held that two originally distinct feasts were combined into one. Probable origins of both can be reconstructed.

The Feast of Unleavened Bread or Feast of Azymes (Heb. ḥag hammasṣôt, Gr. ἡ ἑορτὴ τῶν ἀζύμων) was one of the three great agricultural pilgrimage feasts, along with the Hebrew Feasts of PENTECOST and BOOTHES (Tabernacles), that the Israelites, after their entry into the Promised Land, adopted from the Canaanites. It was celebrated at the beginning of the barley harvest but at no fixed date; the fact that it extended from Sabbath to Sabbath may have been an Israelite innovation. The avoidance of leaven was probably a symbol of the new beginning being made with the new harvest; nothing from the old year was to be retained when the new season began. Though the calendars give as the reason for the feast, “For in the month of Abib you came out of Egypt,” this theme was not original; the Feast of Unleavened Bread, like the other ḥaggîm, or pilgrimage feasts, was originally a harvest festival. (see UNLEAVENED BREAD (IN THE BIBLE)).

Passover in the restricted sense appears in the oldest allusions as a sacrifice and sacrificial meal of quite different significance and background. A lamb was sacrificed on the evening of the full moon in the month later called Nisan, and its blood was spread around the doorframes of homes. The meat was roasted and consumed that night with bitter herbs and unleavened bread. Apparently the rite was conducted privately by families or small groups at home, although one cannot exclude the possibility that at some early epoch whole tribes gathered for it at local sanctuaries. In any event, it appears to be very ancient in the history of Israel, even though the oldest festival calendars do not mention it, perhaps because it was not at the time a public celebration.

Passover seems to be the spring festival of nomadic peoples when they sacrificed one of the firstlings of the flock in petition for an ensuing year of prosperity. Analogies for it have been pointed out among ancient and modern Arab tribes, and all of its details can be accounted for among the customs of a shepherd people. For example, the bitter herbs were a natural seasoning, the unleavened bread the normal fare of nomads, and the blood upon the doorframes an apotropaic rite, i.e., one performed to ward off evil spirits. The “destroyer” mentioned in Ex 12.23 is regarded as a trace of this last element. The Israelites had been seminomads prior to their settlement in Canaan, and they may have celebrated this feast even in Egypt before the Exodus. But sometime after that event they altered its meaning radically.

Evolution. The description of the “first Passover” in Ex ch. 12 (a late text embodying several traditions) relates the familiar story of the slaughter of the firstborn of Egypt and the destroying angel’s “passing over” of the Israelites as they feasted within their homes. Moses enjoins observing the feast and explains all its rites as growing out of and commemorating the events of that historic night. In this passage, the seven days of Unleavened Bread are said to commemorate the going out of Egypt, and all references to either feast in the festival calendars make the same association. It is not a natural association, however, and the very probable origin of the feasts lies elsewhere. What is found in these texts is evidence of the process of historicizing by which the three great pilgrimage festivals of the Israelite year were invested with a role in reliving the drama of SALVATION HISTORY. In the case of Unleavened Bread this process took place earlier than for Pentecost and Booths, since it is only for Unleavened Bread that the earliest calendars (i.e., those of the YAHWIST and the ELOHIST) mention the historical connotation. How early the nomadic Passover was cast in the historical mold of Ex ch. 12 it is impossible to say, but it is not unlikely that it happened in the time of Moses himself. The intervention in Israel’s history portrayed as the Exodus may in fact have occurred at the spring sacrificial celebration.

One can be somewhat more precise in estimating the time when the feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread were combined into one festival. This event is connected with the centralization of the Israelite cult under Josiah, King of Judah (c. 640–609 B.C.), that is reflected in the Deuteronomic tradition of the Pentateuch. Josiah’s Passover (2 Kgs 23.21–23; 2 Chr 35.1–19) is described as unique since the most ancient times, and the Deuteronomic ordinances (Dt 16.1–8) insist that the feast must be celebrated at the Jerusalem Temple. Josiah had made the shepherd Passover a pilgrimage festival as well, and since it nearly coincided in time with the Feast of Unleavened Bread—and also in its connotations, the latter recalling the hardships of the Israelites’ flight—the two were eventually held to be parts of one festival. Unleavened Bread thus received a specific date (Nisan 15–21), and although it could no longer be observed from Sabbath to Sabbath, the first and last days were still kept as days of rest from work.

That this combining of the feasts was preexilic is confirmed by the fact that they are joined in Ezekiel’s ideal festival calendar (Ez 45.21). Several texts seem to suggest that the combining took place even earlier, but the evidence of the calendars must be preferred. The Passover of Joshua (Jos 5.10–11) does not clearly mention the eating of unleavened bread as a festival rite; the account of King Hezekiah’s Passover (2 Chronicles ch. 30), purportedly celebrated at the Temple in the 2d month because it had not been done properly in Nisan, is probably not historical, at least in its details. The “Passover Papyrus” from Elephantine, which may be dated 419 B.C., confirms the union of the two feasts.

Ancient Rites. It is the passages of the Priestly tradition (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL), especially Ex 12.1–20, 43–49; Nm 28.16–25, that provide the most detailed picture of the Passover celebration. The rites began on the 10th day of the 1st month (with the year reckoned as beginning in spring) when the sacrificial victim was chosen, a spotless male lamb, one-year old, for each family or group of families. In the early evening of the 14th day of the month the people assembled at the Temple, and the lambs were slaughtered; previously this had taken place privately at home or at local shrines. Immediately afterward, the blood of the PASSOVER LAMB was daubed upon the doorposts and lintel of the house where the meal was to be consumed, in memory of the sign used to protect the Israelites in Egypt. The lamb was then roasted and had to be consumed that night, along with bitter herbs and unleavened bread, which recalled the haste and the rigors of the flight from Egypt. No bone of the sacrificial victim could be broken and no leftovers kept; all remains had to be burned by the next morning.

The participants were to eat the Passover meal “in haste,” with loins girded, sandals on, and staff in hand, i.e., dressed for traveling in remembrance of the suddenness of Israel’s departure from Egypt. All the members of the household participated in the meal, even slaves and strangers, provided they were circumcised. The observance was of obligation for all, and ritual uncleanness in certain circumstances or the fact of being on a journey did not excuse from it (Nm 9.9–13), although in general, later texts imply the need for ritual purity (e.g., Ezr 6.20–21).

For the following seven days all were required to eat only unleavened bread and to be certain that no leaven was found in the home under penalty of being “cut off from Israel.” The strictness of this obligation seems more a consequence of the agricultural origin of the custom than of the symbolic meaning attached to it. On the 1st and 7th days (i.e., the 15th and the 21st of Nisan) there was to be rest from work, an assembly at the Temple, and special sacrifices. In Lv 23.9–14 it was prescribed that “on the day after the sabbath” (an ambiguous dating that was to be the subject of controversy in later Judaism) a sheaf of the first fruits of the harvest should be waved before Yahweh (i.e., offered as a quasi sacrifice of the new harvest). Special sacrifices accompanied this ceremony, and from this day were calculated the seven weeks to Pentecost.

At the time of the New Testament, Passover was observed according to the general lines of the Priestly tradition, with strict adherence to the Deuteronomic insistence that the sacrifice itself take place at the Temple; people brought their lambs to be killed and then returned home or to some nearby house to eat the ritual meal. The atmosphere of familial joy surrounding the feast had by that time been considerably heightened. In the Gospels themselves the Passover plays an important role, historically and symbolically, but the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel disagree about whether or not the Last Supper was a paschal meal. There is some evidence that the QUMRAN COMMUNITY observed the feast, perhaps even quite independently of the Temple ritual and following their own calendar, which assigned the Passover annually to the same day of the week, Tuesday. After the destruction of the Temple at the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), the sacrifice of the paschal lamb disappeared, along with all Temple rites, from the festival observance, and the rite for the Passover meal was embellished to preserve the symbolism of the feast. It is disputed whether this rite, to be described below, may not have come into existence even before the destruction of the Temple.

The slaughter of the Passover lamb survives even today in the practice of the Samaritan community centered about Nablus. It is sometimes argued that, since the destruction of their temple on Mt. Gerizim (129 B.C.) did not destroy this ritual, the ritual must have been performed privately in a family festival and not merely as a temple sacrifice. Indeed, many aspects of the Samaritan Passover celebration recall what it must have been like in the time of the Israelite kingdom. In Samaritan usage, for example, the feasts of Passover and of Unleavened Bread are still regarded as separate.

Modern Passover Meal. The ritual paschal meal, held privately in the home and sometimes conducted for groups, especially of travelers away from home, is commonly called the Seder (Heb. sēder, order, arrangement). The present-day Seder is substantially the same as the ceremony outlined in the Mishnah (Pes. 10). The narrative text followed during the meal is called the Passover HAGGADAH (story), and both terms Seder and Haggadah are used to designate the booklet containing text and ceremonies.

Two preliminary rites are closely linked with the Seder. One is the formal searching of the home on the night before Passover for any form of leaven or leavened food, which is set aside and later destroyed or given away. No leaven may remain in the home during the festival, and utensils used for leavened foods must be replaced or purified. The other preliminary ceremony is the so-called Fast of the Firstborn observed prior to the Passover meal.

A table set for the Seder contains the following special items: three cakes of unleavened bread (maṣṣôt, matzos) placed on a Seder dish and covered, a roasted shank bone symbolizing the paschal lamb, a roasted egg as an offering for the feast, bitter herbs (mārôr, usually horseradish), some parsley and salted water, a mixture of nuts and fruit (ḥārōset) used to sweeten the bitter herbs, enough wine for four cups each, and a cup at each place with an extra one for Elijah, who is expected to announce the redemption on Passover night.

The ceremony begins with the blessing (qiddūš) over the first cup of wine. Parsley dipped in water is eaten in memory of the hardships of the Israelites' life in Egypt. The master of the house breaks the middle cake of maṣṣâ and conceals half of it to be eaten at the end of the meal (the 'ʿāpīqômān'). Then the youngest one present asks the dramatic question, "Why is this night different from other nights?" There follow four specific questions regarding the unleavened bread, the bitter herbs, reclining on cushions, and eating parsley. In answer, the master of the house reads the main narrative of the Haggadah, recounting the events of the Exodus (fulfilling the command of Ex 13.8 to teach the children on Passover night). There are also several rabbinic explanations, including a commentary on Dt 26.5–8, "A wandering Aramean was my father. . . ." The Hallel is then begun [Ps 112(113)–113A(114)], the second cup is drunk with a blessing, and all wash their hands in preparation for the meal. This begins with handing around and eating first maṣṣôt, then bitter herbs dipped in ḥārōset, and these again served on pieces of unleavened bread. Then the main body of the meal is taken, and the 'ʿāpīqômān' is eaten last to retain the taste of maṣṣâ. Grace is said, and the third cup is drunk. Finally the Hallel is completed [Ps 113B(115)–117(118)], the Great Hallel [Ps 135(136)] sung, and the last cup taken with a blessing.

At various times and in various regions additions have been made to this basic structure. The most familiar of these is the addition in the Ashkenazic (German-Jewish rite) Seder of five medieval folk songs or poems at the end of the meal, including the "Ehād mī yôdēa" (Who knows one?) and the Had gadyā (An only kid).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1746–51. H. HAAG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 8:133–37; Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 6:1120–49. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 484–93. E. G. HIRSCH, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 9:548–56. T. H. GASTER, Passover, Its History and Traditions (New York 1949). J. B. SEGAL, The Hebrew Passover from the Earliest Times to A.D. 70 (London Oriental Series 12; London 1963), review in The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 26 (1964) 123–26. P. GRELOT, "Études sur le 'Papyrus Pascal' d'Éléphantine," Vetus Testamentum 4 (1954) 349–84. C. W. ATKINSON, "The Ordinances of Passover-Unleavened Bread," Anglican Theological Review 44 (1962) 70–85. N. FÜGLISTER, Die Heilsbedeutung des Pascha (Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament 8; Munich 1963). J. JEREMIAS, Die Passahfeier der Samaritaner, Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft Beiheft 59 (Gießen 1932). "Pesahim," The Mishnah, tr. H. DANBY (Oxford 1933) 136–51. The Haggadah, tr. C. ROTH (London 1934). L. N. DEMBITZ, The Jewish Encyclopedia 11:142–47. A. Z. IDELSOHN, Jewish Liturgy and Its Development (New York 1932) 173–87.

[G. W. MACRAE]

PASSOVER LAMB

The animal sacrificed annually at Passover and consumed in the ritual meal.

In the Old Testament, the ancient Priestly law of Ex 12.3–10 probably reflects an earlier custom of sacrifice among shepherd peoples. The victim, taken from the flock, could be either a lamb or a kid, male, unblemished, and born within the preceding year, hence the first fruits representing the whole flock. It was to be separated from the flock in advance to mark it as a sacred victim set apart for the divinity. The animal was immolated by having its throat cut at twilight, then roasted whole over an open fire. None of its bones could be broken (Ex 12.46). Its flesh was consumed in a ritual Passover meal during the night. Since Passover was a family feast, the sacrificial slaying was originally performed by the father of the family.

The Deuteronomic law, which transformed the Feast of PASSOVER into a pilgrimage feast, permitted the use of the young of oxen as well as of smaller animals (Dt 16.2), an updating resulting from the change from a pastoral to an agrarian economy. The ritual sacrifice thenceforth had to be performed at the Jerusalem Temple and was eventually assimilated to the regulations of Leviticus ch. 3 for communion sacrifices: the immolation could be performed only by priests, and the fat pieces were burned on the altar (2 Chr 35.10–14). The immolation was performed at sunset.

In New Testament times, the evening sacrifice was anticipated by an hour to provide time for the immolation of the lambs, which had to be completed by sunset. The owner of the lamb slew it himself, but the priests dashed the blood at the foot of the altar and burned the fat, to the sound of trumpets and the singing of the Hallel. Then each Israelite took his lamb home and roasted it whole on a spit made of pomegranate wood (Pesahim 5.1–7). Since the destruction of the Temple, the Jews celebrate Passover without the lamb; only the Samaritans retain the ancient usage.

The comparison of Jesus to the Passover lamb is the result of the reflection of the early Christian community upon the circumstances of His death at Passover. Paul is the first to express it, in 1 Cor 5.7: as the sacrifice of the lamb is a memorial of the deliverance from Egypt and in later times was regarded as expiatory, so Christ's sacrificial death at Passover has redeemed mankind from the slavery of sin. The theme occurs also in Jn 19.36, where the prohibition against breaking a bone is applied to Jesus on the cross, and also in the Johannine chronology, which places the Crucifixion on the preparation day, when the lambs were sacrificed in the Temple.

See Also: LAMB OF GOD.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1751. J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:137. G. WALTHER, Jesus, das Passalamme des Neuen Bundes (Gütersloh 1950).

[C. J. PEIFER]

PASTOR, LUDWIG VON

Historian; b. Aachen, Jan. 31, 1854; d. Innsbruck, Sept. 30, 1928. Pastor is known as the "Historian of the Popes" and is remembered for his monumental history of the papacy from Martin V (1417) to Pius VI (1799). His use of the Vatican archives, in an age when methods of scientific research were greatly influencing historical exposition, made his study the first thoroughly documented history of the papacy, surpassing the works of Leopold von RANKE and Mandell CREIGHTON. Born to a Lutheran father and a Catholic mother, Pastor was converted to Catholicism after his father's death (1864). Johannes Janssen, famed Catholic historian, influenced Pastor in his youth, and he pursued his natural inclination for historical studies. As Janssen's protégé and friend, he received a solid education, graduating from a gymnasium (1875) and studying at the universities of Louvain, Bonn, Berlin, and Vienna. He earned his doctorate in history at the University of Graz (1878). Interested in Church history, he investigated various archives in Italy, and sought permission to inspect the secret papal archives, which had been open to scholars only on a limited basis before 1870 and closed thereafter. Pastor, determined to gain access to the undisclosed treasure of Vatican documents, wrote petitions and appealed to high-ranking churchmen. His persistence was rewarded (1879) with the granting of limited privileges. In 1883, however, Pope LEO XIII unexpectedly removed all research restrictions for all scholars. At a special audience of historians, Leo XIII stated: "True history must be written from the original sources. . . . We have nothing to fear from the publication of these documents." To Pastor personally, who was then engaged in research on the papacy, the Pontiff said: "Owing to this decree [Saepenumero considerantes] you have a good advantage over Ranke. . . . The fact that many of these writings have never been used and some not even known, must increase the value of your work considerably. Naturally it will spread your fame as an historian." Pastor is generally credited with influencing this new Vatican policy.

Samaritans gather on Mount Gerizim in the spring at Passover to slay lambs and roast them over a fire as an offering to God. Near Nabulus, Samaria, Jordan. 1965. (©Dean Conger/CORBIS)

He spent his remaining years engaged in research, writing, and teaching. As professor at the University of Innsbruck (1881–1901) Pastor became a popular teacher with an enthusiastic student following. He received numerous honorary degrees and decorations and was eventually raised to the rank of hereditary nobility by the Austrian emperor. He was appointed director of the Austrian Historical Institute in Rome (1901) and Austrian ambassador to the Holy See (1920). Pastor died eight weeks after the death of the other renowned Catholic historian of the popes, Msgr. Horace K. Mann.

Pastor was a prolific writer of books and articles: his principal work was History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (16 v. 1886–1933; Eng. ed. 40 v. 1891–1953). This massive study aims at describing the forces of the Reformation era as reflected in the history of 55 popes. Pastor skillfully blended the inner life of the papacy with political and cultural tendencies. Certain interpretations and his criteria for selecting documents have been questioned by historians. Pastor's belief that only a Catholic can adequately understand and interpret the papacy has also been challenged. In general, however, the tone of his magnum opus is moderate and far from apologetic. That he provides a wealth of unused sources and presents an erudite, comprehensive account of the popes of the 15th through 18th centuries makes this study indispensable. His other major work is J. Janssen and L. Pastor, Geschichte des deutschen Volkes (8 v. 1893–1926), a cultural history of Germany during the Reformation begun by Janssen and completed by Pastor who wrote the last two volumes after his friend's death. Pastor also wrote a biography, Johannes Janssen, ein Lebensbild (1892), as well as biographies of others, e.g., August Reichensperger, Max von Gagern, and Viktor Dankl. Among his Church histories are Die Korrespondenz des Kardinals Contarini während seiner deutschen Legation 1541 (1880), Allgemeine Dekrete der Römischen Inquisition aus den Jahren 1555–1597 (1912), and Katholische Reformatoren (1924).

Bibliography: L. VON PASTOR, Tagebücher, Briefe, Erinnerungen, ed. W. WÜHR (Heidelberg 1950); autobiography in Die Geschichtswissenschaft der Gegenwart in Selbstdarstellungen, ed. S. STEINBERG, 2 v. (Leipzig 1925–26) 2:169–198. F. FELLNER, "Ludwig von Pastor," Church Historians, ed. P. GUILDAY (New York 1926) 373–415. J. W. THOMPSON and B. J. HOLM, History of Historical Writing, 2 v. (New York 1942) 2:546–549.

[J. T. COVERT]

PASTORAL EPISTLES

Three New Testament texts, 1–2 Timothy and Titus, have been collectively known as the Pastoral Epistles since the mid-nineteenth century. The Canon of Muratori said that they were written "for the ordering of ecclesiastical discipline." Used by Polycarp of Smyrna, these epistles were assumed to have been written by the apostle Paul until the advent of historical criticism in the early nineteenth century. Over the course of two centuries scholars advanced a number of arguments against their authenticity so that by the end of the twentieth century biblical scholarship reached almost universal consensus that these texts had not been written by Paul. A small number of scholars continue to hold that some of Paul's personal notes have been incorporated into 2 Timothy (the so-called fragment hypothesis).

Authenticity. Detailed study of the epistles' vocabulary and style has been one of the major factors leading to the scholarly consensus. One of every five words in the Pastorals do not appear elsewhere in the New Testament, another one of every five do not appear in any of the other "epistles of Paul." Several of Paul's characteristic words and phrases, "body," for example, are absent from these epistles. Several other words are used in the Pastorals, but with a meaning different from their meaning in Paul's own writings, for example "faith" (1 Tm 1.5, etc.) and "rulers" (Ti 3.1).

The Pastorals are relatively silent about some of Paul's most important ideas, the resurrection, the Holy Spirit, and, according to some scholars, justification. The epistles' way of dealing with opponents also differs from that of Paul. Opponents are dispatched with conventional idiom — they are deceivers and impostors (2 Tm 3.13), whose minds and consciences have been corrupted (Ti 1.15). Little attempt is made to refute their ideas (with the exception of 1 Tm 4.3–5). Titus is urged to avoid stupid controversies, genealogies, dissensions, and quarrels because they are unprofitable and worthless (Ti 3.9). Attempts to create a specific profile of these opponents have been largely doomed to failure because of the paucity of real data about them. They seemed to have practiced some forms of sexual and dietary abstinence (1 Tm 4.3) and espoused some form of elitism. Many scholars consider that the Pastorals were dealing with some form of early gnosticism, perhaps even a Jewish form of gnosticism (Ti 1.14), a kind of popular philosophy but not the Christian heresy of the second century.

Almost all study of the Pastorals demonstrate the "historical" information about Paul's life and ministry gleaned from these letters does not fit in with the data that can be garnered from Paul's own letters and the Acts of the Apostles. Many of the individuals mentioned in the Pastorals, especially in 2 Timothy, Hermogenes and Onesiphorus, for example, are otherwise unknown in the New Testament but reappear in the second-century apocryphal Acts of Paul.

While the literary genre of 2 Timothy is different from that of 1 Timothy and Titus, it is clear that the three Pastorals constitute a mini-corpus within the New Testament. They share similar ideas, a common vocabulary, and a remarkable stylized image of the Apostle Paul. In the Pastoral Epistles, Paul is portrayed as the apostle par excellence. There is no mention of any other apostle. Timothy and Titus are not presented as Paul's co-workers; rather they are portrayed as Paul's "sons," men who have learned from Paul and will carry on his work. Paul is presented as the norm for the "full knowledge of the truth," an example to be followed, and the source of church discipline.

Late twentieth-century studies of Hellenistic epistolography have led to an evaluation of the Pastorals, whose canonicity is not at issue, as attempts to actualize the Pauline tradition. That disciples would write a piece of epistolary literature in the name of a revered teacher was not an unknown practice in the Hellenistic world. By so doing they honored the memory of the teacher and showed the relevance of his teaching to subsequent generations. The Pastoral Epistles came into being in this way. Their anonymous author, most likely a single author for all three epistles, adopted Paul's apostolic letter form in attempt to show how Paul's legacy was to be adapted to the situation of local churches in the late first century C. E. The three epistles were probably composed in Asia between 90 and 100 C. E. The epistles' circumstances of composition imply that they must be viewed in a positive light, not as the work of a dying Paul or as New Testament texts of lesser value.

1 Timothy. First Timothy is the longest of the three epistles. It is an ecclesial text whose literary form makes it one of the oldest examples of Christian "congregational rules," of which the 1983 Code of Canon Law is a more recent example. Sections are devoted to overseers (3.1–7), servers (3.8–13), including female servers (3.11), widows (5.3–16), and the elder's bill of rights (5.17–19). Some commentators speak of "bishops," "deacons," "women deacons," "an order of widows," and the rights of "priests" but the use of such terms is anachronistic. 1 Timothy is an early attempt to organize the "household of God" (1 Tm 3.15); roles within the church have not yet reached the definition that they will later attain in later centuries when the terms are used to designate specific offices in the church.

In addition to the organization of the church, 1 Timothy is also concerned with the way that believers behave in the household of God. Accordingly the qualifications stipulated for those who function as overseers and servers were qualities that should be had by every Hellenistic householder. Women were expected to have "modesty" (2.15), the epitome of the Hellenistic woman's domestic virtues. The pursuit of wealth is presented as a derogation of godliness and a source of all kinds of evil (6.5–10, 17–19).

2 Timothy. The epistolary structure of 2 Timothy tends to cloak the reality of its being a kind of farewell discourse. An imprisoned and isolated Paul is about to die (4.6–8). The epistle "reminisces" about Paul's life and mentions a whole series of people with whom Paul was associated in one way or another. Timothy is constantly encouraged to learn from Paul and to carry on Paul's work (2.8–14; 4.1–2; etc.). He appears to have been virtually "ordained" by Paul through the ritual gesture of the imposition of hands (1.6–7).

Titus. The Epistle to Titus is the shortest of the three texts and arguably the oldest. Its literary genre is similar to 1 Timothy; its foci are the same, church order and proper behavior. Its epistolary opening offers an image of Paul's apostolate that is rich in theology and wide in focus. With regard to church order, Titus appears to speak of elders and the overseer almost interchangeably. He does not speak about widows nor specifically mention female servers. Titus' moral exhortation principally takes the form of a household code in which are spelled out the qualities of older men, older women, younger women, younger men, and slaves (2.1–10).

St. Paul handing Gospel to youth, representing possibly either Titus or Timothy.

Teaching. The Pastorals speak about Christian behavior in in much the same way as contemporary philosophic moralists. "Godliness" or "piety" was a virtue for which everyone is to strive. Some describe the ethics of the Pastorals as an "ideal of good citizenship." The description may not be apt but there is no doubt that the Pastorals foster the conventional moral values of the time, including respect and prayer for civil authority (1 Tm 2.2; Ti 3.1). To some extent their encouragement of a conventional ethic stems from a desire that the church be accepted in Greco-Roman society of the late first century. The ethos of the times expected young women to bear children, raise them, and be subservient to their husbands (1 Tm 2.12, 15; Ti 2.4–5). The Pastorals' support of conventional ethical values represents an accommodation to the times. The expectation of an imminent Parousia is no longer on the horizon, so the church was required to settle into the world in which it existed.

The emphasis on church structures and ethics is accompanied by a number of rich theological insights that have been wrongly and unfortunately neglected in some writing on the Pastorals. In the Pastorals, “faith” means the content of faith. Descriptive phrases talk about faith as “the full knowledge of the truth,” “sound teaching,” “trustworthy sayings,” and “these things,” i.e. the things that Timothy and Titus have received from Paul. Church structures are important; no less important are the considerations that the church is an assembly and the place where God dwells and that it is a pillar of truth (1 Tm 3.15).

The “theology” or understanding of God in the Pastorals is celebrated in doxologies and the multiplication of God’s attributes. The theological statement in 1 Tm 6.15–16 appears to be an apologetic profession of faith in the One God (1 Tm 2.5) in the Greco-Roman world that recognized some emperors as gods. The Pastorals remind their readers that God is the Creator (1 Tm 4.4) and the One who inspired the scriptures (2 Tm 3.16).

Although the Pastorals have little to say about the Holy Spirit (1 Tm 3.16; 4.1; 2 Tm 1.14; Ti 3.5) and therefore lack a developed pneumatology, they provide their readers with elements of a rich christology. A christological hymn appears in 1 Tm 3.16. An “epiphany” or “appearance” motif is the key element in the christology of the Pastorals. Christ appeared in time as Savior (2 Tm 1.10; Ti 3.4–5); he will appear again as Savior and judge (1 Tm 6.14; 2 Tm 4.1–8). Believers exist and live their lives between these epiphanies. The man Jesus is the one mediator (1 Tm 2.5–6). He has destroyed death and revealed life and immortality (2 Tm 1.10). The Pastorals’ use of the epiphany motif was borrowed from the Greco-Roman world where emperors were revered as saviors and occasionally considered to be god made manifest.

Bibliography: R. F. COLLINS, “The Image of Paul in the Pastorals,” LTP 31 (1975) 147–173. R. F. COLLINS, “The Pastoral Epistles” in Letters That Paul Did Not Write: The Epistle to the Hebrews and the Pauline Pseudepigrapha (Wilmington 1988) 88–131. B. FIORE, The Function of Personal Example in the Socratic and Pastoral Epistles (Rome 1986). M. HARDING, What Are They Saying about the Pastoral Epistles? (New York 2001). G. W. KNIGHT, III, Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles (Grand Rapids 1992). I. H. MARSHALL, The Pastoral Epistles (Edinburgh 1999). L. OBERLINNER, Die Pastoralbriefe, HTKNT 11/2. 3 vols. (Freiburg, Basel, Vienna, 1994–1996). J. D. QUINN, The Letter to Titus (New York 1990). J. ROLOFF, Der Erste Brief an Timotheus (Zurich 1988). M. WOLTER, Die Pastoralbriefe als Paulustradition (Göttingen 1988).

[R. F. COLLINS]

PASTOUREAUX, CRUSADE OF THE

The Pastoureaux were bands of peasants and laborers who swept through France in 1251 in a popular uprising similar to the Children’s Crusade. Their aim was to free the king of France, LOUIS IX, who was then a captive of the Muslims, and to reconquer Jerusalem. The Pastoureaux were led by a mysterious “Master of Hungary,” a powerful and persuasive preacher about 60 years old. The “Master” also sent an emissary to England in an effort to raise other bands there, but his representative was torn to pieces by a mob. The movement was accompanied by violent attacks upon feudal lords and upon the clergy, particularly the FRANCISCANS and DOMINICANS, who were held in some way responsible for the disasters that befell St. Louis’s crusade in Egypt. The queen-regent, Blanche of Castile, was at first inclined to assist the Pastoureaux, but when news of their more violent outbreaks reached her, she ordered their suppression. The “Master of Hungary” was killed in battle near Villeneuve-sur-Cher and the main bands quickly broke up. Only a few of the Pastoureaux ever reached the Holy Land.

Bibliography: MATTHEW PARIS, Chronica majora, ed. H. R. LUARD, 7 v. (Rolls Series 57; 1872–83) 5:246–254. É. BERGER, Histoire de Blanche de Castille (Paris 1895). J. DELALANDE, Les Extraordinaires croisades d’enfants et de pastoureaux au moyen âge (Paris 1962).

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

PATARINES

Constituents of a religious movement with social overtones originating among the laity and certain sections of the clergy, especially the lower clergy, in northern Italy in the early part of the second half of the 11th century.

Origin. The derivation of the term is unclear, but it probably has its origin in Patavia, a quarter of Milan where the group was particularly active. The earliest known “Patarine” preaching was that of the deacon of Milan, ARIALDO, at Varese (early 1057), and later in Milan. He was soon joined by Landulph Cotta, the notary of the church in Milan. Initially Patarine preaching was directed against priests’ concubinage or marriage (see CELIBACY, HISTORY OF). However, it soon came to condemn, with equal vehemence, every kind of SIMONY, attacking specifically the archbishop of Milan, Guido of Velate, but by extension, implicating the greater part of the clergy, most of whom were guilty of some personal simony or had, at least, been ordained by simoniac bishops. This antisimony movement struck also at the vested interests of the upper classes of the laity, for they had insinuated their own members into the ranks of the higher clergy precisely by means of simoniac practices.

The Patarine movement signified a more intense participation by the laity in the life of the Church, and the ethical standards demanded by that laity resulted in an active campaign to reform the morals of the clergy. In an age that drew its spiritual values from the evangelical counsels of perfection, i.e., apostolic poverty and virginity, it was natural that the laity demanded chastity of its clergy and condemned any traffic in sacred objects, as well as excessive wealth or power for clergymen. The Patarine movement was, in fact, but one facet of an age that produced at one and the same time the heretical CATHARI and the GREGORIAN REFORM, new eremitical groups such as the CAMALDOLESE and VALLOMBROSANS, and the reform of both monks and canons. Thus, the Patarines of Florence were much influenced by the Vallombrosans, and Arialdo himself founded a reformed chapter of canons regular.

Milan remained the head of the Patarine movement, and after the death of Landulph Cotta, his brother ERLEMBALD, a layman, assumed its leadership. To the bishops, to the supporters of the Church's diocesan hierarchy, and to those faithful to local church traditions, the Patarines appeared to be a dangerous lay movement subversive of the sacramental hierarchy and of Holy Orders itself. It was such, in its extreme forms; for certain lay Patarines took upon themselves the duty of preaching, especially against corrupt clergy. Nor did they limit themselves to abstaining, as directed by decrees of the councils, from participation in rites celebrated by priests guilty of simony; they would even use force to prevent any of the other faithful from participating and would forcibly remove an unworthy cleric from the altar, from the church, and from his benefices, which he, as a simonist, had legally forfeited. The Patarines often did not act as the executors of a regular canonical sentence of condemnation of an unworthy churchman, but on their own initiative proclaimed to the people the cleric's guilt. Pope ALEXANDER II, even though he was a fellow townsman and supporter, reproved the Milanese Patarines for taking matters into their own hands in this way.

The Patarine movement did not go so far as to deny the special character and indispensable function of the priesthood. The Milanese Patarines, however, refused to attend rites celebrated by contumacious priests or to receive the Sacraments from such clerics, and they sought out priests and bishops free of every taint so that they might "freely" receive the Sacraments from them (mente libera, as one source puts it). To find such men they dispatched a mission to Vallombrosa and gladly welcomed a bishop, Rudolph, sent from the Vallombrosan area to minister to their needs in Milan. When the Patarines considered simonist ordinations as invalid and the Sacraments administered by such priests and bishops as sacrilegious, they were simply following the common teaching in the Church of the day, supported by Cardinal HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA, who was not without Vallombrosan connections. PETER DAMIAN himself had allowed and promoted lay preaching, although he limited it to "earnest exhortation" and excluded doctrinal preaching.

Crisis in Milan. When the Milanese Patarines appealed to the Holy See against the diocesan bishop and clergy, Rome dispatched an exploratory mission in 1057. Two years later, a second mission composed of Peter Damian and the Milanese Bishop of Lucca, Anselm I of Baggio, later Pope Alexander II, reconciled Archbishop Guido to the Church along with any guilty priests who declared themselves willing to amend their ways and to do penance. But the traditionalist Ambrosian clergy was irritated by the Patarines' appeals to Rome, and Archbishop Guido soon reverted to his old ways, sided with antipope Cadalus of Parma, and persecuted the Patarines. Alexander II thereupon granted Erlembald the gonfalon of Saint Peter, entrusting this layman with exercising the physical coercive power of the Church; the pope then excommunicated Guido (March 9, 1066), touching off a violent anti-Patarine reaction that led to the murder of Arialdo (June 28).

The Patarine movement spread to other Italian cities, notably Cremona, Piacenza, Lodi, and later Brescia. A religious movement in Florence had the essential characteristics of the Patarines if not their name; it united the laity and the lower clergy under JOHN GUALBERT and his Vallombrosans against corrupt ecclesiastics and the simonist Bishop Peter Mezzabarba, a Pavian nobleman. The faithful appealed to the pope, who sent Peter Damian to attempt a reconciliation: by the victory of their representative in an ordeal by fire, the insurgents convicted Mezzabarba of simony and persuaded him to resign.

In Milan itself the ephemeral reconciliation and futile reform effected by a third pontifical mission in 1067 were swept away by the schism that broke out after the resignation of Archbishop Guido in 1070, a schism between Godfrey, appointed and invested by the German king (Henry IV), and ATTO OF MILAN, elected by the Patarines and recognized by the Holy See. Thus the campaign of the Patarines for Church reform became part of the vaster arena of the imperial-papal INVESTITURE STRUGGLE. Pope GREGORY VII naturally gave strong support to Erlembald and to the Patarines in their fight against the corrupt clergy and the schismatic archbishop, who had received lay INVESTITURE.

Erlembald was killed in a tumult triggered by his trampling on holy chrism that had been consecrated by a simoniac bishop. His death marked the end of Patarine agitations (1075). The Ambrosian Archbishop Anselm III submitted to Pope URBAN II, whose conciliatory policy toward the bishops of central and northern Italy smoothed the way for rooting out some of the worst evils of the Church in that area. And thus the chief cause of Patarine complaints disappeared in the atmosphere of the new enthusiasm for the Crusades. An important social result of the Patarine movement was the destruction of the network of vested interests and family contacts that had enabled a few powerful Lombard families to keep the most important sees of central and northern Italy, especially Tuscany, for their own members. However, there remained in Lombardy, especially in Milan, a small group of Patarine extremists, dissatisfied with the compromise of a moderate and orderly reform. These smoldering resentments and the deluded aspirations for radical religious renewal later found expression in other reform movements or in new heretical currents.

Bibliography: Sources. Arnulphi gesta archiepiscoporum mediolanensium, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826– ) 8:17–25. Landulphi Senioris Mediolanensis historiae libri quatuor, in L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (Milan 1723–51); continued by G. M. TARTINI and N. G. MITTARELLI (1748–71) 4:81–128. Vita sancti Arialdi auctore Andrea abbate Strumensi, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 30.2:1047–75. Literature. C. PELLEGRINI, I ss. Arialdo ed Erlenbaldo (Milan 1897). S. M. BROWN, “Movimenti politico-religiosi a Milano ai tempi della pataria,” Archivio-storico italiano, 58 (Florence 1931) 227–78. C. VIOLANTE, La pataria milanese e la riforma ecclesiastica, v. 1 Le premesse, 1045–1057 (Rome 1955); “I movimenti patarini e la riforma ecclesiastica,” Annuario dell’ Università Cattolica del S. Cuore . . . 1955–57 (Milan 1957) 209–23. E. WERNER, “Παταρηνοί—Patarini: Ein Beitrag zur Kirchen- und Sektengeschichte des 11. Jahrhunderts,” Vom Mittelalter zur Neuzeit (Berlin 1956) 404–19. G. MICCOLI, “Per la storia della pataria milanese,” Bullettino dell’ Istituto storico italiano per il medioevo e Archivio Muratoriano 70 (1958) 43–123.

[C. VIOLANTE]

PATENSON, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest and martyr; b. Durham, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Jan. 22, 1592. Following his seminary studies (1584–87) at Rheims, France, Patenson was ordained (1587) and returned to England (1589). There he ministered in the western counties until his arrest while dining in the home of Lawrence Mompesson at Clerkenwell on the Third Sunday of Advent 1591. He was condemned at the Old Bailey shortly after Christmas. During his imprisonment, Patenson reconciled several convicts imprisoned with him. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, no. 94. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891), 115–17.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

PATERNITY, DIVINE

What is designated in contemporary theological literature under the title divine paternity is perhaps a little ambiguous. On first glance, paternity would be simply the Latin derivative (from paternitas) corresponding to the more familiar Anglo-Saxon fatherhood. Thus, one might expect to see treated under the rubric divine paternity the entire Old and New Testament revelation bearing upon the fatherhood of God and the way this became assimilated and interpreted in the Judeo-Christian community ever since. Actually, however, such a wide and biblically oriented use of paternity is rarely, if ever, encountered. Centuries of theological, and ultimately scholastic, convention have reserved this Latinism for the Father’s unique relation to the eternal Son as grasped and expressed in the technicalities of Trinitarian doctrine and theology.

Historically, this technical usage grew out of a theological insight that can be traced back at least as far as the Cappadocian Fathers—Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa. This was the understanding that plurality within the Godhead was not a contradiction, because the three—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—differed from one another not in respect to Godhead as such but in respect solely to what was proper to each, and this property (ιδιότης) was something purely relative. Even earlier, Athanasius had written (Or. 3 c. Arian. 4; De syn. 49) that whatever is said of the Father is said likewise of the Son, excepting only the very name Father. Subsequently, with the schoolmen and especially Aquinas, the idea of the relative property first appearing with Athanasius and the Cappadocians was still further developed and refined by means of a carefully worked out doctrine of relations. The whole meaning of paternity is simply “to be with reference, or respect, to” son. There is no question, therefore, of the Father being more God than the Son or of having some perfection not shared by the Son. For Father and Son differ in no absolute way, but only in what is exclusively relative.

See Also: GOD (FATHER); AGENNĒTOS; PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); PERSON, DIVINE; RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN; TRINITY, HOLY; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: B. LONERGAN, De Deo Trino, v. 2, Pars systematica (3d ed. Rome 1964), esp. 115–185. For the historical origins of the notion, see the same author’s companion volume De Deo Trino, v. 1, Pars dogmatica (2d ed. Rome 1964) 195–204. J. N. D.

KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960) 263–269.

[R. L. RICHARD]

PATIENCE

Patience is a moral virtue that disposes and inclines a man to suffer and endure present evils without unreasonable dejection. Patience is a perfection of the concupiscible appetite that disposes it to submit to the control of reason so that the difficulties of life will not overwhelm a man with sadness. The primary action that flows from this virtue is to endure; thus patience is annexed to the virtue of fortitude as a potential part. Since the acquisition of any virtue requires the endurance of some sorrow, generally on the sense level, patience is said to prepare the way for the acquisition of all of the other virtues.

Patience does not require the endurance of all present evils. Some can reasonably be avoided or mitigated, and to fail to take action to this end could be culpable. A mother, for example, with a family of small children to control cannot endure unlimited chaos and disorder with apathetic serenity; not infrequently she will be obliged to feel and express some measure of indignation and irritation.

Patience, motivated by man's willingness to endure unpleasant things in order to attain natural virtue and natural goods, is an acquired virtue. Beyond this there is infused into man's soul with sanctifying grace a supernatural virtue of patience that is motivated by a supernatural willingness to endure trouble and affliction in order to attain sanctity and union with God. This supernatural patience can be a joyous thing—suffering for love of God is a source of joy.

True patience possesses three special characteristics: it must be universal, humble, and supernatural. Patience endures every type of evil that should be borne, no matter what may be its kind, cause, or consequences. Patience is humble when it does not complain unduly or seek attention, sympathy, or compassion. Patience is supernatural when it is motivated by charity. St. Paul said: "Charity is patient" (1 Cor 13.4).

Two vices are opposed to the virtue of patience: insensibility and impatience. Insensibility is a lack of feeling that leaves a person stoical and unmoved by his own suffering or by that of others. Impatience is an unreasonable refusal to endure sorrow from present troubles necessary for the accomplishment of works of virtue. Impatience manifests itself externally by unreasonable anger, complaints, and evidences of depression or discouragement; internally, it shows itself in feelings of antipathy to trials and suffering, and in an excessive inclination to protect oneself against all discomfort. The vice of impatience leads a man to the feeling that there is no joy in loving and serving God; it inclines man to avoid the difficulties and the sorrows that often are the prelude to great joy and happiness.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 136. E. VANSTEENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 12.1:2247–51. AUGUSTINE, Patientia. TERTULLIAN, "Patience," Disciplinary, Moral, and Ascetical Works, tr. R. ARBESMANN et al. (New York 1959). A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, tr. and ed. J. AUMANN (Dubuque 1962). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1758–60. FRANCIS DE SALES, Introduction to the Devout Life, tr. M. DAY (Westminster, Md. 1959).

[R. DOHERTY]

PATIENCE (IN THE BIBLE)

The quality or virtue of patience is presented as either forbearance or endurance. In the former sense it is a quality of self-restraint or of not giving way to anger, even in the face of provocation; it is attributed to both God and man and is closely related to mercy and compassion. In the latter sense it is a virtue by which one bears the trials of this life with resignation to God's will, and is therefore associated with hope [see HOPE (IN THE BIBLE)]; obviously in this sense it is predicated only of man. This article discusses patience as forbearance, patience as endurance, and continues with a discussion on the eschatological aspect of patience.

Patience as Forbearance. God's patience with men is one of His most frequently stressed attributes in the Old Testament; compare especially the use of the Hebrew roots rhm and hnn. He is called upon as "a merciful [rāḥûm] and gracious [ḥannûn] God, slow to anger and rich in kindness and fidelity" (Ex 34.6; see also Nm 14.18; Wis 11.24–12.1; Jl 2.13; Neh 9.17). The psalmists praise Him because He does not punish men harshly, but is patient with them [Ps 77(78). 38–39; 85(86).15; 102(103).8; 144(145).8–9]. The greatness of His patience exceeds that of man (Sir 18.8–13) and therefore is not easily understood by impatient man (e.g., Jer 15.15; Jon 4.2). The purpose of this patience is to bring man to repentance (Wis 11.23; 12.8–10); man remains free to abuse it—but he does so to his own detriment (Is 5.18; 57.11–13). The New Testament reflects the same doctrine; cf. especially the use of the Greek μακροθυμία. God "endures with great patience vessels of wrath" (Rom 9.22), and has shown his forbearance in condoning former sins in the vicarious death of Christ (Rom 3.25–26). Therefore, man should not misuse God’s patience (Rom 2.4–5), but rather should come to repentance (1 Pt 3.9).

The Old Testament praises the patient man because he possesses much good sense (Prv 14.29), allays discord (Prv 15.18), and is stronger than a warrior (Prv 16.32). According to the New Testament, patience purifies faith (1 Pt 1.6), fosters hope (Rom 8.25; 15.4), leads to perfection (Jas 1.4), and pertains to charity (1 Cor 13.4, 5, 7). Thus, it is a fruit of the Holy Spirit (Gal 5.22), deriving its power from God (Col 1.11). It is, moreover, God’s own patience that Christians must imitate in dealing with others (Mt 5.45; 18.23–35). Therefore their patience must be universal (1 Thes 5.14) and prudent (2 Cor 11.19), and must pervade their daily conduct (Eph 4.2; Col 3.12). There should be no complaining against one another (Jas 5.8), because by bearing one another’s burdens they can fulfill the law of Christ (Gal 6.2). Such patience is especially necessary for those who would spread the kingdom of God. St. Paul performed his apostolic work “in all patience” (2 Cor 12.12) in order not to give offense and in order to prove himself a worthy minister of God (2 Cor 6.4–6). He wished his patience to be an example to Timothy (2 Tm 3.10) and urged him to work patiently (1 Tm 6.11; 2 Tm 4.2) and to be a “forbearing teacher” in instructing others (2 Tm 2.24). Writing to Titus, he recommended the same virtue for the elders of the Church (Ti 2.2).

Patience as Endurance. The Christian’s bearing of suffering (expressed especially in the Greek term ὑπομονή) has its precedent in the Old Testament where the afflicted put all their trust in God [e.g., Ps 24(25).3; 26(27).14; 32(33).20] and where the Prophets call Yahweh “the Hope of Israel” (Jer 14.8; 17.13). Christ tells us that it is only through this patient endurance of suffering that our life will bear fruit (Lk 8.15). St. Peter exhorts the Christians to endure unjust suffering because it is of great value in the eyes of God (1 Pt 2.19–20). St. Paul, too, recommends patience in affliction (Rom 12.12), rejoices in his own sufferings (Rom 5.3; 1 Cor 4.12; 2 Cor 1.6), and praises the endurance of his recent converts (2 Thes 1.4) because through such endurance they will enter the kingdom of God (Acts 14.21).

Eschatological Aspect. The Christian’s patience is also eschatological. Although the coming of Christ is certain, the day and the hour are not (cf. Mt 24.1–51; Mk 13.1–37; Lk 21.5–38; 1 Thes 4.13–5.11; 2 Thes 2.1–12). Hence, the life of Christians here on earth consists in “looking for the blessed hope and coming of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ” (Ti 2.13). They should not be easily shaken from their right minds (2 Thes 2.2), but should patiently wait (Jas 5.7–8; Heb 10.36; 12.1), for only those who persevere until the end will be saved (Mt 10.22).

See Also: PAROUSIA; SUFFERING.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1758–60. X. LÉON-DUFOUR, ed., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962) 764–767. C. SPICQ, “Patientia,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 19 (1930) 95–106. J. HORST, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 4:377–390. R. BULTMANN, ibid. 4:585–595.

[J. BUKOVSKY]

PATRIARCHATE

Part I: Historical Developments

A patriarchate (Gr. πατριαρχία, Lat. Patriarchatus) is a patriarch’s office, see, reign, or, most often, the territory he governs. The number of patriarchates was in the course of time enlarged from the original three to five, and subsequent historical factors caused a multiplication of patriarchates.

The Three Patriarchs. The oldest Canon Law admitted only three bishops as having what later ages called patriarchal rights—the bishops of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch. The successor of St. Peter held the patriarchate of Rome, or patriarchate of the West. Before the Council of Nicaea I (325) two bishops in the East had the same patriarchal authority over large territories, those of Alexandria and Antioch. It is difficult to say exactly how they obtained this position. The organization of provinces under metropolitans followed, as a matter of obvious convenience, the reorganization of the Empire made by Diocletian. In the new system the most important cities in the East were Alexandria in Egypt and Antioch in Syria. Consequently the bishop of Alexandria became the chief of all Egyptian bishops and metropolitans; the bishop of Antioch held the same place over Syria and at the same time extended his sway over Asia Minor, Greece, and the rest of the East. Diocletian had divided the Empire into four great prefectures. Three of these (Italy, Gaul, and Illyricum) made up the Roman patriarchate; the other, the East (Praefectura Orientis), had five (civil) “dioceses”—Thrace, Asia, Pontus, the Diocese of the East, and Egypt. Egypt was the Alexandrine patriarchate. The Antiochene patriarchate embraced the civil Diocese of the East. The other three civil divisions of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus would probably have developed into separate patriarchates but for the rise of Constantinople.

Later it became popular to connect all three patriarchates with the Prince of the Apostles. St. Peter had also reigned at Antioch, and he had founded the Church of Alexandria through his disciple St. Mark. At any rate the Council of Nicaea in 325 recognized the supreme place of the bishops of these three cities as related to an “ancient custom” (c.6). Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch are the three old patriarchates, whose unique position and order were disturbed by later developments.

The Pentarchy: Five Patriarchates. When pilgrims began to flock to the Holy City, the bishop of Jerusalem, the guardian of the sacred shrines, began to be considered the head of more than a mere suffragan of Caesarea. The Council of Nicaea (325) gave him an honorary primacy, saving, however, the metropolitan rights of Caesarea (c.7). Juvenal of Jerusalem (420–458) succeeded finally, after much dispute, in changing this honorary position into official rule over a patriarchate. The Council of Chalcedon (451) severed Palestine and Arabia (Sinai) from Antioch and formed the Patriarchate of Jerusalem (sess. 7 and 8). Since that time Jerusalem has always been counted among the patriarchal sees.

The greatest change, the one that met most opposition, was the rise of Constantinople to patriarchal rank. Because Constantine had made Byzantium the “New Rome,” its bishop, once the humble suffragan bishop of Heraclea, thought that he should become second only, if not almost equal, to the bishop of old Rome. For many centuries the popes opposed this ambition, not because any of them thought of disputing their first place, but because they were unwilling to change the old order of the hierarchy. In 381 the Council of Constantinople declared that “the Bishop of Constantinople shall have the primacy of honor after the Bishop of Rome, because it is New Rome” (c.3). The popes (Damasus, Gregory the Great) refused to confirm this canon. Nevertheless Constantinople grew by favor of the emperor, whose centralizing policy found a ready help in the authority of his court bishop. The Council of Chalcedon (451) established Constantinople as a patriarchate with jurisdiction over Asia Minor and Thrace and gave it the second place after Rome (c.28). Pope Leo I (440–461) refused to admit this canon, which was made in the absence of his legates; for centuries Rome still refused to give the second place to Constantinople. It was not until the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) that the Latin patriarch of Constantinople would be allowed this place; in 1439 the Council of Florence was to give it to the Greek patriarch. Meanwhile, however, in the East the emperor’s wish was powerful enough to obtain recognition for his patriarch; from the time of the Council of Chalcedon Constantinople was practically, if not legally, the second patriarchate. The new order of five patriarchs—Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem—known as the pentarchy, became in Orthodox ecclesiology an essential element of the constitution of the Church. (See ROME, PATRIARCHATE OF; CONSTANTINOPLE, PATRIARCHATE OF; ALEXANDRIA, PATRIARCHATE OF; ANTIOCH, PATRIARCHATE OF; JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF.)

Multiplication of Patriarchates. At the time of the Great Schism (1054) the great Church of the Empire knew practically these five patriarchs only, though “minor” patriarchates had already begun in the West. The Council of Constantinople IV (869) had solemnly affirmed their position (c.11). The schism, and further distinctions that would not have existed but for it, considerably augmented the number of bishops who claimed the title of patriarch. But even before the great schism, the earlier Oriental Orthodox Churches that separated from Constantinople on their non-reception of Chalcedon had resulted in the appearance of patriarchs as leaders of these churches.

Developments in the five traditional patriarchates occasioned by nationalist tendencies and schism have resulted in new patriarchates emerging. To be under a patriarch had come to be the normal, and apparently necessary, condition for any Church. Instead of being merely an honorable title for the occupants of the five ancient sees of Christendom (pentarchy), the name patriarch was looked upon as denoting the leader of a national church.

Bibliography: T. A. KANE, The Jurisdiction of the Patriarchs of the Major Sees in Antiquity and in the Middle Age (Catholic University of America, CLS 276; Washington 1949). D. GEANAKOPOLOS, A Short History of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople (330–1990) (Brookline, MA 1990). K. WARE, The Orthodox Church, rev. ed. (New York 1997).

[J. J. MCGRATH/EDS.]

Part II: Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople

This entry deals with the origins, historical developments and nature of the office of Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, the territory of the patriarchate, the synodos endēmousa, the subordinate officials and their duties.

Ecumenical Patriarch. Patriarch was a title of honor given at first to any bishop of advanced years or special dignity. In Justinian’s legislation, patriarch takes on its technical sense, connoting a definite rank in the hierarchy, that of a chief bishop ruling over an extensive territory and subject only to the Patriarch of Rome. The designation “ecumenical” was employed in isolated cases in addressing Dioscurus of Alexandria, Pope St. Leo, and Acacius of Constantinople, but became the customary designation of the patriarchs of Constantinople after the Acacian schism. Scholars have reached no agreement on its meaning or original importance. It can be said only that as applied to the patriarch of Constantinople, it met with no objection until Popes Pelagius II (579–590) and Gregory the Great (590–604), who opposed it strongly and persistently; and it remained a bone of contention between Rome and Byzantium for centuries afterward. It was not made strict etiquette in communicating with a patriarch until the reign of the Patriarch PHOTIUS (858–867; 877–886). The title was never used by the patriarch of himself, but only by others speaking to him or of him, until Michael I Cerularius (1043–58) placed it on his seal; and it finally became part of the official title under Manuel I (1217–22).

Synodos Endēmousa. The patriarch's rights were always intimately associated with the synodos endēmousa, and rested not on legislation either ecclesiastical or civil but on custom, to which according to Roman theory law was but the servant and supplement. During semi-Arian times the emperor would refer ecclesiastical matters to a synod of the many bishops in his retinue gathered under the presidency of the local ordinary. That this procedure would continue seems to have been taken for granted as something perfectly natural, e.g., by St. Gregory of Nazianzus and St. Ambrose, even after 381 when Theodosius the Great restored orthodoxy in the East and Constantinople became the permanent residence. Hence, from the very beginning we see St. John Chrysostom convoking the synodos endēmousa (literally, "stopping-over synod"). The bishops who were stopping over on business at Constantinople were called together into a synod by and under the patriarch to decide appeals either made directly to it or referred to it by the emperor from any part of the East regardless of patriarchal boundaries. About the 9th century membership in the synod was restricted to the metropolitans and autocephalous (i.e., exempt from the metropolitan) archbishops of the patriarchate, to whom were added the synod's five highest administrative officials.

Canonical Requirements and Other Formalities. Since the time of Theodosius the Great, patriarchs were appointed by the emperor, but canonical traditions required certain formalities. In the earlier period, the patriarch was elected like any other bishop, but from about the end of the 9th century only the synod had the right of election; it nominated three candidates from whom the emperor chose one, or, if none pleased him, he selected another for the (automatic) approval of the synod. The successful candidate then received the same investiture as lay dignitaries from the emperor and was consecrated the following Sunday, always by the metropolitan of Heraclea. He held office for life and could be canonically deposed only by the synod; treason automatically terminated his tenure.

Once enthroned, the patriarch became the head of the Orthodox Church of Byzantium. In time, his powers developed in connection with his presidency of the synod, and it is impossible to distinguish his personal rights from those exercised conjointly with it. Furthermore, the emperor had greater authority in all matters not requiring orders, though he always consulted the patriarch before publishing any ordinance affecting religion and always addressed it to him. Actually, the patriarch could at times wield tremendous influence, e.g., one of strong character, particularly a monk, confronting a weak ruler, especially if the Church was in a position to throw its weight to either of two evenly balanced political parties. In general, the emperor kept nearly complete control of ecclesiastical geography and the rank of sees (which determined the precedence of bishops), usually by suggestion to the synod and with the consent of the patriarch. After the quarrel over the tetragamy, marriage legislation was more and more reserved to the Church. The spiritual head enjoyed most independence in the liturgy and in the maintaining of ecclesiastical discipline. He also had the final say in the choice of metropolitans, picking from three candidates presented by the synod. From the 9th century he possessed the very important privilege of stauropagia (planting of the cross), i.e., the canonical establishment of a religious house; this also entitled him to approve of a proposed abbot and to collect the kanonikon, a sort of tribute. At about the same time he acquired the exclusive right to consecrate the chrism.

Officials. The officials of the Church of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople were the officials of the patriarchate. In the middle and late periods, they were five: (1) megas oikonomos (grand manager), who controlled the entire property of the patriarchate, both cash and real estate; (2) megas sakkelarius and (3) ho sakkeliou, of whom the one had charge of all monastic establishments and the other, of all parish churches throughout the patriarchate, but their functions were frequently interchanged; (4) megas skeuophylax (grand sacristan), who took care of all precious possessions of the Church and acted as sacristan of Holy Wisdom with general supervision of the lands that furnished materials used in the liturgy (wheat, wine, oil, wax, etc.); (5) megas chartophylax (grand archivist), who, though he ranked fourth and was always only a deacon, had by far the greatest power, since he was the vice-patriarch and the real ecclesiastical governor of Constantinople; he controlled all access personal or by mail to the patriarch, determined the worthiness of all candidates for priesthood or episcopacy, tried all clergy (not bishops) guilty of any offense, determined freedom to marry, and, as archivist, also acted as chief canonist, issuing interpretations, in the name of the synod, that had force of law. These five highest dignitaries were known as the Exokatakoi and were comparable to the Roman Cardinals; they were members of the synod outranking the metropolitans. Originally they were all deacons, but subsequently many were priests. Another important functionary often mentioned in the sources was the APOCRISIARIUS (Nuncio), a permanent representative that the patriarch kept at each of the other patriarchates. Metropolitans had permanent or temporary apocrisarii in Constantinople, and each bishop with his metropolitan. From the earlier Byzantine period two offices ought to be mentioned: that of the archdeacon, head of the administration when all officials were deacons, later reduced to his purely liturgical duties, and the synkellos (cell-mate), second in rank to the patriarch and successor designate; later on, the term became a purely honorary title of bishops. All of these dignitaries had many minor officials under them and office help at their disposal.

Bibliography: L. BRÉHIER, Les Institutions de l'Empire byzantin (Le Monde byzantin 2; Paris 1949). F. DVORNIK, Byzance et la primauté romaine (Paris 1964); Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew (Cambridge, MA 1958). J. HAJJAR, Le Synode permanent dans l'Église byzantine des origines au XI<sup>e</sup> siècle (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 164; 1962). D. GEANAKOPOLOS, A Short History of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople (330–1990) (Brookline, MA 1990). K. WARE, The Orthodox Church, rev. ed. (New York 1997).

[M. J. HIGGINS/EDS.]

Part III: Patriarchate in the Eastern Catholic Churches

Of the twenty-one Eastern Catholic Churches sui iuris in communion with the See of Rome, six are patriarchal churches, i.e., they possess the ancient patriarchal form of ecclesial government with the highest and most comprehensive expression of self-government. These six Eastern Catholic Patriarch churches are, in order of precedence, dignity and honor:

- (1) the Patriarch of Antioch and all the East for the Maronite Church,
- (2) the Coptic Catholic Patriarch of Alexandria,
- (3) the Patriarch of Antioch and all the East, Alexandria and Jerusalem for the Melkite Greek Catholic Church,
- (4) the Patriarch of Antioch and all the East for the Syrian Catholic Church,
- (5) the Patriarch of Babylon for the Chaldean Catholic Church,
- (6) the Patriarch of Cilicia for the Armenian Catholic Church.

Appointment and Request for Communion with Rome. The appointment, jurisdiction, power and prerogatives of Eastern Catholic Patriarchs are determined by the CODE OF CANONS OF THE EASTERN CHURCHES, title

IV, “The Patriarchal Churches,” canons 51–150. The synod of bishops of a patriarchal church elects the new patriarch (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 63), who, if he has been previously ordained a bishop, is enthroned upon the synod’s acceptance of the election results (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 75). The enthronement confers the office of patriarch on the successful candidate (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 77 §1). He then sends a formal notification of his election to the Pope of Rome and the other five patriarchs of his election, and formally requesting ecclesial communion with their churches. As the highest form of self-government within the Eastern Catholic Churches, the appointment of a new patriarch does not require the confirmation of the Holy See, merely the notification of the election and a request for communion. However, until he receives the testimonial of ecclesial communion from the Pope of Rome, the newly enthroned patriarch can neither convene a synod nor ordain a bishop (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 77 §2).

Governance of a Patriarchal Church. Following ancient canonical practice of the Christian East, all patriarchal churches, whether in communion with Rome or Constantinople, are not monarchical in leadership structure. Rather, in the spirit of ecclesial collegiality, leadership in all patriarchal churches is synodal, viz., a patriarch governing a patriarchal church together with a holy synod. Thus, the Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium stipulates that the patriarch presides over his church together with the patriarchal synod, which holds the highest legislative, judicial and electoral power within a patriarchal church (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 110). In addition to the patriarchal synod, there is also a permanent synod comprising the patriarch and four bishops that functions as an executive committee of the larger patriarchal synod (see Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 115–121). The Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium also provides for a patriarchal convocation of all bishops and representatives from the clergy, all religious communities of men and women, institutions of learning and laity that is convoked every five years (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium cc. 140–145).

Territorial Jurisdiction. Every patriarch exercises supra-metropolitan authority (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 56), but only within the territorial boundaries of the patriarchal church (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 78 §2). Chapter 7 of title IV (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium cc. 146–150) regulates the jurisdiction of the patriarch and his patriarchal synod outside the traditional territorial limits of the patriarchal church. To illustrate: within the territorial boundaries of the patriarchal church, a patriarch has the power to ordain bishops without having to obtain the approval of the Pope of Rome. However, with respect to the appointment of bishops outside of patriarchal territory, the patriarch forwards a slate of three names to the Pope of Rome, who reserves to himself the power to appoint the bishop (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 149).

As a rule, all legislation promulgated by a patriarchal synod has force of law only within the territorial limits of the patriarchal church (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 150). There are three exceptions to this rule: (1) Liturgical legislation binds all members of a patriarchal church wherever they may be; (2) All legislation endowed with the force of law by the eparchial bishop becomes eparchial law, and (3) the Pope of Rome approves the legislation and grants it force of law throughout the world (see Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 150 pp. 2–3).

See Also: COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC PATRIARCHS OF THE ORIENT; CODE OF CANONS OF THE EASTERN CHURCHES.

Bibliography: Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, Latin-English ed. (Washington, DC 2001). J. CHIRAMEL, The Patriarchal Churches in the Oriental Code (Alway, India 1992). J. HAJJAR, “Patriarchal Synods in the New Eastern Code of Canon Law,” Concilium 26 (1990) 88–97. J. D. FARIS, The Eastern Catholic Churches: Constitution and Governance According to the “Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches” (Brooklyn, NY 1992). J. ABBAS, “Canonical Dispositions for the Care of Eastern Catholics Outside Their Territory,” Periodica de re Canonica 86 (1997) 321–362.

[G. SALEM/EDS.]

Part IV: Patriarchates in the Latin Church

Within the Latin Church, there is only one true patriarch who is vested with powers of governance and jurisdiction—the Roman Pontiff as Patriarch of the West. Indeed, the Patriarchate of Rome was one of the five historical patriarchates of the pentarchy.

Apart from the Roman Pontiff, all other patriarchates within the Latin Church are purely honorific, without any prerogative of power or jurisdiction (Codex iuris canonici c. 438). At present, the following Latin prelates hold the honorific title of patriarch with respect to their Sees:

- Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem
- Patriarch of Venice
- Patriarch of Lisbon
- Patriarch of the East Indies
- Patriarch of the West Indies

Canon 438 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law does make provision for the possibility of the Roman Pontiff granting special powers to a patriarch as “apostolic privilege,” or that a patriarch may acquire such power by “approved custom.”

[G. SALEM/EDS.]

Patriarchs, Biblical

A condensed study of the Biblical patriarchs warrants the following plan: origin and uses of the word “patriarch,” the pre-Abrahamic patriarchs, the structure of the genealogies, the problem of their long lives, and the similar lists in ancient Mesopotamia.

Origin of “Patriarch.” In the Septuagint (LXX) version, πατριάρχης, from which patriarch is derived, first appears in Chronicles, where it is used for translating several Hebrew expressions. Some of its significations are: the heads of Israelite families (2 Chr 19.8; 26.12); in many Greek manuscripts, the priestly and Levitical family chiefs (1 Chr 24.31); the chiefs over the tribes of Israel (1 Chr 27.22); the captains of companies of 100 men (2 Chr 23.20; cf. 2 Kings 11.19). It has a more restricted use in the apocryphal 4 Maccabees 16.25, where it apparently refers to the 12 sons of Jacob. The same book, however, speaks of “our patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob” (7.19). The word also appears in the New Testament where it refers to the 12 sons of Jacob (Acts 7.8–9); to David (Acts 2.29); to Abraham (Heb 7.4).

In present-day exegesis “patriarch” properly refers to ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB, although two other acceptations are acknowledged: the eponymous ancestors of the 12 tribes of Israel, Joseph and his brothers; and the ten antediluvian and ten postdiluvian celebrities listed by the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS in Genesis 5.1–32 and 11.10–26, respectively. In the last case, one would not speak of “patriarchal times,” which comprise only the period of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In this article the term patriarchs is used only in the last acceptation signifying the pre-Abrahamic patriarchs.

Pre-Abrahamic Patriarchs. The list of antediluvian patriarchs from Adam to Noah is attributed to the Priestly Writers. The YAHWIST too handed down parallel but incomplete lists (Gn 4.17–22, 25–26) containing only six generations after Cain and only one after Seth. The Priestly genealogy proceeds from Adam through Seth, while the Yahwist proceeds from Adam through Cain in its major genealogy. Notwithstanding the variants, it can be established that the same names appear in both lists.

Structure of the Genealogies. The two Priestly lists of Genesis 5.1–32 and 11.10–26 are almost identical in form. Stereotyped formulas, typical of this tradition, are used for each patriarch in both lists and include the name of the patriarch, his age when he begot his first son, and the number of years he lived after the birth of that son. The lists are only slightly divergent; chapter 5 totals the duration of the lifetime of each patriarch, while chapter 11 does not.

The Sacrifice of Isaac, grisaille painting by Andrea Mantegna, 15th century. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

The fact that each genealogy contains ten generations is not mere coincidence. It reveals the author's desire for symmetry in the periods that preceded and followed the deluge. This is all the more apparent when one considers the divergence between the Masoretic Text and the LXX. In the Masoretic Text, one finds ten patriarchs in each period provided that Noah figures in both periods. The LXX adds Cainan from Gn 5.9–14 to the second list in Gn 11.12–13, thus eliminating the necessity of counting Noah twice. The Greek interpolator of the addition sacrificed accuracy for perfect symmetry. His preference for literary perfection and his grasp of the original author's intentions are thus apparent.

Extraordinary Ages. The didactic rather than historical nature of the lists is further confirmed by the amazingly long lives of the patriarchs. All procreated at, and lived to, an age that today, despite our highly superior medical knowledge, would be preposterous. Among the antediluvian patriarchs, according to the Masoretic Text, the shortest life span was 365 years and the earliest procreation age, 65 years. Most of them exceeded 900 years or were not far removed from that age at death except Enoch, 365 years, and Lamech, 777 years, both figures being symbols of perfection in Hebrew numerology. On the average, the postdiluvian patriarchs had a shorter life. Their ages range downward from 950 for Noah, and 600 for Shem, to 148 for Nahor.

Literal Interpretation. The historicity of the genealogies used to be a trying problem for scholars. One of the attempts at a solution was to ignore the problem and accept the strict historical character of the passages and the figures. Modern scholars unhesitatingly reject this position because it pays no attention to historical or literary criticism. Its advocates would be accused of Biblical Fundamentalism today, since they considered that anything contained in the Bible must be interpreted literally and is of necessity historically accurate. They also referred to the legends of other cultures that assert the great longevity of their early ancestors and concluded that the common accord implies a one-time reality. There is no scientific evidence, however, to corroborate this stand. On the contrary, the findings of science show that the life span of primitive man was shorter than ours today. Many favored a modified position but still inflexibly adhered to the historical accuracy of the figures. The year, they conjectured, lasted only one month or more—an erroneous assumption, since, in the Bible, the word “year” always means a span of 12 months and is clearly distinguished from shorter periods.

Didactic Literary Device. The solution admitted by most modern scholars takes the figures as didactic literary artifices without strict historical intent. The genealogies and the ages of the patriarchs reflect ancient traditions and a system of computation for which a completely satisfactory explanation has not yet been found. Modern interpretation stresses the texts' etiological character as a function of religious teaching. Why is man's life span so limited? A long, fruitful life was considered an incomparable blessing, the reward of faithful service to God. The gradual shortening of man's life span was in keeping with the progress of evil in the world. In Noah's day, evil was so rampant that God said to Noah, “The end of all creatures of flesh is in my mind; . . . I will destroy them” (Gn 6.13). As a result, God punished man by the Deluge and reduced his life expectancy by hundreds of years (cf. Noah's, Shem's, Arphaxad's, and Peleg's ages). This chastisement showed God's hatred of sin and gave a reason for the evil of man's short lifetime. The extraordinary ages of the patriarchs, therefore, have religious implications and are to be taken as didactic symbols.

Textual Discrepancies. There are notable discrepancies in the numbers of the lists in the Masoretic Text, the Samaritan Pentateuch (the original Hebrew text of the first five books of the Bible handed down by the Samaritans and quite different in places from the Masoretic Text; it dates, in its first form, from c. 300 B.C.), and the LXX. The freedom with which the figures were altered indicates that they were known to be symbolic and could be modified to bring out more clearly the religious lesson. A comparison shows that the Samaritan Pentateuch agrees with the Masoretic Text down to the fifth patriarch Mahalaleel but keeps to a decreasing amount of years for the following names, in contrast to the Masoretic Text, which has the sixth and eighth patriarchs living longer than Adam. A corresponding lessening of the ages at which the patriarchs first generated a son leads to a discrepancy of 349 years less than the period between Adam and the Flood in the Samaritan Pentateuch.

The LXX adds 100 years to the first five names and to the seventh for the procreation age and thus lengthens the antediluvian period by 606 years and 955 years more than the Masoretic Text and Samaritan versions. All three agree on the perfect age of Enoch, 365 years, but neither of the other two agrees with the Masoretic Text on the perfect 777 years of Lamech. The LXX agrees with the Masoretic Text on the age of the longest-lived patriarch, Methuselah, both as to generating age and age at death, 187 and 969.

These variants are interesting but not very enlightening. The reason that procreation was delayed so long in all three, but especially in the LXX, is most puzzling. It may merely have been to underline the extraordinary characteristics of the men of old, who were closer to God and His original act of creation and who, therefore, could not have been like the ordinary men of the ancient writers' experience.

The case of Enoch is significant. He is described by a Hebrew idiom meaning that he was an extremely holy man. "Enoch walked with God; and he was seen no more because God took him" (Gn 5.24). One would expect him to have lived much longer than the other patriarchs, but his lifetime was only 365 years. However, this figure is a perfect number, the exact duration of the solar year. His mysterious disappearance without the mention of his death is also indicative of his unique position. Later Judaism did not miss these significant details; it made him a messianic figure comparable to Elijah, who was also "taken up by God," and attributed to him apocryphal books that inspired at least one New Testament writer, Jude 14–15 (see ENOCH).

Mesopotamian Genealogies. The Babylonians had similar lists of antediluvian kings. Two cuneiform texts, W.B. 444 and W.B. 62 (The Weld-Blundell Collection, Oxford Editions of Cuneiform Inscriptions, v. 2, p. 8f and plate VI), and the Greek text of BEROSSUS, a Chaldaean priest of the time of Alexander the Great, are well known. Only eight names (given in J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 265) are contained in W.B. 444, whereas W.B. 62 and the text of Berossus, like the Genesis genealogy of the antediluvian patriarchs, contain ten names. The names in the two cuneiform lists are nearly identical, though they do not appear in the same order; those of the Greek text can be identified with the kings in the cuneiform texts. The last name in W.B. 444 is UbarTutu of Shuruppak, the father of the Deluge hero, Utnapishtim (in Akkadian), but the other two lists end with the hero himself, Ziusudra (in Sumerian), Xisouthros (in Greek). The life span of the antediluvian kings is very much longer than that of the biblical patriarchs. Again the figures vary from one list to another and thus reveal the authors' indifference to historical chronology. A look at the list of W.B. 444 will exemplify the grossly exaggerated ages of the Mesopotamian kings: A-lulim of Eridu, 28,800 years; Alalgar of Eridu, 36,000 years; En-men-lu-Anna of Badtibira, 43,200 years, etc., with a total of 241,000 years for the eight kings before the Flood. In this list, the 241,000 years from the monarchy's institution, identified with Creation, to the death of the last antediluvian king contrasts with the 456,000 years of W.B. 62 and the 432,000 years of the Berossus text (the two last include the hero of the Flood plus another previous king). The figures, therefore, were subjected to alterations from one text to another.

Many critics have studied the resemblances and the differences between these lists and the Genesis genealogies. The differences are more striking. The Babylonian lists speak of kings and intend to show the unbroken succession of monarchs from the Creation onward; their perspective is decidedly national. The Biblical genealogies consider the patriarchs as the ancestors of all the races and nations; their perspective is universal and manifests God's supremacy over all of mankind. The chronological computations are very dissimilar, and it is unlikely that the Biblical system is based on the Babylonian. Efforts to identify the patriarchs' names with those of the antediluvian kings have been futile, save for that of Noah, which may possibly have the same meaning as Utnapishtim and its Sumerian equivalent Ziusudra. There may also be some relationship between Enoch's 365 years, as a solar year symbol, and the seventh king of W.B. 62 and the text of Berossus, the king of Sippar, the city of the sun. It appears, therefore, that the Priestly traditions concerning the antediluvian and postdiluvian patriarchs are only remotely non-Israelite traditions.

Bibliography: J. CHAINE, Le Livre de la Genèse (Paris 1951). J. SCHILDENBERGER, Vom Geheimnis des Gotteswortes (Heidelberg 1950) 261–303. H. CAZELLES, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 1:745–54; 7:81–82. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMANS (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 855–56, 1342, 1760, 1920–26.

[N. VAILLANCOURT]

PATRICIAN BROTHERS

Popular name for the Congregation of the Brothers of St. Patrick (FSP, Official Catholic Directory #1160), founded at Tullow, County Carlow, Ireland, in 1808 by Bp. Daniel Delany (1747–1814) of the Diocese of Kildare and Leighlin. The congregation, approved by Rome in 1893, engages in the apostolate of Christian education. The U.S. foundation was established in 1948, and headquartered in Midway City, Calif. The brothers work in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles and Diocese of Orange.

Bibliography: Dr. Delany and the Patrician Brothers (Tullow, Ire. 1955).

[D. LOMASNEY/EDS.]

PATRICIUS ROMANORUM

Patrician of the Romans, an honorary title instituted by Emperor CONSTANTINE I (306–37) as a personal distinction for his principal juridical and military officers. The emperors of the fifth and sixth centuries conferred it, with other honors such as the consulate, upon barbarian chieftains, as well as upon high imperial officials; individual kings of the Visigoths, Ostrogoths, Franks, and Burgundians all held the title. The patriciate remained honorific. In the West, it survived the imperial collapse of the seventh and eighth centuries only in Italy, where the fact that the effective imperial representative, the exarch of RAVENNA, was also patricius gave the title genuine political content. After the LOMBARDS suppressed the exarchate in the eighth century, the patriciate assumed a new character, which it retained until its extinction. In their search for a ruler to assume the duties of defense that the exarchs had formerly owed to the bishops of Rome, the popes of the late eighth century granted the patriciate to their chosen defenders, the Frankish kings. Pope STEPHEN II conferred the title upon PEPIN III the Short and his sons CHARLEMAGNE and CARLOMAN in 754, when he also anointed and crowned them as kings of the Franks, specifically designating them as protectors of the Roman Church. In 781 Charlemagne likewise saw Pope ADRIAN I anoint and crown his sons Pepin and Louis as kings and proclaim them patricii. The title thus came to be an ancillary distinction of the Frankish kings peculiarly expressive of their political and military obligations in Italy, and after the coronation of Charlemagne as emperor (800), it became an attribute of the imperial office itself. Some scholars have maintained that in bestowing the patriciate, Stephen II and Adrian I deliberately usurped prerogatives of the Byzantine emperors and moved to adapt to papal direction what had been the most powerful imperial office in Italy. The patriciate, however, retained the institutional independence of papal authority that it had held in the time of the exarchate, and, though it was frequently bestowed by medieval popes to secure temporal defenders, it was also assumed in other ways by persons hostile to the papacy. Thus, heads of the great Roman family the CRESCENTII, claimed the patriciate by popular election late in the tenth century, and turned the official powers they attributed to the office toward undermining the alliance between the papacy and the Ottonian rulers at the same time that the emperors themselves used the title "by apostolic benediction." Likewise, Emperor Henry IV, who wore the golden cirlet of the patricius at least as early as 1061, commanded Pope Gregory VII to descend from the throne of St. Peter by virtue of the patriciate he held "through the bestowal of God and the sworn assent of the Romans" (1076). Still, because of its close association with papal prerogatives, the insurgent Roman commune abolished the office (1144–45).

Bibliography: L. VON HEINEMANN, Der Patriziat der deutschen Könige: ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Beziehungen zwischen Staat und Kirche im Mittelalter (Wolfenbüttel 1888). F. GREGOROVIVUS, History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages, tr. A. HAMILTON, 8 v. in 13 (London 1894–1902). L. HALPHEN, Charle- tagne et l'empire carolingien (Paris 1947). L. BRÉHIER, Le monde byzantine (Paris 1947–50) v.2, Les institutions de l'empire byzantine. R. FOLZ, L'idée d'empire en occident du Ve au XIVe siècle (Paris 1953); Le couronnement impérial de Charlemagne (Paris 1964). P. E. SCHRAMM, Herrschaftszeichen und Staatssymbolik, 3 v. (Schriften der Monumenta Germaniae historica 13; Stuttgart 1954–56). O. TREITINGER, Die oströmische Kaiser- und Reichsidee nach ihrer Gestaltung im höfischen Zeremoniell (2d ed. Darmstadt 1956). J. DEÉR, "Die Vorrechte des Kaisers im Rom (772–800)," Schweizerische Beiträge zur allgemeinen Geschichte 15 (1957) 5–63. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1962).

[K. F. MORRISON]

PATRICK, ST.

Apostle of Ireland; b. c. 389; d. c. 461? (feast, March 17). Patrick (Patricius), as he himself relates, was born in Roman Britain, son of the decurio (alderman), and later deacon, Calporn(i)us. The dates of his birth and death are disputed, as is his chronology generally. At the age of 16, while staying on his father's country estate (probably near Ravenglass), he was seized by Irish raiders and sold as a slave in Ireland. After six years' servitude as a shepherd, and encouraged by a voice in his sleep, he escaped, found a ship to take him on board, and eventually reached home. For the worldly youth that he had been, though a nominal Christian, captivity had become a means of spiritual conversion. A desire to preach the Christian faith to the Irish grew within him to the certainty of a vocation. Once in a dream he even heard the "voice of the Irish" calling him back. He went to the Continent to train for the priesthood and probably stayed for some time as disciple of St. GERMAIN at Auxerre. Perhaps he visited colonies of monks at Lérins and on the islands of the Tyrrhene Sea.

His desire for converting the Irish did not find favor with his superiors, mainly because of his defective education, for which he had never been able to compensate properly. Upon the death of Palladius, whom Pope CELESTINE I had sent to the Irish as their first bishop in 431, Patrick was appointed his successor. His mission concentrated on the west and north of Ireland, where nobody had preached the gospel before. Having secured the protection of the local kings, he toured the country extensively and made numerous converts. Church organization had to be adapted to the political and social conditions of Ireland. Since there were no towns on the Roman pattern, Patrick established episcopal churches with quasi-monastic chapters as were found not infrequently on the Continent, especially in Gaul. Although he never mentions his own see, the claim of Armagh to be Patrick's church, though not recorded before the 7th century, seems to represent a genuine tradition. The clergy was originally recruited on the Continent (Gaul) and in Britain, but later increasingly from among the native converts. Patrick also propagated monasticism in the primitive form as practiced in the islands off the Mediterranean coast of Gaul.

Saint Patrick. (Bettmann/CORBIS)

In his missionary work he had to face frequent dangers to his freedom and even to his life. The Druids were probably his chief opponents. Patrick's conduct of the mission was severely criticized by the British clergy and also, it seems, by some persons in Ireland. Things would appear to have come to an issue when Patrick demanded the excommunication of the British Prince Coroticus, who during a retaliatory raid on Ireland had killed some of Patrick's converts and sold others into slavery. To his critics Patrick replied with his Confessio, written in his old age.

Writings. Of the writings that go under Patrick's name, his Confessio and the letter (Epistola) concerning the raid of Coroticus are commonly accepted as genuine. The Confessio is an account of Patrick's spiritual development and a justification of his mission, but above all it is a homage to God and thanksgiving for His grace, for having called Patrick, an unworthy sinner, to the apostolate. Autobiographical and historical detail are merely incidental and often difficult to interpret.

The letter is directed partly against the raiders and Coroticus, their leader, partly against the higher clergy of Britain and their scornful attitude toward the Irish bishop. Both works are written in an unusual mixture of Biblical and Vulgar Latin, which often results in strained and obscure language.

Opinion is divided about the authenticity of the Dicta (Sayings) of Patrick in the Book of Armagh, especially the first one, which refers to a sojourn on the Tyrrhene Islands, and the last one, which urges the chanting of Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison at all canonical hours. The canons of a circular letter issued by Bishops Patricius, Auxilius, and Iserminus after the so-called synod of St. Patrick, are probably substantially genuine. Ecclesiastical life as implied in this document, and in particular the frequent references to diocesan jurisdiction of bishops and to canonical discipline, are consistent with a 5th-century date and would not fit into the pattern of the Irish monastic Church of later times. A number of these canons are quoted under Patrick's name in the Collectio Hibernensis alongside others that are spurious. The beautiful Old Irish morning prayer known as "The Breastplate of St. Patrick" is of later date than the saint's lifetime.

Doctrine. Patrick was a man of action, with little inclination for learning. His writings are proof of his firm belief in his vocation, of his devotion to his cause, and of his courage and humility. His "voices"—foretelling his escape from captivity, calling him to the Irish apostolate, comforting him when in disgrace—are for the most part capable of a perfectly natural explanation; only the experiences related in the Confessio (ch. 24, 25) have the characteristics of mystical prayer.

Of his doctrine, little can be stated beyond its orthodoxy. A certain emphasis in his teaching regarding grace might possibly be interpreted as anti-Pelagian. The credal statements in his Confessio (ch. 4) echo a formal creed of Gallican type. Patrick's Biblical text, as far as can be judged, is also Gallican.

Chronology. The only contemporary sources for Patrick's life are his genuine writings and the entries concerning St. Germain and Palladius in the Chronicle of PROSPER OF AQUITAINE. The former are, unfortunately, not precise enough for even approximation of an absolute chronology of the events referred to; they merely place Patrick within the 5th century. The Confessio does contain elements of a relative chronology: capture at the age of 16; escape from slavery at 22; some form of ecclesiastical censure because of a sin he had committed when barely 15 years old, disclosed "after 30 years"—but the date upon which they are reckoned is not clear. On the other hand, the precise dates given by Prosper (delegation of St. Germain to Britain in 429, mission of Palladius to Ireland in 431) bear on the chronology of Patrick only on the assumption that a document from the church of Auxerre, embedded in some lives of St. Patrick, is a genuine record of the saint's life, which some scholars doubt. According to this document, Patrick succeeded Palladius after a very short time; this would bear out the Irish annals, which date the beginning of his mission as of 432. These annals, however, record the death of a Patricius senex in 457 or 461, and the death of the "apostle" Patrick in 493 or thereabouts. However, the value of the Irish annals as sources for the early Christian period has been questioned by J. V. Kelleher of Harvard.

The Latin and Irish Lives of St. Patrick from the 7th century onward are written mainly with a view to promoting the territorial and juridical claims of the See of ARMAGH. They portray a powerful miracle worker, in the manner of Irish hagiographical legend, who has little in common with the author of the Confessio. How much genuine tradition in regard to persons and places they may contain is largely a matter of speculation. It has been observed that most of the persons with whom they bring Patrick into contact belong to the late rather than the middle decades of the 5th century and that the annalistic obits of many of Patrick's disciples fall in the first decades of the 6th century.

This conflicting evidence has been differently interpreted. J. Bury accepted 432 as the initial year of Patrick's mission and 461 as the date of his death. He was followed, in the main, by E. MacNeill, P. Grosjean, and L. Bieler. T. F. O'Rahilly believed that the mission of Palladius, whom he identified with Patricius senex, lasted from 432 to 461 and was continued by the British Patrick from 461 to c. 490. J. Carney allows for only one Patrick, whose mission he dates from 457 to 493. Accordingly, he maintains that Palladius was sent to Scotland, not to Ireland, and the first mission to Ireland, including the foundation of Armagh, was the work of St. Secundinus (annalistic date of arrival: 439), to whom an early hymn on St. Patrick is ascribed in later manuscripts. M. Esposito would make Patrick precede rather than succeed Palladius. D. Binchy, weighing carefully the arguments on all sides, concludes that the balance of probability favors the opinion of O'Rahilly. C. Mohrmann, analyzing Patrick's Latin, inclines to accept the chronology of Bury. It does seem possible, without forcing the evidence, to vindicate the chronology of Bury in all essentials, except that 432 as the initial year of Patrick's mission is probably a little too early.

Cult and Relics. A cult of St. Patrick is attested in the 6th century. The day of his death is first recorded in the 7th-century Life of St. Gertrud, who died on March 17, 659. In the 9th century Ferdomnach, scribe of Armagh, testified to the celebration of St. Patrick's feast as a triduum. The cult of St. Patrick and some of his relics were brought to Péronne in Picardy by St. Fursa (middle of 7th century); the cult soon spread over France, Italy, and Germany. When the Anglo-Normans established themselves in Ireland, they took over the cult of St. Patrick and of other Irish saints. In 1186 relics of SS. Patrick, Brigid, and Columcille were solemnly deposited in the cathedral of Down under the patronage of John de Courcy and Bishop Malachy. An English Cistercian of De Courcy's entourage, Jocelin of Furness, was commissioned to write a life of St. Patrick, and this became the standard text of later times. With the recent Irish emigration the cult has spread over many parts of the New World.

St. Patrick's Purgatory in Lough Derg, a place of penitential pilgrimages since the 12th century, has probably no connection with the saint. The earliest pictorial representation of St. Patrick dates from c. 900. The two most common ones—Patrick's expelling all poisonous snakes from Ireland and his symbolizing the Holy Trinity by the shamrock leaf—are based on legend.

Feast: March 17.

Bibliography: St. Patrick's Confessio, the 7th-century Life by Muirchú, and the Breviarum by Tírechán have been collected in the Book of Armagh, an early 9th-century manuscript, now in Trinity College, Dublin. Editions. J. GWYNN, ed., Liber Ardmachanus (Dublin 1913). L. BIELER, ed., Libri Epistolarum s. Patricii Episcopi in Classica et mediaevalia 11 (1950) 1–150; 12 (1951)

79–214; repr. in 2 v. (Dublin 1952); The Irish Penitentials (Scriptores Latini Hiberniae 5; Dublin 1963), the canons; The Works of St. Patrick (Ancient Christian Writers 17; Westminster, Md.–London 1953), Confessio, letter, sayings, canons, hymn attributed to St. Secundus, Breastplate. E. I. HOGAN, ed., Documenta de s. Patricio (Brussels 1884). J. COLGAN, ed., Trias thaumaturga (Louvain 1647) 11–116; new eds. are being prepared by L. BIELER. W. STOKES, ed., Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, 2 v. (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 89; London 1888; repr. New York 1965), critical ed. and tr. K. MULCRONE (Dublin 1939–). Literature. J. B. BURY, The Life of St. Patrick (New York 1905). J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v. 1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 319–356. E. MACNEILL, St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland (London 1934; 2d ed., J. RYAN, 1964). T. F. O'RAHILLY, The Two Patricks (Dublin 1942). L. BIELER, The Life and Legend of St. Patrick (Dublin 1949). J. CARNEY, The Problem of St. Patrick (Dublin 1961). C. MOHRMANN, The Latin of St. Patrick (Dublin 1961). D. A. BINCHY, "Patrick and His Biographers," Studia Hibernica 2 (1962) 7–173. R. E. MCNALLY, American Catholic Historical Review 47 (Washington 1961–62) 305–324. J. B. BURY, The Life of St. Patrick and His Place in History (Mineola, N.Y. 1998). D. N. DUMVILLE et al, eds. L. ABRAMS, Saint Patrick, A.D. 493–1993 (Woodbridge, UK ; Rochester, N.Y. 1993). N. D. O'DONOGHUE, Aristocracy of Soul: Patrick of Ireland (Wilmington, Del. 1987). R. P. C. HANSON, The Life and Writings of the Historical Saint Patrick (New York 1983). L. DE PAOR, Saint Patrick's World: The Christian Culture of Ireland's Apostolic Age ([S.I.] 1993).

[L. BIELER]

PATRIOTISM

The love of and devotion to one's country, having as its moral foundation the virtue of PIETY. Benedict XV considered it a twin virtue with religion itself and a tie between the human person and his roots in nature.

Basis and Notion. Its social foundation is community. Man is bound to act in accordance with the divinely revealed and humanly confirmed truth that it is not good for him to be alone. Genesis attributes the statement of this truth to the Lord God before Eve's creation; it can be understood in an even stronger sense after the fact: given his social nature, it is impossible for man to be alone, and any pretension to independence from the human community must be disastrous because it is unrealistic and inhuman. Each man is compelled by nature to live in society for the attainment of his personal good, which good in turn provides the basis for society's growth and development toward a common good, ordered in love and justice. To live humanly is to live in community; and to live morally, as a creature under God, is to love that community of which one forms a part.

Patriotism in the sense of the love of one's community is therefore a duty of man flowing from intelligent recognition and moral acceptance of the very form of creation: the creation not of the individual, man, who existed alone only long enough for God to confirm the fact of his incompleteness, but of the human family, mankind, which provides the social principle of the person's being and the necessary context for his truly personal growth.

But patriotism as a form of charity, or love, has a more specific object in its actuation than mankind or the human family as such. According to St. Thomas Aquinas, the particular love of one's fatherland is an important aspect of that preferential form of charity that is called pietas (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 101.1). Through piety the person has an obligation of love to God, parents and fatherland. Each is in some sense a principle of man's being: God through creation; parents through procreation and education; fatherland through a formation of one's cultural and historical identity.

Patriotism, in its specific sense of love of fatherland, or of one's people, is a historical corollary of a natural demand of community. The love of community that is an imperative of man's created being gains only a vague and illusory existence if it is directed finally at nothing more specific than mankind. And again, love-in-community, when confined to family and friends, or even a local community, becomes a confinement, or limitation, of the person, if not even a "passion against" when it meets the larger communities of nation and world. To the love of hearth and of mankind, a love of country is the psychological and moral, as well as historical, mediacy.

Patriotism can therefore be defined descriptively as the reverent acknowledgment of community as it is expressed in history in a form intermediate to home and world, a response in love to the people and milieu in which man exists because he is created not only as a member of a family or species but is bound to a particular cultural group in space, time and tradition. Put more concisely, patriotism is a special form of piety binding a person to his historical and cultural sources. As such, it makes certain practical demands of the person: loyalty to his nation, collaboration in its political order and the will to seek the moral perfection of his people.

Traditional Catholic teaching, notably as it is synthesized doctrinally and in practical applications by the modern popes, has insisted especially on the profoundly moral basis of rightly ordered patriotism. Pius XI reminded Christian citizens in Ubi arcano Dei that "it is never lawful, nor even wise, to dissociate morality from the affairs of practical life," so that "in the last analysis, it is 'justice which exalteth a nation: but sin maketh nations miserable'" (Proverbs 14.34). The citizen must seek the good of his nation according to the norms of a moral order rooted in nature itself, though confirmed by Old Testament precepts and New Testament counsels. The Catholic acknowledgment of natural law is nowhere more explicit or normative than in moral questions connected with the ius gentium, nationalism and internationalism, civic loyalty and patriotism.

National and International Dimensions. The understanding of this natural moral order in practical affairs, though often difficult and obscure, admits no concessions from political expediency or in the name of "moral ambiguity" to violations of justice. Thus, within a moral context, an act of civil disobedience may conceivably be the patriot's deepest expression of love, when other actions would only pass over or strengthen a process of injustice corroding the community. The Christian citizen is bound to his nation in a loyal but intelligent union, accepting gladly his national identity but freeing himself and his nation, by a continual reference to the supranational values of charity and justice, for constant growth and reformation. For patriotism is love, and love wills the good of the other—in the case of a nation, a good dependent on its united response to the just claims of its citizens and, to whatever extent possible, to the human needs beyond its borders.

There is no contradiction in seeing a nation's own common good dependent on its contribution to the common good of other peoples in an international community, since, as Pius XII pointed out in Summi pontificatus, "legitimate and well-ordered love of our native country should not make us close our eyes to the all-embracing nature of Christian charity." This is so true that patriotism rightly understood, far from obstructing a love of mankind, becomes itself in modern papal teaching one of the bases for sane and salutary internationalism.

The charity of patriotism, while being preferential in its practical object, is at the same time universal in its ultimate aim. It is directed at the exaltation of one's nation under God and thus at its fulfillment in justice of the moral principles governing the relations among states. The devout patriot fears nothing so much for his nation as its following a course of injustices that, however "politically realistic," he recognizes as a way of self-destruction. Since patriotism is a form of charity directed toward a social order whose goal and perfection is justice, its concern for the nation's good extends naturally and harmoniously into the international order, where the nation's drive for global justice is its own exaltation. The aggressive character of political nationalism, the "immoderate nationalism" that Pius XI repeatedly distinguished from patriotism, is, on the other hand, the kind of sin that "maketh nations miserable."

The flowering of a rightly ordered patriotism is therefore wider than one's own fatherland alone and seeks relations of that land to the wider human community and world—hence the manner in which modern papal teaching emphasizes at every turn the balance between a sane nationalism and a humane internationalism. Recent popes base this integration of patriotic piety with international loyalty on the fact that the preferential love that finds its object in the nation wills the good of that nation as realizable through its pursuit of a justice greater than itself and extending beyond its borders. Furthermore, since patriotism is a species of charity, its development involves the deepening of an unspecified power at its source in the human will. Man widens his family through love. Just as the father's deepening love for his family increases his capacity for love, so must the true patriot's love for his country grow naturally until it simultaneously embraces the world while yet remaining, alive and effective within the symphony of human loves and social loyalties, the special preferential piety that is patriotism.

Bibliography: General. J. C. BENNETT, The Christian as Citizen (New York 1955). M. CURTI, The Roots of American Loyalty (New York 1946). C. DAWSON, Religion and the Modern State (New York 1935). C. J. H. HAYES, Essays on Nationalism (New York 1926); Christianity and Western Civilization (Stanford 1954). J. L. SPALDING, Things of the Mind (Chicago 1894; 4th ed. 1901); Socialism and Labor and other Arguments, Social, Political and Patriotic (Chicago 1902) ch. 8, essay on "Patriotism." C. VAN DOREN, Patriotic Anthology (New York 1941). J. J. WRIGHT, National Patriotism in Papal Teaching (Westminster, Md. 1956). Encyclicals. LEO XIII, "Sapientiae christianae" (Jan. 10, 1890) Acta Sanctorum, 22 (1890) 385–404; Eng., Tablet, 75 (Jan. 25, 1890) 121–126; "Immortale Dei" (Nov. 1, 1885) Acta Sanctorum, 18 (1885) 161–180; Eng., Catholic Mind, 34 (Nov. 8, 1936) 425–429. PIUS XI, "Caritate Christi compulsi" (May 3, 1932) Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 24 (1932) 177–194; Eng. ibid. 30 (June 22, 1932) 228–243. JOHN XXIII, Mater et Magistra. JOHN XXIII Pacem in terris.

[J. J. WRIGHT]

PATRIPASSIANISM

A Trinitarian heresy that denied that the Logos, Jesus Christ, possessed subsistence and implied that God the Father Himself suffered and died on the cross in the guise of the Son. This term is thus synonymous with SABELLIANISM and was invented by the Latin Fathers who called the propagators of MONARCHIANISM patripassiani (attributors of suffering to the Father) while the Greeks called them Sabellians. TERTULLIAN, in his Treatise Against Praxeas I, first insisted on this implication of Sabellianism, taking Praxeas to task not only for his monarchianism, but also for his opposition to MONTANISM, which Praxeas persuaded the pope (apparently Victor I) to condemn: Duo negotia diaboli Praxeas Romae procuravit: . . . Paracletum fugavit et Patrem crucifixit (Praxeas achieved two works of the devil in Rome: . . . he put the Holy Spirit to flight and crucified the Father). Some scholars think that Tertullian misrepresented Praxeas's archaic Trinitarian formulations to make him the father of MODALISM, and so discredit him, for the name Praxeas does not appear elsewhere in contemporary sources; others suggest that Tertullian is using the word Praxeas (busybody) as a nickname for Pope Callistus.

Bibliography: TERTULLIAN, Treatise Against Praxeas, ed. and tr. E. EVANS (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1949). J. DANIELOU and H. MARROU, Des origines à saint Grégoire le Grand, v.1 of Nouvelle histoire de l'Église (Paris 1963–) 1:138. G. BARDY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 10.2:2196–2200.

[P. LEBEAU]

PATRISTIC PHILOSOPHY

Patristic philosophy can be considered from the point of view of the history of Christianity—and it is then part of the science of PATRISTIC STUDIES—or from the point of view of the history of philosophy that began outside, and before, the Christian community. The point of view of this article is the history of philosophy.

The history of Western philosophy has three periods: ancient, medieval, and modern. The medieval is the period of the religious philosophies: Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan. Though "medieval" designates the European period of the 11th to the 14th centuries A.D., the history of CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY comprises the two periods of patristic and SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY. The patristic period extends from the beginnings of Christianity to the 8th century (or from St. JUSTIN MARTYR, c. 100–164, to St. JOHN DAMASCENE, d. c. 749) and is limited to the Mediterranean basin. The development of patristic thought begins with the apostolic Fathers and continues with the Apologists and the beginnings of theology and philosophy to the golden age of the 4th century (Nicaea, 325 to Chalcedon, 451); the final period concludes with Damascene.

The idea that patristic thought belongs to the history of philosophy except for its extrinsic influence has been challenged. The rationalist philosophers (E. Bréhier) maintained that patristic thought is not philosophy because it depends upon a revelation that cannot be questioned. Scholastic theologians have said that the Fathers did not adequately distinguish philosophy and theology and consequently their work was properly theology (P. Mandonnet). In response, some have admitted the actual fusion of philosophy and theology in the Fathers, but have maintained that the distinction was made in principle and that true philosophical work was done that prepared the way for scholastic philosophy (B. Geyer). Others have defended an intermediate concept of "Christian philosophy" and argued that though precisions were made later, there was a properly Christian philosophy in the Fathers as well as in the scholastics (É. Gilson).

“St. Augustine (of Hippo) Dictating His Works to a Scribe,” 13th century fresco, Upper Church, Basilica of S. Francesco, Assisi, Italy.

On the other hand, rationalist historians have argued that the more philosophical of the Fathers (Origen, Gregory of Nyssa, Augustine) were not authentic Christians but really Gnostics or Neoplatonists. There is as a result an extensive literature studying the question, and in each case it has been resolved in favor of the Christianity of the patristic writer.

General Movements of Patristic Philosophy

Not all the patristic writers were philosophers. Some were exegetes, preachers, poets, or theologians in the technical sense. Though there were some elements of philosophy in the apostolic Fathers, Justin was the first Christian “philosopher”—not only because he professed philosophy before his conversion and called himself a philosopher as a Christian, but especially because he made the basic distinction between the logos of revelation and the logos of Greek philosophy or of reason.

Greek. But the dominant and almost exclusive philosophical tradition among the Greek writers is that which originated with the school of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 150–219) and ORIGEN (c. 185–254). In the 4th century it moved to Cappadocia principally in GREGORY OF NYSSA (c. 335–395), and then to Athens(?) with PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite (c. 500). There are other figures of philosophical importance—such as NEMESIUS OF EMESA (c. 400), whose De natura hominis was mistakenly attributed to Gregory of Nyssa in the Middle Ages, and Damascene, who is important principally as a summist and transmitter of patristic teaching to the scholastics—but the Alexandrian tradition is the mainline of Greek patristic philosophy.

Latin. In the beginning Greek was the language of the writers in the Roman world also, but Latin began to be used toward the end of the 2d century by MINUCIUS FELIX (c. 180) and TERTULLIAN (c. 155–245). However, though a certain amount of philosophy came to the Christians by way of Cicero and Varro, for the most part the development of philosophy among the Latin Fathers was the result of the influence of the Greek writers, both Christian and pagan. In the Roman spirit Tertullian and St. AMBROSE contributed to the development of moral philosophy, and Tertullian made some important beginnings in the definition of theologico-philosophical concepts. By far the most important Latin Father philosophically, however, was St. AUGUSTINE. Augustine was an original thinker and the history of his doctrine followed the itinerary of his development from Manichaeism, through skepticism and Neoplatonism, to Christianity. But since the strongest philosophical influence on him was that of PORPHYRY, PLOTINUS, and the Greek Fathers, he may be assimilated to the Alexandrian tradition in philosophy.

Second in importance to Augustine is BOETHIUS, a layman. Though Augustinian and Neoplatonic at base, his thought is not as mystical and spiritual. His Consolation of Philosophy presents an example of lay philosophy, though he also wrote theological treatises that are philosophically important. He is especially significant for his effort to make both Plato and Aristotle available to the Latin world, and particularly for introducing Aristotelian logic into European philosophy. The work of translation of the Neoplatonists into Latin had been begun much earlier by MARIUS VICTORINUS.

Nature of Philosophy in the Fathers

In the Western world philosophy means the type of rational understanding developed by the Greeks. For this reason the history of philosophy is in large part the history of the influence of Greek philosophy.

Influence of the Greeks. The influence of Hellenism on Christian origins is discernible in the Old Testament, e.g., in the Book of Wisdom. Greek influences are recognizable also in the New Testament, in John and Paul. But the first major effort to unite Greek speculation with the Bible was made by PHILO JUDAEUS (c. A.D. 40). GNOSTICISM likewise had much to do with initiating the movement among the Christians, since it professed to be able to discern in the Scriptures a secret, saving doctrine that had large elements of Greek philosophy in it. One of the motives of the Alexandrian school was to develop a true Christian Gnosticism, though Origen was undoubtedly stimulated also by the beginnings of Neoplatonism in which he seems to have taken part.

The history of pagan philosophy at the time of the beginning of Christianity is not very well known. It was a period of syncretism, not only between philosophies but also between religions, and there was no dominant school. Plotinus (d. A.D. 270) presented the first strong new philosophy since Stoicism and Epicureanism. The first Christians therefore tended to be eclectic. Plato (Ti-maeus), however, seemed closer to Moses (Genesis) than the others, while Epicurus and Aristotle were considered the most incompatible with Christianity. Even skepticism was significant, not only in the development of Augustine's thought, but also in provoking arguments for the necessity of faith. Once Neoplatonism developed, however, it had a preponderant influence on the Christians (Plotinus and Porphyry on Augustine, Proclus on Dionysius).

Concept of Philosophy. The distinction and meanings of theology and philosophy as used in the post-scholastic world were not operative in the patristic period. Among the pagans philosophy was a general term for the doctrine and way of life of a particular group of men. Theology meant simply the part of philosophy that treated of God. The patristic philosophers compared Christianity to the pagan philosophies, much as Christianity and communism might be contrasted. They distinguished between "our philosophy" and the philosophy of "those outside." Thus, philosophy could be considered as a way of human beatitude (Augustine), or a way of salvation through higher, speculative knowledge (Gnosticism), or a way of Christian perfection by the elevation of the mind of God (Alexandrians).

Thus the movement of philosophy among both the pagans and the Christians was toward beatifying knowledge. The Christians, however, insisted that the goal could not be achieved by finite reason alone. Faith is necessary from beginning to end. Thus the process goes from simple faith in revelation, through the hierarchy of human and divine sciences, to mystical contemplation and union with God. This process involves a dialectic of faith and reason that recognizes the validity of human reason proceeding from an analysis of creatures to the Creator (Wis 13; Rom 1.20; Greek philosophy) but considers this insufficient. Faith and reason are interrelated as teacher and pupil in the natural process of human learning (Augustine).

The desire for God did not exhaust all the causes of philosophical reasoning among the Christians. Philosophy was needed to meet the challenge of the pagans (e.g., CELSUS) and to clarify the meaning of the Christian revelation in the face of heretical views within. Moreover, philosophers such as Justin, when converted, could not resist philosophizing within Christianity. Neither did the intellectual mystical tradition present the only view of Christian perfection. There were those such as Basil and Ambrose who stressed the Biblical service of God and the life of the moral virtues.

General Synthesis Of Patristic Philosophy

A catalogue of the philosophical opinions of the individual patristic writers taken chronologically can be found in the Catholic histories of Christian or medieval philosophy (Gilson, Copleston). Some general lines of doctrine are sketched here.

When patristic philosophy is seen from the viewpoint of the history of philosophy, it is generally considered as a correction and development of Greek philosophy. Though there are merits in this procedure, it gives a false perspective. Patristic philosophy began with the Hebrew tradition and the Bible. Greek philosophy entered this tradition and taught the patristic philosophers how to develop the philosophical elements in revelation rationally (cf. C. Tresmontant). But the patristic philosophers also saw themselves as different from the Jews, who held strictly to the Old Testament. The difference, of course, was Christ, and though the mystery of Christ took them beyond the realm of rational understanding, nevertheless the theology of Christ forced a reconstruction of philosophy that can be called specifically Christian, at least in the historical sense.

Trinitarian Doctrine. Christ meant first of all the doctrine of the Trinity, the mystery of one divine nature but three Persons. This was anathema to the Jews, who saw it as a species of polytheism; but philosophically speaking, it forced against the Arians a distinction between generation (the Son) and creation that sharpened appreciably the notion of creation out of nothing derived from the Old Testament.

Creation and Divine Ideas. The Fathers found it easy to adapt the myth of Plato's Timaeus and understood God as an omnipotent artist who freely willed the world in time out of nothing according to patterns that He contemplates in His divine mind. But the break was made with Greek philosophy both by denying any kind of dualism of matter that is coeternal with the Creator and is shaped by Him, and by denying any kind of generationism whereby creatures proceed from God's substance in some way. To the Platonic division between the intelligible and the sensible a more embracing and radical division was added—between Creator and creature—in such a way that the division of creature contained the division of spiritual and material.

The nature of this last division was not always clear to the Fathers, and a certain reality was sometimes attributed to the divine ideas distinct from the being of God, as though God first created the intelligible world that the material world imitated, in a Platonic fashion. The Platonic myth of the fall of man into the body was also sometimes used, as in Gregory of Nyssa. But the ultimate pattern that prevailed was that of Dionysius, who made every creature apart from God a substance and made the intelligible creation the orders of the angels (as against the hypostases of Plotinus and Proclus). The question whether the angels were able to contribute to the creative process was asked but not definitely answered. They were granted some gubernatorial functions in the universe, which was conceived as one whole under God.

After Origen's thesis of multiple worlds, the patristic doctrine settled in the direction of one single creation in time, which, however, went through gradual stages of development until man appeared and the history of civilization began. Here the harmonization between Genesis and the Timaeus is again apparent. Augustine followed Gregory of Nyssa in making use of the theory of SEMINAL reasons to explain how it was possible that the whole of creation was produced "at once" (as they understood Sir 18.1 to teach) but nevertheless went through the stages of the six days. The theory of an eternal world was constantly rejected as contrary not only to revelation but also to Plato. The possibility of distinguishing between the conclusions of reason (which might leave the question of eternity open) and the affirmations of revelation (which does not) did not occur to the Christian world before MAIMONIDES suggested it in the 12th century. Hence, time and history were primary categories of patristic thought, and the world scheme of the Fathers came closer to the 20th-century evolutionary and historical world view than did that of the scholastics.

Psychology of Person. Another great influence of the Trinitarian doctrine on philosophy came in the development of the psychology of the PERSON. It was principally Augustine who reconstructed the Greek psychology into a new Christian synthesis. Christ is the Word of God. This teaching enabled the Fathers to join the Platonic and Stoic theories of the logos. In Augustine the interior word became the middle term of a process that came out of memory and completed itself in love. Plato's theory of reminiscence was changed into a doctrine of divine ILLUMINATION, which formed at once the basis for absolute knowledge and the ascent of the mind to God. Taken objectively as being, truth, and goodness, the triad joined the ontology of the Greeks and became a Christian doctrine of PARTICIPATION whereby all things descend from, and exist by, the One Being who is the cause of all.

In patristic philosophy there are, then, two forms of participation, that of EXEMPLARISM, or participation in the creative ideas by imitation, and an ontological participation whereby creatures derive from the Creator in descending grades of perfection. At the heart of this philosophy is the principle enunciated by Boethius that the imperfect presupposes the perfect (Consol. phil. 3.10).

Knowledge of God. The mystery of the Trinity brought forth yet another theme of patristic philosophy, the knowability yet incomprehensibility of God. The Arian, EUNOMIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE, had attempted to apply univocally to God the Aristotelian categories taken from the sensible world. It became clear in the debate that this could not be done, and the beginnings of the doctrine of ANALOGY were shaped. Moreover, though it is true that reason can apply names from creatures to the Creator in a transcendent manner, nevertheless God still remains incomprehensible and a mystery. This is the constant theme of the Greek Fathers. The negative theology of Dionysius is perhaps their strongest statement about God, though it is mitigated by Damascene's position that God is naturally and readily known by a kind of instinctive ascent from creatures to the Creator.

Teaching on the Incarnation. Christ also means the INCARNATION, that is, the mystery of the assumption of human nature by a divine Person so that the Second Person of the Trinity is both God and man. This forced the Fathers to establish their understanding of the human nature that the Word assumed. Christ did not assume a soul without a body, or a body without a soul; He had all the powers and faculties of man. In terms of the division of creatures into spiritual and material, it became clear that man was a composite of both "natures" and mediated between both worlds. It was possible, then, with Gregory of Nyssa, to define him both as a rational animal and as a corporeal spirit.

Spirit. The notion of SPIRIT and of the spirituality of the human soul did not come easy for the early Fathers. Stoicism and Manichaeism had a developed materialism that included God and held thinkers such as Tertullian and Augustine in its grasp for a while. Scripture itself, especially the Old Testament, was not clear and forceful on this point. Thus it was probably Neoplatonism—in part a reaction to the materialism of Hellenistic philosophy—that did most to clarify the spiritual nature of the soul. But this left the Fathers with a certain dualism in man of soul and body that was not completely overcome. The soul was not conceived in a simple undifferentiated way, however, but rather as a hierarchy of powers and functions that stretched between the poles of spirit and matter. As the soul became more interior, it became more spiritual and also the center wherein God dwelt. This psychology was intimately connected with the theory of mystical contemplation, itself the Christian response to the immanentist doctrine of Plotinus. Within the Alexandrian tradition, at least, the ascetical and moral teaching of the Fathers was worked out from the point of view of this mystical psychology. Thus the life of virtue was structured toward union with God. The view of man's nature as composite made it relatively easy to defend the immortality of the human soul, though it was not as helpful regarding the question of the resurrection of the body.

Person and Nature. The Incarnation and the doctrine of the Trinity both forced a distinction between person and nature, though from opposite directions. The Incarnation presented an instance of one Person but two natures;

the Trinity of one nature but three Persons. This led to new precisions about the Aristotelian category of SUBSTANCE, but particularly it made important the problem of UNIVERSALS and individuals. The question that Boethius bequeathed to the Middle Ages in his commentary on Porphyry's Isagoge was not merely a speculative question that intrigued the scholastics; it was very closely bound up with the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. The solutions of the Fathers tended to be a modification of Platonism and Stoicism and to stress the unity of a nature in all men that was nevertheless possessed by different individuals or persons. When their views were repeated in the early Middle Ages, they came under the sharp criticism of ABELARD, and the problem came into greater prominence.

Role of the Redemption. Christ finally also means redemption. This immediately engages the problem of EVIL, which was probably the most absorbing problem in the syncretic period of the beginning of the patristic age. All the dualistic religions of the East and the Hellenistic philosophies revolved around the mystery of GOOD and evil, the freedom and determinism of man, the providence of God. It is in this context that the historical significance of Christianity can best be understood. Because of the patristic doctrine of creation of all beings by God, who is Being, any kind of absolute DUALISM had to be rejected. There is nothing that did not proceed from God. In this there was a parallelism with the Plotinian doctrine of the emanation of all from the One. Because God is good only, everything He made was good, even matter, and in this the Plotinian doctrine was modified. But perhaps the greatest impulse toward the recognition of the goodness of matter came from the doctrine of the Incarnation; for it was early established against DOCETISM that matter was assumed also by the Son.

Freedom. Consequently, the Christians moved in the direction of explaining evil metaphysically in the Platonic sense of nonbeing, but morally as having its possibility in the FREEDOM and finitude of man. The Fathers worked hard, therefore, to defend human freedom against Manichaeism. On the other hand, the mission of Christ as redeemer also taught them to fend off Pelagian optimism. Man's freedom, then, was seen in an ambivalent position, as drawn to determinism in the physical world and as elevated to freedom by the grace of Christ. The same dialectic that was mentioned above regarding faith and reason was operative also between grace and freedom. These questions absorbed much of Augustine's time, but Nemesius, and especially Damascene, worked to clarify the psychology of choice. In this area the positive help of Aristotle was finally apparent.

Image of God. The doctrine of redemption in patristic thought is closely related also to the doctrine of man as the IMAGE OF GOD. This doctrine was derived from Genesis, but it also fitted well with the Platonic scheme. For the Christians, however, the image of God meant the image of the Creator, and so it was the freedom of man and his position as lord of the world that characterized man's likeness to God. This position, developed by Gregory of Nyssa and others, was to be repeated by St. THOMAS AQUINAS. It is this image that was dimmed by the Fall, that was brought back to its original intention by the redemptive grace of Christ, and that was given a new goal by the new reality of the Son of God made man. Thus, though the Christian doctrine of the Fall and Redemption resembles the Platonic cycle, the patristic doctrine of image also lays the theoretical foundations for man's creative and productive function in history and civilization. He is to be a second creator.

But because men are ultimately free, they are divided into two camps: those who struggle with Christ to redeem the world and those who do not. There is then a dualism of spirits in history, but it is the result of the freedom of creatures and not of two absolute and independent sources. This is the theme of Augustine's great City of God, which furnished the blueprint for the Christian Middle Ages.

Conclusion

Patristic philosophy is not a single tradition, nor is it a separate science apart from the totality of developing Christian life. It did not answer definitively all the questions it raised, but it did explore most of them and set themes and directions that formed the bases not only for medieval philosophy but for much of modern philosophy as well.

Bibliography: É. BRÉHIER, Période Hélienistique et Romaine, v.1.2 of Histoire de la philosophie, 2 v. (Paris 1926–32). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, MD 1946–) v.2. F. UEBERWEG Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, 5 v. (Berlin 1923–28) v.2. E. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). B. ROMEYER, La Philosophie chrétienne jusqu'à Descartes, 3 v. (Paris 1935–37) C. TRESMONTANT, The Origins of Christian Philosophy, tr. M. PONTIFEX (New York 1963); A Study of Hebrew Thought, tr. M. F. GIBSON (New York 1960); La Métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne (Paris 1961). R. ARNOU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 12.2:2258–2392. J. DANIELOU, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II<sup>e</sup> et III<sup>e</sup> siècles, v.2 of Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée (Tournai 1961). M. SPANNEUT, Le Stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie (Paris 1957). H. A. WOLFSON, Philo, 2 v. (Cambridge, MA 1947). A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, L'Idéal religieux des Grecs et l'Évangile (Paris 1932).

[R. F. HARVANEK]

PATRISTIC STUDIES

The study of the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. Also referred to as patrology, a term first used by the Lutheran theologian Johannes Gerhard as the title of a posthumous work (1653). Although the terms patrology, patristics, and the history of ancient Christian literature are sometimes employed interchangeably, it seems advisable to distinguish three scholarly disciplines, covering on broad lines the same period of history and much the same authors, but eyeing their material from distinctive standpoints. Patrology normally has a more historical cast, setting forth the life, writings (genuine, doubtful, spurious), and significant doctrines (or doctrinal significance) of the various authors. Patristics concentrates on the content, primarily theological, of the writings of the Fathers and implies a systematic exposition of their doctrine in whole or in part. The term stems from the 17th century and was first used in Lutheran circles, where theology was divided into Biblical, positive, scholastic, symbolic, and speculative. (See PATRISTIC THEOLOGY.) The history of ancient Christian literature is more in conformity with the philological development and outlook of the 19th and 20th centuries; it puts the Fathers in the framework of the general history of literature, gives more play to the literary aspect of the works involved, and has legitimately introduced (as patrology itself has been compelled to do) a number of writers who are not technically Fathers or even orthodox Christians, but deserve a place in the treatment of the literature of the time. The controversy over the scope and character of early Christian literature initiated early in the 20th century by A. von HARNACK, O. Bardenhewer, and others has long since been resolved, and "ancient Christian literature" is now universally recognized as a satisfactory expression.

Patristic Studies through Trent. The history of patristics goes back to the Church History of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (early 4th century) and JEROME's De viris illustribus (392). The latter was continued in the patristic era by GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES, ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, and ILDEFONSUS OF TOLEDO. In the Middle Ages the most significant "patrology" was PHOTIUS's Myriobiblon or Bibliotheca (858). The catalogue (c. 1317–18) of the last great Nestorian writer 'ABDISHO BAR BERĪKĀ is important for early Syriac literature. Other medieval compilers, such as SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX, HONORIUS OF AUTUN, and Johannes TRITHEMIUS, were content to rely on Jerome and Gennadius. Fresh impetus for patristic study came from the discovery of early Christian texts during the Renaissance, the return to antiquity sparked by the humanists, the Reformation thesis of a gradual deterioration of primitive Christianity, and theological discussions at the Council of TRENT.

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries The studies of the 17th century and the first half of the 18th constitute a first flowering of high-level patristic scholarship on a vast expanse, with remarkable editions (preeminently by the MAURISTS) distinguished for prolegomena and critical apparatus, the painstaking De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis of Robert BELLARMINE, comprehensive historical productions such as L. S. le Nain de TILLEMONT's 16-volume Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (1693–1712) and R. CEILLIER's 23-volume Histoire générale des auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques (1729–63), and the research of Denis PETAU, who gave to positive theology its rightful place in sacred science (notably in his 4-volume Dogmata theologica, 1644–50).

Nineteenth Century. Stimulated in part by A. MAI, J. A. MÖHLER, and J. B. PITRA, the 19th century inaugurated another productive period of patristic scholarship, marked by new discoveries, especially in the Oriental field; the establishment of university chairs of patrology; J. P. MIGNÉ's comprehensive Patrologiae cursus completus (1844–66); the critical editions of the Latin Fathers (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum, 1866–) and the Greek (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, 1897–) undertaken with philological competence by the Vienna and the Prussian Academies of Sciences respectively; and the passage from vast histories to treatises, monographs, and manuals. This florescence produced, toward the end of the century, the extraordinary patristic research initiated by A. von Harnack and O. Bardenhewer, accompanied by scholars such as F. Loofs and L. DUCHESNE, F. X. von FUNK and P. BATIFFOL—whose research was continued and intensified by F. J. DÖLGER, H. LIETZMANN, A. BAUMSTARK, G. MORIN, G. BARDY, B. ALTANER, and a host of others.

Twentieth Century. Twentieth-century patrologists have shown a predilection for exploring more profoundly the doctrinal content of the Fathers, investigating the evolution of words and ideas, and plumbing the patristic stress on history and mystery. Since World War II, new interest in patristic study has been stimulated by striking discoveries (Tura, Nag' Hammâdi, Bodmer papyri) Of unparalleled importance is the long-delayed publication of the texts and translations of the Gnostic writings of Nag' Hammâdi in Egypt, providing firsthand evidence of the range of Gnostic ideas opposed by so many Church Fathers, and now allowing some of the material to be seen more accurately as a development of traditions to be found in the NT and earlier (e.g. the collections of the "sayings" of Jesus). Interest has also been stimulated by the prolific production of texts and translations (cf. Corpus christianorum, 1953–, ultimately to replace Migne;

A. Hamman's Supplementum to Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, [Paris 1878–90] v.1–96, 1958–; Sources chrétiennes, 1942–; Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientantium, 1903–, but esp. since 1949; Ancient Christian Writers, 1946–; Corpus christianorum: Series graeca; Oxford Early Christian Texts). Readily accessible research tools are also available (e.g. G. W. H. Lampe, ed., Patristic Greek Lexicon, the Strasbourg Centre's Biblia patristica, indexing biblical citations and allusions in early Christian writers). This renewed interest has been quickened by the quadrennial Oxford International Conference on Patristic Studies, the ecumenical movement, and an increasing awareness of the significance of doctrinal development.

Among the emphases of recent historical scholarship have been: less interest in using the Fathers as supports for particular theological or ecclesiological positions; greater concern for understanding than for the application of such categories as "orthodox" and "heretical"; increased sophistication in the exploratory use of philosophical, psychological, and sociological analytical tools to deepen and freshen that understanding; heightened sensitivity to and appreciation of the rich diversity revealed in early Christian literature, not only among the Fathers but also between them and their opponents (many of whose writings have not been preserved); broadened interest in the concrete ways of being human and of being religious of the men and women who produced, read, and preserved (and sometimes destroyed) the writings of the Church of the first few centuries.

Vatican Council II has endorsed the study of the Fathers, pointing to our gaining a deepened sense of how the Scriptures have been used in the Church (Dei Verbum 23) and our retrieving a more inclusive, more "ecumenical" spirituality (Unitatis redintegratio 15). But Christians have also become more aware of certain other fairly common positions of the patristic era which have contributed to an unfortunate heritage, demanding serious reexamination today. These positions or attitudes of many of the Fathers would include: a pervasive anti-Judaism; an ambivalence toward sexuality and toward the human body; an antifeminism, understandable but regrettable nonetheless; a Christology which only infrequently took adequate account of the humanity of Jesus; and, especially after Constantine, a political and ecclesiastical "triumphalism" of a kind which, since Vatican II, can be more readily acknowledged and transcended.

Bibliography: Bibliographical aids. K. SCHAFERDIEK, ed. Bibliographia Patristica XXVI–XXVII, 1981–82 (Berlin 1986). J. LIÉBAERT, "Patrologie," Catholicisme 10 (1985) 829–858. T. P. HALTON and R. D. SIDER, "A Decade of Patristic Scholarship, 1970–79," Classical World 76 (1982–83) 65–127, 313–383. AUGUSTINIAN PATRISTIC INSTITUTE OF ROME, Patrology, A. DI BE-

RARDINO, ed., with intro. by J. QUASTEN, The Golden Age of Latin Patristic Literature from the Council of Nicea to the Council of Chalcedon, tr. P. SOLARI (Westminster 1986). ASSOCIATION INTERNATIONALE D'ÉTUDES PATRISTIQUES, Bulletin d'information et de liaison, No. 11. (1985) Annuaire (Turnhout 1985). F. M. YOUNG, From Nicaea to Chalcedon: A Guide to the Literature and its Background (London/Philadelphia 1983). H. CROUZEL, Bibliographie critique d'Origène (La Haye 1971), with Supplément 1 (1983), Fichier augustinien. Augustine bibliography, premier supplément (Boston 1981). S. P. BROCK, "Syriac Studies 1971–1980. A Classified Bibliography," Patrologia orientalis (1981–82) 291–404. Series. W. J. BURGHARDT, "Literature of Christian Antiquity: 1975–1979," Theological Studies 41 (1980) 151–180; "1979–1983," Theological Studies 45 (1984) 275–306. P. JACQUEMENT, "Les Pères de l'Église pour tous," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 65 (1981) 365–370. C. MONDÉSERT, ed., Le Monde grec ancien et la Bible (Bible de tous les temps 1, Paris 1984). J. FONTAINE and C. PIETRI, eds., Le Monde latin antique et la Bible (Bible de tous les temps 2; Paris 1985). A.-M. LA BONNARDIRE, ed., Saint Augustin et la Bible (Bible de tous les temps 3; Paris 1986). E. DEKKERS, "Corpus Christianorum," Epemerides theologicae Lovanienses LX (Bruges 1984) 190–193. R. M. GRANT, Gods and the One God, Library of Early Christianity 1 (Philadelphia 1986). Other Works. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, (Westminster, Md. 1950–). F. L. CROSS, The Early Christian Fathers (London 1960). B. ALTANER, Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati (Rome 1946) 1:483–520. W. BAUER, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, R. KRAFT and G. KRODEL, eds. (Philadelphia 1971). J. DANIELOU, History of Early Christianity, 3 v., tr. J. BOWDEN (London and Chicago 1964–1977). A. GRILLMEIER, Christ in Christian Tradition, tr. J. BOWDEN (2d rev. ed. Atlanta 1976). E. HENNECKE, W. SCHNEEMELCHER, and R. MCL. WILSON, eds., New Testament Apocrypha 2 v., tr. A. J. B. HIGGINS, et al. (Philadelphia 1963–64). J. J. PELIKAN, The Christian Tradition, v. 1, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (Chicago 1971). J. M. ROBINSON, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library (Claremont, Cal. 1977). J. M. ROBINSON and H. KOESTER, Trajectories through Early Christianity (Philadelphia 1971). E. A. LIVINGSTONE, ed., Studia Patristica, XVIII. Papers of the 1983 Patristic Conference, 4 v. (Kalamazoo 1985–87). B. LAYTON, ed., The Rediscovery of Gnosticism. Proceedings of International Conference on Gnosticism at Yale University, 2 v. (Leiden 1981). E. P. SANDERS, ed., Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, v. 1. The Shaping of Christianity in the Second and Third Centuries (Philadelphia 1980). C. HEDRICK and R. HODGSON, eds., Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism and Early Christianity (Peabody, Mass. 1986). M. AUBINEAU, "Textes nouveaux d'Hésychius de Jérusalem. Bilan et méthodes," Studia Patristica, XVIII, 345–351. J. DIVIAK, Sancti Aurelii Augustini opera. Sect. 2 Pars 6. Epistolae ex duobus codicibus nuper in lucem prolatae, Corpus Scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum, 88 (Vienna 1981). G. H. R. HORSLEY, New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity: A Review of the Greek Inscriptions and Papyri published in 1978 (North Ryde, NSW 1983). B. A. PEARSON and J. E. GOEHRING, eds., The Roots of Egyptian Christianity (Philadelphia 1986). H. CHADWICK, History and Thought of the Early Church (London 1982). G. C. STEAD, Substance and Illusion in the Christian Fathers (London 1985). S. BROCK, Syriac Perspectives on Late Antiquity (London 1984). H. J. W. DRIJVERS, East of Antioch: Studies in Early Syriac Christianity (London 1984). R. M. GRANT, Christian Beginnings: Apocalypse to History (London 1983). R. A. MARKUS, From Augustine to Gregory the Great (London 1983).

[W. J. BURGHARDT/D. P. EFROYMSON/T. HALTON]

PATRISTIC THEOLOGY

The development of Christian thought about God and the mystery of man's destiny in the writings of the Fathers of the Church during the first seven centuries A.D. constitutes patristic theology. It differs from Biblical theology in that it consciously reflects the philosophical and religious thought of the Hellenistic world, while its emphasis on a positive approach to Scripture and the Church's tradition and its lack of systematization distinguish it from scholastic and post-Tridentine theology.

Coincident with the Biblical approach, patristic theology is concerned primarily with an event: man's meeting with Christ, the Son of God, who suffered under Pontius Pilate, died, and rose again from the dead. This was the essential consideration of Christian thought, and from time to time threatened to be the Christian's sole interest. However in the annunciation and explanation of this event the Church's teachers were constrained to utilize contemporary philosophy, religious concepts, and cultural patterns in order to defend and clarify their message. Thus patristic theology is an amalgam of Judeo-Christian, Hellenistic, and some Oriental thought adapted to the singular facts enunciated in the Old and New Testaments about God, and enacted by Christ in His own life, and in the life of the Church, His Mystical Body.

It was EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, the great Church historian, who in the 4th century certified the legitimacy of the word theology for Christian usage. He described the Evangelist St. John as "The Theologian," since his Gospel is concerned primarily with the divinity of Christ (De eccl. theol. 1.20; 2.12), and announced the purpose of his Church history as a demonstration of the "theology and economy of salvation according to Christ" (Ecclesiastical History 1.1.7; prol. 2).

THE BEGINNINGS

Earlier Christian thinkers had hesitated to use the words theologos, theologia, theologeîn because, as St. Augustine, quoting the naturalist Varro, remarked, there were three kinds of pagan theology: rational, or an explanation of the gods in their myths; physical, or the explanation of the world in its causes; and civil, devoted to the essentially political religion and cult of the city-state or imperial dynasty (Civ. 6.5; Tertullian, Ad nat. 2.1, 2).

Greek thought associated theology with the theogonies of the poets, particularly Orpheus, Homer, and Hesiod. Aristotle contrasted these theologians with Thales and Anaximander who sought a physical explanation of things, while in his Metaphysics (bk. 12) he supplied a philosophy about God that is a solid natural theology. The Neoplatonists and some Church Fathers considered Plato a theologian, although he used the word theology to designate the educative value of mythology (Rep. 379A).

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA gave Christian recognition to theology as the knowledge of divine things. While Clement recognized the poetical function of ancient pagan theology, he credited the philosophers with a desire to achieve knowledge of the true God (Strom. 1.13; 5.9). Origen spoke of the “ancient theologians among the Greeks” and the “theology of the Persians” as devoted to an explanation of religion and the divinity; but gradually he limited theologia and theologeîn to the Christian sense of a true knowledge of God (Cont. Cel. 6.18; Comm. in Jn 2.34) and particularly of Christ the Savior (ibid. 1.24).

Despite the warnings of early Christians such as Tatian, Tertullian, and Lactantius against a speculative consideration of faith, an explanation of the fact of Christ’s activities, and the mystery embodied in the CHRISTIAN WAY OF LIFE in the Church early proved a necessity. This was apparent to St. Paul, who experienced the shock caused by the preaching of “Christ crucified, a scandal to the Greeks, a stumbling block to the Jews.” While he warned against “philosophy” and human deceit controlled by the demons (Col 2.8–20), he illustrated his teaching with parallels in nature and in Judeo-Hellenistic thought.

Jewish Theology. Jewish theological speculation embodied in the Apocalypses, Haggadah, Pescherim, and liturgical writings greatly influenced both the New Testament and the Judeo-Christian thought concerned with the nature of God, angelology, eschatology, and dualistic considerations of the problem of evil. These influences are apparent in the so-called APOSTOLIC FATHERS from Clement and the Didache to the Pseudo-Barnabas and Ignatius of Antioch. But it was with the Apologists that true theological thinking began.

Converts from philosophy, convinced that in Christ the Logos they had finally achieved truth, they utilized the arguments and topoi in the handbooks and florilegia of the current Stoic, Pythagorean, and Platonic schools to ridicule the gods and counter the anti-Christian charges. While they addressed the public authorities in protest against persecution of the Christians, their primary function was a missionary effort aimed at converting their contemporaries. In this they had as precedent a considerable Judeo-Hellenistic literature in the Letter of Aristaeas, the Judeo-Christian Sibylline Books, and PHILO JUDAEUS. They admitted that the philosophers had achieved some appreciation of truth which, since it was one, had to be homogeneous. Following Philo they claimed that Plato and the earlier thinkers had read Moses and the Prophets for their knowledge of monotheism or had retained a kernel of truth given in an original revelation and preserved among both Greeks and barbarians. But in any case the Christians now possessed the fullness of truth in Christ (Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autol. 2.12; Justin, 1 Apol. 20; Athenagoras, Suppl. 1.6).

The Apologists. The late 2d-century writers confronted their audience with the “unique, eternal, invisible God” (Athenagoras, Resur. 10), “Creator of the universe” (Justin, 2 Apol. 12.1), manifest in his works (Theophilus of Antioch, 1.6) and reminded them of the judgment facing all mankind (Justin, ibid.). Though differing in method, they presented the doctrine of the Resurrection with considerable argument following St. Paul (1 Cor) and St. John (Jn 12.24). They contrasted the purity of the Christian life with the immorality of the pagan (Justin 1 Apol. 14.1–4), utilizing the technique of the early catechesis in the DIDACHE and Letter of Barnabas.

Athenagoras stressed the Christian doctrine of love of neighbor, sanctity of marriage, and virginity (Suppl. 32–33); and the Epistle to Diognetus maintained that the Christians lived like their neighbors but kept the laws of God and man, serving as a leaven for society, giving it life as the soul does the body (5.6–13).

What the Christians took from the Greeks was a manner of explaining both monotheism and the divinity of Christ, leaning on amalgams of Platonic philosophy to establish God’s oneness, and on Stoicism for speculation on the Logos. Later they turned to Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism. The danger in this process was illustrated by the Gnostics, who employed the Platonic philosophies to speculate about God and Christ, but without the Judaic insistence on the historical actuality of Christ and His eschatological setting. Their idealist concept of the divinity gave Him no concrete place in history, and only an apparent piercing of time and space in the salvatory work of Christ. Despising the material world, they called for an absolute spiritualizing of man. The Church rejected this teaching with its parallels in Manichaeism and Marcionism, which were combated by Irenaeus of Lyons, Hippolytus of Rome, and Tertullian.

THEOLOGICAL SPECULATION

Theological advancement began with Justin and Irenaeus who spoke of the oikonomia, or economy of salvation, to designate the events in the life of Christ, “the Son of God who existed before the morning star and the moon, who consented to become flesh in order that by this economy, the serpent who from the beginning had acted evilly, and the angels who imitated him, might be destroyed” (Justin, Dialogue 45.4).

Justin embodied the mysteries of Christ, particularly His virgin birth and His Passion, in the economy, comparing these glories to the Parousia, or second coming (Dialogue 30.3). He included the events of the Old Testament, which he maintains are a typology of the things accomplished by Christ (Dialogue 134.2). They are thus part of his theology of the Word, who carries out the will of His Father (Dialogue 67.6) in the theophanies of the Old Testament (Dialogue 126.3, 5; 127.1) and operates through the Church in the Eucharist and the sacraments of His power (I Apol. 66.2), which will be visible in the second coming (Dialogue 54.1).

These fundamental ideas are developed by Irenaeus, who considered the Incarnation of Christ as the key to the history of salvation wherein God has approached man to bring man to God (Adversus haereses 4.20.1), an idea that will be emphasized by St. ATHANASIUS (De Incarn. 53). Again it is Christ who carried out His Father's will in the Old Testament encounters (Demonst. 45), and who is the Beginning and the Law, the Resurrection and the Life. He saw the two Testaments as two steps in the reeducation by grace of man who sinned from ignorance as a child (nepios), and portrayed Christ as the recapitulation of man, submitting to human experience, but conquering sin and the devil and effecting a recapitulation of all things in His Church by sending man the Holy Spirit in preparation for the final restoration of all things in God (Adversus haereses 3–5; Demonst. 31–33).

Development of Speculative Theology. True theological speculation began with the 3d-century Fathers, particularly Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Methodius of Olympus, Hippolytus of Rome, and Tertullian. The doctrine of ideas in the mind of God had been accepted by Philo Judaeus and combined with Jewish thought expressed in the Books of Wisdom, which saw God's wisdom not merely as an attribute, but as a mysterious entity, possibly personal, who in the beginning assisted God in creation. First-century Jewish speculation had concentrated further on powers, the names of God, and the angel of God, through whom He worked in dealing with the universe. Philo translated the Hebrew word dabar (the power, or word, of God) by the Greek word Logos, thus identifying the notion of knowledge or wisdom with the Hebrew idea of God's power. The Stoics employed logos for the fiery rational principle that formed the universe, while the Neoplatonists defined logos as "a power (dynamis) that represents a higher principle in action on a lower plane."

When St. John in the prologue of his Gospel named Christ the Logos who was with God and is God, he was reflecting common usage in both the Diasporic Jewish and Hellenistic milieu. But John gave the Logos a definite meaning: He is a person; and Heb 1.3 further identified Christ with God's wisdom, calling him the "shining out of His glory.'" In contrast to the cyclical concept of history based on the material world as merely a reflection of ideas in the divine mind, the Christian thinkers of the 3d century followed the Judaic unilinear concept of history, and insisted on the historical reality of Christ, a beginning to the universe, man's destiny with creation, the history of the Fall, Redemption through the Incarnation, and the Church as an eschatological setting.

The Alexandrians were able to locate speculation about the essence of divinity within the Biblical perspective. Hence in considering Neoplatonic doctrine of the One-in-Many—the transcendent being, from whom proceeds the first mind, or Demiurge, who in turn brings into existence the intelligent soul of the universe—they had at least a similitude for the doctrine of the Trinity. But it was a dangerous similitude, and caused some of the Christian thinkers to subordinate the Logos to the Father, and the Holy Spirit to the Logos.

Arius and Eunomius later made the Father the transcendent One; the Logos-Son, the Divine Mind; and the Holy Spirit, something equivalent to the world soul. In reaction to this tendency, the Monarchians (see MONARCHIANISM) denied a real distinction in the persons of the Trinity, seeing them as single phases in the divine life, or modes (see MODALISM) of the divine being. The latter were likewise influenced by Stoicism, which postulates an expanding and contracting Divinity who produces the universe out of His divine substance and periodically reabsorbs it into Himself.

Conciliar Definitions. Athanasius of Alexandria and the Council of NICAEA I (325) clarified the issue of the Trinity by denying that there could be degrees of divinity, and defining the Son as HOMOIOUSIOS or consubstantial with the Father, thus likewise eliminating any idea of inferiority of the Son in relation to the Father. The definition of the consubstantiality of the Holy Spirit with Father and Son was the result of subsequent discussion led by DIDYMUS THE BLIND, HILARY OF POITIERS, Basil of Caesarea, and the Cappadocian fathers and consummated by the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I in 381.

SCRIPTURAL FOUNDATIONS AND INFLUENCE

The greater portion of this early Christian theology was represented by scriptural exegesis. Justin and Irenaeus had engaged in a typological explanation of the Old Testament in relation to the New, and Clement of Alexandria stressed the fact that the Old Testament was a preparation for the New. He utilized a collection of texts called Testimonia that were a continuation of the Jewish technique, to supply a series of types such as the tree of life planted in the world which represented the Divine Wisdom for Moses and Solomon (Strom. 5.2.75).

In the East: Clement and Origen. Clement's theology stemmed from his conception of the Logos as the divine reason and teacher of the world, and is developed in his exegesis by an insistence on Christ's activities as the mysteries or sacraments whose salvific effects originated before the creation of the universe, and are extended through time in the Church, in which the hierarchy is established on the pattern of the angelic choirs.

Origen most consciously used the allegorical techniques employed by the pagan teachers in the explanation of Homer and the poets. He worked out a threefold interpretation of the Scriptures: the literal or historical meaning, the moral, and the typological. This methodology was reflected in both Western and Eastern exegesis, rising to a fourfold interpretation—literal, allegorical, typological, and anagogic—with Hilary of Poitiers and RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA (De bened. patriarch.).

Origen's Peri Archon, or First Principles, is actually an attempt at theological speculation rather than a systematic treatise. Its four books dealt with God, the world, freedom, and revelation, and were explicitly intended as "an examination into the reasons behind" the unalterable truths of the faith revealed by Christ and preached by the Apostles. Aided by the Holy Spirit, he desired "to form a connected series and a body of truths based on the Scriptures and deduced by drawing correct conclusions from those truths" (Preface 10). His errors regarding the preexistence of souls, a possible metempsychosis, and the anakephalaiosis or recapitulation arose from Neoplatonist influence in a realm of thought he felt was open to speculation.

The typological approach to theology is furthered by Hippolytus, who developed the relation between Joseph, David, Susanna, and Christ, and the Church. He is the first Father to compose a consecutive explanation of a book of Scripture—his Commentary on the Canticle of Canticles. His contribution to the catechesis of the Resurrection and the mystagogic significance of the Church and Sacraments influenced AMBROSE of Milan and CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, particularly in regard to the triple parousia of Christ in his Christology, ecclesiology and eschatology. METHIDIUS OF OLYMPUS pursued the typology of Christ as the new Adam, and of the Church as the new Eve. He gave a mystical explanation of the relation between Christ and the Virgin in an ecclesial sense, and indulged in number speculation certainly influenced by the Pythagoreans.

In the West: Tertullian and His Successors. In the West Tertullian, despite his disjunct "What has Athens to do with Jerusalem?" (De Idol. 19), witnessed at once to the Church's theological tradition concerning the nature of God, the relationship between the two Testaments

(Adv. Marc.), the Christology, and sacramental mysteries of the faith. He helped determine the Church's terminology, and more particularly the development of moral concepts based on free will and God's law, influenced at once by his legal background, the Stoic attitude toward nature, and the Church as an institution in competition with the imperial organization surrounding it.

The law of God and the law of the Gospel were explained as the guide to the Church's tradition and deposit of faith; the bishops were the official dispensers of the divine mysteries, and the Church was the Ark without which no one could be sanctified. In his soteriological thought, sin was a crime against God's sovereignty calling for satisfaction, and words such as debt, guilt, and merit are often employed. The redemption is seen as an intervention of God to vindicate His law through One who took man's sin upon Himself to achieve man's forgiveness.

In order to be the Mediator between God and man, Christ had to be both true God and true man (Adv. Marc. 2, 3; De Resur. 63). Thus soteriological thought gave rise to Christological precisions, and this is true of Novatian's De Trinitate, Ambrose's De fide, and Augustine's De Trinitate, and led directly to Leo's Tome to Flavian accepted at the Council of CHALCEDON, which "recognized the difference of the natures" united without admixture or confusion in the One Person of the Son of God.

The Problem of Grace. Western preoccupation with man's moral obligations brought about the problems of the nature of grace and its efficacy posed by the Pelagians (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM) and settled by Jerome, Augustine, and the Roman See; and, while the doctrine of man's deification was brought to the West by Irenaeus and echoes through Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 2.27) and Cyprian (Epist. 58.6), its appearance in Hilary of Poitiers and Leo I is due to their contact with later Eastern ideas. This is likewise true of concern for freedom of the will, which Origen found necessary to assert against the astrologers of his day, and Tertullian defended against the Stoics and Marcion.

Cyprian of Carthage was involved in the controversy over penance and the rebaptism of heretics, problems that forced him to reconsider his doctrine on the unity of the Church, and which led in the 4th and 5th centuries to a development of the Roman understanding of the papal primacy that grew obviously from Siricius and Innocent I to Leo I and Gelasius, and was full-fledged with Gregory the Great.

There was a constant interchange of Western and Eastern ideas all during this period, aided by the exile of Hilary in the East and Athanasius in the West and a constant going back and forth of bishops, scholars, and monks. Athanasius was responsible for the flowering of a vast cenobitic and monastic movement in Italy and Gaul during the 4th century, stimulated by his Life of St. Anthony the Hermit (see ANTHONY OF EGYPT, ST.). Ambrose of Milan, Rufinus of Aquileia, and Jerome contributed to the furtherance of ascetical thought based upon the writings and experiences of St. Basil, St. PACHOMIUS, and the DESERT FATHERS; they stressed the value of virginity and continence as well as the practice of austere virtue that is a consequence of participation in the mysteries of salvation.

THE GOLDEN AGE OF PATRISTIC THEOLOGY

In the East, theological speculation continued with the mystical tendencies embodied in the Alexandrian doctrine of man made in the image of God and called to the imitation of Christ, as it was developed particularly in GREGORY OF NYSSA, EVAGRIUS PONTICUS, and EPHREM THE SYRIAN. At the same time, Antiochene preoccupation with the literal approach toward the Scriptures and a more Aristotelian anthropology represented by Diodore of Tarsus (d. 394), Flavian of Antioch (d. 404), THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (d. 428), and THEODORRET OF CYR (d. c. 466) made them wary of the allegorical exegesis favored at Alexandria. In their Christology, they insisted upon the human factors in Christ's constitution, leading their Alexandrian opponents to accuse them of dividing Christ into "two sons" when Nestorius refused to apply the term THEOTOKOS to Mary, preferring to call her the Christotokos, or Mother of Christ.

Christology. The Christological problem arose in good part from the attempt to apply the Trinitarian concepts of substance and person directly to the person and natures in Christ. It was also the result of the Alexandrian ontological approach, seeing man's deification as his final goal, whereas the Antiocheans had a fear of breaking down the impassable distinction between the finite and the infinite and saw man's destiny in moral perfection that would be realized in the resurrection.

The quarrel came to a climax at the Council of EPHE-SUS in 431, when the Church defined the doctrine of the Theotokos; it reached a second climax at the Council of Chalcedon (451), when Antiochene, Alexandrian, and Western thought were amalgamated on the basis of Leo's Tome to Flavian and the Letter of Union signed by both Cyril of Alexandria and John of Antioch in 433. No great progress was made at Justinian's Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II in 553, and as a consequence questions regarding Christ's human faculties returned to bother the Church down to modern times, though the question of two wills was settled at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III in 681.

Heretical Views. The controversies during the later patristic period occasioned the rise of two separate heretical churches, the Monophysite and the Nestorian (see MONOPHYSITISM; NESTORIANISM), and involved the ecclesiastical and imperial authorities in a series of struggles that resulted in the domination of the Eastern Church by the State, with the emperors taking an active part in the theological controversies. Some of the emperors, such as THEODOSIUS II and JUSTINIAN I, demonstrated considerable theological ability.

The Monophysites, with SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH, PHILOXENUS OF MABBUGH, and their supporters, produced an enormous theological literature and were able to influence clergy, monks, and laity by their insistence on man's vocation to deification with a definite mystical tendency. Their opponents were equally productive, from JOHN THE GRAMMARIAN and FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE, whose Defense of the Three Chapters was one of the finer theological productions of the 6th century, to JOHN OF SCYTHOPOLIS, the Chalcedonian who wrote the first commentary on the writings of the Pseudo-Dionysius, and LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM, who wrote against both the Nestorians and the Eutychians, employing Aristotelian logic and Neoplatonist psychology.

The two men who dominate the great productive period of patristic theology are JOHN CHRYSOSTOM in the East, and Augustine in the West. Chrysostom exhibited a reluctance to enter the intricacies of theological disputation, saying that the two natures in Christ are conjoined "by a union ineffable and past understanding; ask not how" (Hom. in Joh. 11.2). He devoted himself to a practical explanation of the whole of Scripture in his homilies and pastoral instruction that is unsurpassed in breadth of interest, social and psychological understanding, and witness to the traditional teaching of the Church.

Augustinian Theology. St. AUGUSTINE insisted that the understanding of the faith (intellectus) is not merely a knowledge of the truths of revelation, but an encounter with God as an end to be loved. It is the pia fides that purifies the soul. He refused to separate knowledge from its moral obligations. The Augustinian theology of contemplation implies the use of all man's resources in soul and spirit, and the vision at Ostia was an immortal example of this experience.

In the De Trinitate he offered a systematic explanation: the movement toward God constituted by an exercise of wisdom forces the soul to use corporeal objects, then the memory for previous acquisitions, to find God in the superior portion of the mind. The use of sensible similitudes and the resources of science and the arts open the mind to a comprehension of divine things enhanced by faith and elevated by grace. Thus the first seven books of the De Trinitate were devoted to the process of credere: he established the existence of the Trinity, studied the divine attributes, and answered objections on evidence in the Scriptures and Church Fathers. In books 8 to 15 he proceeded modo interiore, by analogies taken from nature, man's moral life, and divine wisdom, to give an insight into the mystery. He thus justified the employment of profane studies and the technique of theology based on pagan disciplines.

In his numerous treatises Augustine covered the whole ambit of theological interest from grace and Christology to the intricacies of the ascetico-mystical life, incorporating the liberal arts, free will and concupiscence, marriage and virginity, and the Church and the Sacraments in a vast synthesis of life in Christ.

Patristic Heritage. The heritage of patristic theology was preserved through the effort of John CASSIAN for the monks of the West, and of CASSIODORUS, ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, and BEDE for the Western Church more generally. In the East, the return to the negative theology of the 1st-century Neoplatonist Albinus, combined with the emphasis of a hierarchical ascension toward mystical union with God, was propagated by the 6th-century mitigated Monophysite writer, PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite. Eastern thought was summed up in the anonymous De Sectis and in the writings of the 7th-century Sophronius of Damascus, MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR, and particularly St. JOHN DAMASCENE, whose De fide orthodoxa is a remarkable summary of Greek thought on the principle Christian doctrines and was taken over by the Western scholastics.

Whereas a polemical spirit characterized much of the patristic theological writings, equanimity had been practiced by Clement of Alexandria and Origen; in his five theological orations, Gregory of Nazianzus called for justice and charity in dealing with opponents, while St. Leo the Great insisted on moderation.

The scholastics made considerable use of the patristic writings, particularly in florilegia, or collections of texts that go back to the 3d and 4th centuries and are the continuations of the Biblical Testimonia. Their witness to the Church's tradition has never been unheeded; but a tendency to rationalize their teachings and theology generally prevailed in the late scholastic and post-Tridentine period, despite the call of Melchior CANO, and above all PETAU, for a return to the Fathers, and the great work of rediscovery and edition that was undertaken by the humanist Churchmen of the 15th and early 16th century, and pursued assiduously by the MAURISTS.

Since the middle of the 19th century there has been a reflowering of patristic thought, made possible by the comprehensive reprinting effort of J. P. MIGNE, the critical editions of the Berlin and Vienna corpora, the more recent Corpus Christianorum, and translations such as the Sources chrétiennes, the Ancient Christian Writers, and others. The turn of the 20th century saw a reflowering of patristic theology in both Catholic and non-Catholic circles, which seems to have taken on new proportions in the post-World War II period and is a substantial factor in the ecumenical progress resulting from Vatican Council II.

Bibliography: A. H. ARMSTRONG and R. A. MARKUS, Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy (New York 1964). J. DANIELOU, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II<sup>e</sup> et III<sup>e</sup> siècles (Tournai 1961); History of Early Christianity, 3 v., tr. J. BOWDEN (London and Chicago 1964–77). J. DE GHELLINICK, Patristique et moyenâge: Études d'histoire littéraire et doctrinale, v.1 (2d ed. Paris 1949), v.2, 3 (Brussels 1947–48) v.1–3. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Maryland 1950– ) v.1–3. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960). A. VON HARNACK, History of Dogma, tr. N. BUCHANAN et al., 7 v. (London 1896–99). J. TIXERONT, History of Dogmas, tr. H. L. BRIANCEAU, 3 v. (St. Louis 1910–16). AUGUSTINIAN PATRISTIC INSTITUTE OF ROME, Patrology, A. DI BERARDINO, ed., with introduction by J. QUASTEN, The Golden Age of Latin Patristic Literature from the Council of Nicea to the Council of Chalcedon, tr. P. SOLARI (Westminster 1986). A. GRILLMEIER, Christ in Christian Tradition, tr. J. BOWDEN (2d rev. ed. Atlanta 1976). J. J. PELIKAN, The Christian Tradition, v. 1, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (Chicago 1971).

[F. X. MURPHY]

PATRON SAINTS

INTRODUCTION

The custom of designating patron saints arose from the practice of building churches over the tombs of martyrs. Constantine was responsible for the great Roman basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls. Similarly the basilicas of St. Lawrence in Agro Verano, St. Sebastian, St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana, among others, were built on sites where their bodies were buried. The saints came to be regarded as the special advocates and intercessors for the churches and the people who assembled in them. Dedication of churches to saints and angels followed. The reference to the seven angels of the seven churches the Book of Revelation (1:20 ff) may have provided a precedent for the practice of churches seeking the patronage of angels. A church in Ravenna was dedicated to St. Michael the Archangel as early as 545.

Over time the choice of a particular patron has depended upon many factors. In summary, patrons have been chosen for one or more of the following reasons: (1) a church or chapel is the burial place of a martyr or confessor; (2) a church or chapel is the repository of an important relic of the saint; (3) saints who were the first to bring the Gospel message to a region or a people as, for example, St. Patrick in Ireland, St. Ansgar in Scandinavia; (4) the cult of a saint fostered by national pride and tradition; (5) the popularity of a saint at a given time, e.g. St. Thérèse of Lisieux in the 20th century; (6) the personal devotion and priorities of a pastor or important benefactor; (7) the identification of a saint with a particular situation or condition in his lifetime or heritage.

Saint Bernardo, Patron Saint of Climbers, Valle d'Aosta, Italy. (©Sandro Vannini/CORBIS)

The 1917 Code of Canon Law spoke of titles, that is, the permanent names assigned to churches to distinguish one from another. If the title was the name of a saint, the person was called a patron, an advocate (1917 CIC c. 1168), and the titular feast was to be celebrated annually in the church. Blessed were able to be named patrons only with permission of the Holy See, generally granted to places and groups associated with the individual. The 1983 code is silent on the matter of titular patrons.

Patrons found their greatest popularity in the high Middle Ages. Towns were named after saints and nearly every institution and circumstance of life had its heavenly protector. The choice of heavenly patrons by guilds of artisans and craftsmen was dictated by some attribute or legend associated with the name of saint that linked their members to him or her. St. Vitus who was said to have been martyred in a caldron appealed to kettle-makers. Archers venerated St. Sebastian. Wagon-makers chose St. Catherine of Alexandria because a wheel was the means of her martyrdom. Tailors sought the patronage of St. Martin of Tours because he was said to have cut his mantle in half, giving one part to a beggar who turned out to be Christ. The intercession of other saints was implored for particular illnesses because they themselves had suffered from a particular malady or they ministered to those who had.

The practice of giving a child a Christian name at baptism is of medieval origin. As late as the ninth century, children in Germany were customarily given old Teutonic names, but gradually the sentiments of the people led to the custom of conferring the name of saints at baptism. The name of John the Baptist was very widely invoked in the 11th century, then the names of the apostles, and eventually the names were taken from litanies of the saints and the liturgical calendar. The importance given in medieval times to patron saints is reflected a decree of the Council of Benevento in 1374 that forbade the practice of repeating the baptismal rite in a case where a name had been omitted in the original administration. The Catechism of the Council of Trent strongly urged that the name given at baptism be from the catalogue of saints.

The saint after whom one is named is held up as a model for imitation as well as being one's guardian and advocate (II, s.v., Baptism, n. 76). The 1917 Code of Canon Law encouraged parents to choose a saint's name and, if they refused, the pastor was to enter both the given name and the name of a saint in the baptismal register (c. 761). The 1983 Code states that "parents, sponsors, and the pastor are to see that a name is not given which is foreign to Christian sentiment" (CIC c. 855).

The patron serves as a model of holiness and charity for the neophyte. The Catechism of the Catholic Church explains at baptism that people are sanctified by the Lord's name, and Christians receive their name in the Church. "This can be the name of a saint, that is, of a disciple who has lived a life of exemplary fidelity to the Lord. The patron saint provides a model of charity; we are assured of his intercession" (no. 2156).

Dates in parentheses represent the date that an individual was declared to be patron; most patronages have developed in a less formal manner.

PATRONS

Academics: Thomas Aquinas

Actors: Genesius

Adopted children: Clotilde, Thomas More

Advertisers: Bernardine of Siena (May 20, 1960)

Alpinists: Bernard of Montjoux (or Menthon) (August 20, 1923)

Altar servers: John Berchmans

Anesthetists: René Goupil

Animals: Francis of Assisi

Archaeologists: Damasus

Archers: Sebastian

Architects: Thomas Apostle

Art: Catherine de Virgi of Bologna

Artists: Luke, Catherine of Bologna, Bl. Fra Angelico (February 21, 1984)

Astronomers: Dominic

Athletes: Sebastian

Authors/Writers: Francis de Sales (April 26, 1923), Lucy

Aviators: Our Lady of Loreto (1920), Joseph of Cupertino

Bachelors: Giuseppe Mario Carolo Alphonse Moscati

Bakers: Elizabeth of Hungary, Nicholas

Bankers: Matthew, Bl. Joseph Tardini

Barbers: Cosmas and Damian, Louis

Basket-makers: Anthony, Abbot

Bees: Ambrose

Beggars: Martin of Tours

Blacksmiths: Dunstan

Blood banks: Januarius

Bookbinders: Peter Celestine

- Bookkeepers: Matthew Booksellers: John of God
 Boy Scouts: George
 Brewers: Luke, Nicholas of Myra
 Bricklayers: Stephen
 Brides: Nicholas of Myra
 Bridges: John Nepomucene, Bénézet
 Broadcasters: Gabriel
 Builders: Vincent Ferrer
 Butlers: Adelelm

 Cabdrivers: Fiacre of Breuil
 Canonists: Raymond of Peñafort
 Carpenters: Joseph
 Catechists: Angela Merici, Charles Borromeo, Peter Canisius, Robert Bellarmine
 Catechumens: Ambrose of Milan, Augustine of Hippo
 Catholic Action: Francis of Assisi (1916)
 Catholic Press: Francis de Sales
 Charitable societies: Vincent de Paul (May 12, 1885)
 Chastity: Thomas Aquinas
 Chefs (Italian): Francis Caracciolo (1996)
 Chefs (Pastry): Honoratus
 Childbirth: Felicity, Raymond Nonnatus, Gerard Majella, Margaret of Antioch, Bl. Marie d'Oignies
 Children: Nicholas of Myra
 Choirboys: Dominic Savio (June 8, 1956)
 Church Universal: Joseph (December 8, 1870)
 Circus people: Julian the Hospitaller
 Civil Disorder/Riots: Andrew Corsini
 Colleges and Universities: Thomas Aquinas, Bl. Contardo Ferrini
 Comedians: Vitus
 Communications personnel: Gabriel
 Computer Users: Isidore of Seville
 Confessors: Alphonsus Liguori (April 26, 1950)
 Converts: Justin, Elizabeth Seton
 Cooks: Martha
 Coppersmiths: Maurus

 Dairy workers: Brigid of Ireland
 Dancers: Vitus
 Dentists: Apollonia
 Desperate situations: Gregory Thaumaturgist, Jude Thaddeus, Rita of Cascia Difficulties: Eustace
 Divorce: Helena
 Dyers: Maurice, Lydia

 Ecologists, Environmentalists: Francis of Assisi (November 29, 1979)
 Ecumenists: Cyril and Methodius, Bl. Elizabeth Hesselblad, Bl. Maria Gabriella Sagheddu
 Editors: John Bosco
 Educators, Catholic: Bl. Karolina Gerhardinger

 Emigrants: Frances Xavier Cabrini (September 8, 1950)
 Engineers: Ferdinand III
 Epidemics and Pestilence: Christopher and Giles
 Epilepsy: Vitus, Willibrord
 Eucharistic Devotion: Pierre Julien Eymard, Paschal Baylon (November 28, 1897)
 Expectant mothers: Raymond Nonnatus, Gerard Majella

 Falsely accused: Raymond Nonnatus
 Families: Bl. Gianna Beretta Molla, Bl. Giuseppina Bonino, Bl. Giovanni Piamarta
 Farmers: George, Isidore
 Fathers: Joseph (1899)
 Firemen: Florian
 Fire prevention: Catherine of Siena
 First communicants: Tarcisius
 Fishermen: Andrew
 Flight Attendants: Bona of Pisa (March 2, 1962)
 Florists: Thérèse of Lisieux
 Forest workers: John Gualbert
 Foundlings: Holy Innocents
 Friendship: John the Divine, Aelred of Rievaulx
 Funeral directors: Joseph of Arimathea, Dismas

 Gardeners: Adelard, Tryphon, Fiacre, Phocas
 Glassworkers: Luke
 Goldsmiths: Dunstan, Anastasius
 Gravediggers: Anthony, Abbot
 Gypsies: Bl. Zeferino Jimenez

 Hagiographers: Athanasius, Gregory the Great Hairdressers: Martin de Porres
 Homeless: Margaret of Cortona, Benedict Joseph Labré
 Home Missions: Katharine Drexel
 Horses: Giles
 Hospital administrators: Basil the Great, Frances X Cabrini
 Hospitality/Lodgings: Gertrude of Nivelles, Julian the Hospitaller Hospitals: Camillus de Lellis and John of God (June 22, 1886)
 Housekeepers: Zita
 Hunters: Hubert, Eustachius

 Infantrymen: Maurice
 Innkeepers: Amand, Julian the Hospitaller

 Janitors: Theobald
 Jewelers: Eligius, Dunstan
 Journalists: Francis de Sales (April 26, 1923), Bl. Titus Brandsma
 Jurists: John Capistrano

 Laborers: Isidore, James, John Bosco
 Lawyers: Ivo (Yves Helory), Genesisius, Thomas More Librarians: Jerome
 Lighthouse Keepers: Venerius of Milan (March 10, 1961)

 Linguists: Gottschalk
 Locksmiths: Dunstan
 Lost Articles: Anthony of Padua, Arnulf of Metz, Daniel of Padua Lovers: Raphael, Valentine Maids: Zita
 Mariners: Michael, Nicholas of Tolentino
 Marriage: John Francis Regis, Bl. Otto Neururer, Ursula of Cologne, Bl. Benedetta Frassinello, Bl. Elizabeth Canori-Mora, Bl. Giuseppe Tovini
 Married Couples: Joachim and Anne, Bl. Luchesius and Buona of Poggibonsi
 Merchants: Francis of Assisi, Nicholas of Myra Messengers: Gabriel
 Metal workers: Eligius of Noyon
 Military chaplains: John Capistrano (February 10, 1984)
 Millers: Arnulph, Victor
 Missionaries: Francis Xavier (March 25, 1904), Thérèse of Lisieux (December 14, 1927), Peter Claver (1896, Leo XIII), Benedict the Moor
 Missions, parish: Leonard of Port Maurice (March 17, 1923)
 Mothers: Monica
 Motorists: Frances of Rome
 Music: Arnulf of Metz, Cecilia of Rome, Dunstan of Canterbury, Philip Neri
 Musicians: Gregory the Great, Cecilia, Dunstan
 Mystics: John of the Cross, Teresa of Avila, Bl. Rafqa
 Native Americans: Bl. Kateri Tekakwitha
 Notaries: Luke, Mark
 Nurses and Nursing: Agatha, Catherine of Siena, Elizabeth of Hungary, John of God (1930, Pius XI), Camillus de Lellis, Raphael
 Orators: John Chrysostom (July 8, 1908)
 Organ builders: Cecilia
 Orphans, Abandoned Children: Jerome Emiliani (1928), Bl. Daniel Brottier
 Painters: Bl. Fra Angelico
 Parenthood: Adelaide of Burgundy, Rita of Cascia
 Pharmacists: Cosmas and Damian, Gemma Galgani
 Philosophers: Justin, Edith Stein
 Physicians: Pantaleon, Cosmas and Damian
 Pilgrims: James the Greater
 Poets: Brigid of Ireland, John of the Cross
 Poor: Lawrence, Anthony of Padua, Bl. Giacomo Cusmano, Bl. Maria Bernardina Jablonska Poor souls: Nicholas of Tolentino
 Possessed: Bruno, Denis
 Postal employees: Gabriel
 Priests: Jean-Baptiste Vianney (April 23, 1929)
 Printers: John of God

Prisoners: Dismas, Joseph Cafasso
 Public relations: Bernardine of Siena (May 20, 1960)
 Publishers: Bl. Timothy Giaccardo, Bl. Joseph Tardini
 Race relations: Martin de Porres
 Radiologists: Michael (January 15, 1941)
 Refugees: Bl. Angela Truszkowska, Bl. Kateri Tekakwitha
 Retreats: Ignatius Loyola (July 25, 1922)
 Sailors: Cuthbert, Brendan, Eulalia, Christopher, Peter González, Erasmus, Nicholas
 Scholars: Bede the Venerable
 Schools, Catholic: Thomas Aquinas (August 4, 1880), Joseph Calasanz (August 13, 1948)
 Scientists: Albert the Great (August 13, 1948), Bl. Niels Stensen
 Sculptors: Four Crowned Martyrs
 Seamen: Francis of Paola
 Searchers of lost articles: Anthony of Padua
 Secretaries: Genesisius
 Secular Franciscans: Louis of France, Elizabeth of Hungary
 Seminarians: Charles Borromeo
 Senior Citizens: Polycarp, Marie Poussepin
 Shepherds: Drogo
 Shoemakers: Crispin and Crispinian
 Sick: John of God and Camillus de Lellis (June 22, 1886)
 Silversmiths: Andronicus
 Single mothers: Margaret of Cortona
 Skaters: Lydwina
 Skiers: Bernard of Montjoux (or Menthon)
 Social workers: Louise de Marillac (February 12, 1960), John Francis Regis
 Soldiers: Hadrian, George, Ignatius, Sebastian, Martin of Tours, Joan of Arc
 Spelunkers: Benedict
 Stenographers: Genesisius, Cassian
 Stonecutters: Clement
 Stonemasons: Stephen
 Students: Thomas Aquinas
 Surgeons: Cosmas and Damian, Luke Swordsmiths: Maurice Tax collectors: Matthew
 Teachers: John Baptist de la Salle (May 15, 1950)
 Telecommunications workers: Gabriel (January 12, 1951)
 Television: Clare of Assisi (February 14, 1958)
 Theologians: Augustine, Alphonsus Liguori, Thomas Aquinas
 Thieves, Repentant: Dismas
 Tour Guides: Bona of Pisa
 Toymakers: Claude
 Translators: Jerome

Travelers: Nicholas of Myra, Christopher, Raphael, Julian the Hospitaller

Unborn Children: Bl. Gianna Beretta Molla

Vocations: Alphonsus Liguori, Bl. Annibale Francia

Watchmen: Peter of Alcántara

Weavers: Paul the Hermit, Anastasius the Fuller

Wine merchants and Bar Keepers: Amand of Maestricht

Workers: Joseph

Youth: Aloysius Gonzaga (1729, 1926), John Berchmans, Bl. Pier Giorgio Frassati

INTERCESSORS IN TIMES OF PERIL AND ILLNESS

Abdominal pain: Erasmus

Abuse, Child: Bl. Laura Vicuña, Bl. Maríam Baouardy

Abuse, Wife: Bl. Elisabetta Canori-Mora, Bl. Victoria Rasoamanarivo

AIDS and Incurable Diseases: Bl. Damian de Veuster, Thérèse of Lisieux

Alcoholism: John of God, Monica, Venerable Matthew Talbot

Barren women: Elizabeth

Blindness: Odilia, Raphael, Bl. Rafqa al-Rayes

Cancer: Peregrine, Ezequiel Moreno y Díaz

Deafness: Francis de Sales, Bl. Pierre-François Jamet

Disabled: Bl. Kateri Tekawitha, Bl. Maria Bernardina Jablonska

Dying: Joseph

Earthquakes: Eustochia Calafato

Epilepsy: Albanus of Mainz, Vincent Ferrer, Vitus of Sicily

Eye disease: Lucy, Raphael, Leodogar of Autun

Fever: Antoninus of Florence, Albert of Trapani, Barbara

Glandular conditions: Cadoc of Llancarfan

Gout: Bl. Emilia Bicchieri, Erconwald of London, Gerebernus of Sonsbeck, Gregory the Great, Idesbald of Flanders

Headaches: Teresa of Jesus (Avila), Denis

Heart disease: John of God

Imprisonment: Maximilian Kolbe, Bl. Jacinta Marto, Bl. Maríam Baouardy

Insomnia: Modestus and Crescentia MM, Vitus of Sicily

Invalids: Roch

Liver Disease: Albert of Trapani, Gerard of Brogne, Odilo of Cluny

Lung disease: Bernardino of Siena

Mental Illness: Dymphna of Gheel, Christina Mirabilis

Nervous Disorders: Bartholomew the Apostle

Paralysis: Osmund of Salisbury

Rheumatism: James the Greater

Stomach problems: Brice of Tours, Emeritiana of Rome, Timothy the Apostle

Stress: Walter of Pontoise

Strokes: Andrew Avellino

Throat ailments: Blaise

Tuberculosis: Gemma Galgani, Thérèse of Lisieux

Ulcers: Martin of Tours

Wounds: Adelgondes of Maubeuge, Marciana of Mauritania

PLACES

Africa: Moses the African, Our Lady Queen of Africa (declared by Cardinal Lavigerie, 1876)

Algeria: Cyprian of Carthage

Angola: Immaculate Heart of Mary (November 21, 1984)

Central Africa: Most Pure Heart of Mary

Congo, Democratic Republic of: Immaculate Conception

Equatorial Guinea: Immaculate Conception of Mary (May 25, 1986)

Ethiopia: Frumentius

Lesotho: Immaculate Heart of Mary

Madagascar: Vincent de Paul

Nigeria: Our Lady Queen of Nigeria

North Africa: Cyprian of Carthage

South Africa: Our Lady of the Assumption (March 15, 1952)

Tanzania: Immaculate Conception (December 8, 1964)

Tunisia: Immaculate Conception

Central, North and South America

Argentina: Bl. Laura Vicuña, Francis Solano, Immaculate Conception, Our Lady of Lujan

Bolivia: Francis Solano, Our Lady of Candelaria, Our Lady of Copacabana, Our Lady of Mount Carmel

Brazil: Immaculate Conception, Nossa Senhora de Aparecida, Peter of Alcántara

Canada: Anne, John de Brébeuf, Isaac Jogues & Companions, Joseph Québec, John the Baptist

Central America: Our Lady of Guadalupe, Rose of Lima

Chile: Francis Solano, James the Greater, Our Lady of Mount Carmel

Colombia: Louis Bertrand, Peter Claver, Our Lady of Chiquinquirá, Our Lady of the Rosary

Costa Rica: Our Lady of the Angels

Cuba: Our Lady of Charity (1605), Virgen de Regla

Dominican Republic: Dominic de Guzmán, Our Lady of High Grace

Ecuador: Sacred Heart of Jesus, Most Pure Heart of Mary

El Salvador: Our Lady of Peace (October 10, 1966)

Guatemala: James the Greater

Haiti: Our Lady of Perpetual Help

Honduras: Our Lady of Suyapa

Jamaica: Mary of the Assumption

Latin America: Rose of Lima

Mexico: Bl. Elías Nieves, Joseph, Our Lady of Guadalupe Cuautitlán, Bonaventure

Mexico City: Philip de las Casas (first native-born saint) Nicaragua: James the Greater
 North America: Isaac Jogues & Companions, Our Lady of Guadalupe
 Paraguay: Francis Solano, Our Lady of the Assumption (July 13, 1951), Our Lady of Lujan
 Peru: Francis Solano, Joseph (March 19, 1957), Rose of Lima, Turibius of Mongrovejo
 Puerto Rico: Our Lady of Divine Providence
 Santo Domingo: Our Lady of Ransom
 South America: Rose of Lima
 United States: Immaculate Conception (1846), Our Lady of Guadalupe
 Uruguay: James the Greater, Our Lady of Lujan, Philip the Apostle, Virgen de los Treinte y Tres (November 21, 1963)
 Venezuela: Our Lady of Comotomo
 West Indies: Gertrude of Helfta

Asia

Borneo: Francis Xavier
 China: Joseph, Mary, Queen of China
 East Indies: Francis Xavier, Thomas the Apostle
 India: Francis Xavier, Our Lady of the Assumption, Rose of Lima, Thomas Didymus, Goa, Bl. Joseph Vaz
 Indonesia: Bl. Virgin Mary
 Japan: Francis Xavier, Peter Baptist
 Korea: Joseph, Bl. Virgin Mary
 Mongolia (Inner): Immaculate Conception of Mary Mongolia (Outer): Francis Xavier
 Pakistan: Francis Xavier, Thomas Didymus
 Philippines: Pudentiana, Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception, Rose of Lima, Sacred Heart of Mary
 Sri Lanka: Lawrence the Deacon, Our Lady of Lanka
 Thailand: Bl. Nicholas Bunkerd Kitbamrung
 Vietnam: Joseph

Asia Minor: John the Evangelist

Alexandria: Cyril of Alexandria
 Arabia: Mary, Our Lady of Arabia
 Egypt: Mark the Evangelist
 Iran: Addai and Mari, Maruthas
 Jordan: John the Baptist
 Palestine: Mary, Queen of Palestine
 Syria: Addai, Mari
 Turkey: John Chrysostom, John the Evangelist

Europe: Benedict of Nursia (declared 1964 by Paul VI), Pope Benedict III, Cyril and Methodius (declared December 31, 1981, by John Paul II), Bridget of Sweden (declared October 1, 1999 by John Paul II), Catherine of Siena (declared October 1, 1999 by John Paul II), Edith Stein (declared October 1, 1999 by John Paul II)
 Albania: Our Lady of Good Counsel
 Alps: Bernard of Menthon

Armenia: Bartholomew the Apostle, Gregory the Illuminator (apostle)
 Austria: Colman of Stockerau, Florian of Noricum, Joseph, Leopold the Good, Maurice of the Theban Legion, Our Lady of Mariazell, Severino
 Belgium: Columbanus of Ghent, Joseph, Our Lady of Banneux, Our Lady of Baeuraing
 Bosnia: (Banja Luka) Bonaventure
 Bulgaria: Cyril and Methodius, Demetrius
 Croatia: (Dubrovnik) Blaise of Sebaste
 Cyprus: Barnabas the Apostle
 Czech Republic: Adalbert, Cyril and Methodius, John of Nepomuk, Ludmilla, Procopius, Wenceslaus of Bohemia
 Denmark: Ansgar (apostle of Denmark), King Canute
 England: Augustine of Canterbury, George the Great, Gregory the Great, Michael the Archangel
 Finland: Henry of Uppsala (apostle)
 France: Denis, Joan of Arc, Laurent, Martin of Tours, Our Lady of the Assumption, Remigius, Thérèse of Lisieux (May 3, 1944), Vincent the Deacon
 Georgia: Nino
 Germany: Boniface
 Gibraltar: Bernard of Clairvaux, Our Lady of Europe (May 31, 1979)
 Greece: Andrew the Apostle, Nicholas of Myra, Paul of Tarsus
 Hungary: Bl. Astericus (Anastasius), Gerard, Stephen of Hungary, Bl. Virgin Mary
 Iceland: Ansgar, Thorlac Thorhallsson (January 14, 1984)
 Ireland: Brigid of Kildare, Columbanus of Bangor, Patrick of Ireland, Our Lady of Knock, Our Lady of Limerick
 Italy: Bernardino of Siena, Catherine of Siena, Francis of Assisi, Our Lady of Loreto, Our Lady of Perpetual Help, Our Lady of Pompeii, Our Lady of Tears, Our Lady of the Snow
 Lithuania: Casimir, Cunegund (Kinga, 1695), Hyacinth, John Cantius, John of Dukla, John of Kanty (1737)
 Luxembourg: Cunegund, Our Lady of Comfort, Willibrord
 Malta: Agatha of Catania, Devota of Corsica, Our Lady of the Assumption, Paul of Tarsus
 Monaco: Devota of Corsica
 Netherlands: Plechelm, Willibrord
 Norway: Olaf of Norway, Magnus of Orkney
 Poland: Adalbert of Prague, Casimir, Cunegund (Kinga, 1695), Florian of Noricum, Hedwig of Anjou, Hyacinth, John Cantius (1737), John of Dukla, Our Lady of Częstochowa, Our Lady of Jasna Góra, Stanislaus of Kraków, Stanislaus Kostka
 Portugal: Antony of Padua, Francis Borgia, George the Great, Immaculate Conception, Vincent
 Romania: Cyril and Methodius, Nicetas

Russia: Andrew the Apostle, Basil the Great, Boris, Casimir, Joseph, Nicholas of Myra, Thérèse of Lisieux, Sergius of Radonez, Vladimir I of Kiev

Scandinavia: Ansgar

Scotland: Andrew the Apostle, Columba, Margaret of Scotland (1673), Palladius

Serbia: Sava

Slovakia: John of Nepomuk, Our Lady of the Assumption, Our Lady of Sorrows

Slovenia: George the Great

Spain: Euphrasius, Felix, Immaculate Conception, James the Greater, John of Avila, John of Nepomuk, Raymond Nonnato, Teresa of Avila, Vincent the Deacon

Sweden: Ansgar, Birgitta of Sweden, Eric, Gall, Sigfrid

Switzerland: Gall, Bl. Nicholas of Fluë

Ukraine: Josaphat, Vladimir

Wales: David (Dewi) of Wales

Oceania: Peter Mary Chanel

Australia: Our Lady Help of Christians (1964), Bl. Mary MacKillop

New Caledonia: Our Lady of the Assumption

New Zealand: Our Lady Help of Christians (1964)

Papua New Guinea: Michael the Archangel (May 31, 1979)

Solomon Islands: Michael the Archangel, Most Holy Name of Mary (September 4, 1991)

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, A New Dictionary of Saints, ed. J. CUMMINGS (rev. ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1993). Catholic Almanac, ed. OUR SUNDAY VISITOR (Indiana 1999). Penguin Dictionary of Saints (3d ed. London 1995). Butler's Lives of the Saints, ed. M. WALSH (San Francisco 1991). H. DELEHAYE, Sanctus (Brussels 1954). D. FARMER, The Oxford Dictionary of Saints (4th ed. New York 1997). S. KELLY and R. ROGERS, Saints Preserve Us (New York 1993). J. C. J. METFORD, Dictionary of Christian Lore and Legend (London 1983). H. ROEDER, Saints and Their Attributes (Chicago 1955). A. SANDOVAL, The Directory of Saints (New York 1996).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN/EDS.]

PATRONATO REAL

Royal patronage, a form of Church-State relationship in which the State played an active role in the administration and support of the Church, developed extensively in the colonial empires of Portugal and Spain. Papal grants were its foundation but it was extended through the centuries by the unilateral action of the State.

Padroado of Portugal

Padroado or patronage is a form of ecclesiastical benefice.

Origin. From the fifth century, laymen were called upon by the Church to help in the building of churches and in the establishment of other pious foundations. In return they were offered several privileges. The Council of Trent was very outspoken on this matter. Two kinds of rights were assigned to the patron: jus praesentandi and jura honorifica. The first entitled him to appoint the person to the ecclesiastical benefice, whether bishop, parish priest, abbot, etc. Rights and duties of the patrons were summarized in the following Latin verses: Patrono debetur honos, onus, emolumentum, Praesentet, praesit, defendat, alatur egenus. Patronage was thus both binding and useful to the patron. In case of need he could even avail himself of the revenues of his church or ecclesiastical foundation.

Christianity developed throughout Europe by means of this system of patronage. Portugal was no exception. Kings and nobles were patrons to many churches, chapels, and other pious foundations. In the 15th century the popes extended Portuguese patronage overseas, as the building of churches and the formation and maintenance of missionaries entailed enormous expenses. It was the Order of Christ, established in Portugal in 1319 to replace the Order of the Temple, then about to be suppressed, which received this right of patronage. As the administrators of the Order of Christ were members of the royal family, the overseas patronage became known as the Royal Patronage. The Church realized that, although there were many misuses and complaints about European patronage, it was necessary to encourage the Portuguese to carry their Christian faith overseas. From then on patronage decayed in Europe, but flourished in Africa, India, Brazil, China, Japan, etc. The reaction of the popes, from the beginning of the Portuguese expansion, was most enthusiastic. MARTIN V in 1418 started a long list of graces and privileges granted by the Church to the Portuguese overseas patronage.

The system was duly carried out with good results. Bishops were presented by the kings of Portugal, as administrators of the Order of Christ and later nominated by the Holy See. In 1580 Portugal fell under the Spanish crown and remained thus up to 1640, when a national revolution reestablished a Portuguese dynasty on the throne. During this period (1580–1640) something new had happened in Church organization. The Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (Propaganda Fide) was established in 1622, and it immediately took command of all mission work. Its first “Instructions” ordered Propaganda missionaries to carry the gospel to regions other than those already under padroado personnel. From 1622 to 1640 Portuguese patronage cooperated with the Propaganda Fide. In 1640, however, after the victory of the Portuguese revolution, relations between the two missionary bodies were seriously undermined. Spain did not at once recognize Portuguese independence and influenced the Holy See to take the same position. Portuguese bishops died one after the other, both in Europe and in the East, and were not replaced by the normal appointment of others. It was only in 1668, when both Spain and the Holy See recognized Lusitanian independence, that this sad state of affairs could be duly redressed.

Padroado versus Propaganda Fide. During this critical period of 28 years (1640–68) the long, drawn-out clashes began between missionaries sent by the Propaganda and those under the padroado. They took place mainly in Cochin China, Tonkin, Siam, and India. The padroado missionaries had several flourishing missions in these regions that had been entrusted by pontifical bulls to padroado dioceses. Taking advantage of the political situation then prevailing in Europe, Propaganda missionaries, instead of establishing themselves in other places, preferred to occupy positions close to the ones belonging to the padroado dioceses. In France, under Louis XIV, the Société des Missions Etrangères de Paris (see PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY) was founded in this period.

The Jesuit Alexander de RHODES, after an extensive tour of the East, came to the conclusion that the Church could not depend altogether on the decadent padroado dioceses. According to his opinion, the Holy See should appoint titular bishops or vicars apostolic, sent directly by Rome and independent from Lisbon. Portugal held the opinion that since the dioceses had been duly created and their boundaries properly marked in their respective bulls, any change would have to be agreed upon after mutual consultation. Besides, according to Portuguese officials, the vicars apostolic would be welcome in territories not assigned to the padroado dioceses; once within diocesan boundaries, such vicars apostolic would automatically fall under diocesan jurisdiction.

In 1658 the Holy See appointed the first two vicars apostolic, FRANÇOIS PALLU, Bishop of Heliopolis and Pierre LAMBERT DE LA MOTTE, Bishop of Berith. They received from the Holy See the task of exercising their jurisdiction not only in Tonkin and Cochin China, but also over all adjoining territories. Tonkin and Cochin China belonged to the padroado. A similar occurrence took place in Siam. The missionaries sent by the Société des Missions Etrangères de Paris built a church only four or five miles away from the one under the padroado priests. In 1668 the Holy See declared that Siam belonged indeed to the Diocese of Malacca, but later on, in 1669, came a new statement from Rome to the effect that the French missionaries could hold jurisdiction over their own Christians. Thus originated the famous double jurisdiction. Clashes occurred and in 1673 Siam was definitely taken out of the Malacca diocese. Tonkin belonged to the MACAU diocese, but was also taken over by the Propaganda in 1696, as was Cochin China.

India, however, was the scene of the most deplorable misunderstanding between padroado and Propaganda missionaries. Portuguese padroado had the following dioceses in Indian territory: GOA, Cochin, Mylapur and Cranganor. Bombay became an object of dispute between the Goanese clergy (padroado) and the Propaganda missionaries. Bombay had been given to the English as part of the dowry of the Portuguese Princess Catherine, when she married Charles II of England. The Bombay Catholic population, mainly composed of Goans, remained sympathetic toward their own missionaries (the Goan clergy), who were appointed by their ordinary, the archbishop of Goa. The new Protestant political authorities of Bombay did not rely on such priests and managed to have new missionaries sent them by the Vicar Apostolic of the Great Mogul, recently appointed, Father Mauritius of St. Theresa, an Italian Carmelite. In spite of Portuguese remonstrances, the Holy See agreed to the change and in 1720 the Goan fathers had to leave. As time went on, relations between Goa and Bombay authorities improved and in 1789 the vicar apostolic of the Great Mogul, Father Victory of St. Mary, received official notification to quit Bombay, which by then was the official residence of the same vicars apostolic. Thus the Goan priests came back, but the Bombay Catholics were already deeply divided. The East India Company, in order to avoid any further breaches of the peace, decided to divide the then existent churches between the two groups: two for the padroado and two for the Propaganda missionaries.

Between 1834 and 1836, when Portugal had broken off her diplomatic relations with Rome, the Holy See under Gregory XVI reorganized the Indian missions. Three eminent theologians were consulted as to whether the Holy See could extinguish the Portuguese padroado outside non-Portuguese territories without consulting the patron. Gregory XVI acted immediately and published the brief Multa praeclare on April 24, 1838, in which it was solemnly stated that the padroado was to be exercised only in the archdiocese of Goa and in the diocese of Macau. All the other Indian territories would belong to the Propaganda. Although Bombay belonged to the archdiocese of Goa, apparently in Rome it was taken for granted that it did not. It was this geographical error that was at the root of all future clashes. As there was no official new statement from the Holy See regarding Bombay, the padroado missionaries defended their presence in Bombay to their utmost. It was, in fact, during these years that the Church in India was shaken by most regrettable disputes. In 1841 diplomatic relations between Lisbon and Rome were renewed.

In the meantime, however, things went so far that three bishops became involved in the imbroglio: J. da Silva Torres, Archbishop of Goa; J. da Mata, Bishop of Macao; and A. Hartmann, Vicar Apostolic of Patna. Bombay was always the crucial question. While the padroado bishops maintained that until a new official decision by the Holy See was published, Bombay would continue to belong to the archdiocese of Goa, Propaganda circles asserted that by the Multa praeclare it had ceased to belong to the padroado and there was no need for further official pronouncement. The Holy See came to the conclusion that the best solution was to conclude a concordat with Portugal.

Conclusion. The concordat was duly signed in 1857. In 1886 a new concordat was negotiated and remained valid until 1928. Portuguese padroado maintained in India, besides the archdiocese of Goa, the diocese of Damão (later attached to Goa), the titular diocese of Cranganor, the diocese of Cochin, and that of St. Thomas of Mylapur. Bombay remained under double jurisdiction. Other agreements were afterward signed with the effect of reducing more and more the field of the padroado missions. In 1950, after the independence of India and upon negotiations with the Holy See, Portugal renounced the padroado in Indian territory, but the archdiocese of Goa kept some mission posts outside Portuguese Goa. A final agreement signed on Oct. 25, 1953, put an end to the padroado in India. In 1974, the Portuguese renounced their padroado privileges over the Archdiocese of Macau, putting an end to the padroado system.

In Africa and in Brazil, the padroado system had no difficulties at all, for the Propaganda missionaries did not try to work in those territories. Conflicts burst out only in territories given first to the padroado but claimed afterward by the Propaganda. As other missionaries stepped in and as Portugal had lost influence in such territories, the padroado had to adapt itself to the new circumstances.

[A. DA SILVA REGO]

Patronato of Spain

The origin, theories, operation, and effects of the patronato of Spain are similar to those of the Portuguese padroado.

Origin and Theories. Upon the return of Columbus from his first trip to America, the rulers of Spain, Ferdinand and Isabella, immediately asked Pope Alexander VI for documents affirming their right to the recently discovered territory (see ALEXANDRINE BULLS). Through letters issued in 1493, the Holy Father charged these rulers with the spiritual conquest of the natives of the New World, making concessions so broad and vague that they lent themselves to differing interpretations.

The first of these documents was the confidential Inter caetera (May 3) in which a grant was made, with exclusive rights to all the islands and land (the rights of the Portuguese rulers being respected) and with concession of apostolic privileges for the Christianizing enterprise to which the Spanish monarchs were obligated. Others followed: Piis fidelium (June 25), granting vicarial power to appoint the missionaries who were to go to the Indies and various privileges to these and to the natives of the lands discovered; Inter caetera (probably June 28), broader than the bull of the same name, with some variations but with the same intent; Eximiae devotionis (probably July 2), granting pleno jure all the privileges that the Portuguese enjoyed; and Dudum siquidem (September 25), which annulled the previous concessions and made a new general grant, unconditional and unlimited, and broader so as to include India.

Since the rights acquired by the king over the territories of the Indies were not clarified, the grant of general patronage was issued again during the papacy of Julius II. On July 28, 1508, the bull Universalis ecclesiae was issued; it gave the rulers of Castile and León the right in perpetuity to grant permission for the construction of "large churches" and to propose proper persons for the offices and benefices of the cathedrals, collegiate churches, monasteries and other pious places. It stipulated that presentations for benefices decreed in consistory were to be made to the pope and all the rest of the bishops.

From the papal documents, Spanish authors arrived at various theories as to the juridical nature of the royal right, which evolved historically as follows: (1) During the 16th century, patronage, properly speaking, was considered an ecclesiastical juridical right that the king exercised by virtue of specific apostolic concession. (2) In the 17th century it was held that the royal vicariate that made the king a delegate of the pope for the Church in the Indies originated in the Church, but once granted, it was irrevocable, properly and exclusively the monarch's in full right (juridically it could be classified as a mixed right, ecclesiastical and civil). (3) The regalism of the 18th century maintained that it was the right of the monarch, inherent in the crown and as such juridically a purely civil right, which the monarch exercised over some ecclesiastical affairs. The reaction of the Church to the doctrines these theories proclaimed was to put the works of their authors on the Index of Prohibited Books, as was done with the De indiarum iure (Madrid 1641) of Juan de Solórzano Pereira, and the Tractatus de regio patronata (Madrid 1677) of Pedro Frasso.

Operation. In spite of theoretical distinctions, in practice the right of patronage was exercised in almost the same manner throughout the centuries of viceregal

government in the Americas. Since presentation was the essential right of patronage, this aspect is most interesting to examine. Whenever the king had notice of a vacant see, he sent an order to the Cámara of the Council of the Indies to propose candidates. From all the information that had been accumulated on the ecclesiastics, the Cámara selected three names and suggested them to the king, who consulted the father confessor. The latter chose one, which the king invariably proposed to the Holy See for papal approval. The appointment of capitular prebendaries was made in the same way, without the intervention of the Roman Curia.

According to the legislative system of the Indies, the viceroys, the presidents of the audiencias and the provincial governors were vice patrons; they were charged with proposing candidates for offices and benefices. In the case of vacancies in benefices held by secular clergy, the bishop or the cabildo of the vacant see if the benefice was a bishopric, called the candidates together within a set time. When the examinations had been taken and the candidates approved, the three most suitable ones were proposed to the vice patron; he chose one and proposed him to the bishop for canonical bestowal of the benefice. For benefices held by the regular clergy, the religious superiors selected three of their subjects, in accord with their rights and proposed them to the vice patron. The latter chose one and proposed him to the bishop, who had the right to examine the candidate before approving him for the appointment.

In spite of strict limitation of the right of patronage to the presentation of candidates, the kings arrogated to themselves derivative rights. These involved not only the bureaucratic procedures to which the nominees were subjected (the same as those applying to civil public officials), but also limitations on the autonomy of the Church and of the hierarchy. The Council of the Indies was given the right to examine all documents issued by the Holy See and to allow their free circulation (regium exequatur), to hold back those that it did not want to reach the Church in America, or to change their content in order that the king's right of patronage might not be infringed upon. The bishops were prohibited from making visits ad limina and from sending information about their dioceses to Rome; they were required to send it to the Council of the Indies. Through these measures the Church in the Indies was kept completely isolated from the Roman Curia during the three centuries of the colonial period.

The king also maintained the right to send the bishop-elect to govern the diocese while procedures were under way to obtain papal approval, as well as the right of being represented in provincial councils and among the applicants for benefices by a royal delegate, who defended patronage. The holders of benefices did not receive inalienable possession of them; they were subject to removal ad nutum by the vice patron and the bishop, by common agreement, for just cause. In practice the patronato regulated the qualifications of candidates for the priesthood and for the religious life, as well as the erection of monasteries and the destruction of those built without royal permission. There was even legislation as to the place that the ecclesiastic judge and vicar-general of the diocese, not being prebendary, was to occupy in the meetings of the ecclesiastic chapter inside and outside the choir.

Effects. The methods of control established by the king—many of them not canonical—limited the action of the Church in America and hindered its full development during the viceregal period. The dioceses kept their original limits, which made spiritual government difficult. Permission was denied for building monasteries and other pious establishments; the ordination and profession of mestizos was prohibited (during the 17th century), contributing to the scarcity of secular and regular clergy and of nuns, which deprived the faithful of proper training. The anticanonical subjection of the religious orders to juridic decree and diocesan law limited the privileges and the autonomy which the Church grants to the orders to enable them to develop their apostleship in the most suitable manner; it made them virtually officials of the State.

Because of this system, which prevailed for three centuries, when independence was achieved in the American provinces the Church lacked the training necessary for establishing autonomy within the State. The new governments tried to obtain from the Holy See the same privileges of patronage that the rulers of Castile had enjoyed. Ferdinand VII prevented this through his representative to the Vatican, alleging his right of presentation, which he claimed had been granted to the person of the king, not because of his political bonds with the American people. The new republics systematically rejected nominees who arrived from Rome. In order to reconcile the interests of the various parties, the Holy See tried to provide bishops in partibus while the problem was being solved, but this effort met with protest and resistance on the part of the American hierarchy. Pius VII, Leo XII and Pius VIII finally stopped making nominations. In Mexico all the bishoprics were vacant in April 1829.

The Spanish government continued to exercise the right of patronage in Cuba, Puerto Rico and the Philippines during the 19th century.

Bibliography: Portugal. A. DA SILVA REGO, Le Patronage portugais de l'Orient: Aperçu historique (Lisbon 1957). J. GODINHO, The Padroado of Portugal in the Orient, 1454–1860 (Bombay

PATRONATO REAL

1924). E. HULL, Bombay Mission History and the Padroado Question, 2 v. (Bombay 1927–30). A. LOURENÇO, Utrum fuerit Schisma Goanum post Breve “Multa praeclare” usque ad annum 1849 (Goa 1947). Spain. J. GARCÍA GUTIÉRREZ, Apuntes para la historia del origen y desenvolvimiento del regio patronato indiano hasta 1857 (Mexico City 1941). A. DE LA HERA, El regalismo borbónico en su proyección indiana (Madrid 1963). P. DE LETURIA, Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica, 3 v. (Analecta Gregoriana, 101–103; 1959–60).

[W. M. PORRAS]